

FINAL REPORT

INTERNATIONAL LEGAL RESEARCH GROUP

FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND PROTECTION OF JOURNALISTIC SOURCES

elsa

The European Law Students' Association

INTERNATIONAL LEGAL RESEARCH GROUP ON FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION – PROTECTION OF JOURNALISTIC SOURCES

Protection of journalistic sources as one of the basic conditions for freedom of expression without which sources may be deterred from assisting the media in informing the public on matters of public interest

The European Law Students' Association

International Coordinator

Antonia Markoviti

International Academic Coordinator

Bruno Filipe Monteiro

International Research Assistants

Håkon Sverdstad Bjørvik & Mariagiulia Cecchini

International Human Resources Coordinator

Jakub Čája

International Linguistics Editor

Mark O'Reilly

International Technical Editor

Lala Darchinova

International Academic Supervisor

Ms. Silvia Grundmann

Head of the Media Division in the Information Society Department of the Directorate General Human Rights and Rule of Law, Council of Europe

July, 2016

FOREWORD

Dear Reader,

The Final Report of the International Legal Research Group on Freedom of Expression - Protection of Journalistic Sources is the outcome of a year of effort and devotion. Approximately 300 people are the 'owners' of this work. It was indeed a highly demanding procedure for all the participants, since our wish to reach a satisfactory level of academic quality, made the whole process challenging – out of the initial 35 registered countries, 28 reach the academic requirements that were set this year. However, real effort is always rewarded and we believe that this international publication will constitute a strong asset in the CV of the participants, but - most importantly - we really hope that all this acquired knowledge has essentially helped the participants to understand thoroughly one of the biggest focuses of the Council of Europe and encouraged them to pay more attention on this topic and act concretely in the future to address – at least legally – these challenges.

Of course, the achievements of the International Legal Research Group would not have been reached without the valuable support and help from many individuals.

First and foremost, as the International Coordination Team, we would like to congratulate the National Research Groups for their extraordinary work. The result is based on the will and effort of the 28 participating countries, involving approximately 300 students and academics participating as Researchers, Coordinators, Linguistics Editors and Academic Supervisors. We would like to thank all of you, because this enormous achievement is now available to act as a valuable source of information for all of our fellow students abroad and of course for anyone interested in the topic.

Indeed, the professional and academic contribution is very important for such kind of student activities. Therefore, we would like to wholeheartedly thank Ms. Barbara Orkwiszewska and the Directorate of Communications of the Council of Europe. We are very grateful for your assistance. Furthermore, we would like to acknowledge the academic support provided by the Media Division in the Information Society Department of the Directorate General Human Rights and Rule of Law, and especially the Head and International Academic Supervisor, Ms. Silvia Grundmann. Specifically, we would like to express our huge gratitude to Ms. Christina Lamprou from the aforementioned department of the Council of Europe, without whom the project would not have been realised. Thank you very much for everything. Last but not least, we are also grateful to Dagne Sabockyte, Vice President for Marketing of ELSA International 2015/16 who contributed to the project in many ways during the year and especially technically.

We wish you a pleasant reading!

Thankfully yours,

Antonia, Bruno, Håkon, Mariagiulia, Jakub, Lala and Mark

International Coordination Team of the International Legal Research Group on Freedom of Expression - Protection of Journalistic Sources

1. WHAT IS ELSA?

ELSA is a non-political, non-governmental, non-profit making, independent organisation which is run by and for students. ELSA has 43 Member and Observer countries with more than 300 Local Groups and 42,000 students. It was founded in 1981 by 5 law students from Poland, Austria, West Germany and Hungary. Since then, ELSA has aimed to unite students from all around Europe, provide a channel for the exchange of ideas and opportunities for law students and young lawyers to become internationally minded and professionally skilled. Our focus is to encourage individuals to act for the good of society in order to realise our vision: "A just world in which there is respect for human dignity and cultural diversity". You can find more information on WWW.ELSA.ORG.

2. LEGAL RESEARCH GROUPS IN ELSA

A Legal Research Group (LRG) is one of the flagship projects of ELSA. It is a group of law students and young lawyers carrying out research on a specified topic of law with the aim to make their conclusions publicly accessible. Legal research was one of the main aims of ELSA during our early years. When ELSA was created as a platform for European cooperation between law students in the 1980s, sharing experience and knowledge was the main purpose of our organisation. In the 1990s, our predecessors made huge strides and built a strong association with a special focus on international exchange. In the 2000s, young students from Western to Eastern Europe were facing immense changes in their legal systems. Our members were part of such giant legal developments such as the EU expansion and the implementation of EU Law. To illustrate, the outcome of the ELSA PINIL (Project on International Criminal Court National Implementation Legislation) has been the largest international criminal law research in Europe. In fact, the final country reports have been used as a basis for establishing new legislation in many European countries.

The results of our more recent LRGs are available electronically. ELSA FOR CHILDREN (2012) was published on COUNCIL OF EUROPE'S WEB PAGES and resulted in a FOLLOW UP LRG (2014) together with, among others, Missing Children Europe. In 2013, ELSA was involved in Council of Europe's 'No Hate Speech Movement'. THE FINAL REPORT resulted in a concluding conference in Oslo that same year and has received a lot of interest from academics and activists in the field of discrimination and freedom of speech. The RESULTS OF THE LRG CONFERENCE, a guideline, have even been translated into Japanese and were presented in the Council of Europe and UNESCO! Last year, we organized Legal Research Group on Social Rights in cooperation with Department of European Social Charter in Council of Europe. 28 National Groups contributed to Final Report and the results are going were presented on a concluding conference in Strasbourg, where the Concluding Report of the whole research was finalised. In the same year with the current LRG a new big cooperation began with the International Labour Organisation (ILO) and a new LRG with the purpose of expanding the ILO LEGOSH Database. The concrete results will be published by ILO and will be available soon.

3. WHAT IS THE LEGAL RESEARCH GROUP ON FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION – PROTECTION OF JOURNALISTIC SOURCES

The topic of new LRG is Protection of Journalistic Sources. There have been a large number of cases in which public authorities in Europe have forced, or attempted to force, journalists to disclose their sources. The European Court of Human Rights has reiterated that Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights safeguards not only the substance and contents of information and ideas, but also the means of transmitting it. The press has been accorded the broadest scope of protection in the Court's case law, including with regard to confidentiality of journalistic sources.

“Protection of journalistic sources is one of the basic conditions for press freedom. ... Without such protection, sources may be deterred from assisting the press in informing the public on matters of public interest. As a result the vital public-watchdog role of the press may be undermined, and the ability of the press to provide accurate and reliable information be adversely affected. ... [A]n order of source disclosure ... cannot be compatible with Article 10 of the Convention unless it is justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest.”

(Goodwin v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 27 March 1996, § 39).

The Council of Europe has found that violations are more frequent in member states without clear legislation. Moreover, in cases of investigative journalism, the protection of sources is of even greater importance. To shed light on this issue, ELSA has partnered with the Media and Internet Division of the Directorate General of Human Rights and Rule of Law in the Council of Europe to understand how journalistic sources are being protected in each Member-States.

Table of Contents

ELSA ALBANIA	8
ELSA AUSTRIA.....	55
ELSA AZERBAIJAN.....	109
ELSA BELGIUM.....	171
ELSA BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA.....	232
ELSA BULGARIA	287
ELSA CYPRUS	353
ELSA FINLAND.....	402
ELSA GEORGIA	454
ELSA GERMANY.....	500
ELSA GREECE.....	573
ELSA HUNGARY.....	618
ELSA IRELAND	668
ELSA ITALY	724
ELSA LATVIA.....	812
ELSA REPUBLIC OF MACEDONIA.....	886
ELSA MALTA.....	929

ELSA NETHERLANDS.....	985
ELSA NORWAY.....	1092
ELSA POLAND.....	1148
ELSA PORTUGAL.....	1212
ELSA ROMANIA.....	1280
ELSA RUSSIA.....	1336
ELSA SPAIN.....	1416
ELSA SWEDEN.....	1487
ELSA TURKEY.....	1538
ELSA UKRAINE.....	1599
ELSA UNITED KINGDOM.....	1669

ELSA ALBANIA

Contributors

National Coordinator and National Academic Coordinator

Sajmira Kopani

National Researchers

Gezim Spahiu

Migena Kore

Paola Ibraj

National Linguistic Editor

Armando Bode

National Academic Supervisor

Prof. Dr. Enkeleda Olldashi

1. Introduction

The freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society.¹ In this framework, with a particular importance is the protection of journalistic sources, as one of the basic conditions for press freedom. Therefore, the legal protection of this right, as it is affirmed in several international instruments on journalistic freedoms, deserves considerable attention within the domestic legislation of a country.

It is generally accepted that without such protection, sources may be deterred from assisting the press in informing the public on matters of public interest. As a result, the vital public-watchdog role of the press, as it is defined by the European Court of Human Rights,² could be undermined, and the ability of the press to provide accurate and reliable information be adversely affected.

Journalists in general, whether working for local, national or international media, routinely depend on non-journalists for the supply of information on issues of public interest. Some individuals serving as sources come forward with secret or sensitive information, relying upon the reporter to convey it to a broader audience. In many instances, anonymity is the precondition upon which the information is conveyed from the source to the journalist. This may be motivated by fear of repercussions which might adversely affect their physical safety or job security.³

In these circumstances, it is essential for journalists to be entitled to refuse the disclosure of both the names of their sources and the nature of the information provided in confidence. The protection of sources and their confidentiality is essential to journalistic practice, as it is very difficult for journalists to operate unless they can give a strong and genuine promise of confidentiality to their sources.⁴

Despite the clear advantages of the protection of journalistic sources, complicated situations may arise when the interests of journalists face the public interests and rights, mainly where this information is relevant to criminal or civil proceedings. In this meaning, differently from other professions such as the case of a lawyer, the protection of journalistic sources against disclosure does not constitute an absolute right which cannot be derogated from in light of specific situations. Therefore, guidelines and provisions in the domestic legislation must provide the extent to which journalists have this kind of 'privilege' to refuse divulging the identity of confidential sources.

¹ Jersild v. Denmark [1994] European Court of Human Rights Series A no. 298, p. 23, para. 31

² Goodwin v. the United Kingdom [1996] European Court of Human Rights. Series A no. 28957, para 39

³ Article 19 and Interights, 'Briefing Paper on Protection of Journalists' Sources - Freedom of Expression Litigation Project' [May 1998], <https://www.article19.org/data/files/pdfs/publications/right-to-protect-sources.pdf> accessed 05 May 2016

⁴ Centre for Media Pluralism and Media Freedom "Protection of Sources – EU Member States Laws" <http://journalism.cmpf.eui.eu/maps/protection-of-sources/> accessed 05 May 2016

The journalist is an important actor of media and therefore its position develops with the same progress as media itself. One can learn a lot about the journalist and the regulation found in the legislation with regard to the rights attributed to him, only by getting to know closer the situation and legal regulation of media.⁵

In this context, this research examines the legal situation regarding the protection of journalistic sources in the Republic of Albania, as one of the contracting states to the Council of Europe, with the obligation to guarantee the freedom of expression as stipulated by Article 10 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and other international legal acts.

2. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information? What type of legislation provides this protection? How exactly is this protection construed in national law?

The national media legislation in Albania has gone through considerable changes during the transition from a totalitarian regime to a democracy and still, nowadays, the media legal system is being approximated with national and international requirements and standards.

The legal reform of the media system started with the introduction of the Press Law in 1993, which was one of the first initiatives of the Government at the time, but this is still not sufficient. This legislative intervention was modelled after a western example (i.e. the German state of Westphalia), but failed to adjust to the Albanian context. As a result, the law on Public and Private Radio and Television, No. 8410, in 1998, was approved with a later Law on Audiovisual Media adopted in 2013.⁶ In 2007, Albania signed an Action Plan for media legal reform with European Union (EU) and the Council of Europe, which together with the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) have participated in the media legislation reform through legal expertise and consultancy.⁷

Journalists benefit of the protection from several national sources in Albania. Apart from the above-mentioned laws, the Constitution also assures protection of speech and the freedom of expression.

⁵Artan Fuga, 'The Four Challenges Faced by Albanian Media', 15 February 2013, <http://en.ejo.ch/media-economics/challenges-albanian-media> accessed 06 May 2016

⁶ Swedish Helsinki Committee for Human Rights, 'European regulation and Albanian media legislation: A comparative analysis of the main standards' <http://www.institutemedia.org/Documents/PDF/European-Albanian%20comparative%20analysis.pdf> accessed 01 May 2016

⁷ ibid.

The Constitution of the Republic of Albania states that the freedom of the press, radio and television is guaranteed.⁸ Article 17 of the Constitution provides that the fundamental rights (including the freedom of expression, freedom of the media and freedom of information) can be restricted by law, in the public interest or for the protection of the rights of others, while adding that such restrictions must be “...in proportion to the situation that has dictated it...” and “...in no case may exceed the limitations provided for in the European Convention of Human Rights.” In addition, the Law on Radio and Television also states that editorial independence is guaranteed by law.⁹

Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) does not explicitly mention the freedom of the press, but the ECHR has developed extensive case-law providing the press a special status in the enjoyment of the freedoms contained in Article 10.¹⁰ A component of this article is the protection of journalists’ sources, which is considered very important for a democratic society.

The status of the European Convention on Human Rights in the Albanian legal system is reinforced by the fact that the Albanian Parliament has ratified the convention and its successive protocols. As such, these international instruments “constitute part of the internal legal system” and even prevail, in case of conflict, over ordinary Albanian laws.¹¹

According to article 159 (1) of Criminal Procedural Code, journalists or any other professionals are not obligated to testify on what they are aware of, if that is part of the professional secret, except in specific cases for procedural authorities. Additionally, no specific provision concerning journalists or their right to protect sources is found for information classified as State Secret Acts.¹²

The Code of Ethics of the Albanian Media (the material source of law) also offers a special protection for the sources of information possessed by journalists.¹³ This Code of Ethics was drafted in 1996 and revised in 2006 with the initiative of the Albanian Media Institute, the main NGO in the country dealing with media training and policy, and the two main journalist associations: the Union of Albanian Journalists and the League of Professional Journalists. Nevertheless, even 20 years after its creation and the wide support of different organizations and

⁸ Constitution Law of the Republic of Albania, article 22

⁹ Law No. 8410 [On Public and Private Radio and Television], article 5

¹⁰ Monica Macovei ‘A guide to the implementation of Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights’, Council of Europe, January 2014 http://www.echr.coe.int/LibraryDocs/DG2/HRHAND/DG2-EN-HRHAND-02\(2004\).pdf.pdf) accessed 01 May 2016

¹¹ Constitution, article 122: “1. Any ratified international agreement constitutes part of the internal legal system after it is published in the Official Journal of the Republic of Albania. It is directly applicable, except when it is not self-executing and its application requires the adoption of law. 2. An international agreement ratified by law has priority over the laws of the country that are incompatible with it.”

¹² Law n. 8391 (For the National Informative Service) 1999 [Per SherbiminInformativKometar]

¹³ Term used for the classification of sources of law

institutions, this Code is not a binding act and its implementation relies on the willingness of journalists themselves.¹⁴

Although these national law provisions provide an implicit right for journalists not to disclose their sources of information, these provisions fail to give an implicit or explicit definition of a “source” and “information identifying a source”, as set out in the Council of Europe Recommendation Nr. R(2000)7.¹⁵

3. Is there, in domestic law, a provision that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his/her sources? How exactly is this prohibition construed in national law? What is the sanction?

Journalist all over the world find it difficult to gain access to places and situations where they can report on matters of public interest and fulfil their role as reporters of truth and wrongdoings, if they cannot guarantee confidentiality of their sources. This is a common problem in Albania, because, if a source is not ensured anonymity, then journalists will not be able to report.

In the national legal system, there are provisions protecting professional secrecy.

As previously stated, Article 159 of the Criminal Procedural Code provides that journalists are not obligated to disclose the source of information they possess. However, if the information regarding the sources is essential to evidence the criminal offense, provided that this is the only way, the court can order the journalists to disclose their sources.

Additionally, according to the “Code of Ethics of Albanian Media”, journalists should not divulge the name of a person who has provided information on a confidential, unless the person has explicitly consented.¹⁶ The right of anonymity can be infringed in special cases where:

- a) There are doubts that the source has intentionally distorted the truth;
- b) There are references that the source is the only way to avoid serious and unavoidable damages;
- c) The information is related with the planning of a criminal act.¹⁷

¹⁴Ilda Londo ‘Self-regulation and defamation’ Albanian Media Institute, pg 5:

<http://www.institutemedia.org/Documents/PDF/Self%20regulation%20and%20defamation.pdf> accessed 01 May 2016

¹⁵ Council of Europe, "Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information", appendix, definitions c. and d.

¹⁶ Ethical Code of Albanian Media, Albanian Media Institute 1996 [KodiEtikiGazetareve]

¹⁷ Para. 5, point 3, Ethical Code of Albanian Media, Albanian Media Institute 1996 [KodiEtikiGazetareve]

According to the Article 17 of Law “On Right of Information”,¹⁸ the right of information can be restricted in cases when it is necessary, proportional and if the information impairs the below-mentioned interests:

- a) The right of a private life;
- b) Commercial secret;
- c) Copyright;
- d) Patents.

It does not explicitly refer to journalists, but this can be interpreted as a way for journalists to disclose their sources for necessary cases, as mentioned in the above-stated article.

Different provisions provide cases when the breach of confidentiality may arise, but on the other hand there are no specific articles in the national framework establishing sanctions for the breach of confidentiality. The Statute of the Albanian Media Institute stipulates that a member of this association may be excluded if his/her activity is in contradiction with the obligations and the ethics of the Statute and his/her moral figure and activity seriously damages the reputation of the association.¹⁹ Therefore, sanctions imposed by this association are made only in certain cases where the board of the association considers as an infringement of the principles imposed in its Statute. These sanctions can only affect membership of the association, by penalizing in a moral and ethical way, without any legal sanctions.

According to the law “for the Protection of Personal Information”²⁰, journalists have to respect the integrity of the person and the provisions envisaged in this law, since in case of infringement, Article 39 of this law provides the administrative sanctions for the misuse of the personal information.

Albanian lawmakers should adopt legislation that specifically establish that principle and bar judges from drawing negative inferences from journalist defendant’s refusal to disclose the identity of their sources.²¹

4. Who is a “journalist” according to the national legislation? Is it, in your view, a restricted definition for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources? What is the scope of protection of other media

¹⁸Article 17. Law n. 119 (On the Right to Information) 2014 [Per t drejten e Informimit ne RepublikensëShqipërisë]

¹⁹Article 13

²⁰Law N. 9887, 2008, changed with the law n. 48/2012

²¹The Cost of Speech, Violations of Media Freedom in Albania, Human Rights Watch, Vol. 14, No.5 (D), June 2002 pg 26

actors? Is the protection of journalists' sources extended to anyone else?

Defining a journalist and journalism is both elusive and problematic. As journalism undergoes a profound shift toward the electronic, it is difficult to figure out who is covered by the term and crafting the definition too narrowly excludes certain speakers from the benefits afforded to journalists.²²

In Albania, the term 'journalist' has a wide meaning, not explicitly defined in national legislation. Generally, a journalist is considered a person who has graduated in "Journalism" from the relevant faculty of any University in Albania.²³ However, the media community considers a journalist as anyone engaged in the process of newsgathering and reporting for written or broadcasting media. This is also evidenced by research that shows that only 53% of journalists have a degree in journalism.²⁴

Additionally, self-regulation mechanisms like several journalists' associations do not necessarily put any criteria related to the education as regards to the membership. For example, the Statute of Albanian Media Institute provides the criteria for who "will be accepted as a member of the association: every journalist older than 18 years who has been working for three consecutive years in any media entity..."²⁵

The role and tasks of a 'journalist' are provided by the Code of Ethics of the Albanian Media Institute. According to this Code, "journalists have the right to obtain information, to publish and to criticize. Information should be truthful, balanced and verified."²⁶

Journalism is a function shared by a wide range of actors, including professional, full-time reporters and analysts, as well as bloggers and others who engage in forms of self-publication in print, on the Internet or elsewhere.²⁷ With regard to the other media actors, Albanian legislation does not provide any definition.

The protection of journalistic sources is guaranteed by Article 44 of the Law No. 8410 "On Public and Private Radio and Television", which states that "confidentiality of sources of information (including material gathered by journalists) is guaranteed. They are disclosed only in special cases provided by law."

²² Greg Leslie, "Who is a journalist and why does it matter?", [2009] pg.4

²³ See: The Internal Regulation of "Faculty of History and Philology", University of Tirana

²⁴ Ramadan Cipuri, "Albanian journalist between the Professional Standards and external pressures"

²⁵ Statute of Albanian Media Institute, Article 9

²⁶ Para 3. Ethical Code of Albanian Media, Albanian Media Institute 2006 [Kodi Etik i Gazetareve]

²⁷ UN Human Rights Committee 2011, 102nd session, General comment no.34, ICCPR, para 44 <http://www2.ohchr.org/english/bodies/hrc/docs/gc34.pdf> accessed 28 April 2016.

Although Albanian Legislation does not provide an explicit provision with regard to protection of other media actors, in our view, the above article, used to imply a wide protection of sources of information not only to the journalist themselves but leaving it open for other media actors as well.

The right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information is included as a principle by the Law for Audiovisual Media in Republic of Albania, which provides that the audiovisual operators, are ruled by the principle of confidentiality of the sources of information.²⁸

On the other hand, an implicit protection of the sources of information is provided by Law No. 119/2014 on “Freedom of Information” which states that the “freedom of information is restricted, if necessary, proportionate and if that information would violate professional secrecy guaranteed by law.”

From the above, it can be concluded that sources of information of journalists are generally protected, even though not clearly nor in a detailed manner.

5. What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources? How are the laws implemented? How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?

The protection of journalistic sources undermines the protection of information and journalists' independence, serving as a direct contribution and a guarantee to the quality of the information. In most countries where a law protecting journalistic sources is adopted, the number of cases incriminating journalists on this matter has decreased or can be more easily fought back at a legal level. In countries where no such law is adopted, journalistic sources are more often threatened.²⁹

Regarding the legal safeguards on this issue, it can be concluded that there is no national law dealing with the issue of the disclosure of journalistic sources.³⁰ However, as it was laid down above, pursuant to article 159 of the Criminal Procedural Code - professional journalists cannot reveal information regarded as professional secrets, hence their sources. However, if the data is essential in proving the criminal offence and the source is the only way to prove this, the court can order the journalists to reveal their sources. In light of this provision, given the fact that the

²⁸ Article 4. Law n. 97 (For Audiovisual Media in Republic of Albania) 2013, [Ligji per Median Audiovizive ne Republiken e Shqiperise)

²⁹ Anthony Bellanger from Jason N. Parkinson ‘Journalism in the Age of Mass Surveillance’ [2014]
<https://www.nuj.org.uk/campaigns/safeguarding-journalists-and-their-sources/> accessed 27 April 2016.

³⁰ Ilda Londo ‘Self-regulation and defamation’ Albanian Media Institute, pg5:
<http://www.institutemedia.org/Documents/PDF/Self%20regulation%20and%20defamation.pdf>. accessed 01 May 2016

disclosure of the source happens only during a testimony in criminal court proceedings, the information can be accessed only by the parties involved therein. The general rule provided in the Criminal Procedure Code is that the proceedings are open to the public, emphasizing the publicity of the hearing.³¹ Nevertheless, according to Article 340/1/c, which provides the cases of closed hearings, the court decides to hold the court examination or some of its actions in camera when it is necessary to protect the witnesses or the defendant.³²

On the other hand, the Criminal Code provides some sanctions and penalties in case of refusal, as laid out in the article 307 which states that: “the offender can be fined or imprisoned up to one year and if proven that the reason for refusing to testify is personal gain, the sentence of imprisonment can be up to three years.” In this framework, since the disclosure of the source is in light of an obligatory testimony, which is essential in proving a criminal offense, the witness (in this case the journalist) has no possibility to avoid this obligation.

From another perspective, there are no legal provisions regulating the relation between journalists and their sources in these cases. Journalists can only appeal to the Code of Ethics or their consciousness in finding out whether to reveal their source or not. The revised Code of Ethics contains a provision stipulating that journalists should not reveal their sources, unless they have obtained explicit consent.³³

Albania does not have a unified piece of legislation regarding the regulation of media in general. There are totally different regulation regimes for print and electronic media. The print media operates in an almost total lack of legal regulation on press. Instead, it is subject only to regulation by competition and commercial laws. After the law on Print Media was repealed in 1997, as it was considered too restrictive and entirely inadequate to the Albanian context, the Law on Press was passed. However, it contains only two provisions that guarantee the freedom of press in a general and vague manner.³⁴

On the other hand, the legal framework on the broadcasting activity in Albania is laid down firstly by the Law on Public and Private Radio and Television, adopted in 1997, and then by the Law on Audio-visual Media, adopted in 2013. According to the law in force, the main body responsible for the implementation of the law is the regulatory authority: Audio-visual Media Authority (AMA), which replaced the National Council of Radio and Television (KKRT). AMA is a public independent legal body which operates pursuant to the provisions of the mentioned law and the effective legislation in the Republic of Albania.

³¹ Article 339/1 of the Criminal Procedure Code: "The hearing shall be public otherwise it shall be null and void".

³² Article 340, Cases of closed hearings:

1. The court decides to hold the court examination or some of its actions in camera: c) when it is necessary to protect the witnesses or the defendant.

³³ ibid.

³⁴ ibid.

In discharging its functions, the AMA must assure, among others, the preservation and support of democratic values regulated in the Constitution, especially those related to the freedom of speech.³⁵

The AMA must also encourage the public service broadcasters to meet objectives in accordance with the provisions of this law. In doing so, the AMA has the competence to draft and adopt codes and rules of audio-visual broadcasts and other bylaws in implementation of the Law on Audio-visual Media. In the same time, the AMA has the right to monitor the implementation of the law by entities exercising their activity in this field and, in case of infringements, it may impose sanctions.³⁶ Nevertheless, as a matter of fact this authority has never ventured into any efforts to guarantee the implementation of these particular provisions so far.³⁷

The recent huge technological developments in the area of media have increasingly complicated its supervision in the legal perspective. In that context, it is admitted that media self-regulation appears to be a solution to increase media accountability while offering more flexibility than state media regulation.³⁸ In this framework, a self-regulation mechanism can be prescribed as a joint endeavor by media professionals to set up voluntary editorial guidelines and abide by them in a process open to the public. By doing so, the independent media accept common responsibility for the quality of the public discourse, while fully preserving their editorial autonomy in shaping it.³⁹

Even though there will always be a need for legal guarantees on the freedom of the media, just as legal definitions of the necessary restrictions are needed, however, to ensure that media is fulfilling its role as watchdog of governments (and not only), it needs as little state interference as possible. Self-regulation can help prevent unnecessary media legislation and provide an alternative to courts for resolving media content complaints.⁴⁰ In contrast to formal and bureaucratic regulation mainly by state and government, self-regulation refers to responsibilities assigned to media operators to implement by themselves or that are voluntarily chosen by them. Such rules often have the character of desirable goals, guidelines or principles, rather than fixed

³⁵ Article 18 "Objectives of AMA's activity" of the Law n. 97 (On Audio-visual Media in Republic of Albania) 2013 [Për mediat audiovizive në Republikën e Shqipërisë]

³⁶ Article 19 "AMA's Functions" Law n. 97 (On Audio-visual Media in Republic of Albania) 2013 [Për mediat audiovizive në Republikën e Shqipërisë]

³⁷ Ilda Londo 'Self-regulation and defamation' Albanian Media Institute, pg5:

<http://www.institutemedia.org/Documents/PDF/Self%20regulation%20and%20defamation.pdf>. accessed 01 May 2016

³⁸ Adeline Hulin and Mike Stone 'The Online Media Self-Regulation Guidebook', [2013]

<http://www.osce.org/fom/99560?download=true> accessed 01 May 2016.

³⁹ Miklós Haraszti 'The Media Self-Regulation Guidebook' Office of the OSCE Representative on Freedom of the Media, [2008] <http://www.osce.org/fom/31497?download=true>: accessed 06 May 2016.

⁴⁰ ibid.

or compulsory standards to be achieved. They are 'policed' either within and by the media organization itself or by some intermediate body representing public and industry interests.⁴¹

In this meaning, in Albania there are no specific media self-regulation mechanisms which address concretely the issue of protection of journalistic sources. There is a negative correlation between a lack of a Journalistic Code of Ethics and a possible self-regulation prospect in professional terms, producing flaws in institutional and democratic standards expected.⁴²

The last attempt to change the situation was the draft law on Freedom of the Press which tried to provide provisions for the establishment of an Order of Journalists that would serve as a regulator of the media community. This was strongly rejected as it was considered a structure that must be established upon the free will of journalists and not initiated by Parliament, or legally bound to report to the Parliament. According to this bill, all journalists would be obliged to become members of this Order and to adhere to its regulation, a system modeled after the Italian system in this area.⁴³ It was considered an excessive legal regulation, by the media community at the time, which was keen to adopt a more self-regulatory approach instead of this kind of intervention by the state.

But, in fact, self-regulation so far in Albania has been almost inexistent.⁴⁴ The two main associations, the League of Albanian Journalists and the Union of Albanian Journalists, which remain extremely weak, have not made any notable attempts to raise awareness among journalists and organize them for their common good.⁴⁵

The main code of ethics recognized by the media community in general, since the moment of its signing in 1996 and its revision in 2006, is the Code drafted with the initiative of the Albanian Media Institute to which we have referred above.⁴⁶ It covers the usual areas intended to promote responsibility in the daily work of journalists, such as the confidentiality of sources among others. The first Code was adopted in 1996 and although it was well-written by providing provisions which covers most of the problems faced by journalists, had as the main flow of this attempt to self-regulation the lack of an implementing mechanism that would supervise journalists' conduct in relation to the Code. In this framework, the main challenge of the new

⁴¹ Belina Budini 'Ways to Establish Self-Regulation on the Part of the Albanian Electronic Media in Coherence with European Union Prospects?' <http://dSPACE.epoka.edu.al/bitstream/handle/1/1323/Ways%20to%20Establish%20Self-Regulation%20on%20the%20Part%20of%20the%20Albanian%20Electronic%20Media%20in%20Coherence%20with%20European%20Union%20Prospects.pdf?sequence=1> accessed 07 May 2016

⁴² ibid

⁴³ Ilda Londo 'Self-regulation and defamation' Albanian Media Institute: <http://www.institutemedia.org/Documents/PDF/Self%20regulation%20and%20defamation.pdf> accessed 07 May 2016.

⁴⁴ ibid

⁴⁵ ibid

⁴⁶ Albanian Media Institute: <http://www.institutemedia.org>

Code of Ethics in 2006 was the establishment of a self-implementing mechanism. After long discussions, the work group drafted a statute which provided a body referred as the Council of Ethics, in a form of a registered association, since in the legal point of view, it guarantees the broadest representation. According to its statute, members of the Council can be natural or legal persons, media outlets, civil society organizations working on freedom of expression, journalists, freelancers, columnists, etc. Hence, the general principle is that membership is voluntary and unlimited, but a broad range of membership is clearly preferred in order to provide the greatest legitimacy possible.

In addition, two permanent commissions would be established within the Council of Ethics, one for print media and the other for electronic media. These would be the bodies that will examine the complaints regarding possible ethical violations. The public can also lodge complaints to the commissions of ethics, as long as the media they complain against are members of the Council of Ethics.⁴⁷ Unfortunately, efforts to establish such a council of ethics, as a media self-regulation in Albania, seemed to be merely an attempt, as far as this body is totally inexistent in the country. Beside the Council of Ethics as it was designed in its draft-statute, in July 2015 was formally established, by a number of journalists and with the support of the Council of Europe, a body named as the Council of Media. The purpose of this self-regulation mechanism is to guarantee the respect of the Code of Ethics by the actors in the entire media area, and to contribute to the freedom of media in Albania.⁴⁸ The concrete results of this initiative are not yet evident and notable, due to the short time of its establishment.

Besides the Code of Ethics, there have been some other sporadic initiatives to establish internal codes of ethics in some private media, such as "Spekter Group". As an illustration, the code of ethics of this company outlines how journalists should deal with their sources, cases when anonymity is allowed and other professional issues. The code is implemented by an ethics bureau, composed by one representative employed by the company.⁴⁹

Nevertheless, the lack of the interest of the media owners to be involved in self-regulation development is evident. The professional media bodies in Albania do not adhere to syndicates or any other efficient professional organization and the competition between the media outlets is more important than their agreement upon the professional standards.⁵⁰ Overall, there is a lack of awareness so as to self-regulation principles and benefits.

Another eventual mechanism successfully proved as a means of achieving self-regulation in the media is the institution of the "news ombudsman". This media actor is considered as the conscience of the news reporting. In light of this development in the Western Europe, there is

⁴⁷ Article 12. Draft Statute of the Association "Council of Journalism Ethics," February [2006]

⁴⁸ <http://www.javanews.al/fomohet-keshilli-i-medias/> accessed 01 May 2016

⁴⁹ <http://www.shekulli.com.al/> accessed 01 May 2016

⁵⁰ Zlatev O. "Media accountability systems (MAS) and their applications in South East Europe and Turkey" in Professional Journalism Self-Regulation. Paris, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization [2011]

no tradition of an institutionalized news ombudsman in Albania, but the role of the ombudsman is occasionally taken by academic personalities and senior journalists related to specific events when they chose to have their say.⁵¹

On the other side, although there is no specific News Ombudsman, there is a general self-regulatory instrument such as the People's Advocate (Ombudsman) in Albania accessible by every person, without restrictions related to the profession. It is an institution designed, following the legislation of other countries of Europe, which have previously created such a mechanism. The main task is to defend the rights, freedoms and lawful interests of individuals from unlawful and incorrect acts or omissions of public administration bodies as well as third parties acting on its behalf. Its mission is the prevention of potential conflicts between public administration and individuals. The Ombudsman in Albania acts on the basis of the complaint or request submitted to his office. He also operates on his own initiative, for special occasions made public, but further must take the consent of the person concerned.⁵² It is not the Ombudsman who decides directly himself to retribute the rights of petitioners, but he makes recommendations to remedy the violation of the right by a public administration body which has caused the violation. In cases where the relevant body does not respond to the recommendations of the Ombudsman, the latter may address gradually to higher bodies in a hierarchy up to the Assembly (Parliament) with a report proposing concrete measures for restitution of the violated right.⁵³ The Ombudsman may not start or, if started, can terminate the investigation if the same case has been decided or is being examined by the prosecution office or the court. In these cases the Ombudsman has the right to request information from those authorities. He has the right to request information or documents related to the matter under consideration, even if they are classified as state secrets.

⁵¹ Belina Budini 'Ways to Establish Self-Regulation on the Part of the Albanian Electronic Media in Coherence with European Union Prospects' <http://dspace.epoka.edu.al/bitstream/handle/1/1323/Ways%20to%20Establish%20Self-Regulation%20on%20the%20Part%20of%20the%20Albanian%20Electronic%20Media%20in%20Coherence%20with%20European%20Union%20Prospects.pdf?sequence=1> accessed 07 May 2016

⁵² Law n.8454 (Law on the People's Advocate in the Republic of Albania) 1999 [Per Avokatin e Popullit ne Republiken e Shqiperise]

⁵³ Albanian People's Advocate oficial page: <http://www.avokatipopullit.gov.al/en/>

6. In the respective national legislation, are the limits of non-disclosure of the information in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7? What are the procedures applied? Is the disclosure limited to exceptional circumstances, taking into consideration vital public or individual interests at stake? Do the authorities first search for and apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the right of journalists not to disclose information?

As a member State to the Council of Europe, the Republic of Albania has undertaken the commitment to the fundamental right to freedom of expression as guaranteed by Article 10 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Due to the importance of the protection of the confidentiality of journalists' sources for the media in a democratic society, national legislation should provide accessible, precise and foreseeable protection. It is in the interest of states, invoking the need for democratic societies, to secure adequate means of promoting the development of free, independent and pluralist media.

The domestic law and practice in Albania should and needs to provide for explicit and clear protection of the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source in accordance with Article 10 of the Convention and the principles established therein, which are to be considered as minimum standards for the respect of this right.⁵⁴

In this framework, the protection of journalists' sources of information constitutes a basic condition for their work and freedom as well as for the freedom of the media in general.

In this perspective, in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 of CoE, Albania has the obligation to bring them to the attention of public authorities and the judiciary as well as to make them available to journalists, the media and their professional organizations.⁵⁵

As it is noted above, Albania does not have specific law (lex specialis) on protecting the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information.

The Law on Audio-visual Media in the Republic of Albania provides only one subparagraph concerning this topic. Article 4.2.c, as a general provision elaborating fundamental principles of 'audio-visual broadcasts', mentions among others the principle of maintaining the secrecy of information sources.

⁵⁴ Principle 1 of the Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information

⁵⁵ Principle 5 of the Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information

Pursuant to the provisions of this law, the AMA which is the regulatory institution in the field of audio-visual broadcasts and their support services in Albania, has drafted and adopted the Broadcasting Code as a sublegal act regulating principles, rules and practices of broadcasting. The issue of journalists' information sources is addressed in only one line of this Code, in the Section 4 "Broadcasting of the Information Programs", where it is provided within a sentence that: "Journalists have the right not to disclose their sources of information".

In the framework of domestic acts providing the right of maintaining the secrecy of information sources, as it is mentioned above, the Code of Ethics adopted by the Albanian Media Institute, has no legal consequences meaning that it is not binding to journalists and other subjects from the legal perspective. Nevertheless, it sets out minimum standards and criteria for the activity of journalists in Albania. In the third section of this Code is regulated the issue of relations with sources, suggesting that journalists should not divulge the name of a person who has provided information on a confidential basis, unless consent has been explicitly given by the person concerned. According to this provision, the right to the anonymity may be breached only if the information in question relates to the planning of a criminal act.

On the other side, the only national law providing in the same provision the right of journalists to maintain professional secrecy and the respective limitation of this right, is the Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Albania. In Section I of Chapter II, named "Types of Evidence", of this Code is provided in the Article 159.3 the right of journalists to save the professional secretly.⁵⁶

According to this provision, certain professionals, including journalists, may not be compelled to testify on what they know due to their profession, except in cases where they have the obligation to report to proceeding authorities (in light of Article 300 of Criminal Code "Failure to report a crime"). This is particularly applied to the names of persons whom professional journalists have obtained information from during the course of their profession.

Paragraph 2, which is also applicable to journalists, provides that when the court has reasons to believe that the claim made by these persons in order to avoid the testimony has no grounds, it orders the necessary verification. When such claims result unjustified, the court orders the witness to testify.

In this line, it is also provided specifically in the paragraph 3 that when the information is indispensable to prove the criminal offence and the truthfulness of the information may only be proved through identification of the source, the court orders the journalist to disclose the source of his information. In regard with this paragraph, for the limitation to be applied must co-exist two cumulative conditions. First, is the fact that the information taken by the source must be indispensable to prove a criminal act, and second, that there is no other way to prove the truthfulness of this information, except through revealing the source.⁵⁷ The legitimate interest in the disclosure of the source sanctioned in this provision is the prevention of criminal acts, similar with the second paragraph of Article 10 of the Convention. In this provision, no distinction is made between offences or minor crimes and “major” or serious crimes.

⁵⁶ Law No. 7895(Criminal Code of the Republic of Albania) 1995 [Kodi Penal i Republikës së Shqipërisë]

According to the Explanatory Memorandum of the Recommendation, only the prevention of the latter category can possibly justify the disclosure of a journalist's source.

With due regard to this provision, it is a positive step the fact that professional journalists, in line with principles set out in the Recommendation, are protected from the obligation to testify in a trial, in order to maintain their sources of information. What is important to notice is that the court is the sole authority which has the exclusive competence to decide whether this right shall be derogated or not. In our opinion, by giving this competence only to the court, it is guaranteed the essence of the right and provided the appropriate legal security for journalists. Furthermore, it is accomplished in the ratio of Principle 5.a of the Recommendation, which states that the motion or request for initiating any action aimed at the disclosure of information identifying a source should only be introduced by persons or public authorities that have a direct legitimate interest in the disclosure.

What might be problematic is the fact that in this provision is not provided any specific alternative measure with the intention of protecting journalists right not to disclose source of information, in order to be less intrusive to this right. It is completely at the discretion of the court to decide on the issue of protecting the journalist's professional secrecy, search for and apply proportionate, alternative measures.

It is also not specified in the so-called procedure of verification, stated in paragraph 2, in case the court suspects that the journalist's claim to apply this protection has no grounds. In the light of this limitation, there is not a clear statement in which grounds would be a hypothetical suspect by the court. Nevertheless, it is widely acceptable that the presumption that the court is the most effective authority to protect and guarantee the right of journalists provided in the national legislation.

In addition, another guarantee provided by the Criminal Procedure Code, is the fact that the eventual disclosure of sources of information shall be made in a form of a trial testimony, which is generally given during the court proceedings, in the presence of the parties, both prosecutor and defendant. The interrogation of journalists as witnesses in the court proceedings cannot be made by prosecutor or police agents, in a different venue except the court.⁵⁸

⁵⁷ Artan Hoxha, Halim Islami and Ilir Panda: "Criminal Procedure", 2012

⁵⁸ Article 157/1 "The duties of the witness": The witness is obliged to appear before the court, to observe its orders and to say the truth for the questions brought before him.

Another problematic area of the Albanian procedural law might be the fact that in Article 159, it has not implemented Principle 5.e of the Recommendation, which states that where journalists respond to a request or order to disclose information identifying a source, the competent authorities should consider applying measures to limit the extent of a disclosure, for example by excluding the public from the disclosure with due respect to Article 6 of the Convention, where relevant, and by themselves respecting the confidentiality of such a disclosure. Nevertheless, as in general court proceedings, even in this case the court has the discretion to decide whether it should exclude the public from the disclosure or not.⁵⁹

It is encouraging the fact that Article 159 provides that the reveal of the source of information is the very last remedy applied by the court. It comes as a necessity only if there is no other way to prove an eventual criminal offence. In light of the other alternative investigative measures available in the Albanian national law, according to the Criminal Procedure Code, beside the testimony, the types of proofs include interrogation of the defendant,⁶⁰ the confrontation,⁶¹ the identification and recognition,⁶² experiments,⁶³ expertise,⁶⁴ material evidence and documents.⁶⁵

These proofs are available only if they are taken by the legal means of searching evidence such as the examination, inspections, seizure and surveillance.⁶⁶

On the other side, Albanian national legislation does not provide, in its legal system, the same protection for other persons who, by their professional relations with journalists, acquire knowledge of information identifying a source through the collection, editorial process or dissemination of this information, as it is stated in Principle 2 of the Recommendation.⁶⁷ Even they should equally be protected under the principles established therein, there are no provisions securing this principle. The knowledge of the source has to be acquired by these other persons in the framework of their 'professional relations with journalists'. Secretarial staff, journalistic colleagues, printing staff, the editor or the employer of a journalist might have access to information identifying a source. It is therefore necessary to extend the protection to these persons in order to maintain the secrecy of a source towards third persons or the public, if they are not already covered by the definition of journalist under national systems of protection.⁶⁸

⁵⁹ Article 340, Cases of closed hearings:

1. The court decides to hold the court examination or some of its actions in camera: c) when it is necessary to protect the witnesses or the defendant.

⁶⁰ Articles 166-168 of the Criminal Procedure Code

⁶¹ Articles 169-179 of the Criminal Procedure Code

⁶² Articles 171-175

⁶³ Articles 176-177

⁶⁴ Articles 178-186

⁶⁵ Articles 187-197

⁶⁶ Chapter III of the Criminal Procedure Code

⁶⁷ Principle 2 of the Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information

⁶⁸ http://www.coe.int/t/dghl/standardsetting/media/doc/cm/rec\(2000\)007&expmem_EN.asp007&expmem_EN.asp)

Within the scope of Article 159, falls only the one named as "professional journalist", without explaining what this term means. In order to exclude any misinterpretation or ambiguity, it would be relevant to modify and reword this provision by defining clearly the terminology used therein. Nevertheless, we consider that in this situation the term "professional journalist" should be interpreted by the court having regard to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights.⁶⁹ In the judgment of De Haes and Gijssels v. Belgium (27 February 1997, para. 55), for example, the European Court of Human Rights extended the right not to disclose information identifying a source to an editor and a journalist alike.

7. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 the following principles should be respected when the necessity of disclosure is stated: absence of reasonable alternative measures, outweighing legitimate interest (protection of human life, prevention of major crime, defence of a person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime). Under which criteria can the interest in the disclosure outweigh the interest in the non-disclosure?

The right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information is part of their right to freedom of expression under Article 10 of the Convention which, according to the ECHR's interpretation, is binding on all Contracting States.

It is widely accepted that the right to freedom of expression and information constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and the development of every individual, as expressed in the Declaration on the Freedom of Expression and Information of 1982.

The "public interest" is an amorphous concept, which is typically not defined in access to information legislation. This flexibility is intentional. Legislators and policy makers recognise that the public interest may change over time and according to the circumstances of each situation. In the same way, neither does the law try to define categorically what is "reasonable."⁷⁰

Courts need to balance the two public interests that stand in tension in journalist's sources protection cases. A miscalculation of the public interest in these cases would cause the risk of moving away from the main intention. The assessment of the public interest should rely on a case-by-case basis. Whether the disclosure of a journalistic source will be deemed to be in the interest of the public outweighing the interest of the non-disclosure, this usually depends upon the facts of the particular case. Anyway, there are some objective criteria which need to guide courts on deciding whether the disclosure is relevant or not.

⁶⁹ Goodwin v the United Kingdom [1996] European Court of Human Rights, para 34

⁷⁰ Megan Carter and Andrew Bouris, "Freedom of Information, Balancing the Public Interest" [2006] pg 3-14

The aim of the invoked Recommendation is also to set out the requirements for an adequate protection of the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information, in order to safeguard freedom of journalism and the public's right of information from the media. The protection of the professional relationship between journalists and their sources is in this respect of higher importance than the actual value of the information for the public, as the ECHR has held.⁷¹ In this line, any disclosure of a source may have a chilling effect on the readiness of future sources to provide journalists with information, irrespective of the kind of information provided by the source. The guidelines appended to this Recommendation therefore establish common principles for the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information in the light of Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

In evaluating a violation of the Article 10 of the Convention, in accordance with paragraph 2, the Court needs to examine whether there has been an “interference” under this provision; whether this interference was “prescribed by law”, whether it pursued a “legitimate aim” and is “necessary in a democratic society”.

Any restriction of the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying their source and of the public interest in the non-disclosure must be prescribed by law and based on a legitimate interest among the grounds provided for in the second paragraph of Article 10. It must be a legitimate intention to restrict the right to freedom of expression. Any limitation of this right must be truly necessary, in response to a pressing social need.

When evaluating whether a particular legitimate interest under this provision justifies the restriction of the right to freedom of expression, the Court applies a balancing test which determines whether a restriction is “necessary in a democratic society”.⁷² Moreover, the disclosure must accomplish its intention based on the public interest; otherwise it would lose the essence of this measure.

In the view of ECHR, there must exist a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the legitimate aim pursued by the disclosure and the means deployed to achieve that aim.

The concrete interest of the person or public authority in the disclosure of the source must be “sufficient to outweigh the vital public interest in the protection of the (...) journalist's source”.⁷³

Only exceptional cases where a vital personal or public interest is at stake might justify or be proportional to the disclosure of a source.

⁷¹ Goodwin v the United Kingdom [1996] European Court of Human Rights para. 37

⁷² Sunday Times v the United Kingdom [1991], European Court of Human Rights para. 50

⁷³ ibid para 45

According to the ECHR, there must be a careful balance between the disclosure and the non-disclosure of journalists sources, in order to protect the free press and hence the fundamental democratic right to right to freedom of expression.

In estimating the importance to be given in favor of disclosure there is a wide spectrum within which a particular case must be located. If the party seeking disclosure shows, for example, that his very livelihood depends upon it, this will put the case near one end of the spectrum. If he shows no more than that what he seeks to protect is a minor interest in property, this will put the case at or near the other end.

On the other side the importance of protecting a source from disclosure in pursuance of the policy underlying the statute will also vary within a spectrum. One important factor will be the nature of the information obtained from the source. The greater the legitimate interest in the information which the source has given to the publisher or intended publisher, the greater will be the importance of protecting the source. But another and perhaps more significant factor which will very much affect the importance of protecting the source will be the manner in which the information was itself obtained by the source. If it appears to the court that the information was obtained legitimately this will enhance the importance of protecting the source. Conversely, if it appears that the information was obtained illegally, this will diminish the importance of protecting the source unless, of course, this factor is counterbalanced by a clear public interest in publication of the information.⁷⁴

In that context, the Albanian domestic legislation, and more concretely the Code of Criminal Procedure, as it is noted above, provides in the Article 159 that the disclosure of the sources of information is the very last remedy applied by the court. It comes as a necessity only if there is no other way to prove an eventual criminal offence. Thus, for the limitation to be applied the information taken by the source must be indispensable to prove a criminal act, and there must be no other way to prove the truthfulness of this information, except through revealing the source.

The legitimate interest in the disclosure of the source sanctioned in this provision is the prevention of criminal acts, similar with the second paragraph of Article 10 of the Convention, being in line with the criteria explained above. Nevertheless, as it is noted above, there is no distinction between offences or minor crimes and “major” or serious crimes, as it is set out in the Recommendation. There are also no specifications regarding the interest for certain crimes, except the fact that the court is the sole authority which has the exclusive competence to decide whether the disclosure shall be made or not.

In this perspective, it can be assumed that the disclosure of journalistic sources in Albania is only partially in line with the Recommendations and standards explained above.

⁷⁴ The House of Lords decision in the Goowin case (Lord Bridge' opinion)

8. In the light of the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, how do national courts apply the respective laws with regard to the right to protect sources? In particular, how do they balance the different interests at stake?

Freedom of expression constitutes one of the main foundations of a democratic society, one of the basic conditions for its progress and for the development of every human.⁷⁵ The European Court of Human Rights has emphasized and set out the standards for different aspects related to the Freedom of Expression and particularly for the right to protect the sources of information. The courts in Albania, when interpreting and applying the law, bring to their attention the consolidated jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights and often base their judicial reasoning according to the case-law of the Court.

With regard to the right to protect sources, to the best of our knowledge, national courts during their judicial reviews have not had cases referring the right to protect sources of information. In Albania there is no case-law considering the right of non-disclosure of sources but different claims have been brought before the court with regard to Freedom of Expression and the national Courts of Albania have given various judicial decisions where you can see how national courts consider the case law of the European Court of Human Rights and its standards.

Courts frequently make the erroneous assumption that journalists who refuse to disclose their sources have acted in bad faith and are therefore guilty of malicious defamation. For example, the District Court of Tirana, in its decision (Case Kryemadhi v. Patozi), failed to acknowledge that the journalist's right to protection of their confidential sources is an essential part of press freedom.

9. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information? Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

Pursuant to Albanian Criminal Code, terrorism includes acts with the purpose of creating panic in the population or to oblige national institutions, Albanian or foreign, to do or not to do a specific crime, or to destroy or destabilise, in a serious manner, political, constitutional, economic or socially important structures of the Albanian state, another state, institution or international organization.⁷⁶

⁷⁵ Handyside v the United Kingdom [1979], European Court of Human Rights, para 41

In the fight against terrorism, the general provisions of the national legal framework are established to prevent and punish all kinds of crime, including terrorism. In accordance with the national legislation, the legal provisions for the fight against terrorism are incorporated in national law. Article 28/2 of the Criminal Code states that: “a terrorist organisation is a special form of criminal organisation, composed of two or more persons who have a sustainable collaboration in time with the aim of committing terrorist acts with a purpose”.⁷⁷ Chapter VII of this Code contains more than 17 articles after the amendment. They express all the forms of terrorism, including: offences with terrorist purposes, terrorist organisations, financing of terrorism, collecting funds for the financing of terrorism, recruitment of one or more persons for committing acts for terrorist purposes or terrorism financing, training for committing purposed terrorist acts, promotion, public and calling propaganda for the execution of activities and threats for the purposes of conducting terrorist acts, etc.⁷⁸

The procedural law provides for the use of different technical means for gathering evidence such as: house searches, seizure of persons, search and seizure of documents, seizure and opening of letters and other items to be delivered, telephone tapping, and other means of intercepting communications (fax, e-mail), electronic surveillance and observation.⁷⁹ The prosecution may search persons when it considers that they may be concealing material evidence or items related to a criminal offence. Furthermore, the court may order the seizure of bank documents, negotiable instruments, sums deposited in current accounts etc., even if they are in safety vaults, where there are reasonable grounds to suspect that they are connected to a criminal offence, even if they do not belong to the defendant or are not in his name. Interception of communication, according to the national Criminal Procedure Code, can be ordered, besides all, for the person who is suspected that receives or transmit communications from the suspected person and for the person, whom surveillance can lead to the discovery of the location or the identity of the suspect.⁸⁰ The surveillance may be allowed for:

- Crimes done voluntarily, which have a maximum conviction of jail time of no less than seven years;
- Criminal offenses of insults and threats done with telecommunication devices.

In view of the present article, even if it is not referred explicitly to journalists, journalists can be part of this surveillance to lead the investigations on the revelation of location or identity of the person of interest. The surveillance can only be made with a warrant from the court, upon the ⁷⁶ Albanian Criminal Code, Article 230, para.1.

⁷⁷ https://www.coe.int/t/dlapil/codexter/Country%20Profiles/Profiles%202014%20Albania_EN.pdf accessed on 2nd May 2016.

⁷⁸ Chapter VII of the Albanian Criminal Code

⁷⁹ Articles 204, 205, 206, 221/1/2/3 and 221/c of the Code of Criminal Procedure request of the prosecutor or the injured party, when there is enough evidence to pursue the investigations.⁸¹ When there are reasonable grounds to think that a delay might seriously damage an investigation, the prosecutor may authorise interception by a reasoned decision and informs the court immediately within twenty-four hours.

⁸⁰ Law n. 7905 (Criminal Procedural Code of the Republic of Albania) 1995 [Kodii Procedures PenaletëRepublikëssëShqipërisë] Article 221/3

In the Code of Ethics of the Albanian Media Institute, it is envisaged that journalists can reveal their sources only in three cases: when the source has intentionally changed the story without saying the whole truth; when the reference to reveal the name of the source is the only way to avoid serious unavoidable damages and when the information is related to the planning of a criminal act.

Moreover, pursuant to the Code of Criminal Procedure journalists are not obliged to testify because of their professional secret, except in certain cases, when they are obliged to refer to the authorities. The court has the authority to compel the journalist to reveal the identity of their source.⁸²

Improvements of investigation techniques are necessary in view of the increase of mass communications through the Internet and communication software. According to Article 191/a, in case of proceedings on criminal acts in the field of information technology, at the request of a party, the Court orders the controller or the holder to deliver memorized computer data. Under Article 208/a of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the court decides upon the sequestration of these data and computer systems.⁸³

Furthermore the National Informative Service in Albania (SHISH),⁸⁴ has the duty to collect information about terrorism, for the production and trafficking of narcotics, for the production of mass destruction weapons and for crimes against the environment. The National Informative Service also has the obligation to protect its methods and sources of information from unauthorised interventions. When this institution has a strong conviction for an infringement of the law, the National Informative Service informs the relevant institutions while protecting the informative sources and the methods.⁸⁵

There is not any national case-law, either concerning journalists' or their sources of information's right to confidential communication and anonymity online, neither concerning any attempts by a public authority to interfere in journalist's right to encryption and anonymity online. Therefore it

⁸¹ Law n. 7905 (Criminal Procedural Code of the Republic of Albania) 1995 [Kodii Procedures PenaletëRepublikës së Shqipërisë] Article 222/1

⁸² Law n. 7905 (Criminal Procedural Code of the Republic of Albania) 1995 [Kodi i Procedures Penale të Republikës së Shqipërisë] Article 159/3

⁸³ p.5, https://www.coe.int/t/dlapil/codexter/Country%20Profiles/Profiles%202014%20Albania_EN.pdf

⁸⁴ Law n. 8391 (For the National Informative Service) 1999 [Per Sherbimin Informativ Shteteror] Article 3

⁸⁵ Law n. 8391 (For the National Informative Service) 1999 [Per Sherbimin Informativ Shteteror] Article 9

cannot be said that journalist's right to anonymity and encryption online has not been violated in Albania.

In conclusion, there are no explicit articles concerning journalists and the identification of their sources, but under the previous articles mentioned before, journalists can be intercepted if they have relevant information about terrorism. Such information may be delivered to the competent authorities, if the National Informative Service considers this information as a threat to any possible infringement of the law.

10. Can journalists rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance?

The right to privacy emblemizes the substance of the process of democratisation in this country.⁸⁶ The Constitution of Albania has affirmed, and also guarantees, this complex and fundamental right. The right to private life, affirmed in the constitution, includes the guarantee given to the individual not to self-incriminate, the right for the protection of individual data, the right to privacy from unauthorised intervention of the police and the confidentiality of the correspondence.

Article 36 of the constitution of Albania inscribes the confidentiality of the correspondent: "Freedom and secrecy of correspondence or any other means of communication are guaranteed."

This is a provision addressed to citizens in general, while, as per the anonymity for journalists, it is actually questionable whether the domestic legislation is clear, considering that the only provisions found in light of anonymity is the Ethical Code of Albanian Media Institute.

The Code of Ethics emphasises the right to anonymity of the journalist, not anonymity online, but anonymity in general as a liability of the journalist not to divulge the name of the person who provided the confidential information, unless the person has clearly consented, as it is mentioned above, the right to anonymity can be exceeded only in exceptional cases:

- a) There is suspicion that the source has consciously distorted the truth;
- b) The reference to the name of the source is the only way to avoid serious damage and is inevitable;
- c) *The information in question relates to the planning of a criminal act...'*⁸⁷

Regarding to anonymity online, Law on "Audiovisual Media in Republic of Albania" No. 97/2013, does not provide any provision to protect themselves and their sources of information against surveillance. This right can neither be drawn in context of other laws, nor through Albanian jurisprudence, since there is no cases regarding this matter.

⁸⁶ Igli Totozani, "The Right to Privacy and Albania", March 2013, Newspaper "The Day"

⁸⁷ Para 3 Ethical Code of Albanian Media, Albanian Media Institute 2006 [Kodi Etik i Gazetareve]

11. Are whistle-blowers explicitly protected under laws protecting journalistic sources? Is there another practice protecting whistle-blowers? Is the legislation prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers?

“Whistle-blower” means any person who reports or discloses information on a threat or harm to the public interest in the context of their work-based relationship, whether it be in the public or private sector.⁸⁸

Whistleblowing is known as an instrument to prevent and detect corruption. Since whistleblowing is aimed at the reporting of corruption, as fraud, misuse of public funds, bribery for a favor in the private or public sector, in places and circumstances, that only few people can know about these events, only individuals engaged in these events or that work closely with the people engaged in these events. Therefore, these people should enjoy a certain level of protection, because in most cases, they are subject of retaliation and legal issues.

In the case Guja v Moldova,⁸⁹ the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights considered the dismissal of a civil servant who had leaked information, a letter to the press, revealing political pressure on the judiciary in a corruption case to be an illegitimate restriction of the right to the freedom of expression, guaranteed under Article 10 of the Convention.⁹⁰ The sanction imposed on Guja was considered disproportionate and it could have a negative effect in the future on civil servants' willingness to denounce malpractices. This case is a very important reference for every country in order to guarantee a protection to whistle-blowers and harmonize the legislation protecting them.

In the Albanian legislation, the protection of whistle-blowers is not yet compromised in a single legal act and is not explicitly found with this term. Moreover, legal disposition on whistleblowing can be found in several laws, but there is not a provision that can be found under the law protecting journalistic sources for whistle blowing.

In order to comply with the requirements of the Council of Europe to protect people who report corruption, the Albanian parliament adopted, in 2006, the law “On co-operation of the public in the fight against corruption”.⁹¹ This law aims to protect the persons involved in the reporting of corruption. The law on public co-operation is considered to comply with international standards, but it does not cover any forms of sanctions, as unfair dismissal or protection of the whistle-blower working status, which is usually what the whistle-blower fears most and the cause of hesitation in ‘blowing the whistle’. Nevertheless, even if the law is praised as a step forward in the fight against corruption and in the protection of whistle-blowers, it has several weaknesses. One of the main weaknesses of this law is that it has not clearly stated the responsible authority to conduct the preliminary investigation. A hypothesis in this regard may be that the law is silent, because the denunciation is made within the institution where the corruption has occurred. That being said, the law on public co-operation makes the protection of whistle-blowers difficult and hard to put into practice.⁹²

⁸⁸ Recommendation CM/Rec (2014) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member States on the protection of whistle-blowers

⁸⁹ Guja v Moldova [2008] European Court of Human Rights, para 73

⁹⁰ Dirk Voorhoof, ‘Whistle-blowing and the Right to Freedom of Expression and information under the European Human Right System’ (30 September 2013) <<http://cmpf.eui.eu/seminars/whistle-blowing.aspx>>, accessed 9 March 2016.

In May 2014, the Council of Ministers of Albania has adopted the Recommendation of Council of Europe in 2013, in scope of fighting corruption in Albania as a key priority.⁹³

Corruption cases from the employee are also envisaged within the Albanian Labour Code, where it is stated that any unjustified measure or administrative sanction taken against employees that have reasons to suspect cases of corruption and that highlight these cases to the responsible people or authorities is invalid.⁹⁴ Moreover, it is stated that the reports of these facts, which have a connection with corruption, do not constitute an infringement of the professional secret. In any unjustified measures or administrative sanctions taken against employees that have reason to suspect cases of corruption and that denounce these cases to the responsible people or authorities is invalid and the employees can resort to the courts to claim their right.

The Code of Administrative Procedure is aimed to protect the fundamental rights of the individual or personal interests. There is not any explicit provision referring to whistleblowing in this code, but it states that any individual may complain against any administrative act, or against the refusal to enact the act, to the responsible body or his/her superior.⁹⁵ Although, the protection of whistle-blowers is not mentioned in any article, this code requires that the public administration bodies, during the course of their activity, shall protect public interest and also should not infringe the legitimate rights of private people.⁹⁶

⁹¹ Law n. 9508 (Public cooperation in combatting corruption) 2006 [Për bashkëpunimin e publikut në luftën kundër korrupsionit]

⁹² Arjan Dymishi, Elira Hroni, Egert Gjokutaj, Whistle-blowers protection in Albania: An assessment of the Legislation and Practice (Institute for Democracy and Mediation, 2013)

⁹³ Decision of the Council of Ministers n.330, dated on 28.5.2014

⁹⁴ Article 10, para 1.Law n. 10053, (The Labour Code of the Republic of Albania) 2009 [Kodi i Punes i Republikës së Shqipërisë]

⁹⁵ Law n. 8485 (The Code of Administrative Procedures of the Republic of Albania) 1999 [Kodi i Procedurave Administrative të Republikës së Shqipërisë] Article 137 and 139

⁹⁶ Ibid. Article 10

The law on protection of collaborators of justice and witnesses is applied for criminal proceedings that are sentenced to no less than 4 years' imprisonment.⁹⁷ This law does not refer explicitly to whistleblowing protection, nevertheless this law precludes any whistleblowing activity in relation to proceeding on criminal offence pursuant to article 260 of the Criminal Code on passive corruption of high state officials or local elected representatives.⁹⁸

In cases of whistleblowing, the law on protection of collaborators of justice and witnesses often fails to offer practical protection.

The law of 2006 "On Co-operation of the public in the fight against corruption" did not give whistle-blowers a sufficient level of protection and it so far it is not successfully implemented. Also, the laws mentioned above do not explicitly protect whistle-blowers. So, it is crucial to implement a specific law for the protection of whistle-blowers in Albania and under this scope the Parliament of Albania has prepared a draft law for the Protection of Whistle-blowers.⁹⁹

Another aspect of interest to mention is that the draft law does not only involve public administration, but also the private sector. This will require a well-studied mechanism to avoid abuse and a proper harmonisation with the legislation in Albania.¹⁰⁰ It is a known fact that companies that have clear internal complaint mechanisms tend to respect the rights of their employees and human rights in general. The position of whistle-blowers is more delicate, since this action can damage their reputation, trust, position and function within the company, so he needs sufficient protection to not fear any retaliation and financial damages.

The draft law creates a new mechanism to remove the suspicious practices and actions in the workplace, by an employee in the public or in the private sector in the Republic of Albania.

Within the report by the whistle-blower, the High Inspectorate of Declaration and Audit of Assets and Conflict of Interests (HIDAACI), will be responsible to gather all the necessary information and to investigate the case, while preserving the anonymity of the whistle-blower.¹⁰¹

The new mechanism for whistle-blowers in the new draft law is built on two main points: the first one is the forecast of a new legal procedure to investigate the allegations of the whistle-blowers for a suspicious corruption act and the second point is to sanction any action against the

⁹⁷ Law n. 10173 (On the Protection of Collaborators of Justice and Witnesses) 2009 [Për mbrojtjen e dëshmitarëve dhe bashkëpunëtorëve të Drejtësisë]law N. 10173 (On the Protection of Collaborators of Justice and Witnesses) 2009

⁹⁸ Arjan Dymishi, Elira Hroni, Egest Gjokutaj, "Whistle-blowers protection in Albania: An assessment of the Legislation and Practice", Institute for Democracy and Mediation [2013] pg.9

⁹⁹ Draft law (Protection of Whistle-blowers) 2015 [Projekt ligj për Mbrojtjen e Sinjalizuesve]

⁸²Netherlands Embassy in Albania, 'Presentation of the Whistleblowing Draft',

<<http://albania.nlembassy.org/news/2016/02/whistleblowing-draft-law-presentation.html>> accessed on 9 March 2016

¹⁰¹ Article 9. Draft law (Protection of Whistle-blowers)2015 [Projekt ligj për Mbrojtjen e Sinjalizuesve]

whistle-blowers in any retaliation directly or indirectly by the company.¹⁰²

The existing provisions are ambiguous and this draft law for the protection of whistle-blowers will guarantee the efficient functioning when denouncing a malpractice and will encourage whistle-blowers to come forward and report malpractices.

12. Conclusions

In conclusion of this research, it can be assumed that, in accordance with Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights, and the principles established therein, the domestic law and practice in Albania should, and need to, provide further explicit and clear protection of the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information. In light of this commitment, the Legal Reform of media in Albania, imposed by the fundamental political changes, from the totalitarian regime to democracy, started with the Press Law on 1993, the first democratic law, as the initial step towards a media system similar to the Western European countries. Since then, several measures on national level have been taken to establish and adjust the media legislation system. Nevertheless, as it is noted in this research, existing Albanian legislation does not provide a specific law (lex specialis) on protecting this right.

There is not a unified piece of legislation regarding the regulation of media in general. There are totally different regulation regimes for print and electronic media. Print media operates in an almost total lack of legal regulation on press. Instead, it is subject only to regulation by competition and commercial laws. On the other hand, the legal framework on the broadcasting activity in the country is laid down firstly by the Law on Public and Private Radio and Television in the Republic of Albania, adopted in 1997, and then by the Law on Audiovisual Media, adopted in 2013. This law provides only a general provision elaborating fundamental principles of 'audiovisual broadcasts', mentioning among others the principle of maintaining the secrecy of information sources.

On the other side, the only national law providing in the same provision (article 159) the right of journalists to maintain professional secrecy and the respective limitation of this right, is the Code of Criminal Procedure in the Republic of Albania.

With due regard to this provision, it is a positive step the fact that professional journalists, in line with principles set out in the Recommendation No R (2000) 7, are protected from the obligation to testify in a trial, in order to maintain their sources of information. What is important to notice is that the court is the sole authority which has the exclusive competence to decide whether this right shall be derogated or not. In our opinion, by giving this competence only to the court, it is guaranteed the essence of the right and provided the appropriate legal security for journalists.

¹⁰² Report on the draft law for the "Protection of Whistle-blowers", para 3

What might be problematic is the fact that in this provision is not provided any specific alternative measure with the intention of protecting journalists right not to disclose source of information, in order to be less intrusive to this right. It is completely at the discretion of the court to decide on the issue of protecting the journalist's professional secrecy, search for and apply proportionate alternative measures. It is also not specified the so-called procedure of verification, stated in paragraph 2 of this provision, in case the court suspects that the journalist's claim to apply this protection has no grounds. In the light of this limitation, there is no a clear statement in which grounds would be a hypothetical suspect by the court. Nevertheless, it is widely acceptable the presumption that the court is the most effective authority to protect and guarantee the right of journalists provided in the national legislation.

It is encouraging that Article 159 of Criminal Procedural Code provides that the revelation of the source of information is the very last remedy applied by the court. It comes as a necessity only if there is no other way to prove a criminal offence.

Another issue, is the fact that within the scope of Article 159, falls only the one named as "professional journalist", without explaining what this term does mean. In this framework, there is no legal definition of the term "journalist" in Albania beyond the description of the role and tasks of 'journalist' provided by the Code of Ethics. In order to exclude any misinterpretation or ambiguity, it would be relevant to modify and reword this provision by defining clearly the terminology used therein. Nevertheless, we consider that in this situation the term "professional journalist" should be interpreted by the court having regard to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights.¹⁰³

From the above, in our view, we can conclude that sources of information of journalists are protected, even though not clearly and in detail, but indirectly through the provisions of Criminal Procedure Code and the Law of "Freedom of Information".

With regard to the right to protect sources, national courts of Albania, during their judicial reviews have not had cases referring the right to protect sources of information. In Albania there is no any case law considering the right of non-disclosure of sources but different claims have been brought before the court with regard to Freedom of Expression and the national Courts of Albania have given various judicial decisions where you can see how national courts consider the case law of the European Court of Human Rights and its standards.

Another important issue is the lack of efficient self-regulations mechanisms, which in a normal situation could help media to keep its role as watchdog of governments in general.

In that context, although it is admitted that media self-regulation appears to be a solution to increase media accountability while offering more flexibility than state media regulation,¹⁰⁴ in this meaning, in Albania there are no specific media self-regulation mechanisms which address concretely the issue of protection of journalistic sources. There is a negative correlation between a lack of a Journalistic Code of Ethics and a possible self-regulation prospect in professional terms, producing flaws in institutional and democratic standards expected.¹⁰⁵ Self-regulation so far in Albania has been almost inexistent.¹⁰⁶

¹⁰³ Goodwin v the United Kingdom [1996] European Court of Human Rights

The main code of ethics recognized by the media community in general, since the moment of its signing in 1996 and its revision in 2006, it is the Code drafted with the initiative of the Albanian Media Institute, as the main NGO dealing with media training and policy.¹⁰⁷ Although well-written by providing provisions which cover almost the entire problematic of journalists, it has as the main flow of this attempt to self-regulation the lack of an implementing mechanism that would supervise journalists' conduct in relation to the Code.

Concerning the problem whether journalists can rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance, it is actually questionable whether our legislation is clear considering that the only implications found with regard to the anonymity to protect the journalists and their sources of information is the Code of Ethics, which is not legally binding, and as consequence it cannot be considered as a 'protective measure'.

Finally, as per the protection of whistle-blowers, in the Albanian legislation, their protection is not yet compromised in a single legal act and is not explicitly found with this terminology. Moreover, legal disposition on whistleblowing can be found in several laws, but there is not a provision that can be found under the law protecting journalistic sources for whistleblowing.

¹⁰⁴ The Online Media Self-Regulation Guidebook / Ed. by A. Hulin and M. Stone

¹⁰⁵ Belina Budini 'Ways to Establish Self-Regulation on the Part of the Albanian Electronic Media in Coherence with European Union Prospects' <http://dspace.epoka.edu.al/bitstream/handle/1/1323/Ways%20to%20Establish%20Self-Regulation%20on%20the%20Part%20of%20the%20Albanian%20Electronic%20Media%20in%20Coherence%20with%20European%20Union%20Prospects.pdf?sequence=1> accessed on 07 May 2016

¹⁰⁶ Ibid

¹⁰⁷ Albanian Media Institute official page <http://www.institutemedia.org>

13. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

13.1. Legislation

- Constitution of the Republic of Albania, Approved by referendum on 22 November 1998, as amended. [Kushtetuta e Republikës së Shqipërisë]
- Law n. 97 (On Audiovisual Media in Republic of Albania) 2013 [Për mediat audiovizive në Republikën e Shqipërisë]
- Law n. 119 (On the Right to Information) 2014 [Per te drejten e Informimit ne Republikën së Shqipërisë]
- Law No. 7895(Criminal Code of the Republic of Albania) 1995 [Kodi Penal i Republikës së Shqipërisë]
- Law n. 8485 (The Code of Administrative Procedures of the Republic of Albania) 1999 [Kodi i Procedurave Administrative të Republikës së Shqipërisë]
- Law n. 7895 (Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Albania) 1995 [Kodi i Procedurave Penale të Republikës së Shqipërisë]
- Law n. 8485 (The Code of Administrative Procedures of the Republic of Albania) 1999 [Kodi i Procedurave Administrative të Republikës së Shqipërisë]
- Law n. 10053, (The Labour Code of the Republic of Albania) 2009 [Kodi i Punes i Republikës së Shqipërisë]
- Law n.8454 (Law on the People's Advocate in the Republic of Albania) 1999 [Per Avokatin e Popullit ne Republikën e Shqipërisë]
- Law n. 9508 (Public cooperation in combatting corruption) 2006 [Për bashkëpunimin e publikut në luftën kundër korrupsionit].
- Law n. 10173 (On the Protection of Collaborators of Justice and Witnesses) 2009 [Për mbrojtjen e dëshmitarëve dhe bashkëpunëtorëve të Drejtësisë]
- Law n. 8391 (For the National Informative Service) 1999 [Per Sherbimin Informativ Kometar]
- Law n. 8410 (On Public and Private Radio and Television),1998 [Për radion dhe televizionin publik e privat në Republikën e Shqipërisë]
- Draft law (Protection of Whistle-blowers)2015 [Projekt ligj për Mbrojtjen e Sinjalizuesve]
- Decision of the Council of Ministers n.330, dated 28.5.2014
- Ethical Code of Albanian Media, Albanian Media Institute 2006 [Kodi Etik i Gazetareve]
- Internal regulation of “Faculty of History and Physiological” , University of Tirana
- European Convention of Human Rights
- Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information
- Recommendation CM/Rec(2014) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member States on the protection of whistle-blowers

13.2. Case Law

- Goodwin v the United Kingdom [1996] European Court of Human Rights
- Sunday Times v the United Kingdom [1991] European Court of Human Rights
- Handyside v the United Kingdom [1979] European Court of Human Rights
- Lingens v. Austria [1986] European Court of Human Rights
- Guja v Moldova [2008] European Court of Human Rights

13.3. Books and articles

- Fuga A., 'The Four Challenges Faced by Albanian Media', 15 February 2013, Interights, 'Briefing Paper on Protection of Journalists' Sources - Freedom of Expression Litigation Project' [May 1998], <https://www.article19.org/data/files/pdfs/publications/right-to-protect-sources.pdf>
- Londo I., 'Self-regulation and defamation' Albanian Media Institute', <http://www.institutemedia.org/Documents/PDF/Self%20regulation%20and%20defamation.pdf>
- Leslie G., "Who is a journalist and why does it matter?", [2009]
- Cipuri R., "Albanian journalist between the Professional Standards and external pressures"
- Bellanger A. from Jason N. Parkinson 'Journalism in the Age of Mass Surveillance' [2014] <https://www.nuj.org.uk/campaigns/safeguarding-journalists-and-their-sources/> accessed 27 April 2016.
- Carter A. and Bouris A., "Freedom of Information, Balancing the Public Interest" [2006]
- Hulin A. and Stone M., 'The Online Media Self-Regulation Guidebook', [2013]
<http://www.osce.org/fom/99560?download=true> accessed 01 May 2016.
- Haraszti M., 'The Media Self-Regulation Guidebook' Office of the OSCE Representative on Freedom of the Media, [2008] <http://www.osce.org/fom/31497?download=true> accessed 06 May 2016.
- Budini B. 'Ways to Establish Self-Regulation on the Part of the Albanian Electronic Media in Coherence with European Union Prospects'
<http://dspace.epoka.edu.al/bitstream/handle/1/1323/Ways%20to%20Establish%20Self-Regulation%20on%20the%20Part%20of%20the%20Albanian%20Electronic%20Media%20in%20Coherence%20with%20European%20Union%20Prospects.pdf?sequence=1>
- Zlatev O. "Media accountability systems (MAS) and their applications in South East Europe and Turkey" in Professional Journalism Self-Regulation. Paris, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization [2011]
- Hoxha A., Islami H., and Panda I., "Criminal Procedure" [2011]
- Carter M. and Bouris A., "Freedom of Information, Balancing the Public Interest" [2006]

- Dyrmishi A., Hroni E., Gjokutaj E., “Whistle-blowers protection in Albania: An assessment of the Legislation and Practice”, Institute for Democracy and Mediation [2013]
- The Cost of Speech, Violations of Media Freedom in Albania, Human Rights Watch, Vol. 14, No.5 (D), [2002]
- Koleka, Benet, Albanian witness in U.S. arms probe dies suddenly. [2008]: <http://www.reuters.com/article/2008/09/12/us-albania-blast-witness-idUSLC14849820080912> Accessed on 22.4.2016
- Centre for Media Pluralism and Media Freedom “Protection of Sources – EU Member States Laws” <http://journalism.cmpf.eu.eu/maps/protection-of-sources/http://en.ejo.ch/media-economics/challenges-albanian-media>

13.4. Internet sources

- <http://www.institutemedia.org>
- www.coe.int
- <http://www.avokatipopullit.gov.al/en/>
- <http://www.javanews.al/fomohet-keshilli-i-medias/>
- <http://www.shekulli.com.al/>
- www.osce.org
- www.ohchr.org

14. Table of provisions

Provisions in native language	Corresponding translation
Kushtetuta e Republikës së Shqipërisë, neni 22 1. Liria e shprehjes është e garantuar. 2. Liria e shtypit, e radios dhe e televizionit është e garantuar. 3. Censura paraprake e mjeteve të komunikimit ndalohet. 4. Ligji mund të kërkojë dhënien e autorizimit për funksionimin e stacioneve të radios ose të televizionit.	Constitution of the Republic of Albania, article 22 1. Freedom of expression is guaranteed. 2. Freedom of the press, radio and television is guaranteed. 3. Prior censorship of means of communication is prohibited. 4. The law may require authorization to be granted for the operation of radio or television stations.
Kushtetuta e Republikës së Shqipërisë, neni 17 1. Kufizime të të drejtave dhe lirive të parashikuara në këtë Kushtetutë mund të vendosen vetëm me ligj për një interes publik ose për mbrojtjen e të drejtave të të tjerëve. Kufizimi duhet të jetë në përpjesëtim me gjendjen që e ka diktuar atë. 2. Këto kufizime nuk mund të cenojnë thelbin e lirive dhe të të drejtave dhe në asnjë rast nuk mund të tejkalojnë kufizimet e parashikuara në Konventën Europiane	Constitution of the Republic of Albania, article 17 1. Limitations of the rights and freedoms provided for in this Constitution may be established only by law, in the public interest or for the protection of the rights of others. A limitation shall be in proportion to the situation that has dictated it. 2. These limitations may not infringe the essence of the rights and freedoms and in no case may exceed the limitations provided for in the European Convention

për të Drejtat e Njeriut.	on Human Rights.
Kushtetuta e Republikës së Shqipërisë, neni 122 1. Çdo marrëveshje ndërkombëtare e ratifikuar përbën pjesë të sistemit të brendshëm juridik pasi botohet në Fletoren Zyrtare të Republikës së Shqipërisë. Ajo zbatohet në mënyrë të drejtpërdrejtë, përveç rasteve kur nuk është e vetëzbatueshme dhe zbatimi i saj kërkon nxjerrjen e një ligji. Ndryshimi, plotësimi dhe shfuqizimi i ligjeve të miratuara me shumicën e të gjithë anëtarëve të Kuvendit për efekt të ratifikimit të marrëveshjeve ndërkombëtare bëhet me të njëjtën shumicë. 2. Një marrëveshje ndërkombëtare e ratifikuar me ligj ka epërsi mbi ligjet e vendit që nuk pajtohen me të.	Constitution of the Republic of Albania, article 122 1. Any ratified international agreement constitutes part of the internal legal system after it is published in the Official Journal of the Republic of Albania. It is directly applicable, except when it is not self-executing and its application requires the adoption of a law. The amendment and repeal of laws approved by a majority of all members of the Assembly is done by the same majority for the purposes of the ratification of an international agreement. 2. An international agreement ratified by law has priority over the laws of the country that are incompatible with it.
Kodi i Procedurës Administrative të Republikës së Shqipërisë, neni 137: 1. Çdo palë e interesuar ka të drejtë të ankohet kundër një akti administrativ ose kundër një refuzimi për nxjerrjen e aktit administrativ. 2. Organi administrativ, të cilit i drejtohet ankimi, shqyrton ligjshmërinë dhe rregullsinë e aktit të kontestuar.	The Code of Administrative Procedures of the Republic of Albania, article 137: 1. Any interested party is entitled to submit an appeal against an administrative act or against a denial for the issuance of the administrative act. 2. The administrative act, to which the appeal is addressed, reviews the legitimacy and regularity of contested act.

3. Në parim, palët e interesuara mund t'i drejtohen gjykatës vetëm pasi të kenë ezauruar rekursin administrativ.	3. In principle, the interested parties may address the court only after using the administrative recourse.
Kodi i Procedurës Administrative të Republikës së Shqipërisë, neni 139: 1. Ankimi administrativ mund të bëhet përpara: a) organit që ka nxjerrë aktin administrativ të ankimuar ose që ka refuzuar të nxjerrë aktin administrativ; b) organit epror të organit të përmendur në nënparagrafin (a) të paragrafit 1 të këtij neni. 2. Në rastet kur ankimi i drejtohet organit epror, ky i fundit ia transferon dosjen përkatëse organit që ka nxjerrë/refuzuar të nxjerrë aktin së bashku me orientimet e tij për zgjidhjen e çështjes.	The Code of Administrative Procedures of the Republic of Albania, article 139: 1. The administrative appeal may be submitted before: a) the body which issued the appealed administrative act or denied the issuance of an administrative act. b) the superior body mentioned in point a of paragraph 1 of this Article. 2. In cases where the appeal is addressed to the superior body, the latter transfers the respective file to the body which has issued/refused to issue the act attached with its instruction concerning the resolution of this case.
Kodi i Procedurës Penale i Republikës së Shqipërisë, neni 159: 1. Nuk mund të detyrohen të dëshmojnë për sa dinë për shkak të profesionit, me përjashtim të rasteve kur kanë detyrimin që t'ua referojnë autoriteteve proceduese:	Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Albania, article 159: 1. May not be compelled to testify on what they know due to their profession, except in cases where they have the obligation to report to proceeding authorities:

a) përfaqësuesit e besimeve fetare, statutet e të cilëve nuk janë në kundërshtim me rendin juridik shqiptar; b) avokatët, përfaqësuesit ligjorë dhe noterët; c) mjekët, kirurgët, farmacistët, obstetrët dhe kushdo që ushtron një profesion shëndetësor; ç) ata që ushtrojnë profesione të tjera, të cilëve ligji u njeh të drejtën të mos dëshmojnë për ato që lidhen me sekretin profesional. 2. Gjykata, kur ka arsye të dyshojë se pretendimi i bërë nga këta persona për t'iu shmangur dëshmisë nuk ka baza, urdhëron verifikimet e nevojshme. Kur ai rezulton pa baza, gjykata urdhëron që dëshmitari të deponojë. 3. Dispozitat e parashikuara nga paragrafi 1 dhe 2 zbatohen edhe për gazetarët profesionistë lidhur me emrat e personave nga të cilët ata kanë marrë të dhëna gjatë ushtrimit të profesionit të tyre. Por, kur të dhënat janë të domosdoshme për të provuar veprën penale dhe vërtetësia e këtyre të dhënave mund të dalë vetëm nëpërmjet identifikimit të burimit, gjykata urdhëron gazetarin që të tregojë burimin e informacionit të tij.	a) religious representatives, whose statutes are not in contravention of the Albanian legal order; b) attorneys at law, legal representatives and notaries; c) physicians, surgeons, pharmacists, obstetricians and anyone who exercises a medical profession, d) those who exercise other professions, which the law recognizes them the right not to testify on what is related to professional secrecy. 2. When the court has reasons to suspect that the claim made by these persons in order to avoid the testimony has no grounds, orders the necessary verification. Where it (claim) results baseless, the court orders the witness to testify. 3. Provisions provided under paragraph 1 and 2 shall also apply to professional journalists pertaining to the names of persons whom they have got information from during the course of their profession. But, when the information is indispensable to prove the criminal offence and the truthfulness of the information may only be proved through identification of the source, the court orders the journalist to reveal the source of his information.
Kodi i Procedurës Penale i Republikës së Shqipërisë, neni 204: 1. Para se të bëhet kontrolli i personit, atij	Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Albania, article 204: 1. Prior to conducting a body search, the

që do të kontrollohet i dorëzohet një kopje e vendimit të kontrollit, duke i bërë të ditur të drejtën për të kërkuar praninë e një personi të besuar, me kusht që ai të gjendet shpejt dhe të jetë i përshtatshëm. 2. Kontrolli bëhet duke respektuar dinjitetin dhe mbrojtjen e atij që kontrollohet.	one who will be searched, is handed over a copy of the search order, informing him of his right to request the presence of a reliable person, provided that can be found immediately and is suitable. 2. The search is conducted in compliance with the dignity and safety of the one being searched.
Kodi i Procedurës Penale i Republikës së Shqipërisë, neni 205: 1. Të pandehurit, kur është i pranishëm, dhe atij që ka në dispozicion vendin u dorëzohet kopja e vendimit të kontrollit, duke i sqaruar të drejtën për të kërkuar praninë e një personi të besuar. 2. Kur mungojnë personat e treguar në paragrafin 1, kopja e vendimit i dorëzohet një të afërm, një fqinji ose një personi që punon bashkë me të. 3. Organi procedues mund të kontrollojë personat e pranishëm, kur çmon se këta mund të fshehin provën materiale ose sendet që i përkasin veprës penale. Ai mund të urdhërojë që të pranishmit të mos largohen para se të mbarojë kontrolli dhe të kthehen forcërisht ata që largohen.	Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Albania, article 205: 1. Defendant, when present and the one who is in charge of the place, is handed over a copy of the search order, informing them of the right to request the presence of a reliable person. 2. When the persons stipulated in paragraph 1 are absent, a copy of the order is handed over to a relative, neighbour or to a person who works with him. 3. The proceeding authority may search the persons present when it judges that they may conceal material evidence or items belonging to the criminal offence. It may order that persons present may not leave prior to conclusion of the search and may use force to get back those who leave.
Kodi i Procedurës Penale i Republikës	Criminal Procedure Code of the

së Shqipërisë, neni 206: 1. Kontrolli në një banesë ose në një vend të mbyllur ngjitur me të nuk mund të fillojë para orës shtatë dhe pas orës njëzet. Në raste të ngutshme organi procedues mund të urdhërojë me shkrim që kontrolli të bëhet tej këtyre caqeve.	Republic of Albania, article 206: 1. A house search or a search of a closed place attached to it may not commence before seven o'clock and after twenty o'clock. In urgent cases, the proceeding authority may order in writing that the search be conducted beyond these restrictions.
Kodi i Procedurës Penale i Republikës së Shqipërisë, neni 221: 1. Përgjimi i komunikimeve të një personi ose të një numri telefoni me telefon, faks, kompjuter ose me mjete të tjera të çdo lloji, përgjimi i fshehtë me mjete teknike i bisedave në vende private, përgjimi me audio dhe video në vende private dhe regjistrimi i numrave të telefonit, hyrës dhe dalës, lejohen vetëm kur procedohet: a) për krimet e kryera me dashje, për të cilat parashikohet dënim me burgim jo më pak, në maksimum, se shtatë vjet; b) për kundërvajtjet penale të fyerjes e të kanosjes, të kryera me mjete të telekomunikimit. 2. Përgjimi i fshehtë fotografik, filmik ose me video i personave në vende publike dhe përdorimi i pajisjeve gjurmuese të	Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Albania, article 221: 1. Interception of communications of a person or a telephone number, by telephone, fax, computer or other means of any kind, the secret interception by technical means of conversation in private place, the interception by audio and video in private places and the recording of incoming and outgoing telephone numbers, is permitted only where there is a proceeding: a) for intentionally committed crimes for which a punishment of imprisonment of no less than seven years is provided; b) for the criminal contravention of insult and threat committed through the means of telecommunications. 2. Secret photographic, filmed or video surveillance of persons in public places and use of tracking devices of whereabouts are

vendndodhjes lejohen vetëm kur procedohet për krime të kryera me dashje, për të cilat parashikohet dënim me burgim jo më pak, në maksimum, se dy vjet. 3. Përgjimi mund të urdhërohet kundër: a) të dyshuarit për kryerjen e një vepre penale; b) personit që dyshohet se merr ose transmeton komunikime nga i dyshuari; c) personit që merr pjesë në transaksione me të dyshuarin; ç) personit, vëzhgimi i të cilit mund të çojë në zbulimin e vendndodhjes ose të identitetit të të dyshuarit. 4. Rezultati i përgjimit është i vlefshëm për të gjithë komunikuesit. 5. Përgjimi parandalues rregullohet me ligj të veçantë. Rezultatet e tij nuk mund të përdoren si provë.	permitted only when there is a proceeding for intentionally committed crimes for which a punishment of imprisonment of no less than two years, in maximum, is provided. 3. Interception/Surveillance may be ordered against: a) a person suspected of committing a criminal offence; b) a person who is suspected of receiving or transmitting communications from the suspect; c) a person who takes part in transaction with the suspect; d) a person whose surveillance may lead to the discovery of the crime scene or the identity of the suspect. 4. The results of interception/surveillance are valid for all the communicators. 5. Preventive interception/surveillance is governed by a separate law. Its results may not be used as evidence.
Kodi i Procedurës Penale i Republikës së Shqipërisë, neni 339, pika 1: 1. Seanca gjyqësore është publike,	Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Albania, article 339, p. 1: 1. The hearing shall be public otherwise it

përndryshe quhet e pavlefshme.	shall be null and void.
Kodi i Procedurës Penale i Republikës së Shqipërisë, neni 340: 1. Gjykata vendos që shqyrtimi gjyqësor ose disa veprime të tij të zhvillohen me dyer të mbyllura: a) kur publiciteti mund të dëmtojë moralin shoqëror ose mund të sjellë përhapjen e të dhënave që duhet të mbahen sekret në interes të shtetit, në qoftë se një gjë e tillë kërkohet nga organi kompetent; b) kur nga ana e publikut ka shfaqje që prishin zhvillimin e rregullt të seancës; c) kur është e nevojshme të mbrohet siguria e dëshmitarëve ose e të pandehurve; ç) kur gjykohet e nevojshme në pyetjen e të miturve. 2. Vendimi i gjykatës për zhvillimin e seancës me dyer të mbyllura revokohet kur pushojnë shkaqet që e sollën atë.	Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Albania, article 340: 1. The court decides to hold the court examination or some of its actions in camera: a) when the publicity may damage the social morality or may divulge data to be kept secret for the interest of the state, if this is requested by the competent authority. b) in case of behaviors which impair the normal performance of the hearing c) when it is necessary to protect the witnesses or the defendant d) when necessary during the questioning of juveniles 2. The decision of the court holding the hearing in camera is revoked once the causes which required it no longer exist.

Ligji nr. 8391 për Shërbimin Informativ Shtetëror, neni 3 Shërbimi Informativ Shtetëror ka këto detyra kryesore: ..... - Mbledh informacion për terrorizmin, për prodhimin dhe trafikun e narkotikëve, për prodhimin e armëve të dëmtimit në masë, për krimet kundër mjedisit .....	Law n. 8391 For the National Informative Service, article 3 National Informative Service has these duties: ..... -to collect information about terrorism, for the production and trafficking of narcotics, for the production of mass destruction weapons, for crimes against the environment. .....
Ligji nr. 8391 për Shërbimin Informativ Shtetëror, neni 9 Shërbimi Informativ Shtetëror nuk kryen veprimtari të karakterit ushtarak ose policor. Kur SHISH krijon bindjen për një shkelje të ligjit, informon në institucionin përkatës, duke mbrojtur burimet dhe metodat informative. Shërbimi Informativ Shtetëror në funksion të realizimit të detyrave të tij mund të bashkëpunojë me shërbimet informative të vendeve të tjera.	Law no 8391 For the National Information Service, article 9 The National Information Service does not perform military or police activities. When NIS has a strong conviction for an infringement of the law, inform the relevant institution while protecting methods and sources of information. National Information Service in order to carry out its tasks can cooperate with information services of other countries.
Projekt ligj për Mbrojtjen e Sinjalizuesve neni 9 Në zbatim të parimit të ruajtjes së konfidencialitetit, sekretit shtetëror dhe	Draft law Protection of Whistle-blowers, article 9 Pursuant to the principle of confidentiality, state secrecy and protection of personal

mbrojtjes të të dhënave personale, njësitë përgjegjëse bashkëpunojnë me njëratjetrën dhe me ILDKPKI-në për shkëmbim të dhënash, të plota dhe pa asnjë rezervë, me qëllim shqyrtimin dhe zgjidhjen e një rasti të sinjalizuar kur pavarësisht nga organizata e sinjalizuesit, të sinjalizuarit i përkasin organizatave të ndryshme.	data, the responsible units cooperate with each other and with HIDAA (High Inspectorate for the Declaration and Audit of Assets) for exchanging of data, full and without reservation, in order hearing and for the resolution of a case of whistleblowing when despite of whistleblowing organizations, whistleblowers belong to different organizations.
Ligji nr 8410 Për radion dhe televizionin publik privat, neni 5 Pavarësia editorial sigurohet me ligj. Punësimi, ngritja në detyrë si dhe të drejtat dhe detyrat e punonjësve të radio dhe televizioneve publike dhe private nuk përcaktohen nga seksi, origjina, pikëpamjet politike, besimi fetar apo anëtarësia në sindikata	Law n. 8410 On Public Private Radio and television, article 5 Editorial independence is guaranteed by law. Employment, promotion and the rights and duties of employees of radio and television public and private are not determined by sex, origin, political views, religious beliefs or trade union membership
Ligji Nr. 8452 për Avokatin e Popullit në Republikën e Shqipërisë, Neni 2 "Detyrat e Avokatit të Popullit": Avokati i Popullit mbron të drejtat, liritë dhe interesat e ligjshëm të individit nga veprimet ose mosveprimet e paligjshme e të parregullta të organeve të administratës publike, si dhe të të tretëve që veprojnë për llogari të saj. Avokati i Popullit i udhëhequr nga parimet	Law Nr. 8454, on the People's Advocate in the Republic of Albania, Article 2 "Duties of the People's Advocate": The People's Advocate safeguards the rights, freedoms and lawful interests of individuals from unlawful and improper actions or failures to act of the organs of public administration as well as third parties acting on their behalf. The People's Advocate guided by the

e paanësisë, konfidencialitetit, profesionalizmit dhe pavarësisë ushtron veprimtarinë në mbrojtje të të drejtave dhe të lirive të njeriut, të parashikuara në dispozita kushtetuese dhe në ligje. Dispozitat e këtij ligji zbatohen edhe për mbrojtjen e të drejtave të të huajve, të cilët janë ose jo rezidentë të rregullt në Shqipëri, të refugjatëve, si dhe të personave pa shtetësi që ndodhen në territorin e Republikës së Shqipërisë, sipas kushteve të parashikuara në ligj.	principles of impartiality, confidentiality, professionalism and independence exercises his activity for the protection of human right and freedoms as defined by the constitutional provisions and by the laws. The provisions of this law shall also apply to protect the rights of foreigners, whether they are residing lawfully, in Albania or not, refugees as well as stateless persons within the territory of the Republic of Albania, pursuant to the terms set forth by law.
Ligji Nr. 8452 për Avokatin e Popullit në Republikën e Shqipërisë, Neni 12 "E drejta për t'u ankuar": Çdo individ, grup individësh ose organizata joqeveritare, që pretendojnë se u janë shkelur të drejtat dhe liritë dhe interesat e tyre të ligjshme nga veprimet ose mosveprimet e paligjshme e të parregullta të organeve të administratës publike, kanë të drejtë të ankohen ose të njoftojnë Avokatin e Popullit dhe të kërkojnë ndërhyrjen e tij për vënien në vend të së drejtës ose lirisë së shkelur. Avokati i Popullit duhet të ruajë fshehtësinë nëse e sheh të arsyeshme, si dhe nëse kjo kërkohet nga personi që bën ankesën, kërkesën apo njoftimin.	Law Nr. 8454, on the People's Advocate in the Republic of Albania, Article 12 "Right to complain": Every individual, group of individuals or non-government organization, claiming that his/their rights, freedoms or lawful interests have been violated by the unlawful or improper actions or failures to act of the organs of the public administration shall have the right to complain or notify the People's Advocate and to request his intervention to remedy the violation of the right or freedom. The People's Advocate shall maintain confidentiality if he deems it reasonable as well as when the person submitting the complaint, request or notification so requests.
Ligji Nr. 8452 për Avokatin e Popullit në Republikën e Shqipërisë, Neni 13 "Fillimi i shqyrtimit të çështjes":	Law Nr. 8454, on the People's Advocate in the Republic of Albania, Article 13 "Initiation of the proceedings":

Avokati i Popullit fillon procedurën e shqyrtimit të çështjes kur vëren ose dyshon se ka ndodhur një shkelje e së drejtës, në bazë të ankesës apo të kërkesës së personit të interesuar ose të dëmtuar, si dhe me nismën e vet, për raste të veçanta të bëra publike, por me pëlqimin e të interesuarit ose të dëmtuarit.	The People's Advocate, upon finding or suspecting that a right has been violated, shall initiate an investigation of the case, upon the complaint or request of the interested or affected person, or on his own motion if the particular case is in the public domain and provided the interested or injured party consents.
Vendim i Këshillit të Ministrave nr 330 datë 28.05.2014 Këshilli i Ministrave vendosi për: Miratimin e udhërrëfyesit për 5 prioritetet e rekomanduara nga Komisioni European	Decision of the Council of the Ministers n. 330 dated 28.05.2014 The Council of Ministers decided for the: Adoption of guidelines for the 5 priorities recommended by European Commission.
Për mediat audiovizive në Republikën e Shqipërisë (neni 5) “Autoritet i komunikimeve elektronike dhe postare ose AKEP” është autoriteti përgjegjës rregullator për komunikimet elektronike, sipas përcaktimeve të ligjit nr. 9918 datë 19.5.2008 “Për komunikimet elektronike në Republikën e Shqipërisë”.	On Audiovisual Media in Republic of Albania (article 5) “Postal and Electronic Communications Authority” or PECA is the regulatory authority responsible for electronic communications pursuant to the provisions of Law No. 9918, dated 19.5.2008 “On Electronic Communications in the Republic of Albania”

Per te drejten e Informimit ne Republikën së Shqipërisë, neni 17 2. E drejta e informimit kufizohet në rast se është e domosdoshme, proporcionale dhe nëse dhënia e informacionit shkakton një dëm të qartë dhe të rëndë ndaj interesave të mëposhtëm: a) sigurinë kombëtare, sipas përkufizimit të bërë nga legjislacioni për informacionin e klasifikuar; b) parandalimin, hetimin dhe ndjekjen e veprave penale; c) mbarëvajtjen e hetimit administrativ në kuadër të një procedimi disiplinor; ç) mbarëvajtjen e procedurave të inspektimit dhe auditimit të autoriteteve publike; d) formulimin e politikave monetare dhe fiskale të shtetit; dh) barazinë e palëve në një proces gjyqësor dhe mbarëvajtjen e procesit gjyqësor; e) këshillimin dhe diskutimin paraprak brenda ose midis autoriteteve publike për zhvillimin e politikave publike; ë) mbarëvajtjen e marrëdhënieve ndërkombe-tare ose ndërqeveritare. Pavarësisht nga sa paras hikohe-t në paragrafin e parë, të pikës 2, të këtij neni, informacioni i kërkuar nuk refuzohet në rast se ekziston një interes publik më i lartë për dhënien e tij. Kufizimi mbi të drejtën e informimit, për shkak të interesit të parashikuar në pikën 2, shkronjat "c" dhe "ç", të këtij neni, nuk zbatohet kur hetimi administrativ, në kuadër të një procedimi disiplinor, dhe procedurat e inspektimit e të auditimit të autoriteteve publike kanë përfunduar. Kufizimi mbi të drejtën e informimit, për shkak të interesit të parashikuar në pikën 2, shkronjat "d" dhe "dh", të këtij neni, nuk zbatohet kur të dhënat përkatëse janë fakte, analiza të fakteve, të dhëna teknike ose të dhëna statistikore. Kufizimi mbi të drejtën e informimit, për shkak të interesit të	On the Right to Information, article 17 (2) 2. The right to information may be restricted, if giving the information causes a clear and serious harm to the following interests: (a) national security, as defined by the legislation for classified information; (b) prevention, investigation and prosecution of offences; (c) conduct of an administrative investigation within a disciplinary proceeding; (d) conduct of inspection and auditing procedures of public authorities; (e) formulation of state monetary and fiscal policies; (f) equality of parties in court proceedings and the conduct of litigation; (g) preliminary consultations and discussions within or between public authorities on public policy development; (h) progres of international or intergovernmental relations. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1 of point 2 of this Article, the information requested is not rejected if there is a higher public interest to grant it. Restrictions on the right to information, due to the interests foreseen in point 2, letter "c" and "d" of this Article, shall not apply when the administrative investigation, in the context of a disciplinary proceeding, and audit inspection procedures of the public authority have been completed. Restriction on the right to information, due to the interests foreseen in point 2, letter "e" and "f" of this Article, shall not apply where the relevant data are facts, analyses of facts, technical data or statistics. Restriction on the right to information, due to the interests foreseen in point 2, letter "g" of this Article, shall not apply once the
---	--

parashikuar në pikën 2, shkronja "e", të këtij neni, nuk zbatohet pasi politikat janë bërë publike.	policies are published.
--	--------------------------------

ELSA AUSTRIA

Contributors

National Coordinator

Anica Karlic

National Academic Coordinator

Anica Karlic

National Researchers

Sandra Gallistl

Susanne Herta

Franziska Jäger

Verena Kirchmair

Mariella Rieder

National Linguistic Editor

Aleksander Makal

National Academic Supervisor

Univ. Prof. Dr. Walter Berka

1. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information? What type of legislation provides this protection? How exactly is this construed in national law?

1.1. Constitutional legislation

Austrian legislation affords protection of the journalists right not to disclose sources by means of Article 10, para 1 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR), § 157 Abs 1 Z 4 Code of Criminal Procedure [Strafprozessordnung, StPO] and § 31 Media Act [Mediengesetz, Medien].

The right of the journalists not to disclose their sources falls within the scope of freedom of expression under Article 10, para 1 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR); in Austria, the ECHR enjoys the rank of federal constitutional law and is directly applicable.¹

Article 10, ECHR prohibits state action which aims at forcing journalists to disclose their sources. In a 2010 case, the Austrian Oberster Gerichtshof (Supreme Court of Justice, “OGH”) followed the decision of the European Court of Human Rights (“ECtHR”) in Sanoma Uitgevers B.V. v. the Netherlands, and ruled that an order for disclosure of sources (which can only be complied with by, for instance, surrendering a storage medium with materials researched by a journalist) is contrary to the provisions of art 10 para 1 ECHR.²

1.2. Criminal legislation

Furthermore, § 157 Abs 1 Z 4 Code of Criminal Procedure [Strafprozessordnung, StPO] and § 31 Media Act [Mediengesetz, MedienG] afford explicit protection of the journalist’s right not to disclose his sources.

In the Austrian law of criminal procedure, § 157 Abs 1 Z 4 StPO 1975 allows a journalist expressis verbis to refuse to testify as a witness in order to protect the identity of his source:³

§157 (1) Entitled to refuse testimony are:

...

4. Media owners, editors, journalistic staff, and [other] employees of a media undertaking or a media service in respect of questions concerning the person of the author, sender,

¹ See Question 4.

² Sanoma Uitgevers B.V. v. The Netherlands [2010] ECtHR App no 38224/03; Os 130/10g [2010] Austrian Supreme Court of Justice EvBl Vol. 20 [2011] 134 [German]; Ernst Fabrizy, Strafprozessordnung (12th edn, Manz 2014) 1052 [German]; or source of articles and documents, or any information which has reached them in their professional capacity.

³ Ernst Fabrizy, 'Strafprozessordnung' (12th edn, Manz 2014) 403, 407 [German].

As already noted, this provision applies only if the journalist concerned is called to testify as a witness. However, even when a criminal action is brought against a journalist, he can protect his sources by exercising a general right to refuse testimony anchored in several provisions⁴ of the StPO 1975 which aim to provide the defendant with protection against self-incrimination and exist independently of the right granted under § 157 Abs 1 Z 4 StPO 1975. The court must instruct the journalist-defendant of this right on its own motion;⁵ should it fail to do so, the judgement may be declared void.⁶ As a result, even as a defendant in criminal proceedings, the journalist can refuse to disclose his source.⁷ This system may be said to achieve the goal set by Principle 7 of Recommendation No. R (2000) 7.⁸

All materials a journalist has received from a source when carrying out his professional activities are protected under § 157 Abs 1 Z 4 StPO 1975; hence any person who furnishes the journalist with information will be a source within the meaning of this provision.⁹

In this context, it is necessary to note that material researched by the journalist himself is not protected. However, if the material concerned has only been partly researched by the journalist and otherwise contains information which the journalist has received from a source, such material will be protected in so far as its disclosure would reveal the identity of the source.¹⁰

1.3. Other legislation

Apart from the provisions of the StPO 1975, the right of journalists not to disclose their sources is also guaranteed under § 31 MedienG. The significance of this provision lies in the fact that, in contrast to the provisions of the StPO 1975 discussed above, it may be invoked in all judicial proceedings (criminal, civil and administrative).¹¹

⁴ § 7 Abs 2, § 49 Abs 4, and §164 Abs 1 StPO 1975.

⁵ §159 Abs 1-2 StPO 1975

⁶ § 281 Abs 1 Z 3 StPO; § 159 Abs 3 StPO.

⁷Walter Berka, Lucie Heindl, Thomas Höhne, Alfred Noll, 'Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar' (LexisNexis 2012) 351f [German].

⁸ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7, Appendix Principle 7.

⁹ ibid.

¹⁰ ibid.

¹¹ Walter Berka, Lucie Heindl, Thomas Höhne, Alfred Noll, 'Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar' (LexisNexis 2012) 351 [German].

MedienG 1981 is a successor to the Press Act 1922 [Pressegesetz] and has been amended several times, most recently in 2011, in order to adjust the law to the conditions of new media technologies, and particularly of online media.¹²

The MedienG 1981 protects general rights of privacy, contains procedural provisions for the protection of journalistic sources, and orders disclosure of financial contributions to media undertakings.

§ 31 MedienG 1981 is a procedural provision. It confers a testimonial privilege on defined categories of people working in the media industry:¹³

§31 Protection of editorial confidentiality

- (1) Media owners, editors, journalistic staff, and [other] employees of a media undertaking or a media service, appearing as witnesses in criminal proceedings or other proceedings before a court or an administrative authority, have the right to refuse to answer questions concerning the person of the author, sender, or source of articles and documents, or any information which has reached them in their professional capacity.

As the media can perform their ‘public watchdog’ role only if they receive secret and confidential information, § 31 MedienG 1981 aims to give journalists a possibility to preserve the anonymity of their informants.¹⁴ However, while journalists may refuse to answer questions about their identity, they are not obliged to keep it secret.¹⁵

1.3.1. Personal Scope: Privileged Persons

As may be seen in the text of § 31 MedienG 1981, there are four occupational groups which can invoke the right of non-disclosure. These are: media owners, editors, journalistic staff (Medienmitarbeiter), and employees (Arbeitnehmer) of a media undertaking or a media service. This is a considerably broader spectrum of people than the label “journalist” would normally accommodate. Since the privileged groups include, but are not limited to, journalists, it may be convincingly argued that this national provision achieves the goals set in Principle 2 of Recommendation No R (2000) 7. Not caught by the provision are, for example, guest commentators, authors of letters to the editor, or authors of books.¹⁶

¹² Werner Röggl, Heinz Wittmann, Peter Zöchbauer, Medienrecht (Verlag Medien und Recht 2012) 13ff [German].

¹³ Franz Höpfel, Eckart Ratz, Wiener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch, MedienG (2nd edn, Manz 2011) 18ff [German].

¹⁴ Walter Berka, Lucie Heindl, Thomas Höhne, Alfred Noll, Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar (LexisNexis 2012) 350 [German]; RS0126501 [2007] (official interpretation of the Austrian justice of Voskuil v. The Netherlands [2007] ECtHR App no 64752/01).

¹⁵ Walter Berka, Lucie Heindl, Thomas Höhne, Alfred Noll, Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar (LexisNexis 2012) 350 [German];

¹⁶ ibid.

The statute does not determine when a person will be deemed to belong to one of the four categories listed in § 31 MedienG 1981. Thus, for instance, a question may arise as to whether a person must be employed by a media company when called to testify before the court in order to take advantage of this privilege. According to the prevailing legal opinion, it is the status of the witness at the time when he received the information that is material. Accordingly, if a witness is no longer employed in one of the positions listed in § 31, he may still refuse to disclose his source's identity provided that he was so employed when he received the information concerned.¹⁷

As mentioned above, this testimonial privilege may be claimed in any court proceedings, whether criminal or civil, as well as before administrative authorities.¹⁸

A defendant in criminal proceedings may not claim the right of non-disclosure under § 31 MedienG 1981.¹⁹ He has, however, a general right to refuse to testify under § 7 Abs 2, § 49 Abs 4, and §164 Abs 1 StPO 1975 (discussed above). As a defendant in civil proceedings, the journalist cannot be forced to testify; his refusal will, however, be interpreted by the trial judge in accordance with the principle of unfettered consideration of evidence (Grundsatz freier Beweiswürdigung).²⁰ Notwithstanding, a journalist can never be forced to disclose a source before the court.

1.3.2. Material scope:

Any person who passes information onto a journalist is a 'source' within the meaning of § 31 MedienG 1981.²¹

In addition to protecting the identity of the source, § 31 MedienG 1981 also protects the content of information received by persons caught by its scope.²² It is immaterial whether the information received is confidential or not.²³

¹⁷Walter Berka, Lucie Heindl, Thomas Höhne, Alfred Noll, Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar (LexisNexis 2012) 351 [German].

¹⁸ibid, 351f; Franz Höpfel, Eckart Ratz, Wiener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch, MedienG (2nd edn, Manz 2011) 18 [German].

¹⁹Franz Höpfel, Eckart Ratz, Wiener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch, MedienG (2nd edn, Manz 2011) 21 [German].

²⁰§ 281 Code of Civil Procedure 1985 [Zivilprozessordnung, ZPO]; Walter Berka, Lucie Heindl, Thomas Höhne, Alfred Noll, Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar (LexisNexis 2012) 352 [German].

²¹ Franz Höpfel, Eckart Ratz, Wiener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch, MedienG (2nd edn, Manz 2011) 18 [German].

²²Walter Berka, Lucie Heindl, Thomas Höhne, Alfred Noll, Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar (LexisNexis 2012) 352 [German].

²³ Franz Höpfel, Eckart Ratz, Wiener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch, MedienG (2nd edn, Manz 2011) 21 [German]; Fritz Zeder, Hygiene um das Redaktionsgeheimnis' (2011) Österreichische Juristen-Zeitung 5 [German].

As is the case under § 157 Abs 1 Z 4 StPO 1975, material researched by the journalist does not fall within the scope of § 31 MedienG 1981. But, again, if the material concerned has only partly been researched by the journalist and otherwise contains information which the journalist has received from a source, such material will be protected in so far as its disclosure would reveal the identity of the source.²⁴

Protecting the anonymity of, as well as the content of information received from, a source, the provisions of MedienG 1981 and StPO 1975 discussed above comply with the guidelines relating to the right of non disclosure as laid down in Recommendation No R (2000) 7.

1.3.3. No balance of interests

§ 31 MedienG 1981 applies strictly, irrespective of the balance of the parties' interests. A person caught by this provision can refuse to testify even if the information about the source is likely to be crucial to the success of an investigation of a serious crime. Currently, such strict application of the provision is a subject of legal and political debates.²⁵

Absent the balance of interests, § 31 MedienG 1981 gives journalists instruments to protect their sources which are superior to both those offered by the ECHR and those called for in Recommendation No R (2000) 7 and Recommendation 1950 (2011).²⁶

2. Is there, in domestic law, a provision that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his/her sources? How exactly is this prohibition construed in national law? What is the sanction?

A provision that prohibits journalists from disclosing confidential sources does not exist in Austrian law. Whilst a journalist has the right not to disclose his source, he is not obliged to keep that source's identity secret.²⁷

According to § 157 Abs 1 Z 4 StPO 1975, a journalist has the right to refuse to testify as a witness in order to keep his source secret. However, the journalist-witness may only invoke this testimonial privilege on his own volition; thus, the journalist-witness will not breach the provisions of the StPO 1975 or the Criminal Code 1975 [Strafgesetzbuch, StGB] if he decides to ²⁴ ibid.

²⁵ Walter Berka, Lucie Heindl, Thomas Höhne, Alfred Noll, Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar (LexisNexis 2012) 352 [German]; Fritz Zeder, Hype um das Redaktionsgeheimnis (2011) Österreichische Juristen-Zeitung 5 [German].

²⁶ Recommendation No R (2000) 7; Recommendation 1950 (2011).

²⁷ Walter Berka, Lucie Heindl, Thomas Höhne, Alfred Noll, Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar (LexisNexis 2012) 350 [German]; ; Franz Höpfel, Eckart Ratz, Wiener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch, MedienG (2nd edn, Manz 2011) 21 [German].

reveal his source.²⁸ Similarly, the MedienG 1981 contains no sanction for disclosing a source. A journalistic source has no right to confidentiality against the journalist's will.²⁹ This said, it will be generally in the journalist's interest to keep the identity of his sources secret. Otherwise, he would be unlikely to obtain crucial information from his future sources. Accordingly, the relevant provisions of the StPO 1975 and the MedienG discussed above aim to give journalists instruments to keep the confidentiality of their sources.³⁰

It goes without saying that a journalist may be prohibited from revealing his sources under his employment contract or the ethical code of his profession. A breach of either may lead to sanctions from the employer.

3. Who is a “journalist” according to the national legislation? Is it, in your view, a restricted definition for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources? What is the scope of protection of other media actors? Is the protection of journalists' sources extended to anyone else?

In Austria, the profession of journalism is regulated in a separate statute – the Journalists Act 1920 [Journalistengesetz, JournalistenG].

According to § 1 Abs 1 JournalistenG 1920, the provisions of the act shall apply to:

all employees of a newspaper enterprise who are charged with the composition of texts or the drawing of pictures, and who are employed with a fixed salary and not merely as a matter of secondary occupation (editors, general editors).

Furthermore, § 1 Abs 2 JournalistenG provides that the act shall apply mutatis mutandis to persons who perform the tasks listed in § 1 Abs 1, but are employed by a press agency, a broadcasting enterprise, or a film production enterprise.

3.1. Holders of the Journalistic Privilege

While the JournalistenG, 1920, addresses issues of labour and company law specific to media companies, the protection of journalistic sources is dealt with primarily in § 31 MedienG 1981.

²⁸ Ernst Fabrizy, Strafprozessordnung (12th edn, Manz 2014) 403 [German].

²⁹ Walter Berka, Lucie Heindl, Thomas Höhne, Alfred Noll, Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar (LexisNexis 2012) 350 [German].

³⁰ Ibid.

Curiously, the MedienG 1981 does not use the term 'journalist'; rather, it provides protection to a broader spectrum of privilege holders:

§ 31. (1) Media owners, editors, journalistic staff, and [other] employees of a media undertaking or a media service, appearing as witnesses in criminal proceedings or other proceedings before a court or an administrative authority, have the right to refuse to answer questions concerning the person of the author, sender, or source of articles and documents, or any information which has reached them in their professional capacity.

Moreover, §1 MedienG 1981 provides some definitions of the terms used in §31 MedienG 1981. Accordingly, a media owner is a person who operates a media undertaking, managing the content, production or distribution.³¹ This role is not defined more precisely by the law, but due to the fact that this term was legally introduced by the amendment of the MedienG in 2005,³² the explanatory materials make clear the intention to extend protection to owners of homepages or of online discussion forums.³³ This is the most significant difference between the term 'journalist' as used in the JournalistenG, which requires a form of employment by a company, and the 'journalistic' privilege granted by § 31 MedienG. Consequently, also private persons, and especially bloggers, are protected and may refuse to disclose their sources.

An editor is defined as the person who makes decisions about the line which the medium represents.³⁴

Journalistic staff (Medienmitarbeiter) and employees (Arbeitnehmer) are all the other persons working in the media company. Tasks performed by the journalistic staff consist in shaping the medium's content. This category of persons can therefore be equated with 'journalists' within the meaning of the JournalistenG 1920.³⁵

Employees are employees of a media undertaking who perform non-journalistic tasks.³⁶ This means that § 31 MedienG 1981 guarantees protection to practically all persons employed by a media company.³⁷ Clearly, the legislature's intention was to protect media undertakings against attempts to bypass the law by means of court orders directing a member of the non-journalistic

³¹ §1 (1) Z8 MedienG 1981

³² Bundesgesetzblatt I Nr. 49/2005; Bundesgesetzblatt 151/2005

³³ Explanatory Notes and Considerations of the parliament, accessed on March 20 2016 <http://www.bka.gv.at/Docs/2005/2/9/erl%C3%A4uterungenmg.pdf>

³⁴ §1 (1) Z9 MedienG 1981

³⁵ §1 (1) Z11 ibid

³⁶ Employees of another company that are, for instance, charged with the print of the newspaper obviously are not included in the meaning of this legal term as they do not belong to the main company, but are employed in another business.

³⁷ Berka, Höhne, Noll, Polley, Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar, (2nd edn, LexisNexis ARD Orac, 2005) § 31 Rn 4 [German]

staff (eg. a secretary) to surrender documents or other materials with reference to the 'fact' that they are not protected by the 'journalistic' privilege.³⁸

Looking at the spectrum of privilege holders, it becomes apparent that the Austrian legislative viewed the term 'journalist' within its conventional meaning as too restrictive; it was thought necessary to provide a more nuanced wording if the freedom of expression should be secured. Nevertheless, the law still does not recognise some of the important channels of distribution, such as YouTube and freelance book authors (who do not happen to be holders of the § 31 privilege by virtue of their acting as media owners, editors, or members of staff of a media company).³⁹

3.2. Circumstances of Protection

§ 31 MedienG 1981 guarantees the right to refuse to disclose journalistic sources if two additional conditions are fulfilled: the person appears before the court as a witness and has received the information concerned in his professional capacity.⁴⁰

3.2.1. Witness

§ 31 Abs 1 MedienG 1981 explicitly 'limits' the right to keep sources secret to persons appearing in a trial as witnesses.

In addition to the right to refuse to disclose sources, § 31 Abs 2 MedienG provides that '[t]he right as stated in Abs 1 must not be circumvented by an order made to a person enjoying this right to surrender documents, printed matter, image, sound, or data carriers, illustrations, or other representations of such content, or by confiscating these.'

As already mentioned in the answer to Question 1, there are several procedural laws guaranteeing a defendant the right to remain silent during a trial. Therefore, it is possible to say that the right to refuse to answer questions concerning journalistic sources is warranted to the same extent to defendants as it is to witnesses.

However, in Austrian law, there is no regulation, which would extend the protection guaranteed by § 31 Abs 2 MedienG 1981 to defendants. This means that if a journalist is a defendant, search and seizure orders may be used to confiscate documents within the limits of the applicable procedural law.

³⁸ This does not mean that employees of cooperating companies (eg a separate printery) are protected as well.

³⁹ Berka, Höhne, Noll, Polley, Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar, (2nd edn, LexisNexis ARD Orac, 2005) § 31 Rn 5 [German]

⁴⁰ § 31 (1) MedienG 1981

Consequently, it may often seem expedient to try to obtain the desired information by commencing a legal action against a privilege holder in order to change his position to that of a defendant. This issue was raised in a case brought before the OGH in 2010.⁴¹ A reporter accompanied two men who were later accused of re-engaging in National Socialist activities by performing a Nazi salute. In the ensuing trial, the reporter, too, was accused of incitement; the prosecution used this circumstance to try to obtain the unpublished film materials by means of confiscation. When the media company appealed, the OGH decided a judgement which is now the leading Austrian case (Präjudiz) recognising the need to protect journalistic sources. The decision highlights the importance of the right of non-disclosure, emphasizes the role of the media in a democratic state, and clarifies the legal 'status' of the MedienG (discussed in point 3.2.). The Court also ruled on the issue of bypassing § 31 MedienG by bringing a charge against a privilege holder, which indicates that the courts are going to scrutinise the trial roles as well as grounds for putting someone in the position of a defendant. Accordingly, the OGH refused the prosecutor's demand to confiscate the unpublished film materials and closed the proceedings against the reporter.

3.2.2. The Receipt of Information

The holders of the journalistic privilege are only entitled to refuse to disclose their sources if they have obtained the information concerned in their professional capacity (as employees of a media undertaking).⁴² This does not mean that the information itself has to be confidential or available to only a limited number of people. Quite to the contrary: the protection is also guaranteed if the information is distributed in public.

It is necessary that the privilege holder have obtained the information while carrying out his professional duties; however, he need not be employed by a media company when appearing as a witness.

4. What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources? How are the laws implemented? How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?

4.1. Safeguards

⁴¹ 13 Os130/10g (13 Os136/10i),

https://www.ris.bka.gv.at/Dokument.wxe?Abfrage=Justiz&Dokumentnummer=JJT_20101216_OGH0002_01300S00130_10G0000_000 accessed on 20 March 2016

⁴² The terms „journalistic/media-related“ are meant in the light of § 31 (1) MedienG 1981 and therefore include the positions described in 3.2.

§ 31 MedienG 1981 merely provides a right to remain silent, if the judge, the prosecutor, or the counsel for the other party requests information in any form.⁴³ In contrast to other evidentiary privileges, the court is not obliged to advise the privilege holder of his right to remain silent about the sources.⁴⁴ This means that the trial may not become a subject of a nullity appeal merely because the witness had not been informed about this right.⁴⁵ Equally, a trial does not become invalid because the witness has disclosed the sources; he is, naturally, allowed to do so if he is asked about it.⁴⁶

Some legal commentators view this legal situation as justifiable, pointing out that the occupational groups concerned should, in any case, be aware of their professional privileges and thus need not be additionally advised of their right to remain silent. Nonetheless, this remains controversial, especially if one considers that such obligation exists under § 152 (2) StPO 1975 in respect of attorneys and notaries, that is, professionals who would normally be expected to be aware of their rights more than members of any other profession.⁴⁷

All things considered, there are no safeguards to protect the holders of the journalistic privilege from the consequences of their unfamiliarity with the law. Absent any self-regulatory mechanism, it is for media undertakings to ensure that their employees are cognisant of their right to remain silent.

4.2. Implementation of the Laws

Austrian law guarantees a wide range of fundamental rights. Not all of them, however, are anchored in constitutional statutes (as may be the case in other countries). Some provisions gained importance over time and were therefore elevated to rank of constitutional law, despite being regulated in 'ordinary' statutes (einfachgesetzliche Regelungen). Additionally, some fundamental rights have their origin in public international law and regulations issued by international institutions and supranational organisations.

A particularly prominent source of fundamental rights is the ECHR, which Austria joined in 1958. The ECHR has been transposed into national law in a general way, which means that its ⁴³ In contrast to the situation in 13 Os130/10g (13 Os136/10i), where the journalist was a defendant, a journalist-witness does not have any right to object to such a request; he may only refuse to answer questions.

⁴⁴ Hubert Hinterhofer, Zeugenschutz und Zeugnisverweigerungsrechte im österreichischen Strafprozess, (Facultas 2004) 421 [German]

⁴⁵ Brandstetter, Schmid, Kommentar zum Mediengesetz, (Manz Verlag) §31 Rz 14 [German]

⁴⁶ A journalist has no right to be heard, but may just respond to questions he/she is asked in the witness stand. As a result, this also means that an informant is not protected by any law and basically has no rights against a disclosing journalist.

⁴⁷ Hubert Hinterhofer, Zeugenschutz und Zeugnisverweigerungsrechte im österreichischen Strafprozess, (Facultas 2004) 421 [German]. This could be against the principle of equality [Gleichheitssatz] and thus unconstitutional.

provisions are directly applicable in Austria. As a result, the freedom of expression guaranteed by Article 10 ECHR enjoys the rank of a constitutional right.⁴⁸

As regards the protection of journalistic sources, which is mainly regulated by the MedienG 1981 (an ordinary statute), it was controversial whether it belonged with the freedom of expression and thus had to be regarded as an aspect of that constitutional right.⁴⁹ This controversy was resolved by the OGH in 2010,⁵⁰ when the Court took a strong position on the legal status of § 31 MedienG 1981 and ruled that the protection of journalistic sources provided for thereunder is an aspect of the freedom of expression and is therefore to be recognised as a constitutional right.⁵¹

Furthermore, the 2010 decision shed some more light on the question of the balance of interests (as between the interest in protecting the source, on the one hand, and the interest in obtaining the information, on the other). The Court held that no balance of interest was required in the context of the right to protect journalistic sources; in other words, no matter how essential the information could be (eg for the success of investigations of a serious crime), a breach of the right guaranteed by § 31 MedienG 1981 is not justifiable.

This must be seen as a special case, since most of the fundamental rights in Austria are subject to restrictions which are justifiable by reference to the exigencies of public interest or a specific purpose which they are to pursue. Only the most significant rights, such as the ones resulting from the prohibition of torture or slavery, are regarded as 'absolute' and are therefore free from restrictions of any kind. It is thus clear that Austrian legislation in this area goes far beyond the law laid down in the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) concerning the balance of interests under Article 10, ECHR.⁵²

5. In the respective national legislation, are the limits of non-disclosure of the information in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7? What are the procedures applied? Is the disclosure limited to exceptional circumstances, taking into consideration vital public or individual interests at stake? Do the authorities first search

⁴⁸ Walter Berka, Verfassungsrecht, (4th edn, Springer Verlag 2012) 482-484 [German]. See also, Fritz Zeder, Hype um das Redaktionsgeheimnis (Österreichische Juristen Zeitung, 2011/2) 5-9 [German]

⁴⁹ Peter Zöchbauer, Was Journalisten (nicht) dürfen (Der österreichische Journalist, 02+03 edn, 2011) 100-101 [German] accessed on 20 March 2016

<http://www.journalist.at/archiv/2011-2/ausgabe-02032011/was-journalisten-nicht-durfen/>

⁵⁰ 13 Os130/10g (13 Os136/10i), accessed on 20 March 2016

https://www.ris.bka.gv.at/Dokument.wxe?Abfrage=Justiz&Dokumentnummer=JJT_20101216_OGH0002_01300_S00130_10G0000_000

⁵¹ Fritz Zeder, Hype um das Redaktionsgeheimnis (Österreichische Juristen Zeitung, 2011/2) 5-9 [German]

⁵² Fritz Zeder, Hype um das Redaktionsgeheimnis (Österreichische Juristen Zeitung, 2011/2) 5-9 [German] for and apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the right of journalists not to disclose information?

According to the Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Council of Europe, in order 'to achieve greater unity between its members for the purpose of safeguarding and realising the ideals and principles which are their common heritage', certain principles concerning the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information should be followed. Whether Austrian national legislation is in line with the principles of the Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 in regard to the limits of the right of non-disclosure shall be discussed in the following.

As already mentioned, the protection of journalistic sources is guaranteed by law, in particular by § 31 MedienG 1981 and § 157 Abs 1 Z4 StPO 1975. According to the ECtHR,⁵³ the protection of journalistic sources is one of the aspects of the freedom of expression. This was confirmed in the 2010 judgement of the OGH discussed above.⁵⁴ The right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source thus falls within the scope of Article 10.

However, the right to freedom of expression is not unlimited. 'Restrictions on restrictions' on this fundamental right are stated in Article 10, paragraph 2, ECHR. According to this Article, limits to freedom of expression have to be prescribed by law and ... necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.

Thus, there are three conditions set out in Article 10, paragraph 2, ECHR and re-affirmed by the ECtHR which have to be met in order to justify restrictions on the freedom of expression. First, prescription by law is required; limits to the freedom of expression must be expressly provided for in law. This is of great importance in preventing public authorities from arbitrarily interfering with the exercise of fundamental rights. Moreover, a number of goals agreeing with legitimate public interest in restrictions of this right are mentioned in the paragraph. In addition to this, in order to be permissible, any interference or restriction must be necessary in a democratic society and pursue the goals defined as legitimate.⁵⁵ Article 10 applies for any interference with the right of non-disclosure of journalistic sources and all three conditions have to be met cumulatively.⁵⁶ The right must not be subject to restrictions other than those stated expressly.

⁵³ Goodwin v United Kingdom App no 17488/90 (ECtHR, 27 March 1996).

⁵⁴ 13 Os 130/10g (OGH, 16 December 2010).

⁵⁵ The Sunday Times v United Kingdom App no 6538/74 (ECtHR, 26 April 1979).

⁵⁶ Michael Holoubek, Klaus Kassai and Matthias Traimer, Grundzüge des Rechts der Massenmedien (4th edn, Springer Wien New York 2010) 42 [German].

In contrast to the first and second conditions, the meaning of the third condition, namely, the interference being necessary in a democratic society, requires further explanation. Whether an interference is necessary in a democratic society, is a question of proportionality.⁵⁷ Any interference disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued will not be deemed 'necessary in a democratic society' and will thus violate Article 10. According to the case-law of the ECtHR, considering 'the importance of the protection of journalistic sources for press freedom in a democratic society and the potentially chilling effect an order of source disclosure has on the exercise of that freedom', restricting measures can only be compatible with Article 10, ECHR when 'justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest'.⁵⁸

These considerations need to be taken into account when determining whether public interest in disclosure as mentioned in Article 10 outweighs the interest in protecting journalistic sources. Following the view of the ECtHR stated in its judgements, the Austrian Verfassungsgerichtshof (Constitutional Court, "VfGH") held that an interference with the freedom of expression will be deemed compatible with the constitution only if the interference is prescribed by law, pursues at least one of the legitimate aims mentioned in paragraph 2 of Article 10 and is necessary in a democratic society.⁵⁹ In order to assess the necessity of the measure in a democratic society, the VfGH developed a "principle of proportionality" (Grundsatz der Verhältnismäßigkeit) which serves to determine the appropriate means-end relationship between the legitimate aim pursued and the interference with the fundamental right.⁶⁰ In Austria, the test of the principle of proportionality is applied to every interference with fundamental rights which are not guaranteed unlimitedly. In order to be considered proportional, an interference needs to meet the following criteria:

The measures used to pursue the legitimate public goals have to be suitable to actually achieve these goals. Secondly, the measures need to be necessary; this means that the measure applied has to be the least severe measure necessary to achieve the goal. The authorities have to first look into and, if possible, apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests, and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the right of journalists not to disclose information. Personal liberty may not be subject to any further restrictions than those which are necessary to secure legitimate public interest. Eventually, restrictions of the exercise of fundamental rights are only in line with the constitution when justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest. For that reason, the assessment of overruling interests is based on a proportionality test in order to determine whether public interests outweigh the protection of personal freedom.⁶¹

It is primarily the legislator who has to ensure that a law which interferes with fundamental rights meets all these criteria. If the law has a margin of appreciation, the executive authorities too are ⁵⁷ ibid 43.

⁵⁸ Goodwin v United Kingdom App no 17488/90 (ECtHR, 27 March 1996)

⁵⁹ B847/87 (VfGH 3 March 1989).

⁶⁰ Walter Berka, Lehrbuch Grundrechte (Springer Wien New York 2000) 60 [German].

⁶¹ ibid 60.

obliged to take notice of the principle of proportionality when implementing the law.⁶² The reasonability of the authorities' actions, especially the balancing of competing interests, is supervised by the ECtHR.⁶³

Since the protection of journalistic sources is one of the aspects of the freedom of expression,⁶⁴ the curb placed on interferences with this right also applies to the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source. However, as noted above, in § 31 MedienG 1981 and § 157 Abs 1 Z4 StPO 1975, the Austrian legislative has gone even further in protecting journalistic sources: the balancing of interests, as prescribed by art 10 ECHR, is not required.⁶⁵ Thus, an order to disclose journalistic sources falling under these provision will always be deemed to infringe on the right to freedom of expression. This applies irrespective of whether the sources, if disclosed, would be likely to provide important information about serious crimes.⁶⁶ The OGH affirmed that this goes far beyond the average European-level of protection.⁶⁷ However, the right of journalists not to disclose their sources only applies when they act as witnesses⁶⁸. In other cases, an interference has to pass the proportionality test in order to comply with the case-law of both the ECtHR and the VfGH. According to § 5 StPO 1975, it is necessary to balance the interests where the actions of criminal investigation do not fall within the protections of sources. This provision makes it possible for criminal execution authorities to act in line with the constitution.

The principles concerning the limits to the right of non-disclosure mentioned in the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 refer to Article 10, paragraph 2, ECHR. The Committee of Ministers effectively sums up the ECtHR case-law on the importance of the right of non-disclosure which needs to be taken into account when balancing interests. As the principle of proportionality developed by the VfGH requires the absence of reasonable alternative measures and a compelling legitimate interest, it complies with Principle 3 of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7. In fact, the provisions of § 31 MedienG 1981 and § 157 Abs 1 Z4 StPO 1975 offer protective instruments which go beyond the goals set in the Recommendation.

6. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 the following principles should be respected when the necessity of disclosure is stated: absence of reasonable alternative measures, outweighing legitimate interest (protection of human life, prevention of major crime, defence of a ⁶² ibid 127.

⁶³ ibid 127.

⁶⁴ Michael Holoubek, Klaus Kassai and Matthias Traimer, Grundzüge des Rechts der Massenmedien (4th edn, Springer Wien New York 2010) 46 [German].

⁶⁵ Fritz Zeder, 'Hype um das Redaktionsgeheimnis' [2011] Österreichische Juristen-Zeitung 6 [German].

⁶⁶ Susanne Reindl-Krauskopf, 'Meinungsäußerungsfreiheit und Redaktionsgeheimnis' [2011] Juristische Blätter 667 [German].

⁶⁷ 13 Os 130/10g (OGH, 16 December 2010).

⁶⁸ For a more detailed discussion see Question 1.

person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime).
Under which criteria can the interest in the disclosure outweigh the interest in the nondisclosure?

As already mentioned, § 31 MedienG 1981 and § 157 Abs 1 Z4 StPO 1975 do not require balancing the interests. As a result, there are no circumstances under which the interest in disclosure could outweigh the interest in non-disclosure. Outside the scope of these provisions, an interference in the right not to disclose sources will only be deemed justifiable if it passes the proportionality test. Both the test and the circumstances under which the interest in disclosure will outweigh the interest in non-disclosure have been discussed in the answer to Question 5.⁶⁹

7. In the light of the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, how do national courts apply the respective laws with regard to the right to protect sources? In particular, how do they balance the different interests at stake?

7.1. Introduction

Between 1991 and 2016, the OGH decided six cases (both criminal and civil) which concerned the right to protect journalistic sources. The OGH case-law can be roughly divided into two categories. The first category addresses the problem of limiting the right to protect sources under § 31 MedienG 1981 to witnesses, and has already been discussed in Question 3. The second category also involves discussions of the scope of § 31 MedienG, but is more focused on the question of interpretation of the source and the protected information itself.

7.2. Information covered by § 31 MedienG 1981

7.2.1. OGH Case 15 Os 69/03 [2003]70

During a demonstration in the assembly hall of the University of Vienna a group of masked demonstrators inflicted damage to property. The events were filmed by a reporter team of the Austrian Broadcasting Corporation (“ORF”). When the court ordered that the footage be surrendered, the ORF refused to comply invoking the right to professional secrecy and filed a complaint against this claim.

⁶⁹ Walter Berka, Lehrbuch Grundrechte (Springer Wien New York 2000) 60 [German].

⁷⁰ 15 Os 69/03 [2003] Austrian Supreme Court of Justice EvBl Vol. 42 [2004] 190 [German].

The OGH held that the right to professional secrecy under § 31 MedienG 1981 did not apply as the footage had been taken in public, during a publicly accessible event, and by a reporter team identified as such. Thus, the team was not creating any impression of secrecy or confidentiality, and the court order could not be seen as an attempt to circumvent the right to protect sources.

The OGH pointed out that § 31 MedienG 1981 will not normally apply for public events as in those cases there is no need to keep information secret. In the light of ECtHR case-law, this blanket statement seems problematic. Thus, for instance, Zöchbauer⁷¹ suggests that the OGH decision is not in line with the case-law of the ECtHR, which in Nordisk Film & TV A/S v. Denmark states:

Article 10 of the Convention may be applicable in such a situation and that a compulsory hand over of research material may have a chilling effect on the exercise of journalistic freedom of expression ... However, this matter can only be properly addressed in the circumstances of a given case.⁷²

According to Zöchbauer, in the 2010 case discussed above,⁷³ the OGH refined its initial position on the scope of the right to protect sources under § 31 MedienG 1981 and Article 10 ECHR.⁷⁴ The Court held that information received at public events is not automatically deprived of protection, and that the right to protect sources is not limited to information given in confidence. As a result, any information given to a journalist in his professional capacity will fall under § 31 MedienG 1981.

The latest case where a party claimed the right to protect sources involved an alleged obligation of telecommunication service providers to disclose information. This civil case involved an order issued against a media owner (who provided an online discussion platform) directing him to disclose email addresses of users who had posted defamatory materials allegedly falling under the scope of § 1330 General Civil Code 1811 (Allgemeines Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch, ABGB).⁷⁵ The media owner refused to disclose this information invoking his right to protect sources under § 31 MedienG 1981.

The OGH held that postings on an online discussion platform do not qualify as information within the meaning of § 31 MedienG 1981. The Court stated that § 31 MedienG 1981 does not include any explicit restrictions on the form of information provided to journalists but excludes postings published strictly of the user's own accord without any connection to journalistic work or activity.

⁷¹ Peter Zöchbauer, Neues zum Redaktionsgeheimnis? Eine Anmerkung zur OGH-Entscheidung 13 Os 130/10g, 13 Os 136/10i [2011] Medien und Recht Vol. 1, 4.

⁷² Nordisk Film & TV A/S v. Denmark [2005]; Sanoma Uitgevers B.V. v. the Netherlands [2010] ECHR 1284, 22.

⁷³ 13 Os 130/10g [2010] Austrian Supreme Court of Justice EvBl Vol. 20 [2011] 134 [German].

⁷⁴ Zöchbauer, Neues zum Redaktionsgeheimnis? 4.

⁷⁵ 6 Ob 133/13x [2014] Austrian Supreme Court of Justice EvBl Vol. 105 [2014] 733 [German].

The Court saw this as agreeing with the rationale of § 31 MedienG 1981, since neither it, the vital public-watchdog role of the press, nor its ability to provide accurate and reliable information were adversely affected. The OGH stated that its decision was in line with the case-law of the ECtHR (e.g. in *Nordisk Film & TV A/S v. Denmark*⁷⁶), pointing out that the information was obtained from a source that was not acting with any awareness of journalistic activity; moreover, it was held that persons which do 'not freely assist the press in informing the public of matters of public interest or matters concerning others' should not enjoy the right to protect sources.⁷⁷

In 2015, the ECtHR decided a similar case regarding postings on a news website. In Delfi AS v. Estonia, the Court was asked to examine a complaint concerning the liability of a company running a news website for comments posted on it by users. The portal provided a platform, run on commercial terms, for user-generated comments on previously published content.⁷⁸ In this case users – whether identified or anonymous – posted unambiguously unlawful comments which infringed on the personality rights of others.

The Grand Chamber held that while the publisher [of a printed media publication] is, through editing, the initiator of the publication of a comment, on the Internet portal the initiator of publication is the writer of the comment, who makes it accessible to the general public through the portal. Therefore, the portal operator is not the person to whom information is disclosed.⁷⁹

The decision taken by the OGH is in line with this ECtHR judgement, since the purpose of the right to protect journalistic sources is not objected to in this case and the application of the right not to disclose sources cannot be extended to postings on media owned websites that have no connection with any journalistic activity whatsoever where the media owner functions solely as a host provider. This again finds reflection in Delfi AS v. Estonia as the recognition of differences between a portal operator and a traditional publisher, is in line with the international instruments in this field, which manifest a certain development in favour of distinguishing between the legal principles regulating the activities of the traditional print and audiovisual media on the one hand and Internet-based media operations on the other. In the recent Recommendation of the Committee of Ministers to the member States of the Council of Europe on a new notion of media, this is termed a 'differentiated and graduated approach [that] requires that each actor whose services are identified as media or as an intermediary or auxiliary activity benefit from both the appropriate form (differentiated) and the appropriate level (graduated) of protection and that responsibility also be delimited in conformity with Article 10 of the European

⁷⁶ Nordisk Film & TV A/S v. Denmark [2005].

⁷⁷ Werner Röggl, Peter Zöchbauer, Redaktionsgeheimnis - beleidigende Postings - Auskunft über die E-Mail-Adresse des Posters [2014] Medien und Recht Vol. 2, 60.

⁷⁸ Council of Europe Research Division, Internet: case-law of the European Court of Human Rights <http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Research_report_internet_ENG.pdf> accessed 25 April 2016.

⁷⁹ Delfi As. v. Estonia [2015].

Convention on Human Rights and other relevant standards developed by the Council of Europe.’ Therefore, the Court considers that because of the particular nature of the Internet, the ‘duties and responsibilities’ that are to be conferred on an Internet news portal for the purposes of Article 10 may differ to some degree from those of a traditional publisher, as regards third-party content.⁸⁰

7.3. The restriction to the witness

A main point of discussion regarding Austrian legislation in the field of the protection of journalistic sources is the restriction of the right to refuse to testify under § 31 MedienG 1981 to witnesses. This is once again reflected in the following case-law.

7.3.1.1 OGH Case Ob 15/91 [1991]81

This civil case involved a newspaper publishing inculpatory evidence against a group of people supposedly involved in corruption and illegal party financing. The defendants in the criminal case claimed that the newspaper had presented false evidence. The newspaper sued them for discredit under § 1330 ABGB. In the proceedings, the newspaper was asked to disclose the informants who had furnished the disputed evidence. The newspaper refused, invoking § 31 MedienG 1981.

The OGH held that the right under § 31 MedienG 1981 to refuse to testify in court was limited exclusively to testimony. Since a party to the proceedings is not obliged to provide any information and non-compliance cannot be sanctioned, the result in respect of the right to protect sources only differs in the way the judge can appraise the evidence as well as the refusal to provide evidence. This statement was repeated in 11 Os 5/03⁸² and 6 Ob 130/06 w;⁸³ in the latter, the court established rules on the appraisal of evidence in civil-law proceedings in the light of the right to protect sources when a defendant remains silent.

7.3.2. OGH Case 6 Ob 130/06 w84

This civil case was commenced by an Estonian company which sued a journalist and the ORF (as co-defendant) for damages for defamation and discredit (§ 1330 ABGB); the damage was allegedly caused by a TV report whose final version was cut in a way which had altered the meaning of the initial report. The journalist responsible for the report stated that, after the TV report was sold to another TV station, the final editing and the controversial change of the ⁸⁰ Delfi As. v. Estonia [2015], para 113.

⁸¹ 1 Ob 15/91 [1991] Austrian Supreme Court of Justice EvBl Vol. 158 [1991] 702 [German].

⁸² 11 Os 5/03 [2003] Austrian Supreme Court of Justice, Medien und Recht Vol. 4 [2005] 231[German].

⁸³ 6 Ob 130/06 w [2006] Austrian Supreme Court of Justice

<https://www.ris.bka.gv.at/Dokumente/Justiz/JJT_20060629_OGH0002_0060OB00130_06W0000_000/JJT_20060629_OGH0002_0060OB00130_06W0000_000.pdf> [German].

⁸⁴ ibid.

report's meaning were already beyond his control. When asked to name the responsible person, he invoked his right to protect the source. The OGH held that the right to refuse to give evidence in accordance with § 31 MedienG 1981 is, in principle, only granted to witnesses in criminal and civil proceedings. As, in this case, the journalist had been summoned before the court as a defendant, he would have had to provide a specific reason which would justify respecting his right to professional secrecy. As the defendant failed to do so, his refusal to disclose the person responsible was eventually taken into account in the judgement according to the principle of unfettered consideration of evidence (Grundsatz freier Beweiswürdigung).

Considering the legal rationale of § 31 MedienG 1981, it is doubtful whether these OGH decisions are in conformity with ECtHR case-law. The fact that the right to protect sources is granted to witnesses or – by argumentum e contrario – that the privilege is not available to the litigating parties has to pass a strict proportionality test and must be reviewed in light of the balance of interests as required by the ECtHR.⁸⁵

It is sometimes argued that the protection of journalistic sources and the concomitant regulations should be extended to cases where the journalist is a defendant in criminal proceedings.⁸⁶ Hinterhofer states that this claim goes too far and would lead to criminal immunity not only in cases related to professional but also private lives of privilege holders. This would go well beyond the initial idea of protecting the sources.⁸⁷

The rights granted under § 31 MedienG 1981 should not too easily be circumvented when a journalist appears before the court as a criminal defendant. Therefore, it is important to point out that in each case the court must interpret the applicable law in the light of the constitution, including Article 10 of the ECHR, and this has to be reflected in the court's decision.⁸⁸

⁸⁵ Zeder, Hype um das Redaktionsgeheimnis, 6.

⁸⁶ See Draft legislation submitted by members of the Austrian National Council (Nationalrat) in 2006 <https://www.parlament.gv.at/PAKT/VHG/XXII/A/A_00823/imfname_062006.pdf> accessed 26 April 2016 [German].

⁸⁷ Hinterhofer, Das Redaktionsgeheimnis im österreichischen Strafprozess 142.

⁸⁸ Zöchbauer, Neues zum Redaktionsgeheimnis? 4.

8. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terror laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information? Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

8.1. National Provisions for Investigative Measures

As discussed in Question 8, § 31 MedienG 1981 guarantees the protection of sources in the context of criminal, civil, or administrative proceedings. A journalist has the right to remain silent when asked about circumstances covered by the right to protect sources. The wording of § 31 MedienG is very similar to that of § 157 Abs 1 (4) StPO 1975, the crucial difference being that the latter is only applicable in criminal cases. Both provisions prohibit circumventing the journalist's right to protect his sources. § 31 MedienG 1981 provides a non-exhaustive list of prohibited actions, which include forced surrender of printed matter, image carriers, sound and data storage mediums as well as seizure of documents.⁸⁹

§ 144 Abs 2 StPO 1975 has a similar effect when it states that any investigative measures under Chapter 8 (Hauptstück) of the StPO that aim to circumvent this right are illegitimate.

The measures under Chapter 8 StPO are comprehensive and cover all types of investigative techniques aimed at identifying, clarifying and confiscating including the search of premises (§§ 119 et seqq.), the interception of telecommunication (§§ 134 et seqq.), and electronic eavesdropping operations (§§ 134, 136).

According to § 5 Abs 1 StPO 1975,⁹⁰ read in light of the principles of legality and proportionality, the criminal police and public prosecutors are strictly bound by restrictions on their powers as prescribed by this law. In the event of an infringement of these legal restrictions the actions and the findings of the investigative bodies are not null and void per se. That means that if such evidence is brought before the court in criminal proceedings, a defendant seeking to prevent it being used against him has to resort to a nullity appeal (see § 281 Abs 1 (2 or 3) StPO 1975).

⁸⁹ Hubert Hinterhofer, Das Redaktionsgeheimnis im österreichischen Strafprozess: Bestandsaufnahme und aktuelle Entwicklungen, in Helmut Koziol et al. (Ed.), Medienpolitik und Recht II, 133 [German].

⁹⁰ § 5 Abs 1 StPO 1975: Criminal police, the prosecutor and the court, in the exercise of powers and in the acquisition of evidence, may only intervene in the right of a person to the extent required and expressly prescribed by law and necessary for the performance of work. Each, thus, caused the infringement of legally protected rights must be proportionate to the severity of the offense, to the degree of suspicion and the desired success.

8.1.2. Legal Protection and Safeguards

8.1.2.1. Seizure Actions

The seizure of evidence, as provided for in § 109 et seqq. StPO 1975, has to be ordered by the public prosecutor. In case of imminent danger or particular urgency, the criminal police are entitled to undertake seizure but have to request authorisation from the public prosecutor within 14 days after the measure was undertaken.

When this seizure action effectively bypasses the right not to disclose journalists' sources under § 157 Abs 1 (4)⁹¹, 144 Abs 2 StPO 1975⁹² and § 31 MedienG 1981, the journalist may object to it. In such case, all material seized has to be brought before the judge and the journalist has to be given an adequate amount of time to go through the material and mark those parts which are protected by professional secrecy. Then, the judge reviews the material and decides on what to take on file. The material that falls under professional secrecy has to be given back to the journalist and is to be treated as unknown to the judge. If the judge decides to take on material that falls under professional secrecy the journalist can appeal against the decision to the OGH which has a suspensive effect.⁹³

8.1.2.2 Search of Premises

Search orders as provided for in §§ 119 et seqq. StPO 1975 are legitimate if a suspicion exists (based on certain facts) that materials which would help clarify or identify a criminal offence are kept in a particular place. However, a search action is legitimate only if it is ordered by the public prosecutor and authorized by the judge. As this measure may not be used to circumvent professional secrecy, a search order will not be issued if the journalist is only suspected of being in possession of evidence (the situation is different if the journalist himself is suspect of a crime, see 3.3.1) The journalist does not have to deliver any evidence referring to the right to protect journalists' sources.⁹⁴ § 121 Abs 2 StPO 1975 includes a special provision for the search of premises which are used exclusively for professional activities, such as a publishing house; in such cases a representative of the professional body, the media owner or his designated representative has to be present during the search. However, there is no legal protection against a possible violation of this provision.⁹⁵

⁹¹ § 157 Abs 1 Z 4 StPO 1975: The right to refuse to testify is granted to the:

Media owner (publisher), media employees and workers of a media house or media service on questions relating to the person of the author, sender or informant of articles and documents or on information that has been given to them regarding their professional activity.

⁹² § 144 (2) StPO 1975: The order or implementation of investigative measures comprised by this main chapter is illegitimate as it is bypassing the right of a person in accordance with § 157 Abs. 1 Z 2 - 4 to remain silent.

⁹³ Christian Bertel/ Andreas Vernier, Strafprozessrecht 97.

⁹⁴ Bertel/Venier, Strafprozessrecht 98.

⁹⁵ Ernst Eugen Fabrizy, Die österreichische Strafprozessordnung. Kurzkommentar 317.

8.1.2.3. Surveillance Actions and the Interception of Communication

The aim of surveillance actions or observation (§ 129 et seqq. StPO 1975) is to obtain information about the whereabouts of a suspect or to verify a well-founded suspicion of a crime. The investigative powers differ depending on the seriousness of the crime committed (in respect of the severity of the potential legal sanction).

Depending on the gravity of intrusion into the private sphere of a suspect or a person that may lead to information on the suspect, these measures can be taken with or without an order or approval of the public prosecutor. The StPO 1975 provides clear norms when it comes to the powers of the criminal police, including the requirements when, how long, and with what means surveillance actions may be implemented.

The interception of communication as regulated in § 134 et seqq. StPO 1975 has to be authorized by the judge and is to be limited to the time strictly necessary to pursue the goal declared.⁹⁶

Yet, again, it is prohibited to implement such measures merely in order to bypass professional secrecy such as the right not to disclose journalists' sources. In the event of these legal restrictions being violated, the infringing actions and findings are not null and void, but rather constitute grounds for annulment through a nullity appeal - see § 281 Abs 1 (2 or 3) StPO 1975.⁹⁷

8.1.3. Officer for Legal Protection

As these measures may constitute a serious infringement of fundamental rights and are secretly conducted, there is a special legal institute implemented to supervise the order and to authorise the operative implementation of investigative measures.

The Officer for Legal Protection (Rechtsschutzbeauftragter) is nominated by the Minister of Justice on the suggestion of the President of the VfGH, the chairman of the Ombudsman Board (Volksanwaltschaft) and the President of the Austrian Bar (Österreichischer Rechtsanwaltskammertag).

The Officer for Legal Protection, according to § 47a StPO 1975, performs his duties independently and is not bound by any instructions. He is required to maintain official secrecy.

§ 147 Abs 1 (5) StPO 1975 explicitly requires the authorisation of this supervisory body in cases where measures such as requests for information on surveillance data or telecommunication data, interception of communication, optical and acoustic observation, are targeted on journalists.

⁹⁶ Bertel/Venier, Strafprozessrecht 104.

⁹⁷ Ingeborg Zerbes, Spitzel, Spähen, Spionieren. Sprengung strafprozessualer Grenzen durch Zugriff auf Kommunikation. 199.

8.2. Undercover Investigation under the Security Police Act 1991 (SPG)⁹⁸

Besides the StPO 1975, the authorisation for the use of investigative measures similar to those granted for crime investigation is found in the Security Police Act 1991 [Sicherheitspolizeigesetz, SPG]. The dividing line between the tasks and competencies of the criminal police, on one hand, and the security police on the other is not always clear and often quite difficult to draw.

Whilst the security police aims at prevention of dangers and addressing general risks, the criminal police focus on investigation of criminal offences. The scope of application of the measures under the SPG 1991 are broad as a general risk may consist of a dangerous attack (a threat to any legally protected interest) or as soon as three or more people with the intent to connect, proceed to commit offenses (criminal connection).⁹⁹ Generally security police undertakes all measures independent of measures and tasks that fall under the StPO 1975 just applies from the time on a suspect of a criminal offence is identified. This is important as, for example, the observation of a person and all other (undercover) investigations do not underlie the same control mechanisms as for a criminal investigation.

The security police report to the Minister of the Interior (Bundesminister für Inneres). The only independent supervision is constituted by the Legal Protection Commissioner (Rechtsschutzbeauftragter). The effectiveness of this legal protection is questionable¹⁰⁰ and often criticized for lacking independence due to it being part of the political the Ministry of the Interior.

A safeguard regarding the protection of sources is implemented in § 56 Abs 4 SPG 1991;¹⁰¹ accordingly, the transfer of personal data to other authorities as security agencies is illegitimate if there are indications that such action may circumvent the provisions of § 31 MedienG 1981.

8.3. State Protection Law of 2016 - a New Threat to the Protection of Sources?

⁹⁸State Police Act 2016 (Polizeiliches Staatsschutzgesetz PStSG)
<<https://www.ris.bka.gv.at/GeltendeFassung.wxe?Abfrage=Bundesnormen&Gesetzesnummer=10005792>> accessed 31 March 2016 [German].

⁹⁹ § 16 SPG 1991: A general risk exists in case of 1. an dangerous attack or 2. as soon as three or more people work together with the intent of committing offenses (criminal organisation).

A dangerous attack consists of a threat of a legally protected good by an unlawful and judicially punishable act that is committed intentionally and not merely pursued at the request of an interested party as it constitutes a criminal offense.

¹⁰⁰ See Rudolf Keplinger/ Lisa Pühringer, Sicherheitspolizeigesetz. Polizeiausgabe, 2014, p. 287.

¹⁰¹ § 56 Abs 4 SPG 1991: The transfer of personal data to other authorities as security agencies is not permitted if there are indications for the supplying agency, that in this way the protection of editorial secrecy (§ 31 para. 1 Media Act) would be circumvented.

Very recently, the Austrian National Council (Nationalrat) passed the State Protection Act 2016 [Polizeiliches Staatsschutzgesetz, PStSG],¹⁰² which will enter into force in July 2016. This act aims at, among others, strengthening measures to counter terrorism, extremism, espionage or any threat to the state. Therefore powers of the police have been expanded. This led to vehement criticism of the new law by the Austrian Journalists Club,¹⁰³ which pointed out the fact that no provisions were made to guarantee professional secrecy.¹⁰⁴

It is noteworthy that, parallel to the expansion of powers, the criteria for using them have become less precise and less rigid. In comparison with the SPG 1991 which requires a direct connection to a dangerous attack or risk of such, the PStSG 2016 legitimises actions in case of a probable danger or when such danger is to be identified.¹⁰⁵

8.4. Compliance of National Legislation with ECtHR Case-Law

As any restriction on the freedom of expression guaranteed under Article 10 ECHR has to be 'prescribed by law' and appear 'necessary in a democratic society,' national legislation for investigative measures has to be reviewed for possible non-compliance with the ECHR. Any authorisation or justification of an interference with individual rights must be compatible with the rule of law and meet the criteria of being accessible, sufficiently clear and precise and therefore foreseeable in its application.

8.4.1. Investigative Measures under the StPO 1975

The StPO 1975 is publicly accessible and provides precise and clear norms about the investigative tasks and powers of the executive authorities in criminal cases. The individual is able to foresee in which cases and under what circumstances the police is capable of taking measures. The StPO 1975 contains legal safeguards against arbitrary interferences by the authorities as police actions that conflict with individual rights have to be approved by the prosecutor office or a judge. In addition it provides the individual with legally enforceable rights

¹⁰² Announced in the Austrian Federal Law Gazette, BGBl. I Nr. 5/2016, 26 February 2016, <https://www.ris.bka.gv.at/Dokumente/BgblAuth/BGBLA_2016_I_5/BGBLA_2016_I_5.pdf> accessed 15 March 2016 [German].

¹⁰³ Austria's largest independent organisation for journalist, <<http://www.oejc.at>> accessed 15 March 2016 [German].

¹⁰⁴ See the Austrian Journalists Club's Opinion on the draft law of the State Protection Law 2016, <https://www.parlament.gv.at/PAKT/VHG/XXV/SNME/SNME_04166/imfname_423521.pdf> accessed 15 March 2016 [German].

¹⁰⁵ § 6 Abs 1 SPG 1991: The Federal Office (Bundesamt) and the national offices (Landesämter) are responsible for 1. enhanced risk exploration; this is the observation of a grouping, when with regard to its existing structures and to recent developments in its surrounding it is to be expected that it will commit criminal acts connected to severe danger for public security especially connected to ideologically or religiously motivated violence to appeal against the specific measure. The StPO 1975 also refers to the journalists' right to protect sources and explicitly prohibits interferences within its scope of protection (see above).
See § 6, 11 State Protection Law, <http://www.parlament.gv.at/PAKT/VHG/XXV/ME/ME_00110/fname_395434.pdf> accessed 1 April 2016 [German].

8.4.2. Investigative Measures under the SPG 1991

The SPG 1991 are similarly accessible to the public and any individual can learn about its content, including precise and clear norms when and why investigative measures can be undertaken by the security police.¹⁰⁶ Search and seizure measures do not have to be ordered by a judicial authority, but the law provides a clear and precise legal basis for their admissibility as they are only legitimate under exigent circumstances.¹⁰⁷ Regarding undercover measures, especially the interception of communication, national legislation has to take a strict approach in order to prevent potential misuse of powers. According to the ECtHR case-law, legislation must explicitly state whose communication may be intercepted and on what grounds.¹⁰⁸ The law must provide for the procedure of protocolling and subsequently making written reports about the interception available for the judge and the suspect as well as for the duration of an interception.¹⁰⁹ In addition, the law must include effective means of control.¹¹⁰ All the criteria which are required to establish clear and foreseeable legislation are assumed to be incorporated in the SPG 1991.

8.4.3. Investigative Measures under the PStSG 2016

The PStSG 2016 may be easily accessed by the public, but raises concerns as far as the criteria of clarity, precision and foreseeability are concerned. It contains vague legal terms, dynamic references as well as a list of offences that leaves a wide investigation scope and might leave the individual puzzled because of its lack of comprehensibility and transparency. The compliance of the PStSG with the ECHR is questionable, since it lacks legal protection and clear norms about

¹⁰⁶ Franz Matscher, Sicherheitspolizeigesetz und Grundrechtsschutz, in Franz Matscher (Ed.), Grundrechtsschutz und polizeiliche Effizienz – Das österreichische Sicherheitspolizeigesetz, 35-36 [German].

¹⁰⁷ Ibid. 25.

¹⁰⁸ In Malone v the United Kingdom (App no 8691/79 (ECtHR, 2 August 1984) para 79) the ECtHR held that the legislation must „indicate with reasonable clarity the scope and manner of exercise of the relevant discretion conferred on the public authorities“.

¹⁰⁹ In Kruslin v France (App no 11801/85 (ECtHR 24 April 1990) para 35) the ECtHR stressed the shortcomings of French legislation: „For example, the categories of people liable to have their telephones tapped by judicial order and the nature of the offences which may give rise to such an order are nowhere defined. Nothing obliges a judge to set a limit on the duration of telephone tapping. Similarly unspecified are the procedure for drawing up the summary reports containing intercepted conversations; the precautions to be taken in order to communicate the recordings intact and in their entirety for possible inspection by the judge (who can hardly verify the number and length of the original tapes on the spot) and by the defence; and the circumstances in which recordings may or must be erased or the tapes be destroyed, in particular where an accused has been discharged by an investigating judge or acquitted by a court.“

¹¹⁰ Daniel Einöckl, Die Zulässigkeit von Informationseingriffen in der Rechtsprechung des EGMR, in Armin Bammer et al., Rechtsschutz gestern – heute – morgen, 99 [German].

the maximum period of the storage of data and information and the absence of any obligation to inform an affected individual.¹¹¹ However, regarding the use of personal data, § 9 Abs 1 PStSG 2016 – in contrast to the initial draft – refers to the journalist right to protect sources as determined in the StPO 1975 and prohibits any interference with this right.

9. Can journalists rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance?

In accordance with the understanding of freedom of expression constituting a fundamental right, Austria took an active role in achieving the EU Guidelines on Freedom of Expression online and offline. Those guidelines, adopted by the Council of the European Union in May 2014, comprise goals and measures for the member states to promote ‘the right to privacy in the digital age’ as well as the ‘security of journalists’.¹¹²

Austria’s constitutional provisions do not provide for one comprehensive basic right to privacy. Instead, various constitutional laws proffer selective protection against certain acts of interference. As far as data monitoring is concerned, the following constitutional provisions should be mentioned:

- Art 10a Basic Law on the General Rights of Nationals 1867 [Staatsgrundgesetz über die allgemeinen Rechte der Staatsbürger, StGG]¹¹³ in conjunction with Art 8 ECHR encompass the protection against confidentiality of telecommunications and
- § 1 Data Protection Act 2000 [Datenschutzgesetz, DSG 2000] governs the fundamental right to data protection.

Art 10a StGG 1867 stipulates the confidentiality of content data, which is disseminated by means of telecommunication networks. Infringement of this constitutional right (e.g. phone tapping, eavesdropping operation) is only considered justified with a court order.¹¹⁴ Article 8 of the ECHR additionally grants protection against encroachment on master, traffic and location data § 92 Telecommunication Act 2003 [Telekommunikationsgesetz, TKG],¹¹⁵ e.g. name, phone

¹¹¹ See the statement of the Arbeitskreis Vorratsdaten Österreich, <<https://akvorrat.at/sites/default/files/PStSG-4.pdf>> accessed 20 May 2016 [German].

¹¹² See ‘EU Human Rights Guidelines on Freedom of Expression Online and Offline’ at: <http://www.consilium.europa.eu/uedocs/cms_data/docs/pressdata/EN/foraff/142549.pdf/> accessed 20 April 2016 [German].

¹¹³ See the full legal text of Austria’s Basic Law at: <https://www.vfgh.gv.at/cms/vfgh-site/english/downloads/englishverfassung.pdf>.

¹¹⁴ See, Mayer, Kucsko-Stadlmayer, Stöger, Bundesverfassungsrecht (11th edn, Manz 2015), 758 [German].

¹¹⁵ See full legal text of the Telecommunication Act 2003 at: https://www.ris.bka.gv.at/Dokumente/ErV/ERV_2003_1_70/ERV_2003_1_70.pdf.

number, IP-address. In those cases, infringement is permitted merely within the realm of substantive reservation of statutory powers. See for instance § 53 Abs 3a SPG.¹¹⁶

On a simple legal level, § 93 TKG 2003 governs the obligation for electronic communication operators to secrecy of communications, including not only content data but also traffic data. § 93 Abs 5 points out that confidentiality of communication must comply with § 31 MedienG 1981.

The DSG 2000 regulates the obligation of secrecy and protection of users' personal data in so far as there is a legitimate interest in doing so.¹¹⁷ 'Personal data' refers to any detail relating to an identified or identifiable individual. Any usage of personal data constitutes an infringement of the fundamental right to non-disclosure thereof.¹¹⁸ Moreover, any use of such data must be based on statutory provisions and pass the proportionality test.

§ 48 DSG 2000 encompasses the so-called 'media privilege', which ensures the protection of journalistic sources.¹¹⁹ This clause exempts media undertakings (especially newspapers, periodicals, broadcasting companies, including online-coverage), media services (news agencies) and media actors (editors, reporters, freelance journalists) from the application of most DSG 2000 provisions.

The privilege includes the following aspects:

- Those media entities may not be impeded when conducting journalistic research and media coverage.
- They cannot be prompted to correct or delete articles or other media coverage.
- Furthermore, media outlets may not be requested to provide information about gathering and processing of personal data in connection with journalistic purposes (for instance about a certain source).¹²⁰

With regard to specific legislation dealing with the usage of encryption services and the granting of online anonymity, the Austrian approach is similar to the protection of whistle-blowers. Both matters pose relatively new legal challenges, which have not yet been tackled with a specific legislative act. At the same time there are other measures that seek for adequate protection.

¹¹⁶Walter Berka, Verfassungsrecht, (5th edn, Verlag Österreich 2014) 490 [German].

¹¹⁷Cf. § 4 Z 3 defines 'affected person' as individual whose data is utilized.

¹¹⁸'Data usage' in § 4 DSG 2000 is a general term pertaining inquiry, processing, transfer, storage, deletion etc..

¹¹⁹For a detailed analysis of § 48 DSG 2000 see Arnaud Berthou, Das Medienprivileg im Datenschutzrecht – Verfassungs- und unionsrechtliche Problemstellungen (diploma thesis), 2012 at: <<http://www.it-law.at/wp-content/uploads/2014/09/Diplomarbeit-Arnaud-Berthou2.pdf/>> accessed 25 April 2016 [German].

¹²⁰See website of the Austrian Data Protection Authority at <<https://www.dsb.gv.at/site/8143/default.aspx/>> accessed 25 April 2016.

Neither the E-Commerce Act 2001 [E-Commerce Gesetz, ECG]¹²¹ nor the Telecommunication Act frame rules on secure online communication, particularly regarding the restriction of the use of encryption or anonymity tools.

The Order on Private Mobile Radio 2004 [Betriebsfunkverordnung, BFV] had governed that encryption systems were allowed within the wireless network of organizational units of the Federal Ministry of the Interior. In its 2004 version, this norm was not incorporated anymore.

On the contrary, the Austrian Government pursues a policy that builds on establishing public awareness about online and digital security respectively. Thus, the overall strategy is to educate the public about secure and private communication, rather than undermining the use of anonymity and privacy enhancing tools through legislation.

In the June 2015 report to the Human Rights Council of the Special Rapporteur on Encryption, Anonymity and the Freedom of Expression, the Permanent Mission of Austria to the United Nations in Geneva laid out a compilation of the governments' campaigns and online platforms mainly offering information and consultation concerning internet safety and responsible use thereof.¹²²

Due to the fact that there is no regulation by law on that very subject matter, there are no specific legal definitions to mention.

§18 Abs 1 ECG deals with liability issues of service providers and violations will lead to administrative sanctions. It regulates that service providers 'shall not be obligated to monitor in a general fashion the information stored, transmitted or made available by them or to actively research circumstances indicating illegal activity'. In other words, §18 Abs 1 does not impose a general statutory monitoring duty but establishes disclosure- and notification obligations (e.g. for courts). Subsections two to four state that if certain prerequisites are satisfied, service providers must facilitate the identification of their users. Considering that the legal norm is subject to a threefold test, its application is of restrictive nature. It is a balancing act between public interests, preserving constitutional rights to privacy as well as data protection and proportionality.

Additionally, in regard to criminal cases, service providers are deemed to be non-suspect third parties, thus the rules of testimony do not apply. Therefore, the courts cannot take any coercive action.

¹²¹ See full legal text of the E-Commerce Act 2001 at:

https://www.ris.bka.gv.at/Dokumente/ErV/ERV_2001_1_152/ERV_2001_1_152.html.

¹²² This report (A/HRC/29/32) may be found at <<http://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/FreedomOpinion/Pages/CallForSubmission.aspx/>> accessed 21 April 2016 [German].

However, the growing concerns about national security threats, especially in the face of recent terror attacks, have placed the Austrian legislation deliberations regarding surveillance measures and cryptography in a state of transformation.¹²³

Despite continuous security issues we are facing in the digital age, Austria's position still remains the same in its core: privacy is a key pillar of democracy and, consequently, a general ban of anonymisation services is negated. Nonetheless, only one week after the passing of the new State Protection Law (see question 8), the Justice Minister, Dr. Wolfgang Brandstetter announced a legislative initiative to deepen and expand surveillance of internet communication via telephone, e-mail and short messaging services. In an interview with 'Die Presse'¹²⁴ he confirms the plan to implement the possibility of monitoring encrypted online communication services such as Skype and Whatsapp. Dr. Susanne Reindl-Krauskopf, head of the Austrian Center for Law Enforcement Sciences (ALES) agrees stating in an interview¹²⁵ that, in order to carry out law enforcement effectively, it will be necessary to improve regulations on telephone surveillance with a focus on access to encoded data.

Whether there will be exceptions especially for lawyers and journalists is unclear at the moment, but the trend obviously is towards more extensive surveillance by state authorities. The challenge will consist in finding a common ground and a well-balanced legal framework which would be sufficient to enable state authorities to fulfil their duties especially in regard to national security issues, while at the same time acknowledging the need to protect journalistic sources.

10. Are whistle-blowers explicitly protected under law protecting journalistic sources? Is there another practice protecting whistle-blowers? Is the legislation prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers?

In Austria, "whistleblowing" is a relatively new phenomenon. However, following the implementation of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act (SOX) in the USA in 2002, it became a hotly debated

¹²³ Report from February 2016 on cyber security:

<<https://www.cert.at/static/downloads/reports/cert.at-jahresbericht-2015.pdf/>> accessed 21 April 2016 [German].

¹²⁴ Press article including the interview with Austria's Justice Minister Dr. Brandstetter may be found under:

<http://diepresse.com/home/panorama/oesterreich/4915917/Trotz-Verschluslung_Brandstetter-will-Skypen-abhoren?parentid=5962984&showMask=1/> accessed 21 April 2016 [German].

¹²⁵ Press article including the interview with Dr. Susanne Reindl-Krauskopf is available at:

<http://diepresse.com/home/recht/rechtallgemein/4877068/Terrorabwehr_Bei-schwersten-Taten-Computer-infiltrieren/> accessed 21 April 2016 [German].

topic.¹²⁶ The SOX regulations obliged Austrian subsidiaries of US based corporations to establish whistleblowing systems within the framework of their corporate governance.

Although the subject-matter of whistleblowing involves a wide spectrum of legal problems (for instance white-collar crimes, corruption, data protection and labour laws), so far no comprehensive general legislation has been passed to regulate these issues for the public and the private sectors. In other words, the legislative efforts to change the legal situation have not yet resulted in the adoption of new legislation explicitly protecting whistle-blowers.

Even though the term “whistleblowing” is now all but commonplace in the German language, so far, no legal definition of the term has been developed.¹²⁷ Whistle-blower protection law (except from the protection law for public servants – see below) can only be derived from many different statutory regulations.

However, the common understanding of whistleblowing is that it consists in exposing malfeasance, for instance white-collar crime, corruption, social fraud, breaches of financial reporting regulations, balance sheet violations, or money laundering. Typically, whistle-blowers detect problems on their own, as they have direct access to information at their place of work.¹²⁸ Thanks to the efforts made by Austria to implement measures to protect whistle blowers, its level of achievement compared to other EU member states was rated ‘partial’ in the 2014 Transparency International report on “Legal Protection for Whistle-blowers in the EU”.¹²⁹ § 53a of the Federal Civil Service Act 1979 [Beamten-Dienstrechtsgesetz, BDG] is the first provision that provides protection for public servants, who come forward and report an instance of malfeasance. Since according to § 53 BDG public servants are obliged to disclose crimes related to their office, statutory protection was paramount and, as a result, detrimental actions against government employees are now prohibited. As laid out in the annotations to the ministerial draft,¹³⁰ the aim was to protect employees who act as informants from sanctions or other forms of discrimination by their employer in order to effectively fight corruption.

It is crucial to distinguish between internal and external whistleblowing.

¹²⁶ The Sarbanes- Oxley Act of 2002 is available at: <https://www.sec.gov/about/laws/soa2002.pdf>.

¹²⁷ Shahanaz Müller, ‘Providing an Alternative to Silence’ – Country Report Austria (2013): <<http://www.asktheeu.org/de/request/994/response/5855/attach/2/Country%20report%20Austria%20Redacted.pdf> /> accessed 25 April 2016.

¹²⁸ Silvia Traunwieser, ‘Whistleblowing – Segen oder Fluch?’, in Gruber/N. Raschauer (Hrsg), Whistleblowing (Manz 2015) [German].

¹²⁹ Mark Worth, ‘Whistleblowing in Europe, Legal Protection for whistle-blowers in the EU’, Transparency International, 2013: <http://www.stt.lt/documents/soc_tyrimai/2013_WhistleblowingInEurope_EN.pdf /> accessed 23 April 2016.

¹³⁰ 326/ME XXIV. KP – Annotations to the Ministerial Draft (Ministerialentwurf – Erläuterungen) [German] <http://www.parlament.gv.at/PAKT/VHG/XXIV/ME/ME_00326/fname_233998.pdf (16.08.2012), p. 10. /> accessed 25 April 2016.

Internal whistleblowing involves identification of problems within an entity, whereas external whistleblowing refers to sharing information about grievances and crimes with the media or other third party supervisory authorities.

External whistleblowing is particularly well protected by a secure whistleblowing system.¹³¹ After a trial period of two years, the so-called 'Whistle-blower' website¹³² was launched officially in January 2016. Following the package of new federal laws (Transparenzpaket) passed in 2012, this communication platform was established by the Public Prosecutor's Office for Combatting Economic Crimes and Corruption [Wirtschafts- und Korruptionsstaatsanwaltschaft, WKStA].¹³³ It serves as a prosecuting body combating large-scale white collar crimes and corruption.¹³⁴ The platform provides whistle-blowers a secure way to convey information via a non-traceable virtual mailbox. It allows for anonymous communication with the whistle-blower. Absolute protection of identity is guaranteed. However, if a whistle-blower wishes to be identified, he may disclose his identity using a special virtual key. In such a case that individual will be able to invoke the rule of lenity in order to receive protection. The relevant provision can be found in § 209a StPO.

The lenity rule only applies to an individual who has not participated in the crime disclosed by the whistle-blower. Voluntary cooperation with the prosecuting authority may free the whistle-blower of criminal charges.

As far as internal whistleblowing is concerned, it is important to stress that private entities are eager to implement their own whistle-blower hotlines as part of their internal control and compliance systems, but there is no general statutory obligation to do so. Their purpose is to give employees an opportunity to disclose wrongdoing internally. Consequently, responsible individuals are able to act on the reported acts of malfeasance in a timely fashion and implement measures necessary to eradicate them. § 37 of the Austrian Labour Constitutional Act 1974 [Arbeitsverfassungsgesetz – ArbVG] grants employees some basic protection against bad consequences of disclosures. In other words, whistle blowers are protected from termination of their employment contract.

In general, internal hotlines are permitted, subject to certain limitations set by data protection and labour law provisions. Setting up anonymous whistleblowing hotlines in private entities requires a previous permission of the data protection authority (Datenschutzbehörde, DSB). The employer has to prove an overriding legitimate interest in using such a hotline. Since

¹³¹ The web-based reporting system is called Business Keeper Monitoring System \(BKMS\).

¹³² Whistle-blower Homepage is available at:

<https://www.bkms-system.net/bkwebanon/report/clientInfo?cin=1at21&language=ger>.

¹³³ For more details, see Austria to the EU 'Anti-Corruption Report', COM(2014) 38 final, Annex 20, page 4 at: <http://ec.europa.eu/dgs/home-affairs/what-we-do/policies/organized-crime-and-human-trafficking/corruption/anti-corruption-report/docs/2014_acr_austria_chapter_en.pdf> accessed 23 April 2016.

¹³⁴ See:

https://www.justiz.gv.at/web2013/file/8ab4ac8322985dd501229ce2e2d80091.de.0/broschuere_englisch_downloadversion.pdf.

implementation of a whistleblowing hotline is a measure, which affects human dignity, the DSB requires a works council agreement (Betriebsvereinbarung); it is binding written agreement between the owner of the company and the worker's council. Either statutes or collective agreements determine the specific matters that have to be regulated by such works council agreements. Particularly measures affecting human dignity require works council's consent (§ 96 Abs 1 Z 3 ArbVG). In its ruling from 2012, the DSK (at that time the DSB was named DSK) held that implementation of whistleblowing-systems is subsumed under that norm requiring a works council agreement.¹³⁵

To sum up, it can be stated that Austria is making efforts to ensure protection of whistle-blowers. On the international level, in April 2014, the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe adopted a Recommendation on the protection of whistle-blowers.¹³⁶ It provides the first European definition of whistleblowing¹³⁷ and, in the Appendix, includes guidelines and principals for member states to review and amend their laws. When these principles are compared with the existing legal framework, it becomes clear that Austria falls short of providing a legal definition of whistleblowing and a clear standalone legislation, especially in the private sector. But it should be noted that there have been some positive developments as well. The explicit implementation of the Whistle-blower-Homepage in § 2a Abs 6 of the Public Prosecutor's Act [Staatsanwaltschaftsgesetz, StAG], which came into force on January 1st 2016, was a significant step towards granting whistle-blowers more protection. One of the key points in the Recommendation highlights the importance of member states in facilitating reporting, encouraging disclosures, and maintaining a high level of confidentiality of the whistle-blower's identity.

11. Conclusion

The right of the journalists not to disclose their sources of information is expressly provided for in Austrian law by § 157 Abs 1 Z 4 StOP 1975 and § 31 MedienG 1981. Moreover, in a number of important OGH decisions, this right has been declared to be an aspect of the freedom of

¹³⁵ The decision DSK 14.12.2012 K600.320- 005/0003- DVR/2012 is available at:

<https://www.ris.bka.gv.at/Dokumente/Dsk/DSKTE_20121214_K600320_005_0003_DVR_2012_00/DSKTE_20121214_K600320_005_0003_DVR_2012_00.html/> accessed 25 April 2016 [German].

For a more in depth analysis of this ruling see: Rainer Knyrim, Renate Riedl, 'Erfordernis einer Betriebsvereinbarung bei Genehmigung eines Hinweisgebersystems bei der Datenschutzkommission' (DRdA 4/2013 August) at:

<http://www.preslmayr.at/tl_files/Publikationen/2013/Erfordernis%20einer%20Betriebsvereinbarung%20bei%20Genehmigung%20eines%20Hinweisgebersystems%20bei%20der%20DSK_Knyrim_Riedl_DrdA_42013.pdf/> accessed 25 April 2016 [German].

¹³⁶ Recommendation CM/Rec (2014)7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the protection of whistle-blowers

<http://www.coe.int/t/dghl/standardsetting/cdcj/CDCJ%20Recommendations/CMRec\(2014\)7E.pdf/7E.pdf/)> accessed 25 April 2016.

¹³⁷ "Whistle-blower" means any person who reports or discloses information on a threat or harm to the public interest in the context of their work-based relationship, whether it be in the public or private sector'.

expression as guaranteed under art 10 para 1 ECHR. The latter is directly applicable in Austria and has the effect of a ban on state action aimed at forcing journalists to disclose their sources. As regards criminal legislation, the Austrian criminal procedure law allows a journalist to refuse to testify as a witness in order to protect the identity of his source (§157 Abs 1 Z 4 StPO). However, this provision applies only if the journalist concerned is called to testify as a witness.

All the material a journalist has received from a source when carrying out his professional activities is protected under §157 Abs 1 Z 4 StPO. This said, it must be stressed that material researched by the journalist himself is not protected. The right of journalists not to disclose their sources is also guaranteed under the procedural provisions of §31 MedienG. In contrast to the provisions of the StPO (which is applicable only to criminal cases), it may be invoked in all judicial proceedings. It contains a testimonial privilege and guarantees to a distinctive group of people working in the media industry the right to refuse to disclose confidential sources. Any person who passes information onto a journalist is a source within the meaning of §31 MedienG.

§31 MedienG does not distinguish between confidential and non-confidential information; it is applicable to both kinds equally. Furthermore, it does not require balancing the interests and applies strictly under all circumstances.

There is no provision in Austrian law which would prohibit journalists from disclosing confidential sources. A journalist has the right not to disclose his source, but he is not obliged to keep their identity secret.

The profession of journalism is regulated in a separate statute, the JournalistenG 1920. §1 Abs 1 JournalistenG specifies to whom its provision shall apply. §31 MedienG offers protection to media owners, editors, journalistic staff, and other, non-journalistic employees of a media undertaking or a media service. While the groups of persons caught by §1 Abs 1 JournalistenG and §1 MedienG respectively partly overlap, the MedienG grants a testimonial privilege to further media actors.

Concerning safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources, Austrian law provides merely a right to remain silent (§31 MedienG). This means the trial does not become subject of a nullity appeal. Moreover there is no process or institution to guarantee or supervise the exercise of this right. All in all, there are neither safeguards to assist the protection of journalistic sources, nor is there a self-regulatory system.

The OGH has taken a strong position and declared that the protection of journalistic sources is an aspect of the freedom of expression and, for this reason, a right with constitutional status. This means that no matter how pressing the disclosure of source of information may appear, a breach of §31 MedienG 1981 will not be justifiable.

As to the question of conformity of Austrian national legislation on non-disclosure with the principles laid down in Recommendation No R (2007), it may be said that the provisions of §31 MedienG and §157 Abs 1 Z 4 StPO not only achieve the goals set in the Recommendation, but also go beyond them in offering media actors even more extensive privileges.

Recently, Austria passed the PStSG 2016, which aims at strengthening measures to counter terrorism, extremism, espionage or any threat against the state. The Austrian Journalists Club has, however, voiced criticism of the new law, pointing out that no provisions to guarantee professional secrecy have been included.

Austria took an active role in achieving the EU Guidelines on Freedom of Expression online and offline. Those guidelines comprise goals and suggested measures for the member states to promote 'the right to privacy in the digital age' as well as the 'security of journalists'. Since there is no legal regulation on this subject-matter, there are no specific legal definitions to discuss.

In Austria, the phenomenon of "whistleblowing" is relatively new; nonetheless, it has become a hot topic in recent years. It can be said that Austria is making efforts to grant protection to whistle-blowers and it should be noted that there have been some positive developments. An important step towards granting whistle blowers more protection was the explicit anchoring of the Whistle-blower-Homepage in §2a Abs 6 StAG 1986.

12. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

12.1. Books and articles

12.1.1 German Titles

- Berka W, Heindl L, Höhne T and Noll A, Mediengesetz Praxiskommentar (Lexis Nexis 2012).
- Berka W, Verfassungsrecht, (Springer Verlag 2012).
- Bertel Ch, Vernier A, Strafprozessrecht, (Manz 2015).
- Berthou A, Das Medienprivileg im Datenschutzrecht – Verfassungs- und unionsrechtliche Problemstellungen (Diploma Thesis 2012).<http://www.it-law.at/wp-content/uploads/2014/09/Diplomarbeit-Arnaud-Berthou2.pdf>.
- Council of the European Union, 'EU Human Rights Guidelines on Freedom of Expression Online and Offline'
- Fabrizy E E, Die österreichische Strafprozessordnung. Kurzkomentar (Manz 2014)
- Fabrizy E E, StPO und wichtige Nebengesetze, Kurzkomentar (Manz 2014)
- Hinterhofer H, Das Redaktionsgeheimnis im österreichischen Strafprozess: Bestandsaufnahme und aktuelle Entwicklungen, in Helmut Koziol et al. (Ed.), Medienpolitik und Recht II (Jan Sramek Verlag KG 2013) [German].
- Hinterhofer H, Zeugenschutz und Zeugnisverweigerungsrechte im österreichischen Strafprozess (Facultas 2004)
- Holoubek M, Kassai K, and Traimer M, Grundzüge des Rechts der Massenmedien (Springer 2010).
- Höpfel/Ratz, Wiener Kommentar zum StGB, MedienG, (Manz 2011)
- Keplinger R, Pühringer L, Sicherheitspolizeigesetz (proLIBRIS 2014).
- Knyrim R, Riedl R, 'Erfordernis einer Betriebsvereinbarung bei Genehmigung eines Hinweisgebersystems bei der Datenschutzkommission' (DRdA 4/2013 August).
- Mayer, Kucsko-Stadlmayer, Stöger, Bundesverfassungsrecht (Manz 2015).
- Müller Sh, Providing an Alternative to Silence – Country Report Austria (2013) <http://www.asktheeu.org/de/request/994/response/5855/attach/2/Country%20report%20Austria%20Redacted.pdf>.
- Reindl-Krauskopf S, 'Meinungsäußerungsfreiheit und Redaktionsgeheimnis' [2011] Juristische Blätter 667 [German].
- Rögglä W, Zöchbauer P, Redaktionsgeheimnis - beleidigende Postings - Auskunft über die E-Mail-Adresse des Posters [2014] Medien und Recht Vol. 2, 59.
- Rögglä, Wittmann, Zöchbauer, Medienrecht Praxiskommentar, Verlag Medien und Recht, Wien 2012.
- Schöpfer E Ch, Schutz des Redaktionsgeheimnisses bei Sicherstellung (Österreichische Judikatur, NLMR 2/2011-OGH, Österreichisches Institut für Menschenrechte) <http://www.menschenrechte.ac.at/docs/11_2/11_2_15.pdf> accessed 15 March 2016.

- Schöpfer EC, Schutz des Redaktionsgeheimnisses bei Sicherstellung (Österreichische Judikatur, NLMR 2/2011-OGH, Österreichisches Institut für Menschenrechte) <http://www.menschenrechte.ac.at/docs/11_2/11_2_15.pdf> accessed 15 March 2016.
- Swoboda E, 'Redaktionsgeheimnis, Datenschutz und effektiver Rechtsschutz' [2014] Zeitschrift für Informationsrecht 27.
- Traunwieser S, 'Whistleblowing – Segen oder Fluch?', in Gruber/N. Raschauer (Hrsg), Whistleblowing (Manz 2015).
- Wittreck F, Die Verwaltung der dritten Gewalt (Mohr Siebeck 2006) [German].
- Zeder F, Hype um das Redaktionsgeheimnis (Österreichische Juristen Zeitung, 2011/2) [German]
- Zerbes I, Spitzel, Spähen, Spionieren. Sprengung strafprozessualer Grenzen durch Zugriff auf Kommunikation (Springer 2010).
- Zöchbauer P, Neues zum Redaktionsgeheimnis? Eine Anmerkung zur OGH-Entscheidung 13 Os 130/10g, 13 Os 136/10i [2011] Medien und Recht Vol. 1, 3.

12.1.2. English Titles

- Worth M, 'Whistleblowing in Europe, Legal Protection for whistle-blowers in the EU' (Transparency International 2013) http://www.stt.lt/documents/soc_tirimai/2013_WhistleblowingInEurope_EN.pdf.
- A/HRC/29/32 report
- <http://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/FreedomOpinion/Pages/CallForSubmission.aspx>.
- European Commission - Austria to the EU Anti-Corruption Report, COM(2014) 38 final, Annex 20, page 4 http://ec.europa.eu/dgs/home-affairs/what-we-do/policies/organized-crime-and-human-trafficking/corruption/anti-corruption-report/docs/2014_acr_austria_chapter_en.pdf.
- Explanatory Notes and Considerations of the parliament, accessed on March 20 2016
<http://www.bka.gv.at/Docs/2005/2/9/erl%C3%A4uterungenmg.pdf>
- Recommendation CM/Rec (2014)7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the protection of whistle-blowers
http://www.coe.int/t/dghl/standardsetting/cdcj/CDCJ%20Recommendations/CMRec\(2014\)7E.pdf7E.pdf).

12. Table of Provisions

Provisions in native language	Corresponding translations
Strafprozessordnung 1975	Code of Criminal Procedure 1975
§ 5 (1) Kriminalpolizei, Staatsanwaltschaft und Gericht dürfen bei der Ausübung von Befugnissen und bei der Aufnahme von Beweisen nur soweit in Rechte von Personen eingreifen, als dies gesetzlich ausdrücklich vorgesehen und zur Aufgabenerfüllung erforderlich ist. Jede dadurch bewirkte Rechtsgutbeeinträchtigung muss in einem angemessenen Verhältnis zum Gewicht der Straftat, zum Grad des Verdachts und zum angestrebten Erfolg stehen.	§ 5 (1) Criminal police, the prosecutor and the court, in the exercise of powers and in the acquisition of evidence, may only intervene in the right of a person to the extent required and expressly prescribed by law and necessary for the performance of work. Each thus caused infringement of legally protected rights must be proportionate to the severity of the offense, to the degree of suspicion and the desired success.
§ 47a Rechtsschutzbeauftragter (1) Der Bundesminister für Justiz hat zur Wahrnehmung besonderen Rechtsschutzes nach diesem Bundesgesetz nach Einholung eines gemeinsamen Vorschlages des Präsidenten des Verfassungsgerichtshofes, des Vorsitzenden der Volksanwaltschaft und des Präsidenten des Österreichischen Rechtsanwaltskammertages einen Rechtsschutzbeauftragten sowie die erforderliche Anzahl von Stellvertretern mit deren Zustimmung für die Dauer von drei Jahren zu bestellen; Wiederbestellungen sind zulässig. Der Vorschlag hat zumindest doppelt so viele Namen zu enthalten wie	§ 47a The Officer for Legal Protection (1) The Federal Minister of Justice shall appoint an officer for legal protection as well as the required number of deputy officers nominated jointly by the President of the Constitutional Court, the Chairman of the Ombudsman Board, and the President of the Austrian Bar Association for a period of three years; reappointment is permissible. There have to be at least twice as many nominees as there are positions to be filled.

Personen zu bestellen sind. (2) Der Rechtsschutzbeauftragte und seine Stellvertreter müssen besondere Kenntnisse und Erfahrungen auf dem Gebiet der Grund- und Freiheitsrechte aufweisen und mindestens fünf Jahre in einem Beruf tätig gewesen sein, in dem der Abschluss des Studiums der Rechtswissenschaften Berufsvoraussetzung ist und dessen Ausübung Erfahrungen im Straf- und Strafverfahrensrecht mit sich brachte (4) Der Rechtsschutzbeauftragte ist in Ausübung seines Amtes unabhängig und an keine Weisungen gebunden. Er unterliegt der Amtsverschwiegenheit. Seine Stellvertreter haben gleiche Rechte und Pflichten.	(2) The Officer for Legal Protection and his deputies must have special knowledge and experience in the field of fundamental and civil rights and must have at least five years' professional experience in a position in the field of criminal law or criminal procedure law where a qualifying law degree is one of the professional requirements. ... (4) In the exercise of his office, the Officer for Legal Protection is independent and not bound by any instructions. He is under obligation to maintain official secrecy. His deputies have the same rights and obligations.
§121 (2) ... Einer Durchsuchung in ausschließlich der Berufsausübung gewidmeten Räumen einer der in § 157 Abs. 1 Z 2 bis 4 erwähnten Personen ist von Amts wegen ein Vertreter der jeweiligen gesetzlichen Interessenvertretung beziehungsweise der Medieninhaber oder ein von ihm namhaft gemachter Vertreter beizuziehen.	§ 121 (2) ... Without prompting from the interested party, a search of areas used by persons mentioned in § 157 Abs 1 Z 2 – 4 exclusively for their professional activities has to be carried out in presence of a representative of the relevant legal interest representation, or a representative of the media owners or a representative designated by him.

§ 144 (2) Die Anordnung oder Durchführung der in diesem Hauptstück enthaltenen Ermittlungsmaßnahmen ist auch unzulässig, soweit dadurch das Recht einer Person, gemäß § 157 Abs. 1 Z 2 bis 4 die Aussage zu verweigern, umgangen wird. (3) Ein Umgehungsverbot nach Abs. 1 erster Satz oder Abs. 2 besteht insoweit nicht, als die betreffende Person selbst der Tat dringend verdächtig ist. In einem solchen Fall ist für die Anordnung und Durchführung einer Ermittlungsmaßnahme in den Fällen des §§ 135 Abs. 2 bis 3 sowie 136 Abs. 1 Z 2 und 3 eine Ermächtigung des Rechtsschutzbeauftragten (§ 147 Abs. 2) Voraussetzung.	§ 144 (2) The order or implementation of investigative measures contained in this chapter are impermissible in so far as the right of a person to remain silent in accordance with § 157 Abs. 1 Z 2 - 4 would thus be circumvented. (3) The prohibition of circumvention under to Abs 1 first sentence or Abs 2 does not apply when the person concerned is under compelling suspicion. In such a case, for the order and implementation of an investigative measure under § 135 Abs 2 to 3 and § 136 Abs 1 Z 2 and 3, an authorisation of the Officer for Legal Protection (§ 147 Abs 2) is required.
§ 147 (1) ... 5. Dem Rechtsschutzbeauftragten obliegt die Prüfung und Kontrolle der Anordnung, Genehmigung, Bewilligung und Durchführung einer Auskunft über Daten einer Nachrichtenübermittlung, einer Überwachung von Nachrichten und einer optischen und akustischen Überwachung von Personen nach den §§ 135 Abs. 2 und 3, 136 Abs. 1 Z 2, die gegen eine Person gerichtet ist, die gemäß § 157 Abs. 1 Z 2 bis 4 berechtigt ist, die Aussage zu verweigern (§ 144 Abs. 3).	§147 (1) ... 5. The Officer for Legal Protection's task is to monitor the order or authorisation of the obtaining of information about data of a communication, an observation of a person in accordance with §§ 135 Abs 2 and 3, 136 Abs 1 Z 2 which is directed against an individual that has the right to refuse to give information according to § 157 Abs 1 Z 2 - 4 (§ 144 Abs. 3)

§ 157 (1) Zur Verweigerung der Aussage sind berechtigt: 4. Medieninhaber (Herausgeber), Medienmitarbeiter und Arbeitnehmer eines Medienunternehmens oder Mediendienstes über Fragen, welche die Person des Verfassers, Einsenders oder Gewährsmannes von Beiträgen und Unterlagen betreffen oder die sich auf Mitteilungen beziehen, die ihnen im Hinblick auf ihre Tätigkeit gemacht wurden	§ 157 (1) Entitled to refuse to testify are: 4. Media owners, editors, copy editors and employees of a media undertaking or media service in respect of questions concerning the person of the author, sender, or source of articles and documentation, or any information which has reached them in their professional capacity.
§ 209a (1) Die Staatsanwaltschaft kann nach den §§ 200 bis 203 und 205 bis 209 vorgehen, wenn ihr der Beschuldigte freiwillig sein Wissen über Tatsachen offenbart, die noch nicht Gegenstand eines gegen ihn geführten Ermittlungsverfahrens sind und deren Kenntnis wesentlich dazu beiträgt, 1. die Aufklärung einer der Zuständigkeit des Landesgerichts als Schöffengericht oder Geschworenengericht oder der WKStA (§§ 20a und 20b) unterliegenden Straftat entscheidend zu fördern, oder 2. eine Person auszuforschen, die in einer kriminellen Vereinigung, kriminellen Organisation oder terroristischen Organisation führend tätig ist oder war.	§209a (1) The public prosecutor may proceed in accordance to §§ 200 to 203 und 205 to 209, if the accused voluntarily reveals his knowledge about facts which are not yet the subject of the investigative proceedings against him and the knowledge of which substantially contributes to 1. solving a crime that falls in the competence of a regional court acting as a lay assessor or jury court or in the competence of the WKStA (§§ 20a und 20b), or 2. finding a person who is or was an active and leading member of a criminal association, a criminal organisation, or a terrorist organisation.

Journalistengesetz 1920	Journalists Act 1920
§ 1 (1) Die Vorschriften dieses Gesetzes gelten für alle mit der Verfassung des Textes oder mit der Zeichnung von Bildern betrauten Mitarbeiter einer Zeitungsunternehmung, die mit festen Bezügen angestellt sind und diese Tätigkeit nicht bloß als Nebenbeschäftigung ausüben (Redakteure, Schriftleiter). (2) Die Vorschriften dieses Gesetzes gelten sinngemäß für die Mitarbeiter einer Nachrichtenagentur, einer Rundfunkunternehmung (Ton- oder Bildfunk) oder einer Filmunternehmung, die mit der Gestaltung des Textes oder mit der Herstellung von Bildern (Laufbildern) über aktuelles Tagesgeschehen betraut und mit festen Bezügen angestellt sind und diese Tätigkeit nicht bloß als Nebenbeschäftigung ausüben	§1 (1) The provisions of this statute shall apply to all employees of a newspaper enterprise who are charged with the composition of texts or the drawing of pictures, and who are employed with a fixed salary and not merely as a matter of secondary occupation (general editors, editors). (2) The provisions of this statute apply by analogy to employees of a press agency, a broadcasting company (sound or image transmission) or a film production company, who are charged with the composition of texts or the production of images about everyday events, and who are employed with a fixed salary and not merely as a matter of secondary occupation.

Mediengesetz 1980	Media Act 1980
§ 1 (1) Im Sinn der Bestimmungen dieses Bundesgesetzes ist 1. „Medium“: jedes Mittel zur Verbreitung von Mitteilungen oder Darbietungen mit gedanklichem Inhalt in Wort, Schrift, Ton oder Bild an einen größeren Personenkreis im Wege der Massenherstellung oder der Massenverbreitung;	§ 1 (1) In terms of this federal act, terms listed hereunder shall mean: 1. “medium”: any means [used] to disseminate information or representations with intellectual content in word, writing, in form of sound or image, to a major audience by way of mass production or mass dissemination;

1a. „Medieninhalte“: Mitteilungen oder Darbietungen mit gedanklichem Inhalt in Wort, Schrift, Ton oder Bild, die in einem Medium enthalten sind; ... 6. „Medienunternehmen“: ein Unternehmen, in dem die inhaltliche Gestaltung des Mediums besorgt wird sowie a) seine Herstellung und Verbreitung oder b) seine Ausstrahlung oder Abrufbarkeit entweder besorgt oder veranlasst werden; 7. „Mediendienst“: ein Unternehmen, das Medienunternehmen wiederkehrend mit Beiträgen in Wort, Schrift, Ton oder Bild versorgt; 8. „Medieninhaber“: wer a) ein Medienunternehmen oder einen Mediendienst betreibt oder b) sonst die inhaltliche Gestaltung eines Medienwerks besorgt und dessen Herstellung und Verbreitung entweder besorgt oder veranlasst oder c) sonst im Fall eines elektronischen Mediums dessen inhaltliche Gestaltung besorgt und	1a. “media content”: information or representations with intellectual content, in word, writing, in form of sound or image contained in a medium; ... 6. “media undertaking”: an undertaking engaging in or causing a third party to engage in shaping the medium’s content and a) its production and distribution or b) its broadcast or availability for download. 7. “media service”: an undertaking procuring features in word, writing, sound or image for media companies on a recurrent basis; 8. “media owner”: one who a) engages in the operation of a media company or a media service or b) otherwise engages in or causes third parties to engage in the creation of a medium’s content and its production and dissemination, or c) otherwise in case of an electronic medium
---	--

dessen Ausstrahlung, Abrufbarkeit oder Verbreitung entweder besorgt oder veranlasst oder d) sonst die inhaltliche Gestaltung eines Mediums zum Zweck der nachfolgenden Ausstrahlung, Abrufbarkeit oder Verbreitung besorgt; 9. „Herausgeber“: wer die grundlegende Richtung des periodischen Mediums bestimmt; 10. „Hersteller“: wer die Massenherstellung von Medienwerken besorgt; 11. „Medienmitarbeiter“: wer in einem Medienunternehmen oder Mediendienst an der inhaltlichen Gestaltung eines Mediums oder der Mitteilungen des Mediendienstes journalistisch mitwirkt, sofern er als Angestellter des Medienunternehmens oder Mediendienstes oder als freier Mitarbeiter diese journalistische Tätigkeit ständig und nicht bloß als wirtschaftlich unbedeutende Nebenbeschäftigung ausübt;	engages in or causes third parties to engage in the creation of its content and its production and dissemination, or d) otherwise engages in the creation of the content of a medium for the purpose of subsequently broadcasting it, making it available for download or disseminating it; 9. “editor”: one who decides on the basic line represented in a periodically published medium; 10. “producer”: one who engages in the mass production of media products; 11. “copy editor”: one who is engaged as a journalist in editing the contents of a medium in a media undertaking or media service or who engages in such journalistic activity as a free professional on a permanent basis and not as a matter of insignificant secondary occupation;
§ 31 (1) Medieninhaber, Herausgeber, Medienmitarbeiter und Arbeitnehmer eines Medienunternehmens oder Mediendienstes haben das Recht, in einem Strafverfahren oder sonst in einem Verfahren vor Gericht oder einer Verwaltungsbehörde als Zeugen die Beantwortung von Fragen zu verweigern, die die Person des Verfassers, Einsenders oder Gewährsmannes von Beiträgen und Unterlagen oder die ihnen im Hinblick auf ihre Tätigkeit gemachten Mitteilungen betreffen. (2) Das im Abs. 1 angeführte Recht darf nicht umgangen werden, insbesondere dadurch, daß dem Berechtigten die Herausgabe von Schriftstücken, Druckwerken, Bild- oder Tonträgern oder Datenträgern, Abbildungen und	§ 31 (1) Media owners, editors, copy editors and employees of a media undertaking or media service, appearing as witnesses in criminal proceedings or other proceedings before court or an administrative authority, have the right to refuse to answer questions concerning the person of the author, sender, or source of articles and documentation, or any information which has reached them in their professional capacity. (2) The right as stated in Abs 1 must not be circumvented by an order made to the person enjoying this right to surrender documents, printed matter, image, sound or data carriers,

anderen Darstellungen mit solchem Inhalt aufgetragen wird oder diese beschlagnahmt werden. (3) Inwieweit die Überwachung von Nachrichten von Teilnehmeranschlüssen eines Medienunternehmens und eine optische oder akustische Überwachung von Personen unter Verwendung technischer Mittel in Räumlichkeiten eines Medienunternehmens zulässig sind, bestimmt die Strafprozeßordnung.	illustrations or other representations of such content or by confiscating them. (3) The extent to which the monitoring of messages send through subscriber lines of a media undertaking, or optical and acoustical surveillance of persons which is carried out using technical devices on the premises of a media undertaking, is permissible, is determined by the Code of Criminal Procedure.
Sicherheitspolizeigesetz 1991	Security Police Act 1991
§ 16 (1) Eine allgemeine Gefahr besteht 1. bei einem gefährlichen Angriff (Abs. 2 und 3) oder 2. sobald sich drei oder mehr Menschen mit dem Vorsatz verbinden, fortgesetzt gerichtlich strafbare Handlungen zu begehen (kriminelle Verbindung).	§ 16 (1) A general risk exists 1. in case of a dangerous attack (Abs 2 and 3) or 2. as soon as three or more people join together with the intention to commit offences (criminal association).
§ 56 (4) Die Übermittlung personenbezogener Daten an andere Behörden als Sicherheitsbehörden ist unzulässig, wenn für die übermittelnde Stelle Hinweise bestehen, dass hierdurch der Schutz des Redaktionsgeheimnisses (§ 31 Abs. 1 Mediengesetz) umgangen würde.	§ 56 (4) The transfer of personal data to authorities other than security authorities is not permitted if the transferring authority has received indications that the protection of editorial secrecy (§ 31 para. 1 Media Act) would be thus circumvented.

Polizeiliches Staatsschutzgesetz 2016	State Protection Act 2016
§ 6 (1) Dem Bundesamt und den Landesämtern obliegen 1. die erweiterte Gefahrenforschung; das ist die Beobachtung einer Gruppierung, wenn im Hinblick auf deren bestehende Strukturen und auf zu gewärtigende Entwicklungen in deren Umfeld damit zu rechnen ist, dass es zu mit schwerer Gefahr für die öffentliche Sicherheit verbundener Kriminalität, insbesondere zu weltanschaulich oder religiös motivierter Gewalt kommt; 2. der vorbeugende Schutz vor verfassungsgefährdenden Angriffen durch eine Person, sofern ein begründeter Gefahrenverdacht für einen solchen Angriff besteht;	§ 6 (1) The Federal Office and the State Offices are responsible for 1. extensive investigation of risks, ie observation of a group, when, considering its existing structures and the anticipated developments in its environment, it is to be expected that criminal acts posing severe danger for public security, and especially acts of ideologically or religiously motivated violence, will occur. 2. preventive protection against attacks which may pose a danger for the constitutional order in so far as there is a well-founded suspicion that such an attack may occur
§ 9 (1) (...) Bei Ermittlungen von personenbezogenen Daten nach diesem Bundesgesetz ist ein Eingriff in das von § 157 Abs. 1 Z 2 bis 4 Strafprozessordnung – StPO, BGBl. Nr. 631/1975, geschützte Recht nicht zulässig. § 157 Abs. 2 StPO gilt sinngemäß.	§ 9 (...)For the investigation of personal data under this federal state law an interference with the right guaranteed by § 157 Abs 1 Z 2 – 4 StPO 1975 is prohibited.

Allgemeines Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch	General Civil Code
§ 1330 (1) Wenn jemandem durch Ehrenbeleidigung ein wirklicher Schade oder Entgang des Gewinnes verursacht worden ist, so ist er berechtigt, den Ersatz zu fordern. (2) Dies gilt auch, wenn jemand Tatsachen verbreitet, die den Kredit, den Erwerb oder das Fortkommen eines anderen gefährden und deren Unwahrheit er kannte oder kennen mußte. In diesem Falle kann auch der Widerruf und die Veröffentlichung desselben verlangt werden. Für eine nicht öffentlich vorgebrachte Mitteilung, deren Unwahrheit der Mitteilende nicht kennt, haftet er nicht, wenn er oder der Empfänger der Mitteilung an ihr ein berechtigtes Interesse hatte.	§ 1330 (1) If a real damage or loss of profit has been caused to someone by libel, he is entitled to claim compensation. (2) This applies also when someone circulates facts that jeopardize the credit, the income, or the advancement of another person, and he knew or must have known about their falsity. In this event also the revocation and its publication can be demanded. When someone makes an announcement whose untruth he is not aware of, and does so non-publically, and he or the recipient of the announcement had a legitimate interest in it, he is not liable for any such announcement.
Staatsgrundgesetz über die allgemeinen Rechte der Staatsbürger 1867	Basic Law on the General Rights of Nationals 1867
Art 10a. Das Fernmeldegeheimnis darf nicht verletzt werden. Ausnahmen von der Bestimmung des vorstehenden Absatzes sind nur auf Grund eines richterlichen Befehles in Gemäßheit bestehender Gesetze zulässig.	Art 10a. The confidentiality of telecommunications may not be infringed. Exceptions from the provisions of the preceding paragraph are admissible only by virtue of a judicial warrant in conformity with the existing laws.

Datenschutzgesetz 2000	Data Protection Act 2000
§ 1 (1) Jedermann hat, insbesondere auch im Hinblick auf die Achtung seines Privat- und Familienlebens, Anspruch auf Geheimhaltung der ihn betreffenden personenbezogenen Daten, soweit ein schutzwürdiges Interesse daran besteht. Das Bestehen eines solchen Interesses ist ausgeschlossen, wenn Daten infolge ihrer allgemeinen Verfügbarkeit oder wegen ihrer mangelnden Rückführbarkeit auf den Betroffenen einem Geheimhaltungsanspruch nicht zugänglich sind. (2) Soweit die Verwendung von personenbezogenen Daten nicht im lebenswichtigen Interesse des Betroffenen oder mit seiner Zustimmung erfolgt, sind Beschränkungen des Anspruchs auf Geheimhaltung nur zur Wahrung überwiegender berechtigter Interessen eines anderen zulässig, und zwar bei Eingriffen einer staatlichen Behörde nur auf Grund von Gesetzen, die aus den in Art. 8 Abs. 2 der Europäischen Konvention zum Schutze der Menschenrechte und Grundfreiheiten (EMRK), BGBl. Nr. 210/1958, genannten Gründen notwendig sind. Derartige Gesetze dürfen die Verwendung von Daten, die ihrer Art nach besonders schutzwürdig sind, nur zur Wahrung wichtiger öffentlicher Interessen vorsehen und müssen gleichzeitig angemessene Garantien für den Schutz der Geheimhaltungsinteressen der Betroffenen festlegen. Auch im Falle zulässiger Beschränkungen darf der Eingriff in das Grundrecht jeweils nur in der gelindesten, zum Ziel führenden Art vorgenommen werden. (3) Jedermann hat, soweit ihn betreffende	(1) Everybody shall have the right to secrecy for the personal data concerning him, especially with regard to his private and family life, in so far as he has an interest deserving such protection. Such an interest is precluded when data cannot be subject to the right to secrecy due to their general availability or because they cannot be traced back to the data subject. (2) Insofar personal data is not used in the vital interest of the data subject or with his consent, restrictions to the right to secrecy are only permitted to safeguard overriding legitimate interests of another, namely in case of an intervention by a public authority the restriction shall only be permitted based on laws necessary for the reasons stated in art 8, para 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights (Federal Law Gazette No. 210/1958). Such laws may provide for the use of data that deserve special protection only in order to safeguard substantial public interests and shall provide suitable safeguards for the protection of the data subjects' interest in secrecy. Even in the case of permitted restrictions the intervention with the fundamental right shall be carried out using only the least intrusive of all effective methods. (3) Everybody shall have, insofar as personal data concerning him are destined for

personenbezogene Daten zur automatisierten Verarbeitung oder zur Verarbeitung in manuell, dh. ohne Automationsunterstützung geführten Dateien bestimmt sind, nach Maßgabe gesetzlicher Bestimmungen 1. das Recht auf Auskunft darüber, wer welche Daten über ihn verarbeitet, woher die Daten stammen, und wozu sie verwendet werden, insbesondere auch, an wen sie übermittelt werden; 2. das Recht auf Richtigstellung unrichtiger Daten und das Recht auf Löschung unzulässigerweise verarbeiteter Daten. (4) Beschränkungen der Rechte nach Abs. 3 sind nur unter den in Abs. 2 genannten Voraussetzungen zulässig.	automated processing or manual processing, i.e. in filing systems without automated processing, as provided for by law, 1. the right to obtain information as to who processes what data concerning him, where the data originated, for which purpose they are used, as well as to whom the data are transmitted; 2. the right to rectification of incorrect data and the right to erasure of illegally processed data. (4) Restrictions of the rights according to Abs 3 are only permitted under the conditions laid out in Abs. 2.
§ 4 Im Sinne der folgenden Bestimmungen dieses Bundesgesetzes bedeuten die Begriffe: 1. „Daten“ („personenbezogene Daten“): Angaben über Betroffene (Z 3), deren Identität bestimmt oder bestimmbar ist; „nur indirekt personenbezogen“ sind Daten für einen Auftraggeber (Z 4), Dienstleister (Z 5) oder Empfänger einer Übermittlung (Z 12) dann, wenn der Personenbezug der Daten derart ist, daß dieser Auftraggeber, Dienstleister oder Übermittlungsempfänger die Identität des Betroffenen mit rechtlich zulässigen Mitteln nicht bestimmen kann; 2. „sensible Daten“ („besonders	§ 4 For the subsequent provisions of this Federal Act the terms listed below shall mean: 1. "Data" ("Personal Data"): Information relating to data subjects (Z 3) who are identified or identifiable; Data are "only indirectly personal" for a controller (Z 4), a processor (Z5) or recipient of a transmission (Z 12) when the Data relate to the subject in such a manner that the controller, processor or recipient of a transmission cannot establish the identity of the data subject by legal means; 2. "Sensitive Data" ("Data deserving special

schutzwürdige Daten“): Daten natürlicher Personen über ihre rassische und ethnische Herkunft, politische Meinung, Gewerkschaftszugehörigkeit, religiöse oder philosophische Überzeugung, Gesundheit oder ihr Sexualleben; 3. „Betroffener“: jede vom Auftraggeber (Z 4) verschiedene natürliche oder juristische Person oder Personengemeinschaft, deren Daten verwendet (Z 8) werden; 8. Verwenden von Daten: jede Art der Handhabung von Daten, also sowohl das Verarbeiten (Z 9) als auch das Übermitteln (Z 12) von Daten;	protection”): Data relating to natural persons concerning their racial or ethnic origin, political opinion, trade-union membership, religious or philosophical beliefs, and data concerning health or sex life; 3. ”Data Subject”: any natural or legal person or group of natural persons not identical with the controller, whose data are processed (Z 8); 8. ”Use of Data”: all kinds of operations with Data, meaning both processing of data (Z 9) and transmission of Data (Z 12);
§48 (1) Soweit Medienunternehmen, Mediendienste oder ihre Mitarbeiter Daten unmittelbar für ihre publizistische Tätigkeit im Sinne des Mediengesetzes verwenden, sind von den einfachgesetzlichen Bestimmungen des vorliegenden Bundesgesetzes nur die §§ 4 bis 6, 10, 11, 14 und 15 anzuwenden. (2) Die Verwendung von Daten für Tätigkeiten nach Abs. 1 ist insoweit zulässig, als dies zur Erfüllung der Informationsaufgabe der Medienunternehmer, Mediendienste und ihrer Mitarbeiter in Ausübung des Grundrechtes auf freie Meinungsäußerung gemäß Art. 10 Abs. 1 EMRK erforderlich ist.	§48 (1) Insofar as media companies, media services and their operatives use data directly for journalistic purposes according to the Media Act, only §§ 4 to 6, 10, 11, 14 and 15 of the non-constitutional provisions of this Federal Act shall apply. (2) The use of data for activities pursuant to Abs 1 shall be legal insofar as this is required to fulfil the information requirements of the media companies, media services and their operatives in exercise of the right to free speech pursuant to art 10 para 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

(3) Im übrigen gelten die Bestimmungen des Mediengesetzes, insbesondere seines dritten Abschnitts über den Persönlichkeitsschutz.	(3) In all other respects the Media Act shall apply, especially the third part about the protection of personality rights.
--	---

Telekommunikationsgesetz 2003	Telecommunication Act 2003
§ 92 (1) Die Bestimmungen dieses Abschnitts gelten für die Verarbeitung und Übermittlung von personenbezogenen Daten in Verbindung mit der Bereitstellung öffentlicher Kommunikationsdienste in öffentlichen Kommunikationsnetzen einschließlich öffentlicher Kommunikationsnetze, die Datenerfassungs- und Identifizierungsgeräte unterstützen. Soweit dieses Bundesgesetz nicht anderes bestimmt, sind auf die in diesem Bundesgesetz geregelten Sachverhalte die Bestimmungen des Datenschutzgesetzes 2000, BGBl. I Nr. 165/1999, anzuwenden. (2) Die Bestimmungen der Strafprozessordnung bleiben durch die Bestimmungen dieses Abschnittes unberührt. (3) In diesem Abschnitt bezeichnet	§ 92 (1) The provisions of this section apply to the processing and transmission of personal data in connection with the provision of public communications services in public communications networks, including those public communications networks which support data collection and identification equipment. Unless otherwise provided by this Federal Act, the provisions of the Data Protection Act 2000, Federal Law Gazette I No.165/1999, shall apply to the facts regulated in this Federal Act. ( 2) The provisions stipulated in this section are without prejudice to the Code of Criminal Procedure. (3) Irrespective of § 3, in this section the term:

unbeschadet des § 3 der Begriff: 4. „Verkehrsdaten“ Daten, die zum Zwecke der Weiterleitung einer Nachricht an ein Kommunikationsnetz oder zum Zwecke der Fakturierung dieses Vorgangs verarbeitet werden; 4a. „Zugangsdaten“ jene Verkehrsdaten, die beim Zugang eines Teilnehmers zu einem öffentlichen Kommunikationsnetz beim Betreiber entstehen und für die Zuordnung der zu einem bestimmten Zeitpunkt für eine Kommunikation verwendeten Netzwerkadressierungen zum Teilnehmer notwendig sind; 5. „Inhaltsdaten“ die Inhalte übertragener Nachrichten (Z 7); 6. „Standortdaten“ Daten, die in einem Kommunikationsnetz oder von einem Kommunikationsdienst verarbeitet werden und die den geografischen Standort der Telekommunikationsendeinrichtung eines Nutzers eines öffentlichen Kommunikationsdienstes angeben, im Fall von festen Telekommunikationsendeinrichtungen sind Standortdaten die Adresse der Einrichtung;	4. “traffic data” means any data processed for the purpose of the conveyance of a communication on a communications network or for the billing thereof; 4a. “access data” means the traffic data created at the operator during access by a subscriber to a public communications network and required for assignment to the subscriber of the network addresses used for a communication at a specific point of time; 5. “content data” means the contents of conveyed communications (Z 7); 6. “location data” means any data processed in a communications network or by a communications service, indicating the geographic position of the telecommunications terminal equipment of a user of a publicly available communications service; in the case of fixed-link telecommunications terminal equipment, location data refer to the address of the equipment
---	--

E-Commerce-Gesetz 2001	E-Commerce Act 2001
§ 18 Die in den §§ 13 bis 17 genannten Diensteanbieter sind nicht verpflichtet, die von ihnen gespeicherten, übermittelten oder zugänglich gemachten Informationen allgemein zu überwachen oder von sich aus nach Umständen zu forschen, die auf rechtswidrige Tätigkeiten hinweisen.	§ 18 The service providers mentioned in §§ 13 to 17 shall not be obligated to monitor in a general fashion the information stored, transmitted or made available by them or to actively research circumstances indicating illegal activity.
Beamten-Dienstrechtsgesetz 1979	Federal Civil Service Act 1979
§ 53a Die Beamtin oder der Beamte, die oder der gemäß § 53 Abs. 1 im guten Glauben den begründeten Verdacht einer in § 4 Abs. 1 des Bundesgesetzes über die Einrichtung und Organisation des Bundesamts zur Korruptionsprävention und Korruptionsbekämpfung, BGBl. I Nr. 72/2009, genannten strafbaren Handlung meldet, darf durch die Vertreterin oder den Vertreter des Dienstgebers als Reaktion auf eine solche Meldung nicht benachteiligt werden. Dasselbe gilt, wenn die Beamtin oder der Beamte von ihrem oder seinem Melderecht gemäß § 5 des Bundesgesetzes über die Einrichtung und Organisation des Bundesamts zur Korruptionsprävention und Korruptionsbekämpfung Gebrauch macht.	§ 53a The civil servant who acts in good faith and has reasonable suspicion about a criminal offence subject to § 4 Abs 1 of the Federal Law on the Establishment of the Federal Bureau of Anti-Corruption, and gives notification in accordance to § 53 Abs 1, shall not be disadvantaged by the employer. The same applies when the civil servant exercises his right according to § 5 of the Federal Law on the Establishment of the Federal Bureau of Anti-Corruption.
Staatsanwaltschaftsgesetz 1986	Public Prosecution Act 1986
§ 2 (6) Bei der WKStA besteht ein	§ 2 (6) WKStA operates an internet-based

internetbasiertes Hinweisgebersystem, über welches Hinweise insbesondere wegen der in § 20a Abs. 1 StPO genannten Vergehen oder Verbrechen auch anonym gemeldet werden können. § 80 StPO bleibt unberührt.

whistle-blower system, which enables a whistle-blower to make an anonymous notification particularly regarding crimes or offences mentioned in § 20a Abs 1 StPO. § 80 StPO shall remain unaffected.

ELSA AZERBAIJAN

Contributors

National Coordinator

Aliyeva Sevil

National Academic Coordinator

Amina Kalantarova

National Researchers

Arzu Shukurova

Nurlana Dunyamaliyeva

Shahla Aslanova

Ayisha Afandiyeva

Mahammad Ismayilov

National Linguistic Editors

Qurban Qurbanzade

National Academic Supervisor

Amir Aliyev

Gulnaz Alasgarova

1. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information? What type of legislation provides this protection? How exactly is this protection construed in national law?

Being the core of the democratic society, the freedom to express one's thoughts and ideas and the freedom of information are one of the main conditions for the progress of the society as a whole and the development of each of its individual in particular. The protection of journalists' right not to disclose their source of information is one of the basic rights providing the freedom of people to get information on the matters of public interest.

In accordance with the article 7 of The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Freedom of Information¹ under the sources of information, which contain the essence of the question, are understood the documents and other carriers reflecting information, in order provided for in the legislation, mass media information and public speeches. A number of cases concerning the right of protection of journalists and their sources of information, provision of this right are reflected in a majority of the domestic legislation of the Republic of Azerbaijan. Our state has held numerous events and has adopted a number of legislative acts in the field of the protection of confidentiality of journalists' sources of information, which is deemed to be one of the generally accepted ethic norms of journalism around the world.

According to article 47 of the Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan,² everyone has the right to freedom of thought and speech. Nobody can be enforced to express his thoughts and convictions or to deny them. In addition, in article 50 of the Constitution,³ the freedom of information expressed. Everyone is free to look for, obtain, transfer, develop and distribute any information in a legal way. Freedom of mass media is guaranteed. State censorship in mass media, including press is prohibited. However, the Constitution does not provide a separate article concerning journalists' freedom of expression, right to obtain, use and disseminate information, right for protection of sources of information. Simply, according to the discretion of those articles, journalists, like everyone else, are entitled to the freedom of expression, right to obtain, use and disseminate information.

According to article 11 of the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media,⁴ a journalist cannot be enforced to disclose the source of information published or broadcasted via mass media in connection with the case under investigation or at the court proceedings, except in

¹ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Freedom of Information, article 7.

² The Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 47.

³ The Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 50.

⁴ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 11.

cases specified by law. In this case, the responsibility for the author's non-disclosed description, article, picture or caricature lies on the shoulders of a contributing editor responsible for release or a journalist. The disclosure of the source of information in our law does not only comprise in itself the disclosure of the name of a person who provided a journalist with information, but also any other information allowing to identify the person, including any personal information about the person who gave information (age, work place, place of residence, etc.); his appearance, voice, information about getting the information by a journalist (where, when, how it was received, etc.); the non-spread part of the provided information; personal information in connection with the journalist's professional activities (his previous work, previous investigations, etc.) In accordance with the article 13 of The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Freedom of Information,⁵ documented information source about an identity of a person are the documents on his name, signed by him and information about a person, gathered by the authorities within their competence. Thus, for the confidentiality of a person privacy terms concerning these documents and information sources must be fulfilled.

The legislation has determined when the abuse by a journalist of his right will result in a violation of law. Thus, according to the article 189 Code of Administrative Offences of the Republic of Azerbaijan⁶ promulgation of information, prohibited to disclosure by legislation; non-fulfilment of control on preparation of materials, published in printing edition in accordance with requirements of legislation; promulgation of information without indication of its source, except occasions envisaged by legislation production or distribution of production of mass media without reference data or deliberate distortion of reference data by abuse of freedom of mass media and journalist rights on behalf a journalist entails imposition of penalty in amount of 20-25 manats.

In all cases, a journalist can be demanded to provide the information about the source of his information only if there exists a reasoned and grounded court decision. The court, in its decision, has to substantiate that the identity of the source of the information is required by the purposes specified in the law and the necessary information was impossible to get in any other ways. A journalist, who does not agree with the court's decision, may appeal to the respective higher court. The journalist must be provided with an opportunity to appeal. When there is disseminated official information of journalists' organizations, parties, societies, associations or any other interested groups the indication of the sources of such information is necessary. However, if an individual, not representing these kind of organisations will have a condition not to disclose his name, when providing information, journalist and media entity must comply with this condition, the sources of information should be secured. For sure, this will be protected in case if the information does not violate other people's rights.

The anonymity of a person giving information to the mass media editorial is guaranteed. This means that the journalist does not have a right to disclose the name of the person who provided him with information. The government authorities or other public institutions, in their row, are banned from looking for the source or to disclose the information acquired by the journalist. A journalist may bear a legal responsibility for disclosing the source, however, in our time, yet no journalist has been sentenced for this type of crime. It should be noted that only the offices and organisations are prohibited to search for and identify the sources, but not enterprises and civilians. The owner of a private firm can search for the source of information, while an editorial journalist might ask his colleague about the sources the latter uses. The results of such searches mostly depend on a journalist. Thus, he takes on himself not only the legal responsibility, but also the moral responsibility. Therefore, by following his moral obligation the journalist must try to keep the source in a secret even when there are requirements of the government and judicial authorities.

⁵ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Freedom of Information, article 13.

⁶ Code of Administrative Offences of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 189.

No one, other than the court, be it the state authorities, officials, can force a journalist to disclose his source of information. The determination of the principle of impossibility to enforce a journalist to disclose the source is of a great importance. It expands the freedom of journalists to obtain information. Protection of information sources plays a major role in strengthening the freedom of information. The right of journalists to keep information sources confidential is a key element in the preparation of reports. The lack of protection of sources of information limits the possibilities for carrying out journalist investigations. If the journalist discloses his source, others may lose their faith to that journalist and persons possessing information vital for journalist would avoid giving this information to the journalist. Therefore, a journalist must try not to disclose the source, for sure, following the requirements of the law.

2. Is there, in domestic law, a provision that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his/her sources? How exactly is this prohibition construed in national law? What is the sanction?

According to the first article of The Code of Professional Ethics of a journalist of the Republic of Azerbaijan,⁷ all professional activities of a journalist are fully compatible with the Constitution and laws of the Republic of Azerbaijan. He is fully responsible for his published (broadcasted) material before the readers, viewers, listeners and society as a whole. In accordance with article 11 of the Law of the Azerbaijan Republic on Mass Media,⁸ media editorship and journalist are not allowed to disseminate information:

- 1) about person giving latent information, if person doesn't want his name to be unfold;
- 2) about person who has given information with condition his name not to be declared;
- 3) about preliminary investigation and interrogation without permission of investigator, interrogator, prosecutor or court;
- 4) about personality of minors who have committed felony without their permission or without their legal representatives' permission.

⁷ The Code of Professional Ethics of a journalist of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 1.

⁸ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 11.

An editor and journalist, who is responsible for publication of information, cannot be forced to unfold his source of information, with an exception if it is in trial proceedings and stated by law. In this case, the editor or journalist is responsible for the anonymous description, article, image or caricature. The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media establishes the general rules of seeking, getting, preparing, transmission, production and dissemination of the mass information in the Azerbaijan Republic, and also organizational, legal and economical fundamentals of activity of press, news agencies, television and radio organisations, directional on a realisation of the rights of the citizens on getting of the full, authentic and quick information. Editor or journalist in the following cases shall be forced by the court to open their sources of information: for the protection of human life; with the purpose to prevent heavy crime; to protect the person accused or suspected in conducting heavy crime. If a journalist possesses the information on cases endangering human life (i.e. the person will be deprived of his life) in order to eliminate danger to the life of that person if other information is not sufficient and a journalist needs to know the identity of a person who informed, the court may require the journalist to disclose the identity of that person. If any other information is not enough for prevention of preparing grave (Article 15.4 of the Criminal Code⁹) and especially grave crimes (Article 15.5 of the Criminal Code¹⁰) the court may require the journalist to disclose the necessary information for revealing the person who gave information. If a journalist refuses to provide the court with information, he may bare criminal liability under the article 307.1 of the Criminal Code¹¹.

In further proceedings, a journalist may also carry the criminal responsibility in accordance with article 298 of the Criminal Code¹² and may be held liable for refusing to testify.

Article 186 of the Code of Administrative Offences of the Republic of Azerbaijan,¹³ establishes that, not responding to a journalist request at periods established by legislation entails the imposition of penalty on natural persons in the amount of 40-70 manats, while restriction of presentation or refusal in presentation of information to journalist, except information protected by legislation entails imposition of penalty in the amount of 60-90 manats. This article directs the administrative liability on officials and the representatives of state bodies, municipalities, institutions, enterprises and organisations, public associations, political parties, who were expected to directly provide the information.

Such individuals and state agencies, in accordance with article 21 of the Civil Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan¹⁴ as a result of violations of the right of journalists to obtain information are also obliged to pay the damage caused to them.

⁹ Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 15.4.

¹⁰ Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 15.5.

¹¹ Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 307.1.

¹² Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 298.

¹³ Code of Administrative Offences of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 186.

¹⁴ Civil Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 21.

According to article 189 of Code of Administrative Offences of the Republic of Azerbaijan,¹⁵ abuse of freedom of mass media and journalist rights on behalf of editorial staff (responsible editor) of mass media and journalists (authors) i.e.: promulgation of information, prohibited to disclosure by legislation; non-fulfilment of control on preparation of materials, published in printing edition in accordance with requirements of legislation; promulgation of information without indication of its source, except occasions envisaged by legislation; production or distribution of production of mass media without reference data or deliberate distortion of reference data entails imposition of penalty on natural persons in amount of 20-25, official persons - 60-80, legal persons - 200-250 manats.

3. Who is a journalist according to national legislation? Is it, in your view, a restricted definition for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources? What is the scope of protection of other media actors? Is the protection of journalists sources extended to anyone else?

Article 49 of the the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media¹⁶ provides us with such a definition of a journalist: a regular correspondent of mass media, who is engaged in gathering, preparing, editing and producing information; a correspondent of mass media, regularly fulfilling the assignments concerning gathering, preparing and editing information are considered to be journalists. As it can be seen the definitions given by our legislation to a journalist lacks the expression of the journalists' right to protect their sources of information. However, the protection of information sources is an essential condition for journalist's independent activities, for obtaining more information by winning the trust of the person providing information and for carrying out the investigation, as well as the integral part of the notion of journalist and journalist activities.

At this point, article 61 of the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media must be analysed.¹⁷ According to it at failure of positions of this law in certain cases the publisher, distributor and editorial office (editor, editor-in-chief) bear civil, administrative, criminal and other responsibility pursuant to the legislation of the Republic of Azerbaijan. These cases are following: unfounded waiving of the disproof, correction and answer, non-observance of the solutions, which have entered valid force, and resolutions of court - editorial office (accountable editor); failure to meet requirements of Articles 9, 11, 13, 21 and 28 of the present Law - the founder, editorial office, publisher and distributor; precluding to distribution on valid foundations of product of publication, introducing of pirate limitations on retail sale of circulation of periodic print publication - the officials; for an assumption of pirate financing of mass media manufactured (distributed) on the territory of the Azerbaijan Republic, by state organs, legal and physical persons of foreign countries - the founder and editor-in-chief (editor); at pirate preparing both distribution by editorial office and publishing house of product of mass media after a resolution of court on suspension or phase-out the distribution – the publisher, distributor and editorial office (editor, editor-in-chief) bear civil, administrative, criminal and other responsibility pursuant to the legislation of the Azerbaijan Republic. According to the Code of Administrative Offences abuse and misuse by an editor of his rights makes the application of respective penalties to an editor inevitable.

¹⁵ Code of Administrative Offences of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 189.

¹⁶ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 49.

¹⁷ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 61.

The legislation has established such defined cases, when a media actor is obliged, unconditionally, to give up the source of information, in any other case they are entitled to the right to keep their source undisclosed. Thus, when personal information is entered in to information systems used by everyone via open sources, the operator of that information system has to inform the subject about the sources of entered-information. This is connected to the right of subjects to get information about the sources of acquisition of personal data, which is collected and processed in the information system. As a general rule, when obtaining verbal information in every office, enterprise, organisation where people are involved, who help the reporter in seeking information. Some are engaged in helping because of their service debts, while others do it employing their constitutional right on the guarantee of maintaining the confidentiality of the source of information and the free distribution of information. Many provide media actors with information disinterestedly; however, the maintenance of their anonymity is very important to them. After all, the issue may be regarding the workplace of the person providing the information. For example, a civil servant is willing to provide information about the illegal actions occurring at one of the departments of his work office. If the principal will make inquiries on who leaked the information, then that person's job may be at risk. Thus, many sources have the grounds to act as an anonymous source. This is an obvious proof of the fact, that keeping the source of information confidential plays an important role for other persons to give information freely and confidently and for determining the problems and events taking place in society and in the political arena. In our legislation, there does not exist a single systemised normative act which would regulate the right of media actors to keep their information sources confidential. Thus, for the formation of free media, our state is in need of developing legislation in this area.

4. What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources? How are the laws implemented? How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?

The Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan, as well as the European Convention on Human Rights, recognises everyone's right to legally search for, acquire, transmit, prepare and spread any information or idea.

The right of a person to seek and acquire the information also covers his right of free movement to the places, where a person assumes the information exists, the right to be able to meet any person, the right to enter any places, as well as the right to look for the information via the suitable technical means, including the internet, all of it for sure can be carried out only in appropriate legal ways. This right, moreover, includes the possibility to make notes on what a person had seen or heard, as well as to record what a person had seen or heard by technical means, such as sound recording, video recording devices, still cameras.

Article 50 of the Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan recognizes everyone's right to look for, obtain, transfer, develop and distribute any information in a legal way.¹⁸ According to the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Getting Information, anyone, himself or through a representative, can apply to the owner of the information, and acquire the desired information by selecting the method of obtaining and type of the information. Anyone is understood as being citizens, foreign citizens, as well as stateless persons. In accordance with the law on Getting Information, everyone has equal rights for obtaining information. Information owners, by this law, regardless of who is requiring from them the information, which information owners consider to be of public importance and open to public, should provide them with what they demand. For this, no kind of limitation exists, be it professional, age or any other restrictions.

The guarantee of the confidentiality of journalists' sources of information: Can journalists be required to disclose their source of information?

As it was previously mentioned, being at the core of a democratic society, the freedom to express one's thoughts and ideas, and freedom of information are one of the main conditions for the progress of the society as a whole and the development of each of its individual in particular. The protection of journalists' right not to disclose their source of information is one of the basic rights providing the freedom of people to get information on the matters of public interest.

Media editors and journalists who are responsible for the publication of information cannot be forced to disclose his source of information, with an exception if it is in trial proceedings and stated by law. To disclose the source of information, in our law, does not only comprise in itself the disclosure of the name of a person who provided a journalist with information, but also any other information allowing to identify the person, including any personal information about the person who gave information (age, work place, place of residence, etc.), his appearance, voice, information about getting the information by a journalist (where, when, how it was received, etc.), the non-spread part of the provided information, personal information in connection with the journalist's professional activities (his previous work, previous investigations, etc.)

The source must always be indicated while disseminating official information from organisations, parties, societies, unions and other interest groups. However, if the person who provides the information prefers to remain anonymous, journalists or media entities must adhere to his/her privacy conditions. The confidentiality of the source of information shall be protected. The information provided by unofficial sources shall be checked for its authenticity and informative value before being disseminated. The content of the information shall not be distorted while being prepared for print. When quoting from another article or speech, journalists should note precise starting and ending points of the quotation. When printing photo-symbols (illustration, photo editing) together with texts, it should be noted that such images do not have documentary importance. Titles of articles should correspond to their content. A journalist should try to have his/her interview signed by interviewees or their authorised agents. If this is not possible, interviewees should be notified of the way in which the interview will be published and whether the questions asked by the journalist will be modified. If there are no other methods available, journalists may use special equipment (hidden cameras, hidden microphones or other hidden tools) or methods (“fake” IDs and etc.) as an exception for obtaining information that has public importance. Journalists shall not resort to intimidation, application of force or threats in order to obtain information or images.¹⁹

¹⁸ The Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 50.

According to article 52 of The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media,²⁰ the citizens of the Azerbaijan Republic have the right to direct information from foreign sources, including mass media. The limitation of direct acceptance of the television programmes is enabled in cases, foreseen by the intergovernmental agreements, contracted by the Azerbaijan Republic. In case the order of distribution of foreign periodic print publications, founder or constant place of editorial office of which one are outside boundaries of the Azerbaijan Republic, is not established by the intergovernmental agreement contracted by the Azerbaijan Republic, its distribution needs a resolution from the appropriate organ of the executive authority.

Journalists shall not condemn people for their nationality, race, sex, language, profession, religion, and place of birth or residence and shall not highlight such data. Journalists shall respect the honour, dignity, and inviolability of personal life of the person he/she meets with and writes about. Journalists may not disseminate facts about citizens’ personal lives without their consent, unless dissemination of such information does not violate the rights of the society, is lawful and does not contradict social interest. Journalists and mass media entities must correct their errors wholly and as soon as possible, regardless of the person who identified the error. The correction should indicate whether the related article was erroneous in whole or in part. When publishing personal letters, the author, the person to whom the letter is addressed to, or their heirs, should be asked for permission. Names or images of victims who suffered from accidents or crime must not be disclosed without their consent. This is possible under special conditions and if the victim is a public figure. If the crime was committed by teenagers or children (persons below 18 years of age), journalists should refrain from disseminating the names or pictures of the criminals. Journalists should respect the right to presumption of innocence of persons who are suspected of committing crimes and should introduce such persons not as criminals, but as persons who have been detained for being suspected of committing crimes. If a mass media entity has provided information on detention or indictment of a citizen as a suspect and if his/her innocence was later proven, the media entity must inform the public in this regard. Journalists shall not take advantage of childrens’ innocence and trust; they shall respect their rights and demonstrate a special responsibility in communicating their views; and shall seek to avoid interviewing children without the consent of their parents or lawful guardians. Journalists shall not publish information or photographs about private life of a child unless there is an overriding public interest. Journalists shall protect the identity of children involved in, or affected by tragedy or criminal activity. If a person is charged with committing of a crime, journalists shall not prepare reports which could undermine the objectiveness of the court in this issue and opinions from all involved parties should be reflected in such reports. If victims of a crime have not given their consent to be identified, journalists shall treat the identities of such individuals with sensitivity. This rule is especially important in cases involving sexual assault. If witnesses have not consented to being identified and if their identification does not have any public importance, journalists shall treat their identity with sensitivity. Journalists shall refrain from glorifying or unnecessarily sensationalising reporting about crime, violence, brutality and suicide. Journalists shall be careful not to be used as a means by those who promote, incite or use violence; instead, journalists shall report on their activities with due constraint and only if there is a clear public interest. Journalists or editorials should not prepare reports that exaggerate terror acts; reports that serve the interests of terrorists; reports that create fear or those which promote or justify terror acts.²¹ Journalists shall not pay sources for information, but where payment is considered necessary in order to obtain information that the public has a right to know, it shall be made clear in the relevant report that payments have been made.²²

¹⁹ Professional Code of Conduct of Azerbaijani Journalists, principle 2.

²⁰ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 52.

Information resources by categories of access may be open and with limited access. Pursuant to the legislation of the Azerbaijan Republic and decisions of relevant bodies of the executive power, information resources, except documented information with limited access, shall be open for access. Documented information with limited access pursuant to the terms of its legal framework shall be divided into information considered state secret and confidential. The classification of information as state secret, procedure for its use and protection shall be established by the Law of Azerbaijan Republic "On State Secret". Information, not being regarded as state secret but needed to be kept in secrecy in order to protect legal interests of citizens, institutions, enterprises and organizations, shall be confidential. Gathering, processing, using and disseminating of confidential information shall only be allowed in cases established by the legislation of Azerbaijan Republic.²³ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Information, Informatization and Protection of Information, dated April 3 1998, regulates the relations arising from the formation of information resources based on creation, collection, processing, accumulation, keeping, search, dissemination of information, establishment and use of information systems, technology and means for their insurance and at protection of information. The Law shall establish rights of subjects involving in information processes. Moreover, it shall not concern relations that are regulated by the Laws of Azerbaijan Republic on Mass Media and on Copyright and Related Rights.

²¹ Professional Code of Conduct of Azerbaijani Journalists, principle 3.

²² Professional Code of Conduct of Azerbaijani Journalists, principle 4.8.

²³ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Information, Informatization and Protection of Information, article 10.

5. In the respective national legislation, are the limits of non-disclosure of the information in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7? What are the procedures applied? Is the disclosure limited to exceptional circumstances, taking into consideration vital public or individual interests at stake? Do the authorities first search for and apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the right of journalists not to disclose information?

The limits of non-disclosure of information is considered in Principle 3 of the Appendix to Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information. This principle refers to Article 10, paragraph 2 of the ECHR in its disposition. So, the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and European Court of Human Rights have stressed the main outlines in which the limits to the disclosure are concerned.. The main problem is that the journalistic sources should be protected and confidentiality is granted and at the same time the personal, state and business secrets should be respected. Therefore, there is a need of developing a balanced system.

Recommendation No. R (2000) 7, principle 3²⁴ - Limits to the right of non-disclosure is consisting of three clauses:

a. The right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source must not be subject to other restrictions than those mentioned in Article 10, paragraph 2 of the Convention. In determining whether a legitimate interest in a disclosure falling within the scope of Article 10, paragraph 2 of the Convention outweighs the public interest in not disclosing information identifying a source, competent authorities of member States shall pay particular regard to the importance of the right of non-disclosure and the pre-eminence given to it in the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, and may only order a disclosure if, subject to paragraph b, there exists an overriding requirement in the public interest and if circumstances are of a sufficiently vital and serious nature.

b. The disclosure of information identifying a source should not be deemed necessary unless it can be convincingly established that:

i. reasonable alternative measures to the disclosure do not exist or have been exhausted by the persons or public authorities that seek the disclosure, and

ii. the legitimate interest in the disclosure clearly outweighs the public interest in the non-disclosure, bearing in mind that:

- an overriding requirement of the need for disclosure is proved,
- the circumstances are of a sufficiently vital and serious nature,
- the necessity of the disclosure is identified as responding to a pressing social need, and ²⁴ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7, Principle 3 (Limits to the right of non-disclosure)

- member States enjoy a certain margin of appreciation in assessing this need, but this margin goes hand in hand with the supervision by the European Court of Human Rights.

c. The above requirements should be applied at all stages of any proceedings where the right of non-disclosure might be invoked.

The definitions for the purpose of the Recommendation in regard of the "information identifying a source" mentions that:

The term "information identifying a source" means, as far as this is likely to lead to the identification of a source:

- the name and personal data as well as voice and image of a source;
- the factual circumstances of acquiring information from a source by a journalist;
- the unpublished content of the information provided by a source to a journalist; and
- personal data of journalists and their employers related to their professional work.²⁵

So, the journalist cannot be compelled to disclose information identifying a source, as it violates certain rights. As the internet is developing with a inevitable speed, the measures for protection should be restricted more than it has been done before. The officials try to make adequate steps for striking a balance.

In the Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan, adopted on November 12 1995, Article 50 states that: freedom of mass information is ensured. State censorship in mass media as well as in print media is prohibited.²⁶

As Azerbaijan is a post-soviet country, the law was concrete on state censorship during the Soviet period. On August 6 1998, the state censorship over mass media was prohibited by the Order of the President Heydar Aliyev. From this period, the free environment is observed in the media sphere.

As the Constitution of Azerbaijan Republic is the supreme document in the land, the national laws also indicated the principle then. The legislation considers only vital public or individual interests at stake when there is a necessity for disclosure.

So, the authorities, namely, investigative bodies and courts, firstly clarify the balance, for that the investigation deeply analyses the matters and then, as in the case of ECHR the balance test should be applied. The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media in the section consisting basis of freedom of mass media, namely in article 11, enumerates the special circumstances in which the editor or journalist can be obliged by the court to disclose the source. The circumstances are limited, shortly speaking, they are as follows:

- for the protection of human life;

²⁵ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 , Definitions; Principle 3 (Limits to the right of non-disclosure)

²⁶ The Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 50.

–for the purpose of preventing grave crime;
–for the protection of the person that is suspected or accused for committing grave crime.²⁷

As seen from these, the bases are in connection with outweighing interests coming from the principles of the Recommendation. The main body implementing the process of disclosure is the court, as stated by article 11 of the Law on Mass Media of the Republic of Azerbaijan.

In Azerbaijani legislation, another legislative act named as 'The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Freedom of Information adopted on June 19 1998, speaks about the information that is with limited access in the Article 10.²⁸

Analysing some cases of the ECtHR, it can be concluded that mainly article 10 of the Convention is deemed to have been violated, but further article 5 (right to liberty and security)²⁹ and article 8 (right to respect private life)³⁰ have also been violated when journalists have been denied their right of not disclosing their source of information.³¹

Azerbaijan became a member of the European Council from January 25 2001, the Convention has been ratified by the Milli Majlis of Azerbaijan Republic on December 25 2005. Azerbaijani citizens have been entitled to apply to the European Court of Human Rights since April 15 2002.³² Azerbaijan considers the importance of co-operation with the European Court of Human Rights and implementing cases in practice. As a country developing to democracy, the fundamental principles should be regarded, as stated in the Explanatory Memorandum of the Recommendation too; the chilling effect of the disclosure of a source by a journalist will impede this role of the media. Hence, national courts and authorities shall pay particular regard to the importance of the right of journalists not to disclose their sources.

The practice helps to make reforms in this sphere and gives rise to the application in the national level, so the approach of the Court in relation to ensuring the right of journalists not to disclose their sources is respected. In absence of any vital interests for individual or state interests, this right should be highly protected by the officials and other citizens under Azerbaijani laws; otherwise, it will be a threat to the protection of democratic values and internal policy of the state. So the authority is expected to be in line with the legal requirements, which mainly indicates the compliance with principles. Similar to the alike processes, the need of disclosure requires the court to define the matter through the application of proportionality principle. Whether the interest is more important and less intrusive to apply in comparison to the non-

²⁷ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 11.

²⁸ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Freedom of Information, article 7.

²⁹ ECHR, article 5.

³⁰ ECHR, article 7.

³¹ http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/FS_Journalistic_sources_ENG.pdf

³² <http://www.judicialcouncil.gov.az/Meqaleler/5.pdf>

disclosure of the journalistic sources. There are provisions applicable here concerned in the Law on Mass Media of the Republic of Azerbaijan about responsibility. Article 59 of the above-mentioned law is named as responsibility for violating the freedom of mass media and journalistic rights. Here, the provision together with other grounds tells that; any interference of the citizens, state bodies, municipalities, administrations, entities and organizations, political parties, and also public associations or officials to the legal activity of the founders, publishers, editorial offices (accountable editors), distributors and journalists of mass media, including: enforcing the journalist to disseminate information or refusing printing the information (broadcasting), can cause civil, administrative, criminal or other responsibility in compliance with the legislation of the Republic of Azerbaijan.³³

The Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan considers obstructing legal professional activity of journalists as a criminal act, in Article 163:

–obstructing legal professional activity of journalists, i.e. compelling them to disseminate any information or refusing from disseminating any information with using violence or threat of violence- is punished by fine in the amount of one hundred to five hundred manats or reclamation work for one year;

–if the same deeds are committed by authorized person using official position – it is punished with depriving to hold certain position or engage in certain activities up to three years, or reclamation work up to two years or imprisonment up to one year without deprivation.³⁴

Procedural regulations of the alternative measures and application stages are not strictly guided by the procedural code, but the following articles of the code let us form some description on this issue. Criminal Procedural Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan among the reasons for initiating criminal case, mentions the information of the mass media about the committed or planned crimes in Article 206,³⁵ information held by the mass media concerning a crime committed or planned, which is deemed to constitute grounds for initiating criminal proceedings, shall be sent to the prosecuting authorities after its disclosure in the press or on radio or television. In the second part, there is a reference to Article 205³⁶ on the issue of order of sending the information to the criminal persecution bodies so; the documents confirming the commitment of the offence shall be attached to the information sent, the details about the source also should be mentioned. The next part of the article³⁷ states that, media officials who have published or sent to the authorities information about a crime committed or planned and authors of such information shall submit the documents in their possession confirming the information to the inquirer, the investigator, the prosecutor in charge of the procedural aspects of the investigation or the court.

³³ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 59.

³⁴ The Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 163.

³⁵ The Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 206.1.

³⁶ The Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 205.

³⁷ Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 206.3.

Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan in relation to the disclosure of the information further states in Article 222.3³⁸ that, information about the investigation may be disseminated by participants in the criminal proceedings and journalists only with the permission of the preliminary investigator, the investigator, the prosecutor in charge of the procedural aspects of the investigation or the court, where the disclosure is not counter to the interests of the investigation and does not violate the rights and legal interests of other participants in the criminal proceedings.

The attitude of the legislation is in line with the relation of international acts about the discussed problem. National authorities, together with principle 3 of the Recommendation, should respect the conditions of principle 5 concerning disclosures, as these provisions refer to the matters about the implementation on disclosing information identifying source.

Limits of non-disclosure is a necessary ground for the correct functioning of the principle. However, the process of applying is the most difficult stage, because of meeting before the political, state and legal thinking or interests. National legislation considers the issue in general and stands for the least intrusive measures. Provisions in relation to protection of journalistic sources and at the same time for limits of non-disclosure are concrete and demands being guided by the principal features of the law. Azerbaijani legislation, respecting the principles, states the issue and ensures the procedural stage to be guided by a balanced control.

6. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7, the following principles should be respected when the necessity of disclosure is stated: absence of reasonable alternative measures, outweighing legitimate interest (protection of human life, prevention of major crime, defence of a person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime). Under which criteria can the interest in the disclosure outweigh the interest in the non-disclosure?

Resembling the principles of Recommendation No R (2000) 7 and the conditions mentioned there, it is clear that journalists can be denied their right of not to disclose their source of information in certain cases. If the right is of a fundamental basis, then restrictions for them should be well-based too. The allowance considers special cases, namely clause b of Principle 3 of the Recommendation No R(2000) 7,³⁹ which states:

b. The disclosure of information identifying a source should not be deemed necessary unless it can be convincingly established that:

i. reasonable alternative measures to the disclosure do not exist or have been exhausted by the persons or public authorities that seek the disclosure, and ³⁸ Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 222.3.

³⁹ Recommendation No R(2000) 7, Principle 3 b.

- ii. the legitimate interest in the disclosure clearly outweighs the public interest in the non-disclosure, bearing in mind that:
- an overriding requirement of the need for disclosure is proved,
 - the circumstances are of a sufficiently vital and serious nature,
 - the necessity of the disclosure is identified as responding to a pressing social need, and
 - member States enjoy a certain margin of appreciation in assessing this need, but this margin goes hand in hand with the supervision by the European Court of Human Rights.

Briefly, the grounds arising from here are: absence of alternative measures, including their exhausting and the outweighing legitimate interest.

Firstly, if there is a necessity for disclosure, it could not be appropriate immediately asking or compelling journalist to disclose the source because of the mentioned principle. There is reference to both persons and authorities, as they are separately discussed as subjects in legislations.

A disclosure should only be justified if and after other means or sources have been unsuccessfully exhausted by the parties to a disclosure proceeding. Such measures may, for example, include an internal investigation in a case where secret internal information about an enterprise or administration was disseminated, the reinforcing of restrictions on access to certain secret information, general police investigations or the dissemination of contrasting information as a countermeasure. The parties to a disclosure proceeding should also exhaust other non-journalistic sources at first before demanding the disclosure of the source by the journalist.⁴⁰

Alternative sources who could be subject to an alternative investigation and enquiry may include, for example, employees, colleagues, contracting partners or business partners of the person requesting the disclosure. In States, which protect the confidentiality of sources as such, it might not be possible to demand information from alternative persons under domestic law. Other persons, however, who are linked to the work of a journalist and thereby acquire knowledge of the journalist's source, are protected by Principle 2 of this Recommendation. Therefore, the persons or public authorities seeking a disclosure should primarily search for and apply proportionate alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the protection of the right of journalists not to disclose their source. The existence of reasonable alternative measures for the protection of a legitimate interest excludes the necessity of disclosing the source by the journalist and the parties seeking the disclosure have to exhaust these alternatives at first.

It is worth mentioning the following part from Recommendation 1950 (2011)⁴¹ as it concerns the modern situation and other persons' participation:

⁴⁰ Explanatory memorandum to the Recommendation No R(2000) 7

⁴¹ Parliamentary Assembly Recommendation 1950 (2011)

In the same manner as the media landscape has changed through technological convergence, the professional profile of journalists has changed over the last decade. Modern media rely increasingly on mobile and Internet-based communication services. They use information and images originating from non-journalists to a larger extent. Non-journalists also publish their own or third party information and images on their own or third-party Internet media, accessible to a wide and often undefined audience. Under these circumstances, it is necessary to clarify the application of the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information.⁴²

The second ground considering legitimate interest requires a broader explanation. The principle states that, the legitimate interest in disclosure should clearly outweigh the public interest in the non-disclosure. What are the further cases? The right of non-disclosure sometimes pursues illegal purposes containing threats to the life or other legitimate interests of the individual, state etc. These circumstances clearly mean that, for providing legitimate interest in the disclosure the right of non-disclosure can be restricted.

Furthermore, the European Court of Human Rights has stressed that any restriction to the freedoms protected by Article 10, paragraph 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights must pursue a legitimate aim under Article 10, paragraph 2 of the Convention. Article 10, paragraph 2 of the Convention enumerates grounds for the restriction of freedom of expression, without establishing a hierarchy among them. Any restriction of the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying their source and of the public interest in the non-disclosure must be based on a legitimate interest from among these grounds. In this respect, Article 10, paragraph 2 has to be interpreted narrowly, in accordance with the established jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights. Therefore, the legitimacy of an interest has to be established by reference to those grounds which can possibly override the rights and interests in the protection of the confidentiality of journalists' sources of information.

The Recommendation affirms the use of a balancing test by the ECHR, because without perceiving the interests and comparing their importance for the sake of society it will be difficult, or impossible, to determine a just decision about disclosure or non-disclosure.

Given the importance of freedom of expression and freedom of the media for any democratic society and every individual, and taking into account the potentially chilling effect a source disclosure may have on the readiness of future sources to provide information to journalists, only exceptional cases where a vital personal or public interest is at stake might justify or be proportional to the disclosure of a source. Paragraph c, sub-paragraph ii refers to this proper use of discretion by the competent authorities and requires that (1) a legitimate interest should outweigh or override the public interest in the non-disclosure and be proven, (2) the vital and serious nature of the circumstances warrants such disclosure and (3) be identified as responding to a pressing social need by the competent authorities; (4) the assessment of the necessity of the disclosure under Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights is subject to supervision and review by the European Court of Human Rights.

⁴² <http://assembly.coe.int/nw/xml/XRef/Xref-XML2HTML-en.asp?fileid=17943&lang=en>

Consequently, the protection of human life, prevention of major crime, defence of a person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime are the exact circumstances making legitimate interest in disclosure outweighing. It is also mentioned in national legislation, as stated in Article 11 of the Law on Mass Media of Azerbaijan Republic in the same way;⁴³

In the following circumstances the editor or journalist can be obliged by the court to disclose the source by the court.

- 1) for protection of human life;
- 2) for the purpose of preventing grave crime
- 3) for the protection of the person that is suspected or accused for committing grave crime.

Protection of human life is of the paramount importance for a state that has accepted fundamental principles, thus if the non-disclosure is carrying a threat to a human life, then it should be denied to be kept so.

Grave crimes are distributed in the national legislations and as they are violating the legal interests more, it would not be justified not to disclose any information containing this kind of details.

A grave crime shall be deliberate and careless actions for committing of which maximal punishment provided by the present Code shall not exceed twelve years of imprisonment, as provided by the Article 15.4 of the Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan.⁴⁴ So, the public danger is considered to be enough for the limitation. The Law on Mass Media speaks about grave crimes in different ways: for preventing their commitment and for protecting the person suspected or accused to commit those crimes, which means the category, will be applicable in two different situations.

So that, the necessity can make disclosure required in spite of the journalistic rights in certain reasonable cases discussed above. The application used is always expected to be just in the middle of the contradictory sides. Measures chosen for particular case must be analysed considering a balance between interests. That is what should be done in case of problems that makes interest of disclosure more necessary than the interest of non-disclosure. The conditions included to the principles are corresponded in Azerbaijani legislation and their justification process stands on the shoulders of the authorities. More proper application by the national law enforcement bodies would be the one stepping to the deep level of the issue and taking the outweighing interest over the other one.

⁴³ Law on Mass Media of the Republic of Azerbaijan, Article 11

⁴⁴ Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 15.4.

7. In the light of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, how do national courts apply the respective laws with regard to the right to protect sources?

In particular, how do they balance the different interests at stake? Unfortunately, there has been no cases relating to the protection of journalistic sources in the judicial practice of the Republic of Azerbaijan at this point in time.

8. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information? Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

As we have identified under the extent of above questions, journalists have the right to get, disseminate information and not to disclose to anyone the source of that information. This provision has been highlighted in respective laws of the Republic of Azerbaijan. In accordance with Article 50 of the Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan,⁴⁵ everyone is entitled to look for, obtain, transmit, develop and distribute any information by any legal way. However, there are some exceptional cases when identifying the source of information is of a paramount importance. The legislation of the Republic of Azerbaijan strictly, and precisely, defines these exceptional cases in order not to give a raise to particular problems. Under the respective laws of AR, there have been enshrined certain criteria of using surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, precisely some investigative actions in order to obtain the source of journalist information.

Article 1 of the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media provides us with certain definitions. The freedom of mass information is based on granting to citizens by the state of the right on seeking, getting, preparing, transmission, production and dissemination of information in a reliable way. Establishing of mass media means, possession, use and control over them, seeking, getting, preparing, transmission, production and dissemination of the mass information cannot be restricted, except for cases, determined by the legislation of the Republic of Azerbaijan on mass media.⁴⁶

Article 8 of the same law defines that the mass media have the right to gain the quick and authentic items of information about economical, political, public and social situation in society, activity of state organs, municipalities, enterprises, plants and organisations, public associations, ⁴⁵ The Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 50.

⁴⁶ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 1.

political parties and officials. This right can not be restricted, except for cases indicated in the legislation of the Azerbaijan Republic.⁴⁷ Article 10 establishes in itself the inadmissibility of abuse by mass media as using mass information with the purposes of distribution of secrets guarded by the legislation of the Azerbaijan Republic, violent overthrow of an existing constitutional state formation, attempt on the integrity of the state, propagation of war, violence and cruelty, national, racial, social hate or intolerance, humiliating honour and a dignity of the citizens, pornographic materials, slander or undertaking of other unlawful operating is not enabled.⁴⁸

Article 11⁴⁹ of the same law establishes some circumstances in which the journalist can be forced by the courts to disclose the source of obtained information to them. These circumstances are following:

- for the protection of human life;
- with the purpose to prevent heavy crime;
- to protect the person accused or suspected in conducting heavy crime.

Main provisions have been defined in The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on the Struggle against Terrorism and The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Operational Search Activities.

Article 1 of the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Operational Search Activities enshrines the definition of this kind of activity.⁵⁰ According to that article, operational-search activity shall be implemented for the purpose of protection of life, health, rights and freedoms of human, interests of legal persons, state and military secrets, as well as the national security from criminal encroachments.

Investigative actions made against journalists in order to get the source of their information are in the scope of operational search activities. In the above-mentioned law, there have been indicated criteria and purposes of using these investigative actions.

Operational search activity in order to be implemented against journalists to get the source of their information has to pursue following objectives:

- 1) Prevention of crimes committed and crimes pending preparation;
- 2) Detection of committed crimes;
- 3) Identification of persons, who prepared, committed or are pending commission of crimes;
- 4) Search of persons concealing themselves from court, investigation and inquiry authority, and evading from execution of punishment, as well as missing persons;
- 5) Identification of unknown human bodies.⁵¹

It is prohibited to violate human and civic rights and freedoms envisaged in the Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan and interests of legal entities. The temporary restriction of human ⁴⁷ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 8.

⁴⁸ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 10.

⁴⁹ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 11.

⁵⁰ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Operational Search Activities, article 1.

⁵¹ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Operational Search Activities, article 2.

and civic rights and freedoms in the course of implementation of operational-search activity is allowed only in accordance with the provision of this ACT in case of prevention and disclosure of crimes, search of those secreting from court, investigation and investigating authorities, escaping sentencing and missing.⁵²

Agents of the operational-search activity shall have the following responsibilities during the course of investigative activities against journalists to obtain the source of their information:

1) to implement all the actions within the scope of own authorities to ensure the protection of human and civil rights and responsibilities, legitimate interests of private and legal persons, public and state security

2) to execute decisions of judicial and investigation authorities pertaining to the implementation of the operational search measures or written instructions within the framework of the criminal case, as well as, to carry out decisions of the authorised Agents of the Operational-Search Activity;

3) to provide information obtained as a result of the operational-search activity, without disclosure of its source and modes of obtaining it, to the person conducting inquiry or investigation or to the court;

4) to respond to the requests by the foreign law-enforcement and appropriate international organisations within the framework of the international treaties, to which the Republic of Azerbaijan is party to;

5) to undertake all necessary measures in order to bring the information about the fact which is relevant to the territorial jurisdiction of another Agent of the Operational-Search Activity on the territory of the Republic of Azerbaijan and render the necessary assistance;

6) to undertake appropriate actions to ensure conspiracy in the course of implementation of operational-search activity;

7) to check the persons who have access to confidential information or matters requiring special permission due to the position that s/he occupies;

8) to protect own staff and their close relatives, persons facilitating the operational-search activity and their close relatives, as well as the participants of the criminal process and their close relatives and their property from illegal encroachments;

9) to ensure the confidentiality and anonymity of cooperation with any person;

10) to maintain the register of events, facts, objects and information sources.⁵³

Operational search activities have to be grounded and based on the specified rules in legislation. The grounds for implementing operational-search measures precisely some investigative actions against journalists are as follows:

1) decisions of a court (judge);

2) decisions of investigation authorities;

3) decisions of the authorised Agents of Operational-Search Activity.

The decisions of courts (judges), investigation authorities or authorised Agents of Operational-Search Activity shall be accepted only in following cases:

⁵² The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Operational Search Activities, article 4, part II.

⁵³ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Operational Search Activities, article 6.

- 1) within the framework of existing of criminal case;
- 2) repealed by the ACT of the Republic of Azerbaijan;
- 3) in case of obtaining reliable information , which is received from unbiased and known source, to the effect that a particular person is preparing, committing or have committed a crime even without the framework of the existing criminal case;
- 4) in case of event infringing the national security and its defense capacity or prevention of this event;
- 5) in case of a person concealing himself from court, investigation or inquiry, evading execution of punishment or missing person;
- 6) in case of identification of unknown human body.⁵⁴

Conditions in order to implement these investigative actions have been defined in article 13⁵⁵ as follows:

I. Operational-search measures in respect of confidentiality of information protected by legislation and transmitted by correspondence, telephone, post-telegraph and other means of communication and privacy of premises shall be allowed if there are sufficient grounds to believe that the measures carried out with a purpose of collecting information on the persons preparing for crime, attempting the commission of crime, committing crime, hiding themselves from court, investigation and inquiry bodies, evading punishment, as well as, of tracing stolen goods, of preventing concealment and destruction of evidence will produce information to serve as evidence in criminal proceedings and location of people at large.

II. Persons commissioned by the agents of the Operational Search Activity to carry out operational-search measures in respect of tapping and recording of telephone and other communication, extracting information from channels of technical communication and other technical means, screening of correspondence and searching of premises, shall possess warrant authorizing the measures and the identification documents.

III. The technical means, psychotropic, chemical and other substances capable of damaging human health and environment shall be banned from usage in the course of implementation of operational-search measures with the purpose of obtaining information about the person who is believed to have committed a crime or to be preparing a crime, as well as his/her connections.

IV. In the course of implementation of the operational-search measures, persons commissioned by the Agents of the Operational Search Activity shall be bound to adhere to the principle of proportionality of these measures to the degree of the danger posed by the targeted criminal encroachments to the interests of the state and public in terms of potential damage to be caused.

Chiefs of the Agents of the Operational-Search Activity shall supervise of compliance with legislation in the course of organising and implementing of the Operational-Search Activity and shall be held personally for defaults.⁵⁶

⁵⁴ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Operational Search Activities, article 11, part IV.

⁵⁵ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Operational Search Activities, article 13.

⁵⁶ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Operational Search Activities, article 19.

The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on the Struggle against Terrorism defines main rules of using anti-terrorism laws in order to get the source of journalistic source.

First of all, we would like to introduce the concept of terrorism used in this law. In accordance with the Article 1⁵⁷ of this Law, terrorism is defined as committing of explosions, fires and other actions threatening the lives of people, damaging their health, causing significant property damage or occurrence of other hazardous consequences to public, with the purpose of destruction of public security, spread of panic among population or influencing the decisions of state authorities or international entities, as well as threat of committing of such actions for the same purposes.

The struggle against terrorism in the Azerbaijan Republic is based on following principles: 1) provision of legality; 2) inevitability of punishment stipulated under the legislation of the Azerbaijan Republic for commitment of terrorist activity; 3) coordination of public and concealed methods of struggle against terrorist; 4) combined use of legal, political, socio-economic and organisational-preventive measures; 5) prioritised protection of rights of persons endangered by terrorist activity; 6) independence in control of resources attracted to operations against terrorism; 7) minimum disclosure of staff involved in operations against terrorism, including methods and tactics used for these purposes.⁵⁸

The law of Azerbaijan on the freedom of information defines the main conceptions about the information, its source and restricted information. In accordance with this law, documents and other carriers reflecting information in order provided for in the legislation, mass media information and public speeches shall be considered as information sources.⁵⁹

Information with limited access includes state, professional (lawyer, notary, and doctor), service, bank, commercial, investigation and court secrets, information on personal and family life of persons and terrorist acts. Information with limited access includes information on environment in cases determined with the relevant legislation. Relations concerning state, professional (lawyer, notary, doctor), service, bank, commercial, investigation and court secrets, information on personal and family life of persons, terrorist acts are regulated by the relevant legislation.

Finally, as we have provided in the first part of the question, the Republic of Azerbaijan has enacted numerous laws in the area of anti-terrorism, mass media and operational-search activities which are enough accessible to the public. All of the aspects including principles, objectives, grounds, basis have been clearly enshrined in these laws to prevent any particular problems including legal uncertainty in this respect.

⁵⁷ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on the Struggle against Terrorism, article 1.

⁵⁸ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on the Struggle against Terrorism, article 4.

⁵⁹ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Freedom of Information, article 7.

9. Can journalists rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance?

Before discussing the main issue, we may run over the basis legislative acts concerning the freedom of expression. One of the most important provisions on this right is article 10 of European Convention on Human Rights,⁶⁰ which declares that everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.

Another international instrument regulating this fundamental freedom is the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR). Article 19⁶¹ is similar to article 10 of European Convention on Human Rights, and it claims that everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

As to the national level, article 47 of the Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan under the title of freedom of thought and speech, establishes that.⁶²

- I. Everyone has the right to freedom of thought and speech.
- II. Nobody shall be forced to express his thoughts and convictions or to deny them.
- III. Agitation and propaganda provoking racial, national, religious, social discord and hostility are prohibited.

Freedom of expression maintains democracy in society. In other words, the freedom of the press affords the public one of the best means of discovering and forming an opinion of ideas and attitudes. In particular, it gives politicians the opportunity to reflect and comment on the pre-occupations of public opinion; it thus enables everyone to participate in the free political debate, which is at the very core of the concept of a democratic society, as to the Castells v. Spain case, European Court of Human Rights.⁶³

As to whether journalists can rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance, the definitions must first be provided. Merriam Webster Dictionary⁶⁴ says that, a journalist is a person engaged in journalism especially: a writer or editor for a news and medium, a writer who aims at a mass audience. Anonymity is merely the fact of not being identified and, in this sense, it is part of the ordinary experience of most people on a daily basis, e.g. walking in a crowd or standing in a queue of strangers. In this way, an activity can be anonymous even though it is also public. Anonymity is fundamental for the full exercise of ⁶⁰ European Convention on Human Rights, article 10.

⁶¹ The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR), article 19.

⁶² The Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 47.

⁶³ Castells v. Spain case, European Court of Human Rights.

⁶⁴ Merriam Webster Dictionary.

the right to freedom of expression, as enshrined in Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. The spread of the internet and new technologies has created new possibilities for communication and free expression and opinion, including enabling anonymity. Encryption has been identified as the process of encoding or ‘scrambling’ the content of any data or voice communication with an algorithm and a randomly selected variable associated with the algorithm, known as a ‘key’. Encryption is required to preserve confidentiality in online communications. APC’s Internet Rights Charter⁶⁵ established in 2001 the right to use encryption: “People communicating on the internet must have the right to use tools which encode messages to ensure secure, private and anonymous communication.” It also states that, people should be able to communicate free of the threat of surveillance and interception. The LEAP Encryption Access Project⁶⁶ coined the phrase “right to whisper”. They say, "Like free speech, the right to whisper is a necessary precondition for a free society. Without it, civil society languishes and political freedoms are curtailed. As the importance of digital communication for civic participation increases, so too does the importance of the ability to digitally whisper.”

Anonymity and encryption also can be used as tools of hate speech and sexual violence. For example,⁶⁷ Berenice, a woman from Mexico,⁶⁸ had her private photos and videos non-consensually uploaded on pornography websites. She had no idea who the culprit was, but suspected that someone had hacked her email. Afraid that people might say demeaning things about her, Berenice contacted the cyber crime police through Facebook. However, when she did not get a favorable response, she took the matter into her own hands. She capitalised on the anonymity offered by the internet as a means to safely and publicly denounce the situation. She also researched to find out how such a violation could have taken place, and what she could do to protect herself. She related, “once I found out about the video, I changed my passwords and I changed the names of my accounts. I don’t use last names any more either.” She also learned how to do reverse-image searches and tried to monitor where her pictures and the video were being uploaded, and then ask for them to be taken down.

As for surveillance, a Dictionary of Law⁶⁹ establishes it as keeping watch on a suspect. Merriam Webster⁷⁰ claims: surveillance is the act of carefully watching someone or something especially in order to prevent or detect a crime. These are more criminal definitions, but in real life journalists may be surveyed not for criminal cases, but also ‘democratic’ cases.

Now that the definitions are clarified, we must determine the appropriate regulation in domestic law. Azerbaijani legislation prohibits for journalists to unfold a name of source if the person does ⁶⁵ APC Internet Rights Charter, Theme 5.

⁶⁶ <https://leap.se/en/about-us/vision>

⁶⁷ <http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Issues/Opinion/Communications/AssociationForProgressiveCommunication.pdf>

⁶⁸ http://www.genderit.org/sites/default/upload/case_studies_mex3_0.pdf

⁶⁹ A Dictionary of Law (7 ed.). Jonathan Law and Elizabeth A. Martin. Oxford University Press

⁷⁰ Merriam Webster Dictionary.

not want to. Regarding to it, article 11 of the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media⁷¹ states that Media editorship and journalist are not allowed to unfold a person giving information with the condition of his identity not to be revealed. Media editorship and journalist who is responsible for publication of information can't be enforced to unfold his source of information, with an exception if it is in a trial proceedings and stated by law. In this case media editor or journalist is responsible for the anonym description, article, image or caricature.

Editors or journalists in the following cases shall be forced by the court to disclose their source of information:

- 1) for the protection of human life;
- 2) with the purpose to prevent the commission of a grave crime;
- 3) for the protection of the person accused or suspected in committing a grave crime.

This statement shows that, in some circumstances journalists can hide themselves, as if they got information from the person that does not want himself to be unfold. Anyway, if this information involves any felony, then journalist will be responsible as an owner of the information. There is also the similar provision in the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Copyright and Related Rights, which confirms this statement. So, article 8.3⁷² of it states that in the case of publication of works anonymous or with encryption (with exception of encryption confirming the personality of the author) the publisher, if there is no other prove, is legally considered as an author's representative and legally represents author's rights and can realize his authorities.

In our legislation, no concrete provisions regarding journalists' anonymity and encryption exist. However, an article from the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Telecommunication⁷³ would be useful to refer to in our case. Article 38 named Provision of the Telecommunication Anonymity states that, the limitation of the information transmitted by the telecommunication means can be allowed only in the circumstances determined by law. These circumstances mainly are connected to criminal offences, territorial integrity, state secret etc.

Thus, journalists in Azerbaijan can rely on anonymity and encryption, but in a certain frame. They can use their positive rights and freedoms without harming others' rights. This regulation in general can be found in different laws of the Republic of Azerbaijan, however, the universal regulation still to be developed by the Milli Majlis of the Republic of Azerbaijan – legislative branch of government. For sure in the first place, the development has to concern the respective reforms in mass media law.

⁷¹ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 11.

⁷² The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Copyright and Related Rights, Art 8.3.

⁷³ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Telecommunication, article 38.

10. Are Whistle-Blowers Explicitly Protected under Law Protecting Journalistic Sources? Is There Another Practice Protecting Whistle-Blowers? Is the Legislation Prohibiting Authorities and Companies from Identifying Whistle-blowers?

The freedom of expression, which can be defined as the freedom to hold opinions, freedom to impart information, freedom to receive information and ideas. (Case Case of TASZ v. Hungary,⁷⁴ Nilgün Halloran Case, 2012/1184⁷⁵) allows people to express their opinion, creates the respect for fundamental human rights, improves national security by making the political system more democratic and the government more efficient, which leads to a better decision-making.

The State has both positive and negative obligations in the scope of freedom of expression and freedom of media. Public authorities should not ban individuals from expressing and disseminating their thoughts unless they have to in the scope of negative obligations; they should take necessary measures for real and effective protection of freedom of expression in the scope of positive obligations.

For providing the necessary answer, all the terms given for discussion must be defined. As to the Cambridge Dictionary,⁷⁶ a whistle-blower is a person who tells someone in authority about something illegal that is happening, especially in a government department or a company. Merriam-Webster⁷⁷ provides that a whistle-blower is one who reveals something covert or who informs against another.

Surely, however, the most clear definitions regarding the term were given in the Recommendation CM/Rec(2014)7 of the Committee of Ministers to member States on the protection of whistle-blowers⁷⁸, where:

- a. “whistle-blower” means any person who reports or discloses information on a threat or harm to the public interest in the context of their work-based relationship, whether it be in the public or private sector;
- b. “public interest report or disclosure” means the reporting or disclosing of information on acts and omissions that represent a threat or harm to the public interest;
- c. “report” means reporting, either internally within an organisation or enterprise, or to an outside authority;
- d. “disclosure” means making information public.

⁷⁴ Társaság a Szabadságjogokért v. Hungary.

⁷⁵ Nilgün Halloran Case, 2012/1184.

⁷⁶ Cambridge Dictionary.

⁷⁷ Merriam-Webster Dictionary.

⁷⁸ Recommendation CM/Rec(2014)7 of the Committee of Ministers to member States on the protection of whistle-blowers.

As far as we can see, similar terms are regulated by the Article 50 of the Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan,⁷⁹ titled as the Freedom of Information:

I. Everyone is free to legally look for, acquire, transfer, prepare and distribute any information in a legal way.

II. Freedom of mass media is guaranteed. State censorship in mass media, including press is prohibited.

III. Everyone's right to refute or react to the information published in the media and violating his or her rights or damaging his or her reputation is guaranteed.

Article 2 on the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Getting Information declares that the acquisition of information in the Republic of Azerbaijan is free.⁸⁰

Article 8 on the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media⁸¹ determines that the media has the right to get operative and honest information about the action of state organisations, municipals, institution, enterprise and organisations, public unions, political parties, officials, and that this right cannot be restricted in any case other than prescribed by the legislation of the Republic of Azerbaijan.

Article 5 of The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Trade Secret⁸² determines several rights for the trade secret owner, which include the right to determine, change and cancel the regime of trade secret; the right to use, give to other persons if it is based on contract and apply the other methods of involving to civil circulation of trade secret; the right to have a defend from the action offended or may offend the regime of trade secret; the right to demand a compensation of the harm from the persons, who used the trade secret for their interests, under judiciary.

However, in Azerbaijani legislation, there is no concrete provision about whistle-blowers, and the most appropriate definition determined in our law is the "source of information". As a temporary alternate regarding to whistle-blowers, we refer to the provisions of our law protecting the "source of information". We can safely assume that, in Azerbaijani legislation this issue is regulated by these norms. As it was determined by the discussions to the previous questions, legislation prohibits authorities and companies from identifying the source of information. Furthermore, it determines liability for perpetrator motions against the source of information. However, surely, there exists a limit. If a whistle-blower's action includes criminal motive, then the punished side will be the whistle-blower. This means that in certain cases, the source of information is liable for spreading the confidential information and may be considered as a perpetrator. Authorities and companies can identify them if they commit a misdemeanor or a felony, as in the Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan⁸³ there are some provisions which demand so. As an example, we may refer to defamation and humiliation, which are determined as the criminal offences under the Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan in the articles 147 and 148 respectively.

⁷⁹ The Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan, article 50.

⁸⁰ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Getting Information, article 2.

⁸¹ The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media, article 8.

⁸² The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Trade Secret, article 5.

⁸³ The Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan, articles 147, 148.

Under the Country Report of Azerbaijan under European Neighbourhood Policy we can partly get answers to the main questions of the issue.⁸⁴ To what extent are there legal provisions in place to protect whistle-blowers in the public sector? Protection of whistle-blowers is envisioned in the draft law on Conflict of Interest, the adoption of which has been delayed, while existing legislation is rather inconsistent on the issue. Although a public official shall be subject to criminal liability for failure to report serious or especially grave crimes, and few corruption related offences fall under this category, there is no legal protection for those who do. In other words, if officials do not report grave incidents they may be punished, and in case of lighter offences they will get away with it, except for police officers who are required to report all kinds of law violations. But if they do, the law will not protect them unless a criminal case is opened, and then the Law on State Protection of Participants of the Criminal Process steps in. Hence, as of now there is really no motivation for officials to do so. Ordinary citizens do not have any reporting obligations and receive some protection under the Criminal Code – i.e. they are freed from criminal responsibility for paying a bribe if they reported it before the information became known to law enforcement bodies, or if they have been exposed to a threat on the part of an official. To what extent are whistle-blowers in the public sector protected in practice? Protection of whistle-blowers in practice is non-existent, which is supported by other external evaluations.⁸⁵ Statistics are not available on the reporting of corruption-related offences. There are no specific systems to receive signals of suspicions of corruption with most public agencies (exceptions being the Ministries of Tax and Education). However, many government bodies have online facilities and hotlines through which people, including officials, can report anything, including corruption suspicions. At any rate, the efficiency of these tools is minimal, as the law prohibits reviewing anonymous reports and few people, least of all civil servants, would dare to reveal their identity when reporting corruption suspicions. The gap in the official whistle-blower mechanisms has partly been filled by civil society organizations such as TI Azerbaijan's Corruption Hotline. However, it should be noted that even civil society does not receive many reports other than complaints from victims of corruption themselves, as the reporting of somebody else's misdoings is contrary to national culture.

Monitoring Report of Azerbaijan on Third Round Monitoring under the Organisation for Economic Co-Operation and Development also shows that,⁸⁶ no steps were taken to introduce a legal obligation to report corruption or regulation on protection of whistle-blowers. A number of significant anti-corruption laws have not been adopted for a long time, for example, legislation on conflict of interest prevention or whistle-blowers protection.

Summing these all up, we come to a certain conclusion, which is that despite the fact, that many foreign countries regulate the definition of whistle-blowers under their legislation, in domestic legislation this issue remains open because of lack of concrete provisions in national law. Our legislation system still uses analogy with regards to the situations concerning by their nature whistle-blowers and we need some theoretical improvement on this exact part of information and media law.

⁸⁴European Neighborhood Policy, Country Report Azerbaijan, March 2005

⁸⁵ Source: Public Anti-corruption Initiatives available at <http://www.business-anti-corruption.com/country-profiles/europe-central-asia/azerbaijan/initiatives/public-anti-corruption-initiatives/>

⁸⁶ www.oecd.org/corruption/acn/AZERBAIJANThirdRoundMonitoringReportENG.pdf

11. Conclusion

According to the article 11 of the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media a journalist cannot be forced to disclose the source of information published or broadcasted via mass media in connection with the case under investigation or at the court proceedings, except in cases specified by law. In this case, the responsibility for the author's non-disclosed description, article, picture or caricature lies on the shoulders of a contributing editor responsible for release or a journalist. To disclose the source of information in our law does not only comprises in itself the disclosure of the name of a person who provided a journalist with information, but also any other information allowing to identify the person, including any personal information about the person who gave information (age, work place, place of residence, etc.), his appearance, voice, information about getting the information by a journalist (where, when, how it was received, etc.), the non spread part of the provided information, personal information in connection with the journalist's professional activities (his previous work, previous investigations, etc.). According to article 189 of Code of Administrative Offences of the Republic of Azerbaijan, abuse of freedom of mass media and journalist rights on behalf of editorial staff (responsible editor) of mass media and journalists (authors) i.e.: promulgation of information, prohibited to disclosure by legislation; non-fulfilment of control on preparation of materials, published in printing edition in accordance with requirements of legislation; promulgation of information without indication of its source, except occasions envisaged by legislation; production or distribution of production of mass media without reference data or deliberate distortion of reference data entails imposition of penalty on natural persons in amount of 20-25, official persons - 60-80, legal persons - 200-250 manats. This is an obvious proof of the fact, that keeping the source of information in confidentiality plays an important role for other persons to give information freely and confidently and for determining the problems and events taking place in society and in the political arena. In our legislation, there does not exist a single systemized normative act which would regulate the right of media actors to keep their information sources confidential. Thus, for the formation of free media our state is in the need of development of legislation in this exact field. Information not being state secret but needed to be kept in secrecy in order to protect legal interests of citizens, institutions, enterprises and organisations shall be confidential one. Gathering, processing, use and dissemination of the confidential information shall only be allowed in cases established by legislation of Azerbaijan Republic. As Azerbaijan is a post-soviet country, the law was concrete on state censorship in Soviet period. In August 6 1998, the state censorship over mass media was prohibited by the Order of the President Heydar Aliyev. From this period the free environment is observed in the media sphere. As the Constitution of Azerbaijan Republic is the supreme document in hierarchy, the national laws also indicated the principle then. The legislation considers only vital public or individual interests at stake when the necessity is allowed for disclosure. Law of Azerbaijan on the freedom of information defines main conceptions about the information, its source and restricted information. In accordance with this law, documents and other carriers reflecting information in order provided for in the legislation, mass media information and public speeches shall be considered as information sources.

Information with limited access includes state, professional (lawyer, notary, and doctor), service, bank, commercial, investigation and court secrets, information on personal and family life of persons and terrorist acts. Information with limited access includes information on environment in cases determined with the relevant legislation. Relations arisen concerning state, professional (lawyer, notary, doctor), service, bank, commercial, investigation and court secrets, information on personal and family life of persons, terrorist acts are regulated by the relevant legislation. Azerbaijan Republic has enacted plenty of laws in anti-terrorism laws, mass media and operational-search activities which are enough accessible to the public. All of the aspects including principles, objectives, grounds, basis have been clearly enshrined in these laws to prevent any particular problems including legal uncertainty in this respect. In our legislation there do not exist concrete provisions regarding journalists' anonymity and encryption. However, an article from the Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Telecommunication would be useful to refer to in our case. Article 38 named Provision of the Telecommunication Anonymity states that, the limitation of the information transmitted by the telecommunication means can be allowed only in the circumstances determined by law. These circumstances mainly are connected to criminal offences, territorial integrity, state secret etc.

Thus, journalists in Azerbaijan can rely on anonymity and encryption, but in a certain frame. They can use their positive rights and freedoms without harming others' rights. This regulation in general can be found in different laws of the Republic of Azerbaijan, however, the universal regulation still to be developed by the Milli Majlis of the Republic of Azerbaijan – legislative branch of government. For sure in the first place, the development has to concern the respective reforms in mass media law. Foreign countries regulate the definition of whistle-blowers under their legislation, in domestic legislation this issue remains open because of lack of concrete provisions in national law. Our legislation system still uses analogy with regards to the situations concerning by their nature whistle-blowers and we need some theoretical improvement on this exact part of information and media law.

12. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

12.1. Legislation

- The Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan
- The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media
- The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Freedom of Information
- European Convention on Human Rights
- The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Information, Informatization and Protection of Information
- The Code of Professional Ethics of a journalist of the Republic of Azerbaijan
- Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan
- Code of Administrative Offences of the Republic of Azerbaijan
- Civil Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan
- Professional Code of Conduct of Azerbaijani Journalists
- The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Operational Search Activities
- The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on the Struggle against Terrorism
- The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR)
- Parliamentary Assembly Recommendation 1950 (2011)
- The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Copyright and Related Rights
- The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Telecommunication
- The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Trade Secret

12.2. Books and articles

- APC Internet Rights Charter
- Merriam Webster Dictionary
- A Dictionary of Law (7 ed.). Jonathan Law and Elizabeth A. Martin. Oxford University Press
- Társaság a Szabadságjogokért v. Hungary.
- Nilgün Halloran Case, 2012/1184.
- Cambridge Dictionary.
- Recommendation CM/Rec(2014)7 of the Committee of Ministers to member States on the protection of whistle-blowers.
- Castells v. Spain case, European Court of Human Rights.
- Explanatory memorandum to the Recommendation No R(2000) 7
- European Neighborhood Policy, Country Report Azerbaijan, March 2005

12.3. Internet sources

- http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/FS_Journalistic_sources_ENG.pdf
- <http://www.judicialcouncil.gov.az/Meqaleler/5.pdf>
- <http://assembly.coe.int/nw/xml/XRef/Xref-XML2HTML>
- <https://leap.se/en/about-us/vision>
- <http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Issues/Opinion/Communications/AssociationForProgressiveCommunication.pdf>
- http://www.genderit.org/sites/default/upload/case_studies_mex3_0.pdf
- www.oecd.org/corruption/acn/AZERBAIJANThirdRoundMonitoringReportENG.pdf
- Public Anti-corruption Initiatives available at <http://www.business-anti-corruption.com/country-profiles/europe-central-asia/azerbaijan/initiatives/public-anti-corruption-initiative>

13. Table of Provisions

Provisions in native language	Corresponding translation
1) Məlumat azadlığı haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının Qanunu Maddə 7. Məlumat mənbələri Qanunvericilikdə nəzərdə tutulmuş qaydada məlumatları əks etdirən sənədlər və başqa daşıyıcılar, kütləvi informasiya vasitələrinin məlumatları, açıq çıxışlar məlumat mənbələri hesab edirlər.	1) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Freedom of Information Article 7. The sources of information Documents and other carriers reflecting information in order provided for in the legislation, mass media information and public speeches are considered to be the sources of information.
2) Kütləvi informasiya vasitələri haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu Maddə 11. İnformasiyanın yayılmasına, informasiya mənbəyinin açıqlanmasına yol verilməyən xüsusi hallar Kütləvi informasiya vasitəsi redaksiyasının və ya jurnalistin: 1) şəxsin gizli saxlanmaq şərt ilə verdiyi məlumatı yayılan xəbər və materiallarda açıqlamasına; 2) adının bildirilməməsi şərt ilə məlumat vermiş şəxsin kimliyini göstərməsinə; 3) təhqiqatçının, müstəntiqin, ibtidai araşdırmaya prosessual rəhbərliyi həyata	2) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media Article 11. Special cases, prohibiting the dissemination of information and the disclosure of the source of information Media editorship and journalist are not allowed to disseminate information: 1) about person giving latent information, if person doesn't want his name to be unfold; 2) about person who has given information with condition his name not to be declared; 3) about preliminary investigation and interrogation without permission of

keçirən prokurorun və ya məhkəmənin icazəsi olmadan ibtidai istintaq və təhqiqat məlumatlarını yaymasına; 4) cinayət etməkdə təqsirləndirilən yetkinlik yaşına çatmayanların və ya qanuni nümayəndələrinin razılığı olmadan onların şəxsiyyəti barədə hər hansı məlumatı yaymasına yol verilmir. Kütləvi informasiya vasitəsinin məlumatın dərc olunmasına (efirə verilməsinə) məsul redaktoru və (və ya) jurnalist istintaqda yaxud məhkəmə icraatında olan işlə əlaqədar qanunla müəyyən edilmiş hallardan başqa, informasiya mənbəyini açıqlamağa məcbur edilə bilməz. Bu halda müəllif açıqlanmayan təsvirə, məqaləyə, şəkilə və ya karikaturaya görə məsuliyyət buraxılışa məsul redaktorun yaxud jurnalistin üzərinə düşür. Redaktor və ya jurnalist aşağıdakı hallarda məhkəmə tərəfindən öz mənbəyini açıqlamağa məcbur edilə bilər: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1) insan həyatının müdafiəsi üçün;2) ağır cinayətin qarşısını almaq məqsədi ilə;3) ağır cinayət törətməkdə ittiham olunan yaxud təqsirli bilinən şəxsin müdafiəsi üçün. Bu maddənin birinci hissəsinin 3-cü bəndinin tələbləri jurnalistin müstəqil təhqiqat aparmaq hüququnu məhdudlaşdırmır.	investigator, interrogator, prosecutor or court; 4) about personality of minors who have committed felony without their permission or without their legal representatives' permission. Media editorship and journalist who is responsible for publication of information cannot be enforced to unfold his source of information, with an exception if it is in a trial proceedings and stated by law. In this case media editor or journalist is responsible for the anonym description, article, image or caricature. Editor or journalist in the following cases shall be forced by the court to disclose their source of information: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1)for the protection of human life;2) with the purpose to prevent the commission of a grave crime;3) for the protection of the person accused or suspected in committing a grave crime. The requirements of the third part of the first provision of this article does not however limit the right of a journalist to conduct an independent investigation.
--	---

3) Məlumat azadlığı haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının Qanunu Maddə 13. Şəxsiyyət haqqında məlumat (fərdi məlumat) Şəxsiyyət haqqında sənədləşdirilmiş və ya açıq elan edilmiş xəbər şəxsiyyət barədə məlumata aiddir. Şəxsiyyət haqqında sənədləşdirilmiş məlumat mənbəyi onun adına verilmiş, onun tərəfindən imzalanmış sənədlər və öz səlahiyyətləriçərçivəsində orqanlar tərəfindən şəxsiyyət haqqında toplanmış məlumatlardır. Şəxsiyyətin dini mənsubiyyəti və əqidəsi barədə məlumat yalnız onun tərəfindən könüllü təqdim edildikdə dövlət orqanları tərəfindən toplana bilər. Şəxsiyyətin siyasi partiyaya üzvlüyü və ya bitərəf olması barədə məlumat yalnız qanunla nəzərdə tutulmuş hallarda dövlət orqanlarına təqdim edilməlidir. 4) Azərbaycan Respublikası Jurnalistin Peşə Etikası Kodeksi I Maddə. Jurnalistin sosial məsuliyyəti Jurnalistin bütün peşə fəaliyyəti Azərbaycan Respublikasının Konstitusiyası və qanunlarına tam uyğun gəlir. O, dərc olunmuş (efirə verilmiş) materialı üçün oxucu, tamaşaçı, dinləyici, ümumiyyətlə ictimaiyyət qarşısında tam məsuliyyət daşıyır. 5) Azərbaycan Respublikasının Cinayət Məcəlləsi	3) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Freedom of Information Article 13. Information about a person Documentary or open news about a person is considered as information about a person. Source of documentary information about a person are documents addressed to his/her name, signed by him/her and information collected about a person by bodies within their authorities. Information about religion and confession of a person may be collected by state bodies only in case of his/her voluntary submission of this information. Information on political party membership or neutrality of a person shall be submitted to state bodies only in cases provided for by the legislation. 4) The Code of Professional Ethics of a journalist of the Republic of Azerbaijan I Article. The social responsibility of a journalist All professional activities of a journalist are fully compatible with the Constitution and laws of the Republic of Azerbaijan. He is fully responsible for his published (broadcasted) material before the readers, viewers, listeners and society in whole. 5) Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan
--	--

Maddə15. Cinayətlərin təsnifatı 15.4. Bu Məcəllə ilə qəsdən və ya ehtiyatsızlıqdan törədilməsinə görə nəzərdə tutulmuş azadlıqdan məhrum etmə cəzasının yuxarı həddi on iki ildən artıq olmayan əməllər ağır cinayətlər hesab olunur. 15.5. Bu Məcəllə ilə qəsdən törədilməsinə görə on iki ildən artıq azadlıqdan məhrum etmə cəzası və ya daha ağır cəza nəzərdə tutulmuş əməllər xüsusilə ağır cinayətlər hesab olunur. 6) Azərbaycan Respublikasının Cinayət Məcəlləsi Maddə 298. Şahidin və ya zərərçəkmiş şəxsin ifadə verməkdən imtina etməsi Şahidin və ya zərərçəkmiş şəxsin ifadə verməkdən imtina etməsi— üç yüz manatdan beş yüz manatadək miqdarda cərimə və ya yüz iyirmi saatdan yüz səksən saatadək ictimai işlər və ya bir ildən iki ilədək müddətə islah işləri və ya altı ayadək müddətə azadlıqdan məhrum etmə ilə cəzalandırılır. Qeyd: Şəxs özü, arvadı (əri), övladları, valideynləri və qanunvericiliklə dairəsi müəyyən edilmiş digər yaxın qohumlarına qarşı ifadə verməkdən imtina etdikdə cinayət məsuliyyətinə cəlb oluna bilməz. 7) Azərbaycan Respublikasının Cinayət Məcəlləsi Maddə 307. Cinayət barəsində xəbər verməmə	Article 15. Classification of crimes 15.4 Grave crime shall be deliberate and careless actions for committing of which maximal punishment provided by the present Code shall not exceed twelve years of imprisonment. 15.5 Especially grave crime shall be deliberate actions for committing of which punishment provided by the present Code, shall be imprisonment for the term of twelve years or more strict punishment. 6) Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan Article 298. Refusal of witness or victim from testifying Refusal of witness or victim from testifying – is punished by the penalty at a rate from three hundred up to five hundred of nominal financial unit, or public works for the term from hundred twenty up to hundred eighty hours, or corrective works for the term from one year up to two years, or imprisonment for the term about six months. NOTE: The person cannot be instituted criminal proceedings for refusal from testifying against himself, wife (husband), children, parents and other close relatives which circle is determined by the legislation. 7) Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan Article 307. Not informing about crimes and
---	--

və ya qabaqcadan vəd etmədən cinayəti gizlətmə 307.1. Ağır və ya xüsusilə ağır cinayətin hazırlanmasını və ya törədilməsini bilərək həmin cinayət barəsində xəbər verməmə — beş yüz manatdan min manatadək miqdarda cərimə və ya iki ilədək müddətə islah işləri və ya iki ilədək müddətə azadlıqdan məhrum etmə ilə cəzalandırılır. 8) Azərbaycan Respublikasının İnzibati Xətalər Məcəlləsi	obviously not promised concealment of crimes 307.1. Not informing about known preparing or committed minor serious or serious crimes — is punished by the penalty at a rate from five hundred up to one thousand of nominal financial unit, or corrective works for the term up to two years, or imprisonment for the term up to two years. 307.2. Obviously not promised concealment of minor serious crimes - is punished by the penalty at a rate from two up to five thousand of nominal financial unit or imprisonment for the term up to three years. 307.3. Obviously not promised concealment serious crime — is punished by imprisonment for the term of from two up to five years. NOTE: The person provided by article 307.1 of the present Code, who has not informed on a crime, prepared or committed by his wife (husband), children, parents and close relatives which circle is established by the legislation, can not be involved to a criminal liability. 8) Code of Administrative Offences of the
--	---

Maddə 186. Jurnalistlərin hüquqlarının pozulması 186.1. Qanunvericiliklə müəyyən edilmiş müddətdə jurnalist sorğusuna cavab verməməyə görə -qırx manatdan yetmiş manatadək miqdarda cərimə edilir. 186.2. Qanunvericiliklə qorunan informasiyalar istisna olmaqla, jurnalistə informasiyanın verilməsi üzərinə məhdudiyyətlər qoymağavə ya informasiya verilməsindən imtina etməyə görə - altmış manatdan doxsan manatadək miqdarda cərimə edilir.	Republic of Azerbaijan Article 186 Violation of rights of journalists 186.1. Not responding journalist request at periods established by legislation, — entails imposition of penalty on natural persons in amount of 40-70 manats. 186.2. Restriction of presentation or refusal in presentation of information to journalist, except information protected by legislation, — entails imposition of penalty in amount of 60-90 manats.
9) Azərbaycan Respublikasının İnzibati Xətalər Məcəlləsi Maddə 189. Kütləvi informasiya azadlığından və jurnalist hüququndan sui-istifadə etmə 189.0. Kütləvi informasiya vasitəsinin redaksiyası (məsul redaktoru) və jurnalistlər (müəlliflər) tərəfindən kütləvi informasiya azadlığından və jurnalist hüquqlarından sui istifadə etməyə görə,yəni: 189.0.1. açıqlanması qanunla qadağan edilənməlumatları açmağa; 189.0.2. mətbu nəşrdə çap olunan materialların qanunvericiliyin tələblərinə uyğun	9) Code of Administrative Offences of the Republic of Azerbaijan Article 189 Abuse of freedom of mass media and journalist rights 189.0. Abuse of freedom of mass media and journalist rights on behalf of editorial staff (responsible editor) of mass media and journalists (authors) i.e.: 189.0.1. Promulgation of information, prohibited to disclosure by legislation; 189.0.2. Non-fulfilment of control on preparation of materials, published in printing

hazırlanmasına nəzarət etməməyə; 189.0.3. qanunvericiliklə müəyyən edilmiş hallardan başqa informasiyanı onun mənbəyini göstərmədən yaymağa; 189.0.4. istinad məlumatları göstərilməyən kütləvi informasiya vasitələri məhsullarını istehsal etməyə və yaymağa, yaxud istinad məlumatlarını qəsdən yanlış göstərməyə görə - fiziki şəxslər iyirmi manatdan iyirmi beş manatadək miqdarda, vəzifəli şəxslər altmış manatdan səksən manatadək miqdarda, hüquqi şəxslər iki yüz manatdan iki yüz əlli manatadək miqdarda cərimə edilir. 10) Azərbaycan Respublikasının Mülki Məcəlləsi Maddə 21. Zərərin əvəzinin ödənilməsi 21.1. Zərərin əvəzinin ödənilməsini tələb etmək hüququna malik olan şəxs ona vurulmuş zərərin əvəzinin tam ödənilməsini tələb edə bilər, bu şərtlə ki, qanunda və ya müqavilədə zərərin əvəzinin daha az miqdarda ödənilməsi nəzərdə tutulmasın. 21.2. Zərər dedikdə, hüququ pozulmuş şəxsin pozulmuş hüququnu bərpa etmək üçün çəkdiyi və ya çəkməli olduğu xərclər, əmlakından məhrum olması və ya əmlakının zədələnməsi (real zərər), habelə hüququ pozulmasaydı, həmin şəxsin adi mülki dövryyə şəraitində əldə edəcəyi gəlirlər (əldən çıxmış fayda) başa düşülür. 21.3. Zərərin əvəzinin ödənilməsi ilə bağlı	edition in accordance with requirements of legislation; 189.0.3. Promulgation of information without indication of its source, except occasions envisaged by legislation 189.0.4. Production or distribution of production of mass media without reference data or deliberate distortion of reference data entails imposition of penalty on natural persons in amount of 20-25, official persons - 60-80, legal persons - 200-250 manats. 10) Civil Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan Article 21. Recovery Compensation of Damages 21.1. The person holding the right to claim the compensation for damage may claim full recovery compensation of damages, provided that the amount of damages recoverable is not limited to a lesser amount by law or contract. 21.2. Damages are the expenses, incurred or to be incurred by which a person, whose right has been violated, incurred or will incur to restore the violated right or damage to his property (tangible loss) as well as profits, which the person would have earned under ordinary conditions of civil relationships, if his rights have not been breached (lost profits). 21.3. In determination of the volume of claim
--	---

tələbin həcmnin müəyyənləşdirilməsi zamanı zərərçəkənin, onun işçisinin və qanunvericiliklə nəzərdə tutulmuş hallarda üçüncü şəxslərin davranışının zərərin yaranmasına və artmasına hansı həcmdə şərait yaratması nəzərə alınmalıdır. 11) Kütləvi informasiya vasitələri haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu Maddə 49. Jurnalist statusu Jurnalistin bu Qanunla müəyyən edilmiş statusu aşağıdakılara şamil edilir: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1) kütləvi informasiya vasitəsinin məlumat toplamaq, hazırlamaq, redaktə və istehsal etməklə məşğul olan ştatlı müxbirlərinə;2) kütləvi informasiya vasitəsinin məlumat toplanması, hazırlanması və redaktəsi ilə bağlı tapşırıqlarını müntəzəm yerinə yetirən ştatdankənar müxbirlərinə. 12) Kütləvi informasiya vasitələri haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu Maddə 61. Kütləvi informasiya vasitələri haqqında qanunun digər pozulma hallarına görə məsuliyyət Kütləvi informasiya vasitələri haqqında Qanunun müddəaları aşağıdakı hallarda pozularsa: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1) təkzib, düzəliş və cavabdan əsassız olaraq imtina edildikdə, məhkəmənin qanuni qüvvəyə minmiş qərar və qətnaməsinə əməl etmədikdə	on compensation of losses, shall be taken into consideration the extent of influence of the party causing loss, his employees and any third parties, to its occurrence and increase. 11) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media Article 49. The status of a journalist The status of a journalist determined with this Law shall be applied to the following: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1)a regular correspondent of mass media, who is engaged in gathering, preparing, editing and producing information;2) a lance correspondent of mass media, regularly fulfilling the assignments concerning gathering, preparing and editing information 12) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media Article 61. Liability for other cases of violation of the law on Mass Media At failure of positions of the Law "On mass media" in following cases: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1.Unfounded waiving of the disproof, correction and answer, non-observance of the solutions, which have entered valid force, and resolutions of court - editorial office
---	--

redaksiya (məsul redaktor); 2) bu Qanunun 9-cu, 11-ci, 13-cü, 21-ci və 28-ci maddələrinin tələbləri yerinə yetirilmədikdə təsisçi, redaksiya, nəşir və yayıcı; 3) çap məhsulunun qanuni əsaslarla yayılmasına mane olduqda, dövrü mətbu nəşrin tirajının pərakəndə satışına qeyri-qanuni məhdudiyətlər qoyulduqda - vəzifəli şəxslər; 4) xarici ölkələrin dövlət orqanlarının, hüquqi və fiziki şəxslərinin Azərbaycan Respublikasının ərazisində istehsal olunan (yayımlanan) kütləvi informasiya vasitələrini qanuna zidd şəkildə maliyyələşdirmələrinə yol verdiklərinə görə - təsisçi və baş redaktor (redaktor); 5) istehsalın və yayımın dayandırılması və ya ona xitam verilməsi barədə məhkəmə qətnaməsindən sonra redaksiya və nəşriyyat kütləvi informasiya vasitəsinin məhsulunu qeyri-qanuni hazırladıqda və yaydıqda - nəşir, yayıcı və redaksiya (redaktor, baş redaktor) Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunvericiliyinə müvafiq surətdə mülki, inzibati, cinayət və digər məsuliyyət daşıyırlar.	(accountable editor); 2.Failure to meet requirements of Articles 9, 11, 13, 21 and 28 of the present Law - the founder, editorial office, publisher and distributor; 3.Precluding to distribution on valid foundations of product of publication, introducing of pirate limitations on retail sale of circulation of periodic print publication - the officials; 4.For an assumption of pirate financing of mass media manufactured (distributed) on the territory of the Azerbaijan Republic, by state organs, legal and physical persons of foreign countries - the founder and editor-in-chief (editor); 5.At pirate preparing both distribution by editorial office and publishing house of product of mass media after a resolution of court on suspension or phase-out the distribution - the publisher, distributor and editorial office (editor, editor-in-chief) bear civil, administrative, criminal and other responsibility pursuant to the legislation of the Azerbaijan Republic.
13) Azərbaycan Respublikasının Konstitusiyası Maddə 50. Məlumat azadlığı I. Hər kəsin qanuni yolla istədiyi məlumatı axtarmaq, əldə etmək, ötürmək, hazırlamaq və yaymaq azadlığı vardır. II. Kütləvi informasiyanın azadlığına təminat	13) The Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan Article 50. Freedom of information I. Everyone is free to look for, obtain, transfer, develop and distribute any information in a legal way. II. Freedom of mass media is guaranteed. State

verilir. Kütləvi informasiya vasitələrində, o cümlədən mətbuatda dövlət senzurası qadağandır. III. Hər kəsin kütləvi informasiya vasitələrində dərc edilən və onun hüquqlarını pozan və ya mənafeələrinə xələl gətirən məlumatı təkzib etmək və ya ona cavab vermək hüququna təminat verilir. 14) Azərbaycan Jurnalistlərinin Peşə Davranışı Qaydaları Prinsip 2. İnformasiya qaynaqlarına sayğılı yanaşma 2.1 Təşkilatların, partiyaların, cəmiyyətlərin, birliklərin və hər hansı digər maraqlı qrupların rəsmi məlumatları yayılarkən mənbə mütləq göstərməlidir. Lakin bilgi verən şəxs adının gizli saxlanması şərtini irəli sürürsə, jurnalist və informasiya orqanı bu şərtə mütləq əməl etməlidir. İnformasiya qaynağının gizliliyi qorunmalıdır. 2.2 Qeyri-rəsmi mənbələrin məlumatları onların həqiqətə uyğunluğu və informasiya dəyəri yoxlanılmadan yayılmamalıdır. İnformasiya çapa hazırlanarkən onun mənası təhrif olunmamalıdır. Başqa mətndən və ya çıxışdan sitat gətirərkən jurnalist həmin sitatın harada başladığını və bitdiyini dəqiq bildirməlidir. Fotosimvolların (illüstrasiya, fotomontaj və sair) dərci zamanı şəklən sənədli xarakter daşmadığı qeyd olunmalıdır. Yazıların sərlövhələri onun məzmununa uyğun gəlməlidir. 2.3. Jurnalist çalışmalıdır ki, götürdüyü müsahibəni onu verən adamın özü, yaxud da	ensorship in mass media, including press is prohibited. III. Everyone's right to refute or react to the information published in the media and violating his or her rights or damaging his or her reputation is guaranteed. 14) Professional Code of Conduct of Azerbaijani Journalists Principle 2. Respectful approach towards sources of information 2.1 The source must always be indicated while disseminating official information from organizations, parties, societies, unions and other interest groups. However, if the person who provides the information prefers to remain anonymous, journalists or media entities must adhere to his/her privacy conditions. The confidentiality of the source of information shall be protected. 2.2 The information provided by unofficial sources shall be checked for its authenticity and informative value before being disseminated. The content of the information shall not be distorted while being prepared for print. When quoting from another article or speech, journalists should note precise starting and ending points of the quotation. When printing photo-symbols (illustration, photo-editing) together with texts, it should be noted that such images do not have documentary importance. Titles of articles should correspond to their content. 2.3 Journalist should try to have his/her
---	---

vəkil etdiyi şəxs imzalasın. Bu, mümkün olmadıqda, müsahibənin hansı şəkildə çap ediləcəyi, hətta jurnalistin özünün verdiyi sualların belə sonradan dəyişdirilib dəyişdirilməyəcəyi müsahibə öncədən bildirilməlidir. 2.4. Jurnalistin müstəsna hal kimi digər imkanları mövcud olmadıqda, ictimai əhəmiyyət kəsb edən informasiyanın əldə edilməsi üçün xüsusi avadanlıqlardan (gizli kameralar, gizli mikrofonlar və sair gizli vasitələrdən) və ya üsullardan (“qurama” kimlik və s.) istifadə edə bilər. 2.5. Jurnalist məlumatların və ya təsvirlərin əldə edilməsi məqsədi ilə hədələməyə, güc tətbiqinə və ya təhdidə yol verməməlidir. 15) Kütləvi informasiya vasitələri haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu Maddə 52. Xarici mənbələrdən alınan informasiyanın yayılması Azərbaycan Respublikası vətəndaşlarının xarici mənbələrdən, o cümlədən kütləvi informasiya vasitələrindən birbaşa məlumat əldə etmək hüququ var. Bilavasitə televiziya proqramlarının qəbul olunmasının məhdudlaşdırılmasına Azərbaycan Respublikasının bağladığı dövlətlərarası müqavilələrdə nəzərdə tutulmuş hallarda yol verilir. Təsisçi və ya redaksiyasının daimi yeri Azərbaycan Respublikasının hüdudlarından kənar olan xarici dövrü mətbu nəşrin yayılma qaydası Azərbaycan Respublikasının bağladığı dövlətlərarası müqavilədə müəyyən	interview signed by interviewees or their authorized agents. If this is not possible, interviewees should be notified of the way in which the interview will be published and whether the questions asked by the journalist will be modified. 2.4. If there are no other methods available, journalists may use special equipment (hidden cameras, hidden microphones or other hidden tools) or methods (“fake” IDs and etc) as an exception for obtaining information that has public importance. 2.5. Journalists shall not resort to intimidation, application of force or threats in order to obtain information or images. 15) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media Article 52. A dissemination of information receivable from foreign sources The citizens of the Azerbaijan Republic have the right to gain the direct information from foreign sources, including mass media. The limitation of direct acceptance of the television programs is enabled in cases, foreseen by the intergovernmental agreements, contracted by the Azerbaijan Republic. In case the order of distribution of foreign periodic print publications, founder or constant place of editorial office of which one are outside boundaries of the Azerbaijan Republic, is not established by the
--	--

edilməmişdirsə, onun yayılması üçün müvafiq icra hakimiyyəti orqanının razılığı tələb olunur. 16) Azərbaycan Jurnalistlərinin Peşə Davranışı Qaydaları Prinsip 4. Jurnalistin özünün və çalışdığı orqanının reputasiyasının qorunması 4.8. Jurnalist zərurət olmadıqca informasiya mənbələrinə pul ödəməməlidir. Lakin ictimaiyyətin əldə etmək hüququnun olduğu informasiyanı toplayarkən ödənişlərin zəruri olduğu hallarda belə ödənişlərin həyata keçirilməsi müvafiq reportajda göstərilməlidir. 17) İnformasiya, informasiyalaşdırma və informasiyanın mühafizəsi haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu Maddə 10. İnformasiyanın təsnifatı Əldə olunma növünə görə informasiya ümumi istifadə üçün açıq və alınması məhdudlaşdırılan informasiyalara bölünür. Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu ilə əldə olunması məhdudlaşdırılmayan informasiyalar açıq informasiyalar sayılır. Əldə edilməsi qanunla məhdudlaşdırılan informasiyalar hüquqi rejiminə görə məxfi və gizli (konfidensial) olur. Dövlət sirri məxfi, vətəndaşların, mülkiyyət növündən asılı olmayaraq yaradılmış idarə, müəssisə və təşkilatların, digər hüquqi şəxslərin qanuni maraqlarının qorunması məqsədilə əldə olunmasına məhdudiyət qoyulan peşə (həkim, vəkil, notariat), kommərsiya, istintaq və məhkəmə sirləri, habelə fərdi məlumatlar	intergovernmental agreement contracted by the Azerbaijan Republic, its distribution needs a resolution of the appropriate organ of the executive authority. 16) Professional Code of Conduct of Azerbaijani Journalists Principle 4. Protection of journalists' own reputation and of the organization he/she works for 4.8. Journalists shall not pay sources for information, but where payment is considered necessary in order to obtain information that the public has a right to know, it shall be made clear in the relevant report that payments have been made. 17) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Information, Informatization and Protection of Information Article 10. Information Resources by Categories of Access Information resources by categories of access may be open and with limited access. Pursuant to legislation of Azerbaijan Republic and decisions of relevant bodies of the executive power, information resources, except documented information with limited access, shall be open for access. Documented information with limited access pursuant to the terms of its legal framework shall be divided into information considered state secret and confidential one. Classification of information as state secret, procedure for its use and protection shall be established by the Law of Azerbaijan Republic "On State Secret". Information not being state secret but needed to be kept in secrecy in order to protect legal
--	--

konfidensial xarakter daşıyır. Fərdi məlumatlar daxilolma (əldə olunma) növünə görə konfidensial və açıq kateqoriyalara bölünür. Məlumatların dövlət sirlrinə aid edilməsi, istifadəsi qaydaları və mühafizəsi "Dövlət sirri haqqında" Azərbaycan Respublikasının Qanunu ilə müəyyən edilir. Konfidensial informasiyanın toplanmasına, işlənməsinə, istifadəsinə və yayılmasına yalnız Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunvericiliyində müəyyən edilmiş hallarda yol verilə bilər.	interests of citizens, institutions, enterprises and organizations shall be confidential one. Gathering, processing, use and dissemination of the confidential information shall only be allowed in cases established by legislation of Azerbaijan Republic.
18) Məlumat azadlığı haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu	18) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Freedom of Information
Maddə 10. Alınması məhdudlaşdırılan məlumat	Article 10. Information with limited access
Alınması məhdudlaşdırılan məlumatlara — dövlət, peşə (vəkil, notariat, həkim), qulluq, bank, kommertiya, istintaq və məhkəmə sirləri, şəxslərin şəxsi və ailə həyatına, terror aksiyalarına aid olan məlumatlar aiddirlər. Ətraf mühitə dair informasiya müvafiq qanunvericiliklə müəyyən edilmiş hallarda alınması məhdudlaşdırılan məlumata aid edilir. Dövlət, peşə (vəkil, notariat, həkim), qulluq, bank, kommertiya, istintaq və məhkəmə sirləri, şəxslərin şəxsi və ailə həyatına, terror aksiyalarına, ətraf mühitə aid olan məlumatlarla bağlı yaranan münasibətlər müvafiq qanunvericiliklə tənzimlənilir.	Information with limited access includes state, professional (lawyer, notary, and doctor), service, bank, commercial, investigation and court secrets, information on personal and family life of persons and terrorist acts. Information with limited access includes information on environment in cases determined with the relevant legislation. Relations arisen concerning state, professional (lawyer, notary, doctor), service, bank, commercial, investigation and court secrets, information on personal and family life of persons, terrorist acts are regulated by the relevant legislation.
19) Azərbaycan Respublikası Cinayət Məcəlləsi	19) Criminal Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan
Maddə 163. Jurnalistlərin qanuni peşə fəaliyyətinə mane olma	Article 163. Impending journalists in their legal professional activities
163.1. Jurnalistlərin qanuni peşə fəaliyyətinə mane olma, yəni zor tətbiq etməklə və ya belə	163.1. Impending journalists in their legal professional activities by forcing them to disseminate or refuse to disseminate

zor tətbiq etmə hədəsi ilə onları məlumat yaymağa və ya məlumat yaymaqdan imtinaya vadar etmə—yüz manatdan beş yüz manatadək miqdarda cərimə və ya bir ilədək müddətə islah işləri ilə cəzalandırılır.

163.2. Eyni əməllər vəzifəli şəxs tərəfindən öz qulluq mövqeyindən istifadə etməklə törədildikdə—üç ilədək müddətə müəyyən vəzifə tutma və ya müəyyən fəaliyyətlə məşğul olma hüququndan məhrum edilməklə və ya edilməməklə iki ilədək müddətə islah işləri ilə və ya bir ilədək müddətə azadlıqdan məhrum etmə ilə cəzalandırılır.

20) Kütləvi informasiya vasitələri haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu

Maddə 1. Kütləvi informasiya azadlığı

Azərbaycan Respublikasında kütləvi informasiya azaddır.

Kütləvi informasiya azadlığı vətəndaşların qanuni yolla informasiya axtarmaq, əldə etmək, hazırlamaq, ötürmək, istehsal etmək və yaymaq hüququna dövlət tərəfindən təminat verilməsinə əsaslanır.

Kütləvi informasiya vasitələrinin təsis olunması, onlara sahiblik, onlardan istifadə, onların idarə olunması, kütləvi informasiyanın axtarılması, əldə edilməsi, hazırlanması, ötürülməsi, istehsalı və yayımı Azərbaycan Respublikasının kütləvi informasiya vasitələri haqqında qanunvericiliyində nəzərdə tutulan hallardan başqa, məhdudlaşdırıla bilməz.

21) Kütləvi informasiya vasitələri haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu information, with use of violence or with threat of its application –is punished by the penalty at a rate of from hundred up to five hundred of nominal financial unit or corrective works for the term up to one year.

163.2. The same act committed by official with use of the service position –is punished by corrective works for the term up to two years or with imprisonment for the term up to one year with deprivation of the right to hold the certain posts or to engage in the certain activities for the term up to three years or without it.

20) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media

Article 1. Freedom of the mass information

The mass information in the Republic of Azerbaijan is free.

Freedom of the mass information is based on granting to the citizens by the state of the right on seeking, getting, preparing, transmission, production and dissemination of information by a reliable way.

Establishing of mass media means, possession, use and control over them, seeking, getting, preparing, transmission, production and dissemination of the mass information cannot be restricted, except for cases, determined by the legislation of the Republic of Azerbaijan on mass media.

21) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media

Maddə 8. Kütləvi informasiya vasitələrinin məlumat almaq hüququ Kütləvi informasiya vasitələri cəmiyyətdəki iqtisadi, siyasi, ictimai və sosial durum haqqında, dövlət orqanlarının, bələdiyyələrin, idarə, müəssisə və təşkilatların, ictimai birliklərin, siyasi partiyaların, vəzifəli şəxslərin fəaliyyəti barədə operativ və doğru-dürüst məlumatlar almaq hüququna malikdirlər. Bu hüquq Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunvericiliyində göstərilən hallardan başqa, məhdudlaşdırıla bilməz. 22) Kütləvi informasiya vasitələri haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu Maddə 10. Kütləvi informasiya azadlığından sui-istifadənin yolverilməzliyi Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunvericiliyi ilə qorunan sirləri yaymaq, mövcud konstitusiyalı dövlət quruluşunu zorakılıqla çevirmək, dövlətin bütövlüyünə qəsd etmək, müharibəni, zorakılığı və qəddarlığı, milli, irqi, sosial ədaləti, yaxud dözülməzliyi təbliğ etmək, mütəbər mənbə adı altında vətəndaşların şərəf və ləyaqətini alçaldan şayiələr, yalan və qərəzli yazılar, pornoqrafik materiallar çap etdirmək, böhtan atmaq, yaxud digər qanunazidd əməllər törətmək məqsədi ilə kütləvi informasiya vasitələrindən istifadə olunmasına yol verilmir. 23) Əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyəti haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu 23.1.Maddə 1. Əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyətinin anlayışı, məqsədləri və vəzifələri II. Əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyəti insan həyatını, sağlamlığını, hüquq və azadlıqlarını, hüquqi	Article 8. The right of the mass media to get information Mass media has the right to get operative and honest information on the economical, political, public and social situation in the society, on the activity of state bodies, municipalities, institutions, enterprises and organizations, public unions, political parties, officials. This right cannot be restricted in any case other than prescribed by the legislation of the Republic of Azerbaijan. 22) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media Article 10. Prohibition of abuse of freedom of mass media Draft on funds of the mass information with the purposes of distribution of secrets guarded by the legislation of the Azerbaijan Republic, violent overthrow of an existing constitutional state formation, attempt on integrity of the state, propagation of war, violence and cruelty, national, racial, social hate or intolerance, printing under cover of a title of an authoritative source of hearings, lie also of prejudiced publications humiliating honor and a dignity of the citizens, pornographic materials, slander or undertaking of other unlawful operating is not enabled. 23) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Operational Search Activities 23.1.Article 1. Concept, purposes and tasks of operational search activities II. Operational-search activity shall be implemented for the purpose of protection of
---	---

şəxslərin qanuni mənafeələrini, dövlət sirtini, habelə milli təhlükəsizliyi cinayətkar qəsdlərdən müdafiə etmək məqsədi ilə həyata keçirilir. III. Əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyətinin vəzifələri aşağıdakılardır: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1) hazırlanan və törədilən cinayətlərin qarşısının alınması;2) törədilmiş cinayətlərin aşkar edilməsi və açılması;3) cinayətləri hazırlayan, törədən və ya törətmiş şəxslərin müəyyən edilməsi;4) məhkəmə, istintaq və təhqiqat orqanlarından gizlənən, cəza çəkməkdən boyun qaçıran və ya itkin düşən şəxslərin axtarılması;5) naməlum meyitlərin şəxsiyyətinin müəyyən edilməsi. 23.2.Maddə 4. İnsan və vətəndaş hüquq və azadlıqlarının təminatları II. Əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyətinin həyata keçirilməsi zamanı Azərbaycan Respublikasının Konstitusiyasında nəzərdə tutulmuş insan və vətəndaş hüquq və azadlıqlarını, hüquqi şəxslərin qanuni mənafeələrini pozmaq qadağandır. Əməliyyat-axtarış tədbirlərinin tətbiqi ilə bağlı insan və vətəndaş hüquq və azadlıqlarının müvəqqəti məhdudlaşdırılmasına yalnız bu Qanunla müəyyən edilmiş qaydada	life, health, rights and freedoms of human, interests of legal persons, state and military secrets, as well as the national security from criminal encroachments. III. Operational search activity in order to be implemented against journalists to get the source of their information has to pursue following objectives: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1) Prevention of crimes committed and crimes pending preparation;2) Detection of committed crimes;3) Identification of persons, who prepared, committed or are pending commission of crimes;4) Search of persons concealing themselves from court, investigation and inquiry authority, and evading from execution of punishment, as well as missing persons;5) Identification of unknown human bodies 23.2.Article 4. Guarantees of rights and freedoms of man and of the citizen II. It is prohibited to violate human and civic rights and freedoms envisaged in the Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan and interests of legal entities. The temporary restriction of human and civic rights and freedoms in the course of implementation of operational-search activity is allowed only in accordance with the provision of this ACT in case of prevention and disclosure of crimes, search of those secreting from court, investigation and investigating authorities,
--	---

cinayətlərin qarşısının alınması, onların açılması, məhkəmə, istintaq və ya təhqiqat orqanlarından gizlənmə, cəza çəkməkdən boyun qaçıran şəxslərin, itkin düşənlərin axtarışı zamanı yol verilə bilər. 23.3.Maddə 6. Əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyəti subyektlərinin vəzifələri Bu Qanunun 1-ci maddəsində göstərilən məqsədlərə nail olmaq üçün əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyəti subyektlərinin aşağıdakı vəzifələri vardır: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1) insan və vətəndaş hüquq və azadlıqlarının, fiziki və hüquqi şəxslərin qanunla müdafiə olunan mənafələrinin, ictimai və dövlət təhlükəsizliyinin qorunması üçün öz səlahiyyətləri daxilində bütün qanuni tədbirləri görmək;2) əməliyyat-axtarış tədbirlərinin keçirilməsinə dair məhkəmə qərarlarını, istintaq orqanlarının qərarlarını və ya cinayət işləri üzrə yazılı tapşırıqlarını, habelə əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyətinin səlahiyyətli subyektlərinin qərarlarını yerinə yetirmək;3) əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyəti nəticəsində əldə edilmiş məlumatları, onların mənbəyini və əldə edilməsi üsullarını yaymadan, konkret cinayət işi üzrə təhqiqatı və ya istintaqı aparən şəxsə və yaxud məhkəməyə vermək;4) Azərbaycan Respublikasının tərəfdar çıxdığı beynəlxalq müqavilələrə əsasən xarici dövlətlərin hüquq-mühafizə orqanlarının və müvafiq beynəlxalq təşkilatlarının sorğularına cavab vermək;5) Azərbaycan Respublikasının ərazisində	escaping sentencing and missing 23.3.Article 6. The duties of subjects of operational search activities Agents of the operational-search activity shall have the following responsibilities during the course of investigative activities against journalists to obtain the source of their information: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1) to implement all the actions within the scope of own authorities to ensure the protection of human and civil rights and responsibilities, legitimate interests of private and legal persons, public and state security;2) to execute decisions of judicial and investigation authorities pertaining to the implementation of the operational search measures or written instructions within the framework of the criminal case, as well as, to carry out decisions of the authorized Agents of the Operational-Search Activity;3) to provide information obtained as a result of the operational-search activity, without disclosure of its source and modes of obtaining it, to the person conducting inquiry or investigation or to the court;4) to respond to the requests by the foreign law-enforcement and appropriate international organizations within the framework of the international treaties, to which the Republic of Azerbaijan is party to;5) to undertake all necessary measures in order
---	--

əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyətinin digər subyektlərinin səlahiyyətinə aid olan faktların aşkar edildiyi təqdirdə təxirəsalınmaz tədbirlər keçirməklə onları xəbərdar etmək və lazımı kömək göstərmək; 6) əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyətini həyata keçirərkən konspirasiya qaydalarına riayət edilməsi üçün müvafiq tədbirlər görmək; 7) öz qulluq mövqeyinə görə məxfi məlumatlara və ya xüsusi icazə tələb edən işlərə buraxılan şəxsləri yoxlamaq; 8) öz əməkdaşlarının, onların yaxın qohumlarının, əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyəti subyektlərinə kömək edən şəxslərin, onların yaxın qohumlarının, habelə cinayət prosesi iştirakçılarının, onların yaxın qohumlarının şəxsi təhlükəsizliyini və əmlakının hüquqa zidd qəsdlərdən qorunmasını təmin etmək; 9) hər hansı şəxslə əməkdaşlığın məxfiliyini və anonimliyini təmin etmək; 10) hadisələrin, faktların, əşyaların və digər informasiya mənbələrinin əməliyyat uçotunu aparmaq.	to bring the information about the fact which is relevant to the territorial jurisdiction of another Agent of the Operational-Search Activity on the territory of the Republic of Azerbaijan and render the necessary assistance; 6) to undertake appropriate actions to ensure conspiracy in the course of implementation of operational-search activity; 7) to check the persons who have access to confidential information or matters requiring special permission due to the position that s/he occupies; 8) to protect own staff and their close relatives, persons facilitating the operational-search activity and their close relatives, as well as the participants of the criminal process and their close relatives and their property from illegal encroachments; 9) to ensure the confidentiality and anonymity of cooperation with any person; 10) to maintain the register of events, facts, objects and information sources.
23.4.Maddə 11. Əməliyyat-axtarış tədbirlərinin həyata keçirilməsi üçün səbəblər və əsaslar III. Əməliyyat-axtarış tədbirlərinin həyata	23.4.Article 11. Reasons and grounds for carrying out the operational search activity measures III. Operational search activities have to be grounded and based on the specified rules in legislation. The grounds for implementing operational-

keçirilməsi üçün əsaslar aşağıdakılardır: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1) məhkəmənin (hakimin) qərarları;2) istintaq orqanlarının qərarları;3) əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyətinin səlahiyyətli subyektlərinin qərarları. IV. Əməliyyat-axtarış tədbirlərinin həyata keçirilməsi barədə məhkəmənin (hakimin), istintaq orqanının və ya əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyətinin səlahiyyətli subyektinin qərarı yalnız aşağıdakı hallarda qəbul oluna bilər: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1) başlanmış cinayət işi mövcud olduqda;2) cinayət işinin başlanmasına kifayət qədər əsaslar olmasa da, cinayəti hazırlayan, törədən və ya törətmiş şəxs barəsində etimad doğuran, məlum və qərəzsiz mənbədən məlumat daxil olduqda;3) dövlət təhlükəsizliyinə və ya müdafiə qabiliyyətinə təhlükə yaradan hadisə baş verdikdə, yaxud onun qarşısı alındıqda;4) şəxs məhkəmə, istintaq və ya təhqiqat orqanlarından gizləndikdə, cəza çəkməkdən boyun qaçırdıqda, yaxud itkin düşdükdə;5) naməlum meyit aşkar edildikdə.	search measures precisely some investigative actions against journalists are as follows: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1) decisions of court (judge);2) decisions of investigation authorities;3) decisions of the authorized Agents of Operational-Search Activity IV. The decisions of courts (judges), investigation authorities or authorized Agents of Operational-Search Activity shall be accepted only in following cases: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1) within the framework of existing of criminal case;2) repealed by the ACT of the Republic of Azerbaijan;3) in case of obtaining reliable information , which is received from unbiased and known source, to the effect that a particular person is preparing, committing or have committed a crime even without the framework of the existing criminal case;4) in case of event infringing the national security and its defense capacity or prevention of this event;5) in case of a person concealing himself from court, investigation or inquiry, evading
---	--

23.5.Maddə 13. Əməliyyat-axtarış tədbirlərinin tətbiqinin şərtləri I. Qanunla mühafizə edilən yazışma, telefon, poçt-teleqraf və digər rabitə üsulları ilə ötürülən məlumatların sirlinin qorunması, eləcə də mənzil toxunulmazlığı ilə əlaqədar əməliyyat-axtarış tədbirlərinin tətbiqinə ancaq cinayət hazırlayan, cinayət törətməyə sui-qəsd edən, cinayət törədən, həmçinin məhkəmə, istintaq və ya təhqiqat orqanlarından gizlənən, cəza çəkməkdən boyun qaçıran şəxslər barədə məlumat toplamaq, habelə oğurlanmış əmlakı tapmaq, gərilərin gizlədilməsinin və məhv edilməsinin qarşısını almaq məqsədi ilə tətbiq edilən tədbirlər nəticəsində əldə olunmuş məlumatların cinayət işi üzrə sübut ola biləcəyini və axtarılan şəxslərin tutula biləcəyini güman etmək üçün kifayət qədər əsas olduğu halda icazə verilir. II. Telefon və digər danışıqlara qulaq asılması və onların yazılması, texniki rabitə kanallarından və digər texniki vasitələrdən informasiyanın çıxarılması, poçt-teleqraf göndərişlərinin yoxlanılması və mənzillərə baxış keçirilməsi ilə əlaqədar tətbiq edilən əməliyyat-axtarış tədbirlərində əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyəti subyektlərinin müvəkkil edilmiş şəxslərində həmin tədbirlərin tətbiqinə dair qərar və özlərinin xidməti vəsiqələri olmalıdır. III. Şəxs tərəfindən cinayətin törədilməsi və ya hazırlanması barədə kifayət qədər əsas olduqda onun özü və əlaqələri haqqında məlumat almaq	execution of punishment or missing person; 6) in case of identification of unknown human body 23.5.Article 13. Conditions for implementation of the operational search activity measures I. Operational-search measures in respect of confidentiality of information protected by legislation and transmitted by correspondence, telephone, post-telegraph and other means of communication and privacy of premises shall be allowed if there are sufficient grounds to believe that the measures carried out with a purpose of collecting information on the persons preparing for crime, attempting the commission of crime, committing crime, hiding themselves from court, investigation and inquiry bodies, evading punishment, as well as, of tracing stolen goods, of preventing concealment and destruction of evidence will produce information to serve as evidence in criminal proceedings and location of people at large. II. Persons commissioned by the agents of the Operational Search Activity to carry out operational-search measures in respect of tapping and recording of telephone and other communication, extracting information from channels of technical communication and other technical means, screening of correspondence and searching of premises, shall possess warrant authorizing the measures and the identification documents. III. The technical means, psychotropic, chemical and other substances capable of damaging human health and environment shall be banned from usage in the course of implementation of operational-search
--	---

məqsədlə tətbiq edilən əməliyyat-axtarış tədbirində insanın səhhətinə və ətraf mühitə ziyan vuran texniki vasitə, psixotrop, kimyəvi və digər maddələrdən istifadə edilməsi qadağandır.

IV. Əməliyyat-axtarış tədbirləri tətbiq edilərkən əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyəti subyektinin müvəkkil edilmiş şəxsləri, həmin tədbirlərin cinayətkar qəsdlərin dövlətin və cəmiyyətin mənafeyinə vura biləcəyi ziyanın ictimai təhlükəlilik dərəcəsinə uyğunluğunu gözləməyə borcludurlar.

23.6.Maddə 19. Əməliyyat-axtarış tədbirlərinin həyata keçirilməsində qanunçuluğun təminatı

Əməliyyat-axtarış fəaliyyəti subyektlərinin rəhbərləri əməliyyat-axtarış tədbirlərinin təşkili və həyata keçirilməsi zamanı qanunçuluğa əməl olunmasına nəzarət edirlər və buna görə fərdi məsuliyyət daşıyırlar.

24) Terrorçuluğa qarşı mübarizə haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu

24.1.Maddə 1. Əsas anlayışlar

Terrorçuluq—ictimai təhlükəsizliyi pozmaq, əhali arasında vahimə yaratmaq, yaxud dövlət hakimiyyət orqanları və ya beynəlxalq təşkilatlar tərəfindən qərar qəbul edilməsinə təsir göstərmək məqsədlə insanların həlak olması, onların sağlamlığına zərər vurulması, əhəmiyyətli əmlak ziyanının vurulması və ya başqa ictimai təhlükəli nəticələrin baş verməsi təhlükəsi yaradan partlayış, yangın və ya digər measures with the purpose of obtaining information about the person who is believed to have committed a crime or to be preparing a crime, as well as his/her connections.

IV. In the course of implementation of the operational-search measures, persons commissioned by the Agents of the Operational Search Activity shall be bound to adhere to the principle of proportionality of these measures to the degree of the danger posed by the targeted criminal encroachments to the interests of the state and public in terms of potential damage to be caused.

23.6.Article 19. Security of the rule of law in implementation of the operational search activity measures

Chiefs of the Agents of the Operational-Search Activity shall supervise of compliance with legislation in the course of organizing and implementing of the Operational-Search Activity and shall be held personally for defaults.

24) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on the Struggle against Terrorism

24.1.Article 1. Main notions

Terrorism is defined as committing of explosions, fires and other actions threatening the lives of people, damaging their health, causing significant property damage or occurrence of other hazardous consequences to public, with the purpose of destruction of public security, spread of panic among population or influencing the decisions of state authorities or international entities, as well as threat of committing of such actions for the

hərəkətlər törətmə, habelə həmin məqsədlə bu cür hərəkətlərin törədiləcəyi ilə hədələmədi 24.2.Maddə 4. Terrorçuluğa qarşı mübarizənin əsas prinsipləri Azərbaycan Respublikasında terrorçuluğa qarşı mübarizə aşağıdakı prinsiplərə əsaslanır: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1) qanunçuluğun təmin edilməsi; 2) terror fəaliyyətinin həyata keçirilməsinə görə Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunvericiliyi ilə nəzərdə tutulmuş cəzanın labüdlüyü; 3) terrorçuluğa qarşı mübarizə zamanı açıq və gizli metodların əlaqələndirilməsi; 4) hüquqi, siyasi, sosial-iqtisadi və təşkilati profilaktik tədbirlərin kompleks istifadəsi; 5) terror fəaliyyəti nəticəsində təhlükəyə məruz qalmış şəxslərin hüquqlarının müdafiəsinin üstünlüyü; 6) terrorçuluq əleyhinə aparılan əməliyyatlara cəlb olunmuş qüvvələrin idarə edilməsində təkbaşlılıq; 7) terrorçuluq əleyhinə aparılan əməliyyatların həyata keçirilməsində iştirak edən şəxsi heyətin, o cümlədən bu məqsədlə istifadə edilən texniki üsulların və taktikanın elan edilməsində minimal aşkarlıq. 25) Azərbaycan Respublikasının Konstitusiyası	same purposes 24.2.Article 4. The main principles the struggle against terrorism Struggle against terrorism in the Azerbaijan Republic is based on following principles: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1) provision of legality; 2) inevitability of punishment stipulated under the legislation of the Azerbaijan Republic for commitment of terrorist activity; 3) coordination of public and concealed methods of struggle against terrorist; 4) combined use of legal, political, socio-economic and organizational-preventive measures; 5) prioritized protection of rights of persons endangered by terrorist activity; 6) independence in control of resources attracted to operations against terrorism; 7) minimum disclosure of staff involved in operations against terrorism, including methods and tactics used for these purposes. 25) The Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan
--	---

Maddə 47. Fikir və söz azadlığı I. Hər kəsin fikir və söz azadlığı vardır. II. Heç kəs öz fikir və əqidəsini açıqlamağa və ya fikir və əqidəsindən dönməyə məcbur edilə bilməz. III. İrqi, milli, dini, sosial ədavət və düşmənçilik oyadan təşviqat və təbliğata yol verilmir. 26) Müəlliflik və əlaqəli hüquqlar haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının Qanunu Maddə 8. Müəlliflik hüququnun yaranması. Müəlliflik prezumpsiyası 3. Əsərin anonim və ya təxəllüslə dərc edildiyi hallarda (müəllifin təxəllüsünün onun şəxsiyyətini şübhə altında qoymadığı hallar istisna olmaqla) əsərdə adı göstərilən nəşir, digər sübutlar olmadıqda, bu Qanuna uyğun olaraq müəllifin nümayəndəsi sayılır və bu simada müəllifin hüquqlarını qorumaq və həyata keçirmək səlahiyyətinə malikdir. Bu müddəə müəllifin öz şəxsiyyətini açıqladığı və müəllifliyini bəyan etdiyi ana qədər qüvvədə qalır. 27) Telekommunikasiya haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu Maddə 38. Telekommunikasiyada məxfiliyin təmin olunması 38.2. Telekommunikasiya şəbəkələri vasitəsilə ötürülən məlumatların məxfiliyinin	Article 47. Freedom of thought and speech I. Everyone has the right to freedom of thought and speech. II. Nobody can be enforced to express his thoughts and convictions or to deny them. III. Agitation and propaganda provoking racial, national, religious, social discord and hostility are prohibited. 26) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Copyright and Related Rights Article 8. Establishment of copyright. Copyright presumption 3. In the case of publication of works anonymous or with encryption (with exception of encryption confirming the personality of the author) the publisher, if there is no other prove, is legally considered as an author's representative and legally represents author's rights and can realize his authorities. 27) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Telecommunication Article 38. Provision of the Telecommunication Anonymity 38.2. The limitation of the information transmitted by the telecommunication means can be allowed only in the circumstances
--	---

məhdudlaşdırılmasına yalnız qanunvericiliklə müəyyən edilmiş hallarda yol verilir. 28) İnformasiya əldə etmək haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu Maddə 2. İnformasiya əldə etmək azadlığı 2.1. Azərbaycan Respublikasında informasiyanın əldə olunması azaddır.	determined by law. 28) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Getting Information Article 2. The freedom to get the information 2.1. The acquisition of information in the Republic of Azerbaijan is free.
29) Kommersiya sirri haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının Qanunu Maddə 5. Kommersiya sirri sahibinin hüquqları 5.0. Kommersiya sirri sahibinin aşağıdakı hüquqları vardır: 5.0.1. kommersiya sirri rejimini müəyyən etmək, dəyişmək və ləğv etmək; 5.0.2. kommersiya sirrindən istifadə etmək, müqavilə əsasında başqa şəxslərə vermək, mülki dövriyyəyə daxil edilmənin digər üsullarını tətbiq etmək; 5.0.3. kommersiya sirrinin rejimini pozan və ya belə rejimin pozulmasına təhlükə yaradan hərəkətlərdən qanunvericiliyə uyğun olaraq müdafiə olunmaq; 5.0.4. kommersiya sirrindən öz maraqları üçün istifadə etmiş şəxslərdən vurulan ziyanın əvəzini məhkəmə qaydasında almaq.	29) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Trade Secret Article 5. Rights of a trade secret owner 5.0. Trade secret owner has following rights: 5.0.1. to determine, change and cancel the regime of trade secret; 5.0.2. to use, give to other persons if it is based on contract and apply the other methods of involving to civil circulation of trade secret; 5.0.3. to have a defend from the action offended or may offend the regime of trade secret; 5.0.4. to demand compensation of the harm from the persons, who used the trade secret for their interests, under judiciary.
30) Azərbaycan Jurnalistlərinin Peşə Davranışı Qaydaları Prinsip 3. Şərəf və ləyaqətin qorunması, şəxsi	30) Professional Code of Conduct of Azerbaijani Journalists Principle 3: Protection of honour and dignity,

həyatın toxunulmazlığı 3.1. Jurnalist adamları millətində, irqində, cinsində, dilində, peşəsində, dinində, yaşadığı və ya anadan olduğu yerinə görə pislənməməli, onlar haqqında bu qəbildən olan bilgiləri qabartmamalıdır 3.2. Jurnalist görüşdüyü, haqqında yazdığı hər bir şəxsin şərəf və ləyaqətində, şəxsi həyatının toxunulmazlığı prinsipinə hörmətlə yanaşmalıdır. 3.3. Jurnalist vətəndaşların şəxsi həyatına aid faktları, onlar cəmiyyətin maraqlarına toxunmursa, hüquqa zidd deyilsə və ya ictimai əhəmiyyət kəsb etmirsə, özlərinin razılığı olmadan yayı bilməz. 3.4. Jurnalist və kütləvi informasiya vasitəsi buraxdığı səhvi, həmin səhvi kimin müəyyən etməsindən asılı olmayaraq, maksimum qısa müddətdə və tam həcmdə aradan qaldırılmalıdır. Düzəliş zamanı aydın olmalıdır ki, əvvəl verilən məlumat tam, yoxsa konkret hansı hissədə səhvdir. 3.5. Şəxsi xarakter daşıyan məktublar dərc edilərkən onların müəllifindən, göndərildiyi şəxsdən və ya həmin şəxsin varislərindən icazə alınmalıdır. 3.6. Bədbəxt hadisələr və ya cinayət nəticəsində zərər çəkmiş şəxslərin razılığı olmadan onların adları açıqlanmamalı, şəkilləri verilməməlidir. Bu, yalnız xüsusi məqamlarda və zərərçəkənin ictimai fiqur olduğu hallarda mümkündür. Əgər cinayəti yeniyetmələr və ya uşaqlar (18 yaşı tamam olmamış şəxslər) törədibsə, bu zaman da cinayətkarın adını açıqlamaqdan və şəklini yaymaqdan çəkinmək	inviolability of personal life 3.1 Journalists shall not condemn people for their nationality, race, sex, language, profession, religion, and place of birth or residence and shall not highlight such data. 3.2 Journalists shall respect the honour, dignity, and inviolability of personal life of the person he/she meets with and writes about. 3.3 Journalists may not disseminate facts about citizens' personal lives without their consent, unless dissemination of such information does not violate the rights of the society, is lawful, does not contradict social interest and is of public unimportance. 3.4 Journalists and mass media entities must correct their errors wholly and as soon as possible, regardless of the person who identified the error. The correction should indicate whether the related article was erroneous in whole or in part. 3.5 When publishing personal letters, the author, the person to whom the letter is addressed to, or their heirs, should be asked for permission. 3.6 Names or images of victims who suffered from accidents or crime must not be disclosed without their consent. This is possible under special conditions and if the victim is a public figure. If the crime was committed by teenagers or children (persons below 18 years of age), journalists should refrain from disseminating the names or pictures of the criminals.
---	--

lazımdır.

3.7. Jurnalist, cinayətdə şübhəli bilinən şəxsin təqsirsizlik prezumpsiyası hüququna hörmətlə yanaşmalı, onu təqdim edərkən onun cinayətkar kimi yox, şübhəli şəxs qismində saxlanılan şəxs kimi təqdim etməlidir.

3.8. Kütləvi informasiya vasitəsi hər hansı vətəndaşın şübhəli şəxs kimi həbs olunması, yaxud istintaqa cəlb edilməsi barədə məlumat yaymışsa və sonradan onun təqsirsizliyi sübuta yetmişə, həmin informasiya orqanı bu barədə mütləq xəbər verməlidir.

3.9. Jurnalist uşaqların məsumluğu və inamından sui-istifadə etməməli, onların hüquqlarına hörmətlə yanaşmalı və onların fikirlərinin çatdırılması ilə bağlı xüsusi məsuliyyət nümayiş etdirməli, valideynlərinin və ya qanuni himayəçilərinin icazəsi olmadan uşaqlardan müsahibə götürməməyə səy göstərməlidir. Daha vacib ictimai əhəmiyyət kəsb edən maraqların mövcud olduğu hallar istisna olmaqla, jurnalist uşaqların şəxsi həyatı barədə məlumatları və ya fotosəkilləri dərc etməməlidir. Jurnalist faciə və ya cinayət əməli nəticəsində zərər çəkmiş və ya belə hadisələrə cəlb edilmiş uşaqların kimliyini mütləq qorumalıdır.

3.10. Cinayət əməli törətməsi ilə bağlı şəxsə qarşı ittiham irəli sürülmüşsə, bu mövzuda məhkəmənin obyektivliyinə təsir göstərəcək reportajlar hazırlanmamalı, hazırlanan reportajlarda isə bütün tərəflərin fikirləri əks olunmalıdır. Cinayət əməllərinin qurbanları öz kimliklərinin açıqlanmasına razı olmadıqda jurnalist belə şəxslərin kimliyinə həssaslıqla yanaşmalıdır. Seksual təcavüzlə bağlı hallarda bu qaydaya xüsusi əhəmiyyət verilməlidir. Şahidlər öz kimliklərinin açıqlanmasına razı

3.7. Journalists should respect the right to presumption of innocence of persons who are suspected of committing crimes and should introduce such persons not as criminals, but as persons who have been detained for being suspected of committing crimes.

3.8. If a mass media entity disseminated information on detention or indictment of a citizen as a suspect and if his/her innocence was later proven, the media entity must inform the public in this regard.

3.9. Journalists shall not take advantage of children's innocence and trust; shall respect their rights and demonstrate a special responsibility in communicating their views; and shall seek to avoid interviewing children without the consent of their parents or lawful guardians. Journalist shall not publish information or photographs about private life of a child unless there is an over-riding public interest. Journalist shall protect the identity of children involved in or affected by tragedy or criminal activity.

3.10. If a person is charged with committing of a crime, journalists shall not prepare reports which could undermine the objectiveness of the court in this issue and opinions from all involved parties should be reflected in such reports. If victims of a crime have not given their consent to be identified, journalists shall treat the identities of such individuals with sensitivity. This rule is especially important in cases involving sexual assault. If witnesses have not consented to being identified and if their identification does not have any public

olmadıqda jurnalist, ictimai əhəmiyyət daşıdırsa belə şəxslərin kimliyinə həssaslıqla yanaşmalıdır. 3.11. Jurnalist cinayət əməlləri, zorakılıq, qəddarlıq və intihar halları barədə reportajlarda belə əməllərin təşviqi və ya əsassız olaraq sensasiyalı formada təqdim olunmasından çəkinməlidir. Jurnalist zorakılığı təşviq edən, təhrik etməyə səy göstərən və ya belə hallara əl atan şəxslər tərəfindən vasitə kimi istifadə olunmamalı, əksinə, öz reportajlarında belə şəxslərin fəaliyyəti barədə müvafiq məhdudyyətləri tətbiq etməli və yalnız müvafiq informasiyanın ictimai əhəmiyyət kəsb etməsi şübhə doğurmadıqda bu barədə reportajlar hazırlamalıdır. 3.12. Jurnalist və redaksiya terror hadisəni şişirdən, terrorçuların məqsədinə xidmət edən qorxu effekti yaradan, terroru oyən və terror hərəkətinə bəraət qazandıran reportajlar verməməlidir. 31) Kütləvi informasiya vasitələri haqqında Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunu Maddə 59. Kütləvi informasiya azadlığının və jurnalist hüquqlarının pozulmasına görə məsuliyyət Kütləvi informasiya vasitələrinin təsisçilərinin, nəşirlərinin, redaksiyalarının (məsul redaktorlarının), yayıcılarının və jurnalistlərin qanuni fəaliyyətinə vətəndaşlar, dövlət orqanları, bələdiyyələr, idarə, müəssisə və təşkilatlar, siyasi partiyalar, habelə ictimai birliklər və ya vəzifəli şəxslər tərəfindən hər hansı müdaxilə, o cümlədən:	importance, journalists shall treat their identity with sensitivity. 3.11 Journalists shall refrain from glorifying or unnecessarily sensational reporting about crime, violence, brutality and suicide. Journalists shall be careful not to be used as a means by those who promote, incite or use violence; instead, journalists shall report on their activities with due constraint and only if there is a clear public interest. 3.12. Journalists or editorials should not prepare reports that exaggerate terror acts; reports that serve the interests of terrorists; reports that create fear or those, which promote or justify terror acts. 31) The Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Mass Media Article 59. The responsibility for failure of freedom of the mass information and press rights Any interference of the citizens, state bodies, municipalities, administrations, entities and organizations, political parties, and also public associations or officials to the legal activity of the founders, publishers, editorial offices (accountable editors), distributors and journalists of mass media, including: applying of censorship;
---	--

senzura tətbiq etmək; peşə müstəqilliyini pozmaq; tirajı və ya onun bir hissəsini qeyri-qanuni müsadirə etmək, yaxud məhv etmək; jurnalisti informasiyanı yaymağa və ya informasiyanı çap etdirməkdən (efirə verməkdən) imtinaya məcbur etmək; jurnalistə informasiya verilməsi üzərinə, Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunvericiliyi ilə qorunan məlumatlar istisna olmaqla, məhdudiyətlər qoymaq və ya informasiya verməkdən imtina etmək; jurnalist sorğusuna Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunvericiliyi ilə müəyyənləşdirilmiş müddətdə cavab verməmək; habelə jurnalistin bu Qanunla müəyyənləşdirilmiş digər hüquqlarını pozmaq Azərbaycan Respublikasının qanunvericiliyinə müvafiq surətdə mülki, inzibati, cinayət və digər məsuliyyətlə səbəb ola bilər. 32) Azərbaycan Respublikasının Cinayət Prosesual Məcəlləsi Maddə 206. Tərədilmiş və ya hazırlanan cinayətlər haqqında kütləvi informasiya vasitələrinin məlumatları 206.1. Cinayətin törədilməsi və ya onun törədilməsinə hazırlıq faktına dair müvafiq kütləvi informasiya vasitəsinə məlum olmuş, cinayət işinin başlanması üçün səbəb hesab edilən kütləvi informasiya vasitələrinin məlumatları mətbuatda, radioda, televiziya və əks etdirildikdən sonra cinayət təqibi	failure of professional independence; pirate suspension or phase-out the production and distribution of mass media; enforcing the journalist to disseminate information or refusing printing the information (broadcasting); introducing limitations on granting to the journalist of the information or waiving of granting of the publication (airing) of the information, except for the information guarded by the legislation of Azerbaijan Republic; not granting the answer on journalist request during the period established by the legislation of Azerbaijan Republic; and also the failure of other rights of the journalist, established by the present Law, which can cause civil, administrative, criminal and other responsibility pursuant to the legislation of the Azerbaijan Republic. 32) Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan Article 206. Mass media information about committed or planned crimes 206.1. Information held by the mass media concerning a crime committed or planned, which is deemed to constitute grounds for instituting criminal proceedings, shall be sent to the persecuting authorities after its disclosure in the press or on radio or
---	--

orqanlarına göndərilməlidir. 206.2. Törədilmiş və ya hazırlanan cinayətlərlə əlaqədar kütləvi informasiya vasitələrinə ünvanlanmış, dərc edilməmiş yazışmalar kütləvi informasiya vasitələrinin vəzifəli şəxsləri tərəfindən bu Məcəllənin 205-ci maddəsində nəzərdə tutulmuş qaydada cinayət təqibi orqanlarına göndərilə bilər. 206.3. Törədilmiş və ya hazırlanan cinayətlər haqqında məlumatları dərc etmiş və ya aidiyyəti üzrə göndərmiş kütləvi informasiya vasitələrinin vəzifəli şəxsləri, habelə həmin məlumatların müəllifləri onlarda olan və cinayət haqqında məlumatı təsdiq edən sənədləri təhqiqatçının, müstəntiqin, ibtidai araşdırmaya prosesual rəhbərliyi həyata keçirən prokurora və ya məhkəməyə təqdim etməlidirlər.	television. 206.2. Correspondence addressed to the mass media about a crime committed or planned, which has not been published, shall be sent by media officials to the persecuting authorities in accordance with Article 205 of this Code. 206.3. Media officials who have published or sent to the authorities information about a crime committed or planned and authors of such information shall submit the documents in their possession confirming the information to the inquirer, the investigator, the prosecutor in charge of the procedural aspects of the investigation or the court.
---	--

ELSA BELGIUM

Contributors

National Coordinator

Daan Wetzels

National Academic Coordinator

Pieter-Jan Ombelet

National Researchers

Christophe Daerden

Nathalie Kimpe

Kristien Poelmans

Pauline Van Sande

National Linguistic Editors

Maxim Arrazola de Oñate

Evelien Wauters

National Academic Supervisor

Prof. Dr. Koen Lemmens

Prof. Dr. Peggy Valcke

1. Introduction

The European Court of Human Rights stated in 1996 that the protection of journalistic sources is one of the basic conditions for freedom of expression. However, even in Belgium there have still been cases where public authorities forced journalists to disclose their sources.

In 2000, the Council of Europe made recommendations about the non-disclosure of journalistic sources for the member-states to implement. Sixteen years after this recommendation this study to analyse how journalistic sources are being protected in Belgium.

The first question will research if there is legislation in Belgium that protects the right of the journalist to non-disclose their information source and even that prohibits the journalist from disclosing the sources. The third question will analyse the national legislation and answer who is protected under the legislation and to what extent.

'What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources? How are the laws implemented? How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?' will be answered in question four.

Questions five and six shall analyse is the Belgian legislation is in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 of the Council of Europe and to what extent.

Hereafter question seven will examine how national courts apply the legislation and balance the different interests at stake.

Questions eight will look into the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information.

Furthermore, question nine will answer the question whether journalists can rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance.

Lastly, this paper will answer if whistle-blowers are protected in anyway.

2. Does the National Legislation Provide (Explicit or Otherwise) Protection of the Right of the Journalists Not to Disclose Their Source of Information? What Type of Legislation provides this protection? How Exactly is This Protection Construed in National Law?

2.1. Does the National Legislation Provide (Explicit or Otherwise) Protection of the Right of the Journalists Not to Disclose Their Source of Information?

Before 2005, Belgium did not have any legislation that explicitly provided journalists with the right not to disclose their source of information.¹ However, professional journalists, that were members of the association of journalists, were bound by ethical codes. These ethical codes encompass the duty for a professional journalist to protect his/her sources.² The codes are however not legally binding.

In 2003, the European Court of Human Rights (hereafter 'ECtHR') convicted Belgium in the case Ernst v. Belgium.³ The case concerned judicial authorities exercising searches and seizures at the offices and homes of four journalists of a Belgian newspaper, as well as at the head office of public broadcasting organisation RTBF.⁴ The searches were performed in connection with the prosecution of members of police and court. The ECtHR found a violation of article 8 and 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights (hereafter 'ECHR'). It held that the wide scale of the searches and seizures by the authorities was not proportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. After this conviction, Belgium started focusing more on the legal recognition of the protection of journalistic sources. Nevertheless, as mentioned above, it took until 2005 for Belgium to recognise the protection of journalistic sources with its Belgian Protection of Journalistic Sources Act of 7 April 2005. Article 3 of the Belgian Protection of Journalistic Sources Act of April 7 2005 implicitly defines journalistic sources as sources such as the informant of their information, every information, document or recording which contain information such as the identity of their informants, the type and origin of their information, the identity of the author of a text or audio-visual production, or the content of the information.⁵

2.2. What Type of Legislation provides this protection?

¹ E. Werkers, E. Lievens and P. Valcke, 'Bronnengeheim voor Bloggers?' [2006] NjW 630 [Dutch].

² Article 19 of the Code of the Council for Journalism.

³ Ernst et autres v. Belgium [2003] European Court of Human Rights, <http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-61214> [French].

⁴ D. Voorhoof, 'Case of Ernst and Others v. Belgium' <<http://merlin.obs.coe.int/iris/2003/9/article4.en.html>> accessed 14 February 2016 [English].

⁵ This list is not exhaustive; K. Lemmens, "Wovon Man Nicht Reden Kann, Darüber Muss Man Scheigen". Het Journalistieke Zwijgrecht Wettelijk Beschermd (die Keure 2008) 29 [Dutch].

The Belgian Protection of Journalistic Sources Act of April 7 2005 (hereafter 'Act'), which is a federal law.

2.3. How Exactly is This Protection Construed in National Law?

Article 3 of the Act provides journalists and editorial staff with the right not to disclose their journalistic sources. This entails that they cannot be forced to disclose their sources; nor to reveal information, documents, recordings which contain information such as the identity of their informants, the type and origin of their information, the identity of the author of a text or audio-visual production, nor the content of the information; nor to hand over the original documents if this could possibly entail identifying the informant. However, this list is not exhaustive.⁶

Considering the general phrasing of article 3, the journalist and the editorial staff also enjoy this protection during hearings in civil and criminal proceedings.⁷ In this way, they are thus protected whenever they are heard as a witness as well as a defendant.

Nevertheless, the protection of journalistic sources is not considered an absolute right. Under article 4 of the Act, a journalist or editorial staff can be forced to disclose protected information to a judicial authority when the following conditions are fulfilled. A journalist or editorial staff can only be ordered to reveal their source of information at the request of a judge, and on the condition that the information at issue is likely to prevent certain crimes which pose a serious threat to the physical integrity of one or more persons. This includes the offences referred to in article 137 of the Belgian Criminal Code which concerns deals with crimes of terrorism, on the condition that they pose a risk for the physical integrity, and if (i) the information is crucial for the prevention of these crimes, and; (ii) it cannot be obtained in another way.

In accordance with article 5, the information in question cannot be submitted to any detection or investigation measures, unless this information would be able to prevent the crimes referred to in article 4, and only in accordance with the conditions stemming from the latter. However, the Act does not provide a penalty in the event that a judicial authority would violate this legislation.

Article 6 of the Act protects journalists and editorial staff from prosecution for fencing if they exercise their right of non-disclosure of their sources. Maybe we can construe it in the following way: Article 6 protects journalists and editorial staff from prosecution for the Belgian offence of fencing which can be defined as the possession of unlawfully obtained goods, which have been acquired by another person by an offense or crime, whenever they would decide not to disclose the source of their information.

⁶ K. Lemmens, "Wovon Man Nicht Reden Kann, Darüber Muss Man Scheigen". Het Journalistieke Zwijgrecht Wettelijk Beschermd" (die Keure 2008) 29 [Dutch].

⁷ Ibid.

Lastly, article 7 provides the protection of journalists and editorial staff against the conviction of an accessory charge for the crime of breach of professional confidence committed by the source. In this way the legislator wanted to put an end to the judicial practice which convicted journalists as an accessory of the breach of professional confidence in the event that the journalist had exercised his/her right of non-disclosure.⁸ However, this article does not protect the journalist from being convicted as an accomplice, nor from being convicted as an accessory under other articles.

3. Is There, in Domestic Law, a Provision That Prohibits a Journalist from Disclosing His/Her Sources? How Exactly Is this Prohibition Construed in National Law? What Is the Sanction?

In Belgium there is no legislation that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his sources.

As mentioned above, article 3 of the Act provides journalists and editorial staff with the right to non-disclosure of information or documents, as well as the right not to be a witness provided that his testimony, or the information he would thereby reveal could be used against the interests of the source of the information in question. The Act provides merely for a right of non-disclosure, not a duty. Nonetheless, in Belgium, professional journalists are bound by an ethical code of the Press Council. The ethical code stipulates the duty of a journalist not to disclose the sources of his information. However, the definition of a 'professional journalist' is more stringent than the notion of 'journalist' as defined by the Act. The journalists who are associated with the Press Council can face disciplinary action such as a reprimand, suspension, or their title of journalist could be revoked if they breach their ethical code.⁹ However, the ethical code is not legally binding.

In Belgium, certain professions entail a professional confidentiality obligation that is sanctioned under criminal law.¹⁰ However, this is primarily the case with regard to professions in the legal and (para)medical world. Journalists, on the contrary, do not have a mandatory professional confidentiality and therefore cannot be sanctioned for the disclosure of their sources under the Criminal Code, nor under the Labour Code.¹¹

4. Who Is a “Journalist” According to the National Legislation? Is It, in Your View, a Restricted Definition for the Purpose of the Protection of Journalistic Sources? What Is the Scope of Protection of Other

⁸ Ibid, 31-32.

⁹ B. Hansez, 'Een Orde van Journalisten?' [2000-01] Jura Falc. 95-120 [Dutch].

¹⁰ Article 458 Belgian Criminal Code.

¹¹ K. Lemmens, Het Journalistieke Zwijgrecht Wettelijk Beschermd 33.

Media Actors? Is the Protection of Journalists' Sources Extended to Anyone Else?

4.1. Who Is A "Journalist" According to the National Legislation?

Traditionally, article 2 (1°) of the Act defined a 'journalist' as "anyone who is self-employed or works as an employee, as well as any legal entity, and who regularly makes a direct contribution to the gathering, editing, production or distribution of information for the public by way of a medium".

Firstly, this definition only protects persons who are journalists in a 'professional way'. Persons that write articles on a voluntary basis will not fall under the scope of the Act. Secondly, these persons must exercise their journalistic activities on a regularly basis.

This interpretation was, however, partly annulled by the Belgian Constitutional Court in its judgment of June 7 2006.¹² The Court examined the definition in light of the articles 19 (freedom of speech) and 25 (freedom of press) of the Belgian Constitution (hereafter 'Constitution'), article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights, and found a violation of article 19 (2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. It highlighted the case-law of the ECHR which described the protection of journalistic sources as "one of the keystones of freedom of press"¹³ and emphasised the function of the press as a watchdog to inform the public on matters of common interest.¹⁴ Following this case law, the Constitutional Court annulled the following words of article 2 (1°) of the Act: "Journalist, and thus" and "is self-employed or works as an employee, as well as any legal entity, and who regularly".

Following this judgement the Act was amended by the Act of May 6 2006. The amendment expanded the scope of the Act by providing for a broader notion of 'journalist'. Today, the new article 2 (1°) of the Act defines a "journalist" as "anyone who directly contributes to the gathering editing, production or distribution of information for the public by way of a medium".

4.2. Is It, in Your View, a Restricted Definition for the Purpose of the Protection of Journalistic Sources?

As mentioned under the previous question, as a result of the judgement of the Constitutional Court and the subsequent amendment to the scope of the notion 'journalist' was broadened. The new broadened definition grants the protection of sources to anyone who publishes facts or opinions on a regular basis. The notion of a “medium” in the definition requires a minimum level of regularity.¹⁵ However, the definition is less strict than the one in the previous version, as the definition is not oriented towards the professional occupation of the “journalist”, but instead looks at the type of activities that a journalist exercises.¹⁶ It follows that not only professional journalists fall within the scope of the Act, but also anyone who publishes on a purely altruistic basis, such as bloggers.

¹² N° 91/2006 [2006] Constitutional Court of Belgium <<http://www.const-court.be/public/n/2006/2006-091n.pdf>> [Dutch].

¹³ Goodwin v. United Kingdom [1996] European Court of Human Rights, <http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-57974> [English]; Roemen and Schmit v. Luxembourg [2003] European Court of Human Rights, <http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-60958> [English]; Ernst et autres v. Belgium [2003] European Court of Human Rights, <http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-61214> [French].

¹⁴ Ibid.

4.3. What Is the Scope of Protection of Other Media Actors?

As stated above, the Act also protects the editorial staff. Art 2 (2°) defines “editorial staff” in a broad way as “anyone who, during the exercise of his functions, may be in a position to have knowledge of information that can lead to the revelation of a source through the gathering, the editorial treatment, the production or the distribution of this information”.

This definition includes, for example, protected press photographers, documentary makers, as well as staff who help prepare the files.¹⁷ As the legislator favoured the word “functions” over “profession”, not only professional editorial staff fall under this protection, but also editorial staff that contributed to the making of a (video)blog. Such an interpretation similarly follows the constitutional protection of freedom of press under article 25 of the Constitution.¹⁸

To sum up, “editorial staff” enjoy the same protection of journalistic sources as “journalists” under the Act. The reasoning behind this is that such protection is quintessential in order to have an effective protection of journalistic sources, because otherwise the protection of the journalists would be too easily circumvented.¹⁹

4.4. Is the Protection of Journalists’ Sources Extended to Anyone Else?

The Act only protects journalists and editorial staff, and thus cannot be invoked by the source itself, or a third party. The Belgian Court of Cassation confirmed this in its case of February 7 2008.²⁰ Pursuant to a complaint alleging a breach of professional secrecy, an investigation was initiated against a police officer. The police officer allegedly had given confidential information to a journalist. The police officer invoked the protection of journalistic sources under the Act. However, the Belgian Supreme Court stated, in accordance with the parliamentary preparations, ¹⁵ Werkers, ‘Bronnengeheim voor Bloggers?’ 633; K. Lemmens, Het Journalistieke Zwijgrecht Wettelijk Beschermd 27.

¹⁶ E. Werkers, E. Lievens, S. Paulussen, D. Geens and K. Vandenbrande, ‘Ethics and Rights for Online Journalists: Inseparable and Obligatory?’ (paper submitted for “The End of Journalism?”, International Journalism Conference 2008, Centre for International Media Analysis, Luton, UK, 17 October 2008) <<http://theendofjournalism.wdfiles.com/local--files/werkeretal/Werkers%20et%20al.pdf>>.

¹⁷ E. Brewaeys, ‘Informatiebronnen van Journalisten’ [2005] NjW 542 [Dutch].

¹⁸ Ibid.

¹⁹ K. Lemmens, Het Journalistieke Zwijgrecht Wettelijk Beschermd 28.

²⁰ P.07.1466.F.1 [2008] Court of Cassation of Belgium <<http://www.cass.be>> [2008].

that the Act only applies to journalists and editorial staff, and that a third party who is suspected of unlawful disclosure of information cannot invoke the Act, even if it concerns the disclosure of information to a journalist.

5. What Are the Legal Safeguards for the Protection of Journalistic Sources? How Are the Laws Implemented? How Are the Legal Safeguards Combined with Self-Regulatory Mechanisms?

In Belgian domestic law there are several legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources. These safeguards can be found in the Constitution, in the Act on the protection of journalistic sources, in the Act on the regulation of the Intelligence and Security Service and in journalistic ethical codes.

5.1. What Are the Legal Safeguards for the Protection of Journalistic Sources? How Are the Laws Implemented?

The first source of legal safeguards to be discussed, is the Belgian Constitution. The universal right of freedom of expression for every individual is enshrined in article 19, while article 25 offers an express protection for journalists, as well as safeguards for the freedom of press. These two articles can be considered as the general sources of the protection of journalistic sources in Belgium.²¹

A more specific source of law is the Act on the protection of journalistic sources of 7 April 2005. The Act introduces that all beneficiaries of the Act have the right not to disclose their sources. The answer to the question in title 2.3 explains the scope of the journalistic protection and clarifies which persons are favoured by the Act. As mentioned above, the beneficiaries of the Act are protected against a prosecution for the crime of fencing (article 6) or as an accessory to crimes (article 7).²² This is an important legal safeguard because such situations sometimes occurred in the past. The cases of Jespers (1977) and Coenen (1985) are examples of journalists arrested for fencing and complicity because they did not want to disclose their sources.²³ Under 1.3., it was also pointed out that the right of non-disclosure can be limited under certain conditions stemming from article 4. As explained, the beneficiaries of the Act can only be forced to disclose information to prevent the commission of a crime posing a serious threat to the physical integrity of persons on the basis of a court order. As the criterion of 'serious threat' is not defined in the Act, it needs to be interpreted by the competent courts. It goes without saying that the interpretation of judges will be an important factor for the protection of sources. Considering that when the judge applies a restrictive interpretation of 'serious threat' the secrecy of sources will logically be protected in a stronger way.²⁴

²¹ Piet Martens, Mediarecht voor journalisten, (Garant, 2005) 17 [Dutch]; Stéphane Hoebeke and Bernard Mouffe, Le droit de la presse (2nd edn, Academia Bruylant, 2005) 54 [French]; Peggy Valcke and Eva Lievens, Media Law in Belgium, (Kluwer Law International, 2011) 51-53; Dirk Voorhoof and Peggy Valcke, Handboek mediarecht, (4th edn, Larcier, 2015) 27 [Dutch].

²² Question 1.3

²³ Jan Ceuleers, "Eindelijk: het journalistiek zwijgrecht (bijna) wettelijk erkend" [2004] AM 222 [Dutch].

Likewise, it was pointed out that such an exception is only applicable if (i) the information is necessary to prevent crimes and; (ii) the information cannot be obtained in another way. On the basis of the same conditions it is also possible to take investigative measures against journalists (article 5). It follows that exceptions are not applicable if the crimes are already taking place or if they are/have already been completed. The competent authorities thus need to prove that it enables them to prevent a potential future crime.

Article 10 of the ECHR contains a similar exception, as paragraph 2 states that the freedom of expression may be limited by pursuing the legitimate aim of preventing criminality, on the condition that the exception is provided by law and is necessary in a democratic society.²⁵ Also, the possibility of making an exception to the secrecy of journalistic sources on the basis of article 10, para 2 in case of a serious ongoing crime, has been recognised in the legal doctrine. Such an exception, however, is not possible on the basis of the Belgian Act.²⁶

A weakness of the Act is the lack of a sanction in case of a violation of the provisions. Nevertheless there are some examples of journalists who claimed damages after the rights granted to them on the basis of the Act were violated. They effectively received compensation.²⁷ Remarkably, at the moment of the facts the Act was not applicable yet.²⁸

Since 2010, the Act on the regulation of the Intelligence and Security Service of 30 November 1998 (hereafter 'ISS Act') also deals with the secrecy of journalistic sources. This ISS Act will be discussed more at length in question in title 8, but a few principles will be mentioned here. The ISS Act ensures that special methods of investigation are adapted to guarantee the secrecy of journalistic sources. On the basis of article 2 (2) of the Act, the Intelligence and Security Service is not allowed to obtain, analyse or exploit data protection under the principle of secrecy of journalistic sources, unless there is a serious indication that the journalist personally or actively participates or participated in the development of a potential threat. The several possible kinds of threats are listed in the Act. Moreover, the exceptional methods need to be necessary.²⁹

²⁴ Dirk Voorhoof, Het journalistiek bronnengeheim ontbult, (die Keure, 2008) 32-34 [Dutch]; Dirk Voorhoof and Peggy Valcke, Handboek mediarecht, (4th edn, Larcier, 2015) 335-336 [Dutch].

²⁵ Secic v Croatia [2007] European Court of Human Rights.

²⁶ Dirk Voorhoof, Het journalistiek bronnengeheim ontbult, (die Keure, 2008) 32-33 [Dutch]; Tessa Gombeer, "Recente rechtspraak van het Europees Mensenrechtenhof inzake artikel 10 EVRM en impact van de journalistieke beroepsethiek" [2009] Nullum Crimen 79 [Dutch].

²⁷ De Graaf v Belgium [2007] Court of First Instance of Brussels, AM [2007], 500 [Dutch].

²⁸ Dirk Voorhoof, Het journalistiek bronnengeheim ontbult, (die Keure, 2008) 51-52 [Dutch]; Dirk Voorhoof and Peggy Valcke, Handboek mediarecht, (4th edn, Larcier, 2015) 336-337 [Dutch].

²⁹ Dirk Voorhoof and Peggy Valcke, Handboek mediarecht, (4th edn, Larcier, 2015) 338-339 [Dutch].

When the Intelligence and Security Service uses special methods of investigation with regard to journalists, they are obliged to notify the president of AVBB, the General Association of Professional Journalists in Belgium. As a result, the investigations will be carried out under the supervision of a special commission, which is tasked to verify whether there is a direct link between the threat and the obtained data under art 18 (2) of the ISS Act. Also, under article 18 (3) of the ISS Act, the commission has to give an advice on possible “serious indications” of the journalist’s involvement and the necessity to move on to the use of special investigation methods.³⁰

The ISS Act only applies to professional journalists, which does not mean that non-professional journalists do not enjoy any protection of sources. They will be covered by the aforementioned Act on the protection of journalistic sources and article 10 ECHR.³¹

5.2. How Are the Legal Safeguards Combined with Self-Regulatory Mechanisms

As explained above, journalists are subject to a deontological or ethical code. The International Code of the International Federation of Journalists, the Declaration of Duties and Rights of Journalists are both important international sources of journalistic deontology. Important Belgian sources of journalistic deontology are the Code of journalistic principles and the Code of the Council for Journalism.³²

As it is very important for a journalist to have the right to collect data and to publish information and opinions freely, one of the most important deontological duties of the journalist is the protection of secrecy of sources.³³

In 2002, the Belgian Council for Journalism was established, which is a self-regulatory body for journalists in the Flemish part of Belgium. It is an independent institution which treats questions and complaints about the professional practice, and consists of six journalists, six representatives of editors, media houses and news agencies, and six external members. Any individual can approach the Council with general questions or complaints. The Secretary General acts as an ‘ombudsman’ and tries to obtain a settlement between the applicant and the journalist.

Deontological rules are taken into account in the rulings of the Council. The Code of the Council for Journalism (hereafter ‘the Code’) is such an instrument. The Code explicitly states ³⁰ Dirk Voorhoof and Peggy Valcke, Handboek mediarecht, (4th edn, Larcier, 2015) 339 [Dutch].

³¹ Dirk Voorhoof and Peggy Valcke, Handboek mediarecht, (4th edn, Larcier, 2015) 340 [Dutch].

³² Stéphane Hoebeke and Bernard Mouffe, Le droit de la presse: presse écrite presse audiovisuelle, presse électronique, (Anthemis, 2012) 841-851 [French]; Eric Brewaeyts, Dirk Voorhoof and Filip Voets, Wetboek media en journalistiek, (Kluwer, 2014) 164-165 [Dutch].

³³ Piet Martens, Mediarecht voor journalisten, (Garant, 2005) 142 [Dutch]; Stéphane Hoebeke and Bernard Mouffe, Le droit de la presse: presse écrite presse audiovisuelle, presse électronique, (Anthemis, 2012) 851-853 [French]; Peggy Valcke and Eva Lievens, Media Law in Belgium, (Kluwer Law International, 2011) 59-60; Dirk Voorhoof and Peggy Valcke, Handboek mediarecht, (4th edn, Larcier, 2015) 334-335 [Dutch].

that the issue of secrecy of sources will be subject to the self-regulation system,³⁴ with a view to stimulating the autonomy of journalism.³⁵

In the French Community of Belgium there is the Council of Journalistic Deontology. The Council was established in 2009 and is composed of the same members as the Flemish equivalent. It is engaged with the functions of information, mediation and regulation.³⁶ Everybody has the possibility to file a complaint.³⁷ The Council of Journalistic Deontology also has its own Code of Journalistic Deontology and a self-regulatory system.³⁸

Article 19 of the Code of the Council for Journalism of the Flemish community provides that a journalist protects the identity of its sources to whom he has promised confidentiality, and sources of whom he knew or should have known that they gave to him the information while expecting that he would not reveal their identity. The same provision can be found in article 21 of the Code of Journalistic Deontology of the French Community. On the basis of principle 8 of the Flemish Code of journalistic principles a journalist can only reveal the source if he receives the explicit authorization of the informant.

6. In the Respective National Legislation, Are the Limits of Non-Disclosure of the Information in Line with the Principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) ? What Are the Procedures Applied? Is the Disclosure Limited to Exceptional Circumstances, Taking into Consideration Vital Public or Individual Interests at Stake? Do the Authorities First Search for and Apply Alternative Measures, which Adequately Protect their Respective Rights and Interests and at the Same Time Are Less Intrusive with Regard to the Right of Journalists Not to Disclose Information?

6.1. In the Respective National Legislation Are the Limits of Non-Disclosure of the Information in Line with the Principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) ?

³⁴ Guidelines article 13 Code van de Raad voor de Journalistiek 20 september 2010.

³⁵ X, Raad voor de Journalistiek <<http://www.rvdj.be/node/58>> accessed 13 February 2016 [Dutch].

³⁶ X, Un conseil de déontologie, pour le public et pour le medias <<http://www.deontologiejournalistique.be/index.php?presentation>> accessed 11 Mars 2016 [French]

³⁷ X, Code de déontologie journalistique <<http://www.deontologiejournalistique.be/index.php?presentation>> accessed 11 Mars 2016 [French]

³⁸ X, Introduire une plainte <<http://www.deontologiejournalistique.be/index.php?presentation>> accessed 11 Mars 2016 [French]

Recommendation No. R (2002) 7 aims to protect the right of non-disclosure of the sources of information of journalists. The recommendation sets up seven basic principles that legislation of Member States need to be in accordance with.

The first principle is the right of non-disclosure of journalists. The second principle contains the right of non-disclosure of other persons. These two principles provide a general protection of journalistic sources, without discussing the limits of non-disclosure.

The possible exceptions to the right of non-disclosure are mentioned in principle 3. This principle sets out the conditions for the exception of an “overriding requirement in the public interest”. A journalist can only be obliged to reveal his source in the following cases:

(a) The right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source must not be subject to other restrictions than those mentioned in article 10, paragraph 2 of the Convention. In determining whether a legitimate interest in a disclosure falling within the scope of article 10, paragraph 2 of the Convention outweighs the public interest in not disclosing information identifying a source, competent authorities of member states shall pay particular regard to the importance of the right of non-disclosure and the pre-eminence given to it in the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, and may only order a disclosure if, subject to paragraph b, there exists an overriding requirement in the public interest and if circumstances are of a sufficiently vital and serious nature.

(b) The disclosure of information identifying a source should not be deemed necessary unless it can be convincingly established that:

i. reasonable alternative measures to the disclosure do not exist or have been exhausted by the persons or public authorities that seek the disclosure, and

ii. the legitimate interest in the disclosure clearly outweighs the public interest in the non-disclosure, bearing in mind that: - an overriding requirement of the need for disclosure is proved, - the circumstances are of a sufficiently vital and serious nature, - the necessity of the disclosure is identified as responding to a pressing social need, and - member states enjoy a certain margin of appreciation in assessing this need, but this margin goes hand in hand with the supervision by the European Court of Human Rights.

(c) The above requirements should be applied at all stages of any proceedings where the right of non-disclosure might be invoked.

As mentioned above, in Belgian Law, article 4 of the Act on the Protection of Journalistic Sources states that beneficiaries of the Act can be forced by a court order to disclose relevant information to prevent a serious threat for the physical integrity of persons or crimes in the sense of article 137 of the Belgian Criminal Code. On the basis of article 5 of the Act on the Protection of Journalistic Sources the above exception is only applicable if the information is necessary to prevent crimes and if the information cannot be obtained in another way. This article also states that on the basis of the same conditions it is possible to take investigative measures against journalists.

Prevention of crimes in the sense of article 4 of the Act can be considered as an overriding requirement in the public interest and a legitimate aim in the sense of principle 3 of the Recommendation. Similar to the Recommendation, the Act requires that there are no reasonable alternative measures to the disclosure.

The answer to the questions in title 5 and 9 gives a comprehensive explanation about the ISS Act. However, with regard to the limits to the right of non-disclosure, it might be relevant to elaborate on article 2 of the ISS Act. On the basis of this article, it is not allowed to obtain, analyse or exploit data, protected by the secrecy of journalistic sources. Nevertheless, the relevant service put this principle aside if there are serious indications that the journalist personally or actively participates or has participated in the development of a potential threat. The several possible kinds of threats are listed in the Act. Examples are threats to the internal or external security of the state, military security, the democratic and constitutional order, international relations, scientific or economic potential or any other fundamental interest of the country, such as espionage, terrorism, extremism, proliferation or participation to harmful sectarian organisations or criminal organisations. It should be pointed out, however, that his exception is limited by the necessity-requirement.³⁹

A serious threat in the sense of the ISS Act could form an overriding requirement in the public interest and thus a legitimate aim in the sense of principle 3 of the Recommendation, as the above kind of threats are crucial for the general interest and the functioning of a state. Also, the ISS Act requirement of necessity can similarly be found in the Recommendation.

6.2. What Are the Procedures Applied?

The Act provides safeguards against judicial authorities and the police force. The conditions in which there can be an exception to the secrecy of sources are mentioned above. These are no procedural conditions. The ISS Act which covers state security or any other intelligence service, states that the intervention of the Intelligence and Security service requires some procedural requirements. These requirements are discussed in the answer to the question in title 9.

6.3. Is the Disclosure Limited to Exceptional Circumstances, Taking into Consideration Vital Public or Individual Interests at Stake?

The answer to question 2.3. and 6.1 shows that the right of non-disclosure can only be limited in exceptional circumstances. It can be limited for the prevention of crimes on the basis of article 4 of the Act on the protection of journalistic sources and when there is a serious threat in the sense of the ISS Act.

6.4. Do the Authorities First Search for and Apply Alternative Measures, which Adequately Protect their Respective Rights and Interests and at the Same Time Are Less Intrusive with Regard to the Right of Journalists Not to Disclose Information?

³⁹ Dirk Voorhoof and Peggy Valcke, Handboek mediarecht, (4th edn, Larcier, 2015) 338-339 [Dutch].

Article 5 of the Act on the Protection of Journalistic Sources explicitly mentions that the secrecy of sources can only be limited if the information is necessary to prevent crimes and if the information cannot be obtained in another way. Consequently, the authorities need to search for and apply reasonable alternative measures if it is possible.

A good example is the judgement of the Court of First Instance of Brussels of June 29 2007.⁴⁰ It concerned the registration of phone calls of a journalist. The Court of First Instance ruled that due to the nature of the facts, it was a disproportionate violation of the secrecy of journalistic sources, as it would have been possible to take alternative investigation measures. The state of Belgium was thus convicted for monitoring the journalist's phone activity. This case is discussed in more depth in the answer to the question in title 8.

7. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 the Following Principles Should Be Respected when the Necessity of Disclosure Is Stated: Absence of Reasonable Alternative Measures, Outweighing Legitimate Interest (Protection of Human Life, Prevention of Major Crime, Defence of a Person Accused or Convicted of Having Committed a Major Crime). Under which Criteria Can the Interest in the Disclosure Outweigh the Interest in the Non-Disclosure?

Council of Europe

Recommendation 7 of the Committee of Ministers on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information contains three relevant principles: principles 3, 5 and 6. Principle 3 describes certain limits to the right of non-disclosure, which have been discussed above in question in title 6.

Principle 4 concerns Alternative evidence to journalists' sources. It stipulates that in legal proceedings against a journalist on grounds of an alleged infringement of the honour or reputation of a person, authorities should consider, for the purpose of establishing the truth or otherwise of the allegation, all evidence which is available to them under national procedural law and may not require for that purpose the disclosure of information identifying a source by the journalist. So in these kinds of procedures the right of non-disclosure is not overruled by an overriding interest to restore the honour or reputation of a person.

Finally, principle 5 establishes certain conditions for cases in which a disclosure can be justified based on an overriding interest. The first condition states that the request to disclose journalistic sources can only be made by persons or public authorities which have a direct legitimate interest in the disclosure. Secondly, journalists should be informed about their right not to disclose the source as well as the limits of this right. They should be informed before the disclosure is requested. The third condition stipulates that sanctions against journalists for not disclosing their source can only be imposed by judicial authorities. This should happen during proceedings which allow for a hearing of the journalist in question in accordance with the procedural safeguards of article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Fourthly, this sanction for non-disclosure after a valid request should be subject to review by another judicial authority. Lastly, if journalists disclose information which can reveal their source the competent authorities should limit the extent of the disclosure as far as possible; for example by excluding the public from the disclosure and by themselves respecting the confidentiality of the disclosure.

⁴⁰ De Graaf v Belgium [2007] Court of First Instance of Brussels, AM [2007], 500 [Dutch].

As such, the Recommendation does not list any specific overriding interest which can justify an exception to the principle of non-disclosure of information which can reveal the source. Instead, the Recommendation includes a series of checks and criteria which must be taken into account by the competent authorities when assessing the legitimate interest.

A Member State's law should specify the conditions in which a disclosure can be justified. This is in line with the case law of the ECHR, which stresses that limitations to Article 10 must be "prescribed by law". The Court has held that "relevant national law must be formulated with a sufficient precision to enable the persons concerned - if need be with appropriate legal advice - to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail", and be formulated with sufficient clarity to provide the individual "adequate protection against arbitrary interference" by public authorities through an unlimited discretion.⁴¹

Belgian law

As mentioned above, article 4 of the Act states that the right of non-disclosure of a journalist or editorial staff member can be limited under certain conditions.⁴² A judicial authority may request the revelation of the source of information if that information is likely to prevent certain crimes that pose a serious threat for the physical integrity of one or more persons, which also includes the offences referred to in article 137 of the Belgian Criminal Code that concern crimes of terrorism. The information must only be disclosed if the crime poses a risk for the physical integrity, and to the extent that following cumulative conditions are met: (1) the information is crucial for the prevention of these crimes; (2) and the information cannot be obtained by any other means. Until now this is in line with the Recommendation, even though the field of application is more restrictive than the one envisaged by the Council of Europe.

A judge can only obligate the journalist to disclose the information in certain circumstances. Foremost, the disclosure can only be ordered for the prevention of a crime.⁴³ In other words, a judge cannot order the disclosure of information if the crime is already committed (for example after a terrorist attack) or during a criminal offence (for example during a hostage taking). Only a criminal judge, the investigating judge or the trial judge, can order the disclosure of sources.

⁴¹ ECHR, Goodwin v. the United Kingdom, 27 March 1996, para. 31

⁴² Article 4 of the Belgian Protection of Journalistic Sources Act of 7 April 2005.

⁴³ K. Lemmens, "Wovon Man Nicht Reden Kann, Darüber Muss Man Schweigen". Het Journalistieke Zwijgrecht Wettelijk Beschermd" (die Keure 2008) 32 [Dutch].

Next, the crime must pose a serious threat for the physical integrity of one or more persons. The Act is restrictive since there are no other exceptions foreseen. Article 10 ECHR states, for example, freedom of expression can also be restricted for the protection of other persons. Furthermore the Recommendation hints to make an exception for the defence of a person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime. The Act however only mentions the exception of “a serious threat for the physical integrity” and no other exceptions. Furthermore, the Act includes all the crimes of terrorism mentioned in article 137 of the Belgian Criminal Code as crimes that pose a serious threat for the physical integrity. The article does not clarify any other crimes that can be seen as a serious threat for physical integrity and it does not define ‘serious threat for physical integrity’.⁴⁴ This decision is up to the judge.

Additionally, the Act provides conditions with regard to the subsidiarity principle.⁴⁵ Article 4 states that it must be imperative that the information is of crucial importance for the prevention of the crime, unless there are other reasonable alternative measures to obtain the information. The Act also provides a proportionality condition, when it states that the information must be crucial to prevent the crime.⁴⁶ Finally, the a priori judicial review of the exception to the right of non-disclosure is in line with the case-law of the ECHR, which envisages an effective protection of the right of non-disclosure of journalistic sources.⁴⁷ Even though the Recommendation does not foresee an exception in cases concerning the infringement of the honour or reputation of a person, a journalist cannot be protected by the right of non-disclosure. A journalist has the choice between revealing its sources, so he will not be liable for unlawful or defamatory journalism, or protect its sources and risk to be held personally liable.⁴⁸ Another important exception to the right of non-disclosure is the following. Pictures and videos of for example riots, demonstrations or other acts of violence do not fall under the protection afforded by the Act, because they do not fall under the definition of a journalistic source. Police and security services can demand footage of to identify suspects and gather evidence. If, however, the images can reveal the identity of informants or the origin of documents, the Act is applicable again.⁴⁹

8. In the Light of the Case Law of the European Court of Human Rights, How Do National Courts Apply the Respective Laws with

⁴⁴ Ibid., 34.

⁴⁵ Ibid., 33.

⁴⁶ P. Martens, Mediarecht voor journalisten, (Garant 2005), 140-145 [Dutch]; S. Hoebeke and B. Mouffe, Le droit de la presse, (Anthemis 2012) 155-177 [Dutch].

⁴⁷ ECHR, September 14, 2010, Sanoma Uitgevers BV vs. The Netherlands; D. Voorhoof and P. Valcke, Handboek Mediarecht, (Larcier 2011) 303 [Dutch].

⁴⁸ D. Voorhoof and P. Valcke, Handboek Mediarecht (Larcier 2011) 304 [Dutch].

⁴⁹ D. Voorhoof and P. Valcke, Handboek Mediarecht, (Larcier 2011) 308-309 [Dutch].

Regard to the Right to Protect Sources? In Particular, How Do They Balance the Different Interests At Stake?

In first instance, some cases will be discussed which predate the entry into force of the Act on the protection of journalistic sources of 2005. This will be followed by a discussion of a few cases which postdate the entry into force of the Act. It goes without saying, that as the cases are examples of the application of the Act, these are more relevant for the present.

Court of First Instance of Brussels – June 7 2002

The first example is a judgement from the Brussels' Court of First Instance. The facts took place in 2002, a few years before the entry into force of the Act. It concerned the Flemish newspaper 'De Morgen' which had published an article about a new TGV-station in the Belgian city of Liège. The article was written on the basis of an internal document of the NMBS, the Belgian railway company. On the basis of this document, it was argued that the building of the station would be excessively expensive. The NMBS denied the existence of this document and demanded the disclosure of the document in court. The Court of First Instance referred to the protection of the secrecy of sources in the sense of article 10 ECHR. It decided that the disclosure of the document would probably result in the identification of the source of the information in violation the principle of secrecy of sources.

The Court referred to the Goodwin case⁵⁰ from the European Court of Human Rights to highlight the importance of the secrecy of journalistic sources in a democratic society.⁵¹ The case at issue was clearly decided in accordance with the case-law from the Court of Human Rights.⁵²

Court of First Instance of Brussels – June 29 2007

In 2007, there was a case concerning the registration of phone calls of a journalist. The journalist had written an article in the Flemish newspaper 'De Morgen' about a terrorism threat in Antwerp. In the article the journalist referred to her source of information, i.e. a confidential police report. The Belgian authorities feared there was an internal leak within the police department. To find the identity of the person who leaked the information in question, the phone activity of the journalist was monitored. On the basis of article 88*bis* of the Belgian Criminal Procedure Code, the monitoring of phone activity is only possible under exceptional circumstances. The journalist claimed that the registration was in violation of the secrecy of journalistic sources. As the facts of the case predated the Act on protection of journalistic sources, the Court of First Instance of Brussels derived the principle of the secrecy from journalistic sources on article 10 ECHR and art 19 of the Constitution. The Court of First Instance argued that the protection of journalistic sources is one of the cornerstones of a democratic society, but that the right to freedom of expression can be limited in the sense of article 10 paragraph 2.

⁵⁰ Goodwin v United Kingdom [1996] European Court of Human Rights.

⁵¹ De Morgen v Belgium [2002] President Court of First Instance Brussels AM [2002] 459.

⁵² Dirk Voorhoof and Peggy Valcke, Handboek mediarecht, (4th edn, Larcier, 2015) 73 [Dutch].

In this case the aim of monitoring the phone activity was identifying the person who leaked the information and had thereby violated his professional confidentiality. The aim was not the prevention of a crime like terrorism. The Court of First Instance said that because of the nature of the facts, it was disproportionate to provide an exception to the secrecy of journalistic sources, and that it would have been possible to take other kinds of investigation measures. The Court thus convicted the Belgian state for monitoring the journalist's phone activity, as the Court found that need for identification of the person who violated his professional confidentiality did not trump safeguarding the secrecy of journalistic sources.⁵³

With regard to the balancing of interests, the Court used the same conditions as the ECtHR. Moreover, the findings of the Court are in following the principles stemming from the Tillack case of the ECtHR. In this case the ECtHR held that the secrecy of journalistic sources should be protected, even if the information is the result of a violation of the professional confidentiality.⁵⁴

Also, the Court found that the condition of subsidiarity was not fulfilled because there are less radical means to find the person who leaked the information, referring to the Ernst case.⁵⁵ For instance, there was the possibility to investigate within the police department, without involving the journalist.⁵⁶

Court of Cassation – February 6 2008

In 2008, the Belgian Court of Cassation heard a case on the protection of journalistic sources. At the time of this case, the Act on the protection of journalistic sources had already entered into force. The prosecutor of Verviers suspected that a police officer had given confidential information to a journalist. Because the police officer was suspected for the crime of violation of his professional confidentiality in the sense of article 458 of the Criminal Code, the investigating judge commanded the monitoring of the police officer's phone activity and the confiscation of his mobile phone. The police officer appealed against these measures, arguing that the measures were in violation of the secrecy of journalistic sources. The Belgian Court of Cassation replied that the secrecy of journalistic sources in the sense of article 5 of the Act on the protection of journalistic sources is not an absolute right. Moreover, the Court of cassation held that the protection does not apply to persons who do not fall within the scope of the Act. A police officer who gave the information to the journalist, does not fall within the scope. The protection merely includes the journalist and his assistants. It is not applicable to the informant of the ⁵³ De Graaf v Belgium [2007] Court of First Instance of Brussels, AM [2007], 500 [Dutch].

⁵⁴ Tillack v Belgium [2007] European Court of Human Rights, Rechtskundig Weekblad [2009], 1067.

⁵⁵ Ernst v Belgium [2003] European Court of Human Rights.

⁵⁶ Roemen and Schmit v Luxemburg [2003] European Court of Human Rights.

journalist. As a consequence, the police officer was prosecuted for the violation of his professional confidentiality.⁵⁷

The case was decided along the lines of the case law of the ECtHR. In Tillack v. Belgium,⁵⁸ the ECtHR held that journalists have the right to non-disclosure of the source of their information, even if the information is the result of the violation of the professional confidentiality. However, the ECtHR did not extend the protection of art 10 of the ECHR to informants of journalists.⁵⁹

This implied that informants did not fall under the protection of article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights.⁶⁰ But, in February 12 2008, a few days after the judgment of the Belgian Court of Cassation, the ECtHR decided, in Guja v. Moldova,⁶¹ that informants enjoy the protection of article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights as well. It follows that the above judgment of the Court of Cassation is now outdated.

Criminal Court of Dendermonde – November 3 2008 and Court of First Instance of Brussels – May 5 2010

In a case of November 3 2008, the Criminal Court of Dendermonde held that the prosecution of a journalist for the crime of unlawful use of documents of a criminal procedure in the sense of article 460ter of the Belgian Criminal Code is not a violation of the Act on the protection of journalistic sources or article 10 ECHR. However, the journalist cannot be punished for complicity to the crime of article 460ter of the Criminal Code when there is no evidence of his participation to the unlawful use of the information and his knowledge of the malicious intent of the principal perpetrator. The mere fact that the journalist possesses copies of the documents out of the criminal procedure, cannot be considered sufficient evidence.⁶²

In 2010, the Court of First Instance of Brussels dealt with the same issue in a case involving the publication of an article on a certain person who was being prosecuted for forgery and fraud. The suspect, assuming that the complainant had leaked information to the journalist in question, argued that the complainant committed the offence of unlawful use of documents out of the criminal procedure basis as enshrined in article 460ter of the Belgian Criminal Code, and claimed that the journalist was his accomplice. The journalist on his turn invoked the secrecy of journalistic sources to avoid having to disclose the source of his information.

The Court of First Instance said that there was no evidence supporting the accusations made by the suspect. In addition, the Court of First Instance remarked that when a journalist denies that one of the parties handed over procedural documents out of a criminal procedure, there cannot be a prosecution for the crime on the basis of article 460ter of the Criminal Code, as the ⁵⁷ H.F. v O.M. [2008] Court Of Cassation of Belgium, Tijdschrift Strafrecht [2008], 457 [French].

⁵⁸ Tillack v Belgium [2007] European Court of Human Rights, Rechtskundig Weekblad [2009], 1067.

⁵⁹ Bart De Smet, "Beperkte draagwijdte van het journalistieke bronnengeheim" [2008] Rechtskundig Weekblad 1727 [Dutch] journalist cannot be forced to disclose his source, which is a fundamental right of the journalist.⁶³ The Court of First Instance thus used the same reasoning as the Criminal Court of Dendermonde in its judgment of 3 November 2008.

⁶⁰ Bart De Smet, "Beperkte draagwijdte van het journalistieke bronnengeheim" [2008] Rechtskundig Weekblad 1727 [Dutch]

⁶¹ Guja v Moldova [2008] European Court of Human Rights.

⁶² [2008] Criminal Court of Dendermonde, AM [2009], 455 [Dutch].

In these two cases, the Belgian Courts found that the protection of journalistic sources outweighed the potential prosecution under article 460ter of the Criminal Code. This does not mean that a journalist cannot be convicted for the crime of article 460ter. If there is sufficient evidence to prove the complicity of the journalist, he can be convicted in accordance with the Masschelin case of the ECtHR.⁶⁴

In the Masschelin case, prosecution of a journalist for complicity to the crime in the sense of article 460ter of the Criminal Code was considered not to be a violation of art 10 ECHR. The ECtHR said that there was complicity of the journalist because he incited the civil parties in the criminal procedure to copy documents out of the criminal procedure to transfer them to him. As such, the Court considered the behaviour of the journalist to be in violation of journalistic deontology.⁶⁵

However, the merely malicious intent of the principal perpetrator is not enough to set aside the protection of journalistic sources. The journalist can only be forced to disclose his source when there is an overriding requirement in the public interest. In the opinion of the ECtHR, the detection of a leakage cannot be regarded as an overriding requirement in the public interest.⁶⁶ This arises from the general principle of protection of journalistic sources as mentioned in the Goodwin case.⁶⁷

9. What Are the Criteria for Using Electronic Surveillance and Anti-Terrorism Laws, which may Include Measures such as Interceptions of Communications, Surveillance Actions and Search or Seizure Actions in Order to Identify Journalists' Sources of Information? Are the National Law Provisions Accessible, Precise, Foreseeable And Include Clear Legislative Norms in the Context Of Surveillance And Anti-Terrorism Provisions?

Council of Europe

⁶³ G.L. v D.C.D. and V.D.E.P. [2010] Court of First Instance of Brussels, AM [2010], 387 [Dutch].

⁶⁴ Masschelin v Belgium [2007] European Court of Human Rights.

⁶⁵ Masschelin v Belgium [2007] European Court of Human Rights.

⁶⁶ Financial Times Ltd. and others v United Kingdom [2010] European Court of Human Rights.

⁶⁷ Goodwin v United Kingdom [1996] European Court of Human Rights.

Recommendation No R (2000) 7 contains two relevant principles. Principle 3 describes certain limits to the right of non-disclosure. In its first paragraph, the article determines that the right of non-disclosure cannot be subject to other restrictions than those mentioned in article 10, paragraph 2 of the European Convention of Human Rights on the freedom of expression. Competent authorities need to pay particular attention to the importance of the right of non-disclosure and can only order a disclosure if there exists an overriding requirement in the public interest and if circumstances are of a sufficiently vital and serious nature. Paragraph 2 stipulates that there can only be an overriding public interest if reasonable alternative measures to the disclosure do not exist or have been exhausted, and the legitimate interest in the disclosure clearly outweighs the public interest in the non-disclosure.

Principle 6 is the second relevant principle in the recommendation. It elaborates on interception of communication, surveillance and judicial search and seizure. The principle determines that these measures should not be applied if their purpose is to circumvent the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source. In the second paragraph, it requires that if information identifying a source has been properly obtained by police or judicial authorities by any of the above actions, although this might not have been the purpose of these actions, measures should be taken to prevent the subsequent use of this information as evidence before courts, unless the disclosure would be justified under Principle 3.

Belgian law

In Belgium, there is no specific constitutional provision regarding the protection of journalistic sources. The Constitution only contains a general privacy protection provision. Article 22 stipulates that everyone is entitled to have their private and family life respected, except under the circumstances and conditions determined by the law.

The federal Act of April 7 2005 offers legal protection of journalistic sources. This Act has been explained in detail in the responses to the first three questions.

One of the first cases in which the law of 2005 was applied, provides an excellent example of use and implications of the law. In a judgment of June 29 2007, the court of first instance of Brussels convicted the Belgian state to pay damages to a journalist and her newspaper for the illegal registration of telephone calls of the journalist. The judge ruled that the police used the tap for facts which already took place in contradiction to the preventive aim of the exception, that alternative measures were possible and that the journalist did not do anything wrong herself. As a consequence the facts were insufficient to allow an exception to the protection of journalistic sources.⁶⁸ A potential terrorist aim seems to fall under the exception to the right of a journalist to remain silent regarding its sources of the Law of 2005. The Law of 2005 however does not seem to allow special investigative measures in case of a potential terrorist aim, unless it is the only way to prevent the attack.⁶⁹

⁶⁸ Rb. Brussel 29 June 2007, AM 2007/5, 500.

The question remains if there are any exceptions to these provisions outside the law of 2005. The law of 2005 on the protection of journalistic sources only protects against judicial authorities and the police force, it does not afford any protection against state security or any other intelligence service.

The ISS Act, which has been mentioned above in the questions in title 5 and 6, contains, following the modifications in 2010, specific limitations and modalities regarding special investigative techniques and the protection of journalistic sources.⁷⁰ In article 3, of the ISS Act a journalist is defined as a professional journalist. This limits the area of application in contrast to the general law of 2005 after the ruling of the Belgian Constitutional Court.⁷¹

Article 2, second paragraph of the ISS Act lays down a general prohibition to obtain, to analyse and to exploit data which is protected by the right of non-disclosure. The only exception to the rule is the case in which the authorities have serious indications that the journalist actively and personally co-operates to the origination or development of a potential threat such as defined in articles 7, 8 and 11. These articles list threats of the internal or external security of the state, military security, the existence of the democratic and constitutional order, international relations, scientific or economic potential or any other fundamental interest of the country as defined by the King. This includes every individual or collective activity from within the country or abroad related to espionage, terrorism, extremism, proliferation of or participation to harmful sectarian organisations of criminal organizations. For example, the dissemination of propaganda and the encouragement or the direct or indirect support, including by providing financial, technical and logistical resources, providing information about possible targets, the development of structures and capacity for the achievement of the objectives pursued.⁷²

⁶⁹ C. Baekeland, "De 'War on Terror' en het journalistieke bronnengeheim: droomhuwelijk of (v)rechtscheiding", C. Declerck, P. Foubert en A. Ooms (eds.), Geheimen in het recht, Antwerpen, Intersentia, 2011, 155-184.

⁷⁰ Regulation Act of 30 November 1998 of the intelligence and security services, BS 18 December 1998; see also question 4.

⁷¹ Constitutional Court, 7 June 2006.

⁷² Definitions: Espionage is defined as researching or providing information which is not accessible to the public and upholding relations which can facilitate the gathering of this information. Terrorism is defined as the use of violence against persons or material interests for ideological or political reasons, with the aim of reaching its objectives through terror, intimidation or threats. Extremism is defined as racist, xenophobic, anarchist, nationalist, authoritarian and totalitarian ideas or intentions, whether they are of a political, ideological, religious or philosophical nature, which are theoretically or practically inconsistent with the principles of democracy and human rights, with the good functioning of democratic institutions or other foundations of the rule of law. Proliferation is defined as the trade of materials, products, goods. or know-how which may contribute to the production or development of non-conventional or highly sophisticated weapon systems, such as the development of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs, the associated transmission systems, and the persons, structures or countries involved. A harmful sectarian organization is defined as any group with philosophical or religious biases or a group that pretends to have these, and who uses illegal activities, which causes harm to individuals or society or human dignity. A criminal organization is defined as any structured association of more than two persons, which

Furthermore, the ISS Act obliges the authorities to inform the chairman of the AVBB (the general association of professional journalists in Belgium) if special or exceptional techniques of data collection as described in article 18 are used. The chairman is sworn to secrecy about the investigation. A special administrative commission and a permanent Commission supervise the operation and make sure that there is a direct connection between the obtained data and the threat. This administrative Commission consists of an investigative judge, a judge and a member of the prosecution's office.⁷³ The permanent Commission of supervision on the intelligence and security services consists of three members appointed by the parliament.⁷⁴

The ISS Act gradually builds up protection of journalistic sources. The more serious the violation of the principle of protection of sources, the smaller the area of application of investigative measures, the more expanded the control mechanisms and the stricter the conditions of application.

Firstly, there are general methods of data collection such as the demand of information of public authorities, the normal observation and the search of locations accessible to the public. For the application of these measures the only condition is that there are serious indications about the personal and active involvement of the journalist to the threats as specified above. In principle there is a prohibition to collect data of journalists, so even the general methods of data collection are in se prohibited, unless the conditions of the exceptions are fulfilled.

Secondly, special techniques of data collection, such as the more thorough observation, searches with technical equipment of locations accessible to the public, measures to identify and/or locate users and data of electronic communication can only be used in the professional sphere of a professional journalist. This is on the condition that the authorities have serious indications about the personal and active involvement of the journalist and if the head of the department, the Administrator-General of State Security or the Head of the General Intelligence and Security Service of the Armed Forces, gives a written approval for the action after a control of the legality, subsidiarity and proportionality of the measure and after notifying the Commission. Additionally the situations or persons to which the measure is applied need to be of interest for the fulfillment of the tasks imposed on the security services. There is a double control mechanism for these kinds of measures. The administrative Commission controls the implementation of the measure during its application and there is a general a posteriori control of the operation by the Commission.

lasts a period of time, with the purpose to jointly commit crimes and offenses or to acquire direct or indirect material benefits. These organizations use intimidation, threats, violence, fraudulent practices or corruption, or they use commercial or other structures to conceal or facilitate the commission of crimes.

⁷³ Art. 43/1 Regulation Act of 30 November 1998 of the intelligence and security services, BS 18 December 1998.

⁷⁴ Art. 28 Organization Act of 18 July 1991 of monitoring police forces and intelligence services and the Coordinating Body for Threat Analysis, BS 26 July 1991.

Finally, exceptional techniques can only be applied if the regular and special techniques prove insufficient. Examples of exceptional techniques are observations and searches of places used for professional purposes and/or the residence of the journalist, the inspection of banking details of the journalist, hacking of computers, bugging and recording of communication, etc. The same conditions of control of legality, subsidiarity and proportionality, serious indications about the personal and active involvement of the journalist and an interest of state security in the matter are valid. Different is the fact that the head of department can only approve the measure after receiving a uniform advice of the administrative Commission or, in absence thereof, of the competent minister. In addition to the double control mechanism a member of the commission should always be present when these techniques are being used. Extra protection is afforded by the obligation of the head of the department and the possibility of the Commission to end or suspend the measure if the threat, which justified the measure, is remedied.⁷⁵ These exceptional techniques can only be used for a period of two months, this can be prolonged on request of the head of department for a period of maximum two months if extraordinary circumstances make it necessary. In the Regulation act are the conditions of application less detailed than those of the law of 2005. The main condition is the personal and active involvement of the journalist in the origination or development of potential threats such as described above. But even if this condition is fulfilled, the authorities still need to balance it with the exceptional character of the breach of protection.

Article 15 of the law of December 19 2003, regarding terrorist crimes, allows the police force and judicial authorities to bug and/or record (tele)communication to prevent terrorist attacks. This rule cannot be used solely to identify the journalist's source.⁷⁶

The next question is if this legislation meets the test of the ECHR. It should be accessible, precise, foreseeable and provide clear norms. Firstly, it could be said that the term 'potential threats' is rather vague in light of the criminal lex certa-principle. The principle requires that all offences are clearly described.⁷⁷

Secondly, problems could arise regarding the sanctioning of the illegal use of these measures regarding journalists' sources. Article 18 stipulates that if the security services do not abide by the protections of the Regulation Act, the data cannot be used anymore. Article 43.2 arranges an a posteriori legality control by the permanent Commission, but only for specific and exceptional measures and after a complaint. The permanent Commission can prohibit using the data and obliging the authorities to destroy the data. But it remains unclear what is meant with 'destroy', because there is no retroactive solution if the data already have been used.⁷⁸

⁷⁵ D. Voorhoof en P. Valcke, Handboek mediarecht, Brussel, Larcier, 2011, 298-309; R. Verstraeten, "Het beroeps- en bronnengeheim en de BIM-wet", in W. Van Laethem, D. Van Daele en B. Vangeebergen (eds.), De wet op de bijzondere inlichtingenmethoden, Antwerpen, Intersentia, 2010, 151-173.

⁷⁶ C. Baekeland, "De 'War on Terror' en het journalistieke bronnengeheim: droomhuwelijk of (v)rechtscheiding", in C. Declerck, P. Foubert en A. Ooms (eds.), Geheimen in het recht, Antwerpen, Intersentia, 2011, 155-184.

⁷⁷ R. Verstraeten, "Het beroeps- en bronnengeheim en de BIM-wet", in W. Van Laethem, D. Van Daele en B. Vangeebergen (eds.), De wet op de bijzondere inlichtingenmethoden, Antwerpen, Intersentia, 2010, 151-173.

Thirdly, a positive element regarding the protection of journalistic sources is that the Law of 2005 is seen as a lex specialis in relation to the Regulation Act of 1998.

Fourthly, a limitation in case of terrorism is recognized by the Constitutional Court. On the one hand, data regarding finished or ongoing terrorist actions falls under the protection of journalistic sources. On the other hand: if the journalist possesses the information that can prevent a severe threat to the physical integrity of persons, he is required to reveal its source to the authorities.⁷⁹

The question remains what exactly has to be considered as a severe threat. Certain authors recognise a proportionality and subsidiarity principle in the condition of a severe threat to the physical integrity of a person.⁸⁰

Finally, another question arises. Should there be a direct or indirect causal relation between the terrorist aim and the severe threat to physical integrity? According to a member of the Senate Commission of Justice, there should be a direct relation. However, this has not been confirmed by the legislator.⁸¹ So we can conclude that the law could be more precise concerning some provisions, but there is no overall problem of imprecision.⁸²

Regarding the accessibility of Belgian law; according to article 129 of the Belgian Constitution, a law can only be applicable if published in the Official Belgian Gazette. So, like every other Belgian law, the laws described above are published in the Official Belgian Gazette. Following this the presumption arises that nemo ius ignorare censetur, which states that everyone is presumed to know the law. All laws are generally accessible via the online publication of the Official Belgian Gazette. This method has never been criticized by the ECHR before.

Regarding the foreseeability of the legislation in question first should be referred to the Malone judgment of the ECHR.⁸³ The ECHR observed that the requirement of foreseeability cannot mean that

⁷⁸ R. Verstraeten, "Het beroeps- en bronnengeheim en de BIM-wet", in W. Van Laethem, D. Van Daele en B. Vangebergen (eds.), De wet op de bijzondere inlichtingenmethoden, Antwerpen, Intersentia, 2010, 151-173.

⁷⁹ Constitutional Court 7 June 2006, nr. 91/2006, §B.38.2; J. Ceuleers, "Eindelijk: het journalistiek zwijgrecht (bijna) wettelijk erkend", AM 2004, 226; E. Brewaeys, "Informatiebronnen van journalisten", NJW 2005, 542-551.

⁸⁰ K. Lemmens, "Wovon man nicht reden kann, darüber muss man schweigen. Het journalistiek zwijgrecht beschermd", in D. Voorhoof (ed.), Het journalistiek bronnengeheim onthuld, Brugge, Die Keure, 2008, 34; P. Deltour, "Uitstekende Bronnenwet botst op taaie gerechtelijke gewoonten en nieuwe uitdagingen", in D. Voorhoof (ed.), Het journalistiek bronnengeheim onthuld, Brugge, Die Keure, 2008, 49; G. Schuijt, "Journalistieke bronbescherming met of zonder wet", in D. Voorhoof (ed.), Het journalistiek bronnengeheim onthuld, Brugge, Die Keure, 2008, 76; K. Lemmens, "La protection des sources journalistiques. Une commentaire de la loi du 7 avril 2005", JT 2005, 669-677.

⁸¹ Parl. St. Senaat 2004-05, nr. 3-670/6, 45.

⁸² P. Deltour, "Journalistiek en bijzondere politiemethoden", Orde van de dag, 2003, 48; C. Baekeland, "De 'War on Terror' en het journalistieke bronnengeheim: droomhuwelijk of (v)rechtscheiding", C. Declerck, P. Foubert en A. Ooms (eds.), Geheimen in het recht, Antwerpen, Intersentia, 2011, 155-184.

⁸³ Malone v. UK (1984)

an individual should be enabled to foresee when authorities are likely to intercept his communications so that he can adapt his conduct accordingly. But foreseeability implies that domestic law must be sufficiently clear in its terms to give citizens an adequate indication as to the circumstances in which and the conditions on which public authorities are empowered to resort to this secret and potentially dangerous interference with the right to respect for private life and correspondence. In this regard we can say that the ISS Act lacks sufficient precision to be entirely foreseeable, but the general way in which it is constructed is logically to be anticipated by professional journalists.

The ISS Act emanated from a decision of the Constitutional Court of 21 December 2004 concerning the Act of 6 January 2003 pertaining to special investigative measures in the combatting of terrorism and serious organised crime.⁸⁴ The Court nullified some of the clauses because they violated the right to a fair trial as stated in article 6, ECHR. Although the new ISS Act remedied these shortcomings, it also created some new controversies especially with regard to its compatibility with article 8(1), ECHR, by introducing new restrictive measures such as unannounced police access to non-residential private property and the placing of technical surveillance equipment there. This was already mentioned in the advisory opinion of the Belgian Supreme Administrative Court.⁸⁵ It is said that the government wanted to limit judicial scrutiny and public debate on the matter; because of the fact that the ISS Act was seen as urgent, so the Supreme Administrative Court had only five days to review the proposal and by submitting it only two months before the legislative deadline as set by the Constitutional Court to Parliament.⁸⁶

On a last note, the European Court of Human Rights has identified the following minimum safeguards a national surveillance law must meet in order to be compatible with Article 8, ECHR⁸⁷: 1. categories of people which may be subjected to electronic surveillance; 2. the offences and activities which may give rise to an interception order; 3. limits on the duration of surveillance operations; 4. Strict procedures for ordering the examination, use, and storage of the data obtained through surveillance; 5. precautions to be taken when communicating the data to third parties; and 6. strict rules on the destruction or erasure of surveillance data to prevent surveillance from remaining hidden after the fact; 7. The bodies responsible for supervising the use of surveillance powers must be independent and responsible to, and be appointed by, Parliament rather than the Executive.⁸⁸ The ISS Act addresses all of these concerns explicitly, even though it could have been more precise on some specific issues, as mentioned before.

⁸⁴ Belgian Constitutional Court, Judgment, no. 202/2004, 21 December 2004.

⁸⁵ Belgian Supreme Administrative Court, Advisory Opinion 39.092/2, see document of the federal parliament 51/2055/001 of 28 October 2005.

⁸⁶ E. De Wet, "The reception process in the Netherlands and Belgium", in H. Keller and A. Stone Sweet, A Europe of Rights, the impact of the ECHR on national legal systems, Oxford University Press, 2008, 277-284.

⁸⁷ Klass and Others v. Germany, Liberty and Others v. the United Kingdom, no. 58243/00, 1 July 2008 and Rotaru v. Romania, no. 28341/95, [GC], 4 May 2000.

⁸⁸ S. Sottiaux, Terrorism and the limitation of rights, the ECHR and the US Constitution, Hart Publishing, 2008, 274-278; A. Galetta and P. De Hert, Complementing the Surveillance Law Principles of the ECtHR with its

10. Can Journalists Rely on Encryption and Anonymity Online to Protect Themselves and Their Sources Against Surveillance?

There is little legislation in Belgium regarding encryption and online anonymity. Regarding journalism, there are almost no specific norms. The only rule regarding encryption can be found in the law of June 13 2005 regarding electronic communications. Article 48 establishes the freedom to use encryption. Article 127.2 determines that the delivery or use of services or equipment which impedes or renders it impossible to track or identify communication or users of communication is prohibited, except encryption systems used for confidentiality of communication and security of payments.⁸⁹

Until recently, Article 126 of the Electronic Communications Act of June 13 2005 stipulated, on the one hand, that providers of telephone, internet and other communication services were obliged to save traffic records, location data, identification data of the end-users, data concerning the used communication service and the presumed equipment used, the so-called metadata. On the other hand the electronic communication providers were prohibited to keep records of the content of the communication. The information was available for police, justice and intelligence services. This article had been modified by the Act of July 30 2013⁹⁰, and implemented by the Royal Decree of September 19 2013,⁹¹ in order to implement the EU Data Retention Directive 2006/24/EG. Following the Digital Rights Ireland ruling in which the Court of Justice declared Directive 2006/24/EG invalid.⁹² The Belgian Constitutional Court invoked basically the same reasons in its ruling of June 11 2015 to annul the Belgian Act of 2013 pursuant to Articles 10-11 of the Belgian Constitution, the principle of non-discrimination.⁹³ The most important reasons for the annulment were the following. It was disproportional to save the metadata of all communications of all Belgian citizens and there were not enough guarantees against abuse of the saved information. The Minister of Justice is working on a new legislative proposal, which is essentially the same as the annulled articles. Therefore there is a lot of criticism by Human Rights Organisations.⁹⁴

Environmental Law Principles: An Integrated Technology Approach to a Human Rights Framework for Surveillance, Utrecht Law Review.

⁸⁹ Law of 13 June 2005 regarding electronic communication, BS 20 June 2005; J. Dumortier en H. Graux, "Recente ontwikkelingen in het domein van privacy- en gegevensbescherming", in P. Valcke en J. Dumortier (eds.), Themis 81, ICT- en Mediarecht, Brugge, Die Keure, 2013, 131-132.

⁹⁰ Law of 30 July 2013 to modify article 2, 126 and 145 of the law of 13 June 2005 regarding electronic communication and of article 90decies of the Criminal Procedure Code.

⁹¹ Royal Decree of 19 September 2013 to implement article 126 of the Law of 13 June 2005 regarding electronic communication, BS 8 October 2013.

⁹² Directive 2006/24/EC of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks, CJEU, 8 April 2014 (Digital Rights Ireland), C-293/12 en C-594/12.

⁹³ Art. 10-11 Belgian Constitution, Belgian Constitutional Court nr. 84/2015 of 11 June 2015.

⁹⁴ http://www.mensenrechten.be/index.php/site/nieuwsberichten/datarentiewet_2.0_op_komst_regering_wil_opnieuw_al_uw_communicatiegegevens

Currently, articles 124 and 145 of the Electronic Communications Act of June 13 2005 lay down the protection of communication. It stipulates that it is prohibited to take knowledge of the existence of telecommunication or the identity of the persons involved and that it is prohibited to modify, erase, reveal, retain or use the information without consent of the persons directly and indirectly involved. However this, provision only envisages taking knowledge [N.B. for the translators: the Dutch phrase is “met opzet kennis nemen van”] of the existence of communications, not taking knowledge of their substance.⁹⁵ The latter is protected by Articles 259*bis* and 314*bis* of the Criminal Law Code which lay down the secrecy of telecommunications (for civil servants and public agents, resp. the general public). The prohibition to intercept private communications is applicable to individuals as well as government officials. This is only true for private communications, but the law stipulates that private communications are all communications of which the participants do not have the intention to make it publically available. The main problem of the protection is the fact that there can only be an a posteriori control.⁹⁶ The CoE Convention on Cybercrime of 2001 was ratified on 3 August 2012, but the principles were already implemented in the Belgian legal system by inter alia the law of 28 November 2002 concerning computer crimes.

So, to conclude, there is no express prohibition of encryption of information in Belgian law and the content of electronic communications is per definition anonymous, unless exceptional techniques of investigation are used, as explained under the question in title 9.

11. Are Whistle-blowers Explicitly Protected under the Law Protecting Journalistic Sources? Is There Another Practice Protecting Whistle-blowers? Is there legislation prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers?

11.1. Are Whistle-blowers Explicitly Protected under the Law Protecting Journalistic Sources?

National law

Whistle-blowers are people who, as a member of an organisation, reveal wrongs and information that could cause social harm. Some Belgian authors have made a distinction between the practice of “reporting” and “whistleblowing”.⁹⁷ In the case of the latter, the whistle-blower will make information public outside of the organisation. In case of reporting, one will report a wrong by way of an internal procedure to a supervisor or an external reporting point.⁹⁸

⁹⁵ J. Dumortier, R. Vanhecke en S. Missotten, “Laat de Belgische wetgeving gerechtelijk aftappen van privécommunicatie via GSM of internet toe?”, Computerrecht 1997, 145-149; J. Dumortier, ICT-recht, Leuven, Acco, 2013; P. Van Linthout en J. Kerkhofs, “Actuele uitdagingen in cybercrime voor de advocatuur en de magistratuur: vervolgen en verdedigen met een bot scalpel?” in P. Valcke & J. Dumortier (eds.), Themis 81 - ICT- en mediarecht, Brugge, Die Keure, 2013.

⁹⁶ B. Docquir, Le droit de la vie privée, Brussel, Larcier, 2008, 354.

The rules in Belgium relating to the protection of journalistic sources are applicable to the protection of the journalists themselves, but don't apply to the whistle-blower himself. Nevertheless there's a need to grant the whistle-blower some protection; if not, none would report wrongs of an organisation and the responsible persons would possibly avoid the consequences of their actions.⁹⁹

The law protecting journalistic sources does not protect whistle-blowers, nor have the Belgian authorities issued a law that follows up on the Recommendation CM/Rec (2014)7 of the Council of Europe on the protection of whistle-blowers.¹⁰⁰ Belgian legislation nevertheless provides the protection of whistle-blower in the public sector. Belgium is a federal state; in this case the protection is regulated on a federal level as well as on a regional level. This protection is regulated on a federal level by the law of 15 September 2013 concerning the report of an alleged breach on integrity in the federal administrative authorities by its staff, and on a regional level by the Flemish Decree for the establishment of a Flemish Ombudsman service of 7 may 2004. This decree applies generally the same principles.¹⁰¹

The law of September 15 2013 is applicable to persons working for the federal government who want to report wrongs, or, as called in the law, breaches of integrity.¹⁰² This is as close as the law comes to a definition of a whistle-blower.

The breaches of integrity are defined in the law as:

- a) an act or omission by a staff member which is a violation of the laws, decisions, circulars, internal rules and internal procedures that apply to the federal administrative authorities and their staff;
- b) an act or omission by a staff member that involves an unacceptable risk to the life, health or safety of persons or to the environment;
- c) an act or omission by a staff member which manifestly shows a serious failure in professional duties or in the management of a federal administrative authority;

⁹⁷ Philippe de Baets, Gerwinde Vynckier and Gudrun Vande Walle, Melden meer dan 'klokkenluiden, Orde van de dag 2015/72, 8.

⁹⁸ Ibid.

⁹⁹ Ibid.

¹⁰⁰ Recommendation CM/Rec(2014)7 adopted by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on 30 April 2014

¹⁰¹ The Law of 15/9/13 concerning the report of an alleged breach on integrity in the federal administrative authorities by her staff (Wet betreffende de melding van een veronderstelde integriteitsschending in de federale administratieve overheden door haar personeelsleden) and the Flemish Decree for the establishment of a Flemish Ombudsservice of 7 may 2004 (decreet houdende instelling van de Vlaamse Ombudsdienst).

¹⁰² Art. 2 1° and 2° Law of 15/9/13

d) the knowingly recommending or advising by a staff member to commit a breach of integrity as referred to in a), b) and c).¹⁰³

The staff members can report these breaches of integrity to a “confidant of integrity” or to the Central Reporting Point for Assumed Integrity Violations, but not without prior advice of the confidant of integrity or the Reporting Point.¹⁰⁴ Both instances fall under the jurisdiction of the Ombudsman, which serves as an intermediary between the government and the people.

Under the law of September 15 2013, the ombudsmen will protect whistle-blowers from measures with an adverse effect on conditions of employment or labour conditions which result from reporting the alleged breach of integrity. Such a measure could consist, among other things, of a bad evaluation or the dismissal of the staff member.¹⁰⁵ A staff member claiming that he’s the victim of such a measure, or claiming that he’s threatened by such a measure, may submit a complaint to the ombudsman. However, the burden of proof will fall on the federal government if there have been taken such measures during the period of protection.¹⁰⁶ This period of protection starts two weeks after receiving the question for advice and does not end until 2 years after the conviction or the roundup of the additional written report. An exception is made if the staff member himself was involved in the breach of integrity or if his report was unfair.¹⁰⁷ The protection in this federal law is comparable to the protection offered by the Flemish Decree of May 7 2004.

At present, a similar protection for whistle-blowers in the private sector does not exist in the Belgian legislation. Nevertheless, some general principles of labor law can apply, such as the protection against workplace bullying and the principle of awe and respect between an employer and his employee, is possible.¹⁰⁸ Another principle that is applicable to (manual) workers is that an employer isn’t allowed to arbitrarily dismiss a worker; administrative workers would have to use the figure of legal abuse.¹⁰⁹ Whether these general principles actually provide for extensive protection, is highly doubtful.¹¹⁰

However, in the (few) Belgian court cases, most whistle-blowers received de facto protection against retaliation. An example is the case law of the Court of appeal of Brussels concerning

¹⁰³ Art. 2 3° Law of 15/9/13

¹⁰⁴ Art 3 §1, 6 §1 and 8 Law of 15/9/13.

¹⁰⁵ Art 15 Law of 15/9/13.

¹⁰⁶ Art 16 Law of 15/9/13.

¹⁰⁷ Art 15 Law of 15/9/13.

¹⁰⁸ Article 16 law of 3 July 1978 concerning labor contracts (wet betreffende de arbeidsovereenkomsten); the law of 4 august 1996 (law concerning the wellbeing of employees during the execution of their job (Wet betreffende het welzijn van de werknemers bij de uitvoering van hun werk); Wim Vandekerckhove, Providing An Alternative To Silence: Towards Greater Protection And Support For Whistle-blowers In Belgium, [2013] report of Transparency International Belgium, 26.

¹⁰⁹ art. 63 law of 3 July 1978; Wim Vandekerckhove, Providing An Alternative To Silence: Towards Greater Protection And Support For Whistle-blowers In Belgium, [2013] report of Transparency International Belgium, 26.

¹¹⁰ Wim Vandekerckhove, Providing An Alternative To Silence: Towards Greater Protection And Support For Whistle-blowers In Belgium, [2013] report of Transparency International Belgium, 27 – 30.

labour matters, where the dismissal of an employee who had sent an open letter to all employees of a company concerning the financial irregularities of his colleagues did not hold up in court. The Court decided that the criticism against colleagues was not considered to be unhealthy in a transparent and democratic society.¹¹¹

In another case, the Council of State decided that the freedom of expression had to be respected in case of a civil servant who had 'blown the whistle'. A restriction of that freedom of expression can only be justified with a pertinent and sufficient justification. Furthermore the restriction has to be proportional to the legitimate aim. The government also has to refrain from imposing sanctions which would have an excessive chilling effect on the freedom of expression.¹¹²

Compatibility with the case-law of the ECtHR

The Belgian case-law seems to be in line with the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, but nevertheless less nuanced than said case law. The case law of the ECtHR often offers protection for whistle-blowers by prohibiting measures with an adverse effect on the basis of article 10 ECHR, both in the public and in the private sector. One of the reasons of this prohibition is the chilling effect it might have on future whistle-blowers.¹¹³

While the prevention of the disclosure of confidential information can be accepted as a legitimate aim, the measure is often found not necessary in a democratic society. The Court bases its judgement on following criteria: whether the public interest was involved; whether the information was authentic; whether there was any damage that the authority suffered as a result; whether the sanction was severe, which motives the employee had for disclosing the information and whether the action of disclosing the information was a last resort.¹¹⁴

11.2. Is There Another Practice Protecting Whistle-blowers?

Apart from the case law and the legislation concerning whistle-blowers in the public sector, the Privacy Commission has also issued a recommendation concerning the compatibility of reporting systems with the law of December 8 1992 concerning the protection of privacy with ¹¹¹47.015 926 (2007) Court of Appeal concerning labour matters in Brussels; Patrick Humblet, Kritiek op werkgever moet kunnen, De Juristenkrant 18 april 2007, 20 and Tom Messiaen, Klokkenluiders. Overzicht van de wetgeving, NJW 2007, 922 – 926.

¹¹²168.781 (2007), Council of State; Patrick Humblet, Kritiek op werkgever moet kunnen, De Juristenkrant 18 april 2007, 20.

¹¹³ Matúš v. Hungary (2014) European Court of Human Rights; European Court of Human Rights, Goggins e.a. v United Kingdom (2012) European Court of Human Rights; Heinisch v Germany (2011) European Court of Human Rights; Sosinowska v Poland (2011); Wojtas-Kaleta v. Poland (2009) European Court of Human Rights; Guja v. Moldova (2008) European Court of Human Rights; Fuentes Bobo v. Spain (2000) European Court of Human Rights and Dirk Voorhoof, Freedom of Expression and Information and the Case Law of the European Court of Human Rights and the Court of Justice of the EU. Overview and highlights 2014, 8.

¹¹⁴ Ibid.

regard to the processing of personal data.¹¹⁵ This recommendation states that there needs to be a balance between the relevant rights of all the parties. It would violate the privacy of the employees and their mutual relationships if the employees were supposed to act as a controller of their colleagues.

However, reporting systems are not contrary to the law of December 8 1992 if they respect the principles laid down in that law, such as honesty, legitimacy, proportionality, accuracy of the data, security of the processing operations and the right of access to the data and the erasing of data for the persons of whom the data are kept in the context of the reporting system.¹¹⁶

11.3. Is There Legislation Prohibiting Authorities and Companies from Identifying Whistle-blowers?

In the private sector, no protection and thus no such prohibition exists; one can only rely on the law of December 8 1992. However, in the public sector there exists a possibility to impede the authorities from identifying the whistle-blower. The whistle-blower has to report the breach of integrity to his supervisor, who will keep the identity of the staff member confidential and make sure the staff member does not experience any negative drawbacks. However, the whistle-blower can choose not to tell his supervisor, in which case he will report to the confidant of integrity. The whistle-blower also has the choice between an open report, by which the whistle-blower gives his permission to the Ombudsman to make his identity public, or a confidential report, in which case he does not. The whistle-blower has therefore the choice to protect his identity from the government, but the Ombudsman will always know this identity.

12. Conclusion

Since its birth, Belgium has always been one of the most liberal nation states of the European continent. Founded on constitutional principles of equality and political freedom, Belgium has long had a considerable lead when it came to protection of a democratic core element: correct, unbiased and high-quality news.

¹¹⁵ Recommendation concerning the compatibility of reporting systems with the law of 8 December 1992 concerning the protection of the privacy with regard to the processing of personal data (Aanbeveling betreffende de verenigbaarheid van meldsystemen (klokkenluidersystemen) met de wet van 8 december 1992 tot bescherming van de persoonlijke levenssfeer ten opzichte van de verwerking van persoonsgegevens, www.privacycommission.be/sites/privacycommission/files/documents/aanbeveling_01_2006.pdf

¹¹⁶ Law of 8 december 1992 concerning the protection of the privacy with regard to the processing of personal data (Wet tot bescherming van de persoonlijke levenssfeer ten opzichte van de verwerking van persoonsgegevens); recommendation concerning the compatibility of reporting systems with the law of 8 December 1992 concerning the protection of the privacy with regard to the processing of personal data (Aanbeveling betreffende de verenigbaarheid van meldsystemen (klokkenluidersystemen) met de wet van 8 december 1992 tot bescherming van de persoonlijke levenssfeer ten opzichte van de verwerking van persoonsgegevens); X, Whistleblowing Legislation (Whistleblowing in Belgium) <<http://expolink.co.uk/whistleblowing/legislation/>> accessed 9 february 2016.

However, as the world gradually became smaller and more complicated, Belgian legislation stayed behind. Even entering the 21st century, not much had changed to the Belgian constitution, apart from some creative and complicated federalisation. No legal provision, constitutional or otherwise, explicitly protected journalists' sources.

Only, in 1996, the European Court of Human Rights challenged this status quo with their decision in Goodwin. Belgium, however, would not be rushed and only presented its implementation in 2005 after it was convicted itself. The ensuing Law concerning the protection of journalistic sources is however not free of critique.

Opinions on the quality of the implementation vary and doubt exists whether a correct balance has been achieved between the interests of justice on the one hand, and the protection of freedom of the press on the other. While the protection offered to sources is broad and detailed in both terms of scope and content, the exceptions are equally broad but without much detail. This makes that the balancing exercise is often only made ex post and on the basis of very general wordings.

Whether or not these provisions serve as a sufficiently dissuasive element is not entirely clear: is the small number of Belgian cases on the topic proof that it is, or do they attest to the fact that victims do not find their way to court? Moreover, Belgian courts have, up until now, showed the tendency to stick very close to the terminology put forward by the European Court of Human Rights and the relevant recommendations. Unfortunately, the jurisprudence of the Belgian courts up to this date does not consistently demonstrate a thorough application of this terminology.

The relative lack of cases may also serve as a testament to a good functioning of the self-regulatory mechanisms organised by the professional associations. While the codes of these associations are more based on prescribing professional conduct and ethics than on enforceable rights, they do entail certain obligations of secrecy. It must, however, be noted that these obligations only exist in the internal relation and do not include enforceable rights for wronged sources. Also, these codes are only binding upon the members of the respective association. Therefore, the occasional author does not own his allegiance to anyone, except the source himself.

While these occasional authors do not fall within the scope of professional codes of conduct, the Belgian Constitutional Court did, however, not forget them. In 2006, the Court struck out those conditions from the law that made the definition of journalist quite restrictive. Belgian law now also grants protection to a person who has taken up his pen for the very first time and written an article on a small blog. The only element preventing that writing a rather lengthy postcard makes someone a journalist now is the requirement that the involved medium publishes with a minimal level of regularity.

Before turning to a general conclusion, it is also worth noting that Belgian primary legislation does not afford direct protection of the sources themselves. Whether or not such general protection is needed or even wanted, it is however apparent from Belgian jurisprudence that local courts tend to afford a de facto protection to weaker parties.

The conclusion to be made from this short introduction must in the end be threefold. Firstly, the Belgian legal framework affords a wide and detailed protection of journalistic sources to an even wider group of recipients. Secondly, the framework however also includes a number of exceptions worded in quite broad and general terms. Third and lastly, Belgian courts have seemingly not yet presided over a sufficient number of relevant cases to develop an adequate understanding and application of the terminology used by both the law and European jurisprudence.

13. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

13.1. Legislation

- Directive 2006/24/EC of 15 March 2006, on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks.
- Recommendation CM/Rec(2014)7 of 30 April 2014, of the Committee of Ministers to member States on the protection of whistle-blowers.
- Belgian Constitution
- Criminal Code of 8 June 1867, BS 9 June 1867.
- Law of 3 July 1978, concerning labor contracts, BS 22 August 1978.
- Law of 18 July 1991, concerning the monitoring of police- and intelligence services and the Coordinating Body for Threat Analysis, BS 26 July 1991.
- Law of 8 December 1992, concerning the protection of the privacy with regard to the processing of personal data, BS 18 March 1993.
- Law of 4 August 1996, concerning the wellbeing of employees during the execution of their job, BS 18 September 1996
- Law of 30 November 1998, concerning the intelligence- and security services, BS 18 December 1998.
- Law of 7 April 2005, concerning the protection of journalistic sources, BS 27 April 2004.
- Law of 13 June 2005, concerning electronic communication, BS 20 June 2005.
- Law of 30 July 2013, concerning modification of articles 2, 126 and 145 of the law of 13 June 2005 concerning electronic communication and of article 90decies of the Criminal Procedure Code, BS 23 August 2013.
- Law of 15 September 2013, concerning the reporting of a supposed breach of integrity in the federal administrative authorities by her members of staff, BS 4 October 2013.
- Royal Order of 19 September 2013, to execute article 126 of the Law of 13 June 2005 concerning electronic communication, BS 8 October 2013.
- Report of Parliamentary Session of 26 January 2005, concerning a bill granting the right to journalists to withhold divulging their sources of information: Procedure of Evaluation: Hearing with M. De Haan, editor-in-chief of Télé Bruxelles and representative of the Bruschetta group, with M. Boribon, secretary-general with the Journaux francophones belges, with M. Anciaux, legal advisor with Journaux francophones belges, with. Van Nieuwenhuyzen, representative of Febelma, and with R. Goos, representative of Vlaamse Dagbladers.
- <https://www.senate.be/www/?MItabObj=pdf&MIcolObj=pdf&MInamObj=pdfid&MItypeObj=application/pdf&MIvalObj=50333302>
- Recommendation of the Commission on Privacy of 8 December 1992, concerning the compatibility of reporting systems with the law concerning the protection of the privacy with regard to the processing of personal data.

http://privacycommission.be/sites/privacycommission/files/documents/aanbeveling_01_2006.pdf

- Decree of 7 May 2004, concerning an amendment of the decree of 7 July 1998 concerning the establishment of a Flemish Ombudsservice, with regard to civil servants whom report irregularities, BS 11 July 2004.
- Code of the Council for Journalism
<http://www.rvdj.be/code-raad-voor-de-journalistiek>

13.2. Case law

- CJEU, 8 April 2014 (Digital Rights Ireland), C-293/12 en C-594/12.
- ECHR, Goodwin v. the United Kingdom, Judgement of 27 March 1996, 17488/90.
- ECHR, Fuentes Bobo v. Spain, Judgement of 19 February 2000, 39393/98.
- ECHR, Ernst v. Belgium, Judgement of 25 June 2002, 33400/96.
- ECHR, Roemen and Schmit v. Luxemburg, Judgement of 25 February 2003, 51772/99.
- ECHR, Šečić v. Croatia, Judgement of 31 May 2007, 40116/02.
- ECHR, Masschelin v. Belgium, Judgement of 20 November 2007, 20528/05.
- ECHR, Tillack v. Belgium, Judgement of 27 November 2007, 20477/05.
- ECHR, Guja v. Moldova, Judgement of 12 February 2008, 14277/04.
- ECHR, Wojtas-Kaleta v. Poland, Judgement of 16 July 2009, 20436/02.
- ECHR, Financial Times Ltd. and others v. the United Kingdom, Judgement of 15 December 2009, 821/03.
- ECHR, Sanoma Uitgevers BV v. The Netherlands, Judgement of 10 September 2010, 38224/03.
- ECHR, Goggins e.a. v. the United Kingdom, Judgement of 19 July 2011, 30098/04 etc.
- ECHR, Heinisch v. Germany, Judgement of 21 July 2011, 28274/08.
- ECHR, Sosinowska v. Poland, Judgement of 18 October 2011, 10247/09.
- ECHR, Matúz v. Hungary, Judgement of 21 October 2014, 7357/10.
- Constitutional Court, Judgement of 11 June 2015, 84/2015.
- Constitutional Court, Judgement of 7 June 2006, 91/2006.
- Court of Cassation, Judgement of 6 February 2008, P.07.1466.F.
- Court of Labour Brussels, Judgement of 9 March 2007, 47.015.
- Court of First Instance Brussels, President's Judgement of 7 June 2002, AM 2002/5, 459.
- Court of First Instance Brussels, Judgement of 29 June 2007, AM 2007/5, 500.
- Criminal Court Dendermonde, Judgement of 3 November 2008, AM 2009/455.

13.3. Books and articles

- Baekeland C., "De 'War on Terror' en het journalistieke bronnengeheim: droomhuwelijk of (v)echtscheiding", in Declerck C., Foubert P. en Ooms A. (eds.), Geheimen in het recht, Antwerpen, Intersentia, 2011, 155-184.
- Brewaeys E., "Informatiebronnen van Journalisten", NJW 2005, 542-551.

- Brewaeyts E., Voorhoof D. and Voets F., Wetboek media en journalistiek, Mechelen, Kluwer, 2014, 420.
- Ceuleers J., “Eindelijk: het journalistiek zwijgrecht (bijna) wettelijk erkend”, AM 2004, 222.
- de Baets P., Vynckier G. and Vande Walle G., “Melden meer dan ‘klokkenluiden’ ”, Orde van de dag 2015/72, 6-15.
- De Smet B., “Beperkte draagwijdte van het journalistiek bronnengeheim”, RW 2008, 1727.
- Deltour P., “Journalistiek en bijzondere politiemethoden”, Orde van de dag, 2003, 48.
- Deltour P., “Uitstekende Bronnenwet botst op taaie gerechtelijke gewoonten en nieuwe uitdagingen”, in Voorhoof D. (ed.), Het journalistiek bronnengeheim onthuld, Brugge, Die Keure, 2008, 49.
- Docquir B., Le droit de la vie privée, Brussel, Larcier, 2008, 354p.
- Dumortier J. and Graux H., “Recente ontwikkelingen in het domein van privacy- en gegevensbescherming”, in Valcke P. and Dumortier J. (eds.), Themis 81: ICT- en Mediarecht, Brugge, Die Keure, 2013, 131-132.
- Dumortier J., ICT-recht, Leuven, Acco, 2013, 368p.
- Dumortier J., Vanhecke R. and Missotten S., “Laat de Belgische wetgeving gerechtelijk aftappen van privécommunicatie via GSM of internet toe?”, Computerrecht 1997, 145-149.
- Gombeer T., “Recente rechtspraak van het Europees Mensenrechtenhof inzake artikel 10 EVRM en impact van de journalistieke beroepsethiek”, Nullum Crimen 2009, 79p.
- Hansez B., “Een Orde van Journalisten?”, Jura Falc 2000-2001, 95-120.
- Hoebeke S. and Mouffe B., Le droit de la presse, Louvain-la-Neuve, Academia Bruylant, 2005, 873p.
- Hoebeke S. and Mouffe B., Le droit de la presse: presse écrite presse audiovisuelle, presse électronique, Limal, Anthemis, 2012, 910p.
- Humblet P., “Kritiek op werkgever moet kunnen”, De Juristenkrant 18 April 2007, 20.
- Lemmens K., “La protection des sources journalistiques. Une commentaire de la loi du 7 avril 2005”, JT 2005, 669-677.
- Lemmens K., “Wovon Man Nicht Reden Kann, Darüber Muss Man Schweigen”. Het Journalistieke Zwijgrecht Wettelijk Beschermd in Voorhoof D. (ed.), Het journalistiek bronnengeheim onthuld, Brugge, Die Keure, 2008, 19-37.
- Martens P., Mediarecht voor journalisten, Antwerpen, Garant, 2005, 165p.
- Messiaen T., “Klokkenluiders. Overzicht van de wetgeving”, NJW 2007, 922 – 926.
- Schuijt G., “Journalistieke bronbescherming met of zonder wet”, in Voorhoof D. (ed.), Het journalistiek bronnengeheim onthuld, Brugge, Die Keure, 2008, 76.
- Valcke P. and Lievens E., Media Law in Belgium, Alphen aan den Rijn, Kluwer Law International, 2011, 152.
- Van Linthout P. and Kerkhofs J., “Actuele uitdagingen in cybercrime voor de advocatuur en de magistratuur: vervolgen en verdedigen met een bot scalpel?” in Valcke P. and Dumortier J. (eds.), Themis 81 - ICT- en mediarecht, Brugge, Die Keure, 2013.

- Verstraeten R., “Het beroeps- en bronnengeheim en de BIM-wet”, in Van Laethem W., Van Daele D. and Vangeebergen B. (eds.), De wet op de bijzondere inlichtingenmethoden, Antwerpen, Intersentia, 2010, 151-173.
- Voorhoof D. and Valcke P., Handboek Mediarecht, Brussel, Larcier, 2011, 303.
- Voorhoof D. and Valcke P., Handboek mediarecht, Brussel, Larcier, 2011, 758.
- Voorhoof D. and Valcke P., Handboek mediarecht, Brussel, Larcier, 2015, 758.
- Voorhoof D., Freedom of Expression and Information and the Case Law of the European Court of Human Rights and the Court of Justice of the EU. Overview and highlights 2014, Colombia University 2015, 1 -55.
- Voorhoof D., Het journalistiek bronnengeheim onthuld, Brugge, die Keure, 2008, 172.
- Werkers E., Lievens E. and Valcke P., “Bronnengeheim voor Bloggers?”, NJW 2006, 630.

13.4. Internet sources

- Liga voor Mensenrechten (NGO), Dataretentiewet 2.0 op komst: Regering wil opnieuw al uw communicatiegegevens bijhouden, Communication of 18 February 2016, <http://www.mensenrechten.be/index.php/site/nieuwsberichten/1707>
- Raad voor Journalistiek, Over Ons, consulted on 13 February 2016, <http://www.rvdj.be/node/58>
- Conseil de Déontologie journalistique, Le CDJ, Généralités : Un Conseil de Déontologie, pour le Public et pour les Médias, consulted on 11 March 2016, <http://www.deontologiejournalistique.be/index.php?presentation>
- EXPOLINK Whistleblowing Hotline, Whistleblowing Legislation (Whistleblowing in Belgium), consulted on 9 February 2016, <http://expolink.co.uk/whistleblowing/legislation/>
- Vandekerckhove E., Providing An Alternative To Silence: Towards Greater Protection And Support For Whistle-blowers In Belgium: 2013 Report of Transparency International Belgium, http://transparencybelgium.be/images/slides/ATOS_Towards_greater_support_and_protection_for_whistle-blowers_in_Belgium.pdf

14. Table of Provisions

*Note: this annex includes the main provisions referred to in the body of the text.
 Provisions of lesser importance are generally translated or transcribed in the body of the text.
 Care was given to a translation most fitting to the original Dutch content and purport. However, no rights should be derived from this translation, as important nuances may inadvertently be lacking.*

Provisions in native language	Corresponding translation
Art. 19 De vrijheid van eredienst, de vrije openbare uitoefening ervan, alsmede de vrijheid om op elk gebied zijn mening te uiten, zijn gewaarborgd, behoudens bestraffing van de misdrijven die ter gelegenheid van het gebruikmaken van die vrijheden worden gepleegd.	Art. 19 The freedom of worship, the free public exercise thereof, together with the freedom of expressing one's opinion on any subject, are guaranteed, save for punishment of the offenses committed on the occasion of the use of these freedoms.
Art. 22 Ieder heeft recht op eerbiediging van zijn privé-leven en zijn gezinsleven, behoudens in de gevallen en onder de voorwaarden door de wet bepaald. De wet, het decreet of de in artikel 134 bedoelde regel waarborgen de bescherming van dat recht.	Art. 22 Each person has the right to respect for his private life and family life, save for the cases and under the conditions provided by law. The law, decree or rule as referred to in article 134 guarantee the protection of this right.
Art. 25 De drukpers is vrij; de censuur kan nooit worden ingevoerd; geen borgstelling kan worden geëist van de schrijvers, uitgevers of drukkers. Wanneer de schrijver bekend is en zijn	Art. 25 The press is free; censorship can never be introduced; no security deposit can be demanded from writers, publishers or printers.

woonplaats in België heeft, kan de uitgever, de drukker of de verspreider niet worden vervolgd.	When the author is known resident in Belgium, neither the publisher, the printer nor the distributor can be prosecuted.
Law of 30 November 1998 concerning regulation of the intelligence and security services (ISS Act)
Art. 2 §1. Deze wet is van toepassing op de Veiligheid van de Staat (VSSE), de burgerlijke inlichtingen- en veiligheidsdienst, en op de Algemene Dienst inlichting en veiligheid van de Krijgsmacht (ADIV), militaire inlichtingen- en veiligheidsdienst, die de twee inlichtingen- en veiligheidsdiensten van het Koninkrijk zijn. Bij het vervullen van hun opdrachten zorgen die diensten voor de naleving van, en dragen bij tot de bescherming van de individuele rechten en vrijheden alsook tot de democratische ontwikkeling van de maatschappij. De methoden voor het verzamelen van in deze wet bedoelde gegevens door de inlichtingen- en veiligheidsdiensten kunnen niet worden gebruikt met het doel de individuele rechten en vrijheden te verminderen of te belemmeren. Ieder gebruik van een specifieke of uitzonderlijke methode voor het verzamelen van gegevens impliceert het naleven van de principes van subsidiariteit en proportionaliteit.	Art. 2 §1. This law is applicable to the State Security Service (VSSE), the civil intelligence and security service, and the General Intelligence and Security Service (GISS), the military service for intelligence and security, which are the two intelligence and security services of the Kingdom. In fulfilling their assignments those services provide for compliance with, and contribute to the protection of individual rights and freedoms and the democratic development of society. The methods for the collection of data referred to in this Law by the intelligence and security services cannot be used for the purpose of reducing or hindering the individual rights and freedoms. Any use of a specific or exceptional method for collecting data implies compliance with the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality.

§2. Het is de inlichtingen- en veiligheidsdiensten verboden gegevens die worden beschermd door ofwel het beroepsgeheim van een advocaat of een arts, ofwel door het bronnengeheim van een journalist te verkrijgen, te analyseren of te exploiteren. Bij uitzondering en ingeval de betrokken dienst vooraf over ernstige aanwijzingen beschikt dat de advocaat, de arts of de journalist persoonlijk en actief meewerkt of heeft meegewerkt aan het ontstaan of aan de ontwikkeling van de potentiële bedreiging, zoals bedoeld in de artikelen 7, 1°, 8, 1° tot 4°, en 11, kunnen deze beschermde gegevens worden verkregen, geanalyseerd of geëxploiteerd worden. §3. Onverminderd de wet van 11 december 1998 betreffende de classificatie en de veiligheidsmachtigingen, veiligheidsattesten en veiligheidsadviezen, de wet van 11 april 1994 betreffende de openbaarheid van bestuur en de wet van 8 december 1992 betreffende de bescherming van de persoonlijke levenssfeer ten opzichte van de verwerking van persoonsgegevens, en op verzoek van iedere natuurlijke persoon met een wettelijk belang, informeert het diensthoofd deze persoon schriftelijk dat hij het voorwerp heeft uitgemaakt van een methode zoals bedoeld in artikel 18/2, § 1 en 2, op voorwaarde : 1° dat een periode van meer dan vijf jaar is verstreken sinds het beëindigen van de methode; 2° dat met betrekking tot de aanvrager sinds het einde van de methode geen nieuwe	§2. It is forbidden for intelligence and security services to obtain, analyse or operate information protected by either the professional confidentiality of a lawyer or medical doctor, or the secrecy of sources of a journalist . Exceptionally and in case the service concerned possesses, in advance, serious indications that the lawyer, medical doctor or journalist is personally and actively participating, or has personally and actively been participating in the creation or development of a potential threat as referred to in article 7,18; 8,1° to 4°; and 11, this protected data can be obtained, analysed or operated. §3. Without prejudice to the law of 11 December 1998 on the classification and security clearances, certificates and safety advice, the law of 11 April 1994 concerning the protection of privacy with regard to the processing of personal data, and at the request of any natural person with a legal interest, the department informs the person in writing that he has been subject of a procedure referred to in article 18/2, §1 and §2, provided; 1° a period of more than 5 years has elapsed since the ending of the method; 2° no new data has been collected on the applicant since ending of the method.
---	---

gegevens werden verzameld. De medegedeelde informatie stipt het juridische kader aan waarbinnen de dienst gemachtigd werd de methode te gebruiken. Het diensthoofd van de betrokken dienst informeert de commissie over elk verzoek om informatie en over het geleverde antwoord. De Koning bepaalt, bij een in de Ministerraad overlegd koninklijk besluit, na advies van het ministerieel Comité voor Inlichtingen en Veiligheid, de wijze waarop de informatie bedoeld in het eerste lid wordt medegedeeld.	The supplied information pinpoints the legal framework within which the service was authorized to use the method. The head of the department concerned shall inform the Commission about any requests for information and the provided answers. The King shall decide, by a Royal Decree discussed in the Council of Ministers, after consultation with the Ministerial Committee for Intelligence and Security, the way in which the information referred to in the first paragraph will be disclosed.
Art. 3 In deze wet wordt verstaan onder: ... 16° “journalist”: een journalist die gerechtigd is de titel van een beroepsjournalist te dragen overeenkomstig de wet van 30 december 1963 betreffende de erkenning en de bescherming van de titel van beroepsjournalist ...	Art. 3 This law shall apply: ... 16° “journalist”: as a journalist who is entitled to use the title of professional journalist under the law of 30 December 1963 on the recognition and protection of the title of professional journalist ...
Art. 7 De Veiligheid van de Staat heeft als opdracht:	Art. 7 The State Security Service (VSSE) has the

1° het inwinnen, analyseren en verwerken van inlichtingen die betrekking hebben op elke activiteit die de inwendige veiligheid van de Staat en het voortbestaan van de democratische en grondwettelijke orde, de uitwendige veiligheid van de Staat en de internationale betrekkingen, het wetenschappelijk of economisch potentieel, zoals gedefinieerd door de Nationale Veiligheidsraad¹, of elk ander fundamenteel belang van het land, zoals gedefinieerd door de Koning op voorstel van de Nationale Veiligheidsraad, bedreigt of zou kunnen bedreigen; 2° het uitvoeren van de veiligheidsonderzoeken die haar overeenkomstig de richtlijnen van de Nationale Veiligheidsraad worden toevertrouwd; 3° het inwinnen, analyseren en verwerken van inlichtingen die betrekking hebben op de activiteiten van buitenlandse inlichtingendiensten op Belgisch grondgebied 4° het uitvoeren van alle andere opdrachten die haar door of krachtens de wet worden toevertrouwd.	task of: 1° the collection, analysis and processing of information relating to every activity that threatens or could threaten the internal security of the State and the continued existence of the democratic and constitutional order, the external security of the State and internal relations, the scientific or economic potential, as defined by the National Security Council, or any other fundamental interest of the country as defined by the King on the proposal of the National Security Council; 2° executing the investigations entrusted to it according to the guidelines of the National Security Council; 3° gathering, analyzing and processing information relating to the activities of foreign intelligence services on Belgian territory; 4° executing any other tasks entrusted to it by or under the law.
Art. 8 Voor de toepassing van artikel 7 wordt verstaan onder : 1° "activiteit die bedreigt of zou kunnen bedreigen" : elke individuele of collectieve activiteit ontplooid in het land of vanuit het buitenland die verband kan houden met spionage, inmenging, terrorisme, extremisme,	Art. 8 For the purposes of article 7 this law shall apply: 1° “activity that threatens or could threaten”: as every individual or collective

proliferatie, schadelijke sektarische organisaties, criminele organisaties, daarbij inbegrepen de verspreiding van propaganda, de aanmoediging of de rechtstreekse of onrechtstreekse steun, onder meer door het verstrekken van financiële, technische of logistieke middelen, het verstrekken van inlichtingen over mogelijke doelwitten, de ontwikkeling van structuren en van actiecapaciteit en de verwezenlijking van de nagestreefde doeleinden. Voor de toepassing van het vorige lid wordt verstaan onder : a) spionage : het opzoeken of het verstrekken van inlichtingen die voor het publiek niet toegankelijk zijn en het onderhouden van geheime verstandhoudingen die deze handelingen kunnen voorbereiden of vergemakkelijken; b) terrorisme : het gebruik van geweld tegen personen of materiële belangen om ideologische of politieke redenen met het doel zijn doelstellingen door middel van terreur, intimidatie of bedreigingen te bereiken;	activity undertaken in the country of from abroad that may be related to espionage, intervention, terrorism, extremism, proliferation, harmful sectarian organisations, criminal organisations, including the dissemination of propaganda, the encouragement or the direct or indirect support, including by providing financial, technical and logistical resources, providing information about possible targets, the development or structures and capacity for action and the achievement of the objectives pursued. For the purposes of the previous paragraph this law shall apply: a) espionage: as searching or providing of intelligence which is not accessible to the public and the maintenance of secrete understandings which can prepare or facilitate such acts; b) terrorism: as use of violence against persons or property for ideological or political motives and by means of terror, intimidation or threats; c) extremism: as racist, xenophobic, anarchist, nationalist, authoritarian and totalitarian ideas or intentions, whether of political, ideological, religious or philosophical nature, which are in theory or practice inconsistent with the principles of democracy and human rights, the proper functioning of democratic institutions or the foundations of the rule of law; d) proliferation: as trading or transactions of materials, products, goods or know-how that may contribute to the
--	---

c) extremisme : racistische, xenofobe, anarchistische, nationalistische, autoritaire of totalitaire opvattingen of bedoelingen, ongeacht of ze van politieke, ideologische, confessionele of filosofische aard zijn, die theoretisch of in de praktijk strijdig zijn met de beginselen van de democratie of de mensenrechten, met de goede werking van de democratische instellingen of andere grondslagen van de rechtsstaat; d) proliferatie : de handel of de transacties betreffende materialen, producten, goederen. of know-how die kunnen bijdragen tot de productie of de ontwikkeling van non-conventionele of zeer geavanceerde wapensystemen. In dit verband worden onder meer bedoeld de ontwikkeling van nucleaire, chemische en biologische wapenprogramma's, de daaraan verbonden transmissiesystemen, alsook de personen, structuren of landen die daarbij betrokken zijn; e) schadelijke sektarische organisatie : elke groep met filosofische of religieuze inslag of die voorwendt dat te zijn en die qua organisatie of in haar praktijk schadelijke onwettige activiteiten uitoefent, individuen of de maatschappij nadeel berokkent of de menselijke waardigheid schendt; f) criminele organisatie : iedere gestructureerde vereniging van meer dan twee personen die duurt in de tijd, met als oogmerk het in onderling overleg plegen van misdaden en wanbedrijven, om direct of indirect vermogensvoordelen te verkrijgen, waarbij gebruik gemaakt wordt van intimidatie, bedreiging, geweld, listige kunstgrepen of corruptie, of waarbij commerciële of andere structuren worden aangewend om het plegen van misdrijven te verbergen of te vergemakkelijken. g) inmenging : de poging om met	production or development of non-conventional or highly sophisticated weapon systems. In this context, that shall, inter alia, include the development of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs, the associated transmission systems, and the persons, structures or countries involved.; e) harmful sectarian organisations: as any group with a philosophical or religious approach or pretending to have so and that utilises an organisational structure or practice that equates to an unlawful activity, causes harm to society or individuals, or violates human dignity; f) criminal organisation: as a structural and lasting organisation between more than 2 people with a view to mutually commit crimes and offences, to acquire direct or indirect financial benefits, in which use is made of intimidation, threats, violence, fraudulent practices or corruption, or commercial and other structures are used to hide or facilitate the commission of crimes; g) Intervention: as the attempt to influence with unauthorized, fraudulent or clandestine means, the decision-making processes;
--	---

ongoorloofde, bedrieglijke of clandestiene middelen beslissingsprocessen te beïnvloeden; 2° "de inwendige veiligheid van de Staat en het voortbestaan van de democratische en grondwettelijke orde": a) de veiligheid van de instellingen van de Staat en het vrijwaren van de continuïteit van de regelmatige werking van de rechtsstaat, de democratische instellingen, de elementaire beginselen die eigen zijn aan iedere rechtsstaat, alsook de mensenrechten en de fundamentele vrijheden; b) de veiligheid en de fysieke en morele vrijwaring van personen en de veiligheid en de vrijwaring van goederen; 3° "de uitwendige veiligheid van de Staat en de internationale betrekkingen" : het vrijwaren van de onschendbaarheid van het nationaal grondgebied, van de soevereiniteit en de onafhankelijkheid van de Staat, van de belangen van de landen waarmee België gemeenschappelijke doeleinden nastreeft, alsook van de internationale en andere betrekkingen die België met vreemde Staten en internationale of supranationale instellingen onderhoudt; 4° "het wetenschappelijk of economisch potentieel": de vrijwaring van de essentiële elementen van het wetenschappelijk of economisch potentieel;	2° "the internal security of the State and the continued existence of the democratic and constitutional order": a) as the safety of the institutions of the State and the safeguarding of the continuity and proper functioning of the rule of law, democratic institutions, basic principles inherent to any rule of law, human rights and fundamental freedoms; b) as the safety and the physical and moral safeguarding of people and the security and safeguarding of assets; 3° "the external security of: the State and international relations": as the safeguarding of the integrity of the national territory, the sovereignty and independence of the State, the interest of the countries with which Belgium pursues common goals, as well as the international and other relations Belgium maintains with foreign States and international or supranational organisations. 4° "scientific or economic potential": as safeguarding the essential elements of the scientific and economic potential.
Art. 18/2 §1. De specifieke methoden voor het verzamelen van gegevens zijn :	Art. 18/2 §1. The specific methods for the collection of evidence are;

1° de observatie, met behulp van technische middelen, in publieke plaatsen en in private plaatsen die toegankelijk zijn voor het publiek, ofwel de observatie, al dan niet met behulp van technische middelen, van private plaatsen die niet toegankelijk zijn voor het publiek; 2° de doorzoeking, met behulp van technische middelen, van publieke plaatsen, van private plaatsen die toegankelijk zijn voor het publiek en van de gesloten voorwerpen die zich op deze plaatsen bevinden; 3° het kennisnemen van de identificatiegegevens van de afzender of de geadresseerde van post of van de titularis van een postbus; 4° de identificatie of de lokalisatie, met behulp van een technisch middel, van de elektronische communicatiediensten en -middelen waarop een bepaald persoon is geabonneerd of die door een bepaald persoon gewoonlijk worden gebruikt;]2 4° /1 de vordering van de operator van een elektronisch communicatienetwerk of van een verstrekker van een elektronische communicatiedienst tot het bekomen van de gegevens betreffende de betalingswijze, de identificatie van het betalingsmiddel en het tijdstip van betaling voor het abonnement of voor het gebruik van de elektronische	1° the observation, with assistance of technical means, in public places and in private places publicly accessible, either for observation, whether or not by technical means, of private places not accessible to the public; 2° the search, with assistance of technical means, of public places, of private places publicly accessible and of closed objects located in these places; 3° taking note of the identity of the sender or addressee of mail or of the owner of a mailbox; 4° the identification or the localization, with assistance of technical means, of electronic communication services and – means which a particular person is subscribed to or which a particular person commonly uses; 4°/1 the demand of the operator of an electronic communication network or from a provider of an electronic communication service regarding the method of payment, the identification of the means of payment and the date of payment for the subscription or the use of the electronic communication service; 5° the measures to retrieve the data of electronic communication means and the localization of the origin or destination of electronic communication.
--	---

communicatiedienst;]2 5° de maatregelen tot opsporing van de oproepgegevens van elektronische communicatiemiddelen en de lokalisatie van de afkomst of de bestemming van elektronische communicatie. § 2. De uitzonderlijke methoden voor het verzamelen van gegevens zijn : 1° de observatie, al dan niet met behulp van technische middelen, in private plaatsen die niet toegankelijk zijn voor het publiek, in woningen of in een door een woning omsloten eigen aanhoorigheid in de zin van de artikelen 479, 480 en 481 van het Strafwetboek, of in een lokaal aangewend voor beroepsdoeleinden of als woonplaats door een advocaat, een arts of een journalist; 2° de doorzoeking, al dan niet met behulp van technische middelen, van private plaatsen die niet toegankelijk zijn voor het publiek, van woningen of van een door een woning omsloten eigen aanhoorigheid in de zin van de artikelen 479, 480 en 481 van het Strafwetboek, of van een lokaal aangewend voor beroepsdoeleinden of als woonplaats door een advocaat, een arts of een journalist, en van gesloten voorwerpen die zich op deze plaatsen bevinden; 3° de oprichting of het gebruik van een rechtspersoon ter ondersteuning van operationele activiteiten en het gebruik van agenten van de dienst, onder de dekmantel van een fictieve identiteit of hoedanigheid; 4° het openmaken en het kennisnemen van de al dan niet aan een postoperator toevertrouwde post;	§2. The exceptional methods for the collection of data are; 1° the observation, whether or not with assistance of technical means, of private places not accessible to the public, in housing or in a appurtenance enclosed by this housing in the sense of articles 479, 480 and 481 of the Criminal Code, or in a room used for professional purposes or as private residence by a lawyer, medical doctor or journalist; 2° the search, whether or not with assistance of technical means, of private places not accessible to the public, in housing or in a appurtenance enclosed by this housing in the sense of articles 479, 480 and 481 of the Criminal Code, or in a room used for professional purposes or as private residence by a lawyer, medical doctor or journalist, and of closed objects located in these places; 3° the creation or use of a legal entity to support operational activities and the use of agents of the service under guise of a fictitious identity or capacity; 4° opening and taking note of mail, whether or not entrusted to a postal operator;
---	---

5° het verzamelen van gegevens betreffende bankrekeningen en bankverrichtingen; 6° het binnendringen in een informaticasysteem, al dan niet met behulp van technische middelen, valse signalen, valse sleutels of valse hoedanigheden; 7° het af luisteren, het kennismaken van en het opnemen van communicaties. § 3. Als een in § § 1 en 2 bedoelde methode aangewend wordt ten opzichte van een advocaat, een arts of een journalist, of van hun lokalen of communicatiemiddelen die zij voor beroepsdoeleinden gebruiken, of van hun woonplaats of verblijfplaats, mag deze methode niet uitgevoerd worden zonder dat, naargelang het geval, de voorzitter van de Orde van de Vlaamse balies, van de Ordre des barreaux francophones et germanophone, van de Nationale Raad van de Orde van Geneesheren of van de Vereniging van Beroepsjournalisten hiervan vooraf op de hoogte is gebracht door de voorzitter van de commissie bedoeld in artikel 3, 6°. De voorzitter van de commissie is verplicht om de nodige inlichtingen te verstrekken aan de voorzitter van de Orde of van de Vereniging van Beroepsjournalisten, waarvan de advocaat, de arts of de journalist deel uitmaakt. De betrokken voorzitter is tot geheimhouding verplicht. De straffen bepaald in artikel 458 van het Strafwetboek zijn van toepassing voor inbreuken op deze verplichting tot geheimhouding. Als een in § § 1 en 2 bedoelde methode aangewend wordt ten opzichte van een advocaat, een arts of een journalist, van hun lokalen of communicatiemiddelen die zij voor beroepsdoeleinden gebruiken, of van hun woonplaats of verblijfplaats, gaat de voorzitter van de commissie na of de via deze methode verkregen gegevens een rechtstreeks	5° the collection of data regarding bank accounts and banking transactions; 6° the intrusion into a computer system, with or without the assistance of technical means, false signals, false keys or false identities; 7° eavesdropping, taking note and recording of communications. §3. If a method referred to in §1 and §2 is used with regard to a lawyer, medical doctor or a journalist, or their premises or means of communication used for professional purposes, or their place of residence or stay, this should not be carried out without the chairman of the commission as referred to in article 3,6° notifying in advance, respectively, the president of the Order of the Flemish Bar or the Order of the French and German Bars, of the National Council of the Order of Physicians, or of the Association of Professional Journalists. The chairman of the commission is obliged to provide the necessary information to these respective Order or Association the lawyer, medical doctor or journalist belongs. The president in question is bound to secrecy. The sanctions provided in article 458 of the Criminal Code are applicable to infringements of this duty of confidentiality. If a method referred to in §1 and §2 is used with regard to a lawyer, medical doctor, or journalist, their premises or means of communication used for professional purposes, the chairman of the commission examines whether the data obtained through these methods are directly related to the
---	--

verband hebben met de bedreiging, wanneer zij beschermd worden door het beroepsgeheim van een advocaat of arts of door het bronnengeheim van een journalist. Als een in § 2 bedoelde uitzonderlijke methode aangewend wordt ten opzichte van een advocaat, een arts of een journalist, dient de voorzitter van de commissie of het door hem aangewezen lid van de commissie aanwezig te zijn bij de aanwending van deze methode.	threat, when they are protected by the professional confidentiality of a lawyer or medical doctor, or the secrecy of sources of a journalist. If an exceptional method referred to in §2 is used with regard to a lawyer, a medical doctor or a journalist, the chairman of the commission or the member appointed by him must be present during the use of this method.
Law of 7 April 2005 concerning the protection of journalistic sources (Act)
Art. 1 Deze wet regelt een aangelegenheid als bedoeld in artikel 78 van de Grondwet.	Art. 1 This law governs a situation as intended by article 78 of the Constitution.
Art. 2 De bescherming van de bronnen als bepaald in artikel 3, genieten de volgende personen : 1° journalisten, dus eenieder die als zelfstandige of loontrekkende werkzaam is, alsook iedere rechtspersoon, en die regelmatig een rechtstreekse bijdrage levert tot het verzamelen, redigeren, produceren of verspreiden van informatie voor het publiek via een medium; 2° redactiemedewerkers, dus eenieder die door de uitoefening van zijn functie ertoe gebracht wordt kennis te nemen van informatie die tot de onthulling van een bron	Art. 2 The protection of the sources as defined by article 3, is enjoyed by the following persons: 1° journalists; everyone who works on a self-employed or salaried basis, and who adds on a regular basis to the gathering, editing, producing or distributing of information towards the public through 2° editorial staff; everyone who, by the exercise of their function, is led to take knowledge of information that can lead to the disclosure of a source; regardless of whether

kan leiden, ongeacht of dat verloopt via het verzamelen, de redactionele verwerking, de productie of de verspreiding van die informatie.	this takes place through gathering, editorial process, production or distribution of that information.
Art. 3 De personen bedoeld in artikel 2 hebben het recht hun informatiebronnen te verzwijgen. Met uitzondering van de gevallen bedoeld in artikel 4, kunnen zij er niet toe worden gedwongen hun informatiebronnen vrij te geven en inlichtingen, opnames en documenten te verstrekken die onder meer : 1° de identiteit van hun informanten kunnen bekendmaken; 2° de aard of de herkomst van hun informatie kunnen prijsgeven; 3° de identiteit van de auteur van een tekst of audiovisuele productie kunnen bekendmaken; 4° de inhoud van de informatie en van de documenten zelf kunnen bekendmaken, indien daarmee de informant kan worden geïdentificeerd.	Art. 3 The persons referred to in article 3 have the right to withhold their sources of information. With exception from the cases referred to in article 4, these persons cannot be forced to divulge their sources of information, or to release information, images/recordings or documents that, inter alia: 1° could reveal the identity of their informants; 2° could disclose the nature or origin of the information; 3° could reveal the identity of the author of a text or audiovisual production; 4° could reveal the content of the information and documents itself, if the informant can be identified by this.
Art. 4 De personen bedoeld in artikel 2 kunnen enkel op vordering van de rechter ertoe	Art. 4 The persons referred to in article can only be forced to reveal their sources of information

gedwongen worden de informatiebronnen bedoeld in artikel 3 vrij te geven, indien die van aard zijn misdrijven te voorkomen die een ernstige bedreiging opleveren voor de fysieke integriteit van één of meer personen, daarin begrepen de misdrijven bedoeld in artikel 137 van het Strafwetboek, in de mate zij de fysieke integriteit in het gedrang brengen, en indien de volgende cumulatieve voorwaarden vervuld zijn : 1° de gevraagde informatie is van cruciaal belang voor het voorkomen van deze misdrijven; 2° de gevraagde informatie kan op geen enkele andere wijze verkregen worden.	as referred to in article 3 by a court order, and only if these are of a capability to prevent crimes that cause a serious threat to the physical integrity of one or more persons, therein understood the crimes as referred to in article 137 of the Criminal Code, to the extent that they endanger the physical integrity, and if the ensuing cumulative conditions are fulfilled: 1° the requested information is of crucial importance for the prevention of these crimes; 2° the requested information cannot be obtained in any other way.
Art. 5 Gegevens die betrekking hebben op de informatiebronnen van de personen bedoeld in artikel 2, mogen niet het voorwerp uitmaken van enige opsporings- of onderzoeksmaatregel, tenzij die gegevens kunnen voorkomen dat de in artikel 4 bedoelde misdrijven worden gepleegd, en met naleving van de daarin bepaalde voorwaarden.	Art. 5 Data relating to the sources of information of the persons referred to in article 2, may not be the subject of any investigational or inquisitor measures, unless that data can prevent that the crimes referred to in article 4 will be committed, and with compliance to the conditions laid down therein.
Art. 6 De personen bedoeld in artikel 2 kunnen niet op grond van artikel 505 van het Strafwetboek worden vervolgd als zij hun recht uitoefenen om hun informatiebronnen te verzwijgen.	Art. 6 The persons referred to in article 2 cannot be prosecuted on the basis of article 505 of the Criminal Code if they exercise their right to withhold their sources of information.

Art. 7 Ingeval het beroepsgeheim in de zin van artikel 458 van het Strafwetboek wordt geschonden, kunnen de personen bedoeld in artikel 2 niet op grond van artikel 67, vierde lid, van het Strafwetboek worden vervolgd als zij hun recht uitoefenen om hun informatiebronnen te verzwijgen.	Art. 7 In case that the professional confidentiality in the sense of article 458 of the Criminal Code is violated, the persons referred to in article 2 cannot be prosecuted on the ground of article 67, fourth paragraph, of the Criminal Code if they exercise their right to withhold their sources of information.
Law of 13 June 2005 concerning the electronic communication
Art. 127 §1. De Koning bepaalt, na advies van de Commissie voor de bescherming van de persoonlijke levenssfeer en van het Instituut, de technische en administratieve maatregelen die aan de operatoren of aan de eindgebruikers worden opgelegd om : 1° in het kader van een noodoproep de oproeplijn te kunnen identificeren; 2° de eindgebruiker te kunnen identificeren en het opsporen, lokaliseren, afluisteren, kennismaken en opnemen van privé-communicatie mogelijk te maken onder de voorwaarden bepaald door de artikel en 46bis, 88bis en 90ter tot 90decies van het Wetboek van strafvordering en door de wet van 30 november 1998 houdende regeling van de inlichtingen- en veiligheidsdiensten De Koning bepaalt, na advies van het Instituut, de tarieven voor de vergoeding van de medewerking van de operatoren aan de in het eerste lid, 2°, bedoelde verrichtingen alsook de termijn waarbinnen de operatoren	Art. 127 §1/ The King shall determine, on the advice of the Commission for the protection of privacy and of the Institute, the technical and administrative measures imposed on operators or end-users to: 1° be able to identify the calling line in the framework of emergency calls; 2° to identify, trace, locate, eavesdrop, take note and record (of) private communications by an end user under the conditions as referred to by articles 46bis, 88bis and 90ter-90decies of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and by the law of 30 November 1998 regulating the Intelligence and Security Services. The King shall determine, on the advice of the Institute, tariffs for compensation for the cooperation of the operators in the operations referred to in paragraph 2 and the deadline by which operators or subscribers must comply with the measures imposed.

of de abonnees moeten voldoen aan de opgelegde maatregelen.

§ 2. De levering of het gebruik van een dienst of van apparatuur die de uitvoering bemoeilijkt of verhindert van de in § 1 bedoelde verrichtingen, zijn verboden, met uitzondering van encryptiesystemen die kunnen worden gebruikt om de vertrouwelijkheid van de communicatie en de veiligheid van betalingen te garanderen.

§ 3. Totdat de maatregelen, bedoeld in § 1, in werking treden, is het verbod bedoeld in § 2 niet van toepassing op de mobiele openbare elektronische communicatiediensten die worden geleverd op basis van een voorafbetaalde kaart.

§ 4. Indien een operator binnen de door de Koning vastgestelde termijn niet voldoet aan de hem opgelegde technische en administratieve maatregelen, is het hem verboden de dienst, waarvoor de betrokken maatregelen niet genomen zijn, aan te bieden.

§ 5. De operatoren sluiten de eindgebruikers die binnen de door de Koning vastgestelde termijn niet voldoen aan de hen opgelegde technische en administratieve maatregelen af van de netwerken en diensten waarop de opgelegde maatregelen van toepassing zijn. Die eindgebruikers worden op geen enkele wijze vergoed voor de afsluiting.

Indien een operator binnen de door de Koning vastgestelde termijn niet overgaat tot de afsluiting van de eindgebruikers die niet voldoen aan de hen opgelegde technische en administratieve maatregelen, is het hem verboden de dienst, waarvoor de eindgebruiker niet heeft voldaan aan de hem opgelegde maatregelen, te verstrekken totdat de identificatie van de oproeper mogelijk is §2. The provision or use of a service or equipment that hinders the implementation or prevents the execution of measures referred to in §1 are prohibited, with the exception of encryption systems that can be used to protect the confidentiality of communications and security of payments.

§3. Until the measures referred to in §1 come into effect, the prohibition referred to in §2 shall not apply to the mobile public electronic communication services provided on the basis of a prepaid card.

§4. If an operator does not meet the imposed technical and administrative measures imposed on a service of his within the deadline set by the King, he will be forbidden to offer the respective service.

§5. The operator shall disconnect the end-user who does not comply with the technical and administrative measures imposed on him within the deadline set by the King from the services on which measures are imposed. The end-users are in no way compensated for the disconnection.

If an operator does not comply with the order for disconnection of an end-users who does not comply with the technical and administrative measures imposed on him, he is forbidden continuing offering the service for which the end-user does not meet the imposed measures before the identification of the end-user is made possible.

gemaakt. § 6. Elke operator zet een interne procedure op voor de afhandeling van verzoeken om toegang tot persoonsgegevens van gebruikers op grond van paragraaf 1. Hij verstrekt op verzoek aan het Instituut gegevens over deze procedures, het aantal ontvangen verzoeken, de aangevoerde wettelijke motivering en zijn antwoord.	§6. Every operator sets up an internal procedure for handling requests for access to end-users' personal data pursuant to §1. It shall
Law of 15 September 2013 concerning the report of an alleged breach on integrity in the federal administrative authorities by her staff
Art. 2 Voor de toepassing van deze wet wordt verstaan onder : 1° personeelslid : het statutair personeelslid, de stagiair of het personeelslid met een arbeidsovereenkomst; 2° federale administratieve overheden : de federale administratieve overheden zoals bedoeld in artikel 14 § 1, 1°, van de wetten op de Raad van State, gecoördineerd op 12 januari 1973; 3° veronderstelde integriteitsschending : de veronderstelling van a) een handeling of het nalaten van een handeling door een personeelslid die een inbreuk is op de wetten, de besluiten, de omzendbrieven, de interne regels en de	Art. 2 For the application of this law shall apply the following definitions: 1°: member of staff: the statutory member of staff, the trainee or the member of staff with an employment contract. 2° federal administrative authorities: the federal administrative authorities referred to in Article 14 § 1, 1 ° of the laws on the Council of State, consolidated on January 12, 1973; 3° an alleged breach of integrity: the presumption of a) an act or omission by a staff member which is a violation of the laws, decisions, circulars, internal rules and internal

interne procedures die van toepassing zijn op de federale administratieve overheden en hun personeelsleden; b) een handeling of het nalaten van een handeling door een personeelslid die een onaanvaardbaar risico inhoudt voor het leven, de gezondheid of de veiligheid van personen of voor het milieu; c) een handeling of het nalaten van een handeling door een personeelslid die manifest getuigt van een ernstige tekortkoming in de professionele verplichtingen of in het beheer van een federale administratieve overheid; d) het welbewust bevelen of adviseren door een personeelslid om een integriteitsschending te begaan zoals bedoeld in a), b) en c).	procedures that apply to the federal administrative authorities and their staff; b) an act or omission by a staff member that involves an unacceptable risk to the life, health or safety of persons or to the environment; c) an act or omission by a staff member which manifestly shows a serious failure in professional duties or in the management of a federal administrative authority; d) the knowingly recommending or advising by a staff member to commit a breach of integrity as referred to in a), b) and c).
Art. 3 § 1. Het systeem voor de melding van een veronderstelde integriteitsschending dient voor de melding van een veronderstelde integriteitsschending in de federale administratieve overheden door een personeelslid dat in dienstactiviteit is in één van deze overheden.	Art. 3 The system for reporting presumed breach of integrity serves for the reporting of a suspected breach of integrity in the federal administrative authorities by a staff member in service of any of these authorities.

Art. 6 § 1. Het personeelslid dat wenst te handelen overeenkomstig artikel 8, § 1, vraagt eerst schriftelijk een voorafgaand advies aan een vertrouwenspersoon integriteit van de federale administratieve overheid waar hij in dienstactiviteit is; Het personeelslid dat wenst te handelen overeenkomstig artikel 8, § 2, vraagt eerst schriftelijk een voorafgaand advies aan het Centraal Meldpunt.	Art. 6 § 1. The staff member who wishes to act in accordance with Article 8, § 1, is required to ask a written preliminary opinion of the confidant of integrity of the federal administrative authority where he is employed; The staff member who wishes to act in accordance with Article 8 § 2, is required to ask a written preliminary opinion to the Central Reporting Point.
Art. 8 § 1. Een personeelslid brengt zijn functionele of een hiërarchische meerdere eerlijk en op basis van een redelijk vermoeden op de hoogte van een veronderstelde integriteitsschending in de federale administratieve overheid waar hij is tewerkgesteld. De betrokken functionele of hiërarchische meerdere gaat vertrouwelijk om met de identiteit en de rechtstoestand van dat personeelslid en zorgt ervoor dat hij geen nadelige gevolgen ondervindt. Als een personeelslid zijn functionele of een hiërarchische meerdere niet wenst op de hoogte te brengen van een veronderstelde integriteitsschending in de federale administratieve overheid waar hij is tewerkgesteld, meldt hij dit aan de vertrouwenspersoon integriteit. Tegelijkertijd deelt het personeelslid aan de vertrouwenspersoon integriteit zijn keuze mee voor : 1° een open melding, waarbij hij de vertrouwenspersoon integriteit de uitdrukkelijke en schriftelijke toelating geeft zijn identiteit bekend te maken, of 2° een vertrouwelijke melding, waarbij de vertrouwenspersoon integriteit met de	Art. 8 §1 A staff member shall inform his functional or hierarchical superior in fairness and on the basis of a reasonable suspicion aware of an alleged breach of integrity in the federal administrative authority where he is employed. The functional or hierarchical superior in question shall treat the identity and legal status of that employee as confidential and shall ensure that he will not be adversely affected. If a staff member does not want to inform his functional or hierarchical superior of an alleged breach of integrity in the federal administrative authority where he is employed, he shall report this to the confidant of integrity. Simultaneously the staff member will inform the confidant of integrity of his choice for: 1 ° an open report, in which he gives the confidant of integrity the express written permission to disclose his identity, or 2 ° a confidential report, in which the confidant of integrity confidentially deals with the identity of the staff member, ensures maximum protection of the identity and makes the identity known to none, within the current legislation, without the express

identiteit van het personeelslid vertrouwelijk omgaat, maximaal afschermt en aan niemand bekend maakt, binnen de geldende wetgeving, zonder de uitdrukkelijke schriftelijke toelating van het betrokken personeelslid. § 2. Een personeelslid meldt bij het Centraal Meldpunt : 1° bij ontstentenis van een vertrouwenspersoon integriteit in de federale administratieve overheid waar hij is tewerkgesteld; 2° als hij zijn functionele of een hiërarchische meerdere niet wenst op de hoogte te brengen van een veronderstelde integriteitsschending in de federale administratieve overheid waar hij is tewerkgesteld en die veronderstelde integriteitsschending ook niet wenst te melden bij de vertrouwenspersoon integriteit van zijn federale administratieve overheid; 3° als zijn melding een veronderstelde integriteitsschending betreft in een federale administratieve overheid waar hij is tewerkgesteld maar waarbij de hoogste hiërarchische meerdere van die federale administratieve overheid vermoedelijk betrokken is; 4° als zijn melding een veronderstelde integriteitsschending betreft in een federale administratieve overheid waar hij niet tewerkgesteld is.	written permission of the staff member. § 2. A staff member reports to the Central Service Desk: 1 ° in the absence of a confidant of integrity within the federal administrative authority where he is employed; 2 ° if he does not wish to inform his functional or hierarchical superior of an alleged breach of integrity in the federal administrative authority where he is employed nor does he wish to report the alleged breach of integrity to the confidant of integrity of its federal administrative authority; 3 ° if his report concerns an alleged breach of integrity in a federal administrative authority where he is employed and the highest hierarchical superior of this federal administrative authority has been implicated; 4 ° if his report concerns an alleged breach of integrity in a federal administrative authority where he is not employed.
Art. 15 §1. De federale ombudsmannen beschermen de volgende personen tegen een maatregel met een nadelig gevolg voor de arbeidsvoorwaarden of de arbeidsomstandigheden, zoals bedoeld in § 2 van dit artikel, dat voortvloeit uit de melding van een veronderstelde integriteitsschending	Art. 15 §1. The Federal Ombudsmen shall protect following persons against a measure with an adverse effect on conditions of employment or labor conditions, as provided for in § 2 of this Article, resulting from the reporting of an alleged breach of integrity to the confidential integrity of the Central Reporting Point:

bij de vertrouwenspersoon integriteit of het Centraal Meldpunt : 1° het personeelslid dat de veronderstelde integriteitsschendingen heeft gemeld; 2° het personeelslid dat wordt betrokken bij het onderzoek; en 3° het personeelslid-raadsman dat het personeelslid dat wordt betrokken bij het onderzoek adviseert. § 2. Onder een maatregel met een nadelig gevolg voor de arbeidsvoorwaarden of -omstandigheden, dat voortvloeit uit de melding van een veronderstelde integriteitsschending wordt onder meer verstaan : 1° het verlenen van ontslag anders dan op eigen verzoek; 2° het tussentijds beëindigen of het niet verlengen van een aanstelling in tijdelijke dienst; 3° het niet omzetten van een aanstelling in tijdelijke dienst voor een proeftijd in een aanstelling in vaste dienst indien deze in het vooruitzicht kan worden gesteld; 4° het verplaatsen of overplaatsen of het weigeren van een verzoek daartoe; 5° het nemen van een ordemaatregel; 6° het nemen van een maatregel van inwendige orde; 7° het nemen van een tuchtmaatregel; 8° het onthouden van salarisverhoging; 9° het onthouden van promotiekansen; 10° het onthouden van faciliteiten die andere medewerkers wel krijgen; 11° het weigeren van verlof; 12° het toekennen van een ongunstige evaluatie. § 3. De beschermingsperiode gaat in : 1° voor het personeelslid dat de	1° the employee who reported the alleged breaches of integrity; 2° the staff member who is involved in the investigation; and 3° the employee-counsel who gives advice to the staff member involved in the investigation. § 2. A measure with an adverse effect on the terms or conditions of employment, resulting from the reporting of an alleged breach of integrity, would include, inter alia: 1 ° the granting of discharge other than at their own request; 2. the termination or non-renewal of a temporary appointment; 3 ° The absence of conversion of a temporary appointment for a trial period in a permanent appointment if this could have been envisaged; 4 ° The moving or transferring or the refusal of such request; 5 ° The taking of a measure of order; 6 ° The taking of a measure of internal order; 7 ° The taking of a disciplinary measure; 8 ° The withholding of salary increase; 9 ° The withholding of promotion; 10 ° The withholding of facilities that do get other employees; 11 ° The refusal to grant leave; 12 ° The assigning of a negative evaluation. § 3. The period of protection begins:
---	--

veronderstelde integriteitsschending heeft gemeld, op de ontvangstdatum, bedoeld in artikel 6, § 4, eerste lid; 2° voor het personeelslid en het personeelslid-raadsman die worden betrokken bij het onderzoek, op de datum waarop zij door de federale ombudsmannen en, desgevallend, de deskundigen bij het onderzoek naar de melding van de veronderstelde integriteitsschending worden betrokken. De Koning bepaalt de duur van de beschermingsperiode. Deze bedraagt minstens twee jaar na het afronden van het aangevulde schriftelijke verslag of na een definitieve gerechtelijke veroordeling. § 4. De bescherming wordt niet toegekend aan het personeelslid dat een veronderstelde integriteitsschending wil melden in een federale administratieve overheid maar niet heeft gehandeld overeenkomstig artikel 8. § 5. De bescherming die aan het personeelslid dat de veronderstelde integriteitsschending meldt wordt toegekend overeenkomstig §§ 1, 2 en 3, wordt opgeheven op datum van de afronding van het aangevulde schriftelijk verslag, bedoeld in artikel 14, § 1, als daarin voldoende elementen aanwezig zijn om te besluiten dat : 1° het personeelslid dat de veronderstelde integriteitsschending heeft gemeld heeft gehandeld in de wetenschap dat deze melding niet eerlijk was; 2° het personeelslid dat de veronderstelde integriteitsschending heeft gemeld zelf betrokken is bij de gemelde veronderstelde integriteitsschending.	1 ° for the employee who reported the alleged breach of integrity, on the date of receipt referred to in Article 6, § 4, first paragraph; 2 ° for the staff member and the counselor who are involved in the investigation, the moment when they get involved by the Federal Ombudsmen or, where applicable, by the experts involved in the investigation into the reporting of the alleged breach of integrity, The King determines the duration of the protection period. This is at least two years after completion of the supplemented written report or after a final court judgment. § 4. The protection is not granted to the member of staff who wants to report an alleged breach of integrity in a federal administrative authority but not acted in accordance with Article 8. § 5. The protection given to the member of staff who reported the alleged breach of integrity granted under §§ 1, 2 and 3, shall be abolished on the date of the completion of the completed written report referred to in article 14, § 1, if there are sufficient elements present to conclude that: 1 ° the member of staff who reported the alleged breach of integrity acted in the knowledge that this report was not fair; 2 ° the member of staff himself was involved in the reported alleged breach of integrity.
---	---

Art. 16 § 1. Een personeelslid dat beweert dat hij het slachtoffer is van of bedreigd wordt met een maatregel, bedoeld in artikel 15, § 2, kan tijdens de beschermingsperiode, zoals bedoeld in artikel 15, een met redenen omklede klacht indienen bij de federale ombudsmannen. § 2. Indien tijdens de beschermperiode tegen een beschermd personeelslid, maatregelen zoals bedoeld in artikel 15, § 2 worden genomen, dan valt de bewijslast, dat er zich geen maatregelen of de dreiging met maatregelen hebben voorgedaan of voordoen, ten laste van de federale administratieve overheid waar het bestaan van of de dreiging met maatregelen zich vermoedelijk hebben voorgedaan of voordoen.	Art. 16 § 1. A staff member who claims he is the victim of or threatened by a measure referred to in Article 15, § 2, during the period of protection as provided in Article 15, may submit a reasoned complaint to the federal ombudsmen. § 2. If during the protection period, measures as referred to in Article 15, § 2 are taken against a protected staff member, then the burden of proof, that no action or threat of action have occurred or occurs, will be borne by the Federal Administrative government where the existence or the threat of action is likely to have occurred or occurs.
---	--

ELSA BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA

Contributors

National Coordinator

Nasir Muftić

National Academic Coordinator

Tahir Herenda

National Researchers

Harun Išerić

Nihad Odobašić

Tahir Herenda

National Linguistic Editors

Nejira Ajkunić

National Academic Supervisor

Kristina Ćendić

1. Introduction

1.1. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information?

While writing this paper we have been in a very unenviable situation as a National Research Group. Bosnia and Herzegovina has no proper legislation on media law and several issues raised by this paper, while being very precise could only be semi-answered due to that. Our country is still being struck by consequences of transition and dominant legal issues nowadays are unfortunately not media freedom. Jurisprudence on media law and questions of this Legal Research Group hardly exist. This also applies to media law scientific articles and literature, which in Bosnia and Herzegovina are pauperized. All mentioned made the writing of this paper difficult and some questions impossible to answer. In those situations, we analysed existing legislation and applied analogy where it was possible in order to give answers.

Bosnia and Herzegovina has a complex constitutional order. For the purpose of better understanding, we will briefly address it, since it is connected with the scope of jurisdiction of different levels of government in Bosnia and Herzegovina (or B-H). There are two entities in Bosnia and Herzegovina – Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (or FB-H) and Republika Srpska (or RS), and Brcko District (or BD). Unlike RS, FB-H has ten cantons, and both entities along with BD have municipalities. As it will be explained in following chapters, jurisdiction on this matter is divided between B-H and entities, and in FB-H cantons have certain jurisdiction as well. It is important to emphasize that divided jurisdiction on this matter is in favor of entities.

The legislation of Bosnia and Herzegovina provides protection of freedom of expression and journalistic sources in several levels. The Constitution of B-H prescribes that European Convention of Human Right and Fundamental Freedoms and its Protocols shall apply directly in B-H, along with the jurisprudence of European Court of Human Rights. Also, international documents succeeded by former Yugoslavia and those ratified by B-H authorities which provide this protection, have priority over all other national law, among which one of the important ones in this matter is Recommendation no. R (2000) 7, on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information. Law on Protection against Defamation brought in by entities and BD provides special protection to journalists other natural person regularly or professionally engaged in the journalistic activity of seeking, receiving or imparting information to the public, who has obtained information from confidential source, prescribing the right not to disclose the identity of that source. B-H also has self-regulatory mechanism in order to protect mentioned rights.

Further on, other documents address this matter, such as the Press Council in Bosnia and Herzegovina which prescribes in its Press Code that journalists have an obligation to protect the identity of those who provide information in confidence, whether or not they explicitly request confidentiality. In its Guidelines for police in dealing with journalists of OSCE Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, it is stated that police cannot force journalist to reveal confidential source of information. The Code of Honour of BH journalists association declares that journalists have the right not to disclose source of information.

Even though B-H legislation does not contain provisions regarding breaches of confidentiality of journalistic sources in criminal proceedings, situation or crimes for which there is a provided possibility of breaching confidentially of journalist sources and who makes decision on breaching of confidentially of journalist sources, these issues are regulated indirectly by other laws.

There is no definition of journalist in national legislation. Nonetheless, we tried to define it by using provisions of laws on protection against defamation and international documents adopted by B-H. Consequently, B-H legislation provides protection of journalist sources for a wider scope of persons – not just for journalists in a traditional point of view, but also for others who are permanently of professionally involved in journalist activities. It also provides protection for participants in civil proceedings regarding defamation.

Legal safeguards for journalists are guaranteed by several laws. Laws on protection against defamation prescribe that the right to disclose the identity of a confidential source is not under any circumstances limited to proceedings conducted in terms of the law. Criminal Procedure Codes prescribe that witness cannot be a person who held professional secret, which naturally refers to, among others, journalists. However, four criminal codes in force in Bosnia and Herzegovina define illegal obtaining of classified information and unauthorised use, which is a criminal offense. This might refer to the press, although so far there were no court proceedings against journalists to run based on the unlawful obtaining confidential data and unauthorised use. Bosnia and Herzegovina lacks regulations providing for violation of the confidentiality of journalistic sources in the context of criminal proceedings or for other reasons, such as "national reasons" or "core national interests", or in other circumstances.

Concerning the compliance of national legislation with the Recommendation No R (2000) 7, it can be concluded that B-H legislation is in accordance with it, which will be specifically addressed in later chapters. The principles of disclosure of journalistic sources set forth by the Recommendation cannot be applied in case of B-H, given that journalists in B-H do not have an obligation to share their sources under any circumstances.

Bosnia and Herzegovina has no single judgment which would involve protection of journalistic sources. However, there are two cases that are in the phase of investigation, which will be mentioned later.

Criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws are prescribed in the criminal procedure codes. In practice, these provisions rarely occur in connection with identifying journalistic sources

In addition to this, journalists in Bosnia and Herzegovina are generally not inclined to encryption and anonymity online in order to protect themselves and their sources of surveillance.

Law which protects whistle-blowers is the Law on Protection of Whistle-Blowers in Institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Off. Gazette of B-H No. 100/13) is a lex specialis that protects whistle-blowers in institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina and legal entities founded by Bosnia and Herzegovina. This definition is not completely in accordance with definition provided in Recommendation No. R (2014) 7. For the Law whistle-blower is every person employed in state institutions, while the Recommendation provides protection also for whistle-blower employed in private sector.

1.2. What type of legislation provides this protection?

- Constitution of B-H
- Constitution of RS
- Constitution of FB-H
- Constitution of BD
- Criminal Code of B-H (Official Gazette No. 03/03, 32/03, 37/03, 54/04, 61/04, 30/05, 53/06, 32/07, 08/10, 47/14)
- Criminal Code of FB-H (Official Gazette No. 36/03, 37/03, 21/04, 69/04, 18/05)
- Criminal Code of RS (Official Gazette No. 49/03, 108/04, 37/06, 70/06)
- Criminal Code of BD (Official Gazette No. 10/03, 45/04, 06/05, 21/10, 52/11)
- Criminal Procedure Code of B-H (Official Gazette No. 03/03, 32/03, 36/03, 26/04, 63/04, 13/05, 48/05, 46/06, 76/06, 29/07, 32/07, 53/07, 76/07, 15/08, 58/08, 12/09, 16/09, 93/09, 72/13)
- Criminal Procedure Code of BD (Official Gazette No. 10/03, 48/04, 06/05, 06/05, 12/07, 14/07, 21/07)
- Criminal Procedure Code of FB-H (Official Gazette No. 35/03, 37/03, 56/03, 78/04, 28/05, 55/06, 27/07, 53/07)
- Criminal Procedure Code of RS (Official Gazette No. 53/12)
- Law on Protection Against Defamation of FB-H (Official Gazette No. 19/03)
- Law on Protection Against Defamation of RS (Official Gazette No. 28/94)
- Law on Protection Against Defamation of Brcko District of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Official Gazette No. 14/03)
- Law on Media of Canton Sarajevo (Official Gazette No. 13/98)
- Law on Protection of Classified Information of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Official Gazette No. 54/05)

1.3. How exactly is this protection construed in national law?

Protection of freedom of expression and journalistic sources in B-H exists on several levels of government. Protection is being provided by constitution's provisions according to which international documents have priority over all other national law. The special importance is given to the European Convention of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and European Court of Human Rights jurisprudence. Protection is also being provided by laws on national and entity level, and self-regulatory mechanism.

There are few laws on the national level which prescribe ways of protection of journalistic sources. That is the consequence of the fact that entities have jurisdiction over this matter, as it was expressed in Article 3 of Constitution of B-H: "All governmental functions and powers not expressly assigned in this Constitution to the institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina shall be those of the Entities.“ Though, laws which address matter of Media law in general on the national level do it indirectly, usually prescribing general provisions on matter over which B-H has jurisdiction.

Laws on entity level which provide protection of freedom of expression and journalistic sources are numerous. Most important ones are laws on Protection against Defamation brought in also by BD. Mentioned laws can be considered lex specialis, since they provide additional protection to freedom of expression. Lex generalis laws, which protect other rights besides freedom of expression and journalistic sources, are Criminal codes and Criminal Procedure codes.

Bosnia and Herzegovina also has self-regulatory mechanism expressed through Press Council. The Press and Online Media Code, issued by the mentioned body, prescribes detailed information regarding our topic, which will be addressed in following chapters.

2. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information? What type of legislation provides this protection? How exactly is this protection construed in national law?

Media regulation in Bosnia and Herzegovina was largely shaped by the international community which initiated passing new media laws after the war 1992-1995. These laws were in line with the international standards regarding protection of freedom of expression and their provisions remained rather modern and well-tailored. In fact, Bosnia and Herzegovina was one of the first countries in the region that abolished defamation as a criminal offense, which is the crucial characteristic of defamation laws in the country. In addition to this, Bosnia and Herzegovina brought in 2001 laws on defamation at the entity level. Under these laws a journalist who has obtained information from a confidential source has the right not to reveal his/her identity and this right is not under any circumstances limited in proceedings conducted in terms of these laws. This normatively represented a significant step forward in the protection of media freedom. However, regulations in Bosnia and Herzegovina do not prescribe situations or sanctions when a journalist or a third party violates the confidentiality of sources of information. Nonetheless, Bosnia and Herzegovina has incorporated provisions of international documents in the Constitution, and it is a signatory of important international agreements regarding media freedoms. Specifically, the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe in Recommendation no. R (2000) 7 on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information recommend to the member states to:

- implement the principles attached to the Recommendation in the framework of its national law and practice
- expand Recommendation and the attached principles, together with translation where necessary,
- in particular draw attention about principles to authorities, the police and the judiciary and make them available to journalists, media and their professional organizations.

In the Annex to this Recommendation, seven principles are noted and the first principle of the right of journalists to reveal sources of information: "The local laws and practices of Member States should provide an explicit and clear protection of the rights of journalists not to disclose information that could indicate the identity of the source according to Article 10 of the Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms and established principles, which should be considered as minimum standards for the respect of that right." Related to this, acts that protect the confidentiality of journalistic sources in Bosnia and Herzegovina are The Press and Online Media Code of the Press Council in Bosnia and Herzegovina and laws on protection against defamation in both entities and in Brcko District:

- The Law on Protection against Defamation of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Article 9);
- The Law on Protection against Defamation of the Republika Srpska (Article 10);
- The Law on Protection against Defamation of the Brcko District of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Article 9).

The texts of these articles of the laws related to the confidentiality of journalistic sources are essentially identical in the three laws (the differences are linguistic and terminological nature).

The laws on defamation define that:

"1) Journalist and other natural person regularly or professionally engaged in the journalistic activity of seeking, receiving or imparting information to the public, who has obtained information from confidential source has the right not to disclose the identity of that source.

This right includes the right not to disclose any document or fact which may reveal the identity of the source particularly any oral, written, audio, visual or electronic material. The right to disclose the identity of a confidential source is not under any circumstances limited to proceedings conducted under this Law.

2) The right to disclose the identity of a confidential source is extended to any other natural person involved in proceedings under this law, and that as a result of their professional relationship with a journalist or other person within the meaning of paragraph 1 of this Article, find out the identity of a confidential source of information."

Reporters, editors, publishers and people who are sources of information hence have benefits from the protection of journalists' sources. The protection of sources of information allows journalists to work freely, particularly in the field of investigative journalism, and increases the trust between journalists and the people who are sources of information. This type of protection allows the media to observe and warn of the various phenomena and irregularities in the company ("watchdog").

Therefore, it is defamation laws that protect journalistic sources and contain provisions ensuring freedom of expression in the country. At this point, it is necessary to mention the concept of insult, too, and the fact that recently there have appeared certain challenges in this regard. Namely, unlike the law on defamation - which is intended to provide a remedy or protection, whenever there are facts that can be proven, the insults that have hurt the reputation of a particular person, "outrage" - as provided by another legal regulation - is not a subject to factual evidence. Here we are talking about the Law on Protection of Public Order of the Republika Srpska, adopted in early 2015. In accordance with this law, "insult" is defined as "causing feelings of physical threat or pain among citizens, the way that offends another person on political, religious or ethnic grounds ", it is possible that it subsume the facts that are of public interest.

More precisely speaking, the definition of "insult" is not clear and not sufficiently precise, and does not even exclude the statements made in the field of political speeches and debates or in the area that is of interest to the public. In the light of the European Court of Human Rights' practice, this definition could find itself under scrutiny, in particular when concerning the insult of others on political grounds. In Recommendation 1897 from 2010, on respect for media freedom the European Council states: "(...) the law of defamation and insult should not be used to silence critical comments, and irony in the media. The reputation of the nation, military, historical figures or religion cannot and must not be protected by laws on defamation and insult. Governments and parliaments must clearly and openly reject the false allegations of "awakened national interest" directed against the work of journalists (...) ". It is also clear that the ECHR provides that all restrictions on freedom of expression must be clearly defined. In fact, part of the Article 1 of the ECHR, which is about freedom of opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authorities is probably the most problematic because of produced problems in practice. The abovementioned Law on public Peace and Order thus came out to hold onto this requirement and enabled police to evaluate whether the offense was committed.

The ECtHR issued several decisions in which it was stated that all the exceptions mentioned or prescribed limits must be strictly interpreted, and that the state must ensure that all restrictions on freedom of expression are proportionate to the objective to be achieved, given that the right to freedom of expression "is one of the cornerstones of any society." All this results in that the fact that the definition of "insult" given by the Law on Public Peace and probably would not pass the test of foreseeability and accessibility, since it is used terminology that limits freedom of speech too general and "their open character gives prosecutors and judges almost unlimited power for the suppression of expression online ".

While the media today, in addition to legislative, judicial and executive authorities, are considered as the fourth pillar of democracy - because their role is to control the power of the public, it often happens just the opposite - the government does not want criticism and wants to control and dispense information to the media communicated to the public .

3. Is there in, domestic law, a provision that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his/her sources? How exactly is this prohibition construed in national law? What is the sanction?

3.1. Prohibition of a journalist from disclosing his/her sources

3.1.1. Constitutional provisions

According to the H constitution, authorities in the field of media regulation are on level of entities (Republic of Srpska (RS) and Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (FH)), Brcko District (BD) and ten cantons in Federation in B-H. H Constitution declares that: 'The rights and freedoms set forth in the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and its Protocols shall apply directly in Bosnia and Herzegovina. These shall have priority over all other law (article 2 paragraph 2). In accordance to the presented, case law of European Court for Human Rights is obligatory for Bosnian courts including Constitutional court of H. Freedom of expression is guaranteed by H Constitution¹, as well as by Constitution of FB-H², RS³ and BD⁴.

3.1.2. Law on Protection against Defamation and journalist associations regulation

Regulations which contain protection of journalist sources are: Law on Protection against Defamation of Brcko District (Off. Gazette of BD No. 14/03), Law on Protection against Defamation of FH (Off. Gazette of FH No. 19/03, 73/05), Law on Protection against Defamation of RS (Off. Gazette of RS No. 37/01) and Press Code of the Press Council in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Laws prescribe which persons have the privilege to disclose identity of confidential source from which they got certain information. They are⁵:

- a. Journalists (in accordance with principle 1 of Recommendation R (2000) 7),
- b. Other persons that are permanently or professionally involved in journalistic activities: seeking, receiving or imparting information to the public (in accordance to the principle 2 of Recommendation R (2000) 7),
- c. Every other person who participates in procedure regarding charges for damages for defamation, which due to its professional relationship with a journalist or a person described above finds identity of confidential source.

¹ Constitution of H, article 2, paragraph 3, point h: "All persons within the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina shall enjoy the human rights and fundamental freedoms referred to in paragraph 2 above; these include: h) freedom of expression."

² Constitution of FH, article 2, paragraph 2, point l: "All persons within the territory of Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina shall enjoy: l) fundamental freedom: freedom of expression and media..."

³ Constitution of RS, article 2, paragraph 26: "Freedom of the press and other means of public communication shall be guaranteed. Anyone is free to establish news organisations and publishing houses, to publish newspapers or to disseminate information via other media, in accordance with the law. Censorship of the press and other media of public information shall be prohibited. It is the duty of the public information media to inform the public timeously, truthfully and without bias. The right to correct untruthfully published information which has damaged a right or an interest of an individual or body shall be guaranteed, as shall be the right to compensation for damages arising thereby."

⁴ Constitution of BD, article 2, paragraph 13, point 4: "All persons on territory of BD exercise freedom and liberties given in ECHR."

⁵ Law on protection against defamation of Brcko District (Off. Gazette of BD No. 14/03), article 9
Law on protection against defamation of FH (Off. Gazette of FH No. 19/03, 73/05), article 9
Law on protection against defamation of RS (Off. Gazette of RS No. 37/01), article 10

Laws also contain protection for certain documents or facts which may reveal the identity of a source. Special protection is prescribed for: oral, written, audio, visual and electronic material. Right to disclose the identity of a source is not limited under any circumstances in procedure regarding charges for damages for defamation (in accordance with principle 4 of Recommendation R (2000) 7). Laws on protection against defamation however do not contain provisions on breach the secrecy of journalist sources.

The Press Council in Bosnia and Herzegovina prescribes in Press Code⁶ that journalists have an obligation to protect the identity of those who provide information in confidence, whether or not they explicitly request confidentiality.⁷ There are no sanctions applied for this.

In its Guidelines for police in dealing with journalists of OSCE Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina⁸, it is stated that police cannot force journalist to reveal confidential source of information.⁹

Code of Honour of BH journalists association¹⁰ declares that journalists have the right not to disclose source of information.¹¹

B-H legislation does not contain provisions regarding: breaches of confidentiality of journalistic sources in criminal proceedings, situation or crimes for which is provided possibility of breaching confidently of journalist sources and who makes decision on breaching of confidently of journalist sources.

3.1.3. Criminal procedure Act and secret data protection

Criminal procedure codes in Bosnia and Herzegovina¹² contain provisions by which a witness cannot be a person who by his/her statement would violate duty of keeping professional secret.

⁶ Pres code Press council in Bosni and Herzegovina, http://english.vzs.ba/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=218&Itemid=9&lang=en accessed January 15 2016

⁷ Article 13

⁸ Smjernice za policiju u ophođenju sa medijima OSCE Misije u Bosni i Hercegovini <http://www.bhnovinari.ba/images/stories/pdf/zakoni/osceuputezapolicijuuophodenjusmedijima.pdf> accessed January 14 2016 [Bosnian]

⁹ Article 7

¹⁰ Code of Honour of BH journalists association http://www.bhnovinari.ba/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=362&Itemid=223&lang=bs accessed January 12 2016 [Bosnian]

¹¹ Article 4

¹² Criminal procedure code of H (Official Gazette No. 03/03, 32/03, 36/03, 26/04, 63/04, 13/05, 48/05, 46/06, 76/06, 29/07, 32/07, 53/07, 76/07, 15/08, 58/08, 12/09, 16/09, 93/09, 72/13), Criminal procedure code of FH (Official Gazette No. 35/03, 37/03, 56/03, 78/04, 28/05, 55/06, 27/07, 53/07), Criminal procedure code of RS (Official Gazette No. 53/12), Criminal procedure code of BD (Official Gazette No. 10/03, 48/04, 06/05, 06/05, 12/07, 14/07, 21/07).

A journalist can be one of these persons, which keeps professional secret, unless he/she is not exempted from that duty by special act or statement of person who benefits from keeping a secret.¹³

One of crimes contained in criminal codes in H¹⁴ is illegal obtaining secret information and their unauthorised use.¹⁵ It is not a crime if someone publishes or mediates in publishing a secret of B-H, FH, RS and BD whose content is contrary to constitutional order of B-H, FH, RS and BD with the aim to reveal a violation of the constitutional order of the B-H, FH, RS and BD if disclosure does not undermine the security of the B-H, FH, RS and BD.¹⁶ Theoretically speaking, it could happen that journalist commit such crime and be processed for that. That did not happen yet.¹⁷

Law on protection of secret data of B-H¹⁸ stipulates obligation of Bosnian citizens who come in possession or gain insight in secret data in a way that is not unlawful, undertake obligation of keeping data that are a secret.¹⁹ There is no sanction for breaking this obligation.

3.1.4. Criminal codes and labour codes in Bosnia and Herzegovina

Criminal codes in Bosnia and Herzegovina²⁰ have criminalised an unauthorised revelation of professional secret. Laws state that beside listed persons²¹, if any other person, which includes and journalist, unauthorized reveal the secret he found out in the exercise of his occupation, shall be punished by a fine (only in CC of Republic Srpska) or imprisonment up to one year. Labour law of Bosnia and Herzegovina²² contains provision on worker responsibilities for grave violation of official duties. Among others, grave violations of official duties are: revelation of an official secret. Sanctions are: suspension from work and salary for a period of two days to thirty days, demotion to a lower position or termination of employment.²³ Labour laws provide an opportunity for employer to release employee in case of grave violation of official duties without

¹³ CPC of H, article 82, CPC of FH, article 96, CPC of RS article 147, CPC of BD article 82 a

¹⁴ Criminal Code of H (Official Gazette No. 03/03, 32/03, 37/03, 54/04, 61/04, 30/05, 53/06, 32/07, 08/10, 47/14), Criminal Code of FH (Official Gazette No. 36/03, 37/03, 21/04, 69/04, 18/05), Criminal code of RS (Official Gazette No. 49/03, 108/04, 37/06, 70/06, 73/10, 1/12, 67/13), Criminal code of BD (Official Gazette No. 10/03, 45/04, 06/05, 21/10, 52/11).

¹⁵ CC of H article 164 paragraph 2, CC of BD article 157 paragraph 2, CC of FH article 158 paragraph 2, CC of RS

¹⁶ CC of H article 164 paragraph 9, CC of BD article 157 paragraph 5, CC of FH article 158 paragraph 5, CC of RS

¹⁷ Bajraktarević Sena, Nihada Jeleč, Zaštita povjerljivosti novinarskih izvora, Parlamentarna skupština BiH – Sekretarijat zajednička služba, 2013, p. 8 [Bosnian]

¹⁸ Law on protection of secret data of H (Official Gazette No. 54/05, 12/09)

¹⁹ Article 11 of the Law on protection of secret data of H (Official Gazette No. 54/05, 12/09)

²⁰ Criminal Code of FH (Official Gazette No. 36/03, 37/03, 21/04, 69/04, 18/05), article 187; Criminal code of RS (Official Gazette No. 49/03, 108/04, 37/06, 70/06, 73/10, 1/12, 67/13), article 173; Criminal code of BD (Official Gazette No. 10/03, 45/04, 06/05, 21/10, 52/11), article 184.

²¹ Doctors, lawyers, social worker, psychologist etc.

²² Labour law of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Official Gazzete No. 26/04, 07/05, 48/05, 60/10, 32/13) article 60, point 3.

²³ Ibid. Article 62, point 2.

notice period.²⁴ Laws do not contain definitions of what grave violations are, but concerning H labour law we can conclude that they could include and revelation of official secret. Labour law of RS²⁵ defines grave violation of working obligations as such behaviour of workers at work or in connection with work that inflicts serious damage to the interests of the employer, as well as the behaviour of workers who are reasonably be concluded that further work workers at the employer would not be possible.²⁶ Under this definition we can include and breach of journalistic sources. Sanctions are: written warning, fee, the end of employment.²⁷

3.2. Conclusion

Criminal codes of FB-H, RS and BD and labour laws of B-H, FB-H, RS and BD provide prohibitions to journalist to disclose their sources and provide sanctions in case they act opposite.

4. Who is a journalist according to the national legislation? Is it in your view a restricted definition for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources? What is the scope of protection of other media actors? Is the protection of journalists' sources extended to anyone else?

4.1. Looking for definition of the journalist

No single act defines a term journalist. Unfortunately, neither legislation nor journalist associations provide definition of journalist.

However, the Law on Protection against Defamation of FB-H states that every person causing damage to natural person or legal entity by expressing or disseminating false facts when identifying this natural or legal entity to a third person is liable for defamation and “that the author, editor, publisher and the person who supervised the content with such expression in some other way are all liable for defamation expressed in the mass media.” The Law on Protection against Defamation of Republika Srpska states “that there is a liability for defamation if a person capable of work causes damage to the reputation of another natural or legal entity by identifying this person to a third person if they caused damage as authors, editors or publishers of the expression or as persons who, in some other way, efficiently controlled the content, just as the legal entity that published the expression.” The laws thus contain provisions regarding to

²⁴ Labour law of BD (Official Gazzete No. 19/06, 01/15), article 74; Labour law of FB-H (Official Gazzete No. 26/16), article 97 b

²⁵ Labour law of RS (Official Gazzete No. 1/16)

²⁶ Article 138

²⁷ Article 140

whom the liability refers however the concept of “author” is disputable in both, and do not offer a specific definition of a journalist.

However, there was a definition in Law on Media of Sarajevo Canton 1998. Journalist, according to this Law, was a professional who collects and processes dates and prepare information for media, who is employed by a publisher or who lives from its journalist work, or one who works in press office of state or public institution or other legal body. The Law was repealed in 2009, while laws adopted later on do not contain definition of journalist.

In practice, a journalist and a person who collects information in B-H has a professional press card. It is issued by media for which this person works. The press card contains the following information: name, photo, title of media, address, logo and official stamp of media for which he/she works.

4.2. Indirect definition of journalist

In order to find out definition of journalist we should consider already cited articles of laws on protection against defamation which provide protection of journalist sources for:

- a. Journalists,
- b. Other persons that are permanently or professionally involved in journalistic activities: seeking, receiving or imparting information to the public,
- c. Every other person who participates in procedure regarding charges for damages for defamation, which due to its professional relationship with journalist or person described under point b finds identity of confidential source.

Using argumentum a contrario, we can conclude that journalist is a person that permanently and professionally is involved in journalistic activities: seeking, receiving and imparting information to the public. So, for a person to be a journalist, it has to:

- a. Permanently and professionally be involved in journalistic activities. It means that a person has to work as a journalist. It cannot be his/her temporary work. He/she cannot be an amateur.
- b. Second element would be journalistic activities that are: Seeking, receiving or imparting information to the public. All these activities have to be facing a public. It does not have to include cumulatively all three activities.

This definition is in accordance with definition of journalist provided in the Recommendation R (2000) 7.

Finally, protection of journalist sources is not just limited to journalists, but also to:

- a. persons who are not journalists, however who that are permanently or professionally involved in journalistic activities: seeking, receiving or imparting information to the public, E.g. citizen journalists, bloggers, since the definition of journalism has spread to a wide range of actors, including bloggers and others who engage in forms of self-publication in print, on the internet or elsewhere.
- b. Every other person who participates in proceedings regarding charges for damages for defamation, which due to its professional relationship with journalist or person described under point a. finds out the identity of confidential source. E.g. journalist employer, editors, lawyers, employees at the media outlet in question, etc.

4.3. Conclusion

In conclusion, we can say that B-H legislation provides protection of journalist sources for wider scope of persons – not just for journalists in a traditional point of view, but also for others who are permanently of professionally involved in journalist activities. It also provides protection for participants in civil proceedings regarding defamation.

5. What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources? How are the laws implemented? How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?

According to the laws on defamation, as previously stated, the right to disclose the identity of a confidential source is not under any circumstances limited to proceedings conducted in terms of the law. In addition, the Criminal Procedure Code of Bosnia and Herzegovina provides that a questioned witness "cannot be a person who by his/her statement would violate the duty of professional secrecy". As that person is classified as "... a journalist to protect sources of information, unless if exempt from that duty by a special regulation or statement of the person who benefits from the secret being kept".²⁸

There is an identical provision in the Criminal Procedure Code of the Federation B-H²⁹, in the Criminal Procedure Code of the Republika Srpska³⁰ in the Criminal Procedure Code of the Brcko District of Bosnia and Herzegovina.³¹ However, four criminal codes in force in Bosnia and Herzegovina³² define illegal obtaining of classified information and unauthorised use, which is a criminal offense. This, in theory, might refer to the press, although so far there were no court proceedings against journalists to run based on the unlawful obtaining confidential data and unauthorized use. Here is the following Article 164 of the Criminal Code of Bosnia and Herzegovina relating to this question:

"(1) An official or responsible person in the institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina or a military person, who is authorized to classify data or to access secret data and who without authorisation

²⁸ Article 82 of the Criminal Procedure Code (Official Gazette, Nos. 03/03, 32/03, 36/03, 26/04, 63/04, 13/05, 48/05, 46/06, 76/06, 29/07, 32/07, 53/07, 76/07, 15/08, 58/08, 12/09, 16/09, 93/09)

²⁹ Article 96 of the Law on Criminal Procedure of the Federation of BiH (Official Gazette of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Nos. 35/03, 37/03, 56/03)

³⁰ Article 147 of the Criminal Procedure of the Republika Srpska (Official Gazette of the Republika Srpska, no. 53/12)

³¹ Article 82 of the Law on Criminal Procedure of Brcko District of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Official Gazette of the Brcko District of Bosnia and Herzegovina, no. 44/10)

³² The Criminal Code of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Official Gazette of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Nos. 3/03, 32/03, 37/03, 54/04, 61/04, 30/05, 53/06, 55/06, 32/07, 8/10); The Criminal Code of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (FBiH Official Gazette, 37/03, 21/04, 69/04, 18/05, 42/10 and 42/11); The Criminal Code of the Republika Srpska (RS Official Gazette No. 108/04, 37/06, 70/06 and 73/10) and the Criminal Code of Brcko District of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Official Gazette of BD, No. 6/05 and 21/10)

communicates, delivers or otherwise makes available classified information, or obtain secret information with the aim of conveying it to an unauthorized person, shall be punished by imprisonment for six months to five years.

(2) The sentence referred to in paragraph (1) of this Article shall be imposed when, in order to make an unauthorized use, illegally obtaining classified information or who communicates, delivers or in some other way makes available classified information without permission, and when communicates, delivers or otherwise make available or transmit in communicating, conveying or otherwise make available another fact or instrument which contains information and which he knows to have secret data and which the possession of an illegal manner.

(3) The prison sentence from one to ten years shall be imposed on whoever commits the offense referred to in paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article: by greed; or in respect of data in accordance with the law as "strictly confidential" or with the degree "secret" or "top secret" or with the degree "top secret"; or for the purpose of communicating, conveying or otherwise making available classified information or its use outside of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

(4) If the criminal offense referred to in paragraphs (1), (2) and (3) of this Article, committed in time of war or imminent threat of war or a state of emergency or when an order was issued for the recruitment and employment of the Armed Forces of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the perpetrator shall be punished by imprisonment for five years. "

In addition to the Criminal Code of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Law on Protection of Classified Information³³ establishes the illegality of acquiring the secret data. The Law on Protection of Classified Information explicitly states who has the access to classified information of a certain degree, and Article 10 provides that all citizens of Bosnia and Herzegovina who come into possession or gain access to classified information in a way that is not unlawful, undertake to preserve the data are secret. Therefore, "the criminal laws and the Law on Protection of Classified Information established the illegality of acquiring data as a condition for the crime."³⁴

It is interesting to note that in Bosnia and Herzegovina, unlike some other countries (e.g., Croatia), there are no regulations providing for violation of the confidentiality of journalists' sources in the context of criminal proceedings or for other reasons, such as "national reasons" or "core national interests", or in other circumstances. In some countries, the decision on the violation of the confidentiality of journalistic sources is issued by the judge (e.g. in Sweden and

³³ Law on protection of classified information of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Official Gazette B-H, 54/05 and 12/09), source: website of the Official Gazette of B-H
<http://www.slist.ba/secure/2005s/glasnik/Broj%2054/broj54.htm> (date of accessing the site on December 16, 2013)

³⁴Sevima Sali-Terzic, International standards related to freedom of expression, access to information and the protection of national security; Chapter 8: Restrictions on press freedom and the protection of national security in the publication Media Law in Bosnia and Herzegovina, editoris Mehmed Halilovic and Amer Dzihana, Internews in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Sarajevo, 2012, p. 229

Slovenia), or the main police officer and even the Minister of the Interior (in the UK). In Bosnia and Herzegovina what is also not overlooked is the possibility to search the premises or home media journalists, unlike the Canadian, German and British law, where there are "provisions of the special conditions for the search of press rooms."³⁵ In addition, there are no sanctions regarding the violation of the confidentiality of journalists' sources, done outside the legal requirements or concealing violations of the confidentiality of journalists' sources and the confidentiality of the investigation.

Regarding the self-regulatory mechanisms, the confidentiality of sources of information is as follows defined in the Press and Online Media Code of the Press Council in Bosnia and Herzegovina: "Whenever possible, journalists should rely on open, identified sources of information. These are to be preferred to anonymous sources, whose honesty and accuracy of the public cannot evaluate. Journalists have an obligation to protect the identity of those who provide information in confidence, regardless of whether or not they explicitly request confidentiality."³⁶ However, the self-regulatory body has so far primarily dealt with issues such as hate speech and discrimination in media (and most recently, in online media and comments), privacy, protection of minors, etc. The body has not seen explicit cases related to disclosure of sources; instead these cases occurred when dealing with e.g. defamation. Namely, according to defamation laws in B-H, when it comes to court proceedings, the courts assess the actions taken by the plaintiff regarding mitigating the consequences of defamatory speech. These actions of mitigation may be: turning to media outlet in question and asking for a retraction, or turning to the Press Council.

The procedure related to the Press Council includes submitting a complaint, which is then discussed by the Complaints Commission. In case the Press Council decides there was a violation of the right to honour and reputation (in line with the Press Code) and informs the media outlet about it, and if the media outlet does not publish a retraction/correction/apology, then the injured person can turn to the court. However, the practice has so far shown that high-profile plaintiffs (e.g. political figures) skip the step of involving the self-regulatory body altogether, thus no such defamation cases have been noticed before the Press Council. Similarly, the role of the Press Council may have been less significant in terms of protection of journalistic sources, because the issue of sources is most often the subject of topics on criminal activities, and offenses with a greater 'weight', thus these issues are more likely to become the subject of court proceedings than of the Complaints Commission.

³⁵ Alen Rajko, Protection of sources of information, Vol. 37 (2000), no. 1, 1.5.2000, p. 214, source: Hrcak - Portal of scientific journals of Croatian: http://hrcak.srce.hr/index.php?show=clanak&id_clanak_jezik=43396 (date of accessing the site 16.12.2013.)

³⁶ Article 13 of the Press and online media, the Press Council in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Source: website of the Press Council of Bosnia and Herzegovina http://www.vzs.ba/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=218&Itemid=9&lang=bs (date of accessing the site 11.12.2013.)

On the other hand, the Press Council has so far served as a body which places a great importance on preserving freedom of expression and full respect of journalistic rights and freedoms in general. Therefore, this is one of the bodies which closely cooperate with the association of B-H Journalists which gathers journalists in the country through journalistic clubs in cities all over B-H. In practice, when coming across certain doubts, journalists often turn to this association for advice, and for consultancy when they face possible legal actions or even threats, chilling effect, etc. These steps are not prescribed by law, but they have become the practice in Bosnia and Herzegovina. B-H Journalists hence offers advice and guidance to journalists who come to them with an issue, and on some occasions contact the OSCE Media Freedom Representative, the Press Council, and others, who may voice their concerns about problems of journalists.

6. In the respective national legislation are the limits of non-disclosure of the information in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7? What are the procedures applied? Is the disclosure limited to exceptional circumstances, taking into consideration vital public or individual interests at stake? Do the authorities first search for and apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the right of journalists not to disclose information?

Recommendation No R (2000) 7 sets out the basic principles of non-disclosure of journalistic sources in its Appendix. The first principle is the right of non-disclosure of journalists. Domestic law and practice in member states should provide explicit and clear protection of the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source in accordance with Article 10 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the principles established herein, which are to be considered as minimum standards for the respect of this right. The question of first principle has already been answered in within the first question of this paper therefore it does not require additional analysis.

The second principle broadens the scope of protection to persons who by their professional relations come to know of information identifying a source. The same provision that protects journalists also protects all other persons that are professionally engaged:

“The right to disclose the identity of a confidential source is extended to any other natural person involved in proceedings under this law, and that as a result of their professional relationship with a journalist or other person within the meaning of paragraph 1 of this Article, find out the identity of a confidential source of information.”

The third principle requires that the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source must not be a subject to other restrictions than those mentioned in Article 10, paragraph 2 of the Convention. B-H Constitution declares that: “The rights and freedoms set forth in the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and its Protocols shall apply directly in Bosnia and Herzegovina. These shall have priority over all other law” (Article 2 paragraph 2). Therefore it can be concluded that the national legislation is in accordance to the third principle.

The fourth principle requires that authorities have alternative evidence to journalistic sources in case of alleged infringement of the honour or reputation of a person. In Bosnia and Herzegovina defamation has been decriminalized since 2002, which means that there cannot be criminal sanctions, fines or imprisonment, or a person having criminal records for making a false statement, and state authorities no longer investigate defamation. It is up to individuals, whose reputation or honour has been allegedly damaged to start a civil procedure against journalists. Therefore, the question of this principle is obsolete when it comes to B-H.

The fifth principle prescribes conditions concerning disclosures. Criminal Procedure Law of Bosnia and Herzegovina prescribes that persons that can violate their duty to keep professional secret by giving testimony, cannot be processed as a witness. Therefore, all the questions that arise in regards of principle 5 are not present in the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina, since journalists do not have an obligation to share their sources under any circumstances.

The sixth principle deals with interception of communication, surveillance and judicial search and seizure. In criminal procedure laws of Bosnia and Herzegovina, these are considered to be special investigative actions, and are subjected to a specific set of rules. These special investigative actions can be considered as alternative measures in the absence of the journalistic obligation to disclose his sources. Special investigative actions are aimed against alleged perpetrators of specific crimes, which are named:

- a) criminal offenses against the integrity of Bosnia and Herzegovina;
- b) criminal offenses against humanity and values protected under international law;
- c) criminal offenses of terrorism;
- d) criminal offenses for which, pursuant to the law, a prison sentence of minimum of three (3) years or more may be pronounced.

Argumentum a contrario it can be concluded that these measures will not be applied if their purpose is to circumvent the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source. Since the disclosure of journalist sources as a journalistic obligation does not exist in the B-H, we will analyse the proportionality of special investigative actions. It is regulated in the Criminal Procedure Code of B-H as follows:

Investigative action from Article 116. (2) of this law can be ordered for crimes:

- a) against the integrity of B-H
- b) against humanity and values protected by international law
- c) terrorism
- d) for crimes that can be punished by three years of law or a harder punishment.

Regarding the second part of this principle “Where information identifying a source has been properly obtained by police or judicial authorities by any of the above actions, although this might not have been the purpose of these actions, measures should be taken to prevent the subsequent use of this information as evidence before courts, unless the disclosure would be justified under Principle 3.”, the Criminal Procedure Law prescribes the following : “No data or information received through the undertaking of actions referred to in Article 116 of this Code shall be used as evidence if they are not related to a criminal offense referred to in Article 117 of this Code.”

The seventh principle establishes protection against self-incrimination. Article 78 of Criminal procedure law prescribes the right against self-incrimination, which has not been derogated by any lex specialis provision in other B-H laws, therefore it can be concluded that the requirements of this principle have been fulfilled.

The other two questions asked (Is the disclosure limited to exceptional circumstances, taking into consideration vital public or individual interests at stake? Do the authorities first search for and apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the right of journalists not to disclose information can be answered together. Given the analysis of the principles of the Recommendation and adequate legal frame in B-H, we can conclude that there are no special provisions that regulate the obligation of journalists to disclose their sources; on the contrary, they are not obliged to disclose them at any circumstances, given the Article 82 of Criminal Procedure Law. However, the authorities do not have a specific regime of alternative measures to be applied in order to protect the right of journalists not to disclose information.

7. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 the following principles should be respected when the necessity of disclosure is stated: absence of reasonable alternative measures, outweighing legitimate interest (protection of human life, prevention of major crime, defence of a person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime). Under which criteria can the interest in the disclosure outweigh the interest in the non-disclosure?

As it has been answered through questions raised in the previous part of the paper, journalists in B-H do not have an obligation to share their sources under any circumstances. Journalists in the B-H therefore enjoy more protection regarding this issue, since their confidentiality cannot be endangered. That being said, this question cannot be posed in the context of B-H legislation. However, we still believe that this question needs to be regulated in B-H therefore we have decided to analyse the Polish legislation towards this question, as an example of successful legislative intervention in the case of necessity.

In comparison, many other European countries have such provisions in their criminal codes or criminal procedure laws. For example, laws of the Republic of Poland do not allow breach of confidentiality of journalistic sources because of “reasons of state” or “fundamental interest of the state“. However, a more precise provision can be found in Article 240 of Criminal Code, which prescribes that a person that has confidential information about preparation, attempt or commitment of serious crimes (genocide, coup d'etat, endangering the independence of the Republic, seceding a part of the Republic, violent change of constitutional order, attack on a state authority based on constitution, espionage, assassination of head of state, assassination of a unit of Armed forces of Poland, murder, causing life-threatening injuries or property in a large extent, acts of terrorism kidnapping of planes or ships and taking hostages) does not promptly inform an agency responsible for prosecuting such offences shall be subject to the penalty of deprivation of liberty for up to 3 years . In regards of the conditions set in Article 10 (2), it is obvious that all of the “serious crimes“ mentioned in the Penal Code of the Republic of Poland represent limitations “in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime“. In Poland only a court (judge) can decide on breach of confidentiality of journalistic sources.

In regards to the principles of the Recommendation, the Penal code doesn't provide “reasonable alternative measures” prescribed in the Principle 3, since it obliges anyone that has confidential information to promptly inform a responsible agency. However, given the crimes, and the fact that court or a judge decides on breach of confidentiality, the request enshrined in the third principle (an overriding requirement of the need for disclosure is proved, the circumstances are of a sufficiently vital and serious nature, the necessity of the disclosure is identified as responding to a pressing social need, and member states enjoy a certain margin of appreciation in assessing this need, but this margin goes hand in hand with the supervision by the European Court of Human Rights) are fulfilled.

Polish Penal Code does not deal with the infringement of the honour of reputation of a person therefore the questions posed in principle 4 are not compatible with the Polish legislation. In regards to the principle 5, several things are to be noted. Point a. of the principle has not been fulfilled by the Polish legislation, since it obliges the person that have the information to come to the authorities, not the other way around. Since the Penal Code does not provide the right not to disclose information identifying a source, the requests of point b. are also obsolete. Requests of the point c. are fulfilled, since only a court/judge can decide on breach of confidentiality. Verdicts for all crimes prescribed in the Penal Code are subjected to judicial review, including the crime prescribed by Article 240. Therefore, requests of point d. are also fulfilled. Penal code does not deal with the requests posed in point e. of principle 5.

This kind of legislation enables the state to protect its core interests, and by listing out the possible situations, and not exempli causa, it provides predictability for interested parties, which in most cases are journalists. Polish laws, however, do not prescribe a possibility of alternative measures that can be enforced in order to prevent disclosure of journalistic sources.

8. In the light of the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights how do national courts apply the perspective laws with regard to the right to protect sources? In particular, how do they balance the different interests at stake?

Unfortunately, Bosnia and Herzegovina has a scarcity of jurisprudence regarding protection of journalistic sources. More precisely, there is no single judgment which would involve protection of journalist sources. Also, there were no cases against Bosnia and Herzegovina before European Court for Human rights regarding interference in rights guaranteed by the Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

There are only two cases regarding disclosure of sources. They have ended in the phase of investigation.

8.1. Case “Dva papka”

8.1.1. Circumstances of the Case

The first case is called affair “Dva papka”. The most popular Bosnian website www.klix.ba in November 2014, after general elections in October 2014, published a video³⁷. In that video, prime minister of Republika Srpska, Željka Cvijanović, speaks about bribing members of Republika Srpska parliament in order to form parliamentary majority. The video shocked and disturbed the public.³⁸ The affair was later on named as “Dva papka” (“two assholes”) referring to two members of the parliament who were bribed. Later, the Dutch forensic experts found that the video was authentic.³⁹ From the moment of published the video, Klix.ba was under political pressure to reveal its sources.⁴⁰ At the beginning, the police of Republika Srpska was claiming that video was mounted. Later, the police of Republika Srpska with the presence of prosecutor of the Special Prosecutor Office of Republika Srpska, conducted an informative conversation with journalists of Klix.ba. During such conversations on December 4 2014, investigators tried to get name of the source which delivered the video. After journalists refused to identify the source, investigators tried by quoting the law by which journalists are allegedly criminally responsible and by which they are allegedly threatened with a prison sentence⁴¹. Due to

³⁷ Klix.ba u posjedu snimke na kojem Cvijanović govori o „kupovini” zastupnika, <http://www.klix.ba/vijesti/bih/klix-ba-u-posjedu-snimka-na-kojem-cvijanovic-govori-o-kupovini-zastupnika/141115059>, accessed January 15 2016 [Bosnian]

³⁸ Article 10 of the ECHR protect the information that may „offend, shock or disturb the State or any sector of the population.” Handyside v United Kingdom [1976] 1 E.H.R.R. 737 § 49

³⁹ Holandski forenzičari potvrdili: Snimak Željke Cvijanović o "dva papka" je autentičan, <http://www.klix.ba/vijesti/bih/holandski-forenzicari-potvrdili-snimak-zeljke-cvijanovic-o-dva-papka-je-autentican/150827052>, accessed January 15 2016 [Bosnian]

⁴⁰ MUP RS-a vrši pritisak na portal Klix.ba zbog afere prisluškivanja Željke Cvijanović, <http://www.klix.ba/vijesti/bih/mup-rs-a-vrsi-pritisak-na-portal-klix-ba-zbog-afere-prisluškivanja-zeljke-cvijanovic/141204057>, accessed January 16 2016 [Bosnian]

⁴¹ Article 147 of Criminal code of RS (Official Gazette No. 49/03, 108/04, 37/06, 70/06, 73/10, 1/12, 67/13) refers to the crime: Unauthorised wiretapping and audio recording:

(1) The one who, with special devices without authorization taps or records a conversation or a statement that it is not intended to him/her, or enables an uninvited person to have knowledge of a conversation or statement that was unauthorized interception or recorded, shall be punished by a fine or imprisonment up to one year.

(2) By the sentence referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article, will be punished one who records a statement that it intended to him/her, without the knowledge and consent of the person who gives statement, with the intention of abuse of such a statement, or one who provides with such statement an unauthorized person.

(3) If offenses referred to in para. 1 and 2 of this Article is committed by an official in discharge of duty, he/she shall be punished with imprisonment up to three years.

*the fact that as journalists we have every right to protect our sources, this interview we realised as a serious pressure on the media, and certainly we will look for the protection of journalists' associations and other institutions in BiH.*⁴² Prosecutors were threatening by charges for crime of unauthorised wiretapping and audio recording.

8.1.2. The search of the Klix.ba facilities

The pressure culminated by the search of Klix.ba facilities on December 29, 2016.⁴³ For more than seven hours, the members of Republika Srpska police by the warrant of Special prosecutor office of RS and Sarajevo Municipal Court were searching the facilities looking for something which could lead them to the source which delivered the video. Besides the documents, investigators exempted hard disk drives of all computers in the newsroom, private cell phones, USB sticks, CDs, notebooks and other stationery. The search provoked many reactions, including the reaction of Dunja Mijatović, OSCE Representative on Freedom of Media. Dunja Mijatović stated the following: *Protection of sources is a crucial element of investigative journalism. Detention, interrogation and pressure on members of the media to reveal their sources is simply unacceptable.*⁴⁴ Madam Representative labelled search of klix.ba facilities as grave and disproportionate intrusion into the journalists' right to report about public interest issues.

A few days later, on January 5 2016, deciding on complaint of Klix.ba on search warrant, Sarajevo Municipal Court found a warrant to be illegal, as it was not issued in accordance with the law and contrary to the Articles 8 and 10 of European Convention on Human Rights.⁴⁵ Municipal Court stated that the first instance Court did not examine conditions under which it is allowed to interfere with human rights proscribed by the ECHR and that the explanation of the warrant for the search contained no basis or purpose of the search. Such warrant was also contradictory to the Recommendation No. R (2000) 7.⁴⁶ The Court ordered the Police of Republika Srpska to return confiscated documents and property of Klix.ba.

8.1.3. The search of the Klix.ba facilities was unconstitutional

⁴² MUP RS-a vrši pritisak na portal Klix.ba zbog afere prisluškivanja Željke Cvijanović, <http://www.klix.ba/vijesti/bih/mup-rs-a-vrsi-pritisak-na-portal-klix-ba-zbog-afere-prisluškivanja-zeljke-cvijanovic/141204057>, accessed January 16 2016 [Bosnian]

⁴³ MUP RS više od sedam sati pretresao prostorije Klix.ba zbog slučaja "Dva papka", <http://www.klix.ba/vijesti/bih/mup-rs-vise-od-sedam-sati-pretresao-prostorije-klix-ba-zbog-slucaja-dva-papka/141229061>, January 10 2016 [Bosnian]

⁴⁴ Raid against Klix.ba a clear attack on media freedom and journalists' right to protect sources in Bosnia and Herzegovina, says Mijatović, <http://www.osce.org/fom/133056>, accessed January 15 2016 [Bosnian]

⁴⁵ Pročitajte šta o pretresu Klix-a piše u odluci Vijeća Općinskog suda u Sarajevu, <http://www.klix.ba/vijesti/bih/procitajte-sta-o-pretresu-klix-a-pise-u-odluci-vijeca-opcinskog-suda-u-sarajevu/150106109#1>, accessed January 14 2016 [Bosnian]

⁴⁶ Foundation Public Law Centre, Zakonska zaštita novinarskih izvora, http://www.fcip.ba/templates/ja_avian_ii_d/images/green/Prikaz_CJP.pdf, accessed April 10 2016 [Bosnian]

In conclusion, search of Klix.ba facilities was unconstitutional⁴⁷ as it was not in accordance with article 10 of the ECHR⁴⁸. The ECtHR states that „an order of source disclosure...cannot be compatible with Article 10 of the Convention unless it is justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest“.⁴⁹ The Sarajevo Municipal Court did not provide any arguments that the search was in the public interest. Exactly the opposite, there was a public interest in informing the public about the video in question as it refers to the matter of public interest: forming the government as one of the main postelection events in a democratic societies. Mehmed Halilović, media law expert, stated that “in this concrete case, Special Prosecutor of Republika Srpska is protecting certain persons and officials, not right of the public to receive information which media are obliged and have duty to publish.”⁵⁰ „The freedom of political debate is at the very core of the concept of a democratic society.“⁵¹ The Klix.ba was without a doubt exercising its role of public-watchdog⁵².

8.2. Case regarding investigation against Editor Senad Avdić and lawyer Dražen Zubak

The second case would be the investigation against the editor of political magazine Senad Avdić and lawyer Dražen Zubak. Investigation was conducted by Canton Sarajevo Prosecutor Office in order to find out information about persons who submitted allegedly “secret documents” to Mr. Avdić and Zubak. In its reaction, the Association B-H Journalists, stated that “the use of unnamed sources of information is a fundamental right and a legitimate journalistic research process of journalists who wish to publish information of public importance”.⁵³ In its reaction, the Canton Sarajevo Prosecutor Office, stated there was no an investigation against Mr. Avdić and Mr. Zubak and that they were called to present their statement as witnesses and remembered that they were not obliged to give their statement if they would break a keeping professional secret.⁵⁴

⁴⁷ Šaršević Edin, Da li je pretres redakcijske prostorije neustava? Slučaj portala Klix.ba, Foundation Public Law Centre http://www.fcjp.ba/templates/ja_avian_ii_d/images/green/Edin_Sarcevic3.pdf accessed April 10 2016 [Bosnian]

⁴⁸ See case: ressiot and others v France App no 15054/07 and 15066/07 (ECtHR 28 June 2012)

⁴⁹ Goodwin v the United Kingdom [1996] 22 E.H.R.R. 123 § 39

⁵⁰ Završen pretres redakcije bh portala <http://balkans.aljazeera.net/vijesti/policija-pretresa-bh-portal-klixba-1> accessed April 10 2016 [Bosnian]

⁵¹ Lingens v Austria [1986] 8 E.H.R.R. 407 § 42

⁵² Thorgeirson v Iceland App no 13778/88 (ECtHR 25 June 1992) § 63

Barthold v Germany [1985] 7 EHRR 383 § 58

⁵³ Protest otvaranju krivične istrage protiv urednika i advokata Slobodne Bosne http://www.bhnovinari.ba/index.php?Option=com_content&view=article&id=872%3Aprotest-povodom-otvaranja-krivine-istrage-protiv-urednika-i-advokata-slobodne-bosne&catid=62%3AAsaopenja&Itemid=240&lang=bs accessed January 17 2016 [Bosnian]

⁵⁴ DALIDA BURZIĆ ODGOVORILA „SB“ I UDRUŽENJU NOVINARA: Nismo otvorili istragu protiv Avdića i Zubaka http://www.slobodnbosna.ba/vijest/26052/dalida_burzic_odgovorila_sb_i_udruzenju_novinar_a_nismo_otvorili_istragu_protiv_avdica_i_zubaka.html, accessed January 21 2016 [Bosnian]

8.3. Conclusion

Mehmed Halilović, former deputy Ombudsman of Federation for Bosnia and Herzegovina for the media, stated that journalists in B-H often refer to protection of sources when it is not necessary. "So far in court proceedings, as far as I know there were no cases in which journalists based its defence on protection of journalist sources. The importance of the obligation to protect sources is huge for the media however too much use could depreciate it. In fact, journalists always take responsibility for the content of the information, so the reference to confidential sources only protects those sources however not the journalists of their responsibility".⁵⁵

It seems that some journalists understand the right to protect their sources as a way of avoiding responsibility for possible defamation. That is how, during the judicial proceedings, journalists state that the certain information they got from confidential sources and therefor they reveal it, and at the same time they did not conduct a further check of its truthfulness.⁵⁶

9. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information? Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

Criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws are prescribed in the Criminal Procedure Act of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Criminal Procedure Code of Bosnia and Herzegovina and same Acts at the entity level, prescribe when it may come to a search of the person or facilities, application of measures such as secret surveillance and technical recording of persons and objects, surveillance and technical recording of telecommunications, etc. The Criminal Procedure Act in its Article 116 defines the criteria for conducting special investigative actions: "Any person against whom there are grounds for suspicion that he/she alone or with others involved or participate in the commission of the criminal offense under Article 117⁵⁷ of

⁵⁵ Nikola Jovanović, Moj izvor je moja tajna, <http://www.media.ba/bs/novinarstvo-tehnikiforme-novinarstvo-tehnik-i-forme/moj-izvor-je-moja-tajna> accessed January 19 2016 [Bosnian]

⁵⁶ Srdić Mladen, Kratka analiza sudske prakse u primjeni Zakona o zaštiti od klevete, http://vsudfbih.pravosudje.ba/vstv/faces/vijesti.jsp?id=32317&vijesti_jezik=B accessed January 20 2016 [Bosnian]

⁵⁷Article 117 (The crimes for which the special investigative actions can be determined):

Measures referred to in Article 116, paragraph 2 of this law can be determined for the following crimes:

- a) against the integrity of Bosnia and Herzegovina,
- b) against humanity and values protected by international law, this law can be determine the special investigative measures, if they otherwise cannot obtain evidence or that their acquisition was associated with great difficulty.”⁵⁸ Among other special investigative actions listed in Article 116 (2), we consider that in terms of the protection of journalistic sources of information most important are:

- surveillance and technical recording of telecommunications;
- access to computer systems and computerized data processing;
- surveillance and technical recording of premises.

The same Act scaled search of premises, other facilities and moveable property in its Article 51, which states that "A search of premises and other facilities of the suspect, accused or other persons, as well as their personal property outside the premises may be conducted only when there are sufficient grounds to suspect that among them are the perpetrator, the accessory, traces of a criminal offense or objects relevant to the proceeding.”⁵⁹

Therefore, from these legal norms, it is evident that they are applicable only if journalistic sources are directly connected with criminal offenses. However, in practice, these provisions rarely occur in connection with identifying journalistic sources, since they are generally related to the perpetration of other crimes. One of the cases that drew the attention of the public, and is related to the protection of journalistic sources, was the already mentioned case of a search of the premises of one of the most popular web portals in the country - www.klix.ba, known as case “Dva papka” which was described in previous question. In conclusion it can be noted that the Laws⁶⁰ are accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions, but the question of implementation of the law is often irregular, which can be seen in the above example of the search of the premises of the web portal Klix.ba.

Related to this, accessibility and precision of the law have been the subject of discussion in front of the ECtHR in the judgment *Sunday Times v. United Kingdom*⁶¹, where the Court held that the fulfilment of the requirement "prescribed by law" requires the fulfilment of two cumulative set of conditions: (1) the law has to be sufficiently available (the possibility of informing the citizens), and (2) the law has to be so precise to enable the citizen to regulate his/her behaviour, i.e. to be aware of all the consequences that his/her actions can cause. On the basis of the ECtHR' opinion, and bearing in mind the way in which mentioned laws in Bosnia and Herzegovina are formulated and regularly published, we believe that the problem lies in the question of their implementation, and not a question of quality of laws.

c) terrorism,

d) for which the law may impose a sentence of imprisonment of three years or more.

⁵⁸The Criminal Procedure Act of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Article 116 (1).

⁵⁹The Criminal Procedure Act of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Article 51 (1).

⁶¹*Sunday Times v UK* App no. 6538/74 (ECtHR, April 26 1979).

10. Can journalists rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance?

The right to privacy and the right to freedom of expression entail a corollary right to communicate anonymously. Allowing people to speak anonymously has long been recognised as worthy of protection in order to encourage communication that might otherwise invite reprisal or stigmatisation, from political pamphleteering, to anonymous tips for journalists, to blowing the whistle on improprieties in the workplace or government. Anonymity, of course, may also be sought by persons engaged in criminal activity, so it is not an absolute right. But neither may the freedom to communicate anonymously be subject to such restrictions as would eliminate the right a priori.⁶²

Encryption and anonymity provide individuals and groups with a zone of privacy online to hold opinions and exercise freedom of expression without arbitrary and unlawful interference or attacks. Echoing Article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Article 17 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights specifically protects the individual against “arbitrary or unlawful interference with his or her privacy, family, home or correspondence” and “unlawful attacks on his or her honour and reputation”, and provides that “everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks”. The General Assembly of the UN, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and special procedure mandate holders have recognised that privacy is a gateway to the enjoyment of other rights, particularly the freedom of opinion and expression.⁶³

Encryption and anonymity are especially useful for the development and sharing of opinions, which often occur through online correspondence such as e-mail, text messaging, and other online interactions. Encryption provides security so that individuals are able “to verify that their communications are received only by their intended recipients, without interference or alteration, and that the communications they receive are equally free from intrusion”.⁶⁴ Given the power of metadata analysis to specify “an individual’s behaviour, social relationships, private preferences and identity”,⁶⁵ anonymity may play a critical role in securing correspondence. Besides correspondence, international and regional mechanisms have interpreted privacy to involve a range of other circumstances as well.⁶⁶

⁶² https://www.hrw.org/sites/default/files/related_material/EncryptionandAnonymity_Feb1015.pdf, accessed February 15 2016.

⁶³ General Assembly resolution 68/167, A/HRC/13/37 and Human Rights Council resolution 20/8.

⁶⁴ Report of the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression, David Kaye, <http://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/FreedomOpinion/Pages/CallForSubmission.aspx>, accessed February 23 2016.

⁶⁵ Ibid.

⁶⁶ Human Rights Committee, general comment No. 16 (1988) on the right to respect of privacy, family, home and correspondence, and protection of honour and reputation. See also European Court of Human Rights, factsheets

Individuals and civil society are subjected to interference and attack by State and non-State actors, against which encryption and anonymity may provide protection. In Article 17 (2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, States are obliged to protect privacy against unlawful and arbitrary interference and attacks. Under such an affirmative obligation, States should ensure the existence of domestic legislation that prohibits unlawful and arbitrary interference and attacks on privacy, whether committed by government or non-governmental actors. Such protection must include the right to a remedy for a violation.⁶⁷ In order for the right to a remedy to be meaningful, individuals must be given notice of any compromise of their privacy through, for instance, weakened encryption or compelled disclosure of user data.

Journalists in Bosnia and Herzegovina are generally not inclined to encryption and anonymity online in order to protect themselves and their sources of surveillance. The fact that surveillance of journalists and their sources is not known to the public does not exclude this possibility, because the technology for monitoring the road (in) directly in the hands of powerful politicians who can point to powerful weapon against anyone, including journalists.⁶⁸

11. Are whistle-blowers explicitly protected under law protecting journalistic sources? Is there another practice protecting whistle-blowers? Is the legislation prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers?

Laws that protect journalistic sources are Laws on Protection against Defamation. However, they do not contain any provisions regarding protection of whistle-blowers.

Another practice can be presented through the Law on Protection of Whistle-Blowers in Institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Off. Gazette of B-H No. 100/13) is a lex specialis that protects whistle-blowers in institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina and legal entities founded by Bosnia and Herzegovina. The law regulates the following: the status of persons who report corruption in institutions of B-H and legal entities founded by B-H, procedure of reporting, obligation of institutions regarding reporting corruption, procedure of protection of persons who report corruption and finally it proscribes sanction for violation of law provisions.

According to the Law, a whistle-blower is every person employed in institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina and legal entities founded by B-H, who due to justified doubt or circumstances ondata protection (www.echr.coe.int/Documents/FS_Data_ENG.pdf) and right to protection of one's image (www.echr.coe.int/Documents/FS_Own_image_ENG.pdf).

⁶⁷See Human Rights Committee general comment No.16 and general comment No. 31 on the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant; and CCPR/C/106/D/1803/2008.

⁶⁸Softveri za spijuniranje u BiH, <http://www.balkans.aljazeera.net/vijesti/softveri-za-spijuniranje-u-bih>, accessed February 23 2016 [Bosnian].

which indicate the existence of corruption in any institution of B-H, in good faith submits a complaint to the responsible persons or institutions according to this Law.

This definition is not completely in accordance with definition provided in Recommendation No. R (2014) 7. For the Law, whistle-blower is every person employed in state institutions, but the Recommendation provides protection also for whistle-blower employed in private sector. The Agency for Prevention of Corruption and Coordination of Fight against Corruption delivers to a person the status of whistle-blower.

The Law makes a distinction between two forms of reporting corruption: internal and external. One of the external forms is reporting to the public corruption or other forms of making information that indicates corruption available to the public. Conditions to do so are:

1. Whistle-blower believes that he/she will be exposed to the harmful measures of particular person,
2. In case of protected reporting, authorized subjects will not conduct adequate acts or evidences and information will be covered or destroyed
3. In case that, after reporting corruption, authorized subjects did not conduct adequate measures.

Before reporting corruption is unveiled, whistle-blower has to consider any damage which could result with reporting. In case of revealing a business secret in reporting corruption, the whistle-blower will not be considered materially, criminally or disciplinary responsible. Corruption report has to be made in good will that is defined as whistle-blower's attitude based on facts and circumstances about which he/she has his/her own knowledge and considers them true.

The law does not have any provisions prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers.

12. Conclusion

We believe that in this paper we have presented the state of the protection of journalist sources in Bosnia and Herzegovina in a precise and correct manner, in line with available legislation.

The paper firstly emphasised the theoretical strength of laws in Bosnia and Herzegovina, which are mainly in line with international documents and modern standards of protection of freedom of expression. In fact, Bosnia and Herzegovina is one of the first countries in the region that abolished defamation as a criminal offense which resulted in the creation of three almost identical laws (two at entity levels and one at the district level) containing provisions that refer to protection of journalists in general and are applicable in a variety of situations. The laws on protection against defamation in B-H also contain the provision regarding the protection of journalistic sources, but this provision is rarely evoked as there have been almost no cases before courts in B-H that dealt with this issues. .

In addition to this, regulations in Bosnia and Herzegovina prescribe which persons have the privilege to disclose identity of confidential source from which they got certain information, among them, journalists are set at the first place. However, this part may be concluded to be problematic, as with the arrival of new technologies and the emergence of new media, the term 'journalist' has become much wider and today we even have citizen journalists which are not associated with a specific media outlets. More precisely, neither legislation nor journalist associations provide definition of journalist. In practice, in B-H, a journalist is only a person who collects information and has a professional press card, issued by media for which person works.

This may prove to be increasingly troublesome as the news consumption shifts and as online media take the priority over traditional media, thus gathering a variety of actors who could fall under the definition of a journalist.

Laws also contain protection for certain documents or facts which may reveal the identity of a source. The right to disclose the identity of a confidential source is not under any circumstances limited to proceedings conducted in terms of the law. In addition, the Criminal Procedure Code of Bosnia and Herzegovina states that "cannot be questioned as a witness a person who by his statement would violate the duty of professional secrecy".

In general, the regulation is mostly in accordance with the international principles, except those which deal with the journalistic obligation to disclose his/her sources, since those provisions do not exist in the laws of B-H. In other words, Bosnia and Herzegovina has a paucity jurisprudence regarding protection of journalistic sources. It is therefore important to notice that the research has reflected on the self-regulatory body in B-H, the Press Council, as well as the OSCE Mission in B-H and the Association of B-H journalists which have on several occasions mentioned the issue of protection of journalistic sources.

When it comes to encryption and anonymity, the research has discussed the situation in B-H by focusing on the fact that journalists in Bosnia and Herzegovina are generally not inclined to encryption and anonymity online in order to protect themselves and their sources of surveillance. The fact that surveillance of journalists and their sources is not known to the public does not exclude this possibility, because the technology for monitoring the road (in) directly in the hands of powerful politicians who can point to powerful weapon against anyone, including journalists. The research has also reflected on the concept of a whistle-blower, which is, according to domestic legislation: every person employed in institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina and legal entities founded by B-H, who due to justified doubt or circumstances which indicate the existence of corruption in any institution of B-H, in good faith submits a complaint to the responsible persons or institutions according to this Law.

Overall, the research has offered an entirely new insight into the current state in Bosnia and Herzegovina when it comes to protection of journalistic sources. Its contribution lies in the fact that the literature and research on the topic is extremely scarce or even non-existent, and even domestic courts have rarely seen this unexplored field when dealing with cases referring to media. Only few cases related to this issue have been noticed in B-H, and thus this research can conclude that the lack of specific legislation in this respect may bring the problem to full enjoyment of journalistic rights and freedoms, but on the other hand, that journalists in B-H are very often under strong political pressures, threats, etc. Thus they are under the chilling effect, and, most importantly, unaware of their rights under the existing legislation and under all international documents of which B-H is signatory.

13. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

13.1. Legislation:

- Constitution of B-H
- Constitution of RS
- Constitution of FB-H
- Constitution of BD
- Criminal Code of B-H(Official Gazette No. 03/03, 32/03, 37/03, 54/04, 61/04, 30/05, 53/06, 32/07, 08/10, 47/14)
- Criminal Code of FB-H(Official Gazette No. 36/03, 37/03, 21/04, 69/04, 18/05)
- Criminal code of RS (Official Gazette No. 49/03, 108/04, 37/06, 70/06)
- Criminal code of BD (Official Gazette No. 10/03, 45/04, 06/05, 21/10, 52/11)
- Criminal Procedure Code of B-H(Official Gazette No. 03/03,32/03,36/03,26/04,63/04,13/05,48/05,46/06,76/06,29/07,32/07,53/07,76/07,15/08,58/08,12/09,16/09,93/09,72/13)
- Criminal Procedure Code of BD (Official Gazette No. 10/03, 48/04, 06/05, 06/05, 12/07, 14/07, 21/07)
- Criminal Procedure Code of FB-H(Official Gazette No. 35/03, 37/03, 56/03, 78/04, 28/05, 55/06, 27/07, 53/07)
- Criminal procedure code of RS (Official Gazette No. 53/12)
- Law on Protection Against Defamation of FB-H (Official Gazette No. 19/03)
- Law on Protection Against Defamation of RS (Official Gazette No. 28/94)
- Law on Protection Against Defamation of Breko District of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Official Gazette No. 14/03)
- Law on Media of Canton Sarajevo (Official Gazette No. 13/98)
- Law on Protection of Classified Information of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Official Gazette No. 54/05)
- Code of Honour of BH journalists association http://www.bhnovinari.ba/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=362&Itemid=223&lang=bs accessed January 12 2016 [Bosnian]
- Press and online media, the Press Council in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Source: website of the Press Council of Bosnia and Herzegovina http://www.vzs.ba/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=218&Itemid=9&lang=bs, accessed December 11 2013

13.2. Books and articles

- Sali-Terzić Sevima, International standards related to freedom of expression, access to information and the protection of national security; Chapter 8: Restrictions on press freedom and the protection of national security in the publication Media Law in Bosnia and Herzegovina, editors Mehmed Halilović and Amer Džihana, Internews in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Sarajevo, 2012;

- Srdić Mladen, Main standards of the practice of European Court in Media Law, editors: Amer Džihana and Mehmed Halilović, Internews, Sarajevo, 2012;
- Alen Rajko, Protection of sources of information, Vol. 37 (2000), no. 1, 1.5.2000, p. 214, source: Hrcak - Portal scientific journals of Croatian: http://hrcak.srce.hr/index.php?show=clanak&id_clanak_jezik=43396, accessed December 16 2015;
- Dalida burzić odgovorila „SB“ i udruženju novinara: Nismo otvorili istragu protiv Avdića i Zubaka, http://www.slobodnabosna.ba/vijest/26052/dalida_burzic_odgovorila_sb_i_udruzenju_novinarar_nismo_otvorili_istragu_protiv_avdica_i_zubaka.html, accessed January 21 2016 [Bosnian]
- Holandski forenzičari potvrdili: Snimak Željke Cvijanović o "Dva papka" je autentičan, <http://www.klix.ba/vijesti/bih/holandski-forenzicari-potvrdili-snimak-zeljke-cvijanovic-o-dva-papka-je-autentican/150827052>, accessed January 15 2016 [Bosnian]
- MUP RS-a vrši pritisak na portal Klix.ba zbog afere prisluškivanja Željke Cvijanović, <http://www.klix.ba/vijesti/bih/mup-rs-a-vrsi-pritisak-na-portal-klix-ba-zbog-afere-prisluškivanja-zeljke-cvijanovic/141204057>, accessed January 16 2016 [Bosnian]
- MUP RS više od sedam sati pretresao prostorije Klix.ba zbog slučaja "Dvapapka", <http://www.klix.ba/vijesti/bih/mup-rs-vise-od-sedam-sati-pretresao-prostorije-klix-ba-zbog-slucaja-dvapapka/141229061>, January 10 2016 [Bosnian]
- Nikola Jovanović, Moj izvor je moj tajna, <http://www.media.ba/bs/novinarstvo-tehnikiforme-novinarstvo-tehnik-i-forme/moj-izvor-je-moja-tajna>, accessed January 19 2016 [Bosnian]
- 4Klix.ba u posjedu snimke na kojem Cvijanović govori o „kupovini“ zastupnika, <http://www.klix.ba/vijesti/bih/klix-ba-u-posjedu-snimka-na-kojem-cvijanovic-govori-o-kupovini-zastupnika/141115059>, accessed January 15 2016 [Bosnian]
- Pročitajte šta o pretresu Klix-a piše u odluci Vijeća Općinskog suda u Sarajevu, <http://www.klix.ba/vijesti/bih/procitajte-sta-o-pretresu-klix-a-pise-u-odluci-vijeca-opcinskog-suda-u-sarajevu/150106109#1>, accessed January 14 2016 [Bosnian]
- Protest otvaranju krivične istrage protiv urednika i advokata Slobodne Bosne, http://www.bhnovinari.ba/index.php?Option=com_content&view=article&id=872%3Aprotest-povodom-otvaranja-krivine-istrage-protiv-urednika-i-advokata-slobodne-bosne&catid=62%3Aasaopenja&Itemid=240&lang=bs, accessed January 17 2016 [Bosnian]
- Raid against Klix.ba a clear attack on media freedom and journalists' right to protect sources in Bosnia and Herzegovina, says Mijatović, <http://www.osce.org/fom/133056>, accessed January 15 2016 [Bosnian]
- Srdić Mladen, Kratka analiza sudske prakse u primjeni Zakona o zaštiti od klevete, http://vsud-fbih.pravosudje.ba/vstv/faces/vijesti.jsp?id=32317&vijesti_jezik=B accessed January 20 2016 [Bosnian]
- Softveri za špijuniranje u BiH, <http://www.balkans.aljazeera.net/vijesti/softveri-za-spijuniranje-u-bih>, accessed February 23 2016 [Bosnian]

- Human Rights Committee, General Comment No. 16 (1988) on the right to respect of privacy, family, home and correspondence, and protection of honour and reputation. See also European Court of Human Rights, factsheets on data protection (www.echr.coe.int/Documents/FS_Data_ENG.pdf) and right to protection of one's image (www.echr.coe.int/Documents/FS_Own_image_ENG.pdf).
- Smjernice za policiju u ophođenju sa medijima OSCE Misije u Bosni i Hercegovini, <http://www.bhnovinari.ba/images/stories/pdf/zakoni/osceputezapolicijuuophodenjusmedijima.pdf>, accessed January 14 2016 [Bosnian].
- Bajraktarević Sena, Nihada Jeleč, Zaštita povjerljivosti novinarskih izvora, Parliamentary Assembly of Bosnia and Herzegovina– Secretariate, 2013, [Bosnian]
- Report of the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression, David Kaye, <http://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/FreedomOpinion/Pages/CallForSubmission.aspx>, accessed February 23 2016.

14. Table of Provisions

Provisions in native language	Corresponding translation
Zakon o zaštiti od klevete Federacije Bosne i Hercegovine Član 9. Zaštita povjerljivih informacija 1. Novinar i drugo fizičko lice koje je redovno ili profesionalno uključeno u novinarsku djelatnost traženja, primanja ili saopćavanja informacija javnosti, koje je dobilo informaciju iz povjerljivog izvora ima pravo da ne otkrije identitet tog izvora. Ovo pravo uključuje i pravo da ne otkrije bilo koji dokument ili činjenicu koji bi mogli razotkriti identitet izvora, a naročito usmeni, pismeni, audio, vizuelni ili elektronski materijal. Pravo na neotkrivanje identiteta povjerljivog izvora nije ni pod kakvim okolnostima ograničeno u postupku koji se vodi u smislu ovog zakona. 2. Pravo na neotkrivanje identiteta povjerljivog izvora ima i svako drugo fizičko lice koje učestvuje u postupku u smislu ovog zakona, a koje kao rezultat svog profesionalnog odnosa sa novinarom ili drugim licem u smislu stava 1. ovog člana, sazna identitet povjerljivog izvora informacija.	The Law on Protection against Defamation of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina Article 9 Protection of Confidential Sources 1. A journalist, and any other natural person regularly or professionally engaged in the journalistic activity of seeking, receiving or imparting information to the public, who has obtained information from a confidential source has the right not to disclose the identity of that source. This right includes the right not to disclose any document or fact which may reveal the identity of the source particularly any oral, written, audio, visual or electronic material. Under no circumstances shall the right not to disclose the identity of a confidential source be limited in proceedings under this Law. 2. The right not to disclose the identity of a confidential source is extended to any other natural person involved in proceedings under this Law who, as a result of his or her professional relationship with a journalist or other person referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article, acquires knowledge of the identity of a confidential source of information.
Zakon o zaštiti klevete Republike Srpske	The Law on Protection against Defamation of the Republika Srpska

Član 10. Zaštita povjerljivih informacija 1. Novinar, kao i svako drugo fizičko lice koje je redovno ili profesionalno uključeno u novinarski posao traženja, primanja ili saopštavanja informacija javnosti, koju je dobio informaciju od povjerljivog izvora nije dužan saopštiti izvor informacije. Ovo pravo uključuje pravo da ne otkrije bilo koji dokumenat koji bi mogao da razotkrije identitet izvora, naročito uključujući: usmene, pisane, audio, vizuelne ili elektronske materijale. Ni pod kakvim okolnostima pravo na neotkrivanje identiteta povjerljivog izvora nije ograničeno kontekstom postupka u smislu ovog zakona. 2. Pravo na neotkrivanje identiteta povjerljivog izvora odnosi se na svako drugo fizičko lice koje učestvuje u postupku u skladu sa ovim zakonom, a koje kao rezultat svog profesionalnog odnosa sa novinarom ili drugim licem iz stava 1. ovog člana, sazna identitet povjerljivog izvora informacije..	Article 10 Protection of Confidential Sources 1. A journalist, and any other natural person regularly or professionally engaged in the journalistic activity of seeking, receiving or imparting information to the public, who has obtained information from a confidential source is not obliged to disclose the identity of that source. This right includes the right not to disclose any material which may reveal the identity of the source including, but not limited to, any oral, written, audio, visual or electronic material. Under no circumstances shall the right not to disclose the identity of a confidential source be limited in proceedings under this Act. 2. The right not to disclose the identity of a confidential source is extended to any other natural person involved in proceedings under this Act who, as a result of his or her professional relationship with a journalist or other person referred to in subsection 1. of this Article, acquires knowledge of the identity of a confidential source of information.
Zakon o zaštiti klevete Brčko Distrikta Član 9. Zaštita povjerljivih informacija 1. Novinar i drugo fizičko lice koje je redovno ili profesionalno uključeno u novinarsku djelatnost traženja, primanja ili saopćavanja informacija javnosti, koje je dobilo informaciju iz povjerljivog izvora ima pravo da ne otkrije identitet tog izvora.	The Law on Protection against Defamation of the Brčko Distrikt Article 9 Protection of confidential sources 1. A journalist, and any other natural person regularly or professionally engaged in the journalistic activity of seeking, receiving or imparting information to the public, who has obtained information from a confidential source is not obliged to disclose the identity of that source.

Ovo pravo uključuje i pravo da ne otkrije bilo koji dokument ili činjenicu koji bi mogli razotkriti identitet izvora, a naročito usmeni, pismeni, audio, vizuelni ili elektronski materijal. Pravo na neotkrivanje identiteta povjerljivog izvora nije ni pod kakvim okolnostima ograničeno u postupku koji se vodi u smislu ovog zakona. 2. Pravo na neotkrivanje identiteta povjerljivog izvora ima i svako drugo fizičko lice koje učestvuje u postupku u smislu ovog zakona, a koje kao rezultat svog profesionalnog odnosa s novinarom ili drugim licem u smislu stava 1 ovog člana, sazna identitet povjerljivog izvora inform	This right includes the right not to disclose any material which may reveal the identity of the source including, but not limited to, any oral, written, audio, visual or electronic material. Under no circumstances shall the right not to disclose the identity of a confidential source be limited in proceedings under this Act. 2. The right not to disclose the identity of a confidential source is extended to any other natural person involved in proceedings under this Act who, as a result of his or her professional relationship with a journalist or other person referred to in subsection 1. of this Article, acquires knowledge of the identity of a confidential source of information
Ustav B-H (Član 2) Sva lica na teritoriji Bosne i Hercegovine uživaju ljudska prava i slobode iz stava 2. ovog člana, što uključuje: h) Slobodu izražavanja. (Član 2, stav 2) Prava i slobode predviđeni u Evropskoj konvenciji za zaštitu ljudskih prava i osnovnih sloboda i u njenim protokolima se direktno primjenjuju u Bosni i Hercegovini. Ovi akti imaju prioritet nad svim ostalim zakonima.	The Constitution of the Bosnia and Herzegovina (Article 2) All persons within the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina shall enjoy the human rights and fundamental freedoms referred to in paragraph 2 above; these include: h) freedom of expression. (Article 2, paragraph 2) The rights and freedoms set forth in the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and its Protocols shall apply directly in Bosnia and Herzegovina. These shall have priority over all other law.
Ustav Federacije Bosne I Hercegovine	The Constitution of the Federation of

(Član 2, paragraph 2, tačka 1) Sva lica na teritoriji Federacije Bosne i Hercegovine uživaju ljudska prava i slobode i: 1) temeljnu slobodu: slobodu izražavanja i štampe.	Bosnia and Herzegovina (Article 2, paragraph 2, point 1) All persons within the territory of Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina shall enjoy: 1) fundamental freedom: freedom of expression and media.
Ustav Republike Srpske (Član 2, paragraf 26) Zajamčena je sloboda tiska i drugih sredstava javnog priopćavanja. Slobodno je osnivanje novinskih i izdavačkih poduzeća, izdavanje novina i javno priopćavanje drugim sredstvima sukladno zakonu. Cenzura tiska i drugih vidova javnog priopćavanja je zabranjena. Sredstva javnog priopćavanja dužna su da pravodobno, istinito i objektivno obavješćuju javnost. Jamči se pravo na ispravak neistinitog obavješćivanja kojim se povređuje nečije pravo ili na zakonu zasnovani interes, kao i pravo na naknadu otete nastale po toj osnovi.	Constitution of RS (Article 2, paragraph 26) Freedom of the press and other means of public communication shall be guaranteed. Anyone is free to establish news organisations and publishing houses, to publish newspapers or to disseminate information via other media, in accordance with the law. Censorship of the press and other media of public information shall be prohibited. It is the duty of the public information media to inform the public timeously, truthfully and without bias. The right to correct untruthfully published information which has damaged a right or an interest of an individual or body shall be guaranteed, as shall be the right to compensation for damages arising thereby.
Statut Brčko Distrikta (Glava 2, član 13, tačka 4) Sva lica na teritoriji Distrikta uživaju prava i slobode koje su im date Evropskom konvencijom o ljudskim pravima i osnovnim slobodama.	Constitution of BD (Article 2, paragraph 13, point 4) All persons on territory of BD exercise freedom and liberties given in ECHR.
Kodeks za štampu i online medije	Code of Honour

Član 4. Diskriminacija Novinari moraju izbjeći prejudicirane i uvredljive aluzije na nečiju etničku grupu, nacionalnost, rasu, religiju, pol, seksualnu opredijeljenost, fizičku onesposobljenost ili mentalno stanje. Aluzije na nečiju etničku grupu, nacionalnost, rasu, religiju, pol, seksualnu opredijeljenost, fizičku onesposobljenost ili mentalno stanje će biti napravljene samo onda kada su u direktnoj vezi sa slučajem o kojemu se izvještava. Član 13. Povjerljivost izvora informacija Kad god je to moguće, novinari se trebaju oslanjati na otvorene, identifikovane izvore informacija. Ovakvi izvori treba da budu pretpostavljeni anonimnim izvorima, čije poštenje i tačnost javnost ne može da ocijeni. Novinari imaju obavezu da štite identitet onih koji daju informacije u povjerenju, bez obzira na to da li su ili ne te ličnosti izričito zahtijevale povjerljivost.	Article 4 Discrimination Journalists must avoid prejudicial or insulting references to a person's ethnic group, nationality, race, religion, gender, sexual orientation, physical disability or mental disability. References to a person's ethnic group, nationality, race, religion, gender, sexual orientation, physical disability or mental disability shall be made only when directly relevant to the occurrence being reported. Articles 13 Confidentiality of Sources Whenever possible, journalists should rely on open, identified sources of information. These sources are to be preferred to anonymous sources, whose honesty and accuracy cannot be judged by the public. Journalists have an obligation to protect the identity of those who provide information in confidence, whether or not they explicitly request confidentiality.
Zakon o krivičnom postupku B-H Član 51. Pretresanje stana, ostalih prostorija i pokretnih stvari (1) Pretresanje stana i ostalih prostorija osumnjičenog, odnosno optuženog i drugih osoba, kao i njihovih pokretnih stvari izvan stana može se poduzeti samo onda ako ima dovoljno osnova za sumnju da se kod njih nalaze učinitelj,	Criminal Procedure Code of B-H Article 51 Search of dwellings, other premises and personal property (1) A search of dwellings and other premises of the suspect, accused or other persons, as well as his personal property outside the dwelling may be conducted only when there are sufficient grounds for suspicion that the

saučesnik, tragovi krivičnog djela ili predmeti važni za postupak.

(2) Pretresanje pokretnih stvari, u smislu odredbe stava 1. ovog člana, obuhvata i pretresanje kompjutera i sličnih uređaja za automatsku obradu podataka koji su s njima povezani. Na zahtjev Suda, osobe koje se koriste ovim uređajima dužne su omogućiti pristup, predati diskete, trake ili neki drugi oblik na kome su pohranjeni podaci, kao i pružiti potrebna obavještenja za upotrebu tih uređaja. Osoba koja odbije njihovu predaju, iako za to ne postoje razlozi iz člana 84. ovog zakona, može se kazniti prema odredbi člana 65. stav 5. ovog zakona.

Član 78.

Pouka osumnjičenom o njegovim pravima

(1) Kad se osumnjičeni prvi put ispituje, pitat će se za ime i prezime, nadimak ako ga ima, ime i prezime roditelja, djevojačko obiteljsko ime majke, gdje je rođen, gdje stanuje, dan, mjesec i godina rođenja, koje je narodnosti i čiji je državljanin, jedinstveni matični broj građana državljanina Bosne i Hercegovine, čime se zanima, kakve su mu obiteljske prilike, je li pismen, kakve je škole završio, je li, gdje i kad služio vojsku odnosno ima li čin rezervnog vojnog starješine, vodi li se u vojnoj evidenciji i kod kojeg organa nadležnog za poslove odbrane, je li odlikovan, kakvog je imovnog stanja, je li, kad i zašto osuđivan, je li i kad je izrečenu kaznu izdržao, da li se protiv njega vodi postupak za koje drugo krivično djelo, a ako je maloljetan, ko mu je zakonski zastupnik. Osumnjičeni će se poučiti da je dužan odazvati se pozivu i odmah saopćiti svaku promjenu adrese ili namjeru da promijeni boravište, a upozorit će se i na posljedice ako po tome ne postupi.

perpetrator, the accessory, traces of a criminal offense or objects relevant to the criminal proceedings might be found there.

(2) Search of personal property pursuant to Paragraph 1 of this article shall include a search of the computer and similar devices for automated data processing connected with it. At the request of the Court, the person using such devices shall be obligated to allow access to them, to hand over diskettes and magnetic tapes or some other forms of saved data, as well as to provide necessary information concerning the use of the devices. A person, who refuses to do so, although there are no reasons for that referred to in Article 84 of this Code, may be punished under the provision of Article 65 Paragraph 5 of this Code.

Article 78

Instructing the Suspect on His Rights

(1) At the first questioning the suspect shall be asked the following questions: his name and surname; nickname if he has one; name and surname of his parents; maiden name of his mother; place of birth; place of residence; date, month and year of birth; ethnicity and citizenship; identification number of Bosnia and Herzegovina citizen; profession; family situation; is he literate; completed education; has he served in the army, and if so, when and where; whether he has a rank of a reserve officer; whether he is entered in the military records and if yes with which authority in charge of defense affairs; whether he has received a medal; financial situation; previous convictions and, if any, reasons for the conviction; if convicted whether he served the sentence and when; are there ongoing proceedings for some other criminal offense; and if he is a minor, who is his legal representative. The suspect shall be instructed to obey summonses and to inform the authorized officials

(2) Na početku ispitivanja osumnjičenom će se saopćiti za koje krivično djelo se tereti i osnove sumnje protiv njega, a poučit će se i o sljedećim pravima: a) da nije dužan iznijeti svoju odbranu niti odgovarati na postavljena pitanja, b) da može uzeti branitelja po svom izboru koji može biti prisutan njegovom ispitivanju, kao i da ima pravo na branitelja bez naknade u slučajevima predviđenim ovim zakonom, da se može izjasniti o djelu koje mu se stavlja na teret i iznijeti sve činjenice i dokaze koji mu idu u korist, c) da ima pravo u toku istrage razmatrati spise i razgledati pribavljene predmete koji mu idu u korist, osim ako je riječ o spisima i predmetima čije bi otkrivanje moglo dovesti u opasnost cilj istrage, d) da ima pravo na besplatne usluge prevoditelja ako ne razumije ili ne govori jezik koji se koristi prilikom ispitivanja. (3) Osumnjičeni se može dobrovoljno odreći prava navedenih u stavu 2. ovog člana, ali njegovo ispitivanje ne može započeti ukoliko se i dok se njegova izjava o odricanju ne zabilježi pismeno i dok ne bude potpisana od strane osumnjičenog. Osumnjičeni se ni pod kojim okolnostima ne može odreći prava na prisustvo branitelja ako je njegova odbrana obavezna u	immediately about every change of an address or intention to change his residence, and the suspect shall also be instructed about consequences if he does not act accordingly. (2) At the beginning of the questioning, the suspect shall be informed of the charge against him, the grounds for the charge and he shall be informed of the following rights: a) the right not to present evidence or answer questions; b) the right to retain a defense attorney of his choice who may be present at questioning and the right to a defense attorney at no cost in such cases as provided by this Code; c) the right to comment on the charges against him, and to present all facts and evidence in his favor; d) that during the investigation, he is entitled to study files and view the collected items in his favor unless the files and items concerned are such that their disclosure would endanger the aim of investigation; e) the right to an interpreter service at no cost if the suspect does not understand the language used for questioning. (3) The suspect may voluntarily waive the rights stated in Paragraph 2 of this Article but his questioning may not commence unless his waiver has been recorded officially and signed by the suspect. To waive the right to a defense attorney shall not be possible for the suspect under any circumstances in case of a mandatory defense under this Code.
--	--

skladu s ovim zakonom. (4) U slučaju da se osumnjičeni odrekao prava da uzme branitelja, a kasnije izrazi želju da uzme branitelja, ispitivanje će se odmah prekinuti i ponovo će se nastaviti kada osumnjičeni dobije branitelja ili mu se branitelj postavi ili ako osumnjičeni izrazi želju da nastavi da odgovara na pitanja. (5) Ako se osumnjičeni dobrovoljno odrekne prava da ne odgovara na postavljena pitanja, mora mu se i u tom slučaju omogućiti da se izjasni o svim činjenicama i dokazima koji mu idu u korist. (6) Ako je postupljeno protivno odredbama ovoga člana, na iskazu osumnjičenog ne može se zasnivati sudska odluka. Član 82. Osobe koje ne mogu biti saslušane kao svjedoci Ne može se saslušati kao svjedok: a) osoba koja bi svojim iskazom povrijedila dužnost čuvanja državne, vojne ili službene tajne, dok je nadležni organ ne oslobodi te dužnosti, b) branitelj osumnjičenog, odnosno optuženog u pogledu činjenica koje su mu postale poznate u svojstvu branitelja, c) osoba koja bi svojim iskazom povrijedila dužnost čuvanja profesionalne tajne (vjerski službenik, odnosno ispovjednik, novinar u svrhu zaštite izvora informacija, advokat, bilježnik, liječnik, babica i dr.), osim ako je oslobođena te dužnosti posebnim propisom ili izjavom osobe u čiju je korist ustanovljeno čuvanje tajne,	(4) In the case when the suspect has waived the right to a defense attorney, but later expressed his desire to retain one, the questioning shall be immediately suspended and shall resume when the suspect has retained or has been appointed a defense attorney, or if the suspect has expressed a wish to answer the questions. (5) If the suspect has voluntarily waived the right not to answer the questions asked, he must be allowed to present views on all facts and evidence that speak in his favor. (6) If any actions have been taken contrary to the provisions of this Article, the Court's. Article 82 Persons Not To Be Heard As Witnesses The following persons shall not be heard as witnesses: a) A person who by his statement would violate the duty of keeping state, military or official secrets until the competent body releases him from that duty; b) A defense attorney of the suspect or accused with respect to the facts that became known to him in his capacity as a defense attorney; c) A person who by his statement would violate the duty of keeping professional secrets, including the religious confessor, professional journalists for the purpose of protecting the information source, attorneys-at-law, notary, physician, midwife and others, unless he was released from that duty by
---	--

d) maloljetna osoba koja s obzirom na uzrast i duševnu razvijenost nije sposobna shvatiti značaj prava da ne mora svjedočiti. Član 116. Vrste posebnih istražnih radnji i uvjeti za njihovu primjenu (1) Protiv osobe za koju postoje osnovi sumnje da je sama ili s drugim osobama učestvovala ili učestvuje u učinjenju krivičnog djela iz člana 117. ovog zakona mogu se odrediti posebne istražne radnje, ako se na drugi način ne mogu pribaviti dokazi ili bi njihovo pribavljanje bilo povezano s nesrazmjernim teškoćama (2) Istražne radnje iz stava 1. ovog člana su: a) nadzor i tehničko snimanje telekomunikacija, b) pristup kompjuterskim sistemima i kompjutersko sravnjenje podataka, c) nadzor i tehničko snimanje prostorija, d) tajno praćenje i tehničko snimanje osoba i predmeta, e) prikriiveni istražitelj i informator, f) simulirani otkup predmeta i simulirano davanje potkupnine, g) nadzirani prijevoz i isporuka predmeta krivičnog djela. (3) Istražne radnje iz stava 2. tačke a. ovog člana mogu se odrediti i prema osobi za koju postoje osnovi sumnje da učinitelju, odnosno od učinitelja krivičnog djela iz člana 117. ovog zakona prenosi informacije u vezi s krivičnim djelom, odnosno da učinitelj koristi njeno sredstvo	a special regulation or statement of the person who benefits from the secret being kept; d) A minor who, in view of his age and mental development, is unable to comprehend the importance of his privilege not to testify. Article 116 Types of Special Investigative Actions and Conditions of Their Application (1) If evidence cannot be obtained in another way or its obtaining would be accompanied by disproportional difficulties, special investigative measures may be ordered against a person against whom there are grounds for suspicion that he has committed or has along with other persons taken part in committing or is participating in the commission of an offense referred to in Article 117 of this Code. (2) Measures referred to in Paragraph 1 of this Article are as follows: a) surveillance and technical recording of telecommunications; b) access to the computer systems and computerized data processing; c) surveillance and technical recording of premises; d) covert following and technical recording of individuals and objects; e) use of undercover investigators and informants; f) simulated purchase of certain objects and simulated bribery; g) supervised transport and delivery of objects of criminal offense. (3) Measures referred to in Item a) of Paragraph 2 of this Article may also be ordered against persons against whom there are grounds for suspicion that he will deliver to the perpetrator or will receive from the perpetrator of the offenses referred to in Article 117 of this Code information in relation to the offenses, or grounds for
---	---

telekomunikacije. (4) Na razgovore osobe iz stava 1. ovog člana i njenog branitelja shodno se primjenjuju odredbe o komunikaciji osumnjičenog i branitelja. (5) Pri izvršavanju istražnih radnji iz stava 2. tačke e. i f. ovog člana policijski organi ili druge osobe ne smiju preduzimati aktivnosti koje predstavljaju podstrekavanje na učinjenje krivičnog djela. Ako su takve aktivnosti poduzete, ta okolnost isključuje krivično gonjenje podstrekavane osobe za krivično djelo izvršeno u vezi s ovim radnjama. Član 117. Krivična djela za koja se mogu odrediti posebne istražne radnje Istražne radnje iz člana 116. stav 2. ovog zakona mogu se odrediti za krivična djela: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a) protiv integriteta Bosne i Hercegovine, b) protiv čovječnosti i vrijednosti zaštićenih međunarodnim pravom, c) terorizma, d) za koja se prema zakonu može izreći kazna zatvora najmanje tri godine ili teža kazna. 	suspicion that the perpetrator uses a telecommunication device belonging to those persons. (4) Provisions regarding the communication between the suspect and his or her defense attorney shall apply accordingly to the discourse between the person referred to in Paragraph 1 of this Article and his or her defense attorney. (5) In executing the measures referred to in Items e) and f) of Paragraph 2 of this Article police authorities or other persons shall not undertake activities that constitute an incitement to commit a criminal offense. If nevertheless such activities are undertaken, this shall be an instance precluding the criminal prosecution against the incited person for a criminal offense committed in relation to those measures. Article 117 Criminal Offenses as to Which Undercover Investigative Measures May Be Ordered Measures referred to in Paragraph 2 of Article 116 of this Code may be ordered for following criminal offenses: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a) criminal offenses against the integrity of Bosnia and Herzegovina; b) criminal offenses against humanity and values protected under international law; c) criminal offenses of terrorism; d) criminal offenses for which, pursuant to the law, a prison sentence of minimum of three (3) years or more may be pronounced.
--	--

Zakon o krivičnom postupku FB-H Član 96. Osobe koja ne mogu biti saslušane kao svjedoci Ne može se saslušati kao svjedok: a) osoba koja bi svojim iskazom povrijedila dužnost čuvanja državne, vojne ili službene tajne, dok je nadležni organ ne oslobodi te dužnosti, b) branilac osumnjičenog, odnosno optuženog u pogledu činjenica koje su mu postale poznate u svojstvu branioca, c) osoba koja bi svojim iskazom povrijedila dužnost čuvanja profesionalne tajne (vjerski službenik, odnosno ispovjednik, novinar u svrhu zaštite izvora informacija, advokat, bilježnik, ljekar, babica i dr.), osim ako je oslobođena te dužnosti posebnim propisom ili izjavom osobe u čiju je korist ustanovljeno čuvanje tajne, d) maloljetna osoba koja s obzirom na uzrast i duševnu razvijenost nije sposobna shvatiti značaj prava da ne mora svjedočiti.	Criminal Procedure Code of FB-H Article 96. Persons Not To Be Heard As Witnesses The following persons shall not be heard as witnesses: a) A person who by his statement would violate the duty of keeping state, military or official secrets until the competent body releases him from that duty; b) A defense attorney of the suspect or accused with respect to the facts that became known to him in his capacity as a defense attorney; c) A person who by his statement would violate the duty of keeping professional secrets, including the religious confessor, professional journalists for the purpose of protecting the information source, attorneys-at-law, notary, physician, midwife and others, unless he was released from that duty by a special regulation or statement of the person who benefits from the secret being kept; d) A minor who, in view of his age and mental development, is unable to comprehend the importance of his privilege not to testify.
Zakon o krivičnom postupku Republike Srpske Član 147. Lica koja se ne mogu saslušati kao svjedoci Ne može se saslušati kao svjedok:	Criminal Procedure Code of Republika Srpska Article 147 Persons Who Shall Not Be Heard As Witnesses The following persons shall not be heard as witnesses:

a) lice koje bi svojim iskazom povrijedilo dužnost čuvanja državne, vojne ili službene tajne, dok ga nadležni organ ne oslobodi te dužnosti, b) branilac osumnjičenog, odnosno optuženog u pogledu činjenica koje su mu postale poznate u svojstvu branioca, c) lice koje bi svojim iskazom povrijedilo dužnost čuvanja profesionalne tajne (vjerski službenik, odnosno ispovjednik, novinar u svrhu zaštite izvora informacija, advokat, bilježnik, ljekar, babica i drugi), osim ako je oslobođeno te dužnosti posebnim propisom ili izjavom lica u čiju je korist ustanovljeno čuvanje tajne i d) maloljetno lice koje s obzirom na uzrast i duševnu razvijenost nije sposobno da shvati značaj prava da ne mora svjedočiti.	a) A person who by his statement would violate the duty of keeping state, military or official secrets until the competent body releases him from that duty; b) A defence attorney of the suspect or accused with respect to the facts that became known to him in his capacity of a defence attorney; c) A person who by his statement would violate the duty of keeping professional secrets (the priest - confessor, journalist for the purpose of protecting the information source, attorney-atlaw, notary, physician, midwife and others), unless he was released from that duty by a special regulation or statement of the person who benefits from the secret being kept; d) A minor who, in view of his age and mental development, is unable to comprehend the importance of his right not to testify.
Zakon o krivičnom postupku Brčko Distrikta Član 82 Osobe koje ne mogu biti saslušane kao svjedoci Ne može se saslušati kao svjedok: a) osoba koja bi svojim iskazom povrijedila dužnost čuvanja državne, vojne ili službene tajne, dok je nadležni organ ne oslobodi te dužnosti, b) branilac osumnjičenog, odnosno optuženog u pogledu činjenica koje su mu postale poznate u svojstvu branioca,	Criminal Procedure Law of Brčko District Article 82 Persons Not To Be Heard As Witnesses The following persons shall not be heard as witnesses: a) A person who by his statement would violate the duty of keeping state, military or official secrets until the competent body releases him from that duty; b) A defense attorney of the suspect or accused with respect to the facts that became known to him in his capacity as a defense attorney;

c) osoba koja bi svojim iskazom povrijedila dužnost čuvanja profesionalne tajne (vjerski službenik, odnosno ispovjednik, novinar u svrhu zaštite izvora informacija, advokat, bilježnik, ljekar, babica i dr.), osim ako je oslobođena te dužnosti posebnim propisom ili izjavom osobe u čiju je korist ustanovljeno čuvanje tajne, d) maloljetna osoba koja s obzirom na uzrast i duševnu razvijenost nije sposobna shvatiti značaj prava da ne mora svjedočiti.	c) A person who by his statement would violate the duty of keeping professional secrets, including the religious confessor, professional journalists for the purpose of protecting the information source, attorneys-at-law, notary, physician, midwife and others, unless he was released from that duty by a special regulation or statement of the person who benefits from the secret being kept; d) A minor who, in view of his age and mental development, is unable to comprehend the importance of his privilege not to testify.
Zakon o zaštiti tajnih podataka B-H Član 10. Uslovi za pristup tajnim podacima Pristup tajnim podacima moguć je samo uz uslove utvrđene Zakonom i drugim podzakonskim propisima izdatim na osnovu Zakona, odnosno međunarodnim ili regionalnim sporazumima koje je zaključila Bosna i Hercegovina Član 11. Tajnost podataka (1) Svi zvaničnici iz člana 5. i člana 6. Zakona, kao i drugih službenika i namještenika koji imaju zakonsko ovlaštenje za pristup tajnim podacima, imaju obavezu da bi takve informacije u tajnosti da ih izvadite iz oznake klasifikacije bez obzira koliko doći do njih, i to je istina, čak i nakon isteka mandata, prestanka radnog odnosa ili prestanka dužnosti ili članstvo u nadležnom državnom organu. (2) Službenici i namještenici koji nemaju zakonske ovlasti za pristup tajnim podacima, kao i građani Bosne i Hercegovine koji dolaze u posjed ili dobiti pristup tajnim informacijama na	Law on protection of secret data of Bosnia and Herzegovina Article 10 Conditions for access to secret data Access to secret data shall be possible only under the conditions as stipulated by this Law and other bylaws issued on the basis of this Law, and/or international or regional agreements concluded by Bosnia and Herzegovina. Article 11 Safekeeping of secret data (1) All officials referred to in Article 5, or Article 6 of this Law as well as other officials and employees with legal authorization to access secret data shall have an obligation to keep secret data regardless of the manner in which they were obtained, and this obligation shall also be applicable after termination of their mandate, cessation of employment and/or cessation of exercising the duty or membership in relevant state authority. (2) Officials and employees without a legal authorization to access secret data as well as citizens of B-H who acquire or gain access to secret data in a manner, which is not contrary

način koji je u suprotnosti sa zakonom, preuzme obavezu čuvanja podataka iz stava (1) ovog član. (3) Lica iz stava (2) ovog člana dužni su da obavijeste glava tijelu u kojem su zaposleni ili organu unutrašnjih poslova neovlašten pristup tajnim podacima i dati izjavu o okolnostima pod kojima su stekli pristup tajnim podacima.	to the law, shall assume the obligation to keep the data referred to in Paragraph (1). (3) Persons referred to in Paragraph (2) shall have the obligation to report to the manager of the body in which they are employed or to an authority of internal affairs any unauthorized access to secret data and give a statement about the circumstances under which they gained access to secret data.
Krivični zakon Bosne i Hercegovine Član 164. Odavanje državne tajne (1) Ovlaštena osoba koja protivno zakonu ili drugom propisu institucija Bosne i Hercegovine donesenim na osnovu zakona, drugome saopći, preda ili učini dostupnim državnu tajnu koja joj je povjerena, kaznit će se kaznom zatvora od jedne do deset godina. (2) Ko drugoj osobi saopći ili preda, ili posreduje u saopćavanju ili predaji podatka ili isprave za koju zna da je državna tajna, a do koje je protupravno došao, kaznit će se kaznom zatvora od šest mjeseci do pet godina. (3) Ako je krivično djelo iz stava 1. ovog člana učinjeno za vrijeme ratnog stanja ili neposredne ratne opasnosti, ili ako je dovelo do ugožavanja sigurnosti, privredne ili vojne moći Bosne i Hercegovine, učinitelj će se kazniti	Criminal Code of Bosnia and Herzegovina Article 164 Disclosing a State Secret (1) An authorised person who in contravention of law or regulation of the institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina passed on the basis of law, passes on or renders accessible a state secret entrusted to him, to another person, shall be punished by imprisonment for a term between one and ten years. (2) Whoever discloses or passes on to another person or mediates in disclosing information or a document which he knows to constitute a state secret, and which he obtained the possession of in an illegal manner, shall be punished by imprisonment for a term between six months and five years. (3) If the criminal offence referred to in paragraph 1 and 2 of this Article has been perpetrated during a state of war or imminent war danger, or if it has led to the endangerment of the security, economic or military power of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

kaznom zatvora najmanje tri godine. (4) Ovlaštena osoba koja učini krivično djelo iz stava 1. ovog člana iz nehata, kaznit će se kaznom zatvora od šest mjeseci do pet godina. (5) Nema krivičnog djela iz stava 2. ovog člana, ako neko objavi ili posreduje u objavljivanju državne tajne čija je sadržina suprotna ustavnom poretku Bosne i Hercegovine, u cilju da javnosti otkrije povredu ustavnog poretka ili međunarodnog ugovora, ako objavljivanje nema štetne posljedice za nacionalnu sigurnost Bosne i Hercegovine.	the perpetrator shall be punished by imprisonment for a term not less than three years. (4) An authorised person who perpetrates the criminal offence referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article by negligence, shall be punished by imprisonment for a term between six months and five years. (5) There shall be no criminal offence referred to in paragraph 2 of this Article, if somebody makes public or mediates in making public a state secret the contents of which are in contravention with the constitutional order of Bosnia and Herzegovina, with an aim of disclosing to the public facts which constitute a violation of the constitutional order or of an international agreement, provided that the making public does not undermine the national security of Bosnia and Herzegovina.
Krivični Zakon FB-H Član 187. Neovlašćeno otkrivanje profesionalne tajne (1) Advokat, branitelj, javni bilježnik, doktor medicine, doktor stomatologije, babica ili drugi zdravstveni djelatnik, psiholog, djelatnik starateljstva, vjerski ispovjednik ili druga osoba koja neovlašćeno otkrije tajnu koju je saznala u vršenju svog zvanja, kaznit će se kaznom zatvora do jedne godine. (2) Nema krivičnog djela iz stava 1. ovog člana ako neko tajnu otkrije u općem interesu ili interesu druge osobe koji je pretežniji od interesa čuvanja tajne.	Criminal Code of FB-H Article 187. Unauthorized Disclosure of a Professional Secret (1) An attorney, defence counsel, notary, physician, dentist, midwife or any other medical worker, psychologist, employee of social welfare institution, confessor or any other person who without authorization discloses a secret which become known to him in the exercise of his profession, shall be punished by imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year. (2) There shall be no criminal offence if someone discloses a secret in the public interest or in the interest of another person, which outweighs the interest of keeping the

	secret.
Krivični Zakon RS Član 173. Neovlašćeno otkrivanje profesionalne tajne (1) Advokat, ljekar ili drugo lice koje neovlašćeno otkrije tajnu koju je saznalo u vršenju svog poziva, kazniće se novčanom kaznom ili zatvorom do jedne godine. (2) Nema krivičnog djela iz stava 1. ovog člana ako je tajna otkrivena u opštem interesu ili interesu dugog lica koji je pretežniji od interesa čuvala nje tajne. (3) Gonjenje se preduzima po prijedlogu. Član 174 Neovlašćeno prisluškivanje i tonsko snimanje (1) Ko posebnim uređajima neovlašćeno prisluškuje ili tonski snimi razgovor ili izjavu koja mu nije namenjena, ili omogući nepoznatom licu da se upozna sa razgovorom ili izjavom koja je neovlašćeno prisluškivana ili snimana, kazniće se novčanom kaznom ili zatvorom do jedne godine.	Criminal Code of RS Article 173. Unauthorized Disclosure of a Professional Secret (1) An attorney, medical doctor or any other person who without authorization discloses a secret which he has got to know in the exercise of his profession, shall be punished by a fine or imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year. (2) There shall be no criminal offense referred to in Paragraph 1 of this Article if a secret has been disclosed in the public interest or in the interest of another person which outweighs that of keeping the secret. (3) Prosecution shall be carried based on motion. Article 174 Unauthorized wiretapping and audio recording (1) The one who, with special devices without authorization taps or records a conversation or a statement that it is not intended to him/her, or enables an uninvited person to have knowledge of a conversation or statement that was unauthorized

(2) Kaznom iz stava 1. ovog člana kazniće se i ko tonski snimi izjavu koja je njemu namjenjena, bez znanja i odobrenja onoga ko je daje, u namjeri da takvu izjavu zloupotrijebi, ili ko omogući nepozvanom licu da se upozna sa takvom izjavom. (3) Ako djelo iz stava 1. i 2. ovog člana učini službeno lice u vršenju službe, kazniće se zatvorom do tri godine.	interception or recorded, shall be punished by a fine or imprisonment up to one year. (2) By the sentence referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article, will be punished one who records a statement that it intended to him/her, without the knowledge and consent of the person who gives statement, with the intention of abuse of such a statement, or one who provides with such statement an unauthorized person. (3) If offenses referred to in para. 1 and 2 of this Article is committed by an official in discharge of duty, he/she shall be punished with imprisonment up to three years.
Krivični zakon Brčko Distrikta Član 184. Neovlašteno otkrivanje profesionalne tajne (1) Advokat, branilac, javni bilježnik, doktor medicine, doktor stomatologije, babica ili drugi zdravstveni radnik, psiholog, socijalni radnik, vjerski službenik ili drugo lice koja neovlašteno otkrije tajnu koju je saznalo u obavljanju svoga zvanja, kaznit će se kaznom zatvora do jedne godine. (2) Nema krivičnog djela iz stava 1 ovoga člana ako ko tajnu otkrije u općem interesu ili interesu drugog lica koje je pretežnije od interesa čuvanja tajne.	Criminal Code of BD Article 184. Unauthorized Disclosure of a Professional Secret (1) An attorney, defence counsel, notary, physician, dentist, midwife or any other medical worker, psychologist, employee of social welfare institution, confessor or any other person who without authorization discloses a secret which become known to him in the exercise of his profession, shall be punished by imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year. (2) There shall be no criminal offence if someone discloses a secret in the public interest or in the interest of another person, which outweighs the interest of keeping the secret.

Zakon o radu u institucijama Bosne i Hercegovine Član 60. 1. Zaposlenik će disciplinski odgovarati za povredu jedne ili više službenih dužnosti propisanih ovim zakonom, kada je povreda rezultat njegove vlastite krivice. 2. Povrede službenih dužnosti mogu biti teže i lakše. 3. Teže povrede službenih dužnosti su: a) vršenje radnje koja je definirana kao krivično djelo protiv službene dužnosti, ili drugo krivično djelo, odnosno prekršaj, kojim se nanosi šteta ugledu poslodavca, što čini zaposlenika nepodobnim za rad kod poslodavca; b) odavanje državne, vojne i službene tajne, odnosno povreda propisa o čuvanju tih tajni; c) zloupotreba ili prekoračenje službenih ovlaštenja; d) neizvršavanje ili nesavjesno i nemarno vršenje povjerenih poslova; e) bavljenje djelatnostima kojima se onemogućava ili otežava građanima ili drugim licima da ostvaruju svoja prava kod poslodavca; f) bavljenje djelatnostima ili radom koji je direktno ili indirektno u suprotnosti s interesima poslodavca; g) prouzrokovanje poslodavcu veće materijalne štete na imovini ili aktivi namjerno ili iz krajnje nepažnje, h) neopravdan izostanak s posla više od dva dana u mjesecu; i) kršenje pravila radne discipline; j) neblagovremeno i neuredno izvršavanje	Law on Civil Service in Institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina Article 60 The employee will be responsible for a disciplinary violation of one or more official duties stipulated by this law, when violations result of his own guilt. 2. Violation of official duties can be more grave and minor offences. 3. Serious breaches of official duties are: a) carrying out actions defined as a criminal offense against official duty, or other serious or minor offenses which are harmful to the reputation of the employer, which makes the employee unfit for work at the employer; b) disclosure of a State, military and official secrets and contravention to the regulations on keeping those secrets; c) abuse or exceeding of official duties; d) failure to consciously and carefully execute official duties; e) undertaking actions which may impede or prevent citizens or other persons to exercise their rights with the employer; f) undertaking actions or activities which directly or indirectly contrary to the interests of the employer; g) causing the employer serious damage to property or assets deliberately or due to gross negligence, h) unexcused absence from work for more than two days a month; i) violation of labor discipline; j) an untimely and irregular execution of
---	---

povjerenih poslova; k) neprimjereno ponašanje prema građanima, saradnicima i drugim licima u vršenju službene dužnosti. l) svaka druga povreda koja se posebnim zakonom utvrdi kao teža povreda. 4. Pravilnikom o disciplinskoj i materijalnoj odgovornosti zaposlenika (u daljem tekstu: Pravilnik o disciplinskoj odgovornosti) utvrđuju se lakše povrede službene dužnosti. 5. Odgovornost za izvršenje krivičnog djela, odnosno prekršaja, ne isključuje disciplinsku i materijalnu odgovornost zaposlenika, pod uslovom da takvo djelo istovremeno predstavlja i povredu službene dužnosti; 6. Pravilnik iz stava 4. ovog člana donosi Vijeće ministara za budžetske korisnike, a poslodavac za ostale zaposlenike. Član 62. 1. Za učinjene povrede službene dužnosti iz člana 60. ovog zakona zaposleniku se mogu izreći sljedeće disciplinske mjere i disciplinske kazne, i to: a) za lakše povrede službene dužnosti izriču se disciplinske mjere: opomena i javna opomena; b) za teže povrede službene dužnosti izriču se disciplinske kazne: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • suspenzija s radnog mjesta i obustava isplate plaće u periodu od najmanje dva do najviše 30dana; • novčana kazna do 30% od osnovne plaće zaposlenika na period do šest mjeseci 	entrusted tasks; k) indecent attitude towards the citizens, collaborators and other parties in the performance of official duties. l) any other violation of a specific law establishes as a serious violation. 4. Regulations on disciplinary and material responsibility of employees (hereinafter: the Regulations on Disciplinary Responsibility) determine minor breaches of official duties. 5. Responsibility for the execution of the offense or offenses, does not exclude the disciplinary and material responsibility of the employee, provided that the act also constitutes a breach of official duties; 6. Regulation referred to in paragraph 4 of this Article by the Council of Ministers for budget users, and the employer to other employees. Article 62 1. For violation of official duties under Article 60 of this Law, an employee may receive the following disciplinary measures and disciplinary punishments, including: a) for minor breaches of official duties shall be imposed disciplinary measures: warning and a public reprimand; b) for a serious breach of official duties shall be imposed disciplinary penalties: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • suspension from work and suspension of payment of wages for a minimum of two to a maximum of 30 days; • a fine of up to 30% of the basic salary of the employee for a period up to six months • Suspension of the right to increase wages in
---	--

<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • suspenzija prava na povećanje plaće u periodu najduže do dvije godine; • degradiranje na niže radno mjesto; • prestanak radnog odnosa. 	the period up to two years; <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • downgrading to a lower position; • termination of employment.
Zakon o radu Federacije Bosne i Hercegovine Član 97. (1) Poslodavac može otkazati ugovor o radu radniku, bez obaveze poštivanja otkaznog roka, u slučaju da je radnik odgovoran za teži prijestup ili za težu povredu radnih obaveza iz ugovora o radu, a koji su takve prirode da ne bi bilo osnovano očekivati od poslodavca da nastavi radni odnos. (2) U slučaju lakših prijestupa ili lakših povreda radnih obaveza iz ugovora o radu, ugovor o radu se ne može otkazati bez prethodnog pisanog upozorenja radniku. (3) Pisano upozorenje iz stava 2. ovog člana sadrži opis prijestupa ili povrede radne obaveze za koje se radnik smatra odgovornim i izjavu o namjeri da se otkaže ugovor o radu bez davanja	Labor Law of Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina Article 97 (1) An employer may terminate a labor contract to an employee, without the obligation to abide by the notice period, if the employee is responsible for a serious offense or serious breach of duties arising from labor contract, which are of such a nature that the employer cannot be reasonably expected to continue with his employment. (2) In case of a minor offense or minor breach of duties arising from a labor contract, the labor contract cannot be terminated without a prior written warning to the employee. (3) The written warning referred to in

predviđenog otkaznog roka za slučaj da se prijestup ponovi u roku od šest mjeseci nakon izdavanja pisanog upozorenja poslodavca. (4) Kolektivnim ugovorom ili pravilnikom o radu utvrđuju se vrste prijestupa ili povreda radnih obaveza iz st. 1. i 2. ovog člana.	paragraph 2 of this Article shall contain a description of the offense or breach of duty for which the employee is deemed responsible, as well as a statement about the intention to terminate a labor contract without the prescribed notice period if the offense is repeated within six months from the issuance of the written warning by the employer. (4) A collective agreement or Rulebook on labor shall determine types of offenses or breaches of duty referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article.
Zakon o radu Republike Srpske Član 137. (1) Radnik je dužan da se na radu pridržava obaveza propisanih zakonom, kolektivnim ugovorom, pravilnikom o radu i ugovorom o radu, i da svoje radne obaveze izvršava na način kojim neće onemogućavati ili ometati druge radnike u izvršavanju njihovih radnih obaveza. (2) Za povredu radnih obaveza radnik je odgovoran poslodavcu, a ako je povredom radnih obaveza prouzročena materijalna šteta poslodavcu ili trećim licima, ili je učinjeno krivično djelo ili prekršaj, radnik je odgovoran materijalno, odnosno krivično i prekršajno. Član 138. (1) Težom povredom radnih obaveza smatra se takvo ponašanje radnika na radu ili u vezi sa radom kojim se nanosi ozbiljna šteta interesima poslodavca, kao i ponašanje radnika iz koga se	Labour Law of Republika Srpska Article 137 (1) An employee is required to work to comply with the obligations laid down by law, collective agreement, rule book and employment contract, and to carry out their duties in a manner that not impede or interfere with other workers in carrying out their work duties. (2) For the violation of duties worker is responsible employer, and if the violation of labor obligations caused damage to the employer or third parties, or a criminal act or offense, the employee is responsible financially or criminal and misdemeanor. Article 138 (1) A serious breach of working obligations is such behavior of workers at work or in connection with work that inflicts serious damage to the interests of the employer, as

osnovano može zaključiti da dalji rad radnika kod poslodavca ne bi bio moguć. (2) Ako radnik učini propust u radu ili u vezi sa radom koji se ne smatra težom povredom radnih obaveza u smislu stava 1. ovog člana, poslodavac će ga pismeno upozoriti na takvo ponašanje ili izreći mjeru iz člana 140. stav 1. tačka 1) ili 2) ovog zakona, pa ukoliko radnik, i pored tog upozorenja, ponovi isti ili drugi propust, u roku od jedne godine, takvo ponovljeno ponašanje smatraće se težom povredom radnih obaveza zbog koje poslodavac može otkazati ugovor o radu. Član 139. Lakšom povredom radnih obaveza smatraju se propusti u radu i u vezi sa radom koji nemaju značajnije štetne posljedice po poslodavca i koji se ne smatraju težim povredama radnih obaveza, a utvrđuju se opštim aktom.	well as the behavior of workers who are reasonably be concluded that further work workers at the employer would not be possible. (2) If a worker does omission in the workplace or in connection with work that is not considered a serious violation work obligations under paragraph 1 of this Article, the employer will issue a written warning to such behavior or impose a measure under Article 140, paragraph 1, item 1) or 2) of this law, and if a worker, despite this warning, repeated the same or other failure, within one year, such repeated behavior be considered a serious breach of obligations for which the employer can terminate the employment contract. Article 139 Minor violation of work obligations are considered to be failures at work and in relation to the work that no significant adverse effects on between employers and who are not considered serious violations of work obligations and are determined by the general act.
Zakon o radu Brčko Distrikta Članak 74 (1) Poslodavac može otkazati ugovor o radu zaposleniku bez obveze poštovanja otkaznog roka propisanog člankom 80 ovog zakona, u slučaju da je zaposlenik odgovoran za teži prijestup ili za težu povredu radnih obaveza iz ugovora o radu ili ako je u pitanju zaposlenje takve prirode da ne bi bilo razumno očekivati od poslodavca da nastavi radni odnos sa	Labour Law of Brcko District Article 74 (1) An employer may terminate a labor contract to an employee, without the obligation to abide by the notice period stipulated in Article 80 in this Law, if the employee is responsible for a serious offense or serious breach of duties arising from labor contract, which are of such a nature that the employer cannot be reasonably expected to

zaposlenikom. (2) U slučaju prijestupa ili povreda radnih obveza koje jesu ozbiljne ali ne dosežu težinu prijestupa iz stavka 1 ovog članka, poslodavac će spomenutom zaposleniku uručiti pismeno upozorenje koje sadrži opis prijestupa i/ili povrede radnih obveza za koje poslodavac zaposlenika smatra odgovornim. To pismeno upozorenje također treba sadržavati i izjavu o namjeri poslodavca da se otkaže ugovor o radu bez davanja predviđenog otkaznog roka, ukoliko opetuje prijestup ili povredu radnih obveza. (3) Kolektivnim ugovorom ili pravilnicima mogu se utvrditi vrste prijestupa ili povreda obveza navedenih u staccima 1 i 2 ovog članka.	continue with his employment. (2) In case of a minor offense or minor breach of duties, which are not as serious as in paragraph 1 of this Article, employer shall give an employee warning letter which contains description of offence or breach of duties for which employer is responsible. Letter must also contain a statement of intent of the employer to terminate the contract of employment without providing the notice, if repeating the offense or breach of obligations. (3) A collective agreement or Rulebook on labor shall determine types of offenses or breaches of duty referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article.
--	---

ELSA BULGARIA

Contributors

National Coordinator

Ana Petrova

National Academic Coordinator

Simona Veleva
LL.M., PhD candidate

National Researchers

Ana Petrova
Anna Uzunova
Krasimir Mitkov
Magdalena Miteva
Maya Aleksandrova
Nikoleta Bezergyanova
Silvana Tonkova
Simeon Stoychev
Tsvetina Kondieva

National Linguistic Editor

Simona Veleva
LL.M., PhD candidate

National Academic Supervisor

Dr. Peter Iliev
LL.M., Ph.D. (LL.D., J.D.)

1. Introduction

Nowadays, journalists tend to depend more frequently on non-journalists for the supply of information on issues of public interest. These people often provide information on a confidential basis, motivated by fear of repercussions, which might affect their physical safety or job security. Journalists have interest in not divulging names of sources because otherwise they may lose them in the future. Protecting the secrecy of journalists' sources means to protect the independence, reliability and freedom of the media. As stated in one of the most fundamental cases of the European Court of Human Rights in that matter - Goodwin v. United Kingdom, any intrusion in the journalists' right not to disclose their sources is interference with the freedom of expression, guaranteed by Article 10 of the European Convention of the Protection of Human Rights and fundamental freedoms. Furthermore, the law should only justify such interference, if it falls under Article 10 Para. 2. Compulsion on journalists should only be imposed in extreme circumstances, if it is necessary for justified in the public or individual interests. Only the establishment of efficient legal safeguards and self-regulations at national level can achieve this.

2. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information? What type of legislation provides this protection? How exactly is this protection construed in national law?

Bulgaria, as a member state of the European Union since January 1 2007 and state party to the European Convention of the Protection of Human Rights and fundamental freedoms (ECHR) since October 2 1992, has to observe the endorsed European principles and standards in this field in order to guarantee the pluralism and independence of mass media by protecting its sources. The ECHR and all EU treaties in the field of media law are part of the Bulgarian legislation due to Article 5, para.4 of the Constitution of Bulgaria.

The Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria was adopted on July 12 1991 and it enshrines all the basic principles and values, which led the way in the further development of the country – “universal human values of liberty, peace, humanism, equality, justice and tolerance”. The constitutional legislator was guided by the international standards in the field of human rights and fundamental freedoms, which are the foundation of justice and peace and are best maintained by an effective political democracy.

On constitutional level, the freedom of expression, freedom of the press and the right to seek, obtain and disseminate information are proclaimed in Articles 39-41 (“communication rights”). The formulating of the rights and restrictions directly corresponds with Article 10 of the European convention of human rights and Article 19 of the International covenant on civil and political rights.

In Bulgaria, the right of journalist to protect their sources is regulated on legislative level explicitly in the “Radio and television act” in Art. 15. Para. 1-4, which will be examined in detail further in the report in points 3 and 4.

The Bulgarian Civil Procedure Code and the Penal Procedure Code do not provide any specific procedural safeguards for the journalists' right not to disclose their sources. The Penal code provides the sanctions, which will be reviewed in the following question.

What should also be taken in consideration, is decision 7/1996 of the Constitutional Court of Republic of Bulgarian on case 1/1996¹. The Constitutional Court has given a binding interpretation of those provisions of the Constitution in Decision 7/96 in correspondence to the request of the President to clarify the meaning of Art. 39-41 in order for conflicting jurisprudence to be avoided in the future. Although it is not explicitly stated in the Constitution, the journalists' right not to disclose his source corresponds with Art. 41. Para. 1., regulating the right to seek, receive, and disseminate information. Furthermore, in Article 41. Para. 2, the restrictions of this principle are given. In this decision the Constitutional Court states "the right to freely seek, receive and impart information, enshrined in Art. 41, para. 1 of the Constitution is described in the present opinion as unhindered access to all sources of information. This view is justified by Article 10, para. 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights, according to which freedom of expression "shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers". According to this view some of the terms used in the text of Art. 41, para. 1 of the Constitution require further clarification. Among them is the phrase "good name" to be associated primarily with the honor and dignity of the citizen and society with established authority. Another reason for restriction is the national security, which include such involvement, which aims to protect important state interests, which may lead to reduced defense capability or failure of economic, political or other interests. By "public order" should be understood the established by regulations order that ensures peace and normal ability to exercise civil rights."² The restrictions proclaimed in Art. 39, par. 2 and Art. 41, par. 2 directly correspond to the restrictions of Art. 10, par. 2 of the Convention.

Further protection of this matter aims the "National Council for Journalistic Ethics", which was established in 2005 to create a system of self-regulation of print and electronic media in Bulgaria, through interpretation and application of the Code of Ethics of the Bulgarian media and resolution of disputes between the media and their audience. By examining individual complaints of citizens through the establishment of high professional journalistic standards, the Commission defends the enshrined in the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria communication rights and freedoms. Despite not being legally binding, the Ethical Code of the Bulgarian Media has an article in section 1.3, devoted to the protection of journalistic sources. It states "1.3.3. We shall protect the identity of confidential sources of information." This is a clear sign of the professional understanding of the significance of keeping sources non-disclosed.

¹ Decision 7/1996 of the Constitutional Court (Конституционен съд) of the Republic of Bulgarian on case 1/1996

² Ibidem

3. Is there, in domestic law, a provision that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his/her sources? How exactly is this prohibition construed in national law? What is the sanction?

3.1 Bulgarian Legislation

In the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria there is no specific article that protects the journalistic sources. However in Chapter 2 (called Citizens' Fundamental Rights and Duties), in articles 39 some general principles can be found regarding the freedom of speech, which can be applied for the disclosure of journalistic sources too. Article 40 states that “the press and the other mass communication media are free and shall not be subjected to censorship”. To emphasize that right in article 41 it is clearly stated, “everyone has the right to seek, receive, and disseminate information. This right shall not be exercised to the detriment of the rights and reputation of others, or to the detriment of national security, public order, public health and morality.” In the aforementioned case № 1/1996 of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Bulgaria (Конституционен съд на Република България) the judges clarified art. 39, 40, 41 of the Constitution in the context of the need to clarify the "communication rights". Furthermore, these rights are the basis for other democratic tools such as the political pluralism (art. 11 (1)). Those 3 articles are functionally connected. The state shouldn't try to limit the range of those rights. However if other rights are threatened, some of them can be limited. This does not mean in context of articles 4 and 32 (regarding the interference in private life and attacks against a person's honour, dignity and reputation) that person cannot be criticized. Especially, if that person is a politician or civil servant.³ Another article, which regulates this topic, is art.5, Para. 4 that says:

Any international treaty, which has been ratified according to a procedure established by the Constitution, which has been promulgated, and which has entered into force for the Republic of Bulgaria, shall be part of the domestic law of the land. Any such treaty shall take priority over any conflicting standards of domestic legislation.

3.1.3 Other Acts

The Civil Procedure Code and the Criminal Procedure Code of Bulgaria does not provide specific privileges for the journalist, so they can refuse to reveal their sources. Only in the Criminal Procedure Code under article 121, paragraph 1 is stated that “witnesses shall not be obligated to testify on questions, the answers to which might incriminate them, their relatives of ascending and descending line, brothers, sisters, spouses or individuals with whom they live together, in the commission of crime”

³ Decision from 20.03.2014 of Sofia Regional Court on case 44041/2012 (not in force to date 25.04.2016)

Article 15 of the Radio and Television Act secures the possibility for the media service providers not to disclose their sources of information. There is an exception of this rule – if an action was brought before the Council for electronic media or if there is a pending process before the court. In the same article it is stated that journalists shall not be obligated to disclose their sources of information either to the audience or to the management of a media service provider (art. 15, para. 2). As it is stated in the book “Freedom of Expression”⁴ the question whether the Radio and Television Act is applicable to journalists who also work in print media, remains open.

According to article 19 of the APIA (Access to Public Information Act) the access to any information, which is “public”, defined by the same act, regarding the mass communication media herein shall be exercised while applying and reconciling the principles of transparency and of economic freedom, as well as respecting the protection of personal data, trade secrecy, and non-disclosure of the identity of the sources of the mass communication media who provide information on condition of anonymity.

Last but not least is the Ethical Code of the Bulgarian Media. Par. 1.3.3 regulates that the identity of the sources of information shall be protected.

3.2 International Acts

The minimum requirements regarding protection of sources in the European Community can be found in Recommendation No.R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their source. This recommendation advises the countries to accept some changes in the domestic law led by the following principles: right of non-disclosure of journalists; right of non-disclosure of other persons; limits to the right of non-disclosure; alternative evidence to journalists' sources; conditions concerning disclosure; interception of communication, surveillance and judicial search and seizure; protection against self-incrimination. Bulgaria has ratified the European Convention on Human rights on 7th September 1992. The relevant case-law is applicable in Bulgaria and can be used in the courtroom.

3.3 Sanctions

General sanction connected with the topic can be found under Section VI “Disclosure of secret of another” of the Penal Code. Art. 145 proclaims: “ Who illegally discloses a secret of another dangerous for the good name of somebody, which has been entrusted to him or has become known to him in connection with his profession, shall be punished by imprisonment of up to one year or a fine of one hundred to three hundred levs.” Further sanction is given by the right to compensation under the Law on Contracts and Obligations, which is another way for protection, in cases of tort before the Civil Court.

⁴ Boyko Boev, Aleksander Kashumov, Krasimir Kunev, Neli Ognyanova, Polina Rusinova, “Freedom of expression”, Sibi 2010, pp. 171-196

4. Who is a “journalist” according to the national legislation? Is it in your view a restricted definition for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources? What is the scope of protection of other media Actors? Is the protection of journalists’ sources extended to anyone else?

4.1. Definition of a Journalist According to Bulgarian Legislation

The theoretical works on the subject of journalism can provide various definitions of the term “journalist”. Most of them regard journalists as all the media associates engaged in the collection, analysis, proofreading, commenting and distributing of news, comments, radio or television programs.⁵ However, Bulgarian legislation lacks explicit definition of who can be referred to as a journalist.

The scope of the journalistic profession can be implicitly brought out from legal acts. The main legal source in the field of journalism is The Radio and Television Act. Still it does not offer legal definition of the term journalist. It is stated in Article 1 of the Act that its purpose is to settle the media services, provided by media service providers under the jurisdiction of the Republic of Bulgaria.⁶ The subject of the Act is the services enumerated under Article 2 of the Act not the authors of the services. Although some rights and obligations of the journalists are written down, there is no definition in the Act of the term “journalist”. Therefore in some way the term journalist can be described implicitly with the rights and obligations under the Act such as the ones to refuse the fulfilment of an assigned task if it is not related to the fulfilment of the provisions of the Act or of the respective contracts and contradicts their personal convictions.⁷

In Bulgaria’s National Classification of Professions and Positions (NCPP)⁸ the journalistic profession is listed under the Second Class – Specialists and more exactly the branch of Jurists and Specialist in the field of public science and culture. The profession is named Journalist and under it are listed some of the specialties of which it is comprised. The profession of a journalist includes a wide range of professions, which all have something in common but differ in characteristics. Under the classification of the profession Journalist are written down the following specialties – Chief Editor, Editor of magazine/newspaper, Journalist, Reporter,

⁵ Maria Popova, Theory of Journalism, 95. See also Sofia University Faculty of Journalism and Mass communications, Journalistic Jobs - Status and Dynamics in Bulgaria, 8.

⁶ Radio and Television Act, published in State Gazette, issue 138, 1998

⁷ Ibid. Article 11

⁸ The National Classification of Professions and Positions, 2011. Pinpoints the professional and positional structure in the republic of Bulgaria and ensures the direct application of the International Standard Classification of Occupations, 2008. Hereinafter referred to as The NCPP.

Reporter/Journalist in magazine, newspaper, etc.⁹ From the description are expressly excluded Book Editors, Camera Operators, Photo reporters, Writers and Poets. Journalists are characterized as people who research, investigate, interpret and transmit news and public events through newspapers, radio and television.¹⁰ Also the NCPP provides detailed explanation of the main tasks which a Journalist performs. It is the fullest definition of the journalistic duties since the NCPP is in force for all the organizations and structures which offer jobs in Bulgaria.¹¹ However detailed it is, it is not and should not be regarded as an explicit definition but should be considered as a guideline for the functions a journalist performs. Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information provides a definition of a journalist. The definition finds reflection in the Standpoint on the subject of the protection of sources of information i.e. Article 1.3.3 of the Ethical Code of the Bulgarian Media,¹² issued on March 24 2015. The concept of journalistic profession is defined in terms of the scope of the protection. This protection does not regard the providers of information but the people who can be referred to as journalist in order to be protected due to their professional duty. Journalist is described as any individual or legal entity, which gathers and spreads information on a daily basis or professionally by the means of mass communication.¹³ The scope of the protection includes traditional and new media. This definition is fully accepted by the NCJE in its Official Statement.¹⁴

We can conclude that a full definition, which describes the elements of the term journalist, does not exist in the form of a legal definition accepted under national legislation. However, there are legal acts, which regulate the right and obligations of journalist.

4.2. Definition of the Purpose of the Protection of Journalist Sources Principle 1, written down in the Appendix of Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 i.e. Right of non-disclosure of journalists, asks for protection of journalist and their right not to disclose information about their sources in accordance with Article 10 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.¹⁵ Bulgaria ratified the European Convention on Human Rights in 1992. Article 10 of the ECHR finds reflection in Article 39 of the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria. Article 39 of the Constitution expresses the notion of freedom of opinion and its expression. This principle is one of the main principles on which Media Law is based.

⁹ Ibid.

¹⁰ Ibid.

¹¹ The National Council of Journalistic Ethics. Hereinafter after referred to as The NCJE.

¹² Ethical Code of the Bulgarian Media. Hereinafter referred to as The Ethical Code.

¹³ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7, Appendix, Definitions (a.).

¹⁴ Standpoint of the National Council of Bulgarian Media, Point 2.

¹⁵ Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950. Hereinafter referred to as The European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).

When considering the purpose of the protection of journalist sources the provision listed under Article 39 of the Constitution should be examined closely. Court Decision Number 7 of June 4 1996 of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Bulgaria on Constitutional Case Number 1/96¹⁶ is delivered in order to provide interpretation of Articles 39, 40, 41 of The Constitution.¹⁷ The proceeding was initiated by a request to the Court from the President of the Republic. In it the Constitutional Court links the present Articles to Article 10 of the ECHR and also Article 19 of The 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights.¹⁸ In other Court Decision Number 15 of September 28 1993 in accordance with Constitutional Case Number 17 from 1993 the same Court states that the principle in Article 39 (1) presents “the opportunity for each person to realize itself in the social reality. It is also the basis of political pluralism and eliminates all forms of political, idealistic or faith monopoly.” The importance of Article 39 of the Constitution is undoubted. Nonetheless it does not cast any light on the subject of the protection of sources.

One of the basic principles deriving from the articles mentioned above is the principle of the protection of the sources of information and also the protection of personal information and the authenticity of the information provided. It is listed in the Ethical Code of the Bulgarian Media under Article 1 - Supplying the public with reliable information i.e. 1.3 Sources. The Ethical Code’s role in Bulgarian legislation will be further examined in Question 4 (4.3.1). Point 1.3.3 of the Ethical Code declares: We shall protect the identity of confidential sources of information. In addition The Official Statement of the NCJE which was discussed above in its first point states that in some cases journalist can directly apply the non-disclosure principle. Journalists may keep in secret the sources they used or are using when their disclosure will discredit the people presenting the information. Such decision should be made considering the obligations a journalist have to inform the public for the sources of the information and the obligations to the provider of the information. This on the other hand contravenes with the right given in Article 39 of the Constitution as an opinion and its express cannot serve as or be used to violate the right of person or for the perpetration of a crime, or the incitement of enmity or violence against anyone.¹⁹

We can come to the conclusion that restricted definition of the purpose of the protection of sources does not exist but can be extracted from the main principle of freedom of opinion.

¹⁶ 7/1996 of the Constitutional Court (Конституционен съд) of Republic of Bulgarian on case 1/1996

¹⁷ Legal basis of Media Law in Bulgaria.

¹⁸ Referred to as UDHR. Article 19 - Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

¹⁹ The Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria 1991, Article 39 (2).

4.3. The Scope of Protection of Other Media Actors and Anyone Else

Article 38 of the Constitution declares that “no one may be persecuted or restricted in his rights because of his convictions, or be obligated or forced to provide information about his own or another person's convictions”. The Radio and Television Act develops the legal basis of the fundamental human right, presented in the abovementioned Article. It declares under Article 15 (1) that radio and television operators shall not be obliged to disclose their sources of information except in some cases and under Article 15 (2) that journalists shall not be obliged to disclose the sources of information not only before the audience but also before the management of an operator except in some cases mentioned in the Act. From this we can come to the conclusion that journalist; radio and television operators are equal regarding the right of non-disclosure, which is an obligation as well.²⁰

5. What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources? How are the laws implemented? How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?

5.1 Legal Safeguards

5.1.1 The Radio and Television Act and Access to Public Information Act

In contrast to others European Constitutions²¹, the right to protect journalists' sources and its legal safeguards finds its basis in the Constitution of Bulgaria in the guarantee of freedom of expression.²² However, there is no explicit provision for such protection. This goal is accomplished at a legislative level.

The legal basis of Bulgarian media law, as it was mentioned above, is the Radio and Television Act (RTA), aimed to transpose the revised Television without Frontiers Directive (TWF).²³ Since then RTA has been amended twenty times and today it contains updated rules and principles regarding the better protection of the freedom and pluralism of speech and information. However, it's disputable whether the scope of this act includes the protection of the press media. That is a matter of concern because RTA is the special law in this field and there is no other

²⁰ The Standpoint of the National Council, Decision 1

²¹ For instance the Constitutions of Portugal and Macedonia. The Constitution of Macedonia Art.16 Para.6 “The right to protect a source of information in the mass media is guaranteed”.

²² The Constitution of Republic of Bulgaria (1991) Art.39 para.1

²³ Nelly Ognyanova, Bulgarian media policy and law: How much Europeanization, Central European Journal of Communication 2 (2009) ISSN 1899-5101

domestic legislation, which safeguards the right of the journalist in the press media not to reveal the identity of their informants.

According to Article 15 of RTA, radio and television operators shall not be obliged to disclose their sources of information to the Council for electronic media. Nevertheless, this provision doesn't provide absolute privilege but admits exception in cases of "pending court proceedings or pending proceedings on a claim of affected person." Thus, the text is concise and gives the opportunity for different interpretations.

Another paragraph of the same article²⁴ stipulates that journalists are obliged to keep secret the source of information if this is explicitly requested by the person who has provided it. This rule raises inconsistency. On one hand, the Radio and Television Act imposes upon journalists the duty of not disclosing the identity of their sources, on the other there aren't envisaged any special privileges for protection in case of disclosure order. In this situation the only way journalist could avoid revealing their confidential sources is by self-regulatory mechanisms.

A further legal safeguard is offered in some circumstances through the Access to Public Information Act. In accordance to Article 19 the access to information on mass media should be carried out while observing and balancing the principles of the confidentiality of the sources of the mass media, which provide information on condition of anonymity.

5.2.2 Procedure laws

There are different methods journalists to be forced to divulge the names of their confidential sources. They can be treated with libel lawsuit or summoned as witnesses. The latter one is a consequence of the lack of efficient procedure provisions for protection of sources.

Bulgarian procedure codes, penal and civil, don't contain any special articles related either to an entitlement to journalists to keep the secrecy of their source or the circumstances in which such disclosure is admissible.

The Bulgarian Penal Procedure Code observes the circumstances in which witnesses shall not be obligated to testify²⁵. The right of not revealing sources of information is envisaged only in cases when the disclosure might incriminate the witness or their relatives in the commission of crime. Moreover, in accordance to Article 120 Para.4 a witness who refuses to testify outside the hypothese of Article 121 shall be punished by fine of up to BGN one thousand. According to Article 166 of The Civil Procedure Code determines that refusal to testify is inadmissible but witness could refuse to answer to a particular question if in this way would incur of inflict immediate damage, defamation or criminal prosecution. This article will be also applied in case the source is already known, but the journalist refuses to divulge further information. It comes clear that there are no explicit legal safeguards for protection of journalists'. This however, was developed with the practice of the court. In the light of the abovementioned Constitutional decision 7/1996 is the practice of the Bulgarian court, including the very recent one, which recalls: “that freedom of expression constitutes one of the foundations of the democratic society and the safeguards to be provided to the press are of particular importance. The press must not overstep the boundaries set out inter alia in the interests of protecting the reputation and rights of others, but its duty is to impart information and ideas of public interest. Not only does the press have as its task to distribute such information and ideas, but also the public has a right to receive them. If this were not so, the press would not be able to play its vital role of 'public watchdog'. Journalists have the right not to disclose the identity of their sources, behavior cannot be defined as illegal because it is one of the guarantees of freedom of speech and the public role of the media to disclose and present relevant information.”²⁶ The court cites Goodwin v. United Kingdom, Sunday Times v. United Kingdom, Lingens v. Austria in this and other cases, related to protection of journalistic sources.²⁷

²⁴ The Radio and Television Act Art. 15 Para.4

²⁵ Penal Procedure Code Art.121

The Bulgarian court applies those ideas stating: “the established journalistic practices of checking authenticity of published information and the prior involvement of the person concerned before publication is a main condition in order not to be disturbed the balance between the right to information and protection of privacy”.²⁸

5.3 Self – regulations

The self – regulation system in the mass media in Bulgaria has been placed on a good foundation, but it is still not widely accepted either by professional circles or the public at large.

5.3.1 Codes of Ethics and the National Council of Journalism Ethics

Bulgaria is one of the first Eastern European countries in which major media owners from the Union of Publishers in Bulgaria have become involved in the creation and implementation of a media self-regulatory mechanism, the Code of Ethics for the Bulgarian media, signed in 2004.²⁹ The Ethical Committees that were set up to oversee compliance with the Code, however, rule only on cases related to media that have signed the document. Thus emerges the paradox – having rules only for radio and television, but not for print media, and rules valid only for the

²⁶ Decision from 11.04.2016 of Sofia City Court on case 16570/2015

²⁷ Decision 3614/2013 of Sofia City Court on case 29/2012; Decision 17/2011 of the Supreme Court of Cassation on case 641/2010

²⁸ Ibid. 3614/2013

²⁹ SEENPM, Freedom of speech in South East Europe: Media independence and self-regulation, 2007

signatories of this Code. As a result a considerable number of media outlets are excluded from the scope of both legal and self-regulations.³⁰

The Union of Publishers in Bulgaria has also contributed to the establishment of self-regulatory body – the National Council for Journalism Ethics. The National Council for Journalistic Ethics was officially registered as a foundation in 2005. One of the main goals of the Council, according to its Statute, is to strengthen the freedom of speech, safeguard journalists' rights and protect editorial sources of information. In 2014, the Bulgarian Media Union published a Code of Ethics and Professionalism of the Bulgarian Media. Representatives of the Bulgarian media, gravitating to New Media Group, which vigorously refused to sign the Code, adopted in 2004, signed the Code of Ethics and Professionalism. The problem that comes in mind in this context is that the existence of two alternative codes can hardly be taken as a positive and adequate development but rather a step towards imposing self-regulation for private benefits. This inference is suggested by the absence of a body to supervise the implementation of the second code.

In accordance to the Ethical Code of the Bulgarian Media, journalists are obliged to protect the identity of confidential sources of information³¹. In March 24 2015, the National Council for Journalistic Ethics adopted a Statement, based on this matter. Thus, the Council stressed the importance of this not only right but obligation of journalists and gave additional explanations about its content. In the spirit of European principles and standards the Statement states that the protection of sources could be put to restrains only after the observation of the prerequisites of legitimacy, proportionality, necessity and judgment, made by independent and unprejudiced court.

The Code also treats the parameters of what is known as public interest. It's states that a publication or a broadcast is on the public interests only if it protects public health, safety, and security; helps the prevention and the disclosure of serious crimes and the abuse of power, or prevents the public from the danger of being seriously misled. There are numerous positive examples of the practice of the court about decisions in which the Court takes into consideration the violation of the Code and states that: "According to the Ethical Code of the Bulgarian Media, when a journalist exports facts, which affect the honor of another person, he or she must verify their authenticity before they are spread. Legal provisions for the manner in which this test is performed are not implemented. Established perception is the affirmation that the journalist has received confirmation from at least two independent sources. The legal significance of the due diligence is manifested when, despite its performance, the facts prove untrue. In this case, if the check is made bona fide, guilt shall be excluded and the journalist shall not be responsible for damages caused by the offending act.”³² The court takes into consideration that the journalist has the right not disclose her or his sources, when necessary.³³

³⁰ Ivan Radev, "A necessary upgrade and restart of the media self-regulation process in Bulgaria" (Association of European Journalists-Bulgaria, 12 May 2014) <<http://www.cej-bulgaria.org/eng/p.php?post=1672/>> accessed 2 March 2016 [Bulgaria]

³¹ Ethical Code of the Bulgarian Media Art.1.3.3 "We shall protect the identity of confidential sources of information".

6. In the respective national legislation are the limits of non-disclosure of the information in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7? What are the procedures applied? Is the disclosure limited to exceptional circumstances, taking into consideration vital public or individual interests at stake? Do the authorities first search for and apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the right of journalists not to disclose information?

6.1 Limits of non-disclosure of the information in ECHR and Recommendation No R (2000) 7.

The right of journalists to protect and not disclose their sources is not absolute. In the case of Goodwin v United Kingdom (1996), the Court of Human Rights in paragraph 39 is noted that:

Having regard to the importance of the protection of journalistic sources for press freedom in a democratic society and the potentially chilling effect an order of source disclosure has on the exercise of that freedom, such a measure cannot be compatible with Article 10 of the Convention unless it is justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest.

Article 10, paragraph 2 of the Convention outlines the major limitations of non-disclosure of the information, which include sufficiently vital and serious circumstances in the scope of protection of national security, human life, health, morals etc. In the case of Sunday Times v. The United Kingdom, (no. 2), para. 50 the Court of Human Rights explains the meaning of the expression “necessary in a democratic society”, used in Article 10 para. 2 of the ECHR, which, according to the Court, implies the existence of a “pressing social need”. The Court establishes that the Contracting States should have a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether such a need exists, but it goes hand in hand with a European supervision, embracing both the law and the decisions applying it, even those given by independent courts.³⁴

³² Decision 1316/2013 of Sofia City Court on case 557/2007

³³ Decision 85/2012 of the Supreme Court of Casation on case 1486/2011

³⁴ Sunday Times v. The United Kingdom (no.2), para. 50 (c), 26 November 1991 <<http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-57708>> accessed March 03 2016

In that matter Recommendation No R (2000) 7 in Principle 3 reaffirms these requirements and does not attempt to amend Article 10 of the Convention. It recommends common standards to be applied by national authorities in member States³⁵, which corresponds to the content of the phrase “prescribed by law” (Article 10 para.2 of the ECHR). As a rule, this would mean a written and public law adopted by the Parliament³⁶.

6.2 Applicable legislation in Bulgaria

As it was said, in Bulgaria the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information in case they received the information confidentially, which is implemented in Recommendation No R (2000) 7, is not explicitly listed in the constitutional regulations.

The Bulgarian national law in Article 34, 39, 40 of the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria only outlines the cases in which the freedom and confidentiality of correspondence, the freedom of expression and the right for access to information are limited. These restrictions are “permissible solely with authorization from the judiciary, where this is necessitated for detection or prevention of grave crime” (see article 34, Section 2 of the Constitution). Furthermore, the freedom of expression and information “shall not be used to the detriment of the rights and reputation of others, or for incitement to a change of the constitutionally established order by force, to the commission of criminal offences, or for incitement to animosity or to personal violence” (see article 39 Section 2 of the Constitution). If we may use the method of *analogia legis*³⁷ we may assume that the mentioned limitations may also apply to journalists’ right not to disclose their sources of information.

As mentioned above, according to Article 15 of RTA the radio and television operators shall not be obliged to disclose their sources of information of the Council for electronic media. That is also noted in the Ethical Code of the Bulgarian Media³⁸. However, our Civil Procedure Code and Code of Criminal Procedure, which regulate the interrogation of witnesses, do not give journalists the privilege not to disclose their sources of information. Moreover, Article 290 Section 1 of the Penal Code says “who, before a court or other respective body of the authority, as a witness, verbally or in writing, deliberately confirms a falsehood or conceals the truth shall be punished for perjury by imprisonment of up to five years”. As it can be seen journalists are not only deprived of special privilege of not identifying their sources but they may be sanctioned for not doing so.

³⁵ Explanatory memorandum to Recommendation No. R (00) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information (Adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 8 March 2000 at the 701st meeting of the Ministers' Deputies)

³⁶ Monica Macovei, Freedom of expression: A guide to the implementation of Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights, Council of Europe, January 2004, p.30

³⁷ Analogia legis is considered an interpretive argument, which refers to the application of a legal norm regulating a case to an essentially similar case for which no legal norm exists

³⁸ Article 1.3.3 of Ethical Code of the Bulgarian Media.

Another way in which a source can be revealed is by searching a journalist's home and office and actions concerning the private or business premises, belongings or correspondence of journalists or their employers or personal data related to their professional work.³⁹ In the respective national legislation this matter is arranged in the Code of Criminal Procedure (CCP)⁴⁰. Neither of its provisions provides special regulations when these particular actions are not directed towards journalists or the media or any other national acts. According to Article 159 CCP upon request of the court or the bodies of pre-trial proceedings, all institutions, legal persons, officials and citizens shall be obligated to preserve and hand over all objects, papers, computerized data, including traffic data that may be of significance to the case. In pre-trial proceedings search and seizure shall be performed with an authorisation by a judge from the respective first instance court or a judge from the first-instance court in the area of which the action is taken, upon request of the prosecutor.⁴¹ In cases of urgency, where this is the only possible way to collect and keep evidence, the bodies of pre-trial proceedings may perform physical examination without authorisation, but not later than 24 hours thereafter⁴², following a decision of the court which is trying the case⁴³. This procedure corresponds to the international standards in this field.

7. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 the following principles should be respected when the necessity of disclosure is stated: absence of reasonable alternative measures, outweighing legitimate interest (protection of human life, prevention of major crime, defence of a person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime). Under which criteria can the interest in the disclosure outweigh the interest in the non-disclosure?

In Bulgaria, the principles are implemented in the national law system. They take form in The Radio and Television Act, which serves as a codifying tool that is trying to ensure the rights and the legal position of the journalists and the providers of information to the public. The Act is also used to regulate the status of the Council for Electronic Media, which is the main regulatory, body regarding the electronic media services.

The Radio and Television Act is codifying basically the entirety of the law related to the journalism and mass media services, since it contains most (yet not all) of the legal rules, relating media service providers. Yet we are lacking the working mechanisms to protect, to defend journalists from the investigating bodies. We are also lacking the measures to make sure that everyone that is trying to provide information in the form of any media service or in any media form gets enough protection.

³⁹ Recommendation No R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers, Principle 6

⁴⁰ Code of Criminal Procedure, Article 159-165

⁴¹ Ibid., Article 161, Section 1

⁴² Ibid., Section 2

⁴³ Ibid., Section 3

Bulgaria is a member of the Council of Europe and is bound to the European Convention of Human Rights, the Convention does indeed have a direct legal effect, and so it has the required legal force so that the authorities or the jurisdictions can apply the act. This effect is implemented in numerous cases. For example, Sofia Appeal Court in a case for insult proclaims: "The court of first instance correctly found in its reasoning that, according to the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR), one of the basic principles of free journalism is failure to disclose sources of information. In this sense, the preservation of information sources is one of the guarantees of freedom of expression, particularly freedom of expression in article 10 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and based Freedoms (ECHR)."⁴⁴

8. In the light of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights how do national courts apply the respective laws with regard to the right to protect sources? In particular, how do they balance the different interests at stake?

8.2 Application

Modern legislations must guarantee that in every society all kind of matter could be discussed freely. It is not considered a violation when the information is subject of a case. It is proved that revealing is more important than protecting the source, if there is no existence of other ways of receiving the information and if assesement by unprejudiced court or organisation is made. The domestic court cites in numerous cases the principles and the case-law of the ECtHR.⁴⁵ In decision 212/2013 on case 5560/2012 Sofia City Court states that: "the case-law in the country and that of the ECtHR is constant." Citing the practice of the ECtHR including Lingens v. Austria, the court has reached the following conclusion: "It is necessary strictly and accurately to distinguish between facts and opinions. The existence of facts can be demonstrated (shown) while the truthfulness of the assessment is not subject to proof. Regarding the legal assessments, this requirement cannot be met and is an attack against freedom of expression." Moreover, in the same decision the ECHR underlined that "the limits of permissible criticism of a politician are wider than criticism of individuals." In this sense, and Decision 7/1996 the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Bulgaria has advocated that "... statements that affect the activity of state bodies or constitute criticism of political figures, government officials or the government, deserve a high level of protection. Hence it can be concluded that the government as a whole, as well as political figures and public officials can be subjected to public criticism at a level higher than that suffered by individuals." The decision is based on the practice of the ECtHR in correspondence to the Bulgarian practice. Revealing information, which is possessed by the government, is crucial for the democratic societies and allows the citizenship to observe the activity of the secular power. Sometimes the public interest is so massive that it overcomes the obligations for privacy policy imposed by the law.

⁴⁴ Decision 212/2013 of the Sofia City Court on case 5560/2012

⁴⁵ Decision 941/2013 of the Sofia City Court on case 2400/2013; 4939/2013 on case 26/2012; 3614/2013 on case 29/2012; 18311/2014 on case 16594/2013

8.3 Balance of Interests

Any kind of interferences with privacy should be assessed legally and proportionally. Depending on the competing interests at stake the degree of discretion seems to vary. National courts are obliged of being well organised in interest balancing. If the standard of Article 8 were to be followed it would still demand national courts to provide horizontal effect of the right to privacy. The Court points out that the machinery of protection established by the Convention is subsidiary to the national systems safeguarding human rights.

A journalist may reveal his source if only a vital public or individual interest is at stake. In some cases the more important the violated interest is, the more important it will be to protect the sources. Courts may only order disclosure when in the particular case the information is of a great level of importance and conflicting interests are at stake.

In most national legislations the party who wants disclosure should indicate interest and argument that the information is of a great importance. The courts should scale the risk of disclosure to freedom of expression. The law standards and requirements, both international and national, must carefully be followed and balanced. The domestic court makes a test for balance, taking into "consideration the provisions of art. 10 of the ECHR, which regulates freedom of expression, as long as it corresponds to the constitutional right to freedom of expression enshrined in Article 39, para. 2 of the Constitution of Bulgaria. Para. 2 gives the limitations of the right, which shall not be used to the detriment of the rights and reputations of others. In deciding whether the right to protection of reputation of citizens must prevail over the right to freedom of expression, the court must always determine what is the balance between the right to freedom of expression in the public interest and the need to respect the right of honor, dignity and reputation of citizens. The criteria for achieving the right balance are proof of the presence or absence of good faith on the part of the journalist. "Good faith" involves applying at least minimal effort on the part of the authors to verify any information before its publication. The need for a thorough examination and confirmation of the factual claims, increased by strengthening the defamatory nature of the information highest expression of which is the attribution of a crime. Only when the journalist makes the necessary verification of the authenticity of the information according to the established journalistic practice, internal rules of the Bar or publisher using objectively existing and possible sources of information, there is professional integrity, which excludes criminal or civil liability for defamation."⁴⁶

⁴⁶ Decision 212/2013 of Sofia City Court on case 212/2013

9. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information? Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

9.1 The Special Surveillance Means Act

The Special Surveillance Means Act (The SSMA) presently is the principal legislative enactment regulating the use of special means of surveillance and was adopted in October 1997.

The SSMA governs the conditions for and the manner of use of special means of surveillance, as well as the control of their use and of the results obtained thereby. It defines special means of surveillance as technical devices which can be used for creating photographs, audio and video recordings and marked objects, as well as the methods for operating them.

By section 3(1) of the SSMA, special means of surveillance may be used when necessary to prevent or uncover grave crime (Article 93 § 7 of the Criminal Code of 1968 defines a "grave" crime as one punishable by more than five years' imprisonment), if the requisite intelligence cannot be obtained through other means. Section 4 provides that special means of surveillance may also be used for activities relating to national security.

Special means of surveillance may be used against:

- Individuals suspected, on the basis of the information available, of planning, committing, or having committed grave crimes
- Individuals who might be unwittingly involved in the above by the suspected perpetrators.
- Individuals and objects related with national security (section 12(1)).
- Individuals who have agreed to that in writing, to protect their lives or property (section 12(2)).

Only the following bodies may request the use of special means of surveillance and draw on the intelligence obtained thereby, in the spheres of their respective competencies:

- The central "Security" and "Police" services of the Ministry of Internal Affairs, as well as the national and territorial directorates of that Ministry;
- The "Military Information" and "Military Police and Military CounterIntelligence" services of the Ministry of Defence;
- The National Intelligence Service;
- The National Investigation Service, the Sofia Investigation Service and the regional investigation services;

- The Prosecutor General, the Supreme Cassation Prosecutor's Office, the Supreme Administrative Prosecutor's Office, the Military Appellate Prosecutor's Office, the appellate prosecutor's offices, the Sofia City Prosecutor's Office and the regional and - regional military prosecutor's offices (section 13(1) and- (2))⁴⁷.

9.2 Researches

In the end of 2000 the Supreme Cassation Prosecutor's Office carried out a special inquiry on the use of special means of surveillance by the Ministry of Internal Affairs during the period January 1 1999 – January 1 2001. The report stated that the overall number of warrants for the use of special means of surveillance during the period January 1 1999 – January 1 2001 was just over 10,000, and that did not include tapping of mobile phones. Out of these, only 267 or 269 had subsequently supplied evidence for use in criminal proceedings. In 243 cases special means of surveillance had been used against persons in respect of whom there had been no grounds for suspecting them for committing a serious intentional offence. In a number of cases the orders for the deployment of such means had not been signed by the Minister of Internal Affairs himself, but by unknown persons on his behalf. In 36 cases the dates of the applications for warrants and of the warrants themselves had been modified. In 28 cases the warrants had not been assigned a number. In some cases the warrants had authorised measures implemented more than twenty-four hours before their issue. In two cases the persons in respect of whom the warrants had been issued were not the persons under investigation.

In an interview published by the daily Trud on January 26 2001 the Minister of Internal Affairs said that during his thirteen months in office he had signed 4,000 orders for the use of special means of surveillance.

During the period December 2002 – February 2003 various newspaper publications reported a number of cases where it was alleged that the services of the Ministry of Internal Affairs had unlawfully used special means of surveillance. The allegations included illegal tapping of the telephones of opposition leaders, journalists, a former constitutional court judge, and other judges. In an interview published on 11 December 2002 the Minister of Justice stated that “a tremendously high number of wiretappings take place in Bulgaria, but apparently for aims different from those of the criminal process”.⁴⁸

A report carried out by the Bulgarian newspaper “Sega” found that during the period of July 7 2014 – December 31 2014 in the Sofia City Court the number of applications for warrants for the use of special means of surveillance amounted to 1647. The refusals for issuing a warrant were just 23. During the period July 7 2015 – November 9 2015 during the presidency of the new president of the Sofia City Court the number of applications were 156. 63 orders were issued and 63 were refused to be issued. A 7-time decline of the issued warrants is observed.⁴⁹ According to The National Bureau 9 were the people who were unlawfully monitored.⁵⁰

⁴⁷ Association for European Integration and Human Rights and Ekimdzhev v. Bulgaria, no. 62540/00, 28 June 2007

⁴⁸ Ibid, para 52.

In the case of *Weber and Saravia v. Germany*⁵¹, the Court reiterated its case law and noted that legislation which by its mere existence entailed a threat of surveillance for all those to whom it might be applied necessarily struck at freedom of communication between users of the telecommunications services and thereby amounted in itself to an interference with the exercise of the applicants' rights under Article 8, irrespective of any measures actually taken against them. This principle was applied in the *Kennedy v. the United Kingdom*⁵² judgment, in which it was stipulated that in order to assess whether an individual could claim an interference as a result of the mere existence of legislation permitting secret surveillance measures, the Court had to have regard to the availability of any remedies at the national level and the risk of secret surveillance measures being applied to the person concerned. Where there was no possibility of challenging the alleged application of secret surveillance measures at domestic level, widespread suspicion and concern among the general public that secret surveillance powers were being abused could not be said to be unjustified. In such cases, even where the actual risk of surveillance was low, there was a greater need for scrutiny by the Court.⁵³

9.3 Bulgarian Court Practice

In a final judgment from February 12 2004 (реш. № 1195 от 12 февруари 2004 г. по адм. д. № 9881/2003 г.), given pursuant to an appeal by a person who had been refused information on whether the use of special means of surveillance had been authorised against him during the period January 1 1996 – November 1 2001, the Supreme Administrative Court held that while Article 41 of the Constitution enshrined the right to obtain information from a state body, that right was subject to limitations when, for instance, this information was a state or an official secret. It was apparent from section 33 of the SSMA that information about the use of special means of surveillance was not to be disclosed. The refusal to provide the requested information was thus compatible with Article 32 § 2 of the Constitution and Article 8 of the Convention.

⁴⁹ Doroteya Dachkova, Исканията за СРС са намалели драстично след оставката на Янева (Sega newspaper, 23 November 2015) <<http://www.segabg.com/article.php?id=779637/>> accessed 04.03.2016 [Bulgarian]

⁵⁰ Marieta Nikolaeva, Деветима незаконно подслушвани у нас през 2015 г. (BTV News, 29 November 2015) <http://btvnovinite.bg/article/bulgaria/devetima-nezakonno-podslushvani-u-nas-prez-2015-g.html/>> accessed 04.03.2016 [Bulgarian]

⁵¹ Weber and Saravia v. Germany (dec.), no. 54934/00, § 78, ECHR 2006-XI

⁵² Kennedy v. the United Kingdom, no. 26839/05, 18 May 2010.

⁵³ National security and European case law,

<https://www.coe.int/t/dghl/standardsetting/dataprotection/TPD_documents/Jurisprudence%20CEDH_En%20%28final%29.pdf> accessed 14.04..2016.

In a final judgment of May 15 2004 (реш. № 4408 от 15 май 2004 г. по адм. д. № 996/2004 г.), given pursuant to an appeal by the same person as in case no. 9881/2003 (see paragraph 49 above), concerning a further refusal to inform him of measures of covert surveillance against him, the Supreme Administrative Court held that his request for such information had properly been denied, because the information relating to special means of surveillance and the intelligence obtained by using them was a state secret within the meaning of section 25 of the PCIA and points 6 and 8 of part II of Schedule No. 1 to the PCIA. On the other hand, the eventual intelligence obtained pursuant to a warrant to use special means of surveillance, as well as the warrant itself, were an official secret within the meaning of section 26(1) of the PCIA. This followed also from the prohibition to divulge information about special means of surveillance laid down in section 33 of the SSMA. The court went on to hold that the fact that the use of special means of surveillance could only be authorised by the presidents of the regional courts was sufficient to ensure independent judicial review of the activities of the executive and provided sufficient safeguards against unwarranted restriction on the citizens' rights.⁵⁴

9.4 The European Court of Human Rights Court Practice

In the case Association for European Integration and Human Rights and Ekimdzhiev v. Bulgaria, no. 62540/00 of 28 June 2007 The European Court of Human Rights analyses the Bulgarian legislation on secret surveillance measures, whether its norms are clear, precise and foreseeable and if there are efficient guarantees against the risk of abuse. In its judgement the Court in paragraphs 70-73 accepts that the SSMA provides a legal basis for the interference and is accessible to the person concerned, who must moreover be able to foresee its consequences for him or her, and is compatible with the rule of law. However, regarding the third requirement - the law's foreseeability and compatibility with the rule of law, the Court states several shortcomings such as the lack of external control over the use of secret surveillance measures, lack of regular report to an independent body or to the general public on the overall operation of the system, the persons subjected to secret surveillance are not notified of this fact at any point in time and under any circumstances, lack of sufficient guarantees against the risk of abuse. The court finds that: "the system of secret surveillance in Bulgaria is, to say the least, overused, which may in part be due to the inadequate safeguards which the law provides"⁵⁵

9.5 Anti-terrorism Legislation

The Law on Measures against the Financing of Terrorism is promulgated in State Gazette in 2003. The Act prevents and detects actions by natural persons, legal persons, groups and organizations that are directed at financing terrorism by blocking/freezing of funds, financial assets and other property and prohibition to provide financial services, funds, financial assets or other property (Article 2 – 3 The Law on Measures Against the Financing of Terrorism).

⁵⁴ Association for European Integration and Human Rights and Ekimdzhiev v. Bulgaria, no. 62540/00, para 49-50, 28 June 2007

⁵⁵ Ibid, para 92

The information necessary to achieve the purposes of this Act shall be collected, processed, systematized, analysed, stored, used and provided by the State Agency for National Security (Article 4, ibid).

According to Article 5 a list of the natural persons, legal persons, groups and organisations in respect whereof the measures under this Act should be applied is made.

10. Can Journalists rely on Encryption and Anonymity Online to Protect Themselves and their Sources against Surveillance?

The interception of communications constitutes an interference with the right to privacy of those communications under Article 8 ECHR, whether made via email, phone, text message, or social media, as it was ruled by the European Court of Human Rights in *Klass v. Germany*⁵⁶, *Weber and Saravia v. Germany*⁵⁷ and *Kennedy v. United Kingdom*⁵⁸ cases. The same is true in respect of accessing communications data, or metadata (for example *Malone v. United Kingdom*⁵⁹). The same concerns the interception of communications aimed to obtain information about journalists' sources which has always been regarded as one of the types of intrusive surveillance impairing internationally recognized human rights, including freedom of expression and the right to privacy and therefore, requiring limitation in its use.⁶⁰

Freedom of expression is established under Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.⁶¹ Right to privacy is established under Article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

In 2012, the United Nations Human Rights Council adopted a landmark resolution affirming “the same rights that people have offline must also be protected online”.⁶² It acknowledged the 2011 reports on ‘the right to freedom of opinion and expression exercised through the Internet’ by UN Special Rapporteur on the Promotion and Protection of the Right to Freedom of Opinion and Expression Frank La Rue, which highlighted how freedom of expression can be

⁵⁶ <<https://stewartroom.co.uk/wp-content/uploads/2014/07/Cases-ECHR-Klass.pdf>> accessed 1 March 2016

⁵⁷ <<http://www.bailii.org/eu/cases/ECHR/2006/1173.html>> accessed 1 March 2016

⁵⁸ <<http://www.bailii.org/eu/cases/ECHR/2010/682.html>> accessed 1 March 2016

⁵⁹ <<https://stewartroom.co.uk/wp-content/uploads/2014/07/Cases-ECHR-Malone.pdf>> accessed 1 March 2016

⁶⁰ “Interception of journalists communication” <<https://internetlawreview.wordpress.com/tag/echr/>> accessed 1 March 2016

⁶¹ Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, (23 March 1976), International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. <www.ohchr.org/en/professionalinterest/pages/ccpr.aspx> accessed 1 March 2016

⁶² United Nations Human Rights Council, “The promotion, protection and enjoyment of human rights on the Internet” (16 July 2012) <http://ap.ohchr.org/documents/dpage_e.aspx?si=A/HRC/RES/20/8> accessed 1 March 2016

fostered as well as violated through the internet.⁶³ La Rue warned of 'increased restrictions on the Internet through the use of increasingly sophisticated technologies to block content monitor and identify activists and critics, criminalization of legitimate expression, and adoption of restrictive legislation to justify such measures'.⁶⁴ La Rue also emphasized the importance of 'private, secure, and anonymous' communications, describing the 'chilling effect' of excluding individuals from vital social spheres and 'dissuading the free expression of information and ideas' when restrictions are placed on people's ability to communicate anonymously.⁶⁵ Later in 2013, La Rue's 'surveillance' report was further reinforced by a UN General Assembly resolution on the right to privacy in the digital age. It called on states to respect the right to privacy in digital communications and take measures to prevent violations, including a review of existing laws and practices and the establishment of oversight mechanisms.⁶⁶

Bulgarian authorities have not yet enacted a law, which explicitly stipulates the right of journalists to encryption and anonymity online in order to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance. So the rights to privacy and freedom of opinion and expression shall apply to secure online communication of journalists, specifically by encryption or anonymity. The Electronic Communications Act, the Protection of Classified Information Act and the Ordinance on Cryptographic Security of Classified Information regulate the work of the State Security Agency and the legal procedures in Bulgaria, which provide for individuals and organizations to use encryption methods to protect online communication and messages and anonymous online communication and transmission of information. As The Permanent Mission of the Republic of Bulgaria to the United Nations Office and other International organizations in Geneva said: "There is no regulation prohibiting persons or organisations to use specific software encryption applications, special software for Internet anonymity or software tools for anonymous communication."⁶⁷ However, there are some restrictions. According to the Electronic Communications Act, radio equipment and/or electronic communication devices including hardware devices to the equipment or the terminal devices for encryption of electronic messages and using cryptographic keys longer than 56 bits are produced or imported after registration in the State Agency for National Security. Cryptographic devices for banking transactions, smart cards, devices for encoding television signals, mobile phones without built-in additional crypto

⁶³ Frank La Rue, "Report of the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression. (10 August 2011) (United Nations General Assembly document A/66/290). <<http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Issues/Opinion/A.66.290.pdf>> accessed 1 March 2016

⁶⁴ Frank La Rue, "Report of the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression". Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights. (A/HRC/17/27). <http://www2.ohchr.org/english/bodies/hrcouncil/docs/17session/A_HRC.17.27_en.pdf> accessed 1 March 2016

⁶⁵ La Rue, A/HRC/23/40, op. cit., p. 7

⁶⁶ United Nations General Assembly, "The right to privacy in the digital age" (20 November 2013) (UN Doc A/C.3/68/L.45/Rev.1. <http://www.un.org/ga/search/view_doc.asp?symbol=A/C.3/68/L.45/Rev.1> accessed 1 March 2016

⁶⁷ <<http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Issues/Opinion/Communications/States/Bulgaria.pdf>> accessed 1 March 2016 [Bulgarian]

module and cryptographic means used by agencies or other organization with diplomatic status are not subject to registration. The legislation provides sanctions for the persons who produce or import radio equipment and/or electronic communication devices without necessary registration.

The problem of the rights to privacy and freedom of opinion and expression in Bulgaria is regulated in the Bulgarian Constitution, data protection and criminal legislation. In 1981, The Council of Europe adopted Convention №108 for the Protection of Individuals with regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data, which has been ratified by the Republic of Bulgaria in 2002. Most constitutions adopted since 1990 contain provisions on the rights of access, control and data protection. In The Bulgarian Constitution these rights are addressed in Article 32, 33 and 34. They relate to privacy and family life of citizens, prohibition of attack against citizen's honor, dignity and reputation, prohibition tracking the use of photography, film recording or subjects to other similar actions without citizen's knowledge or despite his disagreement, inviolability of the home, freedom rights and secrecy of correspondence and other communications. With the Personal Data Protection act, which was adopted in 2000, Bulgaria transposed the principles and norms of Directive 95/46/EU harmonizing its domestic legislation with the European Union's legislation.

The Access to Public Information Act also protects the sources of information. Article 19 stipulates that "the access to information under Article 18 is being applied at the same time with keeping and balancing the principles for transparency and economic freedom and the principles for protection of the personal data, the trade secret and the confidentiality of the sources of information of the media, who have agreed to disclose information on the condition of confidentiality." The principle of protection of sources of information was also laid down in the Ethical code of the Bulgarian media, where in 1.3.3, it is written: „We will not disclose our confidential sources of information." In a decision, taken on March 24 2015, the National Council for Journalistic Ethics has made a statement on the topic: „Journalists bear not just the right, but also the obligation to protect their sources, whenever they are confidential. The right for protection of sources may be a subject to restrictions only when the requirements for legality, proportionality, and necessity in the democratic society are met, and after a decision of an independent and unbiased court." The right of citizens to encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves against surveillance is laid down in the Criminal Code of the Republic of Bulgaria under Article 145a, Article 171 and Article 171a.

In 2015, the Criminal Code and in particular Article 171a was amended - unlawful storage of traffic data shall be punished by deprivation of liberty of up to three years or probation. So far this punishment was applied only to their illegal acquisition, disclosure and dissemination. Bulgaria have to draw up guidelines for public authorities and private service providers concerning the protection of the confidentiality of journalists' sources in the context of the interception or disclosure of computer data and traffic data of computer networks in accordance with Articles 16 and 17 of the Convention on Cybercrime and Articles 8 and 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

In order to protect the rights to privacy and freedom of opinion and expression of individuals, the Supreme Administrative Court Decision №13627/11.12.2008 annulled Article 5 of Regulation 40/2008 for the categories of data and the order in which they are stored and provide for the needs of security and detection of crime. The text formulated this way does not set conditions preventing abuse of the opportunity to violate constitutionally guaranteed rights of citizens. According to the court in the repealed provision there is a lack of clarity about guaranteeing the right to protection against unlawful interference in private and family life, which determines the controversy with Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, Article 32 and Article 34 of The Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria.

In 2010, the Electronic Communications Act was amended after the transposition of Directive 2006/24/EU related to telecommunications data retention. According to the Directive, member states had to store citizens' telecommunications data for a minimum of 6 months and at most 24 months. Under the directive the police and security agencies were able to request access to details such as IP address and time of use of every email, phone call and text message sent or received. Permission to access the information was granted only by a court. Practice for protecting the rights to privacy and freedom of opinion and expression is observed in 2015, when The Constitutional Court Decision №2/12.03.2015 declared for unconstitutional Articles 250a-250e, 251 and 251a of the Electronic Communications Act. Making this decision made free monitoring of the Internet illegal. This happened after on April 8 2014 the Court of Justice of the EU declared the Directive invalid in response to a case brought by Digital Rights Ireland against the Irish authorities.⁶⁸

The amended Electronic Communications Act adopted in October 2015 accepts the following rules: Data obtained from Internet or telephone monitoring will be stored for six months, not twelve as previously provided. There will be a judicial control over the requests for extension of the period for data storage. Monitoring is to be applied only in cases of heavy crimes. Authorities won't have the power to access users' data without a warrant. There will be no access to data when people are declared missing. Another measure provides for an independent state body to control the destruction of data after their storage period. This happened while governments in the UK, Germany, Australia, France and elsewhere are proposing or have passed surveillance laws that grant sweeping powers to mandate data retention and to access users' data without warrants.⁶⁹

Questions of surveillance are all more relevant in the context of the Internet, as the ongoing evolution of Internet technology has included the rapid development of equipment and techniques to monitor online communications.⁷⁰ For example, in the case of Bureau of Investigative Journalism and Alice Ross v. the United Kingdom, currently under examination, the applicants complain under Articles 8 and 10 of the Convention about the interception of communications,

⁶⁸ European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights on Data Retention across EU <<http://fra.europa.eu/en/theme/information-society-privacy-and-data-protection/data-retention>> accessed 1 March 2016

⁶⁹ <https://www.accessnow.org/despite-opposition-france-approves-dangerous-new-surveillance-law/> accessed 1 March 2016

⁷⁰ ECHR Research Division, "Internet case-law of the ECHR" http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Research_report_internet_ENG.pdf accessed 1 March 2016

including on the Internet.⁷¹ More precisely, they consider that the statutory regime in relation to the interception of external communications has affected their ability to undertake their work of investigative journalism without fear for the security of their communications. Ultimately, they argue this poses a risk to the public watchdog role of the press. Big Brother Watch and Others v. the United Kingdom (no. 58170/13) is another case in point. The applicants complain about the interception of communications by the intelligence services. This application, which is pending, concerns the compatibility with Article 8 of the collection, analysis, storage and destruction of the information thus intercepted.⁷²

11. Are whistle-blowers explicitly protected under the law protecting journalistic sources? Is there another practice protecting whistle-blowers? Is the legislation prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers?

11.1. Definition of "whistle-blower"

The concept of whistleblowing derived from the practice of the English police officer Bobby to report an offence by blowing a whistle⁷³. In the sense of Recommendation CM/Rec (2014) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member States on the protection of whistle-blowers, the term 'whistle-blower' is identified as "any person who reports or disclose information on a threat or harm to the public interest in the context of their work-based relationship, whether it be in the public or private sector". However, similar term to "whistle-blower" cannot be found in Bulgarian law and the term "signal" is used instead. In addition the term "investigative journalism" is applicable when the signals come from websites, journalists and reporters⁷⁴. Such variety of words often lead to confusion, especially when applied to non-English speaking countries like Bulgaria - problem that was recognized even by Council of Europe⁷⁵.

⁷¹ <<http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/fre?i=001-150946>> accessed 1 March 2016

⁷² <<http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/fre?i=001-140713>> accessed 1 March 2016

⁷³ Georgi Potchekanski, Whistleblowing - legal protection in Bulgaria <<http://east-legal.com/whistleblowing-in-bulgaria/>>

⁷⁴ Lauren Kierans, Providing an Alternative to Silence: Towards Greater Protection and Support for Whistle-blowers in the EU. Country Report: Bulgaria, Transparency International, p.3
<<http://www.asktheeu.org/en/request/994/response/5856/attach/5/Country%20report%20Bulgaria.pdf>>

⁷⁵ Pieter OMTIZT, Report on topic "The protection of 'whistle-blowers' by the Committee on legal affairs and Human Rights. Council of Europe, p.7 para.16
<<http://www.europarl.europa.eu/document/activities/cont/201105/20110518ATT19544/20110518ATT19544EN.pdf>>

11.2. Protection of Whistle-blowers in Bulgaria

Transparency International has classified the EU members according to their whistle-blower legal framework, according to which Bulgaria is part of the countries with none-to-very-limited provisions⁷⁶. When asked by Council of Europe about the applicable legislation that protects whistle-blowers, Bulgarian government has referred in its answer to the general provisions of PPC regarding witness protection law⁷⁷. In addition, there are also the provisions under the special Act of Protection of Individuals under Threat in Relation to Criminal Proceedings (APITRCP)⁷⁸. However, it should be noted that PPC covers only some aspects of the protection of whistle-blowers⁷⁹, but it does not cover all of them as the latter *"needs to start from the very moment he/she makes a disclosure and not only when a case comes to court"*⁸⁰ and obviously whistle-blowing will not always lead to commencement of litigation proceedings and in those cases the witnesses will be left unprotected.

Bulgaria does not have a specific law for the protection of whistle-blowers within the definition of Recommendation CM/Rec (2014) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member States on the protection of whistle-blowers, but has different general rules covering various aspects of whistle-blowing that can be applied to such cases. To begin with, there are separate provisions in APC and the Conflicts of Interests Prevention and Ascertainment Act. However, the main concern with them is that they refer only to the public administration or to conflict of interests for individuals occupying public offices and not to the private sector contrary to requirements of the Recommendation CM/Rec (2014) 7. Whistle-blowers in the private sector enjoy only the general protection against unlawful dismissal under the Labour Code in article 344, and the right to compensation against retaliation under the Law on Contracts and Obligations, but the law is inadequate and the compensation levels are far too low. Nevertheless, the mechanisms for protecting whistle-blowers against retaliation are not effective as the scope of these provisions is far too limited and the compensation that may be awarded under is far too restricted.

The applicable rules for whistle-blowers in the public sector can be found in the Administrative Procedure Code (APC). According to article 107(4) of the same code reports may be filed for

⁷⁶ Transparency International, Whistleblowing in Europe. Legal protections for whistle-blowers in the EU, p.8 <https://issuu.com/transparencymagazine/docs/2013_whistleblowingineurope_en>

⁷⁷ Pieter OMTIIZT, Report on topic "The protection of 'whistle-blowers' by the Committee on legal affairs and Human Rights. Council of Europe, p.9 para.27 <<http://www.europarl.europa.eu/document/activities/cont/201105/20110518ATT19544/20110518ATT19544EN.pdf>>

⁷⁸ For more details see Rabatlieva, Gergana – Comparative analysis of witness protection within the ICC and the Bulgarian Criminal Justice System, p.7-p.10 <<http://intralegalis.com/gallery/essay-comparative-analysis-of-the-witness-protection-within-icc-and-bulgarian-criminal-justice-system.docx>>

⁷⁹ Articles 121 and 123 of Penal Procedure Code (PPC) <http://www.vks.bg/english/vksen_p04_03.htm>

⁸⁰ Pieter OMTIIZT, Report on topic "The protection of 'whistle-blowers' by the Committee on legal affairs and Human Rights. Council of Europe, p.15 para.73 <<http://www.europarl.europa.eu/document/activities/cont/201105/20110518ATT19544/20110518ATT19544EN.pdf>>

the abuse of power and corruption, bad management of state or municipal property or other unlawful or inexpedient acts or omissions of administrative bodies and public officials in the respective administrations, which must be of such nature that could affect state or public interests, rights or legitimate interests of others. The APC under article 108 (1) also obliges the recipient body to conduct an internal check on foot of receiving the report. The main concern with these provisions is that they do not establish a specific system for protection of whistle-blowers besides the general rules cited above and the special rule of article 121 of the Civil Servant Act. The latter should be developed by the implementation of secondary legislation, namely within the internal rules and regulations of the relevant structures (ministries, agencies etc.)⁸¹. Noted, a step in the right direction is the protection from persecution under article 108(2) of the APC, which stipulates that no person can be persecuted for filing a claim pursuant to that legislation. It should be also stressed that the procedure via APC does not allow anonymous signals and at the same time the law does not contain rules on guaranteeing the confidentiality of the whistle-blower. Moreover, signals for offences committed more than two years ago are not accepted as per article 111(4) of the same code.

It is worth mentioning also the provisions of the Civil Servant Act as the Inspectorates within the ministries are the main bodies that are competent to receive signals for corruption and infringements and to perform internal checks pursuant to article 128(1). According to article 130 of the SCA they have to respect the confidentiality of the source, from which the signal has been received. It is also stated in article 132 that they are obliged to immediately report criminal offences that have come to their knowledge to the investigating authorities and to take the necessary steps to preserve the evidence of the crime. Similar provision also exists in the regarding the internal audit units under article 58 of the National Audit Office Act as they have to report all data of fraud committed that has come to their knowledge during their inspections.

The Conflict of Interest Prevention and Ascertainment Act also contains provisions related to whistle-blowers and although it is related to specific cases of conflict of interests, they are elaborated in more details than APC and can be use as a model for future legislation⁸². This law in article 24 stipulates that everyone who has information about a person holding public office who infringes a provision of that legislation has the right to submit a report on the allegation of conflict of interest. Moreover, some sort of protection for whistle-blowers is envisioned in the text of article 32, according to which the persons competent to consider the signal for conflict of interest are obliged not to reveal the identity of the whistle-blower or facts and data related to the signal. The most important provision is article 32(1), which says that those who report a suspicion of conflict of interest may not be persecuted solely for this reason. The persons assigned to examine such reports are obliged to make proposals to the competent administrative authorities in respect of concrete measures that must be implemented to preserve the dignity of the whistle-blower. These measures include prevention of any actions whereby the whistle-blower would be subjected to mental or physical harassment. It should be noted also that a person, who has been discharged, persecuted or who has suffered mental or physical harassment because of any actions taken as a result of a disclosure being made, is entitled to compensation for economic and non-economic damage. There is, however, no direct reference to whistleblowing as a reason for dismissal, which is atypical within the European context⁸³, but this general regulation could be used as a remedy in the absence of specific rules.

⁸¹ Lauren Kierans, Providing an Alternative to Silence: Towards Greater Protection and Support for Whistle-blowers in the EU. Country report: Bulgaria, Transparency International, p.6 <<http://www.asktheeu.org/en/request/994/response/5856/attach/5/Country%20report%20Bulgaria.pdf>>

⁸² Lauren Kierans, Providing an Alternative to Silence: Towards Greater Protection and Support for Whistle-blowers in the EU. Country report: Bulgaria, Transparency International <<http://www.asktheeu.org/en/request/994/response/5856/attach/5/Country%20report%20Bulgaria.pdf>>

It should be mentioned that the comparative analysis between the general mechanism (regulated by the APC) and the special mechanism (regulated by the Conflict of Interest Prevention and Ascertainment Act) indicates some differences. The regulations are silent in relation to disclosures made first to supervisors and managers. Also, there is no explicit regulation in respect of cases where a whistle-blower is not satisfied as to how to make disclosure to a more senior recipient.

Bulgarian courts have heard a number of cases in which whistle-blowers have faced charges of criminal defamation. In 2009 a judge ruled that an individual did not commit defamation by posting on the Ministry of Interior's website information about alleged corruption committed by officials of the Ministry as the person "lawfully exercised a constitutionally recognized right" and was protected from persecution under APC. In 2011 a judge concluded that an individual who had been threatened with eviction after filing a complaint about an official was protected by the APC from being prosecuted, as the reports made to a public institution could not be considered defamatory because they did not damage the honor, reputation or dignity of a particular person. In 2013 another court ruled that an individual could not be charged with defamation for making disclosures about the management of municipal property because "the right of whistleblowing are constitutionally guaranteed". In 2011 a judge overturned a one-year censure filed against an individual who reported concerns in a police agency. In 2011, Sofia police officer was forced to resign after revealing that the Ministry of Interior was receiving large cash payments from various donors, who in turn were being protected from penalties stemming from traffic violations. The scandal received widespread attention by the media and even criticised by the European Commission⁸⁴.

⁸³ Mark Worth, Whistle-blower protection in Southeast Europe. An Overview of Laws, Practice and Recent Initiatives, p.19 <http://rai-see.org/wp-content/uploads/2015/07/Whistle-blower_Protection_in_SEE.pdf>

⁸⁴ all cases cited in Nevianka Kaneva - Report on the Situation of the Protection of Whistle-blowers and Suggestions for Regulations, Center for Prevention and Countering Corruption and Organized Crime

11.3. Protection of Whistle-blowers under the Law Protecting Journalistic Sources

Whistle-blowers are also protected under the law protecting journalistic sources. The journalist's right to keep in secret his/her sources of information is an essential element of the constitutional principle of freedom of press⁸⁵ and is protected under art. 40 and 41 of the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria. The right to preserve the confidentiality of the source of journalistic information is laid down in particularly in article 10 para.2 it.3 and in article 15 of the Radio and Television Act, it is reaffirmed in article 1.3.3 of Ethical code of the Bulgarian media and in article 19 of The Access to Public Information Act. Although the right to protect its source of information is recognized in the Bulgarian law, journalists cannot benefit from any privileges in the court proceedings to refuse to give statements in order to protect their sources except the general provisions under art.121 of PPC and art.166 of CPC. Journalists, who refuse to disclose their sources can be subject of court proceeding pursuant to art.290 PC for defamation or can be found guilty for perjury when asked to give statements. It is also possible journalist's office and home to be searched in order to find his source of information pursuant to art.159-165 PPC and with that his/her right to private life and freedom of expression violated⁸⁶. The most notorious case in this sense was the one that occurred after the banking crisis in June 2014 in Bulgaria, when the Financial Supervision Commission asked the media outlets "Ikonomedia" to reveal their sources, while at the same time also acknowledged that they were not under an obligation to do it. When they refused to communicate their sources, the FSC imposed them a fine in the amount of €75 000. These fines have triggered very strong criticism both at the national and international levels, because of the disproportionate character of these fines, particularly in view of the low budget of the media outlets fined⁸⁷. Before the fines were imposed, the journalists filed a claim before the Supreme Administrative Court, but it was found inadmissible on the grounds that the court reviewing the lawfulness of the fine once imposed would be in charge.

Bulgaria as a party to the UN Convention against Corruption, the Civil Law Convention on Corruption and the Criminal Law Convention on Corruption has undertaken certain commitments regarding whistle-blower protection. Moreover, the issue of whistleblowing was the subject of an evaluation within the monitoring duties carried out by GRECO and the OECD's Working Group on Bribery in International Business Transactions⁸⁸ and heaving in mind their recommendations, Bulgaria even considered in 2006-2007 adopting a legislation that covers whistleblowing protection in both public and private sector, but failed to do so.

⁸⁵ Radomir Cholakov, Dictionary on Media law

<https://books.google.bg/books/about/%D0%9C%D0%B5%D0%B4%D0%B8%D0%B9%D0%BD%D0%BE%D0%BF%D1%80%D0%B0%D0%B2%D0%BE.html?id=2gzgxSBtl04C&redir_esc=y>

⁸⁶ Ibidem, Boyko Boev and others, p.189.

⁸⁷ Niels Muizniek, Report by the Commissioner for Human Rights of the Council of Europe Following his visit to Bulgaria from 9 to 11 February 2015

<<https://wcd.coe.int/com.instranet.InstraServlet?command=com.instranet.CmdBlobGet&InstranetImage=2801758&SecMode=1&DocId=2284888&Usage=2>>

⁸⁸ Lauren Kierans, Providing an Alternative to Silence: Towards Greater Protection of Whistle-blowers in the EU. Country report: Bulgaria, Transparency International

12. Conclusion

According to Reporters Without Borders' world press freedom index Bulgaria was ranked 36th in the year 2004. Currently, according to the 2016th index Bulgaria occupies 113th place. It is one of the countries in Europe, where the freedom of expression is most progressively and intentionally endangered for the recent years and has never been worse in the newest history of the country.

On legislative level, freedom of expression is guaranteed by the Constitution, by different laws and by the practice of the Bulgarian court, including the Constitutional Court. The protection of journalistic sources is implemental and crucial part of the freedom of expression as well as one of the basic conditions for democracy and is recognized by the law in several acts as the above analyzed RTA, APIA and the Ethical Code of the Bulgarian Media. However, the analyze shows that journalists cannot rely on the privilege to deny testimony in a process before the court in order to protect the identity of their sources. Therefore, journalists are under the threat to be convicted for defamation and perjury. The question whether the Radio and Television Act is applicable for journalists in the printed media or not remains controversial. Unfortunately, the law doesn't prescribe the "test for balance", accepted by the ECHR, although the Bulgarian court applies the test in numerous decisions, as seen above.

The Bulgarian legislator does not provide enough guarantees for the whistle-blowers. The focus of the legislation on this matter is currently on signals, concerning the public administration. However, signals regarding the private sector are not legally settled and the question regarding the protection of the whistle-blowers in those cases remains open. There are not enough guarantees also for non-journalists, including non-government organizations that give signals or would like to protect their sources.

In conclusion, in Bulgaria protection of journalistic sources is recognized by the law and by the practice of the court, but there are not enough procedural guarantees for journalists to protect themselves and their sources. The test for balance, prescribed by the ECHR is not implemented in the Bulgarian legislation. Whistle-blowers, non-government organizations and the medias themselves, when given crucial information of public interests, do not have enough protection and their rights and obligations need further development on legislative level. Such development is highly necessary and is vital for the improvement of the situation of the freedom of expression in Bulgaria, as one of the basic conditions for democracy and the rule of law and as a fundamental tool for the affirmation of the civil society in Bulgaria.

13. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

13.1. Legislation

- Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria 1991
- Radio and Television Act 1978
- Access to Public Information Act 2000
- Penal Procedure Code 2005
- Penal Code 1968
- The National Classification of Professions and Positions 2011
- The Special Surveillance Means Act 1997
- The Law on Measures Against the Financing of Terrorism 2003
- Personal Data Protection Act 2002
- Electronic Communications Act 2007
- Protection of Classified Information Act 2002
- The Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950
- Universal Declaration of Human Rights 1948
- Ordinance on Cryptographic Security of Classified Information
- Convention №108 for the Protection of Individuals with regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data 1985
- Convention on Cybercrime 2004
- Directive 2006/24/EU
- Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information

13.2. Case Law

- Case № 1/1996 of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Bulgaria
- Court Decision Number 15 of September 28 1993 in accordance with Constitutional Case Number 17 from 1993
- Court Decision Number 1195 of 12 February 2004 of the Supreme Administrative Court, Bulgaria on case number 1981/2003 (реш. № 1195 от 12 февруари 2004 г. по адм. д. № 9881/2003 г.)
- Court Decision Number 4408 of 15 May 2004 of the Supreme Administrative Court, Bulgaria on case number 996/2004 (реш. № 4408 от 15 май 2004 г. по адм. д. № 996/2004 г.)
- Decision from 11.04.2016 of Sofia City Court on case 16570/2015
- Decision 212/2013 of Sofia City Court on case 212/2013
- Decision 941/2013 of the Sofia City Court on case 2400/2013
- Decision 4939/2013 of the Sofia City Court on case 26/2012

- Decision 3614/2013 of the Sofia City Court on case 29/2012
- Decision 18311/2014 of the Sofia City Court on case 16594/2013
- Goodwin v United Kingdom
- Sunday Times v. United Kingdom,
- Lingens v. Austria
- Association for European Integration and Human Rights and Ekimdzhiev v. Bulgaria, no. 62540/00, 28 June 2007 of The European Court of Human Rights (Fifth Section)

13.3. Books and articles

- B. Boev, Al. Kashumov, K. Kanev, N. Ognyanova, P. Ruseva, Свобода на изразяване (2010) [Bulgarian]
- Maria Popova, Теория на журнализма (Faber Editing House, 2012) [Bulgarian]
- Sofia University Faculty of Journalism and Mass communications, Journalistic Jobs - Status and Dynamics in Bulgaria (Sofia University Faculty of Journalism and Mass communications, 2010) [Bulgarian]
- Labour and Law magazine, (03,2013) [Bulgarian]
- Monica Macovei, Freedom of expression: A guide to the implementation of Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights, Council of Europe, January 2004
- Neli Ognyanova, Защитата на тайната на източниците: Стандарти от практиката на Съда по правата на човека (Association of European Journalists-Bulgaria, 24 February 2015) < <http://www.aej-bulgaria.org/bul/p.php?post=5539> > accessed 26 February 2016 [Bulgarian]
- Neli Ognyanova, Bulgarian media policy and law: How much Europeanization, (Association of European Journalists-Bulgaria, 12 May 2014) <<http://www.aej-bulgaria.org/eng/p.php?post=1672/>> accessed 2 March 2016
- Ivan Radev, "A necessary upgrade and restart of the media self-regulation process in Bulgaria" (Association of European Journalists-Bulgaria, 12 May 2014) <<http://www.aej-bulgaria.org/eng/p.php?post=1672/>> accessed 2 March 2016
- Freedom of Expression Litigation Project <<https://www.article19.org/data/files/pdfs/publications/right-to-protect-sources.pdf> > accessed 08 March 2016 [Bulgaria]
- Committee to Protect Journalists < <https://www.cpj.org/campaigns/defamation/> > accessed 06 March 2016 [Bulgaria]
- Doroteya Dachkova, Исканията за CPC са намалели драстично след оставката на Янева (Sega newspaper, 23 November 2015) <<http://www.segabg.com/article.php?id=779637/>> accessed 04.03.2016 [Bulgarian]
- Marieta Nikolaeva, Деветима незаконно подслушвани у нас през 2015 г. (BTV News, 29 November 2015) <http://btvnovinite.bg/article/bulgaria/devetima-nezakonno-podslushvani-u-nas-prez-2015-g.html/>> accessed 04.03.2016 [Bulgarian]

- United Nations General Assembly, “The right to privacy in the digital age”(20 November 2013) (UN Doc A/C.3/68/L.45/Rev.1.
<http://www.un.org/ga/search/view_doc.asp?symbol=A/C.3/68/L.45/Rev.1>
accessed 1 March 2016
- Monica Macovei, Freedom of expression: A guide to the implementation of Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights , Council of Europe, January 2004

13.4. Internet Sources

- The Ethical Code of Bulgarian Media
- Standpoint of the National Council for Journalistic Ethics
- Maria Popova, Теория на журнализма (Faber Editing House, 2012) [Bulgarian]
- Sofia University Faculty of Journalism and Mass communications, Journalistic Jobs - Status and Dynamics in Bulgaria (Sofia University Faculty of Journalism and Mass communications, 2010) [Bulgarian]
- B. Boev, Al. Kashumov, K. Kanev, N. Ognyanova, P. Ruseva, Свобода на изразяване (2010) [Bulgarian]
- Labour and Law magazine, (03,2013) [Bulgarian]
- Pieter OMTITZ, Report on topic "The protection of 'whistle-blowers' by the Committee on legal affairs and Human rights. Council of Europe
- Nevianka Kaneva , Report on the Situation of the Protection of Whistle-blowers and Suggestions for Regulations,” Center for Prevention and Countering Corruption and Organized Crime
- Niels Muzniek, Report by the Commissioner for Human rights of the Council of Europe Following his visit to Bulgaria from 9 to 11 February 2015
- UN Human Rights Council, Report “The safety of journalists”, A/HRC/24/23 (1 July 2013), para 9, <<http://www.refworld.org/docid/522d794c4.html>> accessed 1 March 2016
- Frank La Rue, “Report of the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression”. Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights. (A/HRC/17/27).
- <http://www2.ohchr.org/english/bodies/hrcouncil/docs/17session/A.HRC.17.27_en.pdf> accessed 1 March 2016
- Frank La Rue, “Report of the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression”. (10 August 2011) (United Nations General Assembly document A/66/290). <<http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Issues/Opinion/A.66.290.pdf>> accessed 1 March 2016

14. Table of Provisions

Provisions in native language	Corresponding translations
Конституция на Република България Чл. 5 (4) Международните договори, ратифицирани по конституционен ред, обнародвани и влезли в сила за Република България, са част от вътрешното право на страната. Те имат предимство пред тези норми на вътрешното законодателство, които им противоречат.	Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria Article 5 (4) Any international treaty, which has been ratified according to a procedure established by the Constitution, which has been promulgated, and which has entered into force for the Republic of Bulgaria, shall be part of the domestic law of the land. Any such treaty shall take priority over any conflicting standards of domestic legislation.
Конституция на Република България Чл. 32. (1) Личният живот на гражданите е неприкосновен. Всеки има право на защита срещу незаконна намеса в личния и семейния му живот и срещу посегателство върху неговата чест, достойнство и добро име. (2) Никой не може да бъде следен, фотографиран, филмиран, записван или подлаган на други подобни действия без негово знание или въпреки неговото изрично несъгласие освен в предвидените от закона случаи.	Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria Article 32. (1) The privacy of citizens shall be inviolable. Everyone shall have the right to protection against any unlawful interference in their private or family life and against any attack on their honour, dignity, and reputation. (2) No one shall be followed, photographed, filmed, recorded, or subjected to any other similar actions without their knowledge or despite their express disapproval, save in cases provided for in the law.

Конституция на Република България Чл. 33. (1) Жилището е неприкосновено. Без съгласието на обитателя му никой не може да влиза или да остава в него освен в случаите, изрично посочени в закона. (2) Влизане или оставане в жилището без съгласие на неговия обитател или без разрешение на съдебната власт се допуска само за предотвратяване на непосредствено предстоящо или започнало престъпление, за залавяне на извършителя му, както и в случаите на крайна необходимост.	Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria Article 33. (1) The home shall be inviolable. No one may enter a home or stay inside a home without the consent of the occupant thereof, save in the cases expressly stipulated in the law. (2) Entering a home or staying inside a home without the consent of the occupant thereof or without authorization from the judiciary shall be permissible solely for the prevention of an imminent crime or a crime in progress, for apprehension of the perpetrator of any such crime, as well as in the cases of extreme necessity.
Конституция на Република България Чл. 34 (1) Свободата и тайната на кореспонденцията и на другите съобщения са неприкосновени. (2) Изключения от това правило се допускат само с разрешение на съдебната власт, когато това се налага за разкриване или предотвратяване на тежки престъпления.	Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria Article 34 (1) The freedom and confidentiality of correspondence and all other communications shall be inviolable. (2) Exceptions to this provision shall be allowed only with the permission of the judicial authorities for the purpose of discovering or preventing a grave crime.

Конституция на Република България Чл.38. Никой не може да бъде преследван или ограничаван в правата си поради своите убеждения, нито да бъде задължаван или принуждаван да дава сведения за свои или чужди убеждения.	Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria Article 38. No one may be persecuted or restricted in his rights because of his convictions, or be obligated or forced to provide information about his own or another person's convictions.
Конституция на Република България Чл.39. (1) Всеки има право да изразява мнение и да го разпространява чрез слово - писмено или устно, чрез звук, изображение или по друг начин. (2) Това право не може да се използва за накърняване на правата и доброто име на друго и за призоваване към насилствена промяна на конституционно установения ред, към извършване на престъпления, към разпалване на вражда или към насилие над личността.	Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria Article 39. (1) Everyone has the right to express an opinion or to impart an opinion by means of words - either in writing or orally, through sound, image, or by any other medium. (2) This right shall not be used to the detriment of the rights and reputation of others, or for incitement to a change of the constitutionally established order by force, to the commission of criminal offences, or for incitement to animosity or to personal violence.
Конституция на Република България Чл. 40. (1) Печатът и другите средства за масова информация са свободни и не подлежат на цензура. (2) Спирането и конфискацията на печатно издание или на друг носител на	Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria Article 40 (1) The press and the other mass media shall be free and shall not be subjected to censorship. (2) An injunction on or a confiscation of printed matter or another information

информация се допускат само въз основа на акт на съдебната власт, когато се накърняват добрите нрави или се съдържат призови за насилствена промяна на конституционно установения ред, за извършване на престъпление или за насилие над личността. Ако в срок от 24 часа не последва конфискация, спирането преустановява действието си.	medium shall be allowed only through an act of the judicial authorities in the case of an encroachment on public decency or incitement of a forcible change of the constitutionally established order, the perpetration of a crime, or the incitement of violence against anyone. An injunction suspension shall lose force if not followed by a confiscation within 24 hours.
Конституция на Република България Чл. 41. (1) Всеки има право да търси, получава и разпространява информация. Осъществяването на това право не може да бъде насочено срещу правата и доброто име на другите граждани, както и срещу националната сигурност, обществения ред, народното здраве и морала. (2) Гражданите имат право на информация от държавен орган или учреждение по въпроси, които представляват за тях законен интерес, ако информацията не е държавна или друга защитена от закона тайна или не засяга чужди права.	Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria Article 41 (1) Everyone shall be entitled to seek, obtain and disseminate information. This right shall not be exercised to the detriment of the rights and reputation of others, or to the detriment of national security, public order, public health and morality. (2) Citizens shall be entitled to obtain information from state bodies and agencies on any matter of legitimate interest to them which is not a state or official secret and does not affect the rights of others.

Гражданско-процесуален кодекс Чл.166 Отказ от свидетелстване (1) Никой няма право да се отказва от свидетелстване освен: 1. пълномощниците на страните по същото дело и лицата, които са били медиатори по същия спор; 2. роднините на страните по права линия, братята и сестрите и роднините по сватовство от първа степен, съпругът и бившият съпруг, както и лицето, с което страна е във фактическо съпружеско съжителство. (2) Не могат да откажат да свидетелстват, но могат да откажат да дадат отговор на определен въпрос, като посочат причината за това, лицата, които със своите отговори биха причинили на себе си или на лицата по ал. 1, т. 2 непосредствена вреда, опозоряване или наказателно преследване. (3) Свидетелите по делото не могат да бъдат пълномощници на страните по същото дело	Civil Procedure Code Article 166 Refusal to Testify (1) No one has the right to refuse to testify except: 1. the attorneys-in-fact of the parties to the same case and the persons who were mediators in the same dispute; 2. the lineal relatives to the parties, the siblings and the affines in the first degree of affinity, the spouse and the former spouse, as well as the de facto cohabitee with a party. (2) The persons who, by the answers thereof, would incur or inflict on the persons referred to in Item 2 of Paragraph (1) any immediate damage, defamation or criminal prosecution, may not refuse to testify but may refuse to give an answer to a particular question, stating the reasons for this. (3) The witnesses in the case may not be attorneys-in-fact of the parties to the same case.
--	---

Наказателен кодекс чл. 93, параграф 7: "Тежко престъпление" е това, за което по закона е предвидено наказание лишаване от свобода повече от пет години, доживотен затвор или доживотен затвор без замяна.	Penal Code Article 93 § 7: "Serious crime" is a crime for which the law stipulates a punishment of imprisonment of more than five years, life imprisonment or life imprisonment without an option
Наказателен кодекс на Република България Чл. 145а. (Нов - ДВ, бр. 62 от 1997 г.) (1) Който използва информация, събрана чрез използване на специални разузнавателни средства, извън нейното предназначение за опазване на националната сигурност или за целите на наказателното производство, се наказва с лишаване от свобода до три години и глоба до петстотин лева. (2) Когато деянието е извършено от длъжностно лице, което е придобило информацията или тя му е станала известна в кръга на неговата служба, наказанието е лишаване от свобода от една до пет години и глоба до пет хиляди лева. (3) В случаите по предходната алинея съдът може да постанови лишаване от права по чл. 37, ал. 1, точки 6 и 7 .	Penal Code Article 145a (New, SG No. 62/1997) (1) A person who makes use of information collected by special intelligence devices for purposes other than protection of the national security or for the purposes of penal proceedings, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for up to three years and by fine of up to BGN five hundred. (2) Where the act has been committed by an official who has acquired such information or it has come to his knowledge within the sphere of his office, the punishment shall be deprivation of liberty for one to five years and a fine of up to BGN five thousand. (3) In cases under the preceding paragraph the court may rule also deprivation of rights under Article 37, paragraph (1), subparagraphs 6 and 7.

Наказателен кодекс на Република България Чл. 171. (1) (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 28 от 1982 г., бр. 10 от 1993 г.) Който противозаконно: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. отвори, подправи, скрие или унищожи чуждо писмо, телеграма, запечатани книжа, пакет или други подобни; 2. вземе чуждо, макар и отворено, писмо или телеграма с цел да узнае тяхното съдържание или пък със същата цел предаде другиму чуждо писмо или телеграма; 3. (нова - ДВ, бр. 92 от 2002 г.) узнае неадресирано до него съобщение, изпратено по електронен път, или отклони от адресата му такова съобщение, се наказва с лишаване от свобода до една година или с глоба от сто до триста лева. (2) Ако деянието е извършено от длъжностно лице, което се е възползувало от служебното си положение, наказанието е лишаване от свобода до две години, като съдът може да постанови и лишаване от право по чл. 37, ал. 1, точка 6 . (3) (Доп. - ДВ, бр. 92 от 2002 г.) Който чрез използване на специални технически средства противозаконно узнае неадресирано до него съобщение, предадено по телефон, телеграф, чрез компютърна мрежа или по друго далекосъобщително средство, се наказва с	Penal Code Article 171 (1) (Amended, SG. No. 28/1982, SG No. 10/1993) A person who contrary to the law: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. opens, falsifies, hides or destroys a letter, telegram, sealed papers, package and the like of another person; 2. takes another person's, although opened, letter or telegram for the purpose of obtaining knowledge of their contents, or for the same purpose delivers another person's letter or telegram to someone else; 3. (new, SG No. 92/2002) becomes aware of the content of an electronic message not addressed to him/her or prevents such a message from reaching its original addressee. shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for up to one year or by a fine from BGN one hundred to three hundred. (2) If the act was perpetrated by an official who availed himself of his official position, the punishment shall be deprivation of liberty for up to two years, and the court may also rule deprivation of the right under Article 37 (1), sub-paragraph 6. (3) (Supplemented, SG No. 92/2002) A person who, by use of special technical means, unlawfully obtains information not addressed to him, communicated over the telephone, telegraph, computer network or another telecommunication means, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for up to
---	--

лишаване от свобода до две години. (4) (Нова - ДВ, бр. 38 от 2007 г.) Когато деянието по ал. 3 е извършено с користна цел или са причинени значителни вреди, наказанието е лишаване от свобода до три години и глоба до пет хиляди лева.	two years. (4) (New, SG No. 38/2007) Where the act under paragraph 3 has been committed with a venal goal in mind or considerable damages have been caused, the punishment shall be deprivation of liberty for up to three years and a fine of up to BGN five thousand.
Наказателен кодекс на Република България Чл. 171а. (Нов - ДВ, бр. 26 от 2010 г.) (1) (Изм. и доп. – ДВ, бр. 24 от 2015 г., в сила от 31.03.2015 г.) Който противозаконно придобие, съхранява, разкрие или разпространи данни, каквито се събират, обработват, съхраняват или използват съгласно Закона за електронните съобщения, се наказва с лишаване от свобода до три години или пробация. (2) Когато деянието по ал. 1 е извършено с користна цел, наказанието е лишаване от свобода от една до шест години.	Penal Code Art. 171a. (New - SG. 26 of 2010) (1) (amend. And suppl. - SG. 24 of 2015, effective 03.31.2015) A person who unlawfully acquire, store, disclose or disseminate the data they collected, processed, stored or used in accordance with electronic communications Act shall be punished by imprisonment of up to three years or probation. (2) Where the act under par. 1 is committed for gain, the punishment is imprisonment of one to six years.
Наказателен кодекс Чл. 290. (1) Който пред съд или пред друг надлежен орган на властта като свидетел устно или писмено съзнателно потвърди неистина или затаи истина, се наказва за лъжесвидетелстване с лишаване от свобода до пет години.	Penal Code Article 290 (1) Who, before a court or other respective body of the authority, as a witness, verbally or in writing, deliberately confirms a falsehood or conceals the truth shall be punished for perjury by imprisonment of up to five years.

(2) Същото наказание се налага и на преводач или тълковник, който пред съд или пред друг надлежен орган на властта писмено или устно съзнателно даде неверен превод или тълкуване.	(2) The same punishment shall also be imposed to a translator or interpreter who, before a court or other respective body of the authority, verbally or in writing, deliberately presents untrue translation or interpretation.
Наказателен процесуален кодекс Чл.120 (4) Свидетел, който извън случаите по чл. 119 и чл. 121 откаже да свидетелства, се наказва с глоба до хиляда лева	Penal Procedure Code Article 120 (4) A witness who refuses to testify outside the hypotheses of Article 119 and Article 121 shall be punished by fine of up to BGN one thousand.
Наказателен процесуален кодекс Чл.121 Обстоятелства, при които свидетелят не е длъжен да дава показания (1) Свидетелят не е длъжен да дава показания по въпроси, отговорите на които биха улчили в извършване на престъпление него, неговите възходящи, низходящи, братя, сестри или съпруг или лице, с което той се намира във фактическо съжителство. (2) Свидетелят не може да бъде разпитван относно обстоятелствата, които са му били поверени като защитник или повереник или са му станали известни като преводач при срещите на обвиняемия със защитника.	Penal Procedure Code Article 121 Circumstances of which witnesses shall not be obligated to testify (1) Witnesses shall not be obligated to testify on questions, the answers to which might incriminate them, their relatives of ascending and descending line, brothers, sisters, spouses or individuals with whom they live together, in the commission of crime. (2) Witnesses may not be interrogated on circumstances which were confided thereto as defence counsel or attorney.

Наказателен процесуален кодекс Чл. 123. (1) Прокурорът, съдията-докладчик или съдът по искане на свидетеля или с неговото съгласие вземат мерки за неговата незабавна защита, когато са налице достатъчно основания да се предполага, че в резултат на свидетелстването е възникнала или може да възникне реална опасност за живота или здравето на свидетеля, на неговите възходящи, низходящи, братя, сестри, съпруг или лица, с които се намира в особено близки отношения.	Penal Procedure Code Article 123 Witness protection (1) The prosecutor, the judge-rapporteur or the court shall, upon request or with consent of the witness, take measures for his/her immediate protection, should there be sufficient grounds to assume that, as a result of testimony, a real threat has arisen or may arise to the life, health or property of the witness, his/her ascending and descending relatives, brothers, sisters, spouse or individuals with whom he is in a particularly close relationship.
Наказателен процесуален кодекс Чл. 159. (1) (Предишен текст на чл. 159 - ДВ, бр. 32 от 2010 г., в сила от 28.05.2010 г., изм., бр. 24 от 2015 г., в сила от 31.03.2015 г.) По искане на съда или на органите на досъдебното производство всички учреждения, юридически лица, длъжностни лица и граждани са длъжни да запазят и предадат намиращите се у тях предмети, книжа, компютърни информационни данни и други данни, които могат да имат значение за делото	Penal Procedure Code Article 159 Obligation to hand over objects, papers, computerised data, data about subscribers to computer information service and traffic data Upon request of the court or the bodies of pre-trial proceedings, all institutions, legal persons, officials and citizens shall be obligated to preserve and hand over all objects, papers, computerized data, including traffic data, that may be of significance to the case.

Наказателен процесуален кодекс Чл. 161. (1) В досъдебното производство претърсване и изземване се извършват с разрешение на съдия от съответния първоинстанционен съд или от първоинстанционния съд, в района на който се извършва действието, по искане на прокурора. (2) В неотложни случаи, когато това е единствена възможност за събиране и запазване на доказателствата, органите на досъдебното производство могат да извършат претърсване и изземване и без разрешението по ал. 1, като протоколът за извършеното действие по разследването се представя от наблюдаващия прокурор за одобряване от съдията незабавно, но не по-късно от 24 часа. (3) В съдебното производство претърсване и изземване се извършват по решение на съда, който разглежда делото.	Penal Procedure Code Article 161 Bodies making decisions on searches and seizures (1) In pre-trial proceedings search and seizure shall be performed with a authorisation by a judge from the respective first instance court or a judge from the first-instance court in the area of which the action is taken, upon request of the prosecutor. (2) In cases of urgency, where this is the only possible way to collect and keep evidence, the bodies of pre-trial proceedings may perform physical examination without authorisation under paragraph 1, the record of the investigative action being submitted for approval by the supervising prosecutor to the judge forthwith, but not later than 24 hours thereafter. (3) In court proceedings a search and seizure shall be performed following a decision of the court which is trying the case
Наказателен процесуален кодекс Лица, в присъствието на които се извършват претърсването и изземването Чл. 162. (1) Претърсването и изземването се извършват в присъствието на поемни лица и на лицето, което използва помещението, или на пълнолетен член на семейството му.	Penal Procedure Code Article 162 Persons present in the course of searches and seizures (1) Searches and seizures shall be conducted in the presence of certifying witnesses and of the person who uses the premises, or of an adult member of the person's family.

(2) Когато лицето, което използва помещението, или член на семейството му не може да присъства, претърсването и изземването се извършват в присъствието на домоуправителя или на представителя на общината или кметството. (3) Претърсването и изземването в помещение, което се ползва от държавни или общински служби, се извършват в присъствието на представител на службата. (4) Претърсването и изземването в помещение, което се ползва от юридическо лице, се извършват в присъствието на негов представител. Когато не може да присъства представител на юридическото лице, претърсването и изземването се извършват в присъствието на представител на общината или кметството. (5) Претърсване и изземване в помещения на чуждестранни представителства на международни организации и в жилища на техни служители, които се ползват с имунитет по отношение на наказателната юрисдикция на Република България, се извършва със съгласието на ръководителя на представителството и в присъствието на прокурор и представител на Министерството на външните работи. (6) Когато претърсването и изземването са свързани с компютърни информационни системи и програмни продукти, действията се извършват в присъствието на специалист - технически помощник.	(2) Where the person who uses the premises or a member of his/her family cannot attend, the search and seizure shall be effected in the presence of the house manager or of representative of the municipality or mayor's office. (3) Searches and seizures in premises used by state and/or municipal services shall be effected in the presence of a representative of the service. (4) Searches and seizures in premises used by a legal person shall be performed in the presence of a representative thereof. Where no representative of the legal person may be present, the search and seizure shall be carried out in the presence of a representative of the municipality or mayoralty. (5) Searches and seizures in premises of foreign missions and of missions of international organizations or in dwellings of their employees who enjoy immunity with respect to the criminal jurisdiction of the Republic of Bulgaria, shall be conducted with the consent of the head of mission and in the presence of a prosecutor and a representative of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. (6) Where searches and seizures concern computerized information systems and software applications, these shall be conducted in presence of an expert- technical assistant.
--	---

Административно-процесуален кодекс Чл. 107. (4) Сигнали могат да се подават за злоупотреби с власт и корупция, лошо управление на държавно или общинско имущество или за други незаконосъобразни или нецелесъобразни действия или бездействия на административни органи и длъжностни лица в съответните администрации, с които се засягат държавни или обществени интереси, права или законни интереси на други лица.	Administrative procedure code Art. 107. (4) Signals may be filed for abuse of power and corruption, bad management of state or municipal property or other unlawful or inexpedient actions or inactions of administrative bodies and officials in the respective administrations, by which are affected state or public interests, rights or legitimate interests of other persons.
Административно-процесуален кодекс Чл. 108. (2) Никой не може да бъде преследван само заради подаването на предложение или сигнал при условията и по реда на тази глава.	Administrative procedure code Art. 108. (2) Nobody may be prosecuted only because of the filing of a proposal or a signal under the conditions and by the order of this Chapter.
Административно-процесуален кодекс Чл. 111. (4) Не се образува производство по анонимни предложения или сигнали, както и по сигнали, отнасящи се до нарушения, извършени преди повече от две години.	Administrative procedure code CODE Art. 111. (4) Shall not be instituted proceedings on anonymous proposals or signals, as well as on signals, concerning violations, committed before more than two years.

Кодекс на труда Чл. 344. (1) Работникът или служителят има право да оспорва законността на уволнението пред работодателя или пред съда и да иска: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. признаване на уволнението за незаконно и неговата отмяна;2. възстановяване на предишната работа;3. обезщетение за времето, през което е останал без работа поради уволнението;4. поправка на основанията за уволнение, вписано в трудовата книжка или в други документи. (2) Работодателят може и по свой почин да отмени заповедта за уволнение до предявяването на иск от работника или служителя пред съда. (3) В случаите, когато за извършване на уволнението се изисква предварителното съгласие на инспекцията по труда или на синдикален орган и такова съгласие не е било искано или не е било дадено преди уволнението, съдът отменя заповедта за уволнение като незаконна само на това основание, без да разглежда трудовия спор по същество. (4) Трудовите спорове по ал. 1 се разглеждат от районния съд в тримесечен срок от постъпването на исковата молба и от окръжния съд - в едномесечен срок от постъпването на жалбата.	Labour Code Art. 344. (1) The employee is entitled to challenge the lawfulness of the dismissal to the employer or to the court and ask: <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. Recognition of the dismissal as unlawful and its cancellation;2. reinstatement;3. Compensation payment for the time that is unemployed due to dismissal;4. The amendment of the grounds for dismissal written in the service record or other documents. (2) The employer may on its own initiative to revoke the dismissal order until the bringing of a claim by the employee before the court. (3) In cases when performing dismissal requires the prior consent of the labor inspectorate or trade union body and such consent has not been sought or has not been given before dismissal, the court will annul the order of dismissal as unlawful on that ground alone, without considering the labor dispute on its merits. (4) Labour disputes under par. 1 shall be considered by the district court within three
---	--

	months of receipt of the application and the district court - within one month from receipt of the complaint.
Закон за радиото и телевизията Чл. 1. (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 12 от 2010 г.) Този закон урежда медийните услуги, предоставяни от доставчици на медийни услуги под юрисдикцията на Република България.	Radio and Television Act Art.1. (Amended, SG No. 12/2010) This Act shall regulate the media services provided under the jurisdiction of the Republic of Bulgaria.
Закон за радиото и телевизията Чл. 2. (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 12 от 2010 г.) (1) Медийни услуги по смисъла на този закон са аудио-визуални медийни услуги и радиоуслуги. (2) Аудио-визуална медийна услуга/радиоуслуга е: 1. услуга, така както е определена в чл. 56 и 57 от Договора за функционирането на Европейския съюз (ОВ, С 115/47 от 9 май 2008 г.), която е в рамките на редакционната отговорност на доставчик на медийни услуги, чиято основна цел е предоставянето на аудио-визуални предавания/радиопредавания за информиране, забавление или образование на широката общественост чрез електронни съобщителни мрежи по смисъла на Закона за електронните съобщения; 2. аудио-визуално търговско съобщение/търговско съобщение в	Radio and Television Act Art. 2. (Amended, SG No. 12/2010) (1) Within the meaning given by this Act, "media services" shall be audiovisual media services and radio services. (2) "Audiovisual media service/radio service" means: 1. a service as defined by Articles 56 and 57 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (OJ C 115/47 of 9 May 2008 which is under the editorial responsibility of a media service provider and the principal purpose of which is the provision of audiovisual programmes/radio programmes in order to inform, entertain or educate the general public by electronic communications networks within the meaning given by the Electronic Communications Act; 2. an audiovisual commercial communication/commercial communication

радиоуслуга по т. 1. (3) Аудио-визуално предаване е поредица от движещи се изображения със или без звук, което представлява обособена част от програмна схема или каталог, утвърден от доставчик на аудио-визуални медийни услуги и чиято форма е сравнима с формата и съдържанието на телевизионно излъчване. (4) Радиопредаване е обособена част от програмна схема на радиопрограма или каталог, утвърден от доставчик на радиоуслуги. (5) Разпоредбите на този закон не се прилагат за: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. медийни услуги, които не са за масово осведомяване, т.е. не са предназначени за значителна част от аудиторията; 2. дейности, които по принцип са с нестопански характер и които не са конкурентни на телевизията въз основа на програмна схема; 3. лична кореспонденция на ограничен брой адресати чрез електронни съобщителни мрежи; 4. всички услуги, чиято основна цел не е предоставянето на предавания, т.е. когато аудио-визуалното съдържание е включено случайно в услугата и не е нейна основна цел; 5. игрите на късмета, в които се залагат пари, включително лотария, наддаване и други форми на хазарт, както и онлайн игри и програми за търсене, но не и предавания, изцяло посветени на 	in a radio service referred to in Item 1. (3) "Audiovisual programme" means a set of moving images with or without sound constituting an individual item within a programme schedule or a catalogue established by a media service provider and whose form is comparable to the form and content of television broadcasting. (4) "Radio programme" means an individual item within a programme schedule of a radio programme service or a catalogue established by a radio service provider. (5) The provisions of this Act shall not apply to: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. media services which are not for mass communication, i.e. are not intended for a substantial proportion of the public; 2. activities which are primarily non-economic and which are not in competition with television on the basis of a programme schedule; 3. private correspondence sent to a limited number of recipients over electronic communications networks; 4. all services whose principal purpose is not the provision of programmes, i.e. where any audiovisual content is merely incidental to the service and is not its principal purpose; 5. games of chance involving a stake representing a sum of money, including lotteries, betting and other forms of gambling services, as well as on-line games and search engines, but not broadcasts entirely devoted to gambling or games of
--	--

хазартни игри или игри на къмета; 6. електронни варианти на вестници и списания; 7. самостоятелните текстови услуги.	chance; 6. electronic versions of newspapers and magazines; 7. stand-alone text-based services.
Закон за радиото и телевизията Чл. 10. (1) При осъществяването на своята дейност доставчиците на медийни услуги се ръководят от следните принципи: 1. гарантиране на правото на свободно изразяване на мнение; 2. гарантиране на правото на информация; 3. запазване на тайната на източника на информация; 4. защита на личната неприкосновеност на гражданите; 5. недопускане на предавания, внушаващи нетърпимост между гражданите; 6. недопускане на предавания, които противоречат на добрите нрави, особено ако съдържат порнография, възхваляват или оневиняват жестокост или насилие или подбуждат към ненавист въз основа на расов, полов, религиозен или национален признак; 7. гарантиране на правото на отговор в програмите;	Radio and Television Act Art. 10. (1) In carrying out their activities the radio and television operators shall be guided by the following principles: 1. guaranteeing the right to free expression of opinion; 2. guaranteeing the right to information; 3. preservation of the secret of the source of information; 4. protection of the personal inviolability of the citizens; 5. non-admission of programmes suggesting intolerance among the citizens; 6. non-admission of programmes contradicting the good manners, especially if they contain pornography, praising or freeing from blame cruelty or violence or instigate hatred based on racial, sexual, religious or national nature; 7. guaranteeing the right to response;

8. гарантиране на авторските и сродните им права в предаванията и програмите; 9. съхраняване на чистотата на българския език. (2) (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 79 от 2000 г., отм. - ДВ, бр. 12 от 2010 г.) (3) (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 79 от 2000 г., отм. - ДВ, бр. 12 от 2010 г.) (4) (Нова - ДВ, бр. 79 от 2000 г., отм. - ДВ, бр. 12 от 2010 г.)	8. guaranteeing the copyright and related rights of the broadcasts and programmes; 9. preservation of the purity of the Bulgarian language.
Закон за радиото и телевизията Чл. 14. (1) (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 12 от 2010 г.) Доставчиците на линейни медийни услуги са длъжни да записват предоставените за разпространение от тях програми и предавания и да съхраняват записите в продължение на 3 месеца, считано от датата на предаването. (2) (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 12 от 2010 г.) В случай, че в срока по ал. 1 постъпи искане за отговор или бъде предявен иск срещу доставчика на медийни услуги във връзка със съдържанието на предаване или програма, записите се пазят до приключване на делото. (3) Лице, което твърди, че е било засегнато в предаване, има право на достъп до съответния архив и на копие от записа, направено за негова сметка. (4) (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 96 от 2001 г., изм. - ДВ, бр. 12 от 2010 г.) Съветът за електронни	Radio and Television Act Art. 14. (1) (amend. – SG 12/10) The media service providers shall be obliged to record the programmes and broadcasts provided by them for transmission and to keep the records for a period of 3 months considering from the date of broadcasting. (2) (amend. – SG 12/10) If, within the period under para 1, a request for response is received or a claim is made against the media service provider in connection with the contents of the programme or broadcasting the record shall be kept until the conclusion of the case. (3) A person who claims that he has been affected by a broadcasting shall have the right of access to the respective archives and to copy of the record, made for his account. (4) (amend., SG 79/00; revoked –SG 12.10; new –SG 17/13) The media service operators shall publish on their websites the full contents of their contracts with all

медии може да изисква от доставчиците на медийни услуги материали, както и да прави на място проверки, свързани с осъществяването на надзора по спазването на този закон.	parties, coalitions of parties and initiative committees registered for the elections within three days from signing the contracts
Закон за радиото и телевизията Чл. 15. (1) (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 96 от 2001 г., изм. - ДВ, бр. 12 от 2010 г.) Доставчиците на медийни услуги не са длъжни да разкриват източниците на информация, освен ако има висящо съдебно производство или висящо производство по жалба на засегнато лице, на Съвета за електронни медии. (2) (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 12 от 2010 г.) Журналистите не са длъжни да разкриват източниците на информация не само пред аудиторията, но и пред ръководството на доставчик на медийни услуги, освен в случаите по ал. 1. (3) (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 12 от 2010 г.) Доставчиците на медийни услуги имат право да включват в предавания информация от неизвестен източник, като изрично посочват това. (4) Журналистите са длъжни да пазят в тайна източника на информация, ако това изрично е поискано от лицето, което я е предоставило.	Radio and Television Act Art. 15. (1) (amend. – SG 12/10) The media service providers shall not be obliged to disclose their sources of information unless there are pending court proceedings or pending proceedings under a claim of affected person, to the Council for electronic media. (2) (amend. –SG 12/10) The journalists shall not be obliged to disclose the sources of information not only before the audience but also before the management of a media service provider, except in the cases under para 1. (3) (amend. –SG 12/10) The media service provider shall have the right to include in broadcasts information from unknown source explicitly announcing that. (4) The journalists shall be obliged to keep secret the source of information of this is explicitly requested by the person who has provided it.
Етичен кодекс на българските медии 1.3.3. Няма да разкриваме поверителните	Ethical Code of the Bulgarian Media 1.3.3. We shall protect the identity of

си източници на информация.	confidential sources of information.
Закон за достъп до обществена информация Чл. 19. (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 97 от 2015 г., в сила от 12.01.2016 г.) Достъпът до информацията по чл. 18 се осъществява при спазване и балансиране на принципите за прозрачност и икономическа свобода, а също така и за защита на личните данни, търговската тайна и тайната на източниците на средствата за масова информация, пожелали анонимност.	Access to Public Information Act Art. 19. (amend. – SG, 97/2015, in force from 12.1.2016) The access to the information underart. 18 shall be carried out while observing and balancing the principles of transparency and economicfreedom, as well as of protection of personal data, the business secret and the confidentiality of thesources of the mass media, which provide information on condition of anonymity.
Закон за специалните разузнавателни средства Чл. 3. (1) (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 70 от 2013 г., в сила от 9.08.2013 г.) Специалните разузнавателни средства се използват, когато това се налага за предотвратяване и разкриване на тежки умишлени престъпления по глава първа, глава втора, раздели I, II, IV, V, VIII и IX, глава пета, раздели I - VII, глава шеста, раздели II - IV, глава осма, глава осма "а", глава девета "а", глава единадесета, раздели I - IV, глава дванадесета, глава тринадесета и глава четиринадесета, както и за престъпления по чл. 167, ал. 3 и 4, чл. 169г, чл. 219, ал. 4, предложение второ, чл. 220, ал. 2, чл. 253, чл. 308, ал. 2, 3 и 5, изречение второ, чл. 321, чл. 321а, чл. 356к и чл. 393 от особената част на Наказателния кодекс, когато необходимите данни не могат да бъдат събрани по друг начин или събирането	The Special Surveillance Means Act Article 13:(1) (Amended, SG No. 70/2013, effective 9.08.2013) Special intelligence means shall be used to prevent or detect grave intentional criminal offences within the meaning of Chapter I, Chapter II, Sections I, II, IV, V, VIII and IX, Chapter V, Sections I-VII, Chapter VI, Sections II - IV, Chapter VIII, Chapter VIIIa, Chapter IXa, Chapter XI, Sections I - IV, Chapter XII, Chapter XIII and Chapter XIV, as well as crimes within the meaning of Article 167, paragraphs (3) and (4), Article 169d, Article 219, paragraph (4), sentence two, Article 220, paragraph (2), Article 253, Article 308, paragraphs (2), (3) and (5), sentence two, Article 321, Article 321a, Article 356j and Article 393 of the Special Part of the Criminal Code, should the case necessitate it, where there are no other means to collect the necessary information or the collection thereof would be exceptionally difficult.

им е свързано с изключителни трудности.
Закон за специалните разузнавателни средства Чл. 4. По реда на този закон специалните разузнавателни средства могат да се използват и по отношение на дейности, свързани със защитата на националната сигурност.	The Special Surveillance Means Act Article 4 Pursuant to the provisions of this Act, special intelligence means may also be used with regard to activities, concerning the protection of the national security.
Закон за специалните разузнавателни средства Чл. 12. (1) Специалните разузнавателни средства се използват по отношение на: 1. (изм. - ДВ, бр. 70 от 2013 г., в сила от 9.08.2013 г.) лица, за които са получени данни и има основание да се предполага, че подготвят, извършват или са извършили тежко умишлено престъпление от изброените по чл. 3, ал. 1; 2. лица, за чиито действия са получени данни и има основание да се предполага, че се използват от лица по т. 1, без да им е известен престъпният характер на извършваната дейност; 3. лица и обекти, свързани с националната сигурност; 4. (нова - ДВ, бр. 109 от 2008 г.) обекти за установяване самоличността на	The Special Surveillance Means Act, Article 12 (1) Special intelligence means shall be used with regard to: 1. (Amended, SG No. 70/2013, effective 9.08.2013) Persons who are reported to, and for whom there are reasonable grounds to presume that they are preparing to commit, are committing, or have committed grave intentional crime from among those listed in Article 3, paragraph (1); 2. Persons whose activities are reported, and there are reasonable grounds to presume that they are being manipulated by the persons, referred to in Item 1 above, without being aware of the criminal nature of the activities perpetrated; 3. Persons and facilities related to national security; 4. (New, SG No. 109/2008) Facilities

лицата по т. 1 или 2. (2) Специалните разузнавателни средства могат да се използват и за опазване на живота или имуществото на лица, които са дали писмено съгласие за това.	for identifying the persons referred to in item 1 or 2 above. (2) Special intelligence means may be used for the protection of the life and the property of persons, who have consented to this in writing.
Закон за специалните разузнавателни средства Чл. 13. (1) Право да искат използване на специални разузнавателни средства и да използват събраните чрез тях данни и вещественни доказателствени средства съобразно тяхната компетентност имат: 1. (изм. - ДВ, бр. 17 от 2003 г., бр. 45 от 2006 г., бр. 109 от 2007 г., бр. 43 от 2008 г., бр. 109 от 2008 г., бр. 93 от 2009 г., бр. 44 от 2012 г., в сила от 1.07.2012 г., бр. 52 от 2013 г., в сила от 14.06.2013 г., бр. 53 от 2014 г., бр. 14 от 2015 г.) Главна дирекция "Национална полиция", Главна дирекция "Борба с организираната престъпност", Главна дирекция "Гранична полиция", дирекция "Вътрешна сигурност", областните дирекции на Министерството на вътрешните работи, специализираните дирекции (с изключение на дирекция "Технически операции"), териториалните дирекции и самостоятелните териториални отдели на Държавна агенция "Национална сигурност"; 2. (изм. - ДВ, бр. 49 от 2000 г., бр. 109 от 2007 г.) службите "Военна информация" и "Военна полиция" към министъра на отбраната;	The Special Surveillance Means Act Article 13: (1) The following shall have the right to request the use of special intelligence means and to use the data and the material pieces of evidence collected, in accordance with their competence: 1. (amended, SG No. 17/2003, SG No. 45/2006, SG No. 109/2007, SG No. 43/2008, SG No. 109/2008, SG No. 93/2009, SG No. 44/2012, effective 1.07.2012, SG No. 52/2013, effective 14.06.2013, SG No. 53/2014, SG No. 14/2015) the National Police Directorate General, the Directorate General for Combating Organized Crime, the Border Police Directorate General, the Internal Security Directorate, the regional directorates of the Ministry of Interior, the specialized directorates (except the Technical Operations Directorate), the territorial directorates and the autonomous territorial departments of the State Agency for National Security; 2. (amended, SG No. 49/2000, SG No. 109/2007) "Military Information" and "Military Police" services with the Minister of Defence; 3. the National Intelligence Service;

3. (Изм. – ДВ, бр. 79 от 2015 г. , в сила от 1.11.2015 г.) Държавна агенция "Разузнаване"; 4. (отм. - ДВ, бр. 109 от 2008 г.); 5. (изм. - ДВ, бр. 17 от 2003 г., отм., бр. 109 от 2008 г.); 6. (нова - ДВ, бр. 17 от 2013 г., изм., бр. 42 от 2015 г.) окръжните прокуратури - за престъпления по чл. 167, ал. 3, 4 и 5 и чл. 169г от Наказателния кодекс. (2) (Нова - ДВ, бр. 109 от 2008 г.) Наблюдаващият прокурор подава писмено мотивирано искане до съда за използване на специални разузнавателни средства по досъдебно производство.	4. (repealed, SG No. 109/2008); 5. (amended, SG No. 17/2003, repealed, SG No. 109/2008); 6. (new, SG No. 17/2013, amended, SG No. 42/2015) regional prosecutor's offices - for crimes under Article 167, paragraphs (3), (4) and (5) and Article 169 of the Criminal Code. (2) (New, SG No. 109/2008) The supervising prosecutor shall submit to the court a substantiated written request for use of special intelligence means for pre-court proceedings.
Закон за мерките срещу финансирането на тероризма, Чл. 2. Целите на този закон са предотвратяване и разкриване на действия на физически лица, юридически лица, групи и организации, насочени към финансиране на тероризма.	The Law on Measures Against the Financing of Terrorism, Article 2. The purposes of this Act shall be to prevent and detect actions by natural persons, legal persons, groups and organizations that are directed at financing terrorism.
Закон за мерките срещу финансирането на тероризма, Чл. 3. (1) Мерките по този закон са: 1. блокиране на парични средства, финансови активи и друго имущество; 2. забрана за предоставяне на финансови услуги, парични средства, финансови активи или друго имущество.	The Law on Measures Against the Financing of Terrorism, Article 3. (1) The measures under this Act shall be: 1. blocking/freezing of funds, financial assets and other property; 2. prohibition to provide financial services, funds, financial assets or other property.

(2) (Изм. и доп. - ДВ, бр. 19 от 2005 г., доп. - ДВ, бр. 28 от 2008 г., изм. - ДВ, бр. 38 от 2012 г., в сила от 19.11.2012 г.) Лицата, изпълнили мярка по ал. 1, незабавно уведомяват за това министъра на вътрешните работи, министъра на финансите, председателя на Държавна агенция "Национална сигурност" и Комисията за отнемане на незаконно придобито имущество. (3) Блокирането по ал. 1 има действие на заповест или възбрана.	(2) (Amended and supplemented, SG No. 19/2005, supplemented, SG No. 28/2008, amended, SG No. 38/18.05.2012 effective 19.11.2012) The persons who have implemented a measure under Paragraph (1) shall immediately notify the Minister of Interior, the Minister of Finance, the Chairperson of the State Agency for National Security and the Criminal/Illegal Assets Forfeiture Commission. (3) The blocking/freezing under Paragraph (1) shall have the effect of an attachment or distraint.
Закон за мерките срещу финансирането на тероризма, Чл. 4. (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 28 от 2008 г.) Информацията, необходима за осъществяване целите на този закон, се събира, обработва, систематизира, анализира, съхранява, използва и предоставя от Държавна агенция "Национална сигурност".	The Law on Measures Against the Financing of Terrorism, Article 4. (Amended, SG No. 28/2008) The information necessary to achieve the purposes of this Act shall be collected, processed, systematized, analyzed, stored, used and provided by the State Agency for National Security.
Закон за мерките срещу финансирането на тероризма, Чл. 5. (1) (Доп. - ДВ, бр. 28 от 2008 г.) По предложение на министъра на вътрешните работи, на председателя на Държавна агенция "Национална сигурност" или на главния прокурор Министерският съвет с решение приема, допълва и изменя списък на физическите лица, юридическите лица, групите и организациите, спрямо които се прилагат мерките по този закон.	The Law on Measures Against the Financing of Terrorism, Article 5. (1) (Supplemented, SG No. 28/2008) Acting on a motion by the Minister of Interior, the Chairperson of the State Agency for National Security or the Prosecutor General, the Council of Ministers shall adopt, supplement and modify a list of the natural persons, legal persons, groups and organizations in respect whereof the measures under this Act should be applied. (2) The following shall be included in the list

(2) В списъка по ал. 1 се включват: 1. физически лица, юридически лица, групи и организации, посочени от Съвета за сигурност на Организацията на обединените нации като свързани с тероризъм или спрямо които са наложени санкции за тероризъм с резолюция на Съвета за сигурност на Организацията на обединените нации; 2. (доп. - ДВ, бр. 33 от 2011 г., в сила от 27.05.2011 г.) лица, срещу които е образувано наказателно производство за тероризъм, финансиране на тероризъм, набиране или обучаване на отделни лица или групи от хора с цел извършване на тероризъм, образуване, ръководене или членуване в организирана престъпна група, която си поставя за цел да извършва тероризъм или финансиране на тероризъм, приготвяне към извършване на тероризъм, подправка на официален документ с цел улесняване извършване на тероризъм, явно подбуждане към извършване на тероризъм или закана за извършване на тероризъм по смисъла на Наказателния кодекс.	referred to in Paragraph (1): 1. natural persons, legal persons, groups and organizations identified by the United Nations Security Council as associated with terrorism, or with respect to whom sanctions for terrorism have been imposed by a resolution of the United Nations Security Council; 2. (supplemented, SG No. 33/2011, effective 27.05.2011) persons against whom criminal proceedings have been instituted for terrorism; financing of terrorism; recruitment and training of individuals or groups of people for the purpose of practising terrorism, forming, managing or membership of an organized crime syndicate having as its purpose the practice of terrorism or the financing of terrorism; preparation to practise terrorism; forgery of an official document for the purpose of facilitating the practice of terrorism, manifest incitement to practising terrorism; or a threat to practise terrorism, within the meaning given by the Penal Code.
ЗАКОН ЗА ПРЕДОТВРЯВАНЕ И УСТАНОВЯВАНЕ НА КОНФЛИКТ НА ИНТЕРЕСИ Чл. 24. (1) Всеки, който разполага с данни, че лице, заемащо публична длъжност, е нарушило разпоредба на този закон, може да подаде сигнал за конфликт на интереси. (2) Всеки, който разполага с данни за нарушение на разпоредбите на чл. 21 или 22, може да подаде сигнал за	CONFLICT OF INTEREST PREVENTION AND ASCERTAINMENT ACT Article 24. (1) Any person who possesses any data that a public office holder has violated any provision of this Act may submit an alert about a conflict of interest. (2) Any person who possesses any data on a

конфликт на интереси. (3) Когато разполага с данни, че лице, заемащо публична длъжност, е нарушило разпоредба на този закон, органът по избора или назначаването или съответната комисия по чл. 25, ал. 2, т. 1 и 3 незабавно изпраща сигнал до Комисията за предотвратяване и установяване на конфликт на интереси заедно със заверени копия от документите, относими към сигнала. (4) Сигналът, както и искането за установяване на конфликт на интереси, се подава писмено и се регистрира.	violation of the provisions of Articles 21 or 22 herein may submit an alert of a conflict of interest. (3) Where in possession of data that a public office holder has violated any provision of this Act, the electing or appointing authority or the relevant committee referred to in Items 1 and 3 of Article 25 (2) herein shall forthwith send an alert to the Commission for Prevention and Ascertainment of Conflict of Interest together with certified copies of the documents relevant to the alert. (4) The alert, as well as the request for ascertainment of a conflict of interest, shall be submitted in writing and shall be registered.
ЗАКОН ЗА ПРЕДОТВРАТЯВАНЕ И УСТАНОВЯВАНЕ НА КОНФЛИКТ НА ИНТЕРЕСИ Чл. 32. (1) Лице, което е подало сигнал за конфликт на интереси, не може да бъде преследвано само за това. (2) Лицата, на които е възложено разглеждането на сигнала, са длъжни да: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. не разкриват самоличността на лицето, подало сигнала; 2. не разгласяват фактите и данните, които са им станали известни във връзка с разглеждането на сигнала; 3. опазват поверените им писмени 	CONFLICT OF INTEREST PREVENTION AND ASCERTAINMENT ACT Article 32. (1) A conflict of interest whistleblower may not be persecuted solely for this reason. (2) The persons who have been assigned to examine the alert shall be under an obligation: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. not to disclose the identity of the whistleblower; 2. not to make public any facts and data that have come to the knowledge thereof in connection with the examination of

документи от неразрешен достъп на трети лица. (3) Лицата по ал. 2 предлагат на съответните ръководители предприемането на конкретни мерки за опазване достойнството на подалия сигнала, включително мерки, които да предотвратяват действия, чрез които му се оказва психически или физически тормоз. (4) Лице, което е уволнено, преследвано или по отношение на което са предприети действия, водещи до психически или физически тормоз, заради това, че е подало искане, има право на обезщетение за претърпените от него имуществени и неимуществени вреди по съдебен ред.	the alert; 3. to safeguard the written documents entrusted thereto from unauthorised access of third parties. (3) The persons referred to in Paragraph (2) shall propose to the competent heads the taking of concrete measures to preserve the dignity of the whistle-blower, including measures to prevent any actions whereby the said whistle-blower is subjected to mental or physical harassment. (4) A person, who has been discharged, persecuted or in respect of whom any actions leading to mental or physical harassment have been taken by reason of having submitted a request, shall have the right to compensation for the personal injury and damage to property according to a judicial procedure.
ЗАКОН ЗА ДЪРЖАВНИЯ СЛУЖИТЕЛ Чл. 121. (1) Държавният служител има право да оспори законността на прекратяването на служебното си правоотношение пред органа по назначаването или пред съда чрез органа по назначаването и да иска: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. отмяна на акта, с който то е прекратено; 2. (отм. - ДВ, бр. 95 от 2003 г.) 3. обезщетение за времето, през което не е бил на служба поради прекратяването; 4. поправка на основанието за прекратяване на служебното 	CIVIL SERVANTS ACT Article 121. (1) Any civil servant shall have the right to challenge the lawfulness of the termination of the civil-service relationship before the appointing authority or before a court of law care of the appointing authority and to seek: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. revocation of the act of termination; 2. (repealed, SG No. 95/2003); 3. compensation for the time of removal from service by reason of termination; 4. modification of the grounds for termination of the civil-service relationship

правоотношение, вписано в служебната книжка или в други документи.	as entered in the civil-service record or in other documents.
ЗАКОН ЗА ДЪРЖАВНИЯ СЛУЖИТЕЛ Чл. 128. (1) Инспекторите извършват общи и специализирани проверки по утвърден от изпълнителния директор на Изпълнителна агенция "Главна инспекция по труда" годишен план, както и внезапни проверки по сигнали на ръководителите на инспекторатите в административните структури и на синдикалните организации или по жалби от държавни служители.	CIVIL SERVANTS ACT Article 128. (1) Inspectors shall conduct general and specialized examinations according to an annual plan endorsed by the Executive Director of the General Labour Inspectorate Executive Agency, as well as unscheduled examinations acting on alerts by the heads of the inspectorates in the administrative structures and the trade union organizations or on complaints by civilservants.
ЗАКОН ЗА ДЪРЖАВНИЯ СЛУЖИТЕЛ Чл. 130. Инспекторите са длъжни: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. да пазят в тайна поверителните сведения, които са им станали известни във връзка с упражняването на контрола; 2. да пазят в тайна източника, от който е получен сигнал за нарушение на служебното правоотношение. 	CIVIL SERVANTS ACT Article 130. Inspectors shall be obligated: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. to respect the secrecy of any confidential information as may have come to the knowledge thereof in connection with the exercise of control; 2. to respect the confidentiality of the source wherefrom a tip-off on breach of the civil-service relationship has been received.
ЗАКОН ЗА ДЪРЖАВНИЯ СЛУЖИТЕЛ Чл. 132. Когато при проверките се установят нарушения, които съдържат данни за извършено престъпление или други правонарушения, инспекторите	CIVIL SERVANTS ACT Article 132. Where any breaches giving reason to believe that a criminal offence or other wrongful acts have been committed are ascertained upon examinations, inspectors

уведомяват органите на прокуратурата.	shall notify the prosecuting authorities.
ЗАКОН ЗА СМЕТНАТА ПАЛАТА ЧЛ. ЧЛ. 58. (1) При наличие на данни за престъпление Сметната палата изпраща одитния доклад и материалите към него на прокуратурата. (2) Органите на прокуратурата уведомяват текущо Сметната палата за предприетите действия по изпратените материали по ал. 1. (3) Сметната палата не може да огласява данни в случаите по ал. 1 до приключване на наказателното производство. (4) При наличие на данни за престъпление при управлението на сметките за средства от Европейския съюз с решение на Сметната палата материалите от одита или одитният доклад се изпращат и на специализираните органи за превенция и борба с измамите и корупцията на Европейския съюз.	NATIONAL AUDIT OFFICE ACT Art. 58. (1) In case of data for a crime, the BNAO shall submit the audit report and its materials to the prosecution office. (2) The prosecution bodies shall notify currently the BNAO about the undertaken actions on the submitted materials under Para. 1. (3) The BNAO shall not disclose data in the cases under Para. 1 by the time the penal procedure is finalized. (4) In case of data for a crime in the management of the accounts for EU funds, with BNAO decision, the audit materials or the audit report shall also be submitted to the specialized bodies for prevention and fight with fraud and corruption of the EU.
ЗАКОН ЗА ПРЕДОТВРЯВАНЕ И УСТАНОВЯВАНЕ НА КОНФЛИКТ НА ИНТЕРЕСИ ЧЛ. 24. (1) Всеки, който разполага с данни, че лице, заемащо публична длъжност, е нарушило разпоредба на този закон, може да подаде сигнал за конфликт на интереси. (2) Всеки, който разполага с данни за нарушение на разпоредбите на чл. 21 или 22, може да подаде сигнал за	CONFLICT OF INTEREST PREVENTION AND ASCERTAINMENT ACT Article 24. (1) Any person who possesses any data that a public office holder has violated any provision of this Act may submit an alert about a conflict of interest. (2) Any person who possesses any data on a violation of the provisions of Articles 21 or 22 herein may submit an alert of a conflict of

конфликт на интереси. (3) Когато разполага с данни, че лице, заемащо публична длъжност, е нарушило разпоредба на този закон, органът по избора или назначаването или съответната комисия по чл. 25, ал. 2, т. 1 и 3 незабавно изпраща сигнал до Комисията за предотвратяване и установяване на конфликт на интереси заедно със заверени копия от документите, относими към сигнала. (4) Сигналът, както и искането за установяване на конфликт на интереси, се подава писмено и се регистрира.	interest. (3) Where in possession of data that a public office holder has violated any provision of this Act, the electing or appointing authority or the relevant committee referred to in Items 1 and 3 of Article 25 (2) herein shall forthwith send an alert to the Commission for Prevention and Ascertainment of Conflict of Interest together with certified copies of the documents relevant to the alert. (4) The alert, as well as the request for ascertainment of a conflict of interest, shall be submitted in writing and shall be registered.
ЗАКОН ЗА ПРЕДОТВРАТЯВАНЕ И УСТАНОВЯВАНЕ НА КОНФЛИКТ НА ИНТЕРЕСИ Чл. 32. (1) Лице, което е подало сигнал за конфликт на интереси, не може да бъде преследвано само за това. (2) Лицата, на които е възложено разглеждането на сигнала, са длъжни да: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. не разкриват самоличността на лицето, подало сигнала; 2. не разгласяват фактите и данните, които са им станали известни във връзка с разглеждането на сигнала; 3. опазват поверените им писмени документи от неразрешен достъп на трети лица. 	CONFLICT OF INTEREST PREVENTION AND ASCERTAINMENT ACT Article 32. (1) A conflict of interest whistleblower may not be persecuted solely for this reason. (2) The persons who have been assigned to examine the alert shall be under an obligation: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. not to disclose the identity of the whistleblower; 2. not do make public any facts and data that have come to the knowledge thereof in connection with the examination of the alert; 3. to safeguard the written documents entrusted thereto from unauthorised access

(3) Лицата по ал. 2 предлагат на съответните ръководители предприемането на конкретни мерки за опазване достойнството на подалия сигнала, включително мерки, които да предотвратяват действия, чрез които му се оказва психически или физически тормоз. (4) Лице, което е уволнено, преследвано или по отношение на което са предприети действия, водещи до психически или физически тормоз, заради това, че е подало искане, има право на обезщетение за претърпените от него имуществени и неимуществени вреди по съдебен ред.	of third parties. (3) The persons referred to in Paragraph (2) shall propose to the competent heads the taking of concrete measures to preserve the dignity of the whistle-blower, including measures to prevent any actions whereby the said whistle-blower is subjected to mental or physical harassment. (4) A person, who has been discharged, persecuted or in respect of whom any actions leading to mental or physical harassment have been taken by reason of having submitted a request, shall have the right to compensation for the personal injury and damage to property according to a judicial procedure.
Закон за електронните съобщения Чл. 274. (1) (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 43 от 2008 г., изм. - ДВ, бр. 93 от 2009 г.) Радиосъоръжения и/или крайни електронни съобщителни устройства, включващи хардуерни приспособления към съоръженията или крайните устройства за криптографиране на електронни съобщения и използващи криптографски ключ с дължина, по-голяма от 56 бита, се произвеждат или внасят след регистрация в дирекция "Технически операции" на Държавна агенция "Национална сигурност". (2) Не подлежат на регистрация по ал. 1 криптографски устройства за защита на банкови трансакции, смарт карти, криптори за кодиране на телевизионен сигнал, мобилни телефони без вграден допълнителен криптомодул и криптографски средства, използвани от	The Electronic Communications Act Art. 274. (1) Radio equipment or electronic communication terminal equipment, including hardware accessories to the radio equipment or terminal equipment for encryption of electronic communications and using cryptographic keys more than 56 bits long, shall be manufactured or imported after registration in the specialised directorate under Art. 113 of the Law for the Ministry of the Interior. (2) Cryptographic devices for bank transactions protection, smart cards, scramblers for scrambling television signals, mobile phones without a built-in additional cryptographic module and cryptographic devices used by representations or other organisations having a status of diplomatic missions shall not be subject to registration

представителства или други организации със статут на дипломатически мисии. (3) (Изм. - ДВ, бр. 43 от 2008 г.) За радиосъоръженията и крайните електронни съобщителни устройства по ал. 1 се води публичен регистър. Регистърът се публикува на страницата на Държавна агенция "Национална сигурност" в интернет. (4) В регистъра по ал. 3 се съдържа следната информация: <ol style="list-style-type: none">идентификационни данни на производителя или вносителя:<ol style="list-style-type: none">за физически лица - трите имена и постоянен адрес;за юридически лица и физически лица - еднолични търговци - наименование (фирма), седалище, адрес на управление;наименование и тип на крайното устройство по ал. 1	under paragraph 1. (3) Radio equipment and electronic communication terminal equipment under paragraph 1 shall be entered in a public register. The register shall be published on the Internet page of the Ministry of the Interior. (4) The register under paragraph 3 shall contain the following information: <ol style="list-style-type: none">identification data about the manufacturer or importer: 68<ol style="list-style-type: none">for natural persons – full name and permanent address;for legal persons and natural persons-sole traders – name (company), headquarters, registered address.name and type of the terminal equipment under paragraph 1.
--	---

ELSA CYPRUS

Contributors

National Coordinator:

Constantina Markou

National Researchers:

Charalambos Papasavvas

Christopher Lytras

Katerina Sofokleous

Nikoletta Kallasidou

Salome Charalambous

National Linguistic Editors:

Alexander Gioumouxouzis

Constantina Markou

National Academic Supervisor:

Eleni-Tatiani Synodinou

1. Introduction

The Cypriot legal system's peculiarities have led to its description as unique.¹ A mixed legal system, it is very much geared towards common law while still integrating substantial elements of the continental system. This translates into a plurality of legal sources with guidance potential for the Cypriot legal view on freedom of expression: the EU regional system, the ECHR system, and judicial precedent from common law jurisdictions across the globe, evident in Cypriot jurisprudence. The degree of press freedom in Cyprus is seen to be strong by the standards of international monitoring bodies, with Freedom House noting that Cypriot press is "free" with a score of 25 out of 100 (0 being the highest).²

However, the positive ranking of Cyprus is a marked change from the position throughout much of the 20th century. Historically, Cypriot media was constrained by strict government controls, particularly before independence.³ Researchers have noted that there are still barriers in reportage and press freedom, stemming from the country's separation. As the occupied part of the island is not under the effective control of the Cypriot government, the positive international assessment cannot be seen to concern freedom of expression encompassing all the territory of the island. For instance, the experience of female journalists is not consistent across the entire island and in the institutions of Cypriot media.⁴ A regrettable attestation to the disparity of the freedom of expression across Cypriot territory is the case of Kutlu Adali, a Turkish-Cypriot political columnist and the only Cypriot journalist to have died in Cyprus since 1992, whose case reached the ECtHR.⁵

Cypriot law includes important pieces of legislation that protect freedom of expression, and the right that journalists possess to safeguard the confidentiality of their sources is a part of it. It appears both in the form of government legislation and in self-regulatory mechanisms among professional journalists. Under the Constitution of 1960, every person has the right to freedom of speech and expression in any form and to hold opinions and receive or impart information and ideas without interference by any public authority. The Constitution, the Press Law of 1989, and the Journalistic Ethics Code will be the central object of examination in the following pages, along with more specialized pieces of legislation.

¹ Hatzimihail N., "Reconstructing Mixity: Sources of Law and Legal Method in Cyprus" in Palmer V., Mattar M., Koppel A. (eds.), Mixed Legal Systems, East and West (Ashgate 2015), pp. 75-99.

² Freedom House, Cyprus: Freedom of the Press, 2015,

Available at: <<https://freedomhouse.org/report/freedom-press/2015/cyprus>> Accessed March 4, 2016.

³ Whitten-Woodring J. and Belle D., Historical Guide to World Media Freedom (Sage Publications 2014); For a more in-depth historical overview of the Cypriot legal system see Hatzimihail N., "Cyprus as a Mixed Legal System" (2013) Vol.6 Journal of Civil Law Studies, pp.37-96.

⁴ Bailie M. and Azgin B., "Disturbing the Peace: Gender, Journalism and the Cypriot Press" (2011), Vol.12(5) Journalism Studies, pp. 689-704.

⁵ Adali v. Turkey App no 38187/97 (2005)

It will become quickly apparent through this report that there exists a distinct lack of national case-law on the subject of journalistic source protection, as well as other contemporary matters relating to it such as the nature of a journalist and encryption issues. Cypriot courts have, so far, touched upon such matters in a limited number of cases, in the context of rather unrelated facts, and in the form of obiter remarks rather than lengthy analyses. Regardless, this report endeavours to map the present regulatory framework of Cyprus on these issues and discuss as thoroughly as possible, in the light of applicable international frameworks and judgments, the direction of Cypriot courts. By doing so it examines the potential of future judgments, based on contemporary indications.

2. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information? What type of legislation provides this protection? How exactly is this protection construed in national law?

Freedom of expression and the protection of journalistic sources are safeguarded in the Cypriot legal order through various mediums.

Article 19 of the Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus provides that:

1. Every person has the right to freedom of speech and expression in any form.
2. This right includes freedom to hold opinions and receive and impart information and ideas without interference by any public authority and regardless of frontiers.
3. The exercise of the rights provided in paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary only in the interests of the security of the Republic or the constitutional order or the public safety or the public order or the public health or the public morals or for the protection of the reputation or rights of others or for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.
4. Seizure of newspapers or other printed matter is not allowed without the written permission of the Attorney-General of the Republic, which must be confirmed by the decision of a competent court within a period not exceeding seventy-two hours, failing which the seizure shall be lifted.
5. Nothing contained in this Article shall prevent the Republic from requiring the licensing of sound and vision broadcasting or cinema enterprises.⁶

The Cypriot Press Law further delineates all aspects of the freedom of Cypriot press in a specialised manner. It recognises press products in the traditional way, only allowing within its definition those publications which are in print. This is found in Article 2:

⁶ Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus (Chapter II on Fundamental Rights and Freedoms) 1960, Article 19.

"Publication" in terms of newspapers or other printed means, means the distribution, sale, as well as the wall-posting or issuing of the newspaper or other publication in the public place or any assembly or part accessible to the public.

"Issue" in terms of newspapers or other printed means, means the printing of the newspaper or other publication.

"Newspaper" means any publication with the intention of informing the public, published daily or in larger, but in any case regular, time intervals, up to a maximum / month limit, containing material of general political and social interest.⁷

Cypriot case-law has not further dealt so far with the definition of press products and neither, in extension, with that of journalistic sources.

Beyond the Constitution and the Press law there is also the Journalistic Ethics Code, a self-regulatory mechanism which also defines the rights and obligations of journalists including the protection of sources in Article 14:

Professionals have a moral obligation to observe professional secrecy regarding the source of information obtained confidentially. The journalist is not obliged to reveal the source of his information. At the same time, it is the duty of the journalist to ensure that the sources of the information they provide is valid.⁸

However the Journalistic Ethics Code itself poses a limitation to the above principle. That is the exception of public interest provided in Article 15:

In this Code, cases falling into the concern of public interest justifying derogation from the rule are the following:

- a) Detection of crime or disclosure.
- b) Protection of public safety or health.
- c) Protection of human rights.
- d) Preventing deception of the public as a result of acts or statements by individuals or organisations.⁹

Public interest is a particularly prevailing concept in the Cypriot legal order and it is often raised in various cases. In light of ECtHR case-law on the matter, it can be considered a decisive factor that will influence the protection of journalistic sources in the future. The ECtHR has touched upon public interest in its Financial Times Ltd & Ors v. UK judgement¹⁰. In Financial Times the Court emphasized the importance of the 2000 Recommendation by the Council of Europe, ⁷ Press Act (145/89), Article 2.

⁸ Journalistic Ethics Code (1997), Article 14.

⁹ Journalistic Ethics Code (1997), Article 15.

¹⁰ Financial Times Ltd & Ors v. UK App no. 821/03 (2009)

underlining the weight of the protection of journalistic sources as a condition for press freedom. It dismissed claims of public interest for a national law allowing the unveiling of sources, finding the law an unjustified breach of Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Furthermore, in Tillack v. Belgium, it found that the search of a journalist's home and the seizure of all his working papers and tools ran contrary to Article 10.¹¹ Seeing as the Cypriot legal order lacks substantial case law on the matter, and considering the weight of both ECtHR case-law and case-law from other common law jurisdictions, these judgments should carry a special significance when Cypriot courts in the future turn outwards for an authoritative definition of the limits of source protection.

3. Is there, in domestic law, a provision that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his/her sources? How exactly is this prohibition construed in national law? What is the sanction?

3.1. Negative right of non-disclosure

The Cypriot Press Law of 1989 guarantees freedom of the press, the unhindered circulation of newspapers, the right of journalists not to disclose sources of information, and access to official information. It does not provide a positive legal obligation for journalists to not disclose their resources nor any sanctions in the case of breach, but rather equips them with the freedom not to do so, unless in exceptional circumstances.

According to the Press Law all journalists, Cypriot or foreign, have the right to free access to public sources of information, the freedom to seek and receive information from any competent authority of the Republic, and freedom to publish. The relevant authority must provide the requested information unless they relate to the state or public security, constitutional or public order, public morals or the protection of the reputation and rights of third parties. Article 8 provides:

1. All journalists, Cypriot and foreign, have the right not to disclose their sources of information and to refuse to give evidence without being subject to prosecution for it.
2. The only exception is for cases where a journalist publishes information about a criminal offense. It may then be required by the Court to consider the case, or investigator to reveal the source, provided that the court or the investigating judge is satisfied that there exist cumulatively the following conditions:
 - the information is clearly relevant to the criminal offense;
 - the information cannot be obtained by other means;

¹¹ Tillack v. Belgium App. no 20477/05 (2007) Recently upheld by Ressiot and Others v. France App no 15054/07 and 15066/07 (2012), a judgment applauded by the Cypriot Union of Editors.

- Overriding and compelling reasons of public interest require the disclosure of information.¹²

Cypriot courts have not adjudicated upon the exception of a criminal offence in particular concerning the exposure of a journalist's source. The ECtHR cases *Sanoma Uitgevers BV v Netherlands*¹³ and Voskuil v. Netherlands,¹⁴ which places this exception in cautious limits are particularly relevant. Sanoma involved the seizure of photographs which identified a journalist's source in the course of criminal investigations, while Voskuil concerned the detention of the journalist having such information. In Sanoma, the ECtHR underlined the importance of domestic procedural safeguards before any order of disclosure can be given, and in Voskuil it found a lack of overriding public interest, since national authorities had gone too far to identify the source. Such precedent places the exception in the Cypriot Press Law under strict limitations.

Although there is no clear detectable trend which points to whether Cypriot courts would follow a broad or strict interpretation of this case law, there are a few sparse mentions in Cypriot case-law which highlight the weight attributed to the freedom of expression as a cornerstone of human rights in Cyprus. This has been mentioned in the Makrides case: "The principle of anonymity which allows a publisher or reporter to refuse[...]to reveal the name of the author of an article published in his newspaper is inclined to play an important part in the realisation of the right to receive and impart information. [...] It is generally recognised that for the press to be enabled to perform the duty of imparting information to the public it should be allowed to receive information in confidence without revealing its sources."¹⁵

3.2. Positive obligation of non-disclosure

One cannot find any positive obligation not to breach the confidentiality or any corresponding sanctions in the Press Law. Journalists may refuse to testify before a court of law regarding their sources, however as pointed out in Makrides this may lead to contempt of court. Alternatively, such an action may lead to the journalist being considered an unreliable witness, as it happened in the case Yaacoub v. The Republic where the Assize Court found that no attention was to be given to the testimony of a journalist who cited confidentiality to not reveal sources of information.¹⁶

Seeing as the Press Law provides no direct provisions on the responsibility of non-disclosure of journalistic sources, one turns to other instruments to see if any such provisions can be found. The Journalistic Ethics Code itself poses no such consequences, limiting itself to the mention of ¹² Press Act (145/89), Article 8.

¹³ Sanoma Uitgevers BV v Netherlands App. no 38224/03 (2010).

¹⁴ Voskuil v. Netherlands App. no 64752/01 (2007).

¹⁵ Kostas Makrides and other v. Ministry of Interior and Director of the Public Information Office (1981), 3 CLR 321.

¹⁶ Hossam Taleb Yaacoub v. The Republic Criminal Appeal No. 72/2013, 19/3/2014.

a “moral” interest to not disclose such information in Article 14. This moral obligation is not expanded upon by the Code, nor is it expanded upon in case law.

The Cypriot Criminal Code does include a provision in its chapter for offenses against public power, regarding the breach of professional secrets and revealing of government secrets, however this provision would apply to press products by institutions linked to the government such as the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation. Article 135 states that:

A public servant who publishes or communicates information or occurrences which he/she was informed of or documents received because of his/her office, whose confidentiality he/she was obliged to respect, unless the person has an obligation to publish or disclose them, is guilty of a misdemeanour.¹⁷

Furthermore, the Constitution establishes the protection of correspondence in Article 17:

Every person has the right to respect for, and to the secrecy of, his correspondence and other communication if such other communication is made through means not prohibited by law.¹⁸

Labour law does not provide further sanctions regarding journalists in particular. Specialised laws on confidentiality exist for different professional relations, e.g. banking, yet there is no one law applying sanctions for the disclosure of confidential information upon employees as a whole including journalists.

Potential civil actions could arise based on the law of negligence; however the Law on Civil Wrongs does not provide a specialised provision besides several loosely related provisions on defamation. In conclusion, it can be said that Cypriot law does not have any clearly delineated provision imposing a positive duty upon journalists to protect the confidentiality of their sources.

4. Who is a ‘journalist’ according to the national legislation? Is it, in your view, a restricted definition for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources? What is the scope of protection of other media actors? Is the protection of journalist’s sources extended to anyone else?

4.1. Who is a journalist according to Cypriot Law?

In Cyprus, the contentious question of who is a Journalist is addressed in the Press Law of 1989. This legislation draws a distinction between the ‘Cypriot journalist’ and the ‘foreign journalist’, both their definitions being provided by Article 2:

¹⁷ Criminal Code (Chapter 154), Article 135.

¹⁸ Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus (Chapter II on Fundamental Rights and Freedoms) 1960, Article 17.

“Cypriot journalist” means the citizen of the Republic or the foreigner whose main regular and paid professional activity is within a newspaper or newspapers that are published in the Republic and provides towards this newspaper or newspapers exclusively intellectual work as a manager, editor-in-chief, editor, commentator, caricaturist, cartoonist, press photographer, or corrector, engaging with the collection, editing, or revision of journalistic content. The term also includes correspondents of newspapers that are based within the Republic or abroad, as well as those, who, under the same conditions, work in news agencies, which operate in the Republic or in the writing and edition of news content for the broadcasting bulletin of the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation and fall within the category of editors under the service of this Corporation, as well as the operators of the Press and Information Office and exercise journalistic activity.”
“Foreign journalist” means a foreigner who is a journalist by profession and represents a foreign news agency, broadcasting or television station in the Republic or is an entrusted correspondent or envoy extraordinary of such organisation.”¹⁹

The distinction between a Cypriot and a foreign journalist does not manifest itself in any significant practical manner in the law, other than in the procedural requirement of Article 6(4), for foreign journalists who come to Cyprus in their professional capacity for duration longer than a month:

A foreign journalist coming to the Republic for the exercise of his profession must, within one month, deliver his credentials to the Director of the Press and Information Office and apply for registration in the Register of Foreign Journalists.

Cypriot journalists carry a corresponding obligation for registration, with further requirements. The Press Law establishes the Press Council, and organ vested with essential powers over the regulation of the journalistic profession.²⁰ Article 3 provides that the Council bears responsibilities of safeguarding the freedom of press. Particularly, the Council has the responsibility to:

Issue a press card to Cypriot journalists, if satisfied by the production of the relevant certificate from the publisher and editor of the newspaper they (the applicants) are engaged in, or from the General Manager of the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation, or from the Director of the Press and Information Office that the statutory requirements for this purpose are met.²¹

¹⁹ Press Act (145/89), Article 2.

²⁰ Press Act (145/89), Section II: Register of Foreign Journalists, Measures for the Consolidation of the Freedom of Press, Article 3(1).

²¹ Press Act (145/89), Article 3(2) σ.

However, the realisation of this organ has not been possible until this day, and journalists have established their own committee to oversee the application of the Journalistic Ethics Code. Instead, the actual requirements today for the registration of one as a journalist are the following, established by a subsequent amendment to the Press Law:

- Practicing the profession of a journalist,
- Having main, regular, and remunerated employment in mass media operating or issued in Cyprus,
- Providing the Press and Information Office with a letter from one's employer confirming one's journalistic capacity and employment at the relevant organization. The letter should state the name of the person concerned in Greek and English and the ID or passport number.
- Providing a digital photo of oneself to the Press and Information Office.²²

4.2. Evaluation

Is the Cypriot definition restrictive upon who qualifies as a journalist? Interestingly, the Cypriot law has two facets that must exist to enable one to be a "journalist" in the legal sense: falling within the definition of Article 2 of the Press Law, and fulfilling the requirements for registration. Prima facie it does seem that the law imposes a number of requirements that non-conventional journalists cannot comply with. The law must be juxtaposed with Recommendation 2000/7 of the Council of Europe to examine whether it indeed provides a restrictive definition according to contemporary standards.

The commentary to the Recommendation clearly states that protection of journalistic sources is not afforded to those who do not fall within the definition of "journalist", subject to Principle 2.²³ This principle urges the extension of the right of non-disclosure of sources to:

"Other persons who, by their professional relations with journalists, acquire knowledge of information identifying a source through the collection, editorial processing or dissemination of this information [...]"

Furthermore, the definition of "journalist" itself has a notably wider scope in the Recommendation:

The term "journalist" means any natural or legal person who is regularly or professionally engaged in the collection and dissemination of information to the public via any means of mass communication;

Not only does the Recommendation effectively extend the status of press products to any products without differentiating between printed or simply disseminated material, but it also extends the journalistic status to any regular gatherer and communicator of all types of information including press, photographs, audiovisual, and computer-based material. According to Principle 2, for the purpose of the protection of sources, even persons that come to know of such sources through their closeness to journalists fall under the definition of a journalist. The ²² Press Act (145/89), Amendment 84/I of 2002.

²³ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the Right of Journalists Not to Disclose Their Sources of Information (Council of Europe), II Commentary, Definitions, para. 10.

commentary further adds that freedom of expression is understood as implying free access to the journalistic profession and, therefore, the definition should not exclude part-timers, freelancers, newcomers to the profession, or independent investigators.²⁴

These aspects are not addressed in Cypriot Law nor has it been extended in any notable case. Cypriot legislation evidently provides for a traditional definition of the term “journalist” as one associated with a traditional media organisation.²⁵ Although the definition bears elements of viewing journalism as an activity, it still treats it as a profession. Evidently, this is a restrictive interpretation of the concept of journalism and journalists. The Press Law certainly could be modernised to further approach the standards of Recommendation 2000/7. However, an indication of judicial opinion is indeed given on the matter, in the Makrides decision:

The freedom of expression of course presupposes some other person to whom ideas are expressed or imparted and for this reason the freedom of expression includes the right to publication or circulation (see Martin. v. Struthers (1943) 87 Law ed. 1313) as well as freedom to receive and publish (see Express Newspapers v. Union of Indian (1958) S.C. 578-614). The freedom of expression and particularly the freedom of the press as protected by the Constitution and by the international conventions presupposes that there should not be imposed any preventive restriction in the form of a previous licence or preventive censorship. This view is supported by Article 19.5 of the Constitution which runs as follows: "Nothing in this Article contained shall prevent the Republic from requiring the licensing of sound and vision broadcasting or cinema enterprises".

The increasingly growing journalistic activity of the ‘citizen journalist’ triggers the necessity for a wider legal definition of the ‘journalist’ in Cyprus, especially since the rapidly shifting nature of journalism does not leave Cyprus unaffected. Today everything becomes more transparent and accessible through the Internet and social media, allowing anyone to practice journalism.²⁶ This growing journalistic activity is apparent among Cypriot citizens as well, who pursue it more and more using the tools of the modern technology and the reach of the internet to generate content that would otherwise not be revealed.²⁷ Such type of citizen journalism can go far beyond the reach of professional journalism, while Cypriot legislation does not touch upon it. This creates a lacuna of law leading to the objective interpretation of current law as restrictive on the concept of the journalist.

²⁴ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the Right of Journalists Not to Disclose Their Sources of Information (Council of Europe), II Commentary, Definitions, para. 13 (ii).

²⁵ Kent T., “Who’s a Journalist? Closing in on a Definition” (Huffpost Media, 2013) <http://www.huffingtonpost.com/thomas-kent/whos-a-journalist-closing_b_4033856.html> Accessed May 2016.

²⁶ Avsaroglu N., “The Meaning of Journalism in the 21st Century” (Euronews Culture 2014) <<http://www.euronews.com/2014/09/16/the-meaning-of-journalism-in-the-21st-century/>> Accessed May 2016.

²⁷ Barnes C., “Citizen Journalism vs Traditional Journalism: A Case for Collaboration” (2012), Caribbean Quarterly (Vol. 58 No. 2/3).

5. What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources? How are the laws implemented? How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?

The legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources are found in the Press Law (145/89). Article 8(1) provides that:

“A journalist, either Cypriot or foreigner, has the right not to disclose the source of the information that he/she published and to refuse on this occasion to provide evidence, without being penalized because of his/her refusal.”²⁸

However, as with most rights, the right to protection of journalistic sources is not absolute and is subject to limitations. Article 8(2) of the Press Law provides the conditions for the limitation of this right in exceptional circumstance of a relation to a criminal offence:

“In the exceptional circumstance whereby a journalist has published a piece of information that relates to a criminal offence, it is possible that he/she might be forced by means of Court order that undertook the specific offence, or by a coroner to disclose his/her sources, provided that the Court or the coroner is satisfied that the following conditions cumulatively apply:

- (a) The information is precisely related with the criminal offence;
- (b) There is no alternative means through which the same information can be acquired;
- (c) For reasons of higher public interest, it is necessary that the information is disclosed.

It is therefore evident that the protection of journalistic sources may only be lifted under special conditions and only regarding situations where the information in question is directly linked to a criminal offence. Comparing this to the requirements recognised by the ECtHR in its balancing test, the national and international principles theoretically align. The ECHR, in Goodwin v. UK, found that where and as far as an overriding requirement in the public interest exists and the case is sufficiently serious a disclosure might be considered necessary in a democratic society, in accordance with Article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights.²⁹ A disclosure is lawful if the public interest outweighs the legitimate interest of the source in this case, and there are no alternative means of obtaining the necessary information, all in light of the principle of proportionality.

Regarding the hearing of complaints, the Press Council envisaged by the Press Law in Article 3 is statutorily vested with the power to review complaints and in particular:

²⁸ Press Act (145/89), Article 8.1.

²⁹ Goodwin v. the United Kingdom App no. 28957/95 (2002) to investigate complaints regarding the press and its function and to examine, in its own motion or following a complaint, accusations against newspapers and journalists of non-professional acts or behaviour, and decide upon them and indicate the appropriate remedial measures.

As with other functions which the Press Council would be in power to perform had it come into existence, journalists have developed their own self-regulatory mechanism to oversee complaints. The Journalistic Ethics Code in Article 3 establishes the Committee of Journalistic Ethics which, among others, has overseeing capacity:

The Committee receives, deals with and decides on complaints of alleged violations of this Code by a journalist and/or mass media. It also provides, at its discretion and in the spirit of this Code, interpretative guidance lines. The media and those working for them undertake to cooperate with the Commission in conducting its inquiries.

Exceptionally, the Committee may hear the case ex officio which may amount to an infringement, given their importance and seriousness.

The Committee's objective is to settle as soon as possible, any dispute which may entail a material breach of this Code. If no settlement is reached, the Committee examines the complaint and decides whether it violated the Code.

The Committee is not entitled to impose any penalty or award compensation, or to deal with a complaint that is the subject of proceedings before a court or organ vested with that power.³⁰

Beyond the freedom of non-disclosure in Article 5 of the Journalistic Ethics code mentioned above, little else is statutorily or otherwise determined in terms of when and how this procedure can or must take place, or what procedures are undertaken in those circumstances, and such conditions have not risen so far in the case law.

The Criminal Code in any case does stipulate the liability of any person who disobeys lawful orders in Article 137, which could apply in the case of a journalist refusing to disclose their sources in spite of a court order:

Whoever disobeys an injunction, warrant, or order issued by a court, officer or person acting in any official capacity and is properly authorised for it, is guilty of misdemeanour and liable to imprisonment for two years, except when another penalty or procedure in connection with such disobedience is explicitly specified.

³⁰ Journalistic Ethics Code (1997), Article 3.

6. In the respective national legislation, are the limits of non-disclosure of the information in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7? What are the procedures applied? Is the disclosure limited to exceptional circumstances, taking into consideration vital public or individual interests at stake? Do the authorities first search for and apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the right of journalists not to disclose information?

The Committee of Ministers in 2000 adopted the Recommendation 2000 (7) which recognises the freedom of expression as an essential foundation for a democratic society.³¹ The development of free, independent, and pluralist media, in which the protection of journalists' sources is an elemental condition for journalistic work, is therefore crucial. Principle 1 of the Recommendation stipulates that:

“Domestic law and practice in member states should provide for explicit and clear protection of the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source in accordance with Article 10 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the principles established herein, which are to be considered as minimum standards for the respect of this right.”

Cypriot law indeed does provide such clear basic protection in the form of a negative freedom, as seen in the Press Law and the Journalistic Ethics code. Principle 3 of the Recommendation further provides the limitations of this right, in different subsections, which will be juxtaposed with Cypriot provisions. Subsection (a) posits that the right of journalists not to disclose their source of information must not be subject to other restrictions than those mentioned in Article 10.2 of the Convention, therefore any intrusion upon this right must be a) prescribed by law b) necessary in a democratic society and c) established in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, prevention of disorder or crime, protection of health or morals, protection of the reputation or rights of others, preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.³²

Cypriot judges have attested to the soundness of this provision while also applying its exceptions in their judgment in Hadjinikolaou v. The Police, a case concerning the public encouragement of violence through a newspaper article contrary to the Criminal Code, saying that:

“This Court attaches particular significance to the present case since it concerns the right of freedom of expression [...] guaranteed under Article 19 of the Constitution as well as the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights which is applicable to Cyprus under the provisions of Article 169 of the ³¹ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7.

³² European Convention on Human Rights (entry into force September 1953), Article 10.2.

Constitution [...]. But even in the Constitution and the Convention there are reservations and limitations and rightly so, in our concurring opinion, because while no one can doubt that the right to freedom of expression is [...] a characteristic of any civilized society and democratic country, however, it must be such that the reasons for subjecting it to the law must not be overlooked [...].³³

Among the very few cases that touch upon the necessity, adequacy, and proportionality requirements while applying Article 10 of the Convention, this excerpt showcases that the criminal offence exception of Article 8 of the Press law is the most important exception where the disclosure of sources can be demanded. It can be inferred that Cypriot courts would follow the line of the Recommendation seeing as the current Cypriot legislation bears similarities to it – however, there is no substantial mention in Cypriot law of the gravity of the criminal offence in question.

As seen in Question 1, the Press Law only provides for the criminal offence exception, while the Journalistic Ethics Code expands this list by including this exception under the umbrella of specified public interest along with public safety or health, protection of human rights, and prevention of the deception of the public (Article 15). These run in accordance with Subsection (b) of Principle 3 on the limits of non-disclosure, which provides that the disclosure of information is unnecessary unless satisfactorily established that alternative measures to the disclosure do not exist or have been exhausted by the persons or public authorities that seek the disclosure (imposed by Article 8 Press Law) and that the legitimate interest in the disclosure clearly outweighs the public interest in the non-disclosure.

Subsection (c) provides that these requirements are relevant at all stages of proceedings where non-disclosure is invoked. Beside the case-law and the limited wording of the Press Law, there is no further stipulation as to the procedural aspect of any such application before a court of law. Nothing precludes the application of subsection (c) in any stage of court proceedings where non-confidentiality is invoked.

Finally, according to the Recommendation, alternative methods of gaining information may include internal police investigations, investigation of persons connected to the journalists, and others. There is no provision in the law providing for alternative measures for gaining information before resorting to the request for disclosure of journalistic sources, besides the clear position that this must be the last means possible.

In conclusion, duly noting the lack of a sophisticated legislative direction on the matter, it can be said that the current indications of Cypriot law signify that it runs parallel to the requirements of Principle 3 of Recommendation 2000/7.

³³ Hadjinikolaou v. The Police (1976) 2 C.L.R. 63.

7. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 the following principles should be respected when the necessity of disclosure is stated: absence of reasonable alternative measures, outweighing legitimate interest (protection of human life, prevention of major crime, defence of a person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime). Under which criteria can the interest in the disclosure outweigh the interest in the non-disclosure?

Recommendation (2000) 7 states that the interest in disclosure may outweigh that of confidentiality in cases where the disclosure is necessary to safeguard human life, prohibit major crime, or defending a person accused of having committed a major crime. However, the interest should always be balanced against the damage to freedom of expression from the disclosure, and it should be ordered by an individual or body with an explicit legitimate interest that has taken all possible alternative measures to secure that interest. Even so, the extent of disclosure should be limited as far as possible, and any sanctions against journalists who refuse to disclose their source of information should be applied by an impartial court after a fair trial and be subject to appeal to a higher court if it be necessary.

Seeing as there is no national cases which deals particularly with the balancing of interests between disclosure and confidentiality of journalistic sources, one must turn to these provisions and extrapolate the criteria that would be applicable in a Cypriot case. Article 19 of the Cypriot Constitution, seen earlier, provides that exceptions to the right to freedom of expression may take place. These can be formalities, conditions, restrictions, or penalties which are prescribed by law and are necessary in the interests of the national security; the constitutional order; public safety, order, health, or morals; protection of reputation or rights of others; preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence; maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. These are significantly wider than the cases mentioned by the Recommendation, yet one must keep in mind that they apply as limitations of freedom of expression in general, not specifically to orders of disclosure of journalistic sources.

Looking back at Hadjnikolaou, mentioned earlier, it found that it was acceptable to limit the freedom of expression in order to subdue press which incited violence and thus violated provisions of the Criminal Code. The nature of the exceptions of the Recommendation seem to fall in line with the principle put forth by this case, since both revolve around matters of serious legal weight, such as large-scale crime.

Another criterion corresponding to the Recommendation may be extrapolated from Article 8 of the Press Law, and that is the necessity of having exhausted all alternative means of acquiring the sought-after information. As was mentioned, the law does not propose alternative means of investigation like the Recommendation does; yet it authoritatively states that in the exception of a criminal offence, exhausting alternative means is a must.

A holistic overview of the provisions examined so far sketch a legal landscape which, although lacks essential elements to protect confidentiality and journalistic sources directly, still provides principles that draw a significant protective framework that corresponds to an extent with Recommendation 2000/7. This is a fortunate fact since, even in cases that entail a strong public interest in disclosing the identity of a source, there is a strong case to be made for the fundamental function of the protection of sources in a democracy:

“In some cases... the more important the interest violated, the more important it will be to protect the sources... It must be assumed that a broad protection of sources will lead to more revelations of hidden matters than if the protection is limited or not given at all.”³⁴

As G. Robertson and A. Nicol point out in their handbook on media law:

“Were it not for “unofficial sources” obligingly taking “off the record” to journalists, there would be simply be much less news in the newspapers. There would be fewer facts and less information for discussion, for dispute and sometimes for retraction, in democratic society [...]. If sources, frightened of exposure and reprisal, decide not to talk, there will not only be less news, but the news which is published, will be less reliable. It will not be checked for spin”.³⁵

Recommendation 2000/7 could be described as a weapon that can guarantee to journalists protection of their confidential source of information. The criteria that Cypriot law poses in order to compromise the level of this freedom seem to be rather vague and unreliable at present, but seem to follow the trail of the Recommendation.

8. In the light of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights how do national courts apply the respective laws with regard to the right to protect sources? In particular, how do they balance the different interests at stake?

How does the ECtHR place a balance between the public interest and the right to non-disclosure, and how do the ripple effects of this translate into the Cypriot legal order? ECtHR case-law has persistently upheld the thresholds it set for potential derogations to the non-disclosure right through decisions like Goodwin and Sanoma, but it has also made clear that Article 10 does not provide absolute protection.

This is best illustrated through the criminal offence exception, as in Nordisk Film v. Denmark in which a domestic order of disclosure of sources concerning a child sex ring was considered a proportionate interference, necessary to prevent a serious crime.³⁶ The notion of preventing critical erosions of public interest by serious crime is prominent in the case-law.³⁷ Moreover, the Court demonstrated that not all sources fall within the meaning of “journalistic sources” in Stichting Ostade Blade v Netherlands which involved a letter claiming responsibility for a bomb attack.³⁸ The Court has previously ruled that even when sources may be unlawful an order of disclosure is unlikely to be proportionate;³⁹ however the particular gravity of this case offset confidentiality claims.

³⁴ Kontrollutvalget v. Johansen [1992] 1 L.N.R. 39, quoted in Steingrim Wolland, “Press Law in Norway” in Press Law and Practice: A comparative Study of Press Freedom in European and other Democracies, 116 para. 19

³⁵ G. Robertson & A. Nicol, Robertson & Nicol on Media Law (Sweet & Maxwell 4th edition, London 2002) pp. 254-255.

³⁶ Nordisk Film & TV A/S v. Denmark App. no 40485/02 (2005)

The Press Law of 1989 provides the right to journalists to maintain the confidentiality of their sources even withstanding government demands. On this, Terzis notes “authorities generally respect these rights in practice; however, in some cases journalists have been obstructed in their reporting, fined and threatened with more serious charges”.⁴⁰ Legal scholars, Stratilatis and Emilianides, explain that the progression away from traditional media in Cyprus has put pressure on the existing legal framework, which does not adequately guarantee the essential freedoms it protects.⁴¹

As seen earlier, the Cypriot Constitution takes on a rather expansive view of the notion of public interest in Article 19 for freedom of expression in general. But for specific derogations of a journalist’s right of non-disclosure, the exceptions are limited to public interest in the Journalistic Ethics Code (concerning the detection of crime, public safety/ health, human rights, or preventing the deception of the public) and criminal offences, with its criteria set out, in the Press Law.

A slight mention of the keeping of this balance was given in the Makrides case:

“The journalist may perhaps be called upon to reveal the sources of his information, in the name, however, of public interest and national security.”

Besides adding a consideration of national security, this case cannot be of any further indicative value for journalistic sources, since its subject matter did not relate to such revealing, nor did it deal with matters of criminal gravity. No other case has touched upon this considerably either. However a reading of the case demonstrates the strong reliance that Cypriot courts place on common law jurisprudence—and the UK approach to this matter is more allowing of derogations than the ECtHR standard.⁴² For example, the UK Court of Appeal recognized the notion that some sources are not worth protecting notably in Camelot v Centaur in 1997, a case concerning a company’s financial records.⁴³ The ECtHR expressed the same principle in Stichting Ostade Blade in 2014, a case concerning terrorism.

³⁷ Ressiot and Others v. France App no 15054/07 and 15066/07 (2012).

³⁸ Stichting Ostade Blade v Netherlands App no 8406/06 (2014).

³⁹ Tillack v. Belgium App no 0477/05 (2007).

⁴⁰ Georgios Terzis, European Media Governance: National and Regional Dimensions, (Bristol: Intellect Books, 2008) p. 207.

⁴¹ Stratilatis C. & Emilianides A., Media Law in Cyprus, (Kluwer: Netherlands 2015), p. 45.

⁴² Centre for Media Pluralism and Media Freedom (European University Institute) “On Protection of Journalistic Sources” October 10, 2014 < <http://journalism.cmpf.eui.eu/discussions/on-protection-of-journalistic-sources/> > Accessed June 2016.

⁴³ Camelot Group Plc. v Centaur Communications [1997] EWCA Civ 2554, [1999] QB 124.

A potential application of the above could lead to a balancing on interests that tips a little more to the end of disclosure of sources. However, given the historical relationship of Cypriots and the ECtHR on matters of utmost human rights importance, the weight that Cypriot courts should give to the ECtHR's interpretation is not dismissible.

9. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information? Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

The ECtHR's approach to surveillance and seizure may be extrapolated by various cases. Court orders requiring journalists to release information from sources that were international arms traders as in Voskuil v The Netherlands, or even where the source was a government secret service official as in Telegraaf Media Nederland Landelijke Media B.V. and Others v. the Netherlands were not seen as proportionate.⁴⁴ In Roemen and Schmit v Luxembourg, investigators had been armed with search warrants and had raided a journalist's home.⁴⁵ The Court thought the central question was whether the law had upset the balance between the protection of journalistic sources and the effective prevention of crime, and found that it was not an effective measure therefore balance was not struck. The judgment built upon Nordisk Film & TV A/S v. Denmark,⁴⁶ which expressed the principle that an order would be held proportionate where it prevented a serious crime.

Lowenthal notes that the ever-growing reach of government authorities has curbed the ability of members of the press to retain their freedom, with journalists now required to go to ever increasing lengths to code their information and keep their valuable data private.⁴⁷ But are the legal measures in the Cypriot legal order accessible, precise and foreseeable in terms of surveillance? According to the findings of the ECHR, the rule of law test entails several factors: Does the domestic legal system sanction the offence? Is the legal provision accessible to citizens and is it sufficiently precise to allow them to reasonably foresee the consequences which an ⁴⁴*Telegraaf Media Nederland Landelijke Media B.V. and Others v. the Netherlands* App. no 39315/06 (2013).

⁴⁵*Roemen and Schmit v Luxembourg* App. no. 51772/99 (2003).

⁴⁶*Nordisk Film & TV A/S v. Denmark* App. no 40485/02 (2005)

⁴⁷ Tom Lowenthal, "Surveillance Forces Journalists to Think and Act Like Spies" April 17 2015, Available at: <<https://cpj.org/2015/04/attacks-on-the-press-surveillance-forces-journalists-to-think-act-like-spies.php#more>> Accessed 8 March, 2016.

action may entail? And lastly, does the law provide adequate safeguards against arbitrary interference with the respective rights?⁴⁸

Article 17 of the Constitution on the right to Privacy of Correspondence posits the following:

1. Every person has the right to respect and safeguarding of the privacy of correspondence and any other communication of his/hers, so long as the communication is conducted through such means not prohibited by law.

2. There shall be no interference with the exercise of this right unless it is permitted under the law in the following cases:

A. Persons who are in prison or detention.

B. Following a court order issued in accordance with the provisions of the law, at the request of the Attorney General, and the procedure is a measure that in a democratic society it is necessary in the interest of security of the Republic or the prevention, investigation, or prosecution of the following serious criminal offenses:

(a) premeditated murder or manslaughter,

(b) trafficking in adult or juvenile persons and offenses related to child pornography,

(c) marketing, supply, cultivation or production of narcotic drugs, psychotropic substances or dangerous drugs,

(d) offenses related to currency or paper money of the Republic and

(e) corruption offenses for which imprisonment of five years or more upon conviction is stipulated.

C. Following a court order, issued in accordance with the law, for the investigation or prosecution of a serious criminal offense for which five years imprisonment or more upon conviction is stipulated, and the intervention concerns access to the relevant electronic communication data traffic and position and the related data necessary to identify the subscriber or user.

On a related point, Article 15 of the Constitution provides:

1. Everyone has the right to respect for his/her private and family life.

2. There can be no interference on the exercise of this right except one in accordance with the law and necessary only in the interests of security of the Republic or the constitutional order or public security or public policy or public health or morals or the protection of rights and freedoms under the Constitution provided to every person or in the interest of transparency in public life or for purposes of taking measures against corruption in public life.

The Law on the Protection of Confidentiality and Private Communications goes into more detail in Article 8 (Issuance of a Judicial Warrant for Monitoring):⁴⁹

⁴⁸ Greer S., "The exceptions to Articles 8 to 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights" Human rights files No. 15 (Council of Europe Publishing, Strasbourg 1997), p.5.

⁴⁹ The Protection of Confidentiality of Private Communications (Interception and Access to Recorded Private Communication Content) Law of 1996 (92 (I) / 1996).

(1) The Judge may issue a judicial warrant for monitoring, as requested in the application or with such modifications or subject to such conditions which authorise the monitoring of private communications if satisfied that based on the facts presented by the applicant-

(A) There is reasonable suspicion or possibility that a person is committing, has committed or is likely to commit an offense

(B) There is reasonable suspicion or possibility that this private communication is connected or is relevant to the offense

(C) Ordinary examination or investigative procedures have been tried and failed or reasonably appear not expected to succeed if tried or to be dangerous for the proper investigation of the offense or the urgency of the situation is such that it was not practical to conduct surveys or investigations into the offense using other procedures

(D) There is a reasonable suspicion or possibility that the telecommunications device or machine with which, or part of it, or the place where private communication for which monitoring is requested will be held, is being used or is intended or expected to be used in connection with the commission of such offense or it is owned or is registered in the name of a person or commonly used by a person to which reference is made in subsection (1) (a) above;

(E) The issuance of such a court order is in the interest of justice.

The Article describes the contents of the warrant:

(2) A judicial warrant issued under subsection (1) may contain such terms and conditions as the judge considers appropriate and it describes-

(A) the identity of the person, if known, for which a monitoring of private communications is requested,

(B) the nature and location, if known, from where it is intended to monitor private communications, which are identified by the Authority,

(C) the type of private communication for which monitoring is requested and the specific offense to which it relates,

(D) the manner in which it seeks to carry out the monitoring,

(E) the institution or person who is responsible for monitoring and which is the authority or body or person with the permission of the Authority and on such conditions imposed by the Authority or the Chief of Police or the Director of Customs,

(F) the period for which the authorisation is granted, which contains an order whether the monitoring is terminated automatically or not when the described private communication has been received.

Lastly, the Article states that if the above requirements are met, certain actions can be taken:

(3) Judicial warrant issued under this section shall, upon request of the applicant, order the Authority or a person acting on the Authority's authorisation and subject to such conditions imposed by the Authority, provide the applicant or the Chief of Police or Director of Customs, without delay, all necessary information, facilities and technical assistance for the implementation of the court order.

(4) The court order may authorise entry into any premises specified therein for the purpose of installation, maintenance, use or removal of any telecommunication equipment, which is used for monitoring, compliance with the provisions of any existing law.

(5) A judicial warrant issued under this section does not authorise or approve monitoring of any private communication for a period longer than necessary at the discretion of the judge to achieve the objective of the authorisation and, in any event, not for a period more than thirty days. Extensions of the court order may be given from time to time on application made in accordance with Article 7, and if the reasons described in subsection remain fulfilled (1). The time period of each extension is not greater than necessary, at the discretion of the judge, to achieve this objective and, in any event, not more than thirty days.

It is further important to see how this law itself defines offences in Article 3:

1) Except where specifically provided otherwise in this Act, any person who-

(A) willfully intercepts or monitors or otherwise accesses or attempts to intercept or monitor, or in any way to access or cause or permit or authorise any other person to intercept or monitor or access or attempt to intercept or to attend or to access the content of any private communication; or

(B) knowingly uses, attempts to use or cause or permit or authorise any other person to use or attempt to use any electronic, mechanical, electromagnetic, acoustic or other device or machine, for the purpose of interception or monitoring or access to the content of any private communication; or

(C) willfully discloses or attempts to disclose to any other person the contents of any private communication, knowing or having reason to know that the information obtained by interception or monitoring or access private communications content; or

(D) knowingly uses or attempts to use the content of any private communication, knowing or having reason to know that the information obtained by interception or monitoring or access private communications content, is guilty of an offense and on conviction is liable to imprisonment not exceeding five (5) years.

In the recent case, Siamisis, which had to do with the submission of evidence for an online harassment offence, personal data of the accused processed without Court permission were not seen as a sound basis for his conviction. The case did not deal with the protection of journalistic sources in particular, but it is of interest, seeing as the court based its judgment on the provisions of a domestic law put in place to comply with the provisions of the Data Retention Directive:⁵⁰

In this case there was no consent of the appellant for the processing of traffic data of his PC and there was also no court permission for the interference of communication between the complainant and the appellant or to lift the confidentiality of the appellant's communication. Therefore, the process conducted by the Police and CYTA after the complainant gave police the public IP address of the harasser and, through the processing described above, led to the fixed telephone of the appellant and in extension to his identification, was in the circumstances illegal and a violation of the right of private life and the right to privacy of communication, which are guaranteed by Articles 15 and 17 of the Constitution.⁵¹

⁵⁰ Data Retention Directive (2006/24/EC).

The law and the sample of Siamisis demonstrate that there is high regard for Articles 15 and 17 of the Constitution. The principles in Siamisis echo those expressed in the cornerstone case Police v. Georgiades on the privacy of correspondence, in which the learned judges drew from the ECtHR and international case-law to conclude that overhearing of a private conversation through an electronic device installed previously unknown to the defendant or his client was contrary to Articles 15 and 17 of the Constitution:

On a consideration of the objects of Part II of the Constitution, the character of the rights entrenched therein and, the background thereto, outlined in this judgment, I am of the opinion that the basic rights safeguarded in this part of the Constitution, those referring to fundamental freedoms and liberties, are inalienable and inhere in man at all times, to be enjoyed and exercised under constitutional protection. Interference by anyone, be it the State or an individual, is unconstitutional and, a right vests thereupon to the victim to invoke constitutional, as well as municipal, law remedies for the vindication of his rights. The rights guaranteed by Articles 15.1 and 17.1 fall in this category, aimed as they are, to safeguard the dignity of man and ensure a quality of life fit for man and his gifted nature.⁵²

In Georgiades, the Court also said that in Cyprus courts do not enjoy discretion in deciding whether or not to admit evidence obtained through illegal means when those means amount to violations of fundamental rights, safeguarded in part II of the Constitution. The law on the Protection of Confidentiality and Private Communications however makes further stipulations, which may be seen as too broad especially considering the catch-all type provision (1)(E). Furthermore, the Combating Terrorism Act of 2010 expands this further in Article 10 (Refusal to Disclose Information):

A person who holds any information which may help-

- (A) prevent the commission of a terrorism offense by another person or
- (B) ensure the arrest, prosecution, or conviction of another person for the commission of terrorist offenses and conceals such information from any member of the Police, is guilty of an offense and, on conviction, is liable to imprisonment not exceeding two years or to a fine not exceeding ten thousand euro (€ 10.000) or to both such penalties.⁵³

⁵¹ Demetris Siamisis v. The Republic (2011) 2 CLR 308.

⁵² Police v. Georgiades, (1983) 2 CLR 33.

⁵³ The Combating Terrorism Act of 2010 (110 (I) / 2010).

The law defines terrorism in Article 5 (Terrorism Offences):

A person who intentionally performs an act which, given its nature, may seriously damage any country or any international organisation with a purpose;

- The serious intimidation of the public or a public portion or
- Unjust coercion of public authorities or of an international organisation to act or abstain from any act or practice or
- Seriously destabilising or destroying the fundamental political, constitutional, economic or social structures of a country or an international organisation

And this act constitutes-

- (A) an offense listed in the Table of Annex I of this Act,
- (B) an offense listed in the Table of Annex II of this Act,
- (C) the manufacture or possession or acquisition or transfer or supply or use of firearms or radiological weapons or any explosive or other lethal device or nuclear or biological weapons or research and development of biological and chemical weapons,
- (D) causing extensive destruction in-
 - (I) government or public facilities,
 - (Ii) public transport systems,
 - (Iii) infrastructure, including IT systems,
 - (Iv) facilities or property of consular or diplomatic missions,
 - (V) a fixed platform on the continental shelf,
 - (Vi) use of public space,
 - (Vii) Private property,that may endanger human life or cause severe economic damage,
- (E) intervention or disruption or interruption of the water supply, power, or other fundamental natural resource, the effect of which endangers human life, commits a terrorist offense and, on conviction, is liable to life imprisonment.

Stratilatis and Emilianides note that exceptions are a key issue for journalists in Cyprus, where there is a real concern that authorities will engage in such conduct in a matter which is not proportionate to protecting the rights of journalists.⁵⁴ Cyprus requires a stronger framework for the protection of journalistic sources. Claims based on surveillance and terrorism as seen on the laws that were examined may compromise the right of non-disclosure disproportionately. Although the law may be considered sufficiently clear and accessible and in many respects comprehensive, its foreseeability may be lacking, considering the scope of its exceptions and certain vague aspects, as seen above. This will deal irreconcilable damage to the circulation of information. The words of Lord Denning ring true: "if [newspapers] were compelled to disclose their sources, they would soon be bereft of information which they ought to have. Their sources would dry up. Wrongdoing would not be disclosed. Charlatans could not be exposed. Unfairness would go unremedied. Misdeeds in the corridors of power, in companies or in government departments would never be known".⁵⁵

⁵⁴ Stratilatis C. & Emilianides A., Media Law in Cyprus, (Kluwer: Netherlands 2015)

10. Can journalists rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance?

In the case of Makrides Vs Republic (1981)⁵⁶ judge Hadjianastassiou J. explained that in print press, the principle of anonymity gives the power to a publisher to deny revealing the name of an article's author. Today the journalistic battlefield has turned digital and therefore, journalists too bear the responsibility to self-protect and prevent exposure of their identity. Encryption is a first layer of protection and a precautionary measure. The essentials of encryption are statutorily set out. The Electronic Communications and Postal Services Law of 2004 is the harmonizing law established to comply with the e-Privacy Directive of 2002.⁵⁷ The law devotes Chapter 14 to safety, confidentiality, and protection of data. Article 99 provides:

(1) Both the providers referred to in Article 98 (1), and their employees, shall take all appropriate technical and organisational measures to ensure the confidentiality of any communication carried out via an electronic communications network, the publicly available electronic communications services, and related traffic data.

(2) No person, other those communicating with each other, are allowed to listen, eavesdrop, store, interfere and / or conduct any other form of interception of communications and related traffic data without the consent of the users concerned, except to the extent provided in subsection (3).

(3) In the circumstances provided for by the law and with court permission, there can be interference of communications.

(4) The provisions of subsection (2) shall not affect any legally authorised recording of communications and related traffic data in the context of lawful business practice for the purpose of securing evidence of a commercial transaction and / or any other business communication.

(5) The storage of information, or gaining access to information already stored, in the terminal equipment of a subscriber or user is permitted only if the subscriber or user concerned has given his/her consent, based on clear and comprehensive information, in accordance with the provisions of the Processing of Personal Data (Protection of Individuals) Laws, 2001 and 2003, including for the purpose of processing.

Any technical storage or access for the sole purpose of carrying out the transmission of a communication over an electronic communications network, ⁵⁵ British Steel Corporation v Granada Television Ltd [1981] A.C. 1096, 1129.

⁵⁶ Makrides Vs Republic (1981)3 CLR 321.

⁵⁷ Directive on Privacy and Electronic Communications (2002/58/EC).

or that is strictly necessary in order for the information society service provider which has been explicitly requested by the subscriber or user to provide that service, is not prevented by this law.⁵⁸

The Internet Service Provider (ISP) as well as the Commissioner for Personal Data Protection are made the central figures in maintaining and assessing the safety of networks in Chapter 14. Article 98(A) provides:

(1) Subject to subsection (1) of section 98, the provider of publicly available electronic communications service must take, if necessary in conjunction with the provider of a public communications network with respect to network security, the appropriate technical and organisational measures to safeguard security of its services. Taking account of the latest technical possibilities and cost of their implementation, these measures shall ensure a level of security appropriate to the risk presented.

(2) Subject to the provisions of the Processing of Personal Data (Protection of Individuals) Laws, 2001 and 2003, the measures referred to in subsection (1) of this Article, shall at least:

(A) ensure that access to personal data may only be by authorised personnel for legally authorized purposes;

(B) protect stored or transmitted personal data against accidental or unlawful destruction, accidental loss or alteration, and unauthorised or unlawful storage, processing, access or disclosure; and

(C) ensure the application of a safety policy in relation to the processing of personal data

It is provided that the Commissioner and the Commissioner for Personal Data Protection have the power to audit the measures taken by providers of publicly available electronic communications services and to issue recommendations about best practices concerning the level of security to be achieved by these measures.

What is the threshold of IP disclosure in Cyprus and how does the Supreme Court interpret it? This is discussed by Judge Nicolaides in Issaia, a case concerning a writ of Certiorari that requested the Supreme Court to cancel a District Court order for disclosure of telecommunications data, particularly the applicant's IP address.⁵⁹ The judge stated that the exceptions provided in Article 17 of the Constitution, after amendments in 2010, should be activated sparingly and with great caution. The IP address is considered part of the user's private communication and, as seen also in Siamisis, it forms part of personal details through which a user can be identified. Importantly, the judge in Issaia stated that a request to the Court to disclose an IP address must precede a request for the identification of the user of said IP address. This creates a two-layer protection of anonymity.

⁵⁸ The Electronic Communications and Postal Services Law of 2004 (112 (I) / 2004).

⁵⁹ Issaia Andreas and Another (No. 1), (2012) 1 CLR 1966

According to Article 5 of the Retention of Telecommunications Data Aimed at Investigating Serious Criminal Offences Law (2007) it is possible to access data for the investigation of serious criminal offences:⁶⁰

Any service provider, upon presentation of an issued court order issued or letter accompanied by the approval of the Attorney General of the Republic, in accordance with the provisions of Article 4 shall be obliged to immediately and without any undue delay, place at the disposal of the police magistrate all data in the order or in the letter, as appropriate.

On what basis can such a court order be issued? This is clarified by Article 4:

(4) The judge may issue the order specified in subsection (1), as requested in the application or with such modifications or subject to such conditions, which can authorise access to data, if satisfied that based on the events submitted:

(A) There is reasonable suspicion or probability, that a person is committing, has committed, or is likely to commit a serious criminal offense ·

(B) there is reasonable suspicion or possibility that this data is linked or associated with a serious criminal offense.

However, two different articles within this law safeguard the confidentiality of communications: Articles 12 and provide:

(12) The retention of data relating to the content of communication and the disclosure of such content is prohibited and no provision of this Law may be interpreted in a manner contrary to this prohibition.

(22) Nothing in this law shall affect or may be considered to affect the application of the provisions of the Protection of the Confidentiality of Private Communications (Interception) Law.

Evidently the law focuses on the serious criminal offence exception in the manner of the discussed ECtHR case-law. The encryption put in place by the service providers and the anonymity safeguarded by the law however, might be surpassed without much difficulty depending on the circumstances. As seen earlier in Siamisis, in the case of online harassment the unlawful obtaining of personal data that leads to identification was not acceptable. It remains to be seen how these provisions will be applied in national cases in the future.

⁶⁰ Retention of Telecommunications Data Aimed at Investigating Serious Criminal Offences Law of 2007 (183 (I) / 2007).

11. Are whistle-blowers explicitly protected under law protecting journalistic sources? Is there another practice protecting whistle-blowers? Is the legislation prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers?

11.1 Whistle-blower protection under the Press Law

Journalists are protected under the Press Law of 1989, which provides that a journalist has the right not to disclose his source/whistle-blower and to refuse to testify in court without being prosecuted for his/her refusal.⁶¹ The exceptions, elaborated on earlier, to regarding information concerning criminal offences for which a journalist may be ordered by the court to disclose sources if the requirements of a) a direct link, b) no other ways of obtaining the information, and c) an imperative public interest, are fulfilled. Whistle-blowers are covered under the veil of the law and the exceptions that may force a journalist to expose sources. The Press Law makes no further mention of specialized provisions for the protection of whistle-blowers beyond Article 8.

However, with time came the internet age where a whistle-blower has the privilege to disclose information anonymously online. The problem therefore arises: is this sort of whistleblowing covered under the Press Act? The answer would be no, since one would not fulfil the traditional criteria for being a “journalist” under the Press Law. This scenario played out in the case of Author of a Blog v Times Newspapers Ltd [2009] at the UK Court of Appeal.⁶² The claimant was an anonymous blogger who was a serving detective constable while maintaining a blog in which he wrote about aspects of his police work and his opinions on a number of social and political issues relating to the police and the administration of justice. He sought an injunction to restrain the defendant, Times Newspapers Ltd, from publishing any information that would or could lead to his identification as the person responsible for that blog.

The issues arose as to whether the claimant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in relation to the particular information in question and, if so, whether there was some countervailing public interest such as to justify overriding that right. It was held that a journalist who wrote under a pseudonym for the purpose of functioning more effectively in his undercover work had no reasonable expectation of privacy in respect of his identity and, in particular, in relation to photographs which would, when published widely, reveal his identity.

It is often the practice of Cypriot courts to find guidance in British cases when there is no explicit legislation or judicial precedent – therefore it is highly likely that the same outcome would be followed by a Cypriot court as that of this authoritative case. Nevertheless, if the anonymous blogger were a journalist seeking an injunction for his personal details, then the landscape changes and so does the outcome. It would be more likely that he would be granted the injunction since a journalist under Press Act of 1989 is given the right not to disclose his/her source and an injunction would simply enforce this right.

⁶¹ Press Law (1989) Article 8(1).

⁶² Author of a Blog v Times Newspapers Ltd [2009] EWHC 1358 (QB).

11.2. Is there another practice protecting whistle blowers?

Whistle blowers and journalists have a confidential relationship enabled by trust. The confidential relationship of a journalist with the whistle-blower is nothing like the professional privilege of confidentiality between a lawyer and his client, or a doctor and his patient. Taking as an example the Legal Ethics Code for lawyers in Cyprus, the nature of the confidential relationship between lawyer and client is captured in Article 13:

The lawyer is the guardian of confidential information and data entrusted to him by the client. Ensuring confidentiality is a prerequisite to create confidence between the client and the lawyer.⁶³

The relationship between journalist and whistle-blower is different as it does not aim to protect the interest of the whistle-blower but rather to create the necessary circumstances so that the information provided may flow freely and unhindered to the public.⁶⁴ A journalist's duty of confidentiality to the whistle-blower concerns the personal details of the whistle-blower and not the information given to the journalist to expose it to the public.⁶⁵ Also the journalist is bound under the Journalistic Ethics Code to value the confidentiality principle. Any misconduct of the code will be examined by two disciplinary boards.

Noteworthy is also the fact that, as elaborated earlier in discussing Issaia, the Internet has given a new tool to whistle blowers to post anonymous comments or blog online. In Cyprus there is a two-stage process to identify an anonymous comment made by a whistleblower. Issaia delineates that there must be two applications to the Court for an order: first one to uncover the IP address, and then one to identify the user behind it. The Court has discretionary power to issue such an order if it considers that the conditions set by the law are met.

Furthermore, the Combating Terrorism Act of 2010 provides in Article 19 that:

Any witness in criminal proceedings concerning an offense provided for in this Law, is considered as a witness in need of assistance and the provisions of the Witness Protection Law apply.

This protection is evidently provided for trial proceedings and not for the non-disclosure of sources by journalists. It provides for certain safeguards to shield the witness's identity from the accused. Witness Protection Law Article 5 posits:

⁶³ Legal Ethics Code Cyprus, Article 13 "Professional Confidentiality".

⁶⁴ Loukaidis L.G., Topics of Cyprus Law (Nicosia 1982) pp.111-112; Branzburg v. Hayes 408 U.S. 665 (1972)

⁶⁵ Ibid. Loukis G. Loukaidis pp.111-112.

- (1) In the determination of offenses and for the purposes of witness protection in need of assistance, the Court may order as-
 - (A) All or part of the case heard in camera; and
 - (B) the testimony of any witness in need of assistance or another person, the filing of which may be adversely affected, taken in the absence of the accused as instructed and make the necessary arrangements so that the accused know of the testimony of the witness and cross-examine him.
- (2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) the Court may, especially for witness protection purposes, to order-
 - (A) The installation of a special screen; or
 - (B) The use of CCTV; or
 - (C) Use of any other means or system,So that the accused cannot be visible from the control and vice versa.
- (3) In order to safeguard the rights of the accused, the Court must, in the above cases, be satisfied that the appropriate technological and other arrangements have been made and that all appropriate measures have been taken that the defendant be able to listen to the proceedings and give instructions his lawyer.

There exist no legally assured alternate practices for the protection of whistle blowers. This was identified as a problem on the findings of Transparency International through the Global Corruption Barometer 2013, with about half of the households surveyed refusing to report cases of corruption, underlining the fear of consequences as the main reason not to make such reports.⁶⁶

11.3. Is the legislation prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers?

There exists no legislation expressly prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistleblowers, save for the layers of protection discussed earlier. And even beyond that, in the existence of a court order, protection is difficult.

If a court order is granted to reveal an IP address, this amounts to a legal obligation which, if it is not fulfilled, may make an individual liable under section 42 of the Courts of Justice Act. The Court is able to impose a fine or imprisonment, proceed with sequestration of property, or adjudicate on compensation. Non-compliance with a court order can also bring into play the Criminal Code (section 137) which in that case provides for a fine or imprisonment for two years. In Turban Kazim Shemsettin v. Timour the respondents were sentenced to 30 days of imprisonment for contempt of Court under Section 42 of the Courts of Justice Act.⁶⁷ This was deemed to be in full conformity with Article 162 of the Constitution which allows the Court to order imprisonment until a judgment or order is complied with.

⁶⁶ Transparency International <<http://www.transparency.org/gcb2013/country/?country=cyprus>> Accessed May 2016.

⁶⁷ Turban Kazim Shemsettin v. Timour Civil Appeal No. 64/2005.

Until 2002 it was not possible in the context of civil proceedings to punish an individual who was not party to the proceedings. This is affirmed in Christoforou v. The Archbishop of Cyprus Chrysostomos where the Supreme Court found that the jurisdiction of the Court in civil proceedings is confined to the parties before it and not to third parties who may be liable for criminal but not civil contempt.⁶⁸ Following the 80 (1)/2002 amendment of section 42 of the Courts of Justice Act 14/60, the law provides that it is possible to punish third parties for contempt if such parties have knowledge of it and knowingly and intentionally induce non-compliance.

What about protection under the Press Act? If a whistleblower is giving information to a journalist and the journalist is publishing it (and the exceptions of Press Act Art 8(2) do not apply) then the journalist has the power not to disclose the whistleblower without being prosecuted. But what is most likely to occur if a journalist refuses to identify a whistleblower is that authority or company will bring a defamation claim. In that case the burden of proof to prove that the statement is truthful lies on the defendant.⁶⁹

So if journalists do not summon their whistleblower to testify, their testimony may be considered hearsay evidence, therefore undermining their position. They themselves may also be considered an unreliable witness as it happened in Yaacoub. This will bring a journalist to a professional conflict: he/she must decide between financial loss and loss of professional reputation through a lawsuit on one hand, and his/her reputation in the whistleblower world, risking or severely damaging his/her ability to be contacted by whistleblowers ever again on the other. The journalist must choose between suffering the reputational and economic loss of the lawsuit, or he summoning the whistleblower to testify as a witness to promote his/her defense. This proves that the Press Act is not a sufficient way to protect whistleblowers and perhaps freedom of expression generally.

12. Conclusion

It is fairly noticeable that Cypriot law on press freedom has a traditional air that arguably does not fit the modern circumstances of journalism, and that may inhibit journalistic work and especially the adequate protection of journalistic sources. On the other hand, it is also evident that matters relating to personal data and encryption in the law have been heavily influenced by the paradigm of EU law, forming an elaborate web of protection. Although the law in several older pieces of legislation may not set an explicit standard for the gravity of the offence, newer pieces of legislation seem to place an emphasis on the gravity of the criminal offence, with the available indicative case law on data protection pointing to the direction of a high standard. Yet there are aspects of the law that may still be criticized as lacking foreseeability and clarity, thus creating an uncertain basis for Cypriot to stand on when deciding to impart information in a confidential veil.

⁶⁸ Re Archbishop of Cyprus Chrysostomos (1993) 1 CLR 961.

⁶⁹ Eteria Ellinikes Ekdosis «Glafox Ltd» v. Loizja (1984) 1 C.L.R. 729; Parkes R., Mullis A. et al, Gatley on Libel and Slander (Sweet & Maxwell, 2013) 12th Edn, Main Volume, Chapter 11, Section 11.4 "The Burden of Proof".

It remains a fact however that aspects such as the definition of the journalist and the journalistic profession, the scope of protection of the confidentiality of sources, and the scope of the exceptions therein, require an update that would hold up to the standard of Recommendation 2000(7) for a better defined framework of protection. The question of whether bloggers are journalists by law, or cases that require a standard of gravity for a criminal offence to qualify as an exception to the non-disclosure rule will soon arise in Cyprus. When that time comes the Cypriot judge may be illuminated by dense case law on the matter, both emanating from the ECHR and from common law jurisdictions that commonly serve as a source of guidance, and inspiration. Yet the initial change must come from the legislator. The law should recognize the modern complexities of the journalistic world and provide equal and strong protection to the Cypriot journalist's sources, so that quality journalism may be allowed to emerge.

13. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

13.1. Legislation

- Combating Terrorism Act of 2010 (110(I)/2010)
- Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus (1960)
- Criminal Code (Chapter 154)
- Electronic Communications and Postal Services Act of 2004 (112 (I) / 2004)
- Press Act (145/89)
- Protection of Confidentiality of Private Communications (Interception and Access to Recorded Private Communication Content) Act of 1996 (92(I)/1996)
- Retention of Telecommunications Data Aimed at Investigating Serious Criminal Offences Act (183(I)/2007)
- Self-regulatory Mechanisms
- Journalistic Ethics Code (1997)
- Legal Ethics Code
- Data Retention Directive (2006/24/EC)
- Directive on Privacy and Electronic Communications (2002/58/EC)
- European Convention on Human Rights (1953)
- Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the Right of Journalists Not to Disclose Their Sources of Information (Council of Europe) Commentary, Definitions

13.2. Case Law

- Adali v. Turkey App no 38187/97 (2005)
- Financial Times Ltd & Ors v. UK App no. 821/03 (2009)
- Goodwin v. the United Kingdom App no. 28957/95 (2002)
- Nordisk Film & TV A/S v. Denmark App. no 40485/02 (2005)
- Ressiot and Others v. France App no 15054/07 and 15066/07 (2012)
- Roemen and Schmit v Luxembourg App No. 51772/99 (2003)
- Sanoma Uitgevers BV v Netherlands App no. 38224/03 (2010)
- Stichting Ostade Blade v Netherlands App no 8406/06 (2014)
- Telegraaf Media Nederland Landelijke Media B.V. and Others v. Netherlands App no 39315/06 (2013)
- Tillack v. Belgium App no 0477/05 (2007)
- Voskuil v. Netherlands App no. 64752/01 (2007)
- Demetris Siamisis v. The Republic (2011) 2 CLR 308
- Eteria Ellinike Ekdosis «Glafox Ltd» v. Loizia (1984) 1 C.L.R. 729
- Hadjiniolaou v. The Police (1976) 2 C.L.R. 63

- Hossam Taleb Yaacoub v. The Republic, Criminal Appeal No. 72/2013, 19/3/2014
- Kostas Makrides and other v. Ministry of Interior and Director of the Public Information Office (1981), 3 CLR 321
- Police v. Georgiades, (1983) 2 CLR 33
- Kontrollutvalget v. Jobansen [1992] 1 L.N.R. 39
- Author of a Blog v. Times Newspapers Ltd [2009] EWHC 1358 (QB)
- British Steel Corporation v Granada Television Ltd [1981] A.C. 1096, 1129
- Camelot Group Plc. v Centaur Communications [1997] EWCA Civ 2554, [1999] QB 124.
- Branzburg v. Hayes 408 U.S. 665 (1972)

13.3. Books and articles

- Loukaidis L.G, Topics of Cyprus Law (Nicosia 1982)
- Parkes R, Mullis A, Busuttill G, Speker A, Scott A, Gatley on Libel and Slander, 12th edition (Sweet & Maxwell, London 2013).
- Parkes R., Mullis A. et al, Gatley on Libel and Slander (12th edn, Sweet & Maxwell, 2013)
- Robertson G, Nicol A, Robertson & Nicol on Media Law, 4th edition (Sweet & Maxwell, London 2002).
- Stratilatis C, Emilianides A, Media Law in Cyprus, (Kluwer: Netherlands 2015).
- Terzis G, European Media Governance: National and Regional Dimensions (Intellect Books, Bristol 2008)
- Whitten-Woodring J, and Belle D, Historical Guide to World Media Freedom (Sage Publications 2014)
- Bailie M, and Azgin B, “Disturbing the Peace: Gender, Journalism and the Cypriot Press” (2011), Journalism Studies Vol. 12(5).
- Barnes C, “Citizen Journalism vs Traditional Journalism: A Case for Collaboration” (2012), Caribbean Quarterly Vol. 58(2/3).
- Greer S, “The exceptions to Articles 8 to 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights” (1997) Human rights files No. 15 (Council of Europe Publishing, Strasbourg).
- Hatzimihail N, “Reconstructing Mixity: Sources of Law and Legal Method in Cyprus” (2015) in Palmer V, Mattar M, and Koppel A (eds.), Mixed Legal Systems, East and West (Ashgate).
- Steingrim W, “Press Law in Norway” in Press Law and Practice: A comparative Study of Press Freedom in European and other Democracies

13.4. Internet Sources

- Avsaroglu N, “The Meaning of Journalism in the 21st Century” (Euronews Culture 2014) <<http://www.euronews.com/2014/09/16/the-meaning-of-journalism-in-the-21st-century/>> Accessed May 2016.
- Centre for Media Pluralism and Media Freedom (European University Institute) “On Protection of Journalistic Sources” October 10, 2014 <

<http://journalism.cmpf.eui.eu/discussions/on-protection-of-journalistic-sources/>>
Accessed June 2016.

- Freedom House, Cyprus: Freedom of the Press, 2015, Available at: <<https://freedomhouse.org/report/freedom-press/2015/cyprus>> Accessed March 2016.
- Kent T, “Who’s a Journalist? Closing in on a Definition” (Huffpost Media, 2013) <http://www.huffingtonpost.com/thomas-kent/whos-a-journalist-closing_b_4033856.html> Accessed May 2016.
- Lowenthal T, “Surveillance Forces Journalists to Think and Act Like Spies” April 17 2015, Available at: <<https://cpj.org/2015/04/attacks-on-the-press-surveillance-forces-journalists-to-think-act-like-spies.php#more>> Accessed 8 March, 2016.
- Transparency International <<http://www.transparency.org/gcb2013/country/?country=cyprus>> Accessed May 2016.

14. TABLE OF PROVISIONS

Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus
Article 15	1. Everyone has the right to respect for his/her private and family life. 2. There can be no interference on the exercise of this right except one in accordance with the law and necessary only in the interests of security of the Republic or the constitutional order or public security or public policy or public health or morals or the protection of rights and freedoms under the Constitution provided to every person or in the interest of transparency in public life or for purposes of taking measures against corruption in public life.
Article 17	1. Every person has the right to respect and safeguarding of the privacy of correspondence and any other communication of his/hers, so long as the communication is conducted through such means not prohibited by law. 2. There shall be no interference with the exercise of this right unless it is permitted under the law in the following cases: A. Persons who are in prison or detention. B. Following a court order issued in accordance with the provisions of the law, at the request of the Attorney General, and the procedure is a measure that in a democratic society it is necessary in the interest of security of the Republic or the prevention, investigation or prosecution of the following serious criminal offenses: (a) premeditated murder or manslaughter, (b) trafficking in adult or juvenile persons and offenses related to child

	pornography, (c) marketing, supply, cultivation or production of narcotic drugs, psychotropic substances or dangerous drugs, (d) offenses related to currency or paper money of the Republic and (e) corruption offenses for which imprisonment of five years or more upon conviction is stipulated. C. Following a court order, issued in accordance with the law, for the investigation or prosecution of a serious criminal offense for which five years imprisonment or more upon conviction is stipulated, and the intervention concerns access to the relevant electronic communication data traffic and position and the related data necessary to identify the subscriber or user.
Article 19	1. Every person has the right to freedom of speech and expression in any form. 2. This right includes freedom to hold opinions and receive and impart information and ideas without interference by any public authority and regardless of frontiers. 3. The exercise of the rights provided in paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary only in the interests of the security of the Republic or the constitutional order or the public safety or the public order or the public health or the public morals or for the protection of the reputation or rights of others or for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. 4. Seizure of newspapers or other printed matter is not allowed without the written permission of the Attorney-General of the Republic, which must be confirmed by the decision of a competent court within a period not exceeding seventy-two hours, failing which the seizure shall be lifted. 5. Nothing contained in this Article shall prevent the Republic from requiring the licensing of sound and vision broadcasting or cinema enterprises.

Article 169
Cypriot Criminal Code (Chapter 154)
Article 135	A public servant who publishes or communicates information or occurrences which he was informed of or document received because of his office, whose confidentiality he/she was obliged to respect, unless the person has an obligation to publish or disclose them, is guilty of a misdemeanor
Cypriot Law on Press (145/89)
Article 2	"Publication" in terms of newspapers or other printed means, means the distribution, sale, as well as the wall-posting or issuing of the newspaper or other publication in the public place or any assembly or part accessible to the public. "Issue" in terms of newspapers or other printed means, means the printing of the newspaper or other publication. "Newspaper" means any publication with the intention of informing the public, published daily or in larger, but in any case regular, time intervals, up to a maximum / month limit, containing material of general political and social interest. "Cypriot journalist" means the citizen of the Republic or the foreigner whose

	main regular and paid professional activity is within a newspaper or newspapers that are published in the Republic and provides towards this newspaper or newspapers exclusively intellectual work as a manager, editor-in-chief, editor, commentator, caricaturist, cartoonist, press photographer, or corrector, engaging with the collection, editing, or revision of journalistic content. The term also includes correspondents of newspapers that are based within the Republic or abroad, as well as those, who, under the same conditions, work in news agencies, which operate in the Republic or in the writing and edition of news content for the broadcasting bulletin of the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation and fall within the category of editors under the service of this Corporation, as well as the operators of the Press and Information Office and exercise journalistic activity.” “Foreign journalist” means a foreigner who is a journalist by profession and represents a foreign news agency, broadcasting or television station in the Republic or is an entrusted correspondent or envoy extraordinary of such organization.”
Article 3(2)	Specifically, the Press Council has the authority to: 1- investigate complaints regarding the press and its function and to examine, in its own motion or following a complaint, accusations against newspapers and journalists of non-professional acts or behaviour, and decide upon them and indicate the appropriate remedial measures. 2 - Issue a press card to Cypriot journalists, if satisfied by the production of the relevant certificate from the publisher and editor of the newspaper they (the applicants) are engaged in, or from the General Manager of the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation, or from the Director of the Press and Information Office that the statutory requirements for this purpose are met.
Article 6(4)	A foreign journalist coming to the Republic for the exercise of his profession must, within one month, deliver his credentials to the Director of the Press and Information Office and apply for registration in the Register of Foreign Journalists.

Article 8	1. All journalists, Cypriot and foreign, have the right not to disclose their sources of information and to refuse to give evidence without being subject to prosecution for it. 2. The only exception is for cases where a journalist publishes information about a criminal offense. It may then be required by the Court to consider the case, or pestilence investigator to reveal the source, provided that the court or the investigating judge be satisfied that there are cumulatively the following conditions: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • the information is clearly relevant to the criminal offense; • the information cannot be obtained by other means; • Overriding and compelling reasons of public interest require the disclosure of information.
Amendment 84/I	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Practicing the profession of a journalist, • Having main, regular, and remunerated employment in mass media operating or issued in Cyprus, • Providing the Press and Information Office with a letter from one's employer confirming one's journalistic capacity and employment at the relevant organization. The letter should state the name of the person concerned in Greek and English and the ID or passport number. • Providing a digital photo of oneself to the Press and Information Office

Journalistic Ethics Code
Article 3	The Committee receives, deals with and decides on complaints of alleged violations of this Code by a journalist and/or mass media. It also provides, at its discretion and in the spirit of this Code, interpretative guidance lines. The media and those working for them undertake to cooperate with the Commission in conducting its inquiries. Exceptionally, the Committee may hear the case ex officio which may amount to an infringement, given their importance and seriousness. The Committee's objective is to settle as soon as possible, any dispute which may entail a material breach of this Code. If no settlement is reached, the Committee examines the complaint and decides whether it violated the Code. The Committee is not entitled to impose any penalty or award compensation, or to deal with a complaint that is the subject of proceedings before a court or organ vested with that power.
Article 14	Professionals have a moral obligation to observe professional secrecy regarding the source of information obtained confidentially. Journalist is not obliged to reveal the source of his information. At the same time, it is the duty of the journalist to ensure that the sources of the information they provide is valid.
Article 15	In this Code, cases falling into the concern of public interest justifying derogation from the rule are the following: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> a) Detection of crime or disclosure. b) Protection of public safety or health.

	c) Protection of human rights. d) Preventing deception of the public as a result of acts or statements by individuals or organizations.
Legal Ethics Code Cyprus
Article 13	The lawyer is the guardian of confidential information and data entrusted to him by the client. Ensuring confidentiality is a prerequisite to create confidence between the client and the lawyer.
The Combating Terrorism Act of 2010
Article 5	(Terrorism Offences): A person who intentionally performs an act which, given its nature, may seriously damage any country or any international organization with a purpose; <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - The serious intimidation of the public or a public portion or - Unjust coercion of public authorities or of an international organization to act or abstain from any act or practice or

- Seriously destabilizing or destroying the fundamental political, constitutional, economic or social structures of a country or an international organization

And this act constitutes-

(A) an offense listed in the Table of Annex I of this Act,

(B) an offense listed in the Table of Annex II of this Act,

(C) the manufacture or possession or acquisition or transfer or supply or use of firearms or radiological weapons or any explosive or other lethal device or nuclear or biological weapons or research and development of biological and chemical weapons,

(D) causing extensive destruction in-

(I) government or public facilities,

(Ii) public transport systems,

(Iii) infrastructure, including IT systems,

(Iv) facilities or property of consular or diplomatic missions,

(V) a fixed platform on the continental shelf,

(Vi) use of public space,

(Vii) Private property, that may endanger human life or cause severe economic damage,

(E) intervention or disruption or interruption of the water supply, power, or other fundamental natural resource, the effect of which endangers human life, commits a terrorist offense and, on conviction, is liable to life imprisonment.

Article 10	(Refusal to Disclose Information): A person who holds any information which may help- (A) prevent the commission of a terrorism offense by another person or (B) ensure the arrest, prosecution, or conviction of another person for the commission of terrorist offenses and conceals such information from any member of the Police, is guilty of an offense and, on conviction, is liable to imprisonment not exceeding two years or to a fine not exceeding ten thousand euro (€ 10.000) or to both such penalties.
Article 19	Any witness in criminal proceedings concerning an offense provided for in this Law, is considered as a witness in need of assistance the provisions of the Witness Protection Law apply.
The Protection of Confidentiality of Private Communications (Interception and Access to Recorded Private Communication Content) Law of 1996
Article 3	1) Except where specifically provided otherwise in this Act, any person who- (A) willfully intercepts or monitors or otherwise accesses or attempts to intercept or monitor, or in any way to access or cause or permit or authorize any other person to intercept or monitor or access or attempt to intercept or to attend or to

	access the content of any private communication; or (B) knowingly uses, attempts to use or cause or permit or authorize any other person to use or attempt to use any electronic, mechanical, electromagnetic, acoustic or other device or machine, for the purpose of interception or monitoring or access to the content of any private communication; or (C) willfully discloses or attempts to disclose to any other person the contents of any private communication, knowing or having reason to know that the information obtained by interception or monitoring or access private communications content; or (D) knowingly uses or attempts to use the content of any private communication, knowing or having reason to know that the information obtained by interception or monitoring or access private communications content, is guilty of an offense and on conviction is liable to imprisonment not exceeding five (5) years.
Article 8	(Issuance of a Judicial Warrant for Monitoring): (1) The Judge may issue a judicial warrant for monitoring, as requested in the application or with such modifications or subject to such conditions which authorize the monitoring of private communications if satisfied that based on the facts presented by the applicant- (A) There is reasonable suspicion or possibility that a person is committing, has committed or is likely to commit an offense (B) there is reasonable suspicion or possibility that this private communication is connected or is relevant to the offense (C) ordinary examination or investigative procedures have been tried and failed or reasonably appear not expected to succeed if tried or to be dangerous for the proper investigation of the offense or the urgency of the situation is such that it was not practical to conduct surveys or investigations into the offense using other procedures

	(D) there is a reasonable suspicion or possibility that the telecommunications device or machine with which, or part of it, or the place where private communication for which monitoring is requested will be held, is being used or is intended or expected to be used in connection with the commission of such offense or it is owned or is registered in the name of a person or commonly used by a person to which reference is made in subsection (1) (a) above; (E) the issuance of such a court order is in the interest of justice. (2) A judicial warrant issued under subsection (1) may contain such terms and conditions as the judge considers appropriate and it describes- (A) the identity of the person, if known, for which a monitoring of private communications is requested, (B) the nature and location, if known, from where it is intended to monitor private communications, which are identified by the Authority, (C) the type of private communication for which monitoring is requested and the specific offense to which it relates, (D) the manner in which it seeks to carry out the monitoring, (E) the institution or person who is responsible for monitoring and which is the authority or body or person with the permission of the Authority and on such conditions imposed by the Authority or the Chief of Police or the Director of Customs, (F) the period for which the authorization is granted, which contains an order whether the monitoring is terminated automatically or not when the described private communication has been received. (3) Judicial warrant issued under this section shall, upon request of the applicant, order the Authority or a person acting on the Authority's authorization and subject to such conditions imposed by the Authority, provide the applicant or the Chief of Police or Director of Customs, without delay, all necessary information, facilities and technical assistance for the implementation of the court order. (4) The court order may authorize entry into any premises specified therein for the purpose of installation, maintenance, use or removal of any telecommunication equipment, which is used for monitoring, compliance with the
--	---

	provisions of any existing law. (5) No judicial warrant issued under this section does not authorize or approve monitor any private communication for a period longer than necessary, at the discretion of the judge, to achieve the objective of the authorization and, in any event, for a period not more than thirty days. Extensions of the court order may be given from time to time on application made in accordance with Article 7, and if the reasons described in subsection remain fulfilled (1). The time period of each extension is not greater than necessary, at the discretion of the judge, to achieve this objective and, in any event, not more than thirty days.
The Electronic Communications and Postal Services Law of 2004 (112 (I) / 2004)
Article 98(A)	(1) Subject to subsection (1) of section 98, the provider of publicly available electronic communications service must take, if necessary in conjunction with the provider of a public communications network with respect to network security, the appropriate technical and organizational measures to safeguard security of its services. Taking account of the latest technical possibilities and cost of their implementation, these measures shall ensure a level of security appropriate to the risk presented. (2) Subject to the provisions of the Processing of Personal Data (Protection of Individuals) Laws, 2001 and 2003, the measures referred to in subsection (1) of this Article, shall at least: (A) ensure that access to personal data may only by authorized personnel for legally authorized purposes; (B) protect stored or transmitted personal data against accidental or unlawful destruction, accidental loss or alteration, and unauthorized or unlawful storage,

	processing, access or disclosure; and (C) ensure the application of a safety policy in relation to the processing of personal data It is provided that the Commissioner and the Commissioner for Personal Data Protection have the power to audit the measures taken by providers of publicly available electronic communications services and to issue recommendations about best practices concerning the level of security to be achieved by these measures.
Article 99	(1) Both the providers referred to in Article 98 (1), and their employees, shall take all appropriate technical and organizational measures to ensure the confidentiality of any communication carried out via an electronic communications network, the publicly available electronic communications services, and related traffic data. (2) No person, other those communicating with each other, are allowed to listen, eavesdrop, store, interfere and / or conduct any other form of interception of communications and related traffic data without the consent of the users concerned, except to the extent provided in subsection (3). (3) In the circumstances provided for by the law and with court permission, there can be interference of communications. (4) The provisions of subsection (2) shall not affect any legally authorized recording of communications and related traffic data in the context of lawful business practice for the purpose of securing evidence of a commercial transaction and / or any other business communication. (5) The storage of information, or gaining access to information already stored, in the terminal equipment of a subscriber or user is permitted only if the subscriber or user concerned has given his/her consent, based on clear and comprehensive information, in accordance with the provisions of the Processing of Personal Data (Protection of Individuals) Laws, 2001 and 2003, including for the purpose of processing. Any technical storage or access for the sole purpose of carrying out the transmission of a communication over an electronic communications network, or that is strictly necessary in order for the information society service provider

	which has been explicitly requested by the subscriber or user to provide that service, is not prevented by this law.⁷⁰
Retention of Telecommunications Data Aimed at Investigating Serious Criminal Offences Law (183(I)/2007)
Article 4	(4) The judge may issue the order specified in subsection (1), as requested in the application or with such modifications or subject to such conditions, which can authorize access to data, if satisfied that based on the events submitted: (A) There is reasonable suspicion or probability, that a person is committing, has committed, or is likely to commit a serious criminal offense · (B) there is reasonable suspicion or possibility that this data is linked or associated with a serious criminal offense.
Article 5	Any service provider, upon presentation of an issued court order issued or letter accompanied by the approval of the Attorney General of the Republic, in accordance with the provisions of Article 4 shall be obliged to immediately and without any undue delay, place at the disposal of the police magistrate all data in the order or in the letter, as appropriate.

⁷⁰ The Electronic Communications and Postal Services Law of 2004 (112 (I) / 2004).

Article 12	The retention of data relating to the content of communication and the disclosure of such content is prohibited and no provision of this Law may be interpreted in a manner contrary to this prohibition.
Article 22	Nothing in this law shall affect or may be considered to affect the application of the provisions of the Protection of the Confidentiality of Private Communications (Interception) Law.

ELSA FINLAND

Contributors

National Coordinator

Elina Ryymin

National Researchers

Antti Pataila
Hanna Parviainen
Mirjami Ylinen
Petri Freundlich
Sini Ilves

National Linguistic Editors

Emma Kause
Esa Savolainen
Tytti-Maria Tanninen

National Academic Supervisor

Päivi Korpisaari
Professor of Communication and Information Law.
University of Helsinki

1. Introduction

Generally speaking, the rights of journalists and, hence, the right to protection of journalistic sources can be seen as non-problematic issues in Finland, especially if measured on legal actions taken. Indeed, the Finnish Supreme Court has only ruled on a few cases regarding the protection of journalistic sources and the issue has not been widely legislated.

In this report, we take a closer look at journalists' right to freedom of expression in Finland and especially to protection of their sources' anonymity. Firstly, the definition of a journalist is addressed and the applicable case law of the Finnish Supreme Court analysed. Secondly, the level of protection of the sources and the scope of legal and self-regulative mechanisms available to a journalist in order to protect his/her sources are examined. Finally, the status of whistle-blowers is also addressed in the report.

The Finnish legislation, or case-law, does not provide a definition either for a journalist or other media actors. Suomen Journalistiliitto (the Union of Journalists in Finland) defines a journalist as a person whose work includes a significant amount of journalistic work. Members of the Union are not limited only to traditional reporters but wide scope of actors working in the journalistic field are accepted. Essential, is the professional attitude towards journalism and publishing.

Even though, the Suomen Journalistiliitto excludes amateur writers, e.g. bloggers, from joining the Union, the level of protection does not differ between professionals and amateurs. The Finnish Constitution provides everyone the right to publish and receive information. Journalists do not hold special rights and, thus, there has not been pressure to explicitly define a journalist. Therefore, the term reporter's privilege is impractical as the privilege cannot be limited only to reporters.

2. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information? What type of legislation provides this protection? How exactly is this protection construed in national law?

2.1. Legislation

The right of the journalists not to be compelled to testify on their confidential sources – the so-called reporter's privilege – is a key element of freedom of expression in Finland. Freedom of expression is a guaranteed right in the Constitution of Finland, which highlights the importance of reporter's privilege.¹ Chapter 2(12) of the Constitution of Finland states the following on freedom of expression:

*"Everyone has the freedom of expression. Freedom of expression entails the right to express, disseminate and receive information, opinions and other communications without prior prevention by anyone. More detailed provisions on the exercise of the freedom of expression are laid down by an Act. --"*²

As one can read in section 12, freedom of expression does not only consist of the right to publicly say something, but also of the right to "disseminate and receive" information. The task of the media is usually considered to be to disseminate information on important matters in society. Without reporter's privilege, there could be the danger of a source not forwarding its information to media because of the fear of publicity. This way anonymous sources support the media's factual ability to exercise freedom of expression. Section 16 of the Finnish Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media states the following about confidentiality of sources and the right to anonymous expression:

*"The originator of a message provided to the public, the publisher and the broadcaster are entitled to maintain the confidentiality of the source of the information in the message. In addition, the publisher and the broadcaster are entitled to maintain the confidentiality of the identity of the originator of the message. Also a person who has become aware of the confidential information referred to in subsection (1) while in the service of the originator of the message, the publisher or the broadcaster is similarly entitled to maintain that confidentiality. Separate provisions apply to the duty to disclose confidential information referred to in subsection (1) in a pre-trial investigation or court proceedings."*³

In other words, it is a strong main rule that a publisher, broadcaster or journalist does not have to tell who is a confidential source. Mörä underlines how, contrary to many other countries, reporter's privilege does not only protect professional journalism, but also includes all the messages provided to the public. The act talks about an originator of a message, not a "journalist".⁴ As the law does not specifically define a "journalist", a direct answer to the question of how to clarify a "journalistic source" cannot be found. One could also point out that as every originator of a message provided to the public gets the same protection for sources, there is not even a need to give a separate definition for a "journalistic source".

Right to anonymous expression covers all sources that are used in a publication. Tiilikka talks about technology neutrality, which has been an important principle in making the Finnish legislation for reporter's privilege. All ways of communication are equally treated in the Finnish legislation. In Finland for example, web pages of a private person or a blog have reporter's privilege as

¹ Tuomas Mörä (edit), 'Lähdesuoja – normit, ideaalit ja käytännöt' 4. (Communication Research Center CRC, University of Helsinki, March 2011) <http://www.helsinki.fi/crc/Julkaisut/Lahdesuoja_raportti.pdf> Accessed 27 February 2016 [Finnish]

² The Constitution of Finland. 1999/731. [Suomen perustuslaki]

³ Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media 2003/460. [Laki sananvapauden käyttämisestä joukkoviestinnässä]

⁴ Tuomas Mörä, 'Lähdesuoja ja luottamuspäätös' in 'Lähdesuoja – normit, ideaalit ja käytännöt' 7-8. (Communication Research Center CRC, University of Helsinki, March 2011) <http://www.helsinki.fi/crc/Julkaisut/Lahdesuoja_raportti.pdf. 19> Accessed 20 April 2016

much as professionally made newspapers. The key issue is that the message has to be “provided to the public”. In section 2 of chapter 1 of the Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media defines public as “the group of freely determined message recipients”.

Chapter 7 section 8 in Criminal Investigation Act tells with a reference to the Code of Judicial Procedure that reporter’s privilege can be taken away when there is a crime under investigation with a possible penalty of six years in prison. As can be seen in these sections – and which Tiilikka underlines – the right not to give a testimony covers only remaining silent about the personality of the source of information or the originator of the message.⁵ A person to whom reporter’s privilege applies can also refuse to show a document which includes information covered by reporter’s privilege. Otherwise, reporter’s privilege does not mean the right to remain silent. It is a judicial exception to the general duty to give testimony.⁶

Section 20 of Chapter 17 of the Code of Judicial Procedure states that message originator, publisher or broadcaster to which the Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media refers has the right not to testify on who “had been the source of the information in the message or about who had prepared a message provided to the public”.⁷ The court may however force a testimony if “the prosecutor has brought charges for an offence for which the maximum sentence is imprisonment for at least six years”. Testimony can also be forced if prosecution “concerns violation of an obligation of confidentiality in a manner which according to law is punishable”. The latter is possible only in court, not yet in criminal investigation. Often the case is about an information leak in public office.

2.2. Cases of the Supreme Court of Finland in relation to European Court of Human Rights

The Supreme Court case KKO 2004/30⁸ concerned a situation where an internet book had been written about a Finnish telecommunications company called Sonera. The internet book was written about Sonera’s disappeared billions, and there were allegations about the former CEO of Sonera. A publisher had then edited a book based on the text on the internet. A criminal investigation ensued about an alleged aggravated defamation. However, the CEO of the publishing company refused to disclose the identity of the writer of the internet text as well as their source of information to the police. The lower courts had ordered the CEO to disclose the source, but the Supreme Court came to the conclusion that the publisher does not have to answer a question that might end reveal their source. The main reason why the Supreme Court came to a different conclusion was that the law changed during the process. When the lower courts decided upon the case, the law in action was the Act on the Freedom of the Press. This act

⁵ Päivi Tiilikka. ‘Sanavapaus ja lähdetsuoja Suomessa’ in ‘Lähdetsuoja – normit, ideaalit ja käytännöt’ 19-20. (Communication Research Center CRC, University of Helsinki, March 2011)

<http://www.helsinki.fi/crc/julkaisut/Lahdesuoja_raportti.pdf. 19> Accessed 27 February 2016 [Finnish]

⁶ Criminal Investigation Act 2011/805. [Esitutkintalaki]

⁷ Code of Judicial Procedure 1734/4. [Oikeudenkäymiskaari]

⁸30 [2004] Supreme Court of Finland gave reporter's privilege only to material that had been published in timely magazines. The Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media came into effect on 1.1.2004.

Even without the change in domestic law, the decision of the Finnish Supreme Court could have been in favour of reporter's privilege because of the policy of The European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR). The Supreme Court referred to cases of the ECtHR called *Goodwin v. The United Kingdom*⁹ and Roeman and Scmit v. Luxembourg.¹⁰ In the first case, the British Government had argued that reporter Mr. Goodwin (who had reported about plans to take a massive loan to help Tetra Ltd Company's economical situation) had to tell his source because there was a violation of confidentiality in Tetra Ltd Company. However, the ECHR constituted that the protection of journalistic sources is a key element of a democratic society. According to the Court, there was no proportionality in the sense of Article 10 in the European Human Rights Convention for a demand that the reporter should tell his source. In Roeman and Scmit vs. Luxembourg, there was question of a fine that a Luxembourgish minister had to pay due to tax fraud. That was confidential information under the law of Luxembourg, so a criminal investigation was carried about violation of confidentiality in the tax department. The reporters, however, refused to disclose the source and the ECtHR, again, constituted that reporter's privilege is an important part of a democratic society. The Court also underlined that the news article was about public interest. The Court did not find reasons why reporter's privilege should not hold.

ECHR case-law seems to give rather wide protection to reporter's privilege, as it considers the freedom of press a key element in a democratic society. Similarly, this can also be said about the Finnish Supreme Court. When it comes to the protection of sources, the ECtHR examines whether the taken national measures are in line with Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Their task is not to replace the national court. Even though confidentiality of sources is a strong principle, Article 10, however, makes limitations possible. In the practice of the ECtHR, there can be a "legitimate interference" when it comes to freedom of expression. But, because the freedom of expression is vitally important, the main rule should be weighing the freedom of expression higher than the contradicting government aims. There are three criteria: 1) The interference must be prescribed by law. 2) The interference must be aimed at protecting national security, territorial integrity, public safety, prevention of disorder or crime, protection of health, morals, reputation or rights of others, preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence or maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. 3) The interference must be necessary in a democratic society.¹¹ All of the three criteria must be fulfilled.

Reporter's privilege is a wide principle in both the Finnish and the ECHR case-law, as described above. Now, let's look at the restriction part. A crime with a possible penalty of six years of imprisonment, or a punishably illegal violation of obligation of confidentiality can give the court

⁹ Goodwin vs. United Kingdom [1996] ECHR 1996-II.

¹⁰ Roemen and Schmit v. Luxembourg, ECHR 2003.

¹¹ Monica Macovei, 'A Guide to the Implementation of Article 10' 29. (Council of Europe, January 2004). <http://www.echr.coe.int/LibraryDocs/DG2/HRHAND/DG2-EN-HRHAND-02\(2004\).pdf.pdf)> Accessed 27 February 2016

a reason to break reporter's confidentiality of a journalistic source in Finland in order for the court to demand the reporter, publisher or broadcaster to disclose the source. At least criterion 1) seems to be fulfilled. The criterion of whether a prosecuted crime can theoretically end up in 6 years of imprisonment is very easy to look at the Criminal Code. Either it can or it cannot. Punishable illegal violation of obligation of confidentiality is maybe not as clear, because it is more a question of proof and interpretation of whether there has been such crime in a particular case or not. However, also in this case there has to be at least suspicion of violation that is prescribed in law. As whole, one could say that criterion 1) is fulfilled. The question of punishable illegal violation of confidentiality is also at the moment only theoretical since there is currently no case in which reporter's privilege would have been restricted on that basis. It can be underlined that reporter's privilege can be restricted this way only in court, not in criminal investigation, which is a stage where enough proof for starting a trial is often not found. Criterion 2) seems also to be fulfilled since there is obviously a question of prevention of a serious crime, if it can end up in imprisonment of 6 years. Illegal violation of obligation of confidentiality is also a reason accepted by the ECtHR to limit protection of the source, because the Court accepts preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence as a reason to limit freedom of expression. One could argue that criterion 3) would probably be fulfilled when it is question about prosecution for a crime that can give six years of imprisonment. It can be said to be necessary in a democratic society to make sure people obey the laws issued by the parliament elected by the people. The confidentiality criterion is maybe a bit more controversial, because in a democratic society it is also important that people, for example, get information on the actions of those holding positions of power. However, all in all, it seems that the Finnish legislation, in its very limited restrictions to confidentiality of journalistic sources, take well into consideration the ECHR criteria for legitimate interference. "

In the case of Tillack v. Belgium,¹² which was delivered in 2007, the ECtHR came to a conclusion that lawfulness or unlawfulness of journalistic sources cannot decide if the source has to be disclosed. A German journalist called Hans Martin Tillack, who worked in Brussels, was in the case suspected of bribing an official in European Anti-Fraud Office in order to get confidential documents, which he had used as sources in two articles. Tillack's home and workplace were searched by the Belgian authorities. The intervention was "prescribed by law" because it was allowed in the Belgian Code of Criminal Procedure. It had also legitimate aim of preventing disorder and crime. Tillack, however, stated in ECHR that Article 10 had been violated. The ECtHR saw that the searches made were not necessary in a democratic society underlining that the right of a journalist not to reveal his or her sources was not a mere privilege dependent on the lawfulness of the sources. The court saw that the aim of the investigation was to get to know the source and therefore concluded that the question was about reporter's privilege in the case. The court took into consideration that Tillack was never charged. "Legitimate interference" could not be based on rumors according to the ECtHR. Even in the light of this case one can say that the criteria for interference in Finnish law, for example offence giving at minimum six years of imprisonment, are rather strict. If there was a case against Finland in the ECtHR, one could assume that unclear of the three criteria for “legitimate interference” would also be, whether or not interference is necessary in democratic society. One could also assume that if reporter’s privilege was taken away based on “violation of an obligation of confidentiality in a manner which according to law is punishable” the risk of a case like Tillack vs. Belgium would be high. Still, as long as there is no case everything is speculative.

¹² Tillack vs. Belgium [2007] ECHR.

Another ECtHR case was Financial Times Limited & Others v. United Kingdom,¹³ which gave strict criteria for “legitimate interference”. In the case, a business-document of a Belgian brewing company, Interbrew, was leaked to the media. The domestic courts had ordered the journalists to give the original leaked document to Interbrew in order to identify the source of information. The leak had been illegal so the British domestic courts saw the order as “prescribed by law”. However, the ECtHR saw that every case in question has to be looked at as whole and that there has to be “overriding public interest” in order to justify interference with Article 10. In comparison to this case against the UK, it can also be stated that even though Finnish legislation takes well into consideration the ECtHR’s criteria for legitimate interference it cannot always be fully known beforehand, even in the case of a crime defined in the Criminal Code, if the interference is necessary in democratic society according to the ECtHR. There is neither one deciding factor nor an exact definition for what an overriding public interest is. In Financial Times Limited & Others v. United Kingdom domestic courts had seen the leaker’s mala fide and plausible attempt to manipulate markets as justifications for Interbrew’s need to get the original leaked documents in order to identify the source. According to the ECtHR, mala fide of the source cannot, however, be the reason to disclosure of confidential sources, even though it is the responsibility of the journalist to make sure the source is reliable. Even though the journalists were not even demanded to give the name of the source, there was seen a “chilling effect” when journalists were supposed to assist in the process of figuring out who is the anonymous source. Because giving the document to Interbrew could with high probability lead to identification of the source, the ECtHR saw that there was violation of reporter’s privilege. The public interest of protection of sources was seen as more important than the interest of Interbrew.

The Finnish Supreme Court has also been strict when it comes to the chilling effect. In KKO 2009/88, the criteria for legitimate interference did not get fulfilled according to the Finnish Supreme Court.¹⁴ The CEO of the publishing company in KKO 2004/30 had shown the Supreme Court letters to strengthen his argument of reporter’s privilege in the case where he had the right to remain silent about a source as the publisher. The Supreme Court constituted that the publisher had presented the letters to the Supreme Court in order to support his right to remain silent about the source of the internet book – not to give this right away. The use of the letters as the proof of his reporter’s privilege was also acceptable because his constant claim of reporter’s privilege had not been successful in lower courts. Based on the letters, person S was prosecuted on the aggravated defamations against the former CEO of Sonera. The Supreme Court evaluated that the letters were to be used as proof of issues that were part of the publisher's right to remain silent about the source. The Supreme Court saw this as infringing publisher's right to remain silent about source in a manner that was not acceptable. Therefore the letters in question were not to be used as proof according Supreme Court.

¹³ Financial Times Limited & Others vs. United Kingdom [2009]. The European Court of Human Rights.

¹⁴ KKO 2009:88 Supreme Court of Finland [Finnish]

This, very strong, Finnish principle of confidentiality of sources sometimes collides with another fundamental right in the European Convention of Human Rights, Article 8, Right to Respect for Private and Family Life. At least, there was a case *K.U. v. Finland*¹⁵ in which there had been a false homosexual dating announcement made about an under-aged boy. The publisher company of the announcement had however refused to give the IP address of the sender of the profile to the police because they saw it as violation of the Finnish Internet publishing legislation. They had the right to keep the IP address of the sender anonymous. The ECtHR saw that even though the publisher of internet services had the right to freedom of expression the legislator should have made it possible for courts to make a judgement between contradicting demands (This was before Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media was established.) *Tiilikka*¹⁶ underlines, how sometimes the legislation of today can lead to even absurd situations, for example a person who knows who is guilty to an illegal leak of information can gain a right not to testify about the person's identity by simply making the illegal leak of information public and by so doing gaining reporter's privilege. Nowadays in Finland, reporter's privilege cannot, according to Tiilikka, be broken even when investigating confidentiality crimes when leaking about patient registers, information of customers in social security, criminal investigation about a young suspect, investigations in forensic psychiatry or student counseling. Tiilikka sees however that if reporter's privilege would be worsened, this should only happen in the area of natural persons, not organizations.

2.3. Council of Europe - Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information

One way of measuring the level of the Finnish protection for confidentiality of journalistic sources would be to see, how well it fulfills the standards of a recommendation made by the Council of Europe.¹⁷ The Council of Europe seems to have quite wide definitions for a journalist ("any natural or legal person who is regularly or professionally engaged in the collection and dissemination of information to the public via any means of mass communication") as well as for a source ("any person who provides information to a journalist"). In this sense, one could say that the Finnish legislation's "wide scope" fulfills the European standard or ideal when anybody who makes information public gets reporter's privilege. Also, anybody who has given information to the ¹⁵ K.U. vs. Finland [2002], ECHR.

¹⁶ Päivi Tiilikka. 'Sananvapaus ja lähdesuojat Suomessa' in 'Lähdesuojat – normit, ideat ja käytännöt' 29-30. (Communication Research Center CRC, University of Helsinki, March 2001)

<http://www.helsinki.fi/crc/julkaisut/Lahdesuojat_raportti.pdf, 19> Accessed 27 February 2016 [Finnish]

¹⁷ Council of Europe. Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information.

message receiver is understood as source. The right of non-disclosure of journalists is fulfilled because protection of sources is wide in Finland, as discussed above. The right of non-disclosure of other people working with journalists is relatively well-taken into consideration as well, because, for example, publishers have also reporter's privilege in Finland. Also, the wide source protection for every person that makes something public makes the protection of other professions better – when also taking into consideration that Finnish law gives reporter's privilege to all who work for the publisher. On the other hand, the Finnish law specifies so clearly those with reporter's privilege that it might be possible that some people in close relations with journalists do not get reporter's privilege. The right is so much the right of the messenger in Finland. Conditions for disclosure are quite exactly defined in the Finnish law.

3. Is there, in domestic law, a provision that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his/her sources? How exactly is this prohibition construed in national law? What is the sanction?

As *Tiilikka*¹⁸ underlines, in Finland, reporter's privilege is a journalist's, or other person's, who makes something public, right not to disclose his/her sources. It is not a right of a source. A journalist or any other person who has right to reporter's privilege does not have any obligation to disclose their source. If the journalist, however, tells the name of the source to the public via mass media and it is harmful to the source the journalist might be convicted for Dissemination of information violating personal privacy.¹⁹ According to the Finnish Criminal Code this crime is in question when a person “unlawfully (1) through the use of the mass media, or (2) otherwise by making available to many persons disseminates information, an insinuation or an image of the private life of another person, so that the act is conducive to causing that person damage or suffering, or subjecting that person to contempt”. The punishment for this crime is a fine or imprisonment of maximum of two years. However, if the question is about a person in business, politics, public office, public position or similar, and if the information might affect the evaluation of that person's activities in the position and dealing with the matter is also important to society, there is no dissemination of information violating personal privacy. Any leak that is made by a person holding a remarkable position in the society might for instance affect evaluation of the person's reliability in office as well and therefore be important to society.

Not even the self-regulation of journalists demand the journalist to always remain silent about the source, but instead they direct that the journalist should keep the identity of the source secret as it has been agreed. One can anyway state that it is a very strong main rule that the journalist has to remain silent about his or her source giving confidential information because this is usually written in the confidentiality agreement between the journalist and the source. It is very exceptional that a journalist would be allowed to disclose the source but that could happen, for example, if the source had deliberately misled the journalist. The Guidelines for Journalists given by the Finnish self-regulating body, Council for Mass Media, state the following: “The journalist is entitled and duty bound to conceal the identity of any person who has provided confidential information by agreement with the source. If the publication of information that is in the public interest results in highly negative publicity, it is desirable that the editorial office makes public how the reliability of the anonymous source and the information obtained from it has been assured”.²⁰ Violation of a confidentiality agreement can, of course, lead to civil sanctions, which is always the case when violating a contract. However, the clear and short answer is that there is no domestic law provision that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his/her sources.

¹⁸ Päivi Tiilikka. “Sananvapaus ja lähdesuojat Suomessa” in “Lähdesuojat – normit, idealit ja käytännöt” 21. (Communication Research Center CRC, University of Helsinki, March 2011)

<http://www.helsinki.fi/crc/julkaisut/Lahdesuojat_raportti.pdf. 19> Accessed 27 February 2016 [Finnish]

¹⁹ Criminal Code. 1889/39 [Rikoslaki]. ch 24, para 8.

4. Who is a “journalist” according to the national legislation? Is it, in your view, a restricted definition for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources? What is the scope of protection of other media actors? Is the protection of journalists’ sources extended to anyone else?

An explicit definition of a journalist is not specified clearly in the Finnish legislation or case-law. This separation between the two terms is not relevant because the Finnish legislation does not provide any special protection to journalists. All the rights and obligations of freedom of speech belong to everyone and therefore extra protection to journalists has not been seen relevant.

Section 2 Subsection 4 of Finnish Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Speech in Mass Media (in Finnish: laki sananvapauden käytämisestä joukkoviestinnässä) defines publication as [a] printed matter, a data disc or some other text, sound or picture record produced by means of duplication, when provided to the public.²¹

Publishing is providing publications and network messages other than programs to the reach of the public.²² Broadcasting means provision of programs to the public.²³

According to the rules of Suomen journalistiliitto (the Union of Journalists in Finland) (hereinafter: the UJF or the Union), a person can join the Union if their profession includes an essential amount of journalistic elements.²⁴ The applicant’s work must also be professional, which means

²⁰ Council for Mass Media. <http://www.jsn.fi/en/guidelines_for_journalists/> Accessed April 5 2016

²¹ Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Speech in Mass Media 13.6.2003/460 [Laki sananvapauden käytämisestä joukkoviestinnässä]

²² Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Speech in Mass Media Section 2 Subsection 7

²³ Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Speech in Mass Media Section 2 Subsection 8

²⁴ <<http://www.journalistiliitto.fi/liitto/tietoa-jasenistamme/ammatti-yhdistaa/>> accessed February 28 2016 [Finnish]

that a significant portion of the applicant's income must derive from the journalistic work. In their internet site, the UJF lists journalists (print press, radio, broadcast, Internet); photographers and cameramen; graphic designers; editorial managers; publicists and, information officers; freelance journalists and communications entrepreneurs; publishing editors; translators and journalist students, teachers and researchers as eligible professions. The list is not exclusive, and other professions are allowed to join the Union as well, as long as the work meets the requirement for professional journalistic work.

Therefore, the UJF excludes other media actors, such as bloggers and other amateur writers whose writing can be seen as a hobby or unprofessional without income gaining purpose, from becoming union members. The Union does not control if the applicant is professional or not, the level of professionalism is left to the applicant to evaluate. On the other hand, the UJF's annual fee was in 2015 1.4 percent of the member's gross income if they work in the sector that is covered by a collective agreement (print media, publishing, broadcasting) and 1.0 percent if the member is a freelancer or an entrepreneur and does not belong to the unemployment fund.²⁵ Some journalists may not join the Union because of the rate of the annual fee is rather high.

According to the Guidelines for Journalists, a journalist is mainly responsible to the public: the readers, the listeners and the viewers, who have the right to the information of what happens in the society.²⁶ In this sense, a journalist is a delivery person between the events in the world and the interested public.

Even though a journalist is not an exclusive term to describe a specific group of people of certain education or profession, it has some qualifications that need to add up in order to call oneself journalist. An implicit definition of a journalist could be described as a person who works in the field of media and publication and mainly fulfils journalistic tasks, which can vary from news to reports and public announcements. Journalist is a person whose work's purpose is to give the public revised and impartial information concerning local and global events.

5. What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources? How are the laws implemented? How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?

The Finnish Constitution's (Suomen perustuslaki) Section 12 guarantees everyone's right to freedom of expression. Freedom of expression includes one's right to express, publish and receive information, opinions and other messages without sensory.²⁷ This is the foundation to which journalists base their right to publish articles and the Guidelines for Journalists build on.

²⁵ The UJF website <<http://www.journalistiliitto.fi>>, accessed March 29 2016

²⁶ Article 1 of the Guidelines for Journalists, (Operative from 1 January 2014), <<http://www.journalistiliitto.fi/english/ground-rules/guidelines/>> accessed February 28 2016

²⁷ Finnish Constitution 11.6.1999/731 [Suomen perustuslaki]

The Council for Mass Media (in Finnish: Julkisen sanan neuvosto) (later: the CMM) is a self-regulatory committee in Finland which is founded in 1968 by journalists and publishers who work in the mass media. The purpose of the CMM is to maintain good professional practice and defend the freedom of expression and right of publication.²⁸ The CMM does not execute legal jurisdiction, but it gives recommendations and guidelines which bind media actors who have been affiliated with the CMM. The major media houses in Finland are members of the CMM and, therefore, the CMM's decisions have binding effect among the journalists and publishers.²⁹

Julkisen sanan neuvoston kannatusyhdistys ry. (CMM's Relief Association) is founded by the same parties as CMM in order to finance CMM's activity. The Relief Association's purpose is to take care of the CMM's finance as well as prepare and approve Guidelines for Journalists. The Guidelines for Journalists (later: the Guideline) are established in order to maintain good professional journalistic practice among the journalists. In the preamble of the Guideline the purpose of the Guideline is defined as follows:

Freedom of speech is the foundation of a democratic society. Good journalistic practice is based on the public's right to have access to facts and opinions.

The aim of these guidelines is to support the responsible use of freedom of speech in mass communication and encourage discourse on professional ethics.

These guidelines concern all journalistic work. They have been drafted specifically for the purpose of self-regulation. The guidelines are not intended to be used as grounds for criminal liability or damages.³⁰

The Guidelines for Journalists is a self-regulatory mechanism to maintain good professional journalistic practise. The Guideline does not instruct that a journalist must reveal their sources of information. When referring to the work of others, the source must be included, but in the case of independent journalistic research or interview there is no obligation in the Guideline to give away the source.

Article 14 of the Guideline states, that a journalist has the right and obligation to hide the identity of the information source, if the source asks to stay anonymous. The journalist and the source can together agree on the extent to which the source's identity stays hidden. In the second Paragraph of Article 14, the Guideline states that if the revealed information concerns

²⁸ The Basic Agreement 1 §, The Council for Mass Media, <http://www.jsn.fi/en/Council_for_Mass_Media/basic-agreement/> accessed February 28 2016

²⁹ "Ketkä ovat JSN:n takana?", <<http://www.jsn.fi/jsn/jsn/>> accessed February 28 2016

³⁰ Guidelines for Journalists, (Operative from 1 January 2014), <<http://www.journalistiliitto.fi/in-english/ground-rules/guidelines/>> accessed February 28 2016 social matters, which may cause remarkable negative publicity, the journalist should reveal the audience, how the reliability of the source and the information was confirmed.

Article 11 of the Guideline instructs that the audience should be able to distinguish the facts from opinions. This means that the commentary section should be separated from the facts of the case and journalist must keep their own opinions apart from the source's views.

Self-regulation through the Guideline is the ethical guideline for professional journalist to comply. Self-regulation supports the public's trust towards the credibility of the press.³¹ Self-regulation reduces the need for regulation through legislation, if the media operatives act to maintain high ethical standards. Even though self-regulations are not directly applicable in the court of law, high ethical standards prevent journalists from publishing information that breaches the ethical code.

Section 16 of Finnish Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Speech in Mass Media (laki sananvapauden käyttämisestä joukkoviestinnässä) concludes following:

The originator of a message provided to the public, the publisher and the broadcaster are entitled to maintain the confidentiality of the source of the information in the message.

According to the same Section, the publisher or broadcaster has the right to hide the originator's identity as well; in case it is needed. This is described as a right that one can follow, but hiding the source is not compulsory.

On the other hand, Section 8 of Chapter 24 of the Finnish Criminal Code describes the distribution of private life violation. A person, who, for example, through mass media, violates a person's right to private life by revealing a piece of information, an insinuation, or a picture which causes damage, suffering or contempt toward its target, shall be sentenced from distribution of private life violation to a fine.³² If the revelation of the source's identity could compromise their safety, security, or otherwise put them to undesirable position, the constituent elements of the offence may be fulfilled.

The Guideline has no executive power in criminal or civil cases,³³ but the right for non-disclosure is upheld in the court of law as well. The Code of Judicial Procedure is a general-purpose law that enacts the conduct in civil procedure and in the applicable parts of criminal procedure as well. Section 20 of Chapter 17 gives the journalists and publishers the right not to expose their source in the court of law. As an exception, the court has the right to force to disclose the source if the crime that is being prosecuted allows a maximum penalty of at least six

³¹ Miklós Haraszti: The Media Self-Regulation Guidebook, p. 11

³² The Criminal Code, Section 24, Section 8, 39/1889 [Rikoslaki]

³³ The Preamble of the Guidelines for the Journalists (Operative from 1 January 2014), <<http://www.journalistiliitto.fi/in-english/ground-rules/guidelines/>> accessed February 28 2016 &

Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Speech in Mass Media 13.6.2003/730 [Laki sananvapaudesta joukkoviestinnässä]

years of in prison. If a journalist or a publicist refuses to disclose their source, they must provide grounds for their refusal.³⁴

Finnish legislation knows no obligation to conceal the identity of the journalistic source. In case the sources' right to privacy is violated, the journalist or the publicist can be held liable to reimburse the source for the damages caused by the disclosure. This outcome is highly unlikely because there is no case-law to be found on this subject.

6. In the respective national legislation, are the limits of non-disclosure of the information in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7? What are the procedures applied? Is the disclosure limited to exceptional circumstances, taking into consideration vital public or individual interests at stake? Do the authorities first search for and apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the right of journalists not to disclose information?

1. Background

1.1 Recommendation No R (2000) 7

Recommendation No R (2000) 7 (later: "the Recommendation") was adopted by the Committee of Ministers on March 8 2000 during the 701st meeting of the Ministers' Deputies.³⁵ According to Article 15.b of the Statute of the Council of Europe (later: "the Statute"), a recommendation is one of the forms that the conclusions of the Committee may take.³⁶ Despite not being legally binding, the recommendations are considered powerful instruments in the interaction between the Committee and the governments.³⁷ Article 15.b of the Statute allows the Committee to request information from the governments of the member states to supervise their actions regarding the recommendations.

³⁴ The Code of Judicial Procedure, Section 17 Section 23, 1.1.1734/4 [Oikeudenkäymiskaari]

³⁵ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information.

³⁶ Statute of the Council of Europe, 5.V.1949, Art. 15.b.

³⁷ Council of Europe, Committee of Ministers (the official website of the Committee of Ministers) <http://www.coe.int/t/cm/aboutCM_en.asp/> accessed 22 February 2016.

2. Right to non-disclosure

2.1. The Principles

The Recommendation provides seven principles that concern the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information. The third principle, on which this article is going to concentrate, is titled Limits to the right of non-disclosure. The principle is divided into two paragraphs.

2.3 Limits to the Right of Non-Disclosure

Paragraph a begins with a reference to Paragraph 2 of Article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights (later: “the Convention”). According to Paragraph a, the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source must not be subject to other restrictions than those mentioned in Article 10(2). This emphasises the Recommendation’s role as a tool for enforcing the implementation of the Convention and specifying its contents.

Article 10(2) allows restrictions to the right of journalists regarding the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety. Furthermore, a restriction can be justified for the prevention of disorder or crime, protection of health or morals and protection of the reputation or rights of others. A restriction may as well take place in the interest of preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence or maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.³⁸

An overall prerequisite for all the restrictions is that they must be prescribed by law and be necessary in a democratic society. Paragraph a also refers to the importance and pre-eminence of non-disclosure that derives from the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (later: “the Court”). This way, it accentuates the interaction between law in books and law in action in the implementation of the Convention in the member states.

2.3 Criteria for Disclosure

Paragraph b introduces more specific criteria, under which disclosure of information may be regarded necessary. According to Paragraph b, Article (i.), reasonable alternative measures to the disclosure have to be either non-existent or exhausted by the persons or public authorities seeking disclosure. Article (ii.) concretizes the situations in which the legitimate interest in the disclosure can outweigh the public interest in non-disclosure.

Firstly, an overriding requirement for the need of disclosure has to be proved; secondly, the circumstances have to be of a sufficiently vital and serious nature; and thirdly, the disclosure has to be justified by a pressing social need. Article (ii.) also reminds that while member states do have a certain margin of appreciation, they are also bound by the practice of the Court.

³⁸ Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Rome, 4.XI.1950. Art. 10(2).

The last Paragraph, c, contains a clause according to which the above-mentioned requirements should be applied at any stages of proceedings where disclosure might be invoked. It underlines the overall seriousness of situations in which a disclosure can possibly take place.

3. Situation in Finland

3.1 Implementation of Article 10(2) of the Convention

In Finland, the principal legal source that ensures the implementation of Article 10(2) of the Convention is the Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media (2003/460) (later: “the Freedom of Expression Act”).³⁹ Freedom of speech is also a fundamental right guaranteed by the Constitution of Finland (later: “the Constitution”) in Section 12. The Constitution and special legislation are meant to interact with each other. The broad formulations of the Constitution leave space for more specific legislation, the interpretation of which is, in turn, linked to the principle of legal interpretation in light of fundamental and human rights.⁴⁰

The protection of sources is not explicitly mentioned in the Constitution, but it is still regarded as a pre-condition to fully enjoy freedom of expression. Section 16 of the Freedom of Expression Act regulates the confidentiality of sources and the right to anonymous expression. The first Paragraph guarantees the right to maintain the confidentiality of the source of the information in the message to the originator of the message, the publisher and the broadcaster. Further in the Paragraph, the right is extended to some other persons who have obtained confidential information.

3.2 Possibilities of Disclosure in Practice

According to Subsection (3) of Section 16, separate provisions apply to the duty to disclose confidential information referred to in Subsection (1) in a pre-trial investigation or court proceedings. The disclosure of sources is thus limited to two occasions: court proceedings and pre-trial investigations. Furthermore, the disclosure of sources in a pre-trial investigation can be invoked on a more limited basis in respect to disclosure during a court proceeding. In the preliminary works of the Freedom of Expression Act, the legislator has explicitly expressed that the possibility of disclosure should be limited to these occasions only.⁴¹ Preliminary works have quite a big significance in the Finnish system and are often referred to in the practice of the courts.

³⁹ 460/2003 (Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media) 2003 [Laki sananvapauden käyttämisestä joukkoviestinnässä].

⁴⁰ Päivi Tiilikka, Journalistin Sananvapaus (1st edn, Sanoma Pro Oy 2008) 22 [Finnish].

The Finnish case-law regarding the disclosure is somewhat limited.⁴² There have been only three cases that have reached the Finnish High Court. In KKO:2010:88, the Court ruled that the journalist and the editor-in-chief of a magazine programme in the television were guilty of defamation. In the programme, the journalist had brought up claims regarding three persons who had previously been suspected of ties to terrorism. The claim was that these three persons were involved in a group financing a terrorist organisation abroad. The identity of the persons could be recognized from the programme, while the information leading to said claims had been obtained from eight anonymous sources. In its conclusion, the Court ruled the journalist and the editor-in-chief of the programme guilty of defamation, but did not call for a disclosure of sources.

The cases KKO:2004:30 and KKO:2010:88 are connected to the same chain of events. "A" was the managing director of a publishing company that had published a book containing delicate information. The book had been published anonymously and the sources of information of the author remained unknown. In the first case, the question was whether A had the right to remain silent when answering certain questions during a criminal investigation would have lead to revealing the author of the book. The Court stated that A had the right to remain silent, when answering the questions presented by the authorities would have or could have lead to the revelation of confidential information.

The second case concentrated on two letters that A had submitted to the Finnish High Court in order to show that he had the right to remain silence in the circumstances described above. The public prosecutor had appealed to these letters as a ground for A's obligation to reveal information regarding the book. The Court ruled that the letters belonged to the sphere of A's right to remain silent and stated that they could not be used as evidence by the prosecutor.

According to the current legislation, disclosure can only be invoked when the maximum penalty of the crime in question is at least six years in prison.⁴³ Furthermore, disclosure can occur when the information itself has been obtained through a breach of the obligation to maintain secrecy. The latter option is possible only in court proceedings, not in a pre-trial investigation.

3.3 Conclusion

⁴¹ Preparatory materials for 460/2003 (Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media), para 17. [HE 54/2002 Hallituksen esitys Eduskunnalle laiksi sananvapauden käyttämisestä joukkoviestinnässä ja eräksi siihen liittyviksi laeiksi].

⁴² Relevant case law of the Finnish High Court: KKO:2004:30, KKO:2009:88, KKO:2010:88.

⁴³ 4/1734 (Code of Judicial Procedure) 1734 [Oikeudenkäymiskaari] ch 17 section 24(4).

Returning to the questions set at the beginning of this article, it is fair to say that in the Finnish system, disclosure of information has been limited to exceptional circumstances. Until today, a demand to disclose information identifying a source has never had success in national courts, and there are few cases dealing with the question overall.⁴⁴ This suggests that alternative measures are preferred, and until now they have always had the prevalence in the practice of public authorities.

7. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 the following principles should be respected when the necessity of disclosure is stated: absence of reasonable alternative measures, outweighing legitimate interest (protection of human life, prevention of major crime, defense of a person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime). Under which criteria can the interest in the disclosure outweigh the interest in the non-disclosure?

1. Freedom of Speech

1.1 Protection of Sources as a Part of Freedom of Speech

As with most human rights, the content of freedom of speech cannot be determined with precision. To a certain extent, the content of the right is always open to interpretations and has to be considered individually in each case. Previous case-law has a central role in defining the significance of the right.⁴⁵ This applies also to the protection of sources: the possibility of disclosure does exist, but the conditions are limited.

In the Goodwin case,⁴⁶ the Court has established that the protection of journalistic sources is one of the fundamental elements of the right guaranteed in Article 10 of the Convention. In the same ruling, the Court stated that disclosure of sources, should it occur, has to be justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest. The conditions for restrictions are listed in Article 10(2), which will now be examined in more detail. As mentioned before, the Finnish courts have had a restrictive approach regarding the possibility of disclosure. It seems clear that disclosure can be successfully invoked only in the most serious of cases.

2. Restrictions Provided by Article 10(2) of the Convention

⁴⁴ Valtteri Niiranen, Petteri Sotamaa, Päivi Tiilikka, Sananvapauslaki, tulkinta ja käytäntö (1st edn, Sanoma Pro Oy 2013) 124 [Finnish].

⁴⁵ Päivi Tiilikka, Journalistin Sananvapaus (1st edn, Sanoma Pro Oy 2008) 19 [Finnish].

⁴⁶ Goodwin v. the United Kingdom [judgment of 27 March 1996] European Court of Human Rights.

2.1 Meeting the Criteria

Article 10(2) of the Convention reads as follows:

The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.

Thus, when applying the article to the question of disclosure of sources, the basic criteria have to be met: the restriction has to be prescribed by law and be necessary in a democratic society. In addition, the restriction has to serve to protect some of the interests named in the paragraph. These interests can be divided into three categories.⁴⁷

2.2 Interests Justifying Disclosure

Many of the criteria that may justify a restriction to freedom of speech are related to the concept of public interest. This is the case of protecting national security and territorial integrity, as well as public safety. The prevention of disorder and crime and the protection of health or morals can also be added to this group. In practice, public interest is the ground most often used.⁴⁸

The second category is formed by criteria that may function as grounds for restrictions in the name of individual interests. In case of journalism and source protection, it seems natural that the individual interest would often be connected to the protection of privacy, honour and reputation. In the Finnish legal context, this may result in an unsuccessful call for disclosure, since the prerequisite for allowing disclosure is the possible penalty of at least six years in prison. According to the Finnish legislation, the maximum penalty for aggravated defamation is two years in prison.⁴⁹

The third group of interests has to do with public authorities: the focus is on maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. These kind of grounds have not been used to justify the disclosure of journalistic sources in domestic courts.

The European Court of Human Rights has examined the restrictions to freedom of speech in several cases. In Ernst and Others v. Belgium, the Court came to the conclusion that the searches and seizures that had been conducted at the offices of a public broadcasting company and in homes of some of its journalists constituted a breach of the journalists' freedom of expression and violated their right to privacy.⁵⁰ The Court admitted that the interferences, which had been committed by the Belgian judicial authorities, were prescribed by law and that their intention had been to maintain the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. The purpose of the interferences was to identify the police officers or the members of the Belgian judiciary who had been leaking confidential information. However, according to the Court the wide scale of the researches was not proportionate comparing to the fact that none of the journalists had been accused of writing articles that contained confidential information. The Court also asked whether alternative and less invasive measures could have been taken to identify the right persons among the authorities. Finally, the Court stated that the action of the Belgian authorities had not been reasonably proportionated to the legitimate aims pursued, and that the rights and freedoms of the journalists had been violated.

⁴⁷ Päivi Tiilikka, Journalistin Sananvapaus (1st edn, Sanoma Pro Oy 2008) 61 [Finnish].

⁴⁸ ibid 62.

⁴⁹ 19.12.1889/39 (The Criminal Code of Finland) 1889 [Rikoslaki] ch 24 section 10.

In Roemen and Schmit v. Luxembourg,⁵¹ the Court evaluated the justification of the research of a journalist's home and office in the light of the principle of an overriding requirement in the public interest. In the case, a journalist had reported that a Minister had been convicted of tax evasion. Later on, a criminal investigation was opened to identify the person who had leaked the information to the journalist. During the investigation, a research was ordered at the journalist's workplace and home, as well as at the office of his lawyer. The Court examined the colliding interests of the parties. On one hand, the research had been prescribed by law and had pursued a legitimate aim, that of maintaining the public order and preventing crime. On the other, the article revealing confidential information had discussed a matter of general interest. Finally, the Court concluded that the measures taken had been disproportionate and had violated the journalist's right to freedom of expression.

2.3 Conclusion

To sum, the concept of public interest seems dominant when seeking for a justification to disclose information. Freedom of expression and protection of sources as one of its components are powerful rights that are enforced on both European and domestic level. Between different motives to justify restrictions, public interest seems to be the most powerful one.

The threshold for disclosure has been set on quite a high level in Finnish courts; the argumentation of the courts follows the practice of the European Court of Human Rights, emphasising the importance of free public discussion. Furthermore, in the preparatory materials of the Freedom of Expression act the possibility of disclosure in court proceedings is limited to the so called key witnesses. The significance of the information that could be obtained through ⁵⁰*Ernst and Others v. Belgium* [judgment of 15 July 2003] European Court of Human Rights.

⁵¹ Roemen and Schmit v. Luxembourg [judgment of 25 February 2003] European Court of Human Rights.

disclosure has to be crucial in regard to solving the case. Also, the importance of solving that particular case should outweigh the general need of journalists to protect their sources.⁵²

8. In Light of the Case Law of the European Court of Human Rights, How do National Courts Apply the Respective Laws With Regard to the Right to Protect Sources? In Particular, How do They Balance the Different Interests at Stake?

8.1. General Overview of the Finnish Court System

Firstly, it is important to briefly explain the court system in Finland in order to better understand the case-law. According to the Constitution of Finland, Finland has two separate lines of courts, general courts and general administrative courts.⁵³ The highest judicial authority belongs to the Supreme Court and the Supreme Administrative Court, in their respective fields. All the case-law related to this question comes from the general courts which exist in three levels; district courts, courts of appeal and the Supreme Court.⁵⁴ The Supreme Court of Finland is the highest judicial body and the court of final instance in the field of civil, commercial and criminal cases.⁵⁵ The decisions of the Supreme Court are frequently used by lower courts as precedents and therefore have legal importance. However, the Finnish legal system is not very strict when it comes to precedents. They are definitely a source of law but they are not considered strictly or absolutely binding as such.⁵⁶ This is the result of the idea of judicial independence: judges are legally bound only by law and not by decisions of higher courts. However, in practice, lower courts follow the decisions of higher courts and particularly of the Supreme Court.⁵⁷

8.2. General overview of the Case-Law

The Finnish case-law concerning the protection of journalistic sources is not very extensive. There are only few Supreme Court cases in Finland on the subject and the same goes for the appellate level. All the cases in which the protection of journalistic sources has been taken into consideration, the main proceedings have concerned defamation or aggravated defamation ⁵² Preparatory materials for 460/2003 (Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media) [HE 54/2002 Hallituksen esitys Eduskunnalle laiksi sananvapauden käyttämisestä joukkoviestinnässä ja eräiksi siihen liittyviksi laeiksi].

⁵³ The Constitution of Finland 11.6.1999/731, 98–99 § [Perustuslaki].

⁵⁴ Ibid.

⁵⁵ It should be mentioned that the literal translation from Finnish to English is “in dispute- and criminal matters” but the (unofficial) English translation published by the Ministry of Justice uses “civil, commercial and criminal matters”. The distinction is not very important in practice but perhaps the English translation is more precise than the original Finnish wording of the paragraph.

⁵⁶ J. Virolainen & P. Martikainen, Tuomion perusteleminen, Talentum Media 2010, pp. 397–403.

⁵⁷ Ibid.

which are criminalised in the Finnish Criminal Code.⁵⁸ The maximum punishment for aggravated defamation is imprisonment of two years. The severity of the maximum punishment is important because there is a clear distinction in the applicable procedural rules governing investigations and court proceedings depending on the severity of the punishment. Only in a case where for the crime under investigation or as the subject of a trial the maximum punishment is at least six years in prison, the protection of journalistic sources can be broken.⁵⁹ An exception to this rule can only be made if the information is obtained from someone who has unlawfully disclosed this information.⁶⁰ This exception applies to court proceedings only; the parliament specifically excluded the investigation phase from the scope of application.⁶¹

The low number of cases dealing with the issue of journalistic sources could perhaps be explained by the fact that the law in Finland so clearly limits the breaking of the confidentiality to very serious crimes only. The most common criminal proceedings that are associated with media would be defamation and other similar crimes. In court proceedings concerning these types of crimes, the protection can seldom be broken and in investigation phase, never.⁶²

8.3. Sonera book- litigation

Quite possibly the most important case in Finland concerning protection of journalistic sources is a Finnish Supreme Court case from 2004.⁶³ The case deals with an article that was published on the internet by an unknown writer titled 'Minne hävisivät Soneran rahat?' (Where did Sonera's money disappear?). The applicant (A) was a CEO of a publishing company that was publishing a book based on this anonymous writing. The anonymous writing led to a criminal investigation on aggravated defamation and A was heard as a witness because it was assumed that he knew the author of the anonymous Internet article. What is noteworthy in this case is that both the District Court and the court of appeal ordered A to disclose the source.⁶⁴ The district court focused on the exact wording of the Finnish legislation stating that the right to refuse to disclose a source only applies to mass media such as magazines and radio and not to books and other media that is not published periodically but only once.

The court of appeal came to the same conclusion as the district court concerning the protection of sources. Further, the court of appeal also referred to Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights. The court weighed the interests in the case in accordance with article 10(2), eventually concluding that public interest and the severity of the crime outweigh the interest of freedom of speech.

⁵⁸Rikoslaki 19.12.1889, 24 luku 9–10 §.

⁵⁹Code of Judicial Procedure 31.12.1734, 17:20 [Oikeudenkäymiskaari]; Criminal Investigation Act 22.7.2011/805, 7:8 [Esitutkintalaki].

⁶⁰Code of Judicial Procedure 31.12.1734, 17:20 [Oikeudenkäymiskaari]

⁶¹Päivi Tiilikka: Journalistin Sananvapaus, Talentum 2008, p. 37.

⁶²Ibid., pp. 36–37

⁶³KKO 2004:30 Finnish Supreme Court [Finnish]

⁶⁴District court of Helsinki 3.3.2003 [Finnish]; The Court of Appeal of Helsinki 12.6.2003 [Finnish].

The case then advanced to the Supreme Court. It should firstly be noted that the Finnish legislation changed during the process. The new 'Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media' entered into force on January 1st 2004.⁶⁵ Because of this, the Supreme Court didn't directly assess the interpretation of the law given by the courts of lower instance.⁶⁶ Legislation, which was in effect while the case was being determined in lower instances referred specifically to periodically printed media as well as radio and cable broadcasting. The new legislation removed such reference and now covers essentially all media. What the Supreme Court did, and quite rightly so, was to state that limiting the protection of sources only to certain kinds of publications was problematic in the light of Finnish Constitution (section 12, freedom of speech) and the ECHR (art. 10). The Supreme Court also stressed the importance of the protection of sources in guaranteeing the freedom of speech.⁶⁷ Here, the Supreme Court particularly took into account the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in which the protection of journalistic sources has been highlighted. In Roemen and Schmit the Court stated that the “[f]reedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and the safeguards to be afforded to the press are of particular importance. The protection of journalistic sources is one of the cornerstones of freedom of the press.”⁶⁸ Though, the ECtHR cases in question did not deal with the similar publication as in the case at hand (and although article 10(2) allows some derogations to national authorities), the Supreme Court held that nothing in article 10 could be read as allowing different treatment of different types of publications.

In the end, the Supreme Court returned the case to the district court because it was not clear whether A could answer the questions by the police without revealing the writer of the book or the source for the information contained in the book. This case demonstrates clearly that the Supreme Court of Finland uses the settled case-law of the ECtHR and judging by the low number of cases after this case, lower courts have also adopted the same approach. Of course, it should be kept in mind that the applicable legislation changed during the proceedings. It would have been interesting to see whether the decision of the Supreme Court would have been the same with the old and less clear legislation.

8.4. Case-law after KKO 2004:30

Subsequent case-law does not generally deal with the breaking of the protection of sources. There are still two noteworthy Supreme Court cases after KKO 2004:30. The first one deals

⁶⁵Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media 13.6.2003/460, 25 § [Laki sananvapauden käyttämisestä joukkoviestinnässä.]

⁶⁶KKO 2004:30 in KKO:n ratkaisut kommentein 2004:I, Talentum.

⁶⁷KKO 2004:30, para 11 Finnish Supreme Court [Finnish]. See also: Goodwin v. the UK, § 39, no. 17488/90, ECHR 1996-II; Roemen and Schmit v. Luxembourg, § 46, no. 51772/99, ECHR 2003.

⁶⁸*Roemen and Schmit v. Luxembourg*, § 46.

with the aftermath of the case KKO 2004:30.⁶⁹ In the case KKO 2004:30, A had provided the Supreme Court with two letters as evidence that he has the right to refuse to testify based on the protection of sources. In the discovery phase the letters were delivered to the National Bureau of Investigation (KRP).⁷⁰ The prosecutor later brought charges against a third person for defamation using the aforementioned letters as evidence. The question in the case is whether the letters can be used as evidence since this would circumvent the right of protection of sources. The problem in this case is that the Finnish legislation is relatively silent on what may or may not be used as evidence and the practice is mostly based on the precedents of the Supreme Court.⁷¹ The District Court decided that the letters can't be used as evidence. It based the decision on the fact that the letters were sent to a person who has the right not to disclose the source and therefore using the letters would in fact mean violating this right. The prosecutor appealed the decision and the court of appeal reversed it. It justified this on the basis that A had not been obligated to disclose the letters to the Supreme Court and by voluntarily doing so the letters could be used as evidence. The Supreme Court took the same position as the District Court and reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal. It stated that the letters would be used to testify on matters that A has right not to testify and this would not be acceptable. The problem with this case was that the Supreme Court did not provide much guidance on how to weigh different interests at stake. So even though the Court came to the right (in my opinion) conclusion in favor of freedom of speech, the case didn't necessarily provide much guidance for the lower courts for the future.⁷²

The second case, a Supreme Court case from 2010, proves that even though the sources of a journalist are protected, by refusing to name their sources, journalists may open themselves up to defamation charges.⁷³ The case concerned a television programme that claimed that three named persons were part of a group that funded terrorism abroad. The information was almost completely based on interviews of different persons who the journalists refused to identify. Here the Supreme Court stated that by publishing this information and refusing to disclose their sources, the journalists had accepted the risk that they can't prove that they have good faith reasons to trust the information. Further the claims and citations presented in the programme didn't convincingly show that the information was based on nothing but assumptions nor was it likely that the sources were independent of each other. The Court upheld the sentence for defamation. This case presents a problem with the protection of journalistic sources on one hand and right to privacy on the other. It is quite clear that the right to protection of sources mustn't mean that media or journalists can make any claims they wish and then plea the right to protect sources. It is equally true that the threshold for prosecuting journalists must be quite high, otherwise it could prevent the use of secret sources and thus hinder freedom of speech. In this case the Supreme Court weighed the credibility of the claims and of the witnesses that were

⁶⁹KKO 2009:88 Finnish Supreme Court [Finnish]

⁷⁰National Bureau of Investigation (Keskusrikospoliisi in Finnish) is a national unit of the Finnish Police that functions in the whole country and generally deals with more serious crimes.

⁷¹Ibid. Para 10.

⁷²Jyrki Virolainen: KKO 2009:88 in KKO:n ratkaisut kommentein II 2009. Talentum 2010. pp. 242-244.

⁷³KKO 2010:88 Finnish Supreme Court [Finnish] quoted on the program. It was also mentioned in the judgement that the persons were not identified by the sources but were connected to the accusations by the journalists. This means that it is unlikely that the verdict would have been any different even if the sources had been disclosed.

8.5. Conclusions

The body of case-law concerning the protection of journalistic sources in Finland is rather thin. This could be seen as a positive aspect. The most likely reason for this is that the case-law of the Supreme Court is quite clear and on the other hand that the legislation is drafted in a way that leaves very little room for interpretation. This can clearly be seen as an achievement of the new legislation that entered into force from the beginning of 2004. The legislation and the courts clearly give priority to the right to protect sources to a great extent; meaning unless the case concerns a particularly serious crime.

9. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interception of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information? Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

9.1 General background

Journalists' right to protect their sources of information is guaranteed by the Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media 460/2003. It receives interpretative support from the Constitution of Finland (731/1999).⁷⁴ Still as a result of the development of information

⁷⁴ Constitution of Finland (731/1999) Section 10 - The right to privacy

Everyone's private life, honour and the sanctity of the home are guaranteed. More detailed provisions on the protection of personal data are laid down by an Act. (subsection 1)

The secrecy of correspondence, telephony and other confidential communications is inviolable. (subsection 2)

Measures encroaching on the sanctity of the home, and which are necessary for the purpose of guaranteeing basic rights and liberties or for the investigation of crime, may be laid down by an Act. In addition, provisions concerning limitations of the secrecy of communications which are necessary in the investigation of crimes that jeopardise the security of the individual or society or the sanctity of the home, at trials and security checks, as well as during the deprivation of liberty may be laid down by an Act. (subsection 3) technology inter alia the public authorities increasingly use electronic surveillance to gather information.⁷⁵ Annually, approximately 2,500 permits are granted by the Finnish district courts to the police and to the customs to intercept telecommunication and to monitor traffic data.⁷⁶ The use of electronic surveillance is widely acknowledged. It is stated in the Criminal Law Convention on Corruption that the state parties are “required to adopt measures which will facilitate the gathering of evidence” -- this provision imposes an obligation on the Parties to permit the use of “special investigative techniques”, which includes “the use of under-cover agents, wire-tapping, bugging, interception of telecommunications, access to computer systems and so on”.⁷⁷

The acts concerning preliminary investigation mainly regulate the use of electronic surveillance and other coercive means. Thereby two acts are important; the Coercive Measures Act (806/2011) and the Police Act (872/2011) which both entered into force on 1 January 2014. These two laws are complimented by the Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media and the Code of Judicial Procedure (4/1734). The 2011 Coercive Measures Act replaced its predecessoring act which had been in force since 1995. The motion to reform came from the Constitutional Law Committee as it stated that the legislation concerning electronic surveillance is poorly applicable and the need for major reshaping is partly due to technical development.⁷⁸ In addition, in a statement issued also by the Constitutional Law Committee it was addressed that the operative law imposes problems on application and interpretation.⁷⁹ The Legal Affairs Committee in turn stated that there is a need for better surveillance on the use of coercive measures⁸⁰ and for better protection of the rights of objects.⁸¹ The reform also aimed at better protection of civil and human rights and to eliminate the use of complex and aged language and to provide clearer legislation.⁸² The objectives of the renewed Coercive Measures Act are to tighten the criteria of commencing a search especially in those situations where the object in

⁷⁵ National Police Board's report (2013)

https://www.intermin.fi/download/51803_selvitys_poliisin_tiedonhankinnasta_ja_sen_valvonnasta_vuonna_2013.pdf?573273c5e74ed288, page 5 (accessed 22 February 2016, available only in Finnish)

⁷⁶ Johanna Niemi and Virve-Maria de Godzinsky, Telepakkokeinojen oikeussuojajärjestelmä (Oikeuspoliittisen tutkimuslaitoksen tutkimuksia 2009), page 48 (available only in Finnish)

⁷⁷ Explanatory Report to the Criminal Law Convention on Corruption, available here:

<https://rm.coe.int/CoERMPublicCommonSearchServices/DisplayDCTMContent?documentId=exercising> (accessed 28 February 2016)

⁷⁸ Legal Affairs Committee's report 6/2005 vp, available here:

<https://www.eduskunta.fi/FI/vaski/sivut/trip.aspx?triptype=ValtiopaivaAsiakirjat&docid=lavl+6/2005#LAUSUNTO> (accessed 28 February 2016, available only in Finnish)

⁷⁹ Legal Affairs Committee's report 6/2005 vp

⁸⁰ Legal Affairs Committee's report 7/2004 vp, available here:

<https://www.eduskunta.fi/FI/Vaski/sivut/trip.aspx?triptype=ValtiopaivaAsiakirjat&docid=lavl+7/2004> (accessed 28 February 2016, available only in Finnish)

⁸¹ Government's bill 222/2010 vp

⁸² Government's bill 222/2010 vp search is supposed to remain under an obligation to maintain secrecy⁸³ and to improve cooperation between the preliminary investigation officers and the prosecutor.⁸⁴

9.2 Legislation

The Coercive Measures Act enables the use of coercive means and covert coercive means to gather information on a suspect. When applying these means the authorities must follow the principles of proportionality (sec 2), minimum intervention (sec 3) and sensitivity (sec 4).⁸⁵ The so-called "ordinary" coercive means – meaning non-covert coercive means – are enacted in chapters 2 to 9 of the Coercive Measures Act. These coercive means include: apprehension, arrest, remand, restriction of contacts, travel ban, confiscation for security, confiscation and copying of a document, search, cordoning off the site or the object of an investigation. The application of covert coercive means is enacted in chapter 10 of the Coercive Measures Act. The scope of application of covert coercive means is specified in sector 1 of this chapter. Therefore, covert coercive means include: telecommunication interception, the obtaining of data other than through telecommunications interception, traffic data monitoring, the obtaining of base station data, extended surveillance, covert collection of intelligence, technical surveillance (on-site interception, technical observation, technical monitoring and technical surveillance of a device), the obtaining of data for the identification of a network address or a terminal end device, covert activity, pseudo-purchase, the use of covert human intelligence sources and controlled delivery. Covert coercive means may be used in criminal investigation in secret from their subjects.⁸⁶

The jurisdiction to decide over the application of coercive means is divided between several authorities. The jurisdiction to rule on the application of most of the means lies with the district courts, however in those situations where the matter does not brook delay, an official with the power of arrest may decide on the use of certain surveillance methods.⁸⁷ The remainder of the decision-making jurisdiction lies either with the chief of the National Bureau of Investigation, or of the Security Intelligence Service or of a police department, or with an official with the power of arrest especially trained in covert collection of intelligence and appointed to this task.⁸⁸ When a court grants an interception permit it must simultaneously set the time limit on the duration of the interception, which is usually a month, and describe the telecommunications terminal equipment under interception in the permit.

According to sector 2 of chapter 10 of the Coercive Measures Act, a general prerequisite for the use of covert coercive measures is that their use may be assumed to produce information needed

⁸³ Government's bill 222/2010 vp

⁸⁴ Government's bill 222/2010 vp

⁸⁵ The Coercive Measures Act chapter 1

⁸⁶ The Coercive Measures Act 10:1.

⁸⁷ The Coercive Measures Act 10:9,1 10:20.1 10:22.1, 10:24.1

⁸⁸ The Coercive Measures Act 10:15

to clarify an offence. In addition to this, it is required from the use of telecommunications interception, the obtaining of data other than through telecommunications interception, extended surveillance, on-site interception, technical observation, technical monitoring of a person, technical surveillance of a device, covert activity, pseudo-purchase, the use of covert human intelligence sources and controlled delivery that the chosen covert means can be assumed to be of particularly important significance in the clarification of an offence. Measure-specific prerequisites also apply.

The highest threshold of application is adopted with covert activity, pseudo-purchase and on-site interception in domestic premises. The use of these means requires that they are necessary for the clarification of an offence. According to Government Bill 22/2010, “necessity” is to be interpreted in a way that the preliminary investigation authority must be able to show that it is not possible to solve the crime using other coercive measures or preliminary investigation methods or that it would require a fundamentally greater amount of means or that the crime solving process would be delayed without the use of these “necessary” means. Finally, in subsection 3 (of section 2 of chapter 10) it is enacted that the use of covert coercive measures shall be terminated before the end of the period designated in the permit, if the purpose of their use has been achieved or the prerequisites for their use no longer exist.

The only rules which explicitly concern the journalists’ special position are rules which deal with the use of search in certain premises and the prohibition of confiscation and copying connected to people who, according to legislation, either have the obligation or the right to remain silent in a specific matter. In the Coercive Measures Act, there is a differentiation made between a general search of a domicile and a special search of a domicile. A general search of a domicile refers to a search of the premises which has the protection of domiciliary peace. A special search of a domicile refers to a search of premises in which it may be assumed that the object of the search would reveal information in respect of which a person referred to in chapter 17, section 20, subsection 1 of the Code of Judicial Procedure may refuse to testify in court proceedings in respect of which, on the basis of Chapter 7, section 3 of the Coercive Measures Act no confiscation or copying of a document may be directed.⁸⁹ According to the Constitutional Law Committee people referred to in the chapter include for example lawyers, doctors and journalists.⁹⁰ A general, or a special, search of premises may be conducted in an area occupied by a suspect in an offence under two conditions. First, if there is reason to suspect that an offence has been committed and that the most severe punishment enacted for the offence is imprisonment for at least six months, or if the matter being investigated is circumstances connected to the imposition of a corporate fine; and secondly, if it can be assumed that the search will disclose in connection with the offence under investigation an object, property, document, information or a

⁸⁹ The Coercive Measures Act 8:1 point 3

⁹⁰ The Constitutional Law Committee’s report 66/2010 vp, available here:
<https://www.eduskunta.fi/FI/vaski/sivut/trip.aspx?riiotype=ValtiopaivaAsiakirjat&docid=pevl+66/2010>
(accessed 28 February 2016, available only in Finnish)

circumstance that may be of significance in the investigation of the offence.⁹¹ A search representative shall be appointed by a court for a special search of a domicile in order to ensure that confiscation or copying is not directed at information referred to in subsection 3 of section 1.⁹²

The prohibition of confiscation and copying connected to people who have the obligation or the right to remain silent is also enacted in the Coercive Measures Act. According to section 3 of chapter 7, a document may not be confiscated or copied to be used as evidence if it can be assumed to contain material on which a journalist may refuse to testify. The document must also be in the possession of journalists or in the possession of a person in who has the obligation or the right to remain silent regarding the matter. In subsection 3 it is provided that a document may be confiscated or copied if the person may be required to testify on the basis of Chapter 17, section 20, subsection 1 of the Code of Judicial Procedure or if he or she may be required to respond to a question on the basis of section 20, subsection 2 of said code and the maximum punishment for the offence under investigation is imprisonment for at least six years.

9.3 Finnish legislation in the light of the ECHR case-law

The right to confidential communication has been the subject of several cases at the European Court of Human Rights. In cases dealing with journalists' right to protect their sources of information, the ECHR has laid down certain preconditions for the use of coercive means. Firstly, the applicable legislation enabling the use of coercive means must be accessible, i.e. citizens must be able to obtain information about the circumstances in which communications may be intercepted. According to ECtHR case-law, the requirements of "accessibility and foreseeability are satisfied by the knowledge of the criteria".⁹³ Also, according to the ECtHR a rule is considered "foreseeable" if it is "formulated with sufficient precision to enable any individual - if need be with appropriate advice - to regulate his conduct". With regard to secret surveillance measures, the Court emphasised that the "law" had to be particularly detailed.⁹⁴ It is also stated by the ECtHR that "tapping and other forms of interception of telephone conversations constitute a serious interference with private life and correspondence and must accordingly be based on a 'law' that is particularly precise. It is essential to have clear, detailed rules on the subject".⁹⁵ The ECtHR links the expression "in accordance with the law" to the criterion of foreseeability, referring to the "quality of the law in question, requiring that it should be accessible to the person concerned, who must moreover be able to foresee its consequences for him, and compatible with the rule of law".⁹⁶ It is correspondingly stated by the ECtHR that

⁹¹ The Coercive Measures Act 8:2

⁹² The Coercive Measures Act 8:7

⁹³ Liberty and Others v. The United Kingdom 58243/00 para 15

⁹⁴ ECtHR Amann v. Switzerland 27798/95 para 56, see also Malone v United Kingdom 8691/79 para 66

⁹⁵ ECtHR Amann v. Switzerland 27798/95 para 56

⁹⁶ Kopp v. Switzerland 23224/94 para 55, see also Malone v. The United Kingdom 8691/79 para 67 and Telegraaf Media Nederland Landelijke Media B.V. and Others v. Netherlands 39315/06 para 90

the requirement of foreseeability is to be interpreted to mean that “the law must be sufficiently clear in its terms to give citizens an adequate indication as to the circumstances in which and the conditions on which public authorities are empowered to resort to this secret and potentially dangerous interference with the right to respect for private life and correspondence”.⁹⁷

The Parliamentary Ombudsman has criticised the criteria of being relatively broad and leaving wide discretion to decisions makers.⁹⁸ For example, telecommunication interception may be used “when there are grounds to suspect a person” of a certain crime.⁹⁹ The Parliamentary Ombudsman considers the threshold very low.¹⁰⁰ Respectively a special search of a domicile may be conducted if “there is reason to suspect that an offence has been committed”.¹⁰¹ The prerequisite of an “assumption” that the method will provide information in order to clarify an offence leaves wide discretion. The Finnish Institute of Criminology and Legal Policy has addressed that the reasoning given by the police and the customs in their interception permit applications has in general been of poor quality. In one third of the applications taken into consideration in the Institute’s research, the concrete reasoning was unclear and did not meet the quality requirements settled in the Supreme Court’s judgment KKO 2007:7.¹⁰² The Supreme Court has emphasised that it is insufficient if a district court refers only to information received from the civil servant. The court itself has to look into the facts and take care of a suspect’s legal protection.¹⁰³ The importance of looking into the facts was also stressed in the Supreme Court’s judgment KKO 2009:54. In this case, the permit on the use of technical interception was repealed. The applications were processed too rapidly and in most cases the decision was made within as a short amount of time as a day. The cursory processing can be considered to be in conflict with the requirement of detailed reasoning.

The rules are made more complex by the fact that it is unclear which of the lists are exhaustive. In the government bill HE 22/2010 vp, regarding the coercive measures act, the list of cases in which the use of telecommunication interception is allowed is deemed exhaustive.¹⁰⁴ With regard to other coercive measures there is no mention in the bill if lists are exhaustive or not.

9.4 Conclusion

⁹⁷ Malone v. United Kingdom 8691/79 para 67, see also Kennedy v. The United Kingdom 26839/05 para 140

⁹⁸ Parliamentary Ombudsman’s annual report (2011), available here: <http://www.oikeusasiamies.fi/dman/Document.phx%3FdocumentId%3Dxb16012102203265>, page 99 (accessed 22 February 2016, available only in Finnish)

⁹⁹ The Coercive Measures Act 10:3

¹⁰⁰ Parliamentary Ombudsman’s annual report (2011), page 99

¹⁰¹ Coercive Measures Act 8:2.1

¹⁰² Johanna Niemi and Virve-Maria de Godzinsky, Telepakkokeinojen oikeussuojajärjestelmä (Oikeuspoliittisen tutkimuslaitoksen tutkimuksia 2009), page 83 (available only in Finnish)

¹⁰³ Supreme Courts judgement KKO 2007:7 available here: <http://www.finlex.fi/fi/oikeus/kko/kko/2007/20070007> (available only in Finnish)

¹⁰⁴ Government’s bill 222/2010 vp, page 122 (available only in Finnish)

To date, there is no case law in Finland concerning the use of electronic surveillance or anti-terrorism laws in order to identify journalists' sources of information. Some case law exists on the obligation of journalists to disclose their sources but no case law exists specifically on the use of any coercive means or covert coercive means applied in order to identify journalists' sources. There are no statistics on which objectives have been attempted to reach with the use of coercive means.

Prior to the Coercive Measures Act reformation, it was stated by the Legal Affairs Committee and also stated in Government Bill 222/2010 vp that the legislation concerning preliminary investigation or court proceedings was complex, the norms concerning electronic surveillance were poorly applicable and the operative law caused problems in application and interpretation. The Parliamentary Ombudsman has criticized the norms of leaving too much space for discretion. Finally, the processing of applications has been criticized by the Finnish Institute of Criminology and Legal Policy. In this respect the foreseeability requirement has not been fulfilled. Nevertheless, journalists' right to protect their sources of can be considered to be enforced effectively. This may be the explanation why the question has not arisen in any Finnish court.

10. Can journalists rely on the encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance?

10.1 Legislation

The right to privacy and confidential communication are strongly protected in Finland and the provisions addressing the right to privacy are laid down in The Constitution of Finland (731/1999). According to section 10 “[e]veryone's private life, honor and the sanctity of the home are guaranteed”. The secrecy of correspondence, telephony and other confidential communications is inviolable.”¹⁰⁵ Those provisions which concern the necessary limitation of secrecy of communications in crime investigation at trials and security checks, as well as during the deprivation of liberty, that threaten the security of the individual or society or the sanctity of the home must be laid down by an Act. For such a limitative provision to be enforced, concrete suspicion of a crime is required.¹⁰⁶

The Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media (460/2003) similarly provides protection on confidential communication. According to section 16: “[t]he originator of a message provided to the public, the publisher and the broadcaster are entitled to maintain the confidentiality of the source of the information in the message.” This means that the publisher, the broadcaster or a person who has become aware of the confidential information while in the service of the originator of the message, the publisher or the broadcaster, are entitled to maintain the confidentiality of the identity of the originator of the message.

¹⁰⁵ The Constitution of Finland (731/1999) section 10, subsections 1 and 2

¹⁰⁶ Guidelines for developing Finnish legislation on conducting intelligence. A report of the Working Group (2015), available here: http://www.defmin.fi/files/3016/Suomalaisen_tiedustelulainsaadannon_suuntaviivoja.pdf, page 104 (accessed 20 February 2016, available only in Finnish)

These rules apply to both traditional and electronic communication. The duty to disclose confidential information in a pre-trial investigation or court proceedings is regulated separately. The Information Society Code (917/2014) in turn, which entered into force on January 1 2015, aims at ensuring the confidentiality of electronic communication and the protection of privacy.¹⁰⁷ The Code provides special protection for journalists' sources against corporate or association subscribers; according to section 151, an automatic search shall not be targeted nor traffic data shall be searched nor manually processed in order to find data on the originator of a specific message provided to the public, on a publisher or on a broadcaster.

An attempt at message interception is penalised in Finnish criminal law. According to the Criminal Code of Finland (38/1889) a person who unlawfully opens a letter or another closed communication addressed to another or hacks into the contents of an electronic or other technically recorded message which is protected from outsiders, or obtains information on the contents of a telephone call, telegram, transmission of text, images or data, or another comparable telemessage transmitted by telecommunications or on the transmission or reception of such a message shall be sentenced for message interception to a fine penalty or to imprisonment for at maximum two years.¹⁰⁸ The punishment for aggravated message interception is imprisonment for at most three years.¹⁰⁹ Finally, the Finnish Communications Regulatory Authority (Viestintävirasto) and The Finnish Data Protection Ombudsman (Tietosuojavaltuutettu) also supervise the right to confidential communication.

There is no legislation preventing journalists from using encryption to secure communication and to protect their sources of information.

10.2 ECtHR and Finnish case-law

The ECtHR case-law concerning journalist' and their sources' right to anonymity and encrypted communication online is not very extensive. In case Telegraaf Media Nederland Landelijke Media B.V. and Others v. Netherlands (39315/06), the ECtHR was of the opinion that the telephone tapping and surveillance of two journalists by the Netherlands security and intelligence services lacked a sufficient legal basis. The law did not provide adequate safeguards and “relevant and sufficient” reasons for the interference have not been given and therefore there had been a violation of Articles 8 and 10 of the Convention.¹¹⁰ In Goodwin v. The United Kingdom (17488/90), the ECtHR ruled by a vote of eleven to seven that an imposition in a disclosure order which required a journalist to reveal the identity of a source violated the right to freedom of expression under Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights.¹¹¹ In Sanoma Uitgevers B. V. v. The Netherlands (38224/03), the ECtHR found that an order for a compulsory surrender of journalistic material containing information which could identify journalistic sources constitutes in itself an interference with the applicant company's freedom to receive and impart information under Article 10.1 §. However, case-law has not dealt with online protection itself.

¹⁰⁷ Information Society Code (917/2014) sec 1

¹⁰⁸ Criminal Code of Finland (38/1889) chapter 38, section 3

¹⁰⁹ Criminal Code of Finland (38/1889) chapter 38, section 4

No Finnish case-law exists, either concerning journalists' or their sources of information's right to confidential communication and anonymity online. There are no cases concerning attempts by a public authority to interfere in journalists' right to encryption and anonymity online. Since the case law is absent it can be argued that journalists' right to anonymity and encryption online has not been severely violated in Finland.

10.3 New intelligence initiative

Currently, there is no legislation regarding intelligence activity in Finland. In December 2013, the Ministry of Defence set up a working group with the objective to improve the national intelligence legislation, which, in September 2015, led to the Ministry of Justice to set its own working group in order to investigate and prepare a possible amendment of the Constitution.¹¹² This is due to a statement in the Ministry of Defence's working group report that it is not possible to approve the initiative without amending section 10 of the Constitution - which guarantees the right to privacy and the right to confidential communication. The amendment would be necessary because national security is not listed in subsection 3 of section 10 of the Constitution as one of the acceptable grounds of restricting confidential communication.¹¹³ In October 2015, the Ministry of the Interior placed an initiative to adopt intelligence legislation. Because of possible amendments of the Constitution, the initiative could have a great impact on

¹¹⁰ Telegraaf Media Nederland Landelijke Media B.V. and Others v. Netherlands (39315/06) para 82 and 132

¹¹¹ Goodwin v. The United Kingdom (17488/90) para 46

¹¹² Ministry of Justice's resolution (submitted 28.9.2015) available here: <http://www.oikeusministerio.fi/material/attachments/om/valmisteilla/lakihankkeet/kansainvalinenprosessioikeu/OY7fsDIMX/asettamispaatos.pdf> (accessed 27 February 2016, available only in Finnish)

¹¹³ Constitution of Finland (731/1999) Section 10 - The right to privacy

Measures encroaching on the sanctity of the home, and which are necessary for the purpose of guaranteeing basic rights and liberties or for the investigation of crime, may be laid down by an Act. In addition, provisions concerning limitations of the secrecy of communications which are necessary in the investigation of crimes that jeopardise the security of the individual or society or the sanctity of the home, at trials and security checks, as well as during the deprivation of liberty may be laid down by an Act. (subsection 3)

the Finnish judicial system and on journalists' right to protect their sources. According to the Ministry of the Interior, the objective of the initiative is to improve the level of national security by legislating civilian intelligence. The prospective bill would expand the Finnish Security Intelligence Services' (Suojelupoliisi) powers to gather information by means of person intelligence, data system and telecommunications intelligence.¹¹⁴

The initiative has invoked criticism from various parties. The Ministry of Transport and Communication left a dissenting opinion in which the Ministry stated that the means of internet surveillance defined in the initiative are ineffective in relation to the intended purposes and also harmful to business life and confidential communication¹¹⁵. Anyhow, the Ministry of Transport and Communications stresses that it is important to improve the scope of competency of national armed forces in intelligence activity and agrees it to be reasonable to improve person and data system intelligence against foreign states¹¹⁶. The Ministry of Transport and Communication also approves the expansion in police's powers so that it can be ensured that the police is capable of managing their tasks¹¹⁷. Furthermore, the Ministry suggests that Finland should actively promote international co-operation, especially in the European Union, in order to safeguard the right to confidential communication¹¹⁸. According to the Ministry of Defence's report, state authorities' and interest groups' experts have expressed their concern that for example, the internet intelligence suggested in the initiative would introduce a drastic transition in the Finnish judicial system and could lead to a decline in the trust of internet users. Intelligence should not result in limiting the journalists' right to protect their sources of information.¹¹⁹ The Federation of the Finnish Media Industry, Finnmedia (Viestinnän Keskusliitto), The Union of Journalists in Finland (UJF) (Suomen Journalistiliitto) and the Council for Mass Media (Julkisen sanan neuvosto) have also expressed their concerns about the reform.¹²⁰ These organisations have argued that the initiative's working group has not examined the initiative in the light of journalists' right to protect their sources of information and that ¹¹⁴ Ministry of the Interior's resolution (submitted 1.10.2015), available here:

http://www.intermin.fi/download/62772_tiedustelulainsaadanto_asettamispaatos_01102015.pdf?6e3780742d02d388 page 2 (accessed 27 February 2016, available only in Finnish)

¹¹⁵ Guidelines for developing Finnish legislation on conducting intelligence. A report of the Working Group (2015) page 110

¹¹⁶ Guidelines for developing Finnish legislation on conducting intelligence. A report of the Working Group (2015) page 110-111

¹¹⁷ Guidelines for developing Finnish legislation on conducting intelligence. A report of the Working Group (2015) page 117

¹¹⁸ Guidelines for developing Finnish legislation on conducting intelligence. A report of the Working Group (2015) page 113

¹¹⁹ Guidelines for developing Finnish legislation on conducting intelligence. A report of the Working Group (2015) page 104

¹²⁰ Press release of The Union of Journalists in Finland (UJF), available here:
<http://www.journalistiliitto.fi/site/assets/files/7838/verkkovalvontalausunto.pdf> (accessed 28 February 2016)

there is a need for better instruments in the prospective bill in order to secure the journalists' special position.¹²¹ It is stressed in the UJF statement that due to the changes proposed by the working group, it is possible (author's emphasis) that a source's identity may be revealed to public authorities¹²². The organizations have also criticized the Ministry of the Interior over the fact that while the Ministry has studied the initiative in the light of right to privacy they have not studied it in the light of freedom of expression which is protected by section 12 of the Constitution which in turn is equivalent to Article 10 of the ECHR.¹²³ It remains to be seen what the final wording of the bill will turn out to be, similar to its impact on the Finnish judicial system.

10.4 Conclusion

The right to confidential communication is protected by the Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media and by the Constitution effectively. All restrictions to this right must be laid down by an Act. There is no case-law regarding a public authority attempting to unlawfully interfere in journalists' or their sources' right to encryption and anonymity online. Correspondingly, there is no ECtHR nor Finnish case-law regarding journalists' or their sources' right to anonymity and to encrypted communication online. With regard to all of these facts, it appears that the right to confidential communication enjoys extensive protection and respect in Finland.

It is challenging to estimate the full impact and significance of the initiative on legislating intelligence and confidential communication. Should the initiative lead to amending section 10 of the Constitution, this might result in broader impact on the Finnish judicial system and on the respect over journalists' right to anonymity. The Ministry of Defence's working group report has invoked interesting discussion on the matter and on how Finland should place itself within the international context considering the protection of confidential communication.

¹²¹ Press release of Finmmedia, available here: <http://www.vkl.fi/ajankohtaista/tiedotteet/media> (accessed 28 February 2016, available only in Finnish)

ala_muistuttaa_lahdesuojan_vaatimuksista_verkkoalvonnan_saantelyssa.6240.news (accessed 28 February 2016, available only in Finnish)

¹²² Press release of The Union of Journalists in Finland (UJF), available here: <http://www.journalistiliitto.fi/site/assets/files/7838/verkkoalvontalausunto.pdf>, page 1 (accessed 28 February 2016, available only in Finnish)

¹²³ The Constitution of Finland (731/1999) Section 12 - Freedom of expression and right of access to information
Everyone has the freedom of expression. Freedom of expression entails the right to express, disseminate and receive information, opinions and other communications without prior prevention by anyone.

11. Are whistle-blowers explicitly protected under law protecting journalistic sources? Is there another practice protecting whistle-blowers? Is the legislation prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers?

For the time being, whistle-blowers are guaranteed virtually no legal protection in Finland. According to research conducted by Transparency International, in 2013, there are also no official channels for whistle-blowers to use, no dedicated authorities to investigate the allegations made by whistle-blowers, no means of providing compensation for retribution nor specific penalties for retributions against them.¹²⁴ However, retributions against whistle-blowers may of course result in penalties depending on the form of retribution, but these laws are not directly connected to whistle-blowing.

According to the 2010 OECD report on the implementation of the OECD Anti-Bribery Convention in Finland, the Finnish authorities rely on some existing level of witness protection and the ability of unfairly dismissed employees to gain restitution through labor laws.¹²⁵ In the 2010 OECD report, the examiners recommended for Finland to introduce adequate mechanisms for the protection of whistle-blowers and also, once such mechanisms would have been made available, to subsequently raise awareness on these mechanisms. Unfortunately, this has not yielded anything concrete. In the follow-up report in 2013 it was noted that although having been discussed, the Finnish government had not adopted any rules to implement the OECD recommendation.¹²⁶ The OECD Working Group on Bribery last addressed the lack of development in a statement released on 24 February 2016.¹²⁷

The EU Anti-Corruption report notes the same as the OECD reports: The Finnish authorities rely on witness protection and labour laws. However, the report also points out that witness protection only provides a limited form of protection and labour laws are only of help should ¹²⁴Whistleblowing in Europe – Legal protection for whistle-blowers in the EU. Transparency International 2013. Retrieved at <https://issuu.com/transparencyinternational/docs/2013_whistleblowingineurope_en> (5.5.2016)

¹²⁵Phase 3 Report on Implementing the OECD Anti-Bribery Convention in Finland, OECD October 2010. Retrieved at <<http://www.oecd.org/daf/anti-bribery/anti-briberyconvention/Finlandphase3reportEN.pdf>> (5.5.2016)

¹²⁶Finland: Follow-up to the Phase 3 Report & Recommendations, OECD January 2013. Retrieved at <<http://www.oecd.org/daf/anti-bribery/FinlandPhase3WrittenFollowUpReportEN.pdf>>(5.5.2016)

¹²⁷Statement of the OECD Working Group on Bribery on Finland's limited implementation of the Anti-Bribery Convention, 24.2.2016. Retrieved at <<http://www.oecd.org/corruption/public-statement-on-finland-s-lack-of-implementation-of-the-anti-bribery-convention-2016.htm>>(5.5.2016)

the retribution be connected to a dismissal.¹²⁸ It is also noted in the EU report that several international organisations as well as non-governmental organizations (NGOs) have encouraged Finland to set up a protection regime for whistle-blowers.

Thus far, these recommendations have not resulted in any concrete action in Finland. Finland remains one of the few countries in Europe where there is virtually no legislation on the subject. It was highlighted in the 2014 report of the Committee on Ethics of State Civil Servants that the Council of Europe has issued several recommendations on whistle-blower protection and that those recommendations should be followed by Finland in order to ensure that wrongdoings are exposed.¹²⁹

12. Conclusions

Generally, this report did not find many problems with the protection of journalistic sources in Finland. The Finnish legislation and case-law is rather well-aligned with different recommendations, and the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights. The protection of journalistic sources is regulated very little in Finland, at least in comparison to most other jurisdictions. The protection of journalistic sources applies to everyone who provides information to the public, and is not dependent on the status or the profession of that person. This means that a professional journalist does not enjoy any particular privileges compared to, for example, an amateur blogger. Finnish journalists have also self-regulatory guidelines that address the protection of sources; however, these are not legally binding in the sense that they could be applied in courts.

Breaching the protection of sources has been limited to very particular set of cases in Finland. For this reason, there are few court cases dealing with this issue. Also, it is clear that in the few cases where protection of sources has been an issue, the attempts to breach it haven't been successful. The Finnish legislation is generally well in line with the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 and alternative means are preferred in criminal investigations and court procedures. However, a new intelligence legislation is being prepared in Finland and it still remains to be seen how this affects the protection of journalistic sources.

One field in which the Finnish legislation is incompatible with the recommendations of the Council of Europe, OECD etc. is the protection of whistle-blowers. Finnish legislation doesn't provide any additional protection to whistle-blowers. This makes Finland one of the few countries in Europe that lack such protection.

¹²⁸ANNEX: Finland to the EU Anti-Corruption Report. Brussels, 3.2.2014 COM(2014) 38, Annex 26. Retrieved at <http://ec.europa.eu/dgs/home-affairs/what-we-do/policies/organized-crime-and-human-trafficking/corruption/anti-corruption-report/docs/2014_acr_finland_chapter_en.pdf>

¹²⁹Valtion virkamiesseettisen toimikunnan raportti 3/2014. Valtiovarainministeriö helmikuu 2014, p. 44. Retrieved at <http://vm.fi/documents/10623/1107479/Valtion_virkamiesseettisen_toimikunnan_raportti_3_2014.pdf/ab866e15-a9af-456d-aca4-99b7b1c2e340>

In conclusion, the freedom of expression is quite well valued and protected in Finland. There remain certain problematic areas (such as whistle-blower protection) and some questions on future development. However, during the compilation process of this report, our research group found there to be no major issues in the sphere of freedom of expression and it is unlikely that there would be drastic changes to this in the near future.

13. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

13.1. Legislation

- Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media 13.6.2003/460 [Laki sananvapauden käyttämisestä joukkoviestinnässä.]
- Coercive Measures Act 806/2011 [Pakkokeinolaki]
- Constitution of Finland 731/1999 [Suomen perustuslaki]
- Criminal Code of Finland 38/1889 [Rikoslaki]
- Information Society Code 917/2014 [Tietoyhteiskuntakaari]
- Code of Judicial Procedure AAD/1734 [Oikeudenkäymiskaari]
- Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Rome, 4.XI.1950
- Statute of the Council of Europe, 5.V.1949

13.2. Case Law

- KKO 2004:30
- KKO 2007:7
- KKO 2009:88
- KKO 2010:88
- Amann v. Switzerland, no. 27798/95
- Financial Times Limited & Others vs. United Kingdom, no. 821/03 ECHR [2009]
- Goodvin v. the UK, no. 17488/90, ECHR 1996-II
- Ernst and Others v. Belgium, no. 33400/96
- Kennedy v. The United Kingdom, no. 26839/05
- Kopp v. Switzerland, no. 23224/94
- K.U. vs. Finland, no. 2872/02
- Liberty and Others v. The United Kingdom, no. 58243/00
- Malone v. The United Kingdom, no. 8691/79
- Roemen and Schmit v. Luxembourg, no. 51772/99, ECHR 2003
- Telegraaf Media Nederland Landelijke Media B.V. and Others v. Netherlands, no. 39315/06
- Tillack vs. Belgium no. 20477/05 ECHR [2007].

13.3. Books and articles

- Niemi J, and de Godzinsky, V-M, Telepakkokeinojen oikeussuojajärjestelmä (Oikeuspoliittisen tutkimuslaitoksen tutkimuksia 2009)
- Niiranen V, Sotamaa P, Tiilikka P, Sananvapauslaki, tulkinta ja käytäntö, (Sanoma Pro Oy 2013)
- Tiilikka P, Journalistin sananvapaus (Sanoma Pro Oy 2008).
- KKO:n ratkaisut kommentein 2004:I (Talentum 2005)
- KKO:n ratkaisut kommentein 2009:II (Talentum 2010)

13.4. Internet sources

- Ammatti yhdistää <<http://www.journalistiliitto.fi/liitto/tietoa-jasenistamme/ammattiyhdistaa/>> accessed February 28 2016 [Finnish]
- Council of Europe, Committee of Ministers (the official website of the Committee of Ministers) <http://www.coe.int/t/cm/aboutCM_en.asp/> accessed 22 February 2016
- Guidelines for Journalists, (Operative from 1 January 2014), <<http://www.journalistiliitto.fi/in-english/ground-rules/guidelines/>> accessed February 28 2016
- Haraszti M, The Media Self-Regulation Guidebook <<http://www.osce.org/fom/31497?download=true>> accessed February 26 2016
- “Ketkä ovat JSN:n takana?”, <<http://www.jsn.fi/jsn/jsn/>> accessed February 28 2016
- The Basic Agreement, <http://www.jsn.fi/en/Council_for_Mass_Media/basic-agreement/> accessed February 28 2016
- The Preamble of the Guidelines for the Journalists (Operative from 1 January 2014), <<http://www.journalistiliitto.fi/in-english/ground-rules/guidelines/>> accessed February 28 2016
- ANNEX: Finland to the EU Anti-Corruption Report. Brussels, 3.2.2014 COM(2014) 38, Annex 26. Retrieved at: <http://ec.europa.eu/dgs/home-affairs/what-we-do/policies/organized-crime-and-human-trafficking/corruption/anti-corruption-report/docs/2014_acr_finland_chapter_en.pdf> (5.5.2016)
- Council of Europe, Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information. <<https://wcd.coe.int/ViewDoc.jsp?id=342907&Site=CM>> Accessed 27 February 2016
- Explanatory Report to the Criminal Law Convention on Corruption. Retrieved at: <<https://rm.coe.int/CoERMPublicCommonSearchServices/DisplayDCTMContent?documentId=exercising>> (28.2.2016)
- Finland: Follow-up to the Phase 3 Report & Recommendations, OECD January 2013. Retrieved at: <<http://www.oecd.org/daf/anti-bribery/FinlandPhase3WrittenFollowUpReportEN.pdf>> (5.5.2016)
- Government's bill 222/2010 vp

- Guidelines for developing Finnish legislation on conducting intelligence. A report of the Working Group (2015). Retrieved at:
- <http://www.defmin.fi/files/3016/Suomalaisen_tiedustelulainsaadannon_suuntaviivoja.pdf> (20.2.2016)
- Legal Affairs Committee's report 6/2005 vp. Retrieved at:
<<https://www.eduskunta.fi/FI/vaski/sivut/trip.aspx?triptype=ValtiopaivaAsiakirjat&docid=lavl+6/2005#LAUSUNTO>> (28.2.2016)
- Legal Affairs Committee's report 7/2004 vp. Retrieved at:
- <<https://www.eduskunta.fi/FI/Vaski/sivut/trip.aspx?triptype=ValtiopaivaAsiakirjat&docid=lavl+7/2004>> (28.2.2016)
- Ministry of Justice's resolution (submitted 28.9.2015). Retrieved at:
<<http://www.oikeusministerio.fi/material/attachments/om/valmisteilla/lakihankkeet/kansainvalinenprosessioikeu/OY7fsDIMX/asettamispaatos.pdf>> (27.2.2016)
- Ministry of the Interior's resolution (submitted 1.10.2015). Retrieved at:
<http://www.intermin.fi/download/62772_tiedustelulainsaadanto_asettamispaatos_01102015.pdf?6e3780742d02d388> (27.2.2016)
- National Police Board's report (2013) Retrieved at:
<https://www.intermin.fi/download/51803_selvitys_poliisin_tiedonhankinnasta_ja_sen_valvonnasta_vuonna_2013.pdf?573273c5e74ed288> (22.2.2016)
- Parliamentary Ombudsman's annual report (2011). Retrieved at:
<<http://www.oikeusasiamies.fi/dman/Document.phx%3FdocumentId%3Dxb16012102203265>, page 99> (22.2.2016)
- Phase 3 Report on Implementing the OECD Anti-Bribery Convention in Finland, OECD October 2010. Retrieved at : <<http://www.oecd.org/daf/anti-bribery/anti-briberyconvention/Finlandphase3reportEN.pdf>> (5.5.2016)
- Preparatory materials for 460/2003 (Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media) [HE 54/2002 Hallituksen esitys Eduskunnalle laiksi sananvapauden käyttämisestä joukkoviestinnässä ja eräiksi siihen liittyviksi laeiksi]
- Press release of The Union of Journalists in Finland (UJF). Retrieved at:
<<http://www.journalistiliitto.fi/site/assets/files/7838/verkkovalvontalausunto.pdf>> (28.2.2016)
- Council for Mass Media, <http://www.jsn.fi/en/guidelines_for_journalists/> Accessed April 5 2016
- Macovei M, A Guide to the Implementation of Article 10. (Council of Europe, January 2004). <http://www.echr.coe.int/LibraryDocs/DG2/HRHAND/DG2-EN-HRHAND-02\(2004\).pdf.pdf)> Accessed 27 February 2016
- Mörä T (ed), Lähdesuoja – normit, idealit ja käytännöt. (Communication Research Center CRC, University of Helsinki, March 2011)
<http://www.helsinki.fi/crc/Julkaisut/Lahdesuoja_raportti.pdf> Accessed 27 February 2016 [Finnish]
- Statement of the OECD Working Group on Bribery on Finland's limited implementation of the Anti-Bribery Convention, 24.2.2016. Retrieved at:
<<http://www.oecd.org/corruption/public-statement-on-finland-s-lack-of-implementation-of-the-anti-bribery-convention-2016.htm>> (5.5.2016)

- The Constitutional Law Committee's report 66/2010 vp. Retrieved at:
<<https://www.eduskunta.fi/FI/vaski/sivut/trip.aspx?riptide=ValtiopaivaAsiakirjat&docid=pevl+66/2010>> (28.2.2016)
- Tiilikka P, Sananvapaus ja lähdesuoja Suomessa in Tuomas Mörä (ed), Lähdesuoja – normit, idealit ja käytännöt. (Communication Research Center CRC, University of Helsinki, March 2011) <http://www.helsinki.fi/crc/Julkaisut/Lahdesuoja_raportti.pdf. 19> Accessed 27 February 2016 [Finnish]
- Valtion virkamiesseettisen toimikunnan raportti 3/2014. Valtiovarainministeriö helmikuu 2014. Retrieved at:
<http://vm.fi/documents/10623/1107479/Valtion_virkamiesseettisen_toimikunnan_raportti_3_2014.pdf/ab866e15-a9af-456d-aca4-99b7b1c2e340>(5.5.2016)
- Whistleblowing in Europe – Legal protection for whistle-blowers in the EU. Transparency International 2013. Retrieved at:
<https://issuu.com/transparencyinternational/docs/2013_whistleblowingineurope_en> (5.5.2016)

14. Table of provisions

Provisions in native language	Corresponding translation
Suomen Perustuslaki 731/1999 12 § Sananvapaus ja julkisuus Jokaisella on sananvapaus. Sananvapauteen sisältyy oikeus ilmaista, julkistaa ja vastaanottaa tietoja, mielipiteitä ja muita viestejä kenenkään ennakolta estämättä. Tarkempia säännöksiä sananvapauden käyttämisestä annetaan lailla. Lailla voidaan säätää kuvaohjelmia koskevia lasten suojelemiseksi välttämättömiä rajoituksia. Viranomaisen hallussa olevat asiakirjat ja muut tallenteet ovat julkisia, jollei niiden julkisuutta ole välttämättömien syiden vuoksi lailla erikseen rajoitettu. Jokaisella on oikeus saada tieto julkisesta asiakirjasta ja tallenteesta. 9 luku Lainkäyttö 98 § Tuomioistuimet Yleisiä tuomioistuimia ovat korkein oikeus,	The Constitution of Finland 731/1999 Section 12 - Freedom of expression and right of access to information Everyone has the freedom of expression. Freedom of expression entails the right to express, disseminate and receive information, opinions and other communications without prior prevention by anyone. More detailed provisions on the exercise of the freedom of expression are laid down by an Act. Provisions on restrictions relating to pictorial programmes that are necessary for the protection of children may be laid down by an Act. Documents and recordings in the possession of the authorities are public, unless their publication has for compelling reasons been specifically restricted by an Act. Everyone has the right of access to public documents and recordings. Chapter 9 - Administration of justice Section 98 - Courts of law The Supreme Court, the Courts of Appeal and the District Courts are the general

hovioukudet ja käräjäoukudet. Yleisiä hallintotuomioistuimia ovat korkein hallinto-oukeus ja alueelliset hallintoukudet. Tuomiovaltaa erikseen määrättyillä toimialoilla käyttävistä erityistuomioistuinten säädetään lailla. Satunnaisten tuomioistuinten asettaminen on kielletty. 99 § Ylimpien tuomioistuinten tehtävät Ylintä tuomiovaltaa riita- ja rikosasioissa käyttää korkein oukeus sekä hallintolainkäyttöasioissa korkein hallintoukeus. Ylimmät tuomioistuimet valvovat lainkäyttöä omalla toimialallaan. Ne voivat tehdä valtioneuvostolle esityksiä lainsäädäntötoimeen ryhtymisestä. Laki sananvapauden käyttämisestä joukkoviestinnässä (460/2003) 16 § Lähdesuoja ja oukeus anonyymiin ilmaisuun Yleisön saataville toimitetun viestin laatijalla sekä julkaisijalla ja ohjelmatoiminnan harjoittajalla on oukeus olla ilmaisematta, kuka on antanut viestin sisältämät tiedot.	courts of law. The Supreme Administrative Court and the regional Administrative Courts are the general courts of administrative law. Provisions on special courts of law, administering justice in specifically defined fields, are laid down by an Act. Provisional courts shall not be established. Section 99 - Duties of the Supreme Court and the Supreme Administrative Court Justice in civil, commercial and criminal matters is in the final instance administered by the Supreme Court. Justice in administrative matters is in the final instance administered by the Supreme Administrative Court. The highest courts supervise the administration of justice in their own fields of competence. They may submit proposals to the Government for the initiation of legislative action. Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media (460/2003) Section 16 - Confidentiality of sources and right to anonymous expression The originator of a message provided to the public, the publisher and the broadcaster are entitled to maintain the confidentiality of the source of the information in the message. In addition, the publisher and the broadcaster are entitled to maintain the
--	--

Julkaisijalla ja ohjelmatoiminnan harjoittajalla on lisäksi oikeus olla ilmaisematta viestin laatijan henkilöllisyyttä. Edellä 1 momentissa tarkoitettu oikeus on myös sillä, joka on saanut mainituista seikoista tiedon ollessaan viestin laatijan taikka julkaisijan tai ohjelmatoiminnan harjoittajan palveluksessa. Velvollisuudesta ilmaista 1 momentissa tarkoitettu tieto esituskinnassa tai oikeudenkäynnissä säädetään erikseen. Rikoslaki 39/1889 24 luku Yksityisyyden, rauhan ja kunnian loukkaamisesta (531/2000) 8 § (13.12.2013/879) Yksityiselämää loukkaava tiedon levittäminen Joka oikeudettomasti 1) joukkotiedotusvälinettä käyttämällä tai 2) muuten toimittamalla lukuisten ihmisten saataville esittää toisen yksityiselämästä tiedon, vihjauksen tai kuvan siten, että teko on omiaan aiheuttamaan vahinkoa tai kärsimystä loukatulle taikka häneen kohdistuvaa halveksuntaa, on tuomittava yksityiselämää loukkaavasta tiedon levittämisestä sakkoon.	confidentiality of the identity of the originator of the message. Also a person who has become aware of the confidential information referred to in subsection (1) while in the service of the originator of the message, the publisher or the broadcaster is similarly entitled to maintain that confidentiality. Separate provisions apply to the duty to disclose confidential information referred to in subsection (1) in a pre-trial investigation or court proceedings. The Criminal Code of Finland 39/1889 Chapter 24 - Offences against privacy, public peace and personal reputation (531/2000) Section 8 – Dissemination of information violating personal privacy (879/2013) (1) A person who unlawfully. (1) through the use of the mass media, or (2) otherwise by making available to many persons disseminates information, an insinuation or an image of the private life of another person, so that the act is conducive to causing that person damage or suffering, or subjecting that person to contempt, shall be sentenced for dissemination of information violating personal privacy to a fine. (2) The spreading of information, an insinuation or an image of the private life of
--	--

Yksityiselämää loukkaavana tiedon levittämisenä ei pidetä sellaisen yksityiselämää koskevan tiedon, vihjauksen tai kuvan esittämistä politiikassa, elinkeinoelämässä tai julkisessa virassa tai tehtävässä taikka näihin rinnastettavassa tehtävässä toimivasta, joka voi vaikuttaa tämän toiminnan arviointiin mainitussa tehtävässä, jos esittäminen on tarpeen yhteiskunnallisesti merkittävän asian käsittelemiseksi.

Yksityiselämää loukkaavana tiedon levittämisenä ei myöskään pidetä yleiseltä kannalta merkittävän asian käsittelemiseksi esitettyä ilmaisua, jos sen esittäminen, huomioon ottaen sen sisältö, toisten oikeudet ja muut olosuhteet, ei selvästi ylitä sitä, mitä voidaan pitää hyväksyttävänä.

9 § (13.12.2013/879) Kunnianloukkaus

Joka

1) esittää toisesta valheellisen tiedon tai vihjauksen siten, että teko on omiaan aiheuttamaan vahinkoa tai kärsimystä loukatulle taikka häneen kohdistuvaa halveksuntaa, taikka

2) muuten kuin 1 kohdassa tarkoitetulla tavalla halventaa toista, on tuomittava kunnianloukkauksesta sakkoon.

Kunnianloukkauksesta tuomitaan myös se, joka esittää kuolleesta henkilöstä valheellisen tiedon tai vihjauksen siten, että teko on omiaan aiheuttamaan kärsimystä ihmiselle, jolle vainaja oli erityisen läheinen.

Edellä 1 momentin 2 kohdassa tarkoitettuna a person in politics, business, public office or public position, or in a comparable position, does not constitute dissemination of information violating personal privacy, if it may affect the evaluation of that person's activities in the position in question and if it is necessary for purposes of dealing with a matter of importance to society.

(3) Presentation of an expression in the consideration of a matter of general importance shall also not be considered dissemination of information violating personal privacy if its presentation, taking into consideration its contents, the rights of others and the other circumstances, does not clearly exceed what can be deemed acceptable.

Section 9 - Defamation (879/2013)

(1) A person who

(1) spreads false information or a false insinuation of another person so that the act is conducive to causing damage or suffering to that person, or subjecting that person to contempt, or

(2) disparages another in a manner other than referred to in paragraph (1) shall be sentenced for defamation to a fine.

(2) Also a person who spreads false information or a false insinuation about a deceased person, so that the act is conducive to causing suffering to a person

kunnianloukkauksena ei pidetä arvostelua, joka kohdistuu toisen menettelyyn politiikassa, elinkeinoelämässä, julkisessa virassa tai tehtävässä, tieteessä, taiteessa taikka näihin rinnastettavassa julkisessa toiminnassa ja joka ei selvästi ylitä sitä, mitä voidaan pitää hyväksyttävänä. Kunnianloukkauksena ei myöskään pidetä yleiseltä kannalta merkittävän asian käsittelemiseksi esitettyä ilmaisua, jos sen esittäminen, huomioon ottaen sen sisältö, toisten oikeudet ja muut olosuhteet, ei selvästi ylitä sitä, mitä voidaan pitää hyväksyttävänä. 10 § (13.12.2013/879) Törkeä kunnianloukkaus Jos 9 §:n 1 momentissa tarkoitettussa kunnianloukkauksessa aiheutetaan suurta kärsimystä tai erityisen suurta vahinkoa ja rikos on myös kokonaisuutena arvostellen törkeä, rikoksentekeijä on tuomittava törkeästä kunnianloukkauksesta sakkoon tai vankeuteen enintään kahdeksi vuodeksi. 38 luku (21.4.1995/578) Tieto- ja viestintärikoksista 3 § (10.4.2015/368) Viestintäsalaisuuden loukkaus	to whom the deceased was particularly close, shall be sentenced for defamation. (3) Criticism that is directed at a person's activities in politics, business, public office, public position, science, art or in comparable public activity and that does not obviously exceed the limits of propriety does not constitute defamation referred to in subsection 1(2). (4) Presentation of an expression in the consideration of a matter of general importance shall also not be considered defamation if its presentation, taking into consideration its contents, the rights of others and the other circumstances, does not clearly exceed what can be deemed acceptable. Section 10 - Aggravated defamation (879/2013) If, in the defamation referred to in section 9(1), considerable suffering or particularly significant damage is caused and the defamation is aggravated also when assessed as a whole, the offender shall be sentenced for aggravated defamation to a fine or to imprisonment for at most two years. Chapter 38. Data and communications offences (578/1995) Section 3 - Message interception (368/2015) (1) A person who unlawfully
---	--

Joka oikeudettomasti 1) avaa toiselle osoitetun kirjeen tai muun suljetun viestin taikka suojauksen murtaen hankkii tiedon sähköisesti tai muulla vastaavalla teknisellä keinolla tallennetusta, ulkopuoliselta suojatusta viestistä taikka 2) hankkii tiedon televerkossa tai tietojärjestelmässä välitettävänä olevan puhelun, sähkeen, tekstin-, kuvan- tai datasiirron taikka muun vastaavan televiestin sisällöstä taikka tällaisen viestin lähettämisestä tai vastaanottamisesta, on tuomittava viestintäsalaisuuden loukkauksesta sakkoon tai vankeuteen enintään kahdeksi vuodeksi. Yritys on rangaistava. 4 § (21.4.1995/578) Törkeä viestintäsalaisuuden loukkaus Jos viestintäsalaisuuden loukkauksessa 1) rikoksenteekijä käyttää rikoksen tekemisessä hyväksi asemaansa sähköisen viestinnän tietosuojalaissa (516/2004) tarkoitetun teleyrityksen palveluksessa tai muuta erityistä luottamusasemaansa, (16.6.2004/517) 2) rikoksenteekijä käyttää rikoksen tekemistä varten suunniteltua tai muunnettua tietojenkäsittelyohjelmaa tai teknistä erikoislaitetta tai rikos muuten tehdään erityisen suunnitelmallisesti taikka 3) rikoksen kohteena oleva viesti on sisällöltään erityisen luottamuksellinen	(1) opens a letter or another closed communication addressed to another or by hacking obtains information on the contents of an electronic or other technically recorded message which is protected from outsiders, or (2) obtains information on the contents of a telephone call, telegram, transmission of text, images or data, or another comparable telemessage transmitted by telecommunications or an information system or on the transmission or reception of such a message shall be sentenced for message interception to a fine or to imprisonment for at most two years. (2) An attempt is punishable. Section 4 - Aggravated message interception (578/1995) (1) If in the message interception (1) the offender commits the offence by making use of his or her position in the service of a telecommunications company, as referred in the Act on the Protection of Electronic Messages (516/2004) or his or her other special position of trust, (517/2004) (2) the offender commits the offence by making use of a computer program or special technical device designed or altered for such purpose, or otherwise especially methodically, or (3) the message that is the object of the offence has an especially confidential content or the act constitutes a grave
--	---

taikka teko huomattavasti loukkaa yksityisyyden suojaa ja viestintäsalaisuuden loukkaus on myös kokonaisuutena arvostellen törkeä, rikoksentehtyjä on tuomittava törkeästä viestintäsalaisuuden loukkauksesta vankeuteen enintään kolmeksi vuodeksi. Yritys on rangaistava. Oikeudenkäymiskaari (4/1734) 17 luku (12.6.2015/732) Todistelusta 20 § (12.6.2015/732) Sananvapauden käyttämisestä joukkoviestinnässä annetussa laissa (460/2003) tarkoitettu yleisön saataville toimitetun viestin laatija taikka julkaisija tai ohjelmatoiminnan harjoittaja saa kieltäytyä todistamasta siitä, kuka on antanut viestin perusteena olevat tiedot tai laatinut yleisön saataville toimitetun viestin. Tuomioistuimien voi velvoittaa 1 momentissa tarkoitettua henkilön todistamaan, jos syyttäjä ajaa syytettyä rikoksesta, josta säädetty ankara rangaistus on vähintään kuusi vuotta vankeutta tai joka koskee salassapitovelvollisuuden rikkomista rangaistavaksi säädetyllä tavalla. Esitutkintalaki (805/2011)	violation of the protection of privacy. and the message interception is aggravated also when assessed as a whole, the offender shall be sentenced for aggravated message interception to imprisonment for at most three years. (2) An attempt is punishable. Code of Judicial Procedure (4/1734) Chapter 17 - Evidence (732/2015) Section 20 (1) The originator of a message provided to the public, the publisher or the broadcaster referred to in the Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media (460/2003) may refuse to testify about who had been the source of the information in the message or about who had prepared a message provided to the public. (2) The court may oblige a person referred to in subsection 1 to testify if the prosecutor has brought charges for an offence for which the maximum sentence is imprisonment for at least six years or that concerns violation of an obligation of confidentiality in a manner which according to law is punishable. Criminal Investigation Act (805/2011)
--	--

7 luku Kuulustelut 8 § (12.6.2015/736) Todistajan ilmaisuvelvollisuus ja kieltäytyminen todistamasta Todistajan on totuudenmukaisesti ja mitään salaamatta ilmaistava, mitä hän tietää tutkittavasta asiasta. Jos hän kuitenkin olisi tutkittavaa rikosta koskevassa oikeudenkäynnissä oikeudenkäymiskaaren 17 luvun 10–14 §:n, 16–21 §:n taikka 22 §:n 1 ja 2 momentin nojalla oikeutettu tai velvollinen kieltäytymään todistamasta, hän on vastaavasti oikeutettu tai velvollinen siihen myös esitutkinnassa. Sen estämättä, mitä 1 momentissa säädetään todistajan oikeudesta tai velvollisuudesta kieltäytyä todistamasta, todistaja on kuitenkin velvollinen todistamaan, jos: 1) oikeudenkäymiskaaren 17 luvun 11 §:n 2 tai 3 momentissa, 12 §:n 1 tai 2 momentissa, 13 §:n 1 tai 3 momentissa, 14 §:n 1 momentissa taikka 16 §:n 1 momentissa tarkoitettu henkilö, jonka hyväksi salassapitovelvollisuus on säädetty, suostuu todistamiseen; 2) tutkittavana on rikos, josta säädetty ankarin rangaistus on vähintään kuusi vuotta vankeutta, taikka tällaisen rikoksen yritys tai osallisuus siihen, ja tuomioistuimien voisi tutkittavaa rikosta koskevassa oikeudenkäynnissä velvoittaa todistamaan oikeudenkäymiskaaren 17 luvun 12 §:n 3 momentin, 13 §:n 2 tai 3 momentin, 14 §:n 2 momentin taikka 20 §:n 2 momentin nojalla; 3) tutkittavana on rikos, josta oikeudenkäymiskaaren 17 luvun 9 §:n 3 momentin nojalla tuomioistuimissa ei olisi	Chapter 7 – Questioning Section 8 – The obligation of a witness to provide evidence and refusal to testify (736/2015) (1) A witness shall truthfully and without concealment state what he or she knows in the matter under investigation. However, if he or she would have the right or the obligation in the criminal proceedings concerning the matter to refuse to testify, in accordance with Chapter 17, sections 10 – 14, 16 – 21 or 22(1) or 22(2) of the Code of Judicial Procedure, he or she has said right or obligation also in the criminal investigation. (2) Notwithstanding what is provided in subsection 1 on the right or obligation of a witness to refuse to testify, a witness is required to testify if: (1) the person in whose benefit the secrecy obligation has been provided, as referred to in Chapter 17, section 11(2) or 11(3), section 12(1) or 12(2), section 13(1) or 13(3), section 14(1) or section 16(1) of the Code of Judicial Procedure, consents to the testimony; (2) the offence under investigation is punishable with a maximum of imprisonment for at least six years, or attempt of or participation in such an offence, and in criminal proceedings concerning the offence the court could require testimony in accordance with Chapter 17, section 12(3), section 13(2) or 13(3), section 14(2) or section 20(2) of the Code of Judicial Procedure; oikeutta tai velvollisuutta kieltäytyä todistamasta, eikä todistaja ole mainitun luvun 20 §:n 1 momentissa tarkoitettu henkilö.
--	--

Todistaja on velvollinen myös esittämään hallussaan olevan, esitutkinnan kannalta merkityksellisen asiakirjan tai muun todistusaineiston, jos se voitaisiin pakkokeinoin luvun 1 §:n mukaan takavarikoida eikä takavarikoimiselle ole mainitun luvun 3 §:ssä säädettyä estettä.

Todistajaan, joka on epäiltyyn oikeudenkäymiskaaren 17 luvun 17 §:n 1 momentissa tarkoitettussa suhteessa, ei sovelleta, mitä tämän pykälän 2 ja 3 momentissa säädetään.

Tietoyhteiskuntakaari (917/2014)

1 § Lain tavoitteet

Lain tavoitteena on edistää sähköisen viestinnän palvelujen tarjontaa ja käyttöä sekä varmistaa, että viestintäverkkoja ja viestintäpalveluja on kohtuullisin ehdoin jokaisen saatavilla koko maassa. Lain tavoitteena on lisäksi turvata radiotaajuuksien tehokas ja häiriötön käyttö sekä edistää kilpailua ja varmistaa, että viestintäverkot ja -palvelut ovat teknisesti kehittyneitä, laadultaan hyviä, toimintavarmoja ja turvallisia sekä hinnaltaan edullisia. Lain tavoitteena on myös turvata sähköisen viestinnän luottamuksellisuuden ja yksityisyyden

(3) the offence under investigation is one in which, in accordance with Chapter 17, section 9(3), the witness does not have the right or obligation to refuse to testify in court, and the witness is not a person referred to in section 20(1) of said Chapter.

(3) A witness is also required to produce a document or other evidence in his or her possession that is of significance for the criminal investigation, if it could be confiscated in accordance with Chapter 7, section 1 of the Coercive Measures Act and there are no bars to confiscation as provided in section 3 of said Chapter.

(2) What is provided in subsections 2 and 3 of this section do not apply to a witness who is related to the suspect in the manner referred to in Chapter 17, section 17(1) of the Code of Judicial Procedure.

Information Society Code (917/2014)

Section 1 Objectives of the Act

The objective of the Act is to foster the supply and use of electronic communications services and to ensure that everyone across Finland has access to communications networks and services at reasonable conditions. A further objective of the Act is to secure the efficient and interference-free use of radio frequencies, to foster competition, and to ensure that communications networks and services are technologically advanced, of high quality, reliable, safe, and inexpensive. This Act also aims to ensure the confidentiality of electronic communication and the protection of privacy.

suojan toteutuminen.

(All original texts and translations are retrieved from www.finlex.fi)

ELSA GEORGIA

Contributors

National Coordinator

Tamta Megrelishvili

National Academic Coordinator

Tinatin Ramishvili

National Researchers

Nana Edisherashvili

Darejan Ozmanovi

Ketevan Mchedlishvili

Ana Ghambashidze

Ani Mikiashvili

Nino Vashakmadze

Sophiko Chikhladze

Shorena Kokorashvili

Tamar Kapanadze

Mari Molashvili

Natia Mindadze

Mariam Tsereteli

National Linguistic Editors

Irakli Gobadze

Mariam Khundadze

Inga Beridze

Tea Iremadze

National Academic Supervisor

Ketevan Buadze

Introduction

The Georgian government signed international agreements and entered national legislation into force, which means that the government is strong enough to govern the “new nation”. However, some progress was made during 2011 in media regulation and ownership transparency, but the state’s influence over the broadcast media remains a concern.

Georgia became the member of the European Convention of Human Rights in 1989, which means that the government is responsible to protect not only rights written in national legislation but the ones, protected by the convention as–well. Case–law of the European Court of Human Rights is to assist judges, prosecutors and lawyers to take account of the requirements of the convention when interpreting Codes and or related legislation.

At an individual level, freedom of expression is key to the development, dignity and fulfillment of every person. At a national level, freedom of expression is necessary for good governing system and therefore for economic and social progress. For all these reasons, the Georgian community has recognised the freedom of expression and the freedom of information as some of the most important human rights.

In the following document, we—as national researchers are going to provide you with the information about how Georgian society meets international standards and protects the freedom of expression on the national level.

1. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information? What type of legislation provides this protection? How exactly is this protection construed in national law?

The Constitution of Georgia

On the 24th of August, 1995, the Georgian government entered the Georgian constitution into force. This was the very first step from which the country recognised the general principles of international law including the freedom of speech and the values most of the countries with a democratic social order, economic freedom, a rule of law based social states share.

Only the individual who is fully aware of the rights she/he can be considered as an active member of the society. Each of us has the right to receive and impart the information and the right mentioned above cannot be limited because of the content of spreading information.

The legal definition of the freedom of expression can be found in Article 24 as well as in Article 19 of the constitution that reads as follows – “everyone has the right to freedom of speech, thought, conscience, religion and belief. The persecution of a person on the account of her/his speech, thought, religion or belief as well as the compulsion to express her/his opinion about them shall be impermissible.”

By taking into consideration the fact that article 24 is more general and expresses the idea of receiving and spreading the information, on the other hand, article 19 concretely defines the kind of information and beliefs that can be imparted or received.

The second paragraph of article 24 focuses on the protection of mass media, specifically: “mass media shall be free. The censorship shall be impermissible.” Mass media companies cannot be the victim of subjective discrimination, meaning and only one company cannot be allowed to spread specific information.

It is clear that the violation of rights because of the content of spreading information would be considered as discrimination. It is logical that when the right to impart the information is limited because of the contest that may negatively effect on society’s attitude towards government is a direct discrimination, because making detraction against thing, based on category which thing is perceived to belong rather than on individual merit is the clear example of direct discrimination. As law defines–“mentioned constitutional laws are thought to be the negative kind of human rights that protect her /his right not to express and spread information, thoughts, even facts according to a literature. So journalistic right to keep silence and not to divulge professional secret, even a source of information as the source of information is also protected under the law. He/she can use any means of dissemination of information.”

Constitutional law is the highest ranking legal instrument which provides a general regulation of the freedom of expression that are specified by the law of Georgia on the freedom of expression. The law gives a legal definition of “media” meaning “a print or electronic means of mass communication, including Internet.”

Law of Georgia on Mass Communication

One of the most important legal act concerning the topic is the Law of Georgia on mass communication. The law aims to prevent society from receiving incorrect information and journalists while spreading news.

Article 21 states: “a journalist is the person, who collects, creates, edits and prepares materials to publish it in any means of mass communication. Therefore, he/she has some conformable persuasion or represents journalists’ registered membership.”

According to the second paragraph of the article– regulating rules must follow the principles determined by the international federation of journalists:

1. To search, receive and impart information.
2. To enter in any establishment to accomplish her/his professional duty.
3. To record and write information by any means.
4. To attend and actively broadcast mass events, etc.

The aforementioned definition is considered to be less complete. The vast majority of lawyers talks about the importance of concretizing and specifying it. It is worth mentioning that the law doesn't consist enough regulations for the police to and other enforcement officials to identify a journalist.

Code of Conduct for Public Broadcasting

Georgian public broadcaster established conduct standards in the Code of Conduct for Public Broadcasting According to the regulations, a journalist should be restrained and well-informed, his/her imparted information must be exhaustive and informational, facts and thoughts must be balanced, every thought and speech of any human must be broadcasted impartially.

A source is the most important point of a journalistic activity so it follows that protecting its confidentiality is in the spotlight. A journalist has the right not to disclose the source of information. According to observed media standards, a journalist is obliged to preserve the information about information's personality in case the source would deliver the information provided that his/her personality would be secreted. For his/her part, the journalist is obliged to keep "the promise" even if it is problematic for him/her. The source of the professional

Information is protected by the absolute privilege and no one has the power to demand to disclose it. During the litigation about the restriction on freedom of speech and expression, a defendant should not be obliged to betray the source of the confidential information. Even disclosure of confidential information is impermissible without the owner's consent or the court decision. The court only can demand to disclose the part of confidential information under its reasonable decision if the necessity of disclosure and it is proved with evidence. The disclosed information should be used only for the determined purpose.

Georgian Charter of Journalistic Ethics

Next to the above-mentioned legislation of Georgian, the Georgian charter of journalistic ethics, as the agreement between the journalists, is another instrument for protecting journalistic rights. Article 6 defines: "journalists have a moral responsibility not to disclose confidential sources." This principle is the right and the obligation for journalist to keep and protect confidential information and its source at the same time.

2. Is there, in domestic law, a provision that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his/her sources? How exactly is this prohibition construed in national law? What is the sanction?

Civil Code

The Civil Code of 1997 is one of the main achievements of the Country. This Act provides for civil liability forms of information, which is not true, violates the honor and dignity. The Code also provides for the dissemination of information obtained as a result of property or non-property damage compensation rules.

Civil Code, Article 18, paragraph 2 of this norm is thought incomplete disclosure of information about a person in such a way that the public the wrong impression according to research or fact, but this fact is not sufficient to establish liability, as it is necessary, in the form of publication of the information is incomplete contribute to a person's honor, dignity or business reputation. So, if you look at the harm, you will not be the person who cannot be held responsible for driving the information. Honour, dignity, business reputation of a person on the dissemination, containing an allegation of infringement of them by law or morality, wicked actions committed. There are some cases when incorrect information can result in a person's honour and dignity, the fact that the information may be already known to the public and therefore it is impossible to do any additional damage.

Civil Code, Article 18, paragraph 3 of this Article shall provide the list with the question arises whether the journalist responsible for accuracy when it essentially a public interest in connection with the public or the person has been released the information. The Supreme Court's Civil Chamber made an important explanation of speech and expression, as well as freedom of the press. The Supreme Court decision explains the expression of a democratic society and one of the fundamental basis for the development and self-fulfillment of the conditions for personal, so democracy society of freedom of expression can be restricted only rarely may prove to be necessary. The scope of such necessity is even more reduced when it comes to freedom of the press, freedom of the press as the very high cost of a democratic society and its limitations important explanations. There is the Strasbourg court's important explanation about human rights and fundamental freedoms. This practice is consistent with the standards established by the Ministry of Law, speech and freedom of expression.”

The Criminal Code: Article 154 of the journalist's professional activities hindering¹ and Criminal procedure code

According to the Criminal Procedure Code, the Criminal Procedure Code only partially recognizes the principle of confidentiality of sources. Article. 95 paragraph 2, “the court has the right to witness the obligation to release the journalists, if they have undertaken not to disclose the name of the author or the source of information and publication of content.” It turns out that the source of this information, the court grants a journalist. In fact, for this right, the journalist filed a motion to appeal to the court; otherwise he would be obliged to give evidence in the body. The law does not specify what criteria should be granted or not granted the privilege of confidentiality of journalists' sources. This means that in this case the Court's very wide discretionary powers are granted. It is also quite clear how to prove the journalist, whether it has to fulfill its obligation to keep confidential information from the source. Since the Code of Criminal Procedure, “the press and other mass media about” the law is taken much later, during the conflict of laws, it is given precedence over a. unfortunately, this important problem posed to “press and other media about the” law of the right to privacy enshrined in the full source-to-use.² The Criminal Code provides punishment for disclosure of secret information by a person who was responsible for this situation, or that the information is, in this situation, he won.... This article does not specify the disclosure of a journalist's exclusion, but it is clear the intention of the legislator with the flexibility, in order not to become necessary to list all the professions.

Article 157. Personal or family secrets, personal information or personal data in violation of life

In this article, the first, 2nd or 3rd part of the action Committed by a person, by position, professional activity or other circumstances, who has the duty to protect this secret or committing such action under use – of the act committed by a person, by position, professional activity or other circumstances, has the duty to protect this secret or committing such action under use – Punishable by imprisonment for a term of four to seven years, position or the right to operate from up to three years or without it.

The Criminal Code provides punishment for disclosure of secret information by a person who was responsible for this situation, or that the information is, in this situation, he won.... This article does not specify the disclosure of a journalist's exclusion, but it is clear the intention of the legislator with the flexibility, in order not to become necessary to list all the professions.

¹ Criminal Code of Georgia, the Parliament of Georgia, document number 2287, 22/07/1999, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/16426>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

² The Georgian Criminal Procedure Code, the Parliament of Georgia, document number 1772 09/10/2009, Georgia, <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/90034>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

Article 157. Personal or family secrets, personal information or personal data in violation of life

4. In this article, the first, second or third part of the action Committed by a person, by position, professional activity or other circumstances, who has the duty to protect this secret or committing such action under use - of the act committed by a person, by position, professional activity or other circumstances, has the duty to protect this secret or committing such action under use is punishable by imprisonment for a term of four to seven years, position or the right to operate from up to three years or without it.

Charter of speech and freedom of expression

Any professional journalist's rights and obligations arising from the right of the public to be informed about events and opinions. The Charter is based on the Council of Europe's "European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms" Article 10 of the Convention and the "International Federation of Journalists" by the "declaration of principles of conduct of Journalists." These principles of the code of conduct for journalists, who, transmit and disseminate information and comments on current events. Of the media to recognise and acknowledge the following principles of responsibility and commitment to this responsibility. Of legislation, the professional competence of their colleagues and discuss the possibility of the government or other force of any form of interference in the exercise of powers. Article 6 of the Charter, according to the journalist's moral obligation not to disclose information obtained in confidential source.

The topic involves sites of high public interest, but the fact that vast majority of society is interested, trust or distrust does not change the content of this article.

In confidence obtained reveal the source of information is unacceptable. Journalism Ethics also calls upon the media, special caution illegally obtained secret information on the video, even if the state authorities take over legacy and protect it depicted people, both as victims and perpetrators anonymity.

The Charter was created to ensure that the work of journalists have been regulated in accordance with the law. The Charter is self-regulating, it is not included in any kind of punitive measure, since it is contrary to the principle of self-regulation. In the case of a journalist violates the Charter of any principle, the Ethics Council shall meet and review all cases, hear the applicant and the defendant's position, and then decides whether the journalist had violated the Charter of the norm:

Article 8 of the Charter according to Subparagraph the Board of Ethics: "P" review proceedings in accordance with the Charter of ethical violations related statements;

Human Rights and the Fundamental Freedoms Convention

This regulation, Human Rights and the Fundamental Freedoms Convention, aims to defend human rights was signed in Rome in 1950.

Article 10³ regulates the freedom of expression: Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This article includes freedom to have opinions and to receive and spread information and ideas without the interference of authority and regardless of the state's borders. International transparency according to Georgia's published data: in the last year and a half in terms of media pluralism in Georgia has significantly improved and there are no cases of pressure and violence. But still, before the 2012 parliamentary elections was a case of Violence, abuse, pressure against journalists that has remained uninvestigated. Violation of journalist's rights and the lack of qualifications is a major problem when evaluating the state of the media named in the Ombudsman's annual reports. In 2013, the Public Defender's Office that studied cases, showed the results that the performance of illegal acts, including 2012 cases (pre-election period) by law enforcement agencies, had the right qualifications of the cases. However, as the report says, observance of the cases of violent activities, show that the investigative authorities are reluctant to act under Article 154 of the Criminal Code, regarding to evaluate actions such as the injury intentionally caused to health, beating or hooliganism.

The recommendation of the minister committee of European Union includes the right of the member states' journalist's not to disclose their sources of information. (Adopted by the European Committee on 8 March 2000 by the Ministers' Deputies) created for common purpose, for the unity of the member state's goals, common interests and ideals. This recommendation takes account of the obligations. Member states have the obligation to protect journalists' right of expression, which is guaranteed by Article 10. Recommendation highlights the fact that freedom of expression is the foundation of a democratic society and its progress, as well as each individual's development (freedom of expression Declaration of 1982) Recommendation recognises the necessity of the journalist's freedom and the protection of their sources for the development of the society. Aforementioned document protects not only journalists' right to transmit information but public's right to receive information— as well .journalists' sources and this is the main expression of their Recommendation defines the terms: “Journalist”, “information”, “source”. “Journalist” is a natural or legal person who is regularly or professionally spreading the information for the public. “Information” is any fact which is reflected in written, audio or imaging means. “Source” is the person who gives the information to the journalist.

Media freedom, professionalism and pluralism to raise the European Union and the Council of Europe project “Media freedom, professionalism and pluralism improvement” aims to increase the professionalism and responsibility of the media, regulators and the public broadcaster's independence broadcaster strengthening.⁴

³Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Council of Europe, 4 November 1950, Rome, <http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Convention_ENG.pdf> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

- Professionalism among journalists, responsibility and ethics towards the strengthening of respect for journalists' rights and professional codes of ethics and continuing to raise awareness;
- The education and training to improve the quality of individual rights and duties of journalists;
- Media coverage of minority groups and professional activities related to the strengthening of intolerance and hate speech;
- Broadcast regulators and the public broadcaster's independence continued support; media reports and other means in accordance with Article 24 of the Law, a journalist is obliged to protect the privacy of the persons providing the information. If the source is anonymous journalist's responsibility, then, of course, no one can oblige him to disclose this information.

Since the Code of Criminal Procedure, “the press and other mass media about” the law is taken much later, during the conflict of laws, it is given precedence over a. unfortunately, this important problem posed to “press and other mass media about the” law of the right to privacy enshrined in the full source—to-use.⁵

Media Development Fund—date: 23 Dec 2015

The courts should take into account the public interest in the case of journalists.

On December 22, the OSCE Representative on Freedom of the Mijatovic Austrian court's decision, under which the owner of the online information portal to 2 000 euros to pay for shelter in the center of unauthorized entry. Mijatovic's view, this decision may influence the media's ability to effectively take up the high public interest in the events.

“Journalists must be able to cover the high public interest in the issues of undue restriction or without fear of punishment. The use of private property rights to punish the journalists who are covering the topics of discussion of high public interest, not justified” – said Mijatovic.

⁴ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7, Committee of Ministers, 8 March 2000, <<https://wed.coe.int/ViewDoc.jsp?Ref=Rec%282000%297&Language=lanEnglish&Site=COE&BackColorInternet=DBDCF2&BackColorIntranet=FDC864&BackColorLogged=FDC864>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

⁵ Law of Georgia about Press and other mass media, The Supreme Council of the Republic of Georgia, 10/08/1991, Georgia, (Dead Law), <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/32548>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

In October 2014, the news portal online Dossier—'s journalists tried to visit refugees in asylum centers, including the preparation of the material living conditions. Once the owner has the right to enter the territory of the journalists refused, they were invited to the asylum seekers.

December decision of the Regional Court, said that journalists entering the building neither the owner, nor the refugee agency had no permission, thus violating their right to ownership.⁶

In the past two years, central and local government representatives to the regional media to put pressure on more than 15 cases were reported. "Transparency International – Georgia" continues to express the position of the cases on which it was possible to verify the information.

We believe that the tendency of harassment of journalists in the past year. If trends continue, the regional media significantly obstructed in the upcoming parliamentary elections in the proper coverage.

Regional media and journalists working in the regions of the facts of pressure on "Transparency International – Georgia" information in the media on the basis of the information collected. Employees also interviewed several representatives of the regional media. Naturally, this does not allow us to express the scale of the investigation or pressure on journalists for them to interfere in the activities of all facts. However, the following cases show that some of public figures do not specify the role of independent media.

Adjara: "Transparency International – Georgia" in several cases of interference in journalistic activities.

On September 1, 2015, visited the winery in the Public Broadcast of the Ministry of Agriculture officers verbally and physically abused.

Broadcaster, journalist during an interview with a representative of the Ministry of agreeing. Suknishvili Mirza explained that the journalist was drunk. Information about the fact that the journalist was drunk rejected the broadcaster's news department, Shorena Glonti. According to him, journalists, cameramen and reporters Samkharauli Bureau conducted an examination on the same day on alcohol, according to which none of them were under the influence of alcohol. The television at the request of the Prosecutor's Office to investigate the incident. Order of the Chairman of the Government, the disciplinary commission of inquiry before the end of Agriculture Deputy Minister Avtandil Meskhidze suspended.

⁶ The Media Development Foundation (MDF), Post in 23 December 2015, Georgia, <http://www.mdfgeorgia.ge/geo/view_news/419> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

On September 30, the public broadcaster was carried away in the car of a stranger. Nino Commerce informed the relevant authorities about the kidnapping of a television. After several hours of questioning in Kobuleti police, journalist was demanded to change his testimony. On August 25, 2015, members of the Town Council of Kobuleti Iveri Gugunava newspaper “newspaper” “Free Democrats’ supported for the accused. Council members cited “the newspaper” by commercial orders within the “Free Democrats” party newspaper spread named.

In 2014, a journalist of the region to put pressure on the most prominent cases of the Supreme Council Medea Vasadze connected. “TV-25” Jaba Ananidze Medea Vasadze threatened him with the outcome, which is June 8, Ananidze copyright film “Top Comfort” aired. The film was about the costs incurred by the deputies of the Supreme Council.

Broadcast material later, the MP called the journalist and threatened. “TV-25” where the audio recording of the MP, media Vasadzis threats clearly heard their Web site disclosed.

Shortly after the Facebook page was created with the journalist Jaba Ananidze private life and dignity of photo and video material from being uploaded. “TV-25”, Director General of the Surnamidze demanding an investigation, the police on June 12 and addressed to the social network created to identify the authors of the page. Journalist pressure further, Medea Vasadze from the position of non-governmental organizations and journalists demanded.⁷

3. Who is a “journalist” according to the national legislation? Is it in your view a restricted definition for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources? What is the scope of protection of other media actors? Is the protection of journalists’ sources extended to anyone else?

There is not a strict definition of a Journalist in the national legislation. Journalist does not differ from the other citizen, who can get any desired information. The profession of journalist should be differed from the other person by the law. Despite, the first article of law of Georgia on Freedom of speech and Expression says that, “professional secret – the secret of confession, information disclosed to a member of Parliament, a member of the High Council of an Autonomous Republic, a doctor, journalist, human rights defender, or advocate with regard to their professional activity, as well as information of professional value, which became known to a person under the condition of privacy protection in relation to carrying out his/her professional duties and the disclosure of which may damage the person’s professional reputation; information, which does not contain any personal data, a state or trade secret, as well as information on an administrative body shall not be a professional secret”⁸, but there is not mentioned who is a journalist and what is the difference between him/her and the other citizen who can get confidential, public or professional information, without any “knowledge of journalism” and spread it through the media. Under the Journalism ethic code, which contains duties of the Journalist and is based on the article 10 of the convention of human rights and the declaration of principles on the conduct of journalists. All the duties, which journalists have to fulfill, are mentioned in this code, but, there is no definition who is a journalist. By law, it is a person, which works in Media, get and spread information, and makes comments about the current issues⁹. In spite of the fact, that there is no strict definition of a Journalist under the Georgian legislation, there is a statement in the law of Georgia On Assemblies and Demonstrations, that during Assembly and Demonstration, there must be a safe area for journalist, in order, for him/her to make his/her job in a proper way, but at that time journalist have to have some sign for the identification. It is another statement, what they mean in this sign.

⁷*Transparency International – Georgia*, Post in 13 October 2015, Georgia. <<http://www.transparency.ge/node/5580>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

There is mentioned, that the legislation of Georgia shall determine the responsibility for unlawfully obstructing journalists in their professional activities¹⁰. There is not strict definition, what is the sign for identification, or permission, by which he/she could implement its work.

Getting and spreading information by a journalist is linked to a duty freedom of speech and expression of a person.

By the decision of a supreme court, freedom of speech is a fundamental right in a democratic society, it is essential or development and realisation of yourself, and it is the reason why there is only a few examples of necessity of the restriction of the right of expression. Such necessity is reduced, when it relates to the freedom of press. The practice of the European court of human ⁸Article 1(n), Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

⁹Preamble, Code of Ethic, The SPJ Code of Ethics is voluntarily embraced by thousands of journalists, regardless of place or platform, and is widely used in newsrooms and classrooms as a guide for ethical behavior. The code is intended not as a set of “rules” but as a resource for ethical decision-making. It is not — nor can it be under the First Amendment — legally enforceable. The present version of the code was adopted by the 1996 SPJ National Convention, <<https://www.spj.org/pdf/ethicscode.pdf>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

¹⁰Article 2(4), Law of Georgia, On Assemblies and Demonstration, The Parliament of Georgia, 12/06/1997, Georgia, <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/31678?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

rights says that, the freedom of press has a high value for democratic society and restriction needs especial justification.¹¹

The journalists protect this value during their work. Firstly, they have to protect honor and dignity. It is under a question there should be a strict definition of a journalist and what connection is to the sources, which journalists use during the freedom of expression. A journalist has a right to protect the source of the information and not mention the person, by whom he/she got the confidential information. The confidentiality of the source is the main guarantee of the journalist's activity. Sometimes it is possible to be different motives for making information confidential, or maybe an applicant by his/her profession or the position in government does not want exposing himself/herself.

4. What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources? How are the laws implemented? How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?

A journalist has a right not to disclose sources. Which means that legislation doesn't contain any article about ability to request to disclose, which means that if a journalist doesn't want to name the source none of governmental body or authority has the right to request disclosure.

Only self-regulatory mechanism that exists in Georgia is the Charter of journalistic ethics. More specifically this is a non-governmental organisation founded by journalists and the one, which wrote the charter, but it does not say anything about the source of information, request to disclose. To sum everything up concerning the issue, law does not regulate the topic, which is because of the fact that there is no necessity of limiting the right not to disclose.

In the dictionary, journalist is explained as a literate, and not as selfless person who is constantly under threat. Therefore, this fact signifies the importance of the protection provided by government, respective authorities and legal norms based on self-regulating mechanisms.

On the 17th of January 2009, the European Court of Human Rights took into the consideration the case: *Ramishvili and Kokhreidze V. Georgia*¹². The circumstances of the case were represented in the following way: Shalva Ramishvili and Davit Kokhreidze were the founders of the independent media group "MEDIA KOMPANIA" that included channel "TV-202". The abovementioned channel was supposed to air a programme with political elements. Based on the circumstances of the case, after contacting Mr. Ramishvili, one of the parliamentarians asked him to block the transmission of the firm. In return, Mr. Ramishvili requested payment of 10 000 USD (American dollars). Shalva Ramishvili and Davit Kokhreidze were arrested at the arranged meeting place for alleged use of bribery. Ministry brought criminal proceedings against the applicant on suspicion of extortion. Other ambivalent circumstances of the case are connected to the detention and conditions they were kept in. However, already existing facts makes it unambiguous that we face direct interference into political transmissions as well as an investigative journalism.

¹¹ Decision #56-1278-1298-2011, Georgian supreme court, 20/02/2012, Georgia, <<http://www.supremecourt.ge/files/upload-file/pdf/1278-1298-2011.pdf>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

¹² Press Country Profile, Georgia, European Court of Human Rights, Kast Updated July 2016. <http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/CP_Georgia_ENG.pdf> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

One of the main principles of democracy is positive and negative duties that governmental bodies have, meaning that governmental authorities is obliged to provide protection of journalist, without violating one's rights (Positive). Moreover, they should not contravene rights of journalists themselves (Negative). Then it is vague and arguable where the line between prescribed governmental norms and infringement of these norms is. What are the legal tools that protect journalistic sources if government openly violates the law?

According to the Criminal Procedure Code of Georgia,¹³ journalist is not obliged to be a witness in a case, if it has connection to his professional activity.¹⁴

Simultaneously, we have to admit the fact, that journalist is not obliged to indicate a source of information, while giving testimony at the specific case¹⁵. Criminal Procedure Code also indicates that testimony is considered inadmissible, when there is no sign of source of information. Although, this case is connected to one's professional activity, in the case of journalist; testimony can be used as indirect evidence. Despite the importance of the evidence, inexistence of indications about source of information creates the barrier in solving this case.

Information gathered during journalistic activity can be considered as a professional secret. There is a separate chapter concerning the protection of commercial or professional secret. Moreover, Article 11 of the code states that disclosure of information without acceptance of the source, gives the opportunity to request and claim any kind of compensation.

Beside respective legal norms, journalists are constantly trying to use, so called, self-regulating mechanisms in order to protect their own rights. Charter of Journalistic Ethics is one of the ¹³ Article 50(1), The Georgian Criminal Procedure Code, the Parliament of Georgia, document number 1772 09/10/2009, Georgia, <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/90034>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

¹⁴ Commentary on the Criminal Procedure Code of Georgia, Article 50, Tumanishvili G., Tbilisi, 2015.

¹⁵ Article 143(7d), The Georgian Criminal Procedure Code, the Parliament of Georgia, document number 1772 09/10/2009, Georgia, <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/90034>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

most effective mechanisms, which is based on European Convention of Human Rights, Article 10.¹⁶

It consist of preamble, main part and transitional provisions. In the preamble,¹⁷ it is stated that, journalists recognise and protect universally recognized human rights and supreme human values, which means that they are responsible for the protecting them while reporting. According to the act, journalist takes responsibility to spread information, even if the source of information is not mentioned. At the same time, information has to be truthful. In the case of spreading inaccurate information, one should correct it in a trustworthy manner.

5. In the respective national legislation are the limits of non–disclosure of the information in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7? What are the procedures applied? Is the disclosure limited to exceptional circumstances, taking into consideration vital public or individual interests at stake? Do the authorities first search for and apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the right of journalists not to disclose information?

According to the Constitution of Georgia, there are no restrictions on freedom of speech and expression if it does not violate the rights of others. Under the Constitution, the restriction can be realised to protect national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of crime, protection of the rights and dignity of others, for preventing disclosure of the information, which is received as confidential or for ensuring the independence and impartiality of the judiciary.¹⁸

¹⁶1.” Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises. 2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary”

¹⁷*Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms*, Council of Europe, 4 November 1950, Rome, <http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Convention_ENG.pdf> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

¹⁸ Article 24, Constitution of Georgia, the Parliament of Georgian Republic, 28/08/1995, Georgia, <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/30346?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

Besides the Constitution, in our country the freedom of expression and the rights of others private space is protected by the Civil Code,¹⁹ the law on “Freedom of Speech and Expression”²⁰ and even The Criminal Code.²¹

According to the Article 3(2(d)) of the law on “Freedom of Speech and Expression,” freedom of expression includes the right of journalists to protect the source of information.²² By Article 11(1) of the same law, a secret source is protected by absolute privilege and no one has the right to demand disclosure of the source.²³ According to Article 12(3) of the same law, inviolability of private life and the protection of personal information may not be restricted freedom of expression, when there is importance of knowing some kind of information, which is necessary in democratic country for fulfilling public self-governance.²⁴

Obliging the journalist to reveal the source of information, is the violation of its freedom of expression. Interfering the freedom of expression illegally, performs an offense under Article 153 of the Georgian Criminal Code. Likewise, illegally hindering professional activities of journalists violates Article 154 of the Criminal Code. Consequently, if someone forces a journalist to spread the above information, it is possible for such action includes the signs of crime.²⁵ According to Article 158 of the Criminal Code, it is prohibited the use or distribution of illegal recordings of private communication. It is clear from the text, that the private communication records to use or dissemination is prohibited not in any case, but only when it illegally.²⁶ In order to define the legal spread of the issue, must look through the Broadcasting Code of Conduct for each

¹⁹ Civil Code of Georgia, the Parliament of Georgia, 26/06/1997, Georgia, <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/31702?impose=original>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

²⁰ Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

²¹ Criminal Code of Georgia, the Parliament of Georgia, 22/07/1999, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/16426>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

²² Article 3(2(d)), Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

²³ Article 11(1), Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

²⁴ Article 12(3), Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

²⁵ Article 153, Article 154, Criminal Code of Georgia, the Parliament of Georgia, document number 2287, 22/07/1999, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/16426>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

²⁶ Article 158, Criminal Code of Georgia, the Parliament of Georgia, document number 2287, 22/07/1999, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/16426>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

television and radio stations, which is adopted on the basis of the Article 2(h13) of the Broadcasting Law.²⁷

According to Article 18(2) of the Georgian Civil Code, A person has the right to demand through the court the retraction of information that defames its honour, dignity, privacy, personal inviolability or business reputation, if this information distributor does not prove that they are true.²⁸ The same rule applies to the incomplete publication, if it violates a person's honour, dignity or business reputation.²⁹ Thus, liability of the journalists should be brought in two cases:

- 1) If diffused information is incorrect – If it is determined that the information is correct, no responsibility will be raised.
- 2) If diffused information is incomplete – It is necessary, that incomplete information abases the person's honor, dignity or business reputation cause.³⁰

It should be noted, that if there will be no caused harm, needless speaking about the liability of spreading information.³¹

Consequently, it can be said, that our national legislation is in line with the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 while discussing this question.

6. According to the “Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms,” Each Human rights are reserved which has been reflected in many countries legislation among them is Georgia.

The law on “Freedom of Speech and Expression” stipulates, that the source of professional secrecy is protected by an absolute privilege³² and no one has the right to request to disclose such information.³³

²⁷ Article 2(b13), Broadcasting Law, the Parliament of Georgia, 23/12/2004, Georgia, <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/32866?impose=original>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

²⁸ Article 18(2), Civil Code of Georgia, the Parliament of Georgia, 26/06/1997, Georgia, <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/31702?impose=original>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

²⁹Ibid.

³⁰Ibid.

³¹Ibid.

³²*Article 3(2(a)), Article 4(1)*, Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

According to the Georgian Criminal Procedure Code, the journalist is not obliged to be a witness in connection with the information, which is received during professional activities.³⁴

The journalist is not authorised to reveal the source of information neither the police, nor the prosecutor's office nor the security service request. An exception is the case when there is adequate demand by the court. According to the Article 11(2) of the law on “Freedom of Speech and Expression”, it is impermissible to disclosure secret information even the permission of its owner without reasoned decision of the court.³⁵

Article 12 of the law on “Freedom of Speech and Expression” specifies a responsibility for the disclosure of a secret. According to this Article, “person shall be responsible only for the disclosure of a secret, protecting the confidentiality of which is either his/her official duty or the result of a civil agreement, and whose disclosure creates obvious, direct and essential danger for benefits protected by law.”³⁶ Also, Article 12 of the law on “Freedom of Speech and Expression” stipulates that “A person shall be released from responsibility if a secret has been disclosed for the purpose of protecting the legitimate interests of society, and if the benefits protected exceed the damage caused.”³⁷ Article 12(3) of the law on “Freedom of Speech and Expression” states that the freedom of expression, in relation to events, the knowledge of which is necessary for a person in order to execute public self-government in a democratic state may not be restricted for the purpose of personal life immunity and personal data protection.³⁸ Article 12 of the law on “Freedom of Speech and Expression” allows individuals to demand reimbursement for property and non-property (moral) damages caused by the violation of rights protected under this article.³⁹

³³Article 11(1), Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

³⁴Article 50(1(t)), The Georgian Criminal Procedure Code, the Parliament of Georgia, document number 1772 09/10/2009, Georgia, <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/90034>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

³⁵Article 11(2), Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

³⁶Article 12(1), Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

³⁷Article 12(2), Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

³⁸Article 12(3), Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

³⁹Article 12(4), Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

In particular, Article 24 of the Constitution of Georgia⁴⁰ of the provisions on freedom of expression and Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights are similar with its content. Both these Articles are the main guarantors of freedom of speech, freedom of expression and free media in our country. However, Article 19 of the Constitution contain provision to protect the rights and values of the other people.

The international organisation “Article 19” estimates, that the law on “Freedom of Speech and Expression” is one of the most progressive step forward in Georgian legislation to protect freedom of expression in the country. According to their estimates, the law on “Freedom of Speech and Expression” establishes a high standard of freedom of expression, which is in line with the best international practices.⁴¹

Consequently, Georgian legislation meets the claims of the “Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms,” and the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 while reviewing freedom of speech and expression in our country.

7. In the light of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights how do national courts apply the respective laws with regard to the rights to protect sources? In particular, how do they balance the different interests at stake?

On the factsheet of the European court of human rights on Article 10⁴² of the European convention of Human Rights– Protection of journalistic sources. In the factsheet the court repeatedly emphasized the value of Article 10 of the convention and listed cases regarding this article.

“Protection of journalistic sources is one of the basic conditions for press freedom. ... Without such protection, sources may be deterred from assisting the press in informing the public on matters of public interest. As a result the vital public–watchdog role of the press may be undermined, and the ability of the press to provide accurate and reliable information be adversely affected.”⁴³

⁴⁰ Constitution of Georgia, the Parliament of Georgian Republic, 28/08/1995, Georgia, <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/30346?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

⁴¹ Guide to the Law of Georgia on Freedom of speech and expression, ARTICLE 19, April 2005, London, <<https://www.article19.org/data/files/pdfs/analysis/georgia-foe-guide-april-2005.pdf>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

⁴² Protection of journalistic sources, European Court of Human Rights, January 2016, <http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/FS_Journalistic_sources_ENG.pdf> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

Georgian legislative system does not consist enough cases related to the topic. One of the most important fact (was not sued in the court) for the practice was against Rustavi 2. The channel broadcasted covert recordings without permission and journalists did not name the journalistic source.

Most of the authorities declared that the channel did not have a permission of not telling the name of a person who sent those recordings to the channel.

Similar case was sued in the European court of human rights Goodwin v. the United Kingdom – This case concerned a disclosure order imposed on a journalist (working for The Engineer) requiring him to reveal the identity of his source of information on a company’s confidential corporate plan. The applicant, a trainee journalist with The Engineer magazine, received information regarding the financial status of a company. The information was given by telephone from a source who wished to remain anonymous and appeared to come from a confidential corporate plan, one copy of which had gone missing. The company obtained orders preventing the applicant from disclosing the confidential information and for delivery up and, under s 10 Contempt of Court Act 1981, an order compelling the applicant to divulge the identity of his source. The applicant appealed unsuccessfully to the Court of Appeal and House of Lords. He refused to disclose his source and was fined £5,000 for contempt. He complained of a violation of Article 10 of the Convention.⁴⁴

The only important decision related to the topic was made by the constitutional court of Georgia *Akaki Gogichaishvili V. The Parliament of Georgia*⁴⁵ subject of the case was constitutionality of the second paragraph of article 18 of the civil code of Georgia and paragraph 1 of article 20 of The Law of Georgia “On the other means of press and Mass Information” in terms of paragraph 2 of article 19 of the constitution of Georgia.

The applicant was requiring that journalist must have been obliged to assert the truth of even the belief or an opinion he was spreading through a television.

⁴³*Goodwin v. the United Kingdom*, § 39, European Court of Human Rights, (Application no. 17488/90), judgment of 27 March 1996, Strasbourg, <[http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i%3D001-57974#{"itemid":\["001-57974"\]}](http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i%3D001-57974#{)> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

⁴⁴*Goodwin v. the United Kingdom*, European Court of Human Rights, (Application no. 17488/90), judgment of 27 March 1996, Strasbourg, <[http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i%3D001-57974#{"itemid":\["001-57974"\]}](http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i%3D001-57974#{)> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

⁴⁵*Citizen Akaki Gogichaishvili V. the Parliament of Georgia*, Constitutional Court of Georgia, 11 March 2004, Case number N2/1/241, Georgia, <<http://www.constcourt.ge/en/legal-acts/judgments/citizen-akaki-gogichaishvili-v-the-parliament-of-georgia-234.page>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

As an expert of the case – Konstantine Korkelia defined journalist cannot be obliged to assert anything except information. Every person is free in having as well as expressing his/her own beliefs or opinion towards any case and it cannot be limited for the journalists.⁴⁶ Otherwise it would be an example of discrimination. It is worth mentioning that if a journalist had been obliged to declare that what he is saying—meaning the opinion is based on information he has, he would not have a right of disclosure of a source.

The resolute part of the judgment reads as follows: Articles 20 of the civil code as well as the Law of Georgia “On the other means of press and Mass Information” are not in the collision of paragraph 2 of article 19⁴⁷ of the constitution of Georgia.

8. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists’ sources of information? Are the national law provisions?

Georgian Legislation has two familiar ways in the field of secret investigative activities, in particular, telephone conservation surveillance/recording and interception of communication channels. The first one is provided in The Criminal Procedure Code of Georgia (Article XVI¹) and another one in the law of “Electronic Communications” (Article 83).

According to The Criminal Procedure Code of Georgia the following covert investigative actions are allowed (Article 143¹(1)):

The phone conservation eavesdropping and recording Interception and recording of the communication channels (communication facilities, computer networks, wired communications and with joining stations facilities) the computer system (directly or remotely) and for this purpose a computer system with an appropriate software to install;

Postal and telegraphic transfer (other than diplomatic) control; Hidden video and audio recording, cinema and photography; Electronic tracking with technical devices, which usage does not endanger human life, health and the environment. According to The Criminal Code of Georgia following investigative actions are allowed.

⁴⁶Ibid.

⁴⁷“No one shall have the right to enter a place of residence and other possessions against the will of possessors, nor conduct a search unless there is a court decision or urgent necessity provided for by law.”

When the case concerns investigating procedures according to Article 143²(Child trafficking) and Article 143³of (Using services of victims (person affected by) of human trafficking) Criminal Code of Georgia, If the action is necessary for a legitimate aim in a democratic society – the national security or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime was committed on order to avoid the country's economic well-being of the interests or the rights and freedoms of others.

There is a need for a democratic society, if it is carried out due to a pressing social need and is a suitable and proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim.

Hidden investigation can be carried out only when with other means of investigation substantial evidence is impossible to obtain or requires unreasonably great effort. Undercover investigation limits (intensity) must be proportionate to the legitimate aim. Toward clergyman, a lawyer, a doctor, a journalist and a person with immunity, covert investigative actions are permitted only in cases when gaining the secret information is not in accordance with their religious or professional activities. Toward state-political officials, judges and immune persons the hidden investigative actions can be carried out in the case of there is commitment by the Supreme Court, the Prosecutor General or his deputy motivated motion.

Since November, 2014, there has been added the Law on “Electronic Communications” to Article 83, which establishes the Criminal Code by adding a secret investigative cases.

According to Article 83:

The competent state bodies with special rights for the hidden investigative operations are allowed:

To have technical ability to gain information from communication within the physical lines and their connections from mail servers' bases, station from the equipment, communication networks and communication with other connections to the information in real time and the purpose of communication in the media, if necessary, being free of charge in order to deploy lawful overcome management system and other relevant equipment and software products. To obtain further information on real-time measures carried out directly by the competent authority, on the basis of a court ruling or a prosecutor;

To copy the dates from the communication channel of the identification data and a copy of their 2-year term only in this case, the information from the communication channels/computer system for removing and fixing further covert investigation carried out by the competent authority of the duplicate data from banks, on the basis of a court ruling or a prosecutor;

Technical aspects of real-time delivery of the information architecture and the interfaces are defined by the State Security Service on the basis of the appropriate act.

The specific definitions of the fight against terrorism law are provided as at Georgian Law of the fight against terrorism as well as the Criminal Code, which defines what is considered as an act of terrorism, terrorist activities and the basic principles in the fight against it:

Article 1

b) Terrorist Act- explosion, arson, use of a weapon or the actions that make up the human loss of life, significant property damage or other serious consequence, undermines public safety, significant political or economic interest, and is committed to intimidate the population or authority in order to influence;

According to the anti-terrorism law (Article 3)

The basic principles of the fight against terrorism in Georgia:

- a. Legality;
- b. Respect and protection of the rights and freedom of individuals and legal entities
- c. Combating terrorism the priority of human life and Health
- d. Preventive measures for the implementation of priority
- e. Legal, political, socio-economic, propaganda, information and other complex use
- f. To negotiate with terrorists in order to avoid expected results out of terroristic crimes
- g. United management of the participated forces in counterterrorist operations and recourses
- h. Divulgence impermissibility of counterterrorist operation tactics and technical means, as well as the operation of the membership of appearance;
- i. Inevitability of punishment for terrorist activity

According to the information mentioned above, criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws are accessible, precise, and foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions. As for further cases, there are particular Articles if they are in accordance with Constitution of Georgia and are being discussed in the Constitutional Court.

The norms mentioned above explains what the main aspects while discussing criteria in the field of electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism law are.

According to the office of the personal data protection inspector, in their annual 2015 report, they have clearly stated how data must be processed:

- . It must be fairly and lawfully, without prejudice to person's dignity
- . For specific, clearly defined purpose
- . Adequately and proportionately to the purpose of the processing
- . Data must be stored for definite term
- . Illegally collected data must be deleted or destroyed.

Although having such statements, mentioned above, the main problem still remains identification proper grounds and presenting legal arguments for owning the data or for otherwise utilization of such data. In addition to this, there are agencies in public sector, collecting personal dates with oral or written agreement between the organisation and the citizen, using the information collected from them, in a proper way and after concrete period of time are being destroyed.

What is more, accessibility to the collected information always varies depending on which sector a citizen tries to access. There is the case when a citizen applied to the Inspector and asked for response action; the citizen stated that one of the microfinance organisations checked his/her data in the database without his/her consent. During examination of the case it was established that the microfinance organization had citizen's consent on data processing on the basis of loan agreement, within the scope of loan relations. Though, upon expiry of debt relations the microfinance organisation once again checked the information about the person in the database without his/her consent, for the purpose of offering a new credit product. During examination of the complaint the Inspector identified that the microfinance organisation acted beyond the authorisation granted by the citizen and violated the law while checking individual's data, as the organization had no relevant grounds for data processing – namely, the consent. The law of Georgia on Personal Data Protection defines the consent of a data subject as “free consent of a data subject, after receiving relevant information, on his/her data processing for a specific purpose, expressed orally, through telecommunication or other relevant means, which can clearly indicate the will of a data subject”. In order for the data subject to be properly informed about the purpose of the consent on data processing and its out- Grounds and Principles of Data Processing 12 comes, it is important that he/she receives clear and specific information about the purpose of data processing before such data subject expresses his/her will. The will expressed upon receipt of such information can be used as the ground for data processing.

During examination of this case it was also identified that this organization made citizen's information readily accessible without any prior mechanism of checking legal grounds.

In addition, current legislation does not establish any specific regulations with financial institutions, including protection of customers' right.

9. Can journalists rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance?

Confidentiality of sources means the right of journalists not to name the person who provided the information to him/her. Confidentiality is an important guarantee of the journalist's activity. Gathering information about different spheres of public life, of course, a journalist based on various sources, some of which do not wish to disclose their identity. Sometimes it is important for the public to get information from them. There are cases when the source of information is the state of the body, or even a representative of the Institute, whose action – disclose any information you provide – has a variety of reasons.

To get information based on the Anonymous source is particularly effective journalistic investigation. This right is gaining an importance in our country, where in the circumstances of total violence of administrative bodies, without warranty of anonymity and privacy of information source they does not agree to provide information.⁴⁸

Journalists' unions all over the world recognize an exceptional remedy of the sources of information. Identical rules in force are in Georgia as well. For example, the Charter, Article 6, “the journalist's moral obligation not to disclose confidential source of information.”⁴⁹

The Charter explains that “In considering this article appeared, there are journalists who are constantly appealing to confidential sources, which is why they have low confidence. Confidential source must be connected to the high public interest in the information carrier. But the public's trust and distrust does not change the content of this article: It is not allowed to reveal the source of confidential information.”

The Charter is valid in Georgia since December 2009, in the same year was enacted another legal guarantee for protecting the information – “Code of Conduct.” According to this document “To ensure accuracy, the broadcaster must identify the source of information. Based on an ⁴⁸*Media and law*, Zurab Adeishvili, Year 2004, Tbilisi.

⁴⁹ Article 6, “Georgian Journalists Ethical Charter”, 25/02/2010, Georgia, <http://mediasabcho.blogspot.com/2010/02/blog-post_25.html> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

unnamed source of information covering the case, the broadcaster must clearly indicate that the source is anonymous.”⁵⁰

The “Code of Conduct for Public Broadcasting” is enacted since 2006 the 5th chapter of it dedicated to the protection standards of confidential information, extraction of them and represents further recommendations for the anonymous source of information about the importance and necessity of protection.

According to this document:

- Sources anonymity protection is one of the valuable elements of freedom of Information and the journalist's professional duty;
- Journalist, usually, do not use anonymous sources, if there is other opportunity to get the open information sources;
- The use of anonymous sources is only justified if the information is reliable and valuable and cannot be distributed in any other way;
- Privacy violation is allowed only in cases when it serves the legitimate interests of the public, for example, when the information relates to the preparation of the crime. In such cases, the journalist is obliged to inform the relevant authorities about the impending crime;
- The disclosure of the confidential source, also, is justified when the issue is the protection of state interests. The need can be established only when the country's constitutional order is in real danger;
- Source, which did not require anonymity, has to be nominated;
- Transfer of information provided by an anonymous source should be noted that the source is anonymous;

⁵⁰Article 14(2), “Broadcasters Code of Conduct”, Georgian National Communications Commission Resolution N2, 12/03/2009, Georgia, <http://www.gncc.ge/files/7060_7177_303673_Code%20of%20Conduct.pdf> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

- For journalists it is allowed only a confidential source of information, whom they trust to. However, despite the reliability of the source, it has to be verify the authenticity of the information;
- If the information provided by an anonymous source contains serious allegations , in this case, must be disclosed by an anonymous source, only the details, on which will be agree source itself;
- An anonymous respondent should be protected by all means. It has to be disguising his/her voice and image as well. It is prohibited to show details, such as, for example, the number of car, house and others.⁵¹

There are cases when the information is valuable and covered the respondent's use is justified, but journalists must take into account the fact that the source of such information could mislead the public because the aim of that kind of source always is not to tell objective truth.

From aforesaid its natural to think that information security safeguards are a tool in the realisation of freedom of expression, by Georgian law – freedom of expression means unacceptability of censorship, editorial independence and pluralism, the right of journalists to protect the source of information and make editorial decisions based on their own conscience.⁵²

As a rule such a large area for the source spreading is the Internet, these crimes are aware as “cybercrime” the key regulatory International document for the cyber crime issues is Council of Europe’s Convention on Cybercrime, 2001, which was ratified by Georgia in 2012. This document defines the unlawful acts committed in cyberspace, which is in charge of punishing the revelation of the Member States. In addition, the Convention obliges member states to set up national cybercrime and the specialized straggle units, which will also 24/7 international contact point authorities.

In Georgia, cybercrime punishment is regulated by the Criminal Code (CC) XXXV chapter, under which criminal responsibility in cyberspace committed the following acts: a computer system against unauthorized access (Section 284), computer data and / or computer system for illegal use of computer data and / or Computer system encroachment.⁵³

⁵¹Chapter 5, Article 14(2), “Broadcasters Code of Conduct”, Georgian National Communications Commission Resolution N2, 12/03/2009, Georgia, <http://www.gncc.ge/files/7060_7177_303673_Code%20of%20Conduct.pdf> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

⁵²Article 3(2(d)), Law of Georgia on Freedom of Speech and Expression, the Parliament of Georgia, 24/06/2004, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/33208?impose=translateEn>> accessed 25 July 2016 [English].

Article 284 – Unauthorised access to computer system

1. Unauthorised access to computer system, shall be punished by a fine or corrective labour for up to two years, or by imprisonment for the same term.
2. The same act:
 - a. Committed by a group with preliminary agreement;
 - b. committed using an official position;
 - c. committed repeatedly;
 - d. That has resulted in substantial damage, shall be punished by a fine or corrective labour for up to two years, or by imprisonment for a term of two to five years.

Note:

1. A computer system is any mechanism or a group of inter-connected mechanisms that automatically processes data (including personal computers, any equipment with a microprocessor, also a mobile phone) by means of software.
2. Computer data are any information displayed in any form that can be processed in the computer system, including software that ensures the operation of the computer system.
3. Unauthorised shall mean illegal, also those cases when the owner of the right has not, directly or indirectly, transferred the right to the person committing the act.
4. For the purposes of this chapter 'substantial' shall mean damage exceeding GEL 2 000.
5. For the act specified in this article, a legal person shall be punished by a fine, with deprivation of the right to carry out a particular activity or by liquidation and a fine.⁵⁴

Law of Georgia No 292 of 5 May 2000 – LHG I, No 18, 15.5.2000, Article 45

Law of Georgia No 458 of 30 June 2000 – LHG I, No 27, 17.7.2000, Article 83

Law of Georgia No 2937 of 28 April 2006 – LHG I, No 14, 15.5.2006, Article 90

⁵³ Legislation on Cybercrime and the General Policy, Ministry of Internal Affairs <<http://police.ge/ge/projects/kiberdanashauli/kanonmdebloba-kiber-danashaulze-da-zogadi-politika>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

⁵⁴ Article 284, Criminal Code of Georgia, the Parliament of Georgia, document number 2287, 22/07/1999, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/16426>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

Law of Georgia No 5940 of 19 March 2008 – LHG I, No 8, 28.3.2008, Article 47

Law of Georgia No 3619 of 24 September 2010 – LHG I, No 51, 29.9.2010, Article 332

Article 285 – Illegal use of computer data and/or computer system

1. Unauthorised making, storage, sale, dissemination of software and/or other equipment, also of a password, access code to the computer system or of other similar data or provision of access to the above in any other way for the purpose of committing the offence defined in this Chapter and by Articles 158 or 159 of this Code, – shall be punished by a fine or corrective labour for up to two years and/or by imprisonment for up to three years.
2. The act defined in paragraph 1 of this article:
 - a. committed by a group with preliminary agreement;
 - b. committed using an official position;
 - c. committed repeatedly;
 - d. that has resulted in substantial damage, – shall be punished by a fine or corrective labour for up to two years, and/or by imprisonment for a term of three to six years.

Note:

For the act specified in this article, a legal person shall be punished by a fine, with deprivation of the right to carry out a particular activity or by liquidation and a fine.

Law of Georgia No 458 of 30 June 2000 – LHG I, No 27, 17.7.2000, Article 83

Law of Georgia No 3619 of 24 September 2010 – LHG I, No 51, 29.9.2010, Article 332

Law of Georgia No 2378 of 2 May 2014 – web-site, 16.5.2014⁵⁵

Article 286 – Unauthorized handling of computer data and/or computer systems

⁵⁵Article 285, Criminal Code of Georgia, the Parliament of Georgia, document number 2287, 22/07/1999, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/16426>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

1. Unauthorised damage, deletion, replacement or concealment of computer data, – shall be punished by a fine, or corrective labour for up to two years and/or by imprisonment for the same term.
2. The act defined in paragraph 1 of this article, also unauthorized insertion or transfer of computer data that has resulted in considerable and intentional disruption of the operation of a computer system, – shall be punished by a fine or corrective labour for up to two years and/or by imprisonment for up to three years.
3. An act defined in paragraph 1 or 2 of this article:
 - a. committed by a group with preliminary agreement;
 - b. committed using an official position;
 - c. committed repeatedly;
 - d. that has resulted in substantial damage, – shall be punished by a fine or corrective labour for up to two years, or by imprisonment for a term of three to five years. Note: For committing an act specified in this article, a legal person shall be punished by a fine, with deprivation of the right to carry out a particular activity or by liquidation and a fine.

Law of Georgia No 458 of 30 June 2000 – LHG I, No 27, 17.7.2000, Article 83

Law of Georgia No 2937 of 28 April 2006 – LHG I, No 14, 15.5.2006, Article 90

Law of Georgia No 3619 of 24 September 2010 – LHG I, No 51, 29.9.2010, Article 332.⁵⁶

“In addition, in 2012 it was adopted a law on “Information Security”, which sets standards for information security in the general public and the private sector. (But it must be mentioned that in the third paragraph of the third article of the law, according to which “3. This law does not apply to media, publishing houses and editorial offices, scientific, educational, religious and social organizations and political parties, regardless of their importance to the defense of the country or and / or economic security, state authority and / or the maintenance of public life “⁵⁷) based on the legislative decree, the president approved “ Critical information systems’ list of subjects.“ At this stage, the list includes only those State institutions, which proper functioning are vital for Georgia.

In May 2013, the President signed the agreement on cyber security strategy for 2013–2015, which in the field of cyber security is the main policy–making document. The strategy has a plan of action, where in details is planned the measures of the future, as well as state institutions, which are directly responsible for the Action Plan commitments.

⁵⁶Article 286, Criminal Code of Georgia, the Parliament of Georgia, document number 2287, 22/07/1999, Georgia. <<https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/16426>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

⁵⁷ Law of Georgia on Information Security, the Parliament of Georgia, 05/06/2012, Georgia, <<http://dea.gov.ge/uploads/InfoSec%20Law%20ENG.pdf>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

To accomplish this, existence guarantee of privacy we can considered as a mechanism for realization of freedom expression. according the law of Georgia freedom of expression means unacceptability of censorship, editorial independence and pluralism, the right of journalists to protect the source of information and make editorial decisions based on their own conscience.⁵⁸

10. Are whistle-blowers explicitly protected under law protecting journalistic sources? Is there another practice protecting whistle-blowers? Is the legislation prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers?

The guaranties of legal protection of whistle-blower, addressee or any sources information are provided by the constitution article 24.1 that states freedom of information along with freedom of expression.

According to the Article 24.1 “Everyone has the right to freely receive and impart information, to express and impart his/her opinion orally, in writing or by in any other means.”

In fact, this article protects accessibility of information. In some cases, the source of information can be considered as a person who spreads information or as the information itself. Respective constitutional norm implies that the freedom of press means recognition of confidentiality of information and protection of the source of information.

The guaranties of legal protection of whistle-blower or sources of specific information are also provided by articles 11 and 12 of “Law Georgia on freedom of speech and expression.”

11.1 “The source of a professional secret merit absolute protection and restricts demand of its disclosure. No one is authorised to disclose the source of confidential information during court proceedings on the limitation of the right of freedom of speech and expression. No one is permitted to disclose confidential information except with the consent of its owner or pursuant to a reasoned court decision in cases prescribed by law. A court has a power to request disclosure only of the part of confidential information that is proved to be necessary. Article 12 is repressive, as confidential information received through disclosure proceedings can only be used for the purpose for which it was disclosed.

⁵⁸ Legislation on Cybercrime and the General Policy, Ministry of Internal Affairs <<http://police.ge/ge/projects/kiberdanashauli/kanonmdbloba-kiber-danashaulze-da-zogadi-politika>> accessed 25 July 2016 [Georgian].

12.1 “A person is liable only October or the disclosure of secrets to which one is related by contract or in accordance with one’s official position about the disclosure that creates a direct and substantial danger to values protected by la October w. In case of violation of these rights, a person can demand compensation of material and moral damages. The stance of the criminal law concerning the legal protection of whistle-blowers and sources of information is implicitly important. It October would be useful to use article 153, stating that a person who is illegally prevented from receiving or spreading the information, must be punished with respective sanction.

The legal definition of article 154 protects journalist's rights to spread the information that has an interest of the vast majority of people. Aforementioned norm does not give us the definition of a whistle-blower; otherwise this must have been the only legal safeguard (as a norm) for a whistle-blower. Legal norms related to a whistle – blowers can be found in Georgian legislation, specifically – “Law of Georgia on Conflict of Interests and Corruption on Public Service.”⁵⁹

In 2012, the Public Service hall of the country presented a draft of the law on the protection of whistle- blowers, however, this initiative didn't succeed in as for the “Law of Georgia on Conflict of Interests and Corruption on Public Service.”

Chapter 5 of the law defines a meaning of a 'whistle- blower ', and his/her rights and duties as well.

Article 20: “It is prohibited to intimidate, oppress or threat a whistle-blower in discriminatory ways. The whistle-blower may not be subject to disciplinary or administrative procedures, civil action or prosecution or be held responsible otherwise for the circumstances related to the acts of the whistleblowing, until the end of the investigation. It is also forbidden to worsen the conditions of the agreements, license and grant and to release or temporarily release from the job, derangement of legal relationships, until proving the untruthfulness of the information provided by whistleblowing.”

This law implies a definition of an anonymous whistle-blowers. According to third paragraph of article 3 –”It is prohibited to intimidate, oppress or threat a whistleblower in discriminatory ways.” according to the 2nd part of this article– “Disciplinary, civil, administrative and criminal procedures are not related to the conditions of whistleblowing of the exposed person.” and this article protects whistle-blowers from not only from the private sector but from a public as well.

⁵⁹*Comments of the constitution of Georgia*, Zoidze Besarion, Tbilisi, 2014, P.252.

The aforementioned draft law contains important topics; on the other hand, it doesn't share all important principles of international legislation. According to the law "the exposed person can serve as the bases for the imposition of civil, administrative or criminal responsibility, it should refer the case to the competent authorities. The judgment about the complaint is an administrative act. The entry into force of the administrative act, as well as the execution and its appeal is regulated under Georgian Administrative Legislation. The judgment shall not be based on the circumstances, facts, evidence and arguments, which were not judged substantially during the examination of the complaint. "

It is worth mentioning that Georgian legal definition of whistle-blower is different from the definitions that are given in the legislation of other countries. Whistle-Blower is not only the person who "gives away" somebody, but means – To inform the public institution which examines the complaints against the public official (exposed) about the infractions of the law or the rules of due conduct of the public employees, which caused harm to public interests or reputation of public institutions. That was the main reason of represented draft document—to make Georgian legislation harmonized with international one.

Draft document was written by foreign experts and was represented by Public service hall. Before started working on the document experts held a monitoring for collecting enough information for analyzing existing environment. Changes in document was made in 2015, October 2.

The purposes of this changes are:

- to make the stable monitoring system which implies the declaration property of Officials
- to make the bureau accredit able to have the right of monitoring , which approves the accuracy of the discussed information

11. Conclusion

To sum up all the information analysed above, we can say without any ounce of hesitation that Georgia has harmonized legislation with EU standards, but the fact that our country is not reach for law—cases concerning the topic doesn't mean that journalist rights are fully protected. Violence and harassment aimed at journalists are still happening. On several regions of Georgia government cannot even protect rights recognized by national and international legislation.

It is also worth mentioning that our government cannot effectively control protection of the right on the territories of Abkhazia and South Ossetia which are under Russian control. There is little media presence in tiny South Ossetia. Local authorities operate a television station, although most programming is rebroadcast from Russia. Media sector including print sector is not independent. Serbian travel journalist Viktor Lazić was detained in September 2011 on a charge of crossing the border illegally, having entered South Ossetia from Georgia proper. In Abkhazia, local population has access to both Russian and Abkhazian television content; Georgian stations are only available via satellite. Abkhazia's residents have access to Georgian and Turkish radio, and the territory is home to several private print media outlets. Overall, media ownership and coverage is dominated by local authorities. (Source: Freedom House—an independent watchdog organization dedicated to the expansion of freedom and democracy around the world.)

There so much country should do freedom of expression, receiving and spreading the information to be protected. This is the part of an effective governing system, this is the part of a country with democratic social order, economic freedom and a rule-of-law based social values.

12. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

12.1. Legislation

- Law of Georgia on Conflict of Interests and Corruption on Public Service
- Criminal Procedure Code of Georgia
- Civil Code of Georgia
- Law of Georgia, on Freedom of speech and Expression
- Journalism ethic code
- Law of Georgia on assemblies and demonstration

12.2. Case–Law

- CITIZEN GOGICHAISHVILI V. THE PARLIAMENT OF GEORGIA, judgment of 11 MARCH, 2004, Case number N2/1/241.
- Goodwin v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 27 March 1996, § 39.
- Ramishvili and Kokhreidze V. Georgia, judgment of 27 January 2009, §64.

12.3. Books and articles

- Tumanishvili G., Commentary on the Criminal Procedure Code of Georgia, Tbilisi, 2015.
- Natia Kapanadze, What's the difference between professional and legal guarantees for the protection of the sources of information? Tbilisi, 2016.
- B.Zoidze, Commentary on the constitution of Georgia, Tbilisi, 2014.

12.4. Internet sources

- http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/CP_Georgia_ENG.pdf
- <http://qartia.org.ge/charter/>
- <https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/16426>
- <https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/90034>
- <https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/1208370https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/1208370>
- <https://wcd.coe.int/ViewDoc.jsp?Ref=Rec%282000%297&Language=lanEnglish&Site=COE&BackColorInternet=DBDCF2&BackColorIntranet=FDC864&BackColorLogged=FDC864>

- <https://wcd.coe.int/ViewDoc.jsp?Ref=Rec%282000%297&Language=lanEnglish&Site=COE&BackColorInternet=DBDCF2&BackColorIntranet=FDC864&BackColorLogged=FDC864>
- <https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/32548><https://matsne.gov.ge/ka/document/view/32548>
- http://www.mdfgeorgia.ge/geo/view_news/419
- http://www.mdfgeorgia.ge/geo/view_news/419
- <http://www.transparency.ge/node/5580>
- <http://www.transparency.ge/node/5580>
- <http://constcourt.ge/en/legal-acts/judgments/citizen-akaki-gogichaishvili-v-the-parliament-of-georgia-234.page>

13. Table of Provisions

Provisions in native language	Corresponding translation
საქართველოს კონსტიტუცია, მუხლი 19: 1. ყოველ ადამიანს აქვს სიტყვის , აზრის , სინდისის , აღმსარებლობისა და რწმენის თავისუფლება . 2. დაუშვებელია ადამიანის დევნა სიტყვის , აზრის , აღმსარებლობის ან რწმენის გამო , აგრეთვე მისი იძულება გამოთქვას თავისი შეხედულება მათ შესახებ . 3. დაუშვებელია ამ მუხლში ჩამოთვლილ თავისუფლებათა შეზღუდვა , თუ მათი გამოვლინება არ ლახავს სხვათა უფლებებს.	The Constitution of Georgia, Article 19: 1. Everyone has the right to freedom of speech, thought, conscience, religion, and belief. 2. No one shall be persecuted because of his/her speech, thought, religion or belief, or be compelled to express his/her opinion about them. 3. Freedoms listed in this article may not be restricted unless expression thereof infringes on the rights of others.
საქართველოს კონსტიტუცია, მუხლი 24: 1. ყოველ ადამიანს აქვს უფლება თავისუფლად მიიღოს და გაავრცელოს ინფორმაცია , გამოთქვას და გაავრცელოს თავისი აზრი ზეპირად , წერილობით ან სხვაგვარი საშუალებით . 2. მასობრივი ინფორმაციის საშუალებები თავისუფალია . ცენზურა დაუშვებელია . 3. სახელმწიფოს ან ცალკეულ პირებს არა აქვთ მასობრივი ინფორმაციის ან მისი გავრცელების საშუალებათა მონოპოლიზაციის უფლება . 4. ამ მუხლის პირველ და მეორე პუნქტებში ჩამოთვლილ უფლებათა განხორციელება შესაძლებელია კანონით შეიზღუდოს ისეთი პირობებით , რომლებიც აუცილებელია დემოკრატიულ საზოგადოებაში სახელმწიფო	The Constitution of Georgia, Article 24 1. Everyone shall be free to receive and disseminate information, to express and disseminate his/her opinion orally, in writing, or otherwise. 2. Mass media shall be free. Censorship shall be inadmissible. 3. Neither the State nor particular individuals shall have the right to monopolize mass media or the means of dissemination of information. 4. Exercise of rights listed in the first and second paragraphs of this article may be restricted by law, to the extent and insofar as is necessary in a democratic society, in order to guarantee state security, territorial integrity or public safety, to prevent crime, to safeguard rights and dignity of others, to prevent the disclosure of information acknowledged as confidential, or to ensure the independence and impartiality of justice.

უშიშროების , ტერიტორიული მთლიანობის ან საზოგადოებრივი უსაფრთხოების უზრუნველსაყოფად , დანაშაულის თავიდან ასაცილებლად , სხვათა უფლებებისა და ღირსების დასაცავად , კონფიდენციალურად აღიარებული ინფორმაციის გამჟღავნების თავიდან ასაცილებლად ან სასამართლოს დამოუკიდებლობისა და მიუკერძოებლობის უზრუნველსაყოფად .
საქართველოს სისხლის სამართლის კოდექსი, მუხლი 153: სიტყვის თავისუფლების ანდა ინფორმაციის მიღების ან გავრცელების უფლების განხორციელებისათვის უკანონოდ ხელის შეშლა, რამაც მნიშვნელოვანი ზიანი გამოიწვია, ანდა ჩადენილი სამსახურებრივი მდგომარეობის გამოყენებით, – ისჯება ჯარიმით ან გამასწორებელი სამუშაოთი ვადით ერთ წლამდე ანდა თავისუფლების აღკვეთით ვადით ორ წლამდე, თანამდებობის დაკავების ან საქმიანობის უფლების ჩამორთმევით ვადით სამ წლამდე ან უამისოდ.	Criminal Code of Georgia, Article 153: Freedom of speech or the right to impart or receive information for the implementation of illegal interference, causing substantial damage, or committed using official position, - Punishable by a fine or corrective labor for up to one year or a prison term of up to two years, a position or the right to work from up to three years or without it.
საქართველოს სისხლის სამართლის კოდექსი, მუხლი 154: 1. ჟურნალისტისათვის პროფესიულ საქმიანობაში უკანონოდ ხელის შეშლა, ესე იგი მისი იძულება, გაავრცელოს ინფორმაცია ან თავი შეიკავოს მისი გავრცელებისაგან, – ისჯება ჯარიმით ან საზოგადოებისათვის სასარგებლო შრომით ვადით ას ოციდან ას ორმოც	The Criminal Code of Georgia, Article 154: 1. journalistic activities illegal interference, forcing him to impart information or to refrain from its dissemination - Punishable by a fine or community service for a period of one hundred twenty to one hundred and forty hours, or corrective labor for up to two years. 2. The same action committed by using threat of violence or official position, - Punishable by a fine or imprisonment for

საათამდე ანდა გამასწორებელი სამუშაოთი ვადით ორ წლამდე. 2. იგივე ქმედება, ჩადენილი ძალადობის მუქარით ან სამსახურებრივი მდგომარეობის გამოყენებით, – ისჯება ჯარიმით ან თავისუფლების აღკვეთით ვადით ორ წლამდე, თანამდებობის დაკავების ან საქმიანობის უფლების ჩამორთმევით ვადით სამ წლამდე ან უამისოდ.	up to two years, deprivation of the right to occupy a position or activity for up to three years or without it.
საქართველოს სისხლის სამართლის კოდექსი, მუხლი 158: 1. კერძო საუბრის უნებართვო ჩაწერა ან მიყურადება, აგრეთვე კომპიუტერულ სისტემაში ან სისტემიდან კერძო კომუნიკაციისას გადაცემული კომპიუტერული მონაცემის ან ამგვარი მონაცემის მატარებელი ელექტრომაგნიტური ტალღების უნებართვო მოპოვება ტექნიკური საშუალების გამოყენებით ან კერძო კომუნიკაციის ჩანაწერის, ტექნიკური საშუალებით მოპოვებული ინფორმაციის ან კომპიუტერული მონაცემის უკანონოდ შენახვა	The Criminal Code of Georgia, Article 158: Unauthorized recording or eavesdropping on a private conversation, as well as a computer system or computer data transmitted from the system to the private communication of such data to unauthorized mining train of electromagnetic waves by using technical means or private communication records, computer data or technical information obtained through the illegal possession
საქართველოს სისხლის სამართლის კოდექსი, მუხლი 284: 1. კომპიუტერულ სისტემაში უნებართვო შეღწევა, – ისჯება ჯარიმით ან გამასწორებელი სამუშაოთი ვადით ორ წლამდე ანდა თავისუფლების აღკვეთით იმავე ვადით. 2. იგივე ქმედება: ა) წინასწარი შეთანხმებით ჯგუფის მიერ; ბ) სამსახურებრივი მდგომარეობის	The Criminal Code of Georgia Article 284: 1. The computer system against unauthorized access, - Punishable by fine or by corrective labor for up to two years or imprisonment for the same period. 2. The same action: A) by a group; B) using official position; C) repeatedly; D) causing substantial damage, - Punishable by fine or by corrective labor for up to two years or a prison term of

გამოყენებით; გ) არაერთგზის; დ) რამაც მნიშვნელოვანი ზიანი გამოიწვია, – ისჯება ჯარიმით ან გამასწორებელი სამუშაოთი ვადით ორ წლამდე ანდა თავისუფლების აღკვეთით ვადით ორიდან ხუთ წლამდე. შენიშვნა: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. კომპიუტერული სისტემა არის ნებისმიერი მექანიზმი ან ერთმანეთთან დაკავშირებულ მექანიზმთა ჯგუფი, რომელიც პროგრამის მეშვეობით, ავტომატურად ამუშავებს მონაცემებს (მათ შორის, პერსონალური კომპიუტერი, ნებისმიერი მოწყობილობა მიკროპროცესორით, აგრეთვე მობილური ტელეფონი). 2. კომპიუტერული მონაცემი არის კომპიუტერულ სისტემაში დამუშავებისათვის ხელსაყრელი ნებისმიერი ფორმით გამოსახული ინფორმაცია, მათ შორის, პროგრამა, რომელიც უზრუნველყოფს კომპიუტერული სისტემის ფუნქციონირებას. 3. უნებართვო გულისხმობს უკანონოს, აგრეთვე იმ შემთხვევას, როდესაც უფლების მფლობელს პირდაპირ ან არაპირდაპირ არ გადაუცია უფლება ქმედების ჩამდენი პირისათვის. 4. ამ თავში მნიშვნელოვნად ითვლება 2000 ლარზე მეტი ოდენობის ზიანი. 5. ამ მუხლით გათვალისწინებული ქმედებისათვის იურიდიული პირი ისჯება ჯარიმით, საქმიანობის უფლების ჩამორთმევით ან 	two to five years. Note: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The computer system is any mechanism or mechanisms linked together a group that through the program, to automatically process data (including personal computers, any device with microprocessor, as well as mobile phone). 2. Computer data in a computer system is suitable for processing image information in any form, including a program that provides computer system. 3. Illegal means illegal, as well as a case of the right holder, directly or indirectly, had not communicated to the person committing the act is made. 4. This section is considered to be significantly more than the 2000 amount of damage. 5. This article shall conduct a legal entity shall be punished by a fine, deprivation of the right to work or liquidation and fine.
--	--

ლიკვიდაციით და ჯარიმით.
საქართველოს სისხლის სამართლის კოდექსი, მუხლი 285: 1. კომპიუტერული პროგრამის ან/და სხვა მოწყობილობის, აგრეთვე კომპიუტერულ სისტემაში შეღწევისათვის საჭირო პაროლის, დაშვების კოდის ან სხვა მსგავსი მონაცემის უნებართვო დამზადება, შენახვა, გაყიდვა, გავრცელება ან ხელმისაწვდომობის სხვაგვარი უზრუნველყოფა ამ თავითა და ამ კოდექსის 158-ე ან 159-ე მუხლით გათვალისწინებული დანაშაულის ჩადენის მიზნით, – ისჯება ჯარიმით ან გამასწორებელი სამუშაოთი ვადით ორ წლამდე ან/და თავისუფლების აღკვეთით ვადით სამ წლამდე. 2. ამ მუხლის პირველი ნაწილით გათვალისწინებული ქმედება: ა) წინასწარი შეთანხმებით ჯგუფის მიერ; ბ) სამსახურებრივი მდგომარეობის გამოყენებით; გ) არაერთგზის; დ) რამაც მნიშვნელოვანი ზიანი გამოიწვია, – ისჯება ჯარიმით ან გამასწორებელი სამუშაოთი ვადით ორ წლამდე ან/და თავისუფლების აღკვეთით ვადით სამიდან ექვს წლამდე. შენიშვნა: ამ მუხლით გათვალისწინებული ქმედებისათვის იურიდიული პირი ისჯება ჯარიმით, საქმიანობის უფლების ჩამორთმევით ან ლიკვიდაციით და ჯარიმით.	The Criminal Code of Georgia Article 285: 1. A computer program and / or other device, as well as a computer system to access the required password, access code, or similar data to unauthorized manufacture, storage, sale, or distribution of the provision of this chapter and the article 158 or 159 of the Criminal the purpose of committing - Punishable by a fine or corrective labor for up to two years and / or imprisonment for up to three years. 2. The first part of the action: A) by a group; B) using official position; C) repeatedly; D) causing substantial damage, - Punishable by a fine or corrective labor for up to two years and / or a prison term of three to six years. Note: This article shall conduct a legal entity shall be punished by a fine, deprivation of the right to work or liquidation and fine.
საქართველოს სისხლის სამართლის	The Criminal Code of Georgia Article

კოდექსი, მუხლი 286: 1. კომპიუტერული მონაცემის უნებართვო დაზიანება, წაშლა, შეცვლა ან დაფარვა, – ისჯება ჯარიმით ან გამასწორებელი სამუშაოთი ვადით ორ წლამდე ან/და თავისუფლების აღკვეთით იმავე ვადით. 2. ამ მუხლის პირველი ნაწილით გათვალისწინებული ქმედება, აგრეთვე კომპიუტერული მონაცემის უნებართვო ჩასმა ან გადაცემა, რამაც კომპიუტერული სისტემის ფუნქციონირების განზრახ მნიშვნელოვანი შეფერხება გამოიწვია, – ისჯება ჯარიმით ან გამასწორებელი სამუშაოთი ვადით ორ წლამდე ან/და თავისუფლების აღკვეთით ვადით სამ წლამდე. 3. ამ მუხლის პირველი ან მე-2 ნაწილით გათვალისწინებული ქმედება: ა) წინასწარი შეთანხმებით ჯგუფის მიერ; ბ) სამსახურებრივი მდგომარეობის გამოყენებით; გ) არაერთგზის; დ) რამაც მნიშვნელოვანი ზიანი გამოიწვია, – ისჯება ჯარიმით ან გამასწორებელი სამუშაოთი ვადით ორ წლამდე ანდა თავისუფლების აღკვეთით ვადით სამიდან ხუთ წლამდე. შენიშვნა: ამ მუხლით გათვალისწინებული ქმედებისათვის იურიდიული პირი ისჯება ჯარიმით, საქმიანობის უფლების ჩამორთმევით ან	286: 1. The computer data against unauthorized damage, delete, or change the cover - Punishable by a fine or corrective labor for up to two years and / or imprisonment for the same period. 2. The first part of the action, as well as computer data or unauthorized insertion of the program, causing the computer system to function deliberately caused significant delays, - Punishable by a fine or corrective labor for up to two years and / or imprisonment for up to three years. 3. The provisions of Article 2 or part of the action: A) by a group; B) using official position; C) repeatedly; D) causing substantial damage, - Punishable by fine or by corrective labor for up to two years or a prison term of three to five years. Note: Under this article are legal entity shall be punished by a fine, deprivation of the right to work or liquidation and fine.
--	---

ლიკვიდაციით და ჯარიმით.
საქართველოს სისხლის სამართლის საპროცესო კოდექსი, მუხლი 50: 1. მოწმედ დაკითხვისა და საქმისათვის მნიშვნელობის მქონე ინფორმაციის შემცველი საგნის, დოკუმენტის, ნივთიერების ან სხვა ობიექტის გადაცემის ვალდებულება არ ეკისრება: თ) ჟურნალისტს – პროფესიული საქმიანობისას მიღებულ ინფორმაციასთან დაკავშირებით;	The Criminal Procedure Code of Georgia, Article 50: 1. The witness interrogation and investigation of important information in the object, document, or other object to the substance of the program, is not required: t) a journalist - a professional operation of the information;
საქართველოს კანონი სიტყვისა და გამოხატვის თავისუფლების შესახებ, მუხლი 1: ო) პროფესიული საიდუმლოება – აღსარების საიდუმლოება, პარლამენტის წევრის, ავტონომიური რესპუბლიკის უმაღლესი საბჭოს წევრის, ექიმის, ჟურნალისტის, უფლებადამცველის, დამცველის პროფესიულ საქმიანობასთან დაკავშირებით მათთვის განდობილი ინფორმაცია, აგრეთვე პროფესიული ფასეულობის მქონე ინფორმაცია, რომელიც პირისათვის ცნობილი გახდა კონფიდენციალურობის დაცვის პირობით, მის მიერ პროფესიული მოვალეობის შესრულებასთან დაკავშირებით და რომლის გამჟღავნებამ შეიძლება ზიანი მიაყენოს პირის პროფესიულ რეპუტაციას. ინფორმაცია, რომელიც არ შეიცავს პერსონალურ მონაცემებს, სახელმწიფო ან კომერციულ საიდუმლოებას, აგრეთვე ადმინისტრაციული ორგანოს შესახებ ინფორმაცია არ არის პროფესიული საიდუმლოება;	Law of Georgia On Freedom of Speech and Expression, Article 1: n) professional secret – the secret of confession, information disclosed to a member of Parliament, a member of the High Council of an Autonomous Republic, a doctor, journalist, human rights defender, or advocate with regard to their professional activity, as well as information of professional value, which became known to a person under the condition of privacy protection in relation to carrying out his/her professional duties and the disclosure of which may damage the person's professional reputation; information, which does not contain any personal data, a state or trade secret, as well as information on an administrative body shall not be a professional secret;

საქართველოს კანონი სიტყვისა და გამოხატვის თავისუფლების შესახებ, მუხლი 3: 2. ყველას, ადმინისტრაციული ორგანოს გარდა, აქვს გამოხატვის თავისუფლება, რაც გულისხმობს: დ) ცენზურის დაუშვებლობას, მედიის სარედაქციო დამოუკიდებლობასა და პლურალიზმს, ჟურნალისტის უფლებას, დაიცვას ინფორმაციის წყაროს საიდუმლოება და საკუთარი სინდისის შესაბამისად მიიღოს სარედაქციო გადაწყვეტილებები;	Law of Georgia On Freedom of Speech and Expression, Article 3: 2. Everyone, except an administrative body, shall have the freedom of expression, which shall imply: d) unacceptability of censorship, editorial independence and pluralism of the media, the right of a journalist to protect the secret of information source and to make editorial decisions based on his/her conscience
საქართველოს კანონი სიტყვისა და გამოხატვის თავისუფლების შესახებ, მუხლი 4: 1. აზრი დაცულია აბსოლუტური პრივილეგიით	Law of Georgia On Freedom of Speech and Expression, Article 4: 1. Thought shall be protected by an absolute privilege.
საქართველოს კანონი სიტყვისა და გამოხატვის თავისუფლების შესახებ, მუხლი 12: 1. პირი პასუხს აგებს მხოლოდ იმ საიდუმლოების გამხელისათვის, რომლის დაცვაც მას ევალება სამსახურებრივად ან სამოქალაქო გარიგებით და რომლის გამხელა აშკარა, პირდაპირ და არსებით საფრთხეს უქმნის კანონით დაცულ სიკეთებს. 2. პირი თავისუფლდება პასუხისმგებლობისაგან, თუ საიდუმლოების გამხელა მიზნად ისახავდა საზოგადოების კანონიერი ინტერესების დაცვას და დაცული სიკეთე აღემატება მიყენებულ ზიანს. 3. კერძო ცხოვრების ხელშეუხებლობისა და	Law of Georgia On Freedom of Speech and Expression, Article 12: 1. A person shall be responsible only for the disclosure of a secret, protecting the confidentiality of which is either his/her official duty or the result of a civil agreement, and whose disclosure creates obvious, direct and essential danger for benefits protected by law. 2. A person shall be released from responsibility if a secret has been disclosed for the purpose of protecting the legitimate interests of society, and if the benefits protected exceed the damage caused. 3. The freedom of expression, in relation to events, the knowledge of which is necessary for a person in order to execute public self-government in a democratic state may not be restricted for the purpose of personal life immunity and personal

პერსონალური მონაცემების დაცვის მოტივით არ შეიძლება შეიზღუდოს გამოხატვის თავისუფლება იმ მოვლენასთან დაკავშირებით, რომლის ცოდნაც აუცილებელია ადამიანისათვის დემოკრატიულ სახელმწიფოში საზოგადოებრივი თვითმმართველობის განსახორციელებლად. 4. პირს შეუძლია მოითხოვოს ამ მუხლის პირველი და მე-2 პუნქტებით დაცული უფლებების ხელყოფით მიყენებული ქონებრივი და არაქონებრივი (მორალური) ზიანის ანაზღაურება.	data protection. 4. A person may demand reimbursement for property and non-property (moral) damages caused by the violation of rights protected under the first and second paragraphs of this article.
საქართველოს კანონი სიტყვისა და გამოხატვის თავისუფლების შესახებ, მუხლი 11: 1. პროფესიული საიდუმლოების წყარო დაცულია აბსოლუტური პრივილეგიით და არავის არ აქვს უფლება, მოითხოვოს ამ წყაროს გამხელა. სიტყვის თავისუფლების შეზღუდვის შესახებ სასამართლო დავისას მოპასუხეს არ შეიძლება დაეკისროს კონფიდენციალური ინფორმაციის წყაროს გამხელის ვალდებულება. 2. დაუშვებელია კონფიდენციალური ინფორმაციის გამხელა თვით მისი მფლობელის თანხმობის ან კანონით გათვალისწინებულ შემთხვევებში სასამართლოს დასაბუთებული გადაწყვეტილების გარეშე.	Law of Georgia On Freedom of Speech and Expression, Article 11: 1. The sources of professional secrets shall be protected by an absolute privilege, and nobody shall have the right to require disclosure of the source. In litigation on the restriction of the freedom of speech, the respondent shall not be obliged to disclose the source of confidential information. 2. Disclosure of confidential information without the consent of its owner or, in cases determined by the law, without a grounded decision of the court, shall be unacceptable.

საქართველოს სამოქალაქო კოდექსი, მუხლი 18: 2. პირს უფლება აქვს სასამართლოს მეშვეობით, კანონით დადგენილი წესით დაიცვას საკუთარი პატივი, ღირსება, პირადი ცხოვრების საიდუმლოება, პირადი ხელშეუხებლობა ან საქმიანი რეპუტაცია შელახვისაგან.	Civil Code of Georgia, Article 18: 2. A person has the right to court, according to the law to protect their honor, dignity, privacy, personal integrity or reputation it.
--	---

ELSA GERMANY

Contributors

National Coordinator

Gertrud Bohler

National Researcher

Annika Lintz

Julia-Katharina Horn

Katinka von Rhein

Larissa Balluff

Lennart Thoms

National Linguistic Editor

Robert Vierling

National Academic Supervisor

Prof. Dr. Lauber-Rönsberg (TU Dresden)

1. Does the National Legislation Provide (explicit or otherwise) Protection of the Right of the Journalists not to Disclose their Source of Information? What Type of Legislation Provides this Protection? How Exactly is this Protection Construed in National Law?

The right of journalists not to disclose their sources is one of the main principles of the freedom of the press. In addition to the freedom of expression and the related freedom of information, the freedom of the press is explicitly stated in the German legislation in Article 5 Grundgesetz (German Constitution). According to Article 5 I 2 GG¹ the freedom of the press and the freedom of reporting by broadcasters and film are guaranteed. Thereby the state is obliged to protect the freedom of the press and to ensure its existence.

The freedom of the press is likewise included in the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) under Article 10. It offers journalists the right of keeping secret where they got their information from.² This is a prerequisite for the freedom of the press and not only a privilege of journalists. Domestically, the ECHR develops binding effect only on the basis of and within the limits of the law under Article 59 II GG with its application command. With its functions of orientation and guidance, it is supposed to fit as gently as possible into the existing national legal system and to serve as an interpretation guide.³ Despite of the content-related congruence of Article 5 II GG and Article 10 ECHR,⁴ Article 10 ECHR does not grant constitutional rank via Article 1 II GG or Article 25 GG in the hierarchy of legal source.⁵ In Germany, the ECHR is subordinated under the constitutional law on the level of ordinary federal statutes.⁶ This is the reason why it can be applied in German courts like any other law.⁷

As a matter of principle, the main task of the press is to ensure the formation of a public opinion.⁸ On the one hand side, journalists are supposed to be free of control of public authorities (passive function). On the other hand side they should also be encouraged in their task to conduct truthful reporting and critical statements (active function).⁹ This is only possible

¹ GG = Grundgesetz (German Constitution).

² Jens Meyer-Ladewig, Europäische Menschenrechtskonvention (3rd edn, CH Beck 2011) EMRK Artikel 10, I. 39 [German].

³ Hannes Radthe, Parteiverbote unter dem Grundgesetz und der EMRK (Deutscher Bundestag, Wissenschaftliche Dienste, 02/2013), <<https://www.bundestag.de/blob/193480/e1c02208cc129970754653b8053ac1fc/partieverbote-data.pdf>> accessed 18 April 2016 [German].

⁴ Otto Teplitzky/Karl-Nikolaus Peifer, Wolfgang B. Schünemann, Großkommentar – Gesetz gegen unlauteren Wettbewerb (2nd edn, De Gryter 2013), Book I, Introduction §§ 1- 13, 65 [German].

⁵ Theodor Maunz/ Günter Dürig, Roman Herzog, Grundgesetz Kommentar (53rd edn, CH Beck 2009) Art. 1 II GG I. 41 [German].

⁶ BVerfGE 82, 106 (114).

⁷ Dirk Ehlers, Europäische Grundrechte und Grundfreiheiten (3rd edn, De Gryter Lehrbuch 2009) 31 [German].

⁸ Jens Meyer-Ladewig, Europäische Menschenrechtskonvention (3rd edn, CH Beck 2011) EMRK Artikel 10, I. 31 [German].

⁹ Gerhard Schricker, Verlagsrecht (3rd edn, CH Beck 2001) I. 106 [German].

in a democratic and constitutional state and with democratically elected legislature. Throughout its creation of a critical point of view the press plays an active role in the opinion making process of the society.¹⁰ Responsible citizens are irreplaceable for a democracy, which means the freedom of the press in turn guarantees democracy. To sum it up, without source protection informants might be discouraged to help the press in informing the public on matters of public interest to fulfil its role as “public watchdog”.¹¹

Specifically, the protection is guaranteed in Germany as follows: The freedom of the press under Article 5 I 2 GG does not name the subject of the fundamental right, but the scope of protection-usually, fundamental rights guarantee the right to defend oneself against the state. But according to consistent case-law of the Bundesverfassungsgericht (German Constitutional Court), Article 5 I 2 GG even guarantees an individual right. Therefore any natural or legal person can be entitled of this fundamental right. Excluded, however, are corporate bodies under public law, but not public service broadcasters.¹² Following this approach, the protection is valid for everyone and it does not restrict it to journalists, certainly not during their professional activity.

Beyond the freedom of expression, the freedom of the press protects press products, and the institution of a free press.¹³ Press in the (compared to the understanding of the constitution) restrictive formal understanding of the ECHR means only published printed works. Press products include all certain and to the dissemination suitable printed matter, not only periodically but also uniquely printed works.¹⁴ On personal and institutional level, the activities of those who are involved in the process of production and distribution of periodical press products, so especially professional journalists, publishers and editors, but also those involved directly in manufacture and sales of publications.¹⁵

Moreover, the scope of protection of Article 5 I 2 GG overcomes the delimitations by media types and is therefore open to forms of communication that cannot be classified in the frame of traditional media categories (press, television, radio, film). This applies in particular for the Internet-based media, if due to the narrow concept using of "broadcast" (within the meaning of "radio") and television in Article 10 I 3 ECHR (unlike the prevailing understanding of the Article 5 I 2 GG) which are not assigned with the freedom of broadcasting.¹⁶

¹⁰ Udo Branahl/ Patrick Donges, Warum Medien wichtig sind: Funktionen in der Demokratie (Informationen zur politischen Bildung, Massenmedien, 309/2010)

¹¹ <<http://www.bpb.de/izpb/7492/warum-medien-wichtig-sind-funktionen-in-der-demokratie?p=all>> accessed 18 April 2016 [German].

¹² Volker Epping/ Christian Hillgruber, Franz Schemmer, Beck'scher Online-Kommentar Grundgesetz (27th edn, CH Beck 2015) Art. 5 GG II. 38-41 [German].

¹³ BVerfGE 85, 1 (13).

¹⁴ Theodor Maunz/ Günter Dürig, Roman Herzog, Grundgesetz Kommentar (53rd edn, CH Beck 2009) Art. 5 I, II I. 132 [German].

¹⁵ Hubert Gersdorf/ Boris P. Paal, Matthias Cornils, Beck'scher Online-Kommentar Informations- und Medienrecht (11th edn, CH Beck 2016), Art. 10 EMRK I. 23 [German].

¹⁶ Ibid., I. 22.

The protection ranges here from the provision of information to the dissemination of news and opinions.¹⁷ In Germany, the freedom of the press is based on the access to information and the opportunity to inform the addressees of important events.¹⁸ Therefore, part of the freedom of the press is a certain protection of the confidential relationship between the press and private informants. It is indispensable, since the press cannot do its work without this source of information through private communications, which in turn only flows productively when the informant can rely on the principle that the editorial confidentiality is maintained.¹⁹ This means that the basis for the information gathering is a relationship of trust between the press and informants, which is therefore covered by the freedom of the press.²⁰

An intervention is present in particular in the prevention of free information gathering, the interception of telecommunications by journalists or searches of editorial offices.

In a democratic society the protection of journalistic sources is of great significance for the freedom of the press. Demands to a journalist, to specify his sources, as well as searches of his home or his workplace to determine such a source, transgress his right of freedom of expression under Article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights or rather Article 5 GG. They are only justified if there is an overriding public interest.²¹ There is no explicit legal definition for journalistic sources.

But in general you could say, that an informant is someone who gives (secret) information to another.²²

Such interference could, however, may be justified. This would be the case, as far as a general law, the protection of minors or laws precluding the protection of honour are up against the freedom of the press. For example, the freedom of the press in media products that glorify hatred and violence could be restricted in favour of the protection of minors. The protection of personal honour is guaranteed with the general right of personality under Article 2 I GG. It is particularly significant in testimony offenses, written in §§²³ 185 II. Strafgesetzbuch (Criminal Code). The concrete determination in general law is controversial (special legal theory, balancing theory, mixed special legal consideration doctrine). Usually it has to be measured by the mixed special legal consideration doctrine. The justification by a general law is the most important barrier. However, the presence alone is not enough for a legitimate restriction, decisive is the proportionality. Regarding the adequacy, the restrictive law itself has to be interpreted also in the 17 BVerfGE 20, 162 (175).

18 BVerfGE 91, 125 (134).

19 Neue Juristische Wochenschrift, , Zur Frage der Verfassungsmäßigkeit von Durchsuchungen in Presseräumen' (NJW CH Beck 1966) 1603 [German]

20 BVerfGE 36, 193 (176); BVerfGE 64, 108 (115).

21 EGMR, 14. 9. 2010, 38224/03; NJW-RR 2011, 1266.

22 <http://www.oxforddictionaries.com/de/definition/englisch/informant>

23 In Germany the terms article and § are used side by side. The constitution and the constitutions of the federal states are using the term article, whereas in domestic law § are used.

context of fundamental rights.²⁴ All in all, it is important to examine and consider the predominant interest in each individual case.

Furthermore, with the ban on censorship in Article 5 III GG control by the state is prohibited before publication. Exceptions are permitted only in favour of the protection of minors.

Moreover, the national legislation provides explicit protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their sources with the right to refuse to testify, which is written in § 53 I 1 No. 5 Strafprozessordnung (Code of Criminal Procedure) as well as in § 383 I No. 5 Zivilprozessordnung (Code of Civil Procedure). The right to refuse to give evidence for press stuff protects journalistic sources and the anonymity of informants.²⁵ Protection from inspection or monitoring is additionally provided by § 20u Bundeskriminalamtsgesetz/BKAG (federal law about the criminal police office)²⁶ as well as § 3b G10 Gesetz zur Beschränkung des Brief-, Post- und Fernmeldegeheimnisses/ Artikel 10-Gesetz (law limiting the mail, post and telecommunications).

In conclusion, the national legislation in Germany protects the right of journalists not to disclose their source of information with high priority. It is a main principle in our democracy to protect the freedom of the press as well as the freedom of expression. Therefore it is construed as a fundamental right in the German Constitution under Article 5 GG.

Nevertheless, there is always a balancing process to be made between the freedom of expression of the journalist – including the protection of his source - and the overwhelming public interest in individual cases.

2. Is there in Domestic Law a Provision that Prohibits a Journalist from Disclosing his/her Sources? How Exactly is this Prohibition Construed in National Law? What is the Sanction?

The research is indispensable and information in image and graphics are to examine and reproduce faithfully. Their meaning must not be distorted nor falsified by editing, headline or caption and unconfirmed reports, rumours and assumptions are to be made recognizable as such.

The requirements vary depending on the severity of the feared interference with individual rights (the heavier the higher care needs) and also a potential time pressure of the press has to be considered (the more current the topic, the less possible for due diligence). Also, a balance of interests should always be carefully and comprehensively carried out. Often the question of whether a present consent to a photo, which is spread is actually effective or would be in demand here again (verification), in this regard, plays a major role. Furthermore, one should always be careful to distinguish clearly between its own opinions and actual messages and to distinguish between advertising and editorial content (separation rule).

²⁴ Hubert Gersdorf/ Boris P. Paal, Stefan Söder, 'Beck'scher Online-Kommentar Informations- und Medienrecht' (11th edn, CH Beck 2016), § 823 BGB I. 111 [German].

²⁵ VG Lüneburg, Beschluss vom 02.06.2014 - 5 A 154/13

²⁶ <http://www.bundesverfassungsgericht.de/SharedDocs/Entscheidungen/DE/2016/04/rs20160420_1bvr096609.html> accessed 6th May 2016 [German].

Among the rights of third parties, which must be followed in reporting, belongs especially the general right of personality under Article 2 I GG. What is needed is a balance between the fundamental rights of freedom of expression and freedom of the press on the one hand and the general right on the other hand side. The following applies: the greater the public interest in an event, the more likely the consideration is carried out in favour of the freedom of expression and the freedom of the press.

In domestic law in Germany there is no exact provision that prohibits a journalist to disclose his source. In contrary, as we can see it is especially protected.

Even though there is a critical point with the publication of illegally procured information. The illegal procurement of information cannot be generally justified by the pursued research purposes. Although in the interpretation and application of the relevant prohibitions the weight of the freedom of expression has to be considered.²⁷ According to Article 5 I GG, only the publication of information from generally accessible sources is allowed.

The distribution of illegally obtained information, however, is within the scope of protection under Article 5 I GG included.²⁸ Whether it is permissible in a particular case must be determined by comprehensive evaluation of interests. The importance of the fundamental right of the freedom of expression rises in significance as more it is contributing to the intellectual struggle of opinions in the public fundamentally affecting.²⁹

Sometimes it is still reported on the contents of secret documents - for example the documents that can be found on special websites. These documents were on the Internet already available to everyone before journalists made it a topic. In borderline cases like these, journalists must carefully outweigh what weighs more - the claim of the state to secrecy or the claim of the public to information. The relevance is usually present when grievances of considerable weight are revealed by the publication. Prior to release, this will be carefully checked by broadcasters and publishing houses.³⁰ In cases where the publisher obtains illegally procured information by fraud, with the intention to use it against the deceived person, the publication has to remain undone in principle.

The only exception is when the importance of information for informing the public and for the public opinion clearly outweighs the disadvantages, which bring the breach of law for the concerned person and for the legal system.³¹

27 EGMR, 24.02.2015, 21830/09.

28 BVerfG NJW 1984, 1741 (1743).

29 Hubert Gersdorf/ Boris P. Paal, Stefan Söder, 'Beck'scher Online-Kommentar Informations- und Medienrecht' (11th edn, CH Beck 2016) BGB § 823 BGB I. 220 [German].

30 'Grenzen der Berichterstattung' (Westdeutscher Rundfunk 2016), <http://www1.wdr.de/unternehmen/der-wdr/medienrecht_infotext100.pdf> accessed 18 April 2016 [German].

31 NJW 1984, 1741, 'Schutz der Redaktionsarbeit durch die Vertraulichkeit der Pressefreiheit' [German].

In general, neither the freedom of expression nor the freedom of the press allow illegal procurement of information. However, the dissemination of illegally obtained information is covered by the freedom of speech is then inadmissible if disclosure of information with other purpose or fulfil inadmissible intervene in private legal interests. The press cannot rely on the justification to assert legitimate interests pursuant to § 193 StGB for a breach of the journalistic duty of care. A particular care is to be noted when it comes to a tentative reporting. The criminal presumption of innocence until proven guilty does not apply to the press. On the one hand, a suspicion reporting can violate the general personal right. The press must therefore weigh up the public interest in information and the interests of the person concerned and make it clear in their reports that it is only a suspicion. On the other hand the spread of rumours that affect privacy is not permitted.³² Supports the medium as part of his research exclusively on own resources, the journalistic due diligence has to be considered in particular. Journalists need to exploit all available resources in order to provide comfort on the veracity of the limits of the possible and feasible. Relying on rumours is not enough.³³

In Germany, everyone has the so-called "law of the spoken word". In practice this means that each can decide whether his statements can be published verbatim, that may be quoted. A secret recording of conversations is prohibited by § 201 StGB. Even the secret eavesdropping is as an invasion of the general right not allowed. Private conversations that not everyone should hear shall not be cited publicly unasked. Everything said is basically intended for the listener. Only if someone is directed to a plurality of persons or a journalist who identifies as such, one may quote what was said.³⁴

But what happens if the authorization is refused or confidentiality had been agreed? Then you can only publish the information obtained when there is a public interest in them (balancing process). Furthermore, one should not disclose the identity of the interviewee nor reflect his words. And you will not be able to call him as a witness in any court disputes. This is called an "exclusionary rule".

Next to the protection of the spoken and written word, there are a few more rights, the press has to take into account: firstly the protection of anonymity under §§ 202a, 203 StGB, secondly the protection of reputation and honour under § 823 II with §§ 185 ll. StGB; § 187a StGB, § 189 StGB, thirdly breach of trust in the Foreign Office, violation of professional secrecy and a specific duty of confidentiality § 353a, b StGB, fourthly the right on the own picture under §§ 22-24 Kunsturhebergesetz (German law regulating art and copyright questions) as well as the moral rights under §§ 12-14 Urhebergesetz (copyright law). Nevertheless there are no criminal provisions in the German criminal code which punish violation of professional secrecy, confidential information and/or private information and in principle applicable to journalists who violate their duty to protect his/her sources.

32 Christoph Hauschka/ Klaus Moosmeier/ Thomas Lösler, 'Corporate Compliance – Handbuch der Haftungsvermeidung in Unternehmen' (3rd edn. CH Beck 2016) § 57 Compliance im Presse- und Verlagswesen, § 57 ll. 30 [German].

33 Renate Damm/ Klaus Rehbock, 'Widerruf, Unterlassung und Schadensersatz in den Medien' (3rd edn. CH Beck 2008) l. 675 [German].

34 Kurt Haag/ Geigel, 'Der Haftpflichtprozess mit Einschluss des materiellen Haftpflichtrechts' (27th edn. CH Beck 2015) l. 67-72 [German].

Next to the law, for German journalists there is a Press Code. In numeral 5 states that the press maintains professional secrecy, makes use of the privilege to refuse to give evidence and do not abandon informants without their explicit agreement.³⁵ At the whole Press Code there are no sanctions normalized. However, the creator of the Press Code, the Press Council, has several boards of complaint. With them it is a matter of voluntary self-regulation for reviews of articles, interviews, photos, etc. In a pledge the majority of all publishers confess to the Press Code and the sanctions of the Press Council.³⁶ The sanctions imposed by the board sanctions are the following: The public reprimand is the toughest sanction of the complaints commissions. She must be published by the editors in their next issues. For the protection of those affected, the complaint may also be non-publicly pronounced. Second strongest measure is disapproval. The Press Council recommends the publication, but it is not mandatory. Furthermore, the Press Council can issue a notice to a relevant editorial.³⁷ The German Law provides no provisions in Labour Law which may apply a disciplinary sanction for breaching the secrecy of journalistic sources.

To sum it up, in domestic law there are several provisions that restrict a journalists rights. There is a thin line between the freedom of the journalist and the protection of the affected person. The prohibition starts where rights of others are touched. Furthermore there are also non-legal rules concerning the work of journalist in the press code.

3. Who is a “Journalist” According to the National Legislation? Is it in your View a Restricted Definition for the Purpose of the Protection of Journalistic Sources? What is the Scope of Protection of other Media Actors? Is the Protection of Journalists’ Sources Extended to Anyone Else?

In Germany, Article 5 GG deals with the protection of the freedom of press. Article 5 Section 1 Sentence 1 guarantees everyone the freedom of speech. This is specified in S. 2. There is no censure, S. 3. A journalist is part of the press. Therefore, Article. 5 also protects journalists. The Grundgesetz (German Constitution) does not define “press”³⁸, although it does mention it several ³⁵ Trägerverein des Deutschen Presserats e.V., Pressekodex (presserat, – 2016) <<http://www.presserat.de/pressekodex/pressekodex/>> accessed June 02 2016 [German].

³⁶ Trägerverein des Deutschen Presserats e.V., Pressekodex (presserat, – 2016) <<http://www.presserat.de/presserat/selbstverpflichtungserklaerung/>> accessed June 02 2016 [German].

³⁷ Trägerverein des Deutschen Presserats e.V., Pressekodex (presserat, – 2016) <<http://www.presserat.de/pressekodex/uebersicht-der-ruegen/>> accessed June 02 2016 [German].

³⁸ Reinhart Ricker, Johannes Weberling, Handbuch des Presserechts (6th edn, CH Beck 2012) 2 [German].

times in Articles 5 and 75. Neither does the constitution define “journalist”. Journalists are part of press. Press is defined as all printed matter³⁹ made for publication, no matter if they are published periodically or only once.⁴⁰ There is no need for publication to the public, the printed matter can also only be published among a certain group of people.⁴¹ The freedom of press is a special case of the freedom of information because it is not only about the access to information from publicly accessible sources but also about privately researched sources and observances.⁴² However, there is no right to information. This can only be granted in state legislation.⁴³

The protection of the press is valued highly because the press will only be able to publish independently if the access to sources is provided without restrictions. An informant will only offer information if assured that he or she can rely on confidentiality.⁴⁴

The trade union „Deutscher Journalisten Verband“ (DJV) has established certain criteria defining the term “journalist”.⁴⁵ One needs to fulfil these criteria to become a member of the union.

To be a journalist one needs to work full-time as an employee or a freelancer for media such as print media or broadcasting.⁴⁶ Moreover, one has to research and work on information, which is supposed to be spread for information, opinion and entertainment.⁴⁷ The person has to select and choose the information to be published.⁴⁸

To conclude, according to German law everyone writing or working in media could label himself or herself a journalist. Therefore, the term journalist is not restricted but rather extensive so that many people are protected. There is no special protection exclusively for journalists but for press only.

As the German Law of Press is based on national and state legislation, both have to be considered when answering the question.⁴⁹

³⁹ For a definition: Landespressegesetze (State legislation regarding press), eg § 7 I Landespressegesetz North Rhine-Westphalia.

⁴⁰ Federal Constitutional Court of Germany Report Volume 20 [1962] 176 [German]; Bodo Pieroth, Bernhard Schlink, Thorsten Kingreen, Ralf Poscher, Grundrechte Staatsrecht II (29th edn, CF Müller 2013) para 611 [German].

⁴¹ ibid.

⁴² ibid para 616.

⁴³ ibid.

⁴⁴ Federal Constitutional Court of Germany Report Volume 20 [1962] 176 [German]; Federal Court of Germany Report Volume 36 [1989] 1 [German].

⁴⁵ DJV Guidelines to admission <<https://www.djv.de/en/startseite/profil/mitglied-werden/aufnahmerichtlinien.html>> accessed 3 June 2016 [German].

⁴⁶ ibid. bullet point 1 <<https://www.djv.de/en/startseite/profil/mitglied-werden/aufnahmerichtlinien.html>> accessed 3 June 2016, 7:24 [German].

⁴⁷ Ibid. bullet point 2 <https://www.djv.de/en/startseite/profil/mitglied-werden/aufnahmerichtlinien.html> accessed 3 June 2016 [German].

⁴⁸ Ibid [German].

⁴⁹ Ricker, Weberling, Handbuch des Presserechts 3.

4. What are the Legal Safeguards for the Protection of Journalistic Sources? How are the Laws Implemented? How are the Legal Safeguards Combined with Self-Regulatory Mechanisms?

There are several laws in Germany dealing with media to be considered in relation to this question. The media can only support the formation of a public opinion if they can offer reliable information.⁵⁰

In every German state, there are Landespressegesetze (state legislation concerning press), eg Landespressegesetz North Rhine-Westphalia (LPresseG NRW). Those laws mainly focus on the right of the press to be informed by administration about topics they need to be informed about to fulfil their task of informing the public.

However, they do not only focus on the protection of journalistic sources but also on the right to reply to every person concerned in published works or the liability of publishers. According to the law, editors and publishers are even liable for negligence when publishing wrong facts.⁵¹

The freedom of information is a fundamental human right recognised both at federal and national level.⁵²

There are several legal safeguards. Among these are the right to refuse to give evidence, restrictions for (legal) searches and “confiscation” in media companies, limits to “lawful interception” and enlargement to multimedia.⁵³

In Germany everyone has the right to refuse to testify according to § 53 I StPO under special conditions. As the German Supreme Court pointed out the press area is under high protection concerning private information and the informant will only offer information if assured that he or she can rely on the keeping of the confidentiality of the legal department.⁵⁴ It is a special law for people whose profession swears them to secrecy, § 53 I No. 5 StPO. According to this law, you have to be a member of a profession that prepares, makes or distributes print media, film reports or other media made for teaching or forming of opinion. Then you can refuse to tell who offered information and other job related documents as long as they are made for the editorial

⁵⁰ Ernst Fricke, Recht für Journalisten: Presse – Rundfunk – Neue Medien (1st edn, UVK Verlagsgesellschaft 2010) 78 [German].

⁵¹ §§ 21f. LPresseG NRW.

⁵² There is state and national legislation regarding the freedom of information (Informationsfreiheitsgesetz of Germany and Informationsfreiheitsgesetz of North Rhine-Westphalia). They are only valid between people and national administration.

⁵³ Benjamin Bröcker; Redaktionsgeheimnis und Quellenschutz in Frankreich und Deutschland Schriftenreihe zum internationalen Einheitsrecht und zur Rechtsvergleichung Band 48, (1st edn, Verlag Dr Kovac 2015) 45ff [German].

⁵⁴ Federal Constitutional Court of Germany Report Volume 20 [1962] 176 [German]; Federal Court of Germany Report Volume 36 [1989] 1.

part of the media. You must not refuse evidence if there is investigation regarding a crime⁵⁵ or if the national security or the state is endangered (as long as there is no other way of solving the crime)⁵⁶. You must also not refuse to give evidence if the prosecution investigates a crime regarding sexual self-determination⁵⁷ or money laundering⁵⁸. However, there is a re-exception for journalists, which protects the informant nevertheless.

Identical laws can be found in § 383 I No. 5 ZPO (German code of civil procedure) and in § 102 I No. 4 AO (German tax code). These laws can also be applied in “Fachgerichten” (specialised tribunals) because of the reference rules in §§ 46 ArbGG (German Labour Court Law), 98 VwGO (Administrative Court Procedures Code), 84 I FGO (German Tax Law Code), 118 I SGG (Social Security Code) and 15 I FGG (Jurisdiction over non-contentious matters). There, the right to refuse evidence is a guaranteed privilege.⁵⁹

A problem is that this law’s wording does not include protection of data, eg in a cloud, as this is not explicitly stated in the concerning laws.⁶⁰ The state can request disclosure of the sources, e.g. the prosecution during a criminal procedure. As shown above, the right to refuse evidence can be found in all laws regarding trial. Obviously, the parties to a trial can always ask for disclosure of the sources of a journalist. However, the journalist then has the right to refuse to testify. This right is voluntary and the journalist can refrain from making use of it.⁶¹

The German term “Redaktionsgeheimnis” sums up all these measures for which there is no exact translation but it can be described as the confidentiality of the editorial department.

In general, it means that there are legal safeguards, which protect journalists and their sources by limiting the state’s/government’s/courts’ possibilities of interfering and forcing the journalists to reveal their sources.

Moreover, there are restrictions for (legal) searches and “confiscation” in media companies.

As those restrictions are part of the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of press, they can be found in both constitutional and non-constitutional law.⁶²

Regarding the German constitution, legal searches and confiscation are very strong interference in the basic rights such as Article 5 of the concerned persons.⁶³ This protection adds to the right

⁵⁵ § 53 II Nr. 1 StPO.

⁵⁶ ibid.

⁵⁷ § 53 II Nr. 1 StPO.

⁵⁸ § 53 II Nr. 3 StPO.

⁵⁹ Bröcker, Redaktionsgeheimnis und Quellenschutz in Frankreich und Deutschland 46.

⁶⁰ Cf laws mentioned in section before.

⁶¹ Fricke, Recht für Journalisten: Presse – Rundfunk – Neue Medien 92.

⁶² Bröcker, Redaktionsgeheimnis und Quellenschutz in Frankreich und Deutschland 69.

⁶³ Bröcker, Redaktionsgeheimnis und Quellenschutz in Frankreich und Deutschland 69.

to refuse evidence because the press is protected from the state searching its editorial department for information to avoid the application of the right to refuse evidence. The constitutional court has created some kind of accessoriness⁶⁴ between the two rights.⁶⁵

Legal searches and confiscation cannot be conducted with the main purpose of discovering an informant because this would mean an evasion of § 97 V StPO.⁶⁶

There are also several limits to “lawful interception”. Both, Article 5 I 2 and Article 10 I GG are Concerned. The constitutional court ruled that media could rely on both protections. It stressed that especially a journalist’s source is protected because the press cannot work without the trust and security of its informants.⁶⁷ The state cannot employ arbitrary surveillance of Telecommunication. Nevertheless, no general privilege exists regarding criminal prosecution.⁶⁸

So, Surveillance via telecommunication can be more easily employed than giving oral evidence or Searching rooms. The reason is that data of telecommunication is not in the hands of the journalists but of the media companies.⁶⁹ Moreover, the legal barriers for surveillance of telecommunication are in general much higher.⁷⁰ In addition, § 193 StGB protects the legitimate interest regarding the voicing of opinions.

This is also mentioned in § 824 II BGB. § 193 expresses the so-called “erlaubtes Risiko” (risk that is permitted) meaning that statements are not even considered as unlawful if it is proved later that they are not untrue if their truth could not be proved at the point of release.⁷¹ When publishing such insecure information, the press has to meet a certain standard of care and they have to prove a legitimate interest in court.⁷² This is proved to court if the interest of the offender outweighs the interest of the person concerned.⁷³ Thus, the press cannot be held liable.⁷⁴

According to § 312 StPO you have the right of appeal against an unfavourable ruling.⁷⁵ In general trials are public.⁷⁶ However, a person can request an exclusion of the public according to ⁶⁴ ibid 70.

⁶⁵ ibid 70.

⁶⁶ Bröcker, Redaktionsgeheimnis und Quellenschutz in Frankreich und Deutschland 71.

⁶⁷ Federal Constitutional Court of Germany Report Volume 100 [1999] 313 [German].

⁶⁸ Federal Constitutional Court of Germany Report Volume 107 [2003] 322 [German].

⁶⁹ Ibid 332.

⁷⁰ § 100a StPO; Bröcker, Redaktionsgeheimnis und Quellenschutz in Frankreich und Deutschland 118.

⁷¹ Fricke, Recht für Journalisten: Presse – Rundfunk – Neue Medien 80.

⁷² Fricke, Recht für Journalisten: Presse – Rundfunk – Neue Medien 80.

⁷³ Brian Valerius, Beck'scher Online Kommentar StGB, (30th edn, Bernd von Heintschel-Heinegg, CH Beck 2015) § 193 I 11 [German].

⁷⁴ Fricke, Recht für Journalisten: Presse – Rundfunk – Neue Medien 80.

⁷⁵ Carsten Paul Karlsruher Kommentar zur Strafprozessordnung (7th edn, Rolf Hannich, CH Beck 2013) § 312 para 1ff [German].

§ 172 GVG (German Judicature Act) if his interest outweighs the right of the public to be informed, eg if the freedom of a witness is endangered.⁷⁷ Journalist can make use of this right.

Moreover, the enlargement of press to multimedia needs to be considered.⁷⁸ The above-mentioned legal safeguards have to be applied to multimedia and maybe even changed. This is difficult with regard to blogs⁷⁹, Internet platforms of media companies⁸⁰ and cloud computing⁸¹. It has to be defined if the users should be considered as informants.

According to the states' legislation regarding press, there is no organisation in which membership is mandatory as a professional journalist.⁸² However, there are several organisations on a voluntary basis such as "Deutscher Journalisten-Verband" (German Federation of Journalists)⁸³

As a self-regulatory mechanism, members of the media industry found the association "Deutscher Presserat" (German Press Council).⁸⁴ Its actions are not legally binding.⁸⁵

They have a self-regulatory mechanism: the *Pressekodex*⁸⁶ (German Codex of Press). This voluntary measurement compels journalists to keep their sources secret. Number 5 Pressekodex deals with the protection of informants. The press does not disclose information about informants if they do not agree. Number 5.1 regulates exceptions such as the protection of the state:

"Should an informant stipulate, as a condition for the use of his/her report, that he/she remain unrecognisable or not endangered as the source, this is to be respected. Confidentiality can be non-binding only if the information concerns a crime and there is a duty to inform the police. Confidentiality may also be lifted if, in carefully weighing interests, important reasons of state predominate, particularly if the constitutional order is affected or jeopardised. Actions and plans described as secret may be reported if after careful consideration it is determined that the public's need to know outweighs the reasons put forward to justify secrecy."⁸⁷

76 ibid.

77 § 172 Nr. 1a GVG; Thomas Fischer Karlsruher Kommentar zur Strafprozessordnung Einleitung para 66ff.

78 Bröcker, Redaktionsgeheimnis und Quellenschutz in Frankreich und Deutschland 141.

79 ibid 142 ff.

80 ibid 152ff.

81 ibid 160ff.

82 § 1 III LPressG NRW.

83 <<https://www.djv.de/startseite/profil/der-djv/information-in-english.html>> accessed 17 April 2016.

84 <<http://www.presserat.de/presserat/>> accessed 10 April 2016 [German].

85 Fricke, Recht für Journalisten: Presse – Rundfunk – Neue Medien 84.

86 <<http://www.presserat.de/pressekodex/pressekodex/>> accessed 17 April 2016 [German].

87 Guideline 5.1 German Press Codex <<http://www.presserat.de/pressekodex/pressekodex/>> accessed 17 April 2016.

The reasons for confidentiality not being binding are the same as in § 53 II StPO.⁸⁸ Everyone can complain about a certain press release or other actions concerning media to the Presserat.⁸⁹ After a complaint, the Presserat has certain ways of imposing sanctions although none of them are legally binding.⁹⁰

To sum it up, journalists should look for consent from the Presserat if they want to disclose a source in accordance with Number 5.1 Pressekodex. However, there are no criminal consequences when disclosing information as the right to refuse evidence is voluntary meaning that the journalist can choose freely to disclose information.⁹¹

All in all, there are several legal safeguards in German law for the protection of journalistic sources. As described above, the freedom of speech and press are valued highly in Germany. That is why the laws are strictly implemented. The protection of sources is supported by the codex of the Presserat, which also values the protection very highly with respect to the importance of undisclosed sources for the free press. Therefore, journalists in Germany have both a legal right and a voluntary duty not to disclose their sources.

5. In the Respective National Legislation are the Limits of Non-Disclosure of the Information in Line with the Principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7? What are the Procedures Applied? Is the Disclosure Limited to Exceptional Circumstances, Taking Into Consideration Vital Public or Individual Interests at Stake? Do the Authorities First Search for and Apply Alternative Measures, which Adequately Protect their Respective Rights and Interests and at the Same Time are Less Intrusive with Regard to the Right of Journalists Not to Disclose Information?

5.1. Principles of the Recommendation No. R (2000) 7

In the Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 there are many important points mentioned concerning the journalistic right not to disclose their source of information. It is disputable if and to what extent the limits of non-disclosure in the German legislation are in line with the following principles.

⁸⁸ cf fn 14ff.

⁸⁹ Fricke, Recht für Journalisten: Presse – Rundfunk – Neue Medien 85.

⁹⁰ ibid 85.

⁹¹ Senge Karlsruher, Kommentar zur Strafprozessordnung (7th edn, CH Beck 2013) § 53 StPO Para 7 [German].

5.1.1. Principle 1: Right of Non-Disclosure of Journalists

Journalists should have the right not to disclose a source of information. Their rights must be in line with Article 10 EMRK (Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms). According to this Article everyone generally has the right to express his or her opinion, but there are also duties and responsibilities. If there is no restriction due to very special circumstances, such as a danger to the public safety, the freedom of expression has to be ensured by the authorities.

As it was already shown in the previous questions, this is realized in the German legislation (especially Article 5 GG, in which the freedom of expression and the freedom of the press are guaranteed).

5.1.2. Principle 2: Right of Non-Disclosure of other People

People acquiring knowledge of information identifying a source due to their professional relationships with journalists should be protected by all the principles mentioned here in the same way as journalists are protected.

This principle is put into practice in the German legislation as well.⁹²

5.1.3. Principle 3: Limits to the Right of Non-Disclosure

There must not be any other limitation to the right of journalists not to disclose a source than those manifested in Article 10, paragraph 2 EMRK. Authorities should only be allowed to order a disclosure when there are very serious circumstances in which the public interest in the disclosure outweighs the interest of the single journalist who does not want to disclose a source of information.

In the German Constitution (Article 5, paragraph 2 GG) there are some restrictions to the freedom of expression mentioned: the regulations of general law, the protection of the youth and the personal honor. Each of these aspects can be interpreted as part of Article 10, paragraph 2 of the Convention as well. This Article allows restrictions to the right of non-disclosure, which is implemented in the freedom of expression, due to legal rules.⁹³ The personal honor, that is protected in Article 5 GG, can also be found in Article 10 EMRK, there it is called „protection of the reputation or rights of others“. The last restriction that is mentioned in Article 5 GG is the protection of the youth. This is not particularly mentioned in Article 10 EMRK, but it can be included in the „protection of morals“, which Article 10 explicitly demands.

All the limitation to the journalistic right not to disclose a source of information that exist in the German legislation can be interpreted as part of Article 10, paragraph 2 EMRK. The restrictions that are mentioned in Article 5 GG are in every point similar or at least comparable to those ⁹² This is not explained here, since it was ascertained due to the previous questions.

⁹³ Article 10, Paragraph 2 EMRK: as are prescribed by law.

named in Article 10 EMRK. The third principle of the Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 is consequently followed.

5.1.4. Principle 4: Alternative Evidence to Journalists' Sources

Within legal proceedings against a journalist due to a supposed violation of another person's honor or reputation authorities must not be allowed to require the disclosure of information identifying a source by the journalist in order to find out whether their allegation is true or not. The Federal Constitutional Court of Germany decided that searching and confiscation are not permissible if their main aim is to disclose the identity of the informant⁹⁴ (there will be more details about this judgment in question 7). This decision points out that journalists do not have to disclose information identifying a source, even if they are suspected of having done something that is forbidden.

5.1.5. Principle 5: Conditions Concerning Disclosures

There are several conditions concerning disclosures of information mentioned: first of all only people or public authorities having a direct legitimate interest in the disclosure of information should be allowed to induce it. Secondly before requesting such a disclosure the authorities would have to inform the journalists of their right of non-disclosing a source, but also of the limits that are set to this right. Furthermore, any sanction against a journalist due to the non-disclosure of a source has to be declared within a proceeding in which the journalist has a chance to explain his or her point of view. Article 6 EMRK serves as a rule here, its principles should be followed. Once the sanction is imposed the journalist should have the right to make another judicial authority check the decision.

5.1.6. Principle 6: Interception of Communication, Surveillance and Judicial Search and Seizure

Several measures should not be practiced if they intend to elude the journalistic right not to disclose information identifying a source: Interception or surveillance orders concerning communication of journalists, their employers or any other of their contacts and search or seizure orders in their private or business rooms. Even if information identifying a source has been received in a correct way, the authorities should take measures in order to prevent the use of this information during proceedings. It may only be used if the disclosure of information identifying a source would be justified in accordance to principle 3 of this Recommendation No. R (2000) 7. Therefore one of the cases named under 5.1.3. Would have to be given.

Article 10 EMRK deals with this topic as well: Private or business rooms of journalists may only be searched if there is an outweighing legitimate interest.⁹⁵

⁹⁴ NJW 2007, 1117.

⁹⁵ NJW 2008, 2565.

In Germany the authorities are generally not allowed to confiscate any object that is kept by an editorial office according to §97 paragraph 5 StPO.⁹⁶ This law protects any kind of medium, for example written documents, but also pictures and illustrations. Searching of private or business rooms are in general inadmissible if their aim is to find out anything about the informant.⁹⁷

5.1.7. Principle 7: Protection Against Self-Incrimination

Journalists should be protected from self-incrimination in criminal proceedings, so that they cannot be punished in any way for not disclosing a source.

As it was already mentioned the German law guarantees that every journalist has the right to refuse to testify⁹⁸ in order not to incriminate himself or herself by not disclosing information identifying a source. This right has been confirmed and invigorated by the Federal Constitutional Court.⁹⁹ Like this journalists are protected from being punished due to non-disclosure of information identifying a source. The last principle of the Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 is accordingly realized in the German legislation as well.

5.2. The Procedures Applied

There are some procedures applied in order to protect the journalistic right of non-disclosure of sources and information.

One important point is the fact that Article 5 of the German Constitution guarantees the freedom of the press. Like that journalists have the chance to sue for their rights if they think these rights are not respected. Another protective mechanism is the right to refuse to testify according to §97 paragraph 1 Nr. 5 StPO, which was already mentioned. These rules that have been set by the legislator secure the right of journalists not to disclose their source of information.

5.3. The Limitation of the Possibility to Request Disclosure to Exceptional Circumstances

The authorities' options to force journalists to disclose information identifying a source should be limited to exceptional circumstances. Therefor vital public or individual interests should be taken into consideration in order to define in which case and under which particular ⁹⁶ Compare as well: Löffler, Martin/ Wenzel, Karl Egbert/ Sedelmeier, Klaus (Hrsg.): Presserecht: Kommentar, 6. edition, München 2015, page 1127.

⁹⁷ Compare: Roxin, Klaus/ Schünemann, Bernd: Strafverfahrensrecht: ein Studienbuch, 28. edition, München 2014, §35.

⁹⁸ §53 paragraph 1 Nr. 5 StPO, § 383 paragraph 1 Nr. 5 ZPO and § 102 paragraph I Ziffer 4 AO.

⁹⁹ NJW 1990, 525.

circumstances such a restriction of the journalistic right not to disclose their sources might be allowed.

In Germany journalists generally have the right to refuse to testify according to §53 paragraph 1 no. 5 StPO. Only in exceptional situations a journalist can be forced to disclose his or her source¹⁰⁰, for example if this information is absolutely necessary to illuminate a crime.

The most important principle here is the concept of necessity. In order to decide whether a disclosure is necessary or not, a judge should analyzed several aspects: It has to be found out whether disclosure is truly necessary due to the absence of any less intrusive measure, for example alternative investigative measures that can lead to the same result. Secondly it has to be ascertained that the information that is provided will really be relevant for the case. Furthermore the measures that are taken have to be adequate; their aim should be to reduce any damage and to find a good balance between the interests of all the people involved in the respective case.

The requirements of ordering a disclosure of information according to §53 StPO¹⁰¹ are extremely high: only in very special cases the right to refuse to testify may be restricted. This might happen when the journalist's testimony is necessary to illuminate a crime or when the object of the investigation is something really grave, for example treason or money laundering. Even in these situations journalists are still allowed not to disclose information identifying their informant. Like that authorities can only make a journalist disclose such information under particular circumstances.

It is important to point out that in Germany a judge as part of the judiciary is bound to law and order due to the constitution¹⁰², he or she accordingly has to respect all the rules including §53 StPO. The police and the prosecution, that are criminal authorities as well, are also bound to all the rules. They are part of the executive that is mentioned in Article 20 paragraph 3 GG as well.

5.4. Application of Less Intrusive Measures

Authorities should first search for and apply alternative measures which protect their respective rights and interests in the same way and at the same time are less intrusive concerning the right of journalists not to disclose information.

In Germany the authorities have to first try other things before restricting journalistic rights. §97 paragraph 5 StPO for example, that was already mentioned here, forbids the authorities to confiscate any medium belonging to a journalist's work as long as what he or she is doing is included by the right to refuse to testify.

¹⁰⁰ According to §53 paragraph 2 StPO.

¹⁰¹ Paragraph 1 Nr. 5 guarantees a general right to refuse to testify, in paragraph 2 there are cases mentioned in which a disclosure might though be ordered.

¹⁰² Article 20 paragraph 3 GG.

To conclude, all the seven points of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 are put into practice in the German legislation, which is consequently in line with the principles mentioned and postulated here. There are several protective mechanisms in order to make sure that journalists cannot be forced to disclose information identifying their source. The most important principle is the concept of necessity, which is realized in §53 StPO. Journalists have the right to refuse to testify, which may only be circumvented under very special criteria. The judges (judiciary), the police and the prosecution (both are part of the executive) are bound to this law according to the constitution.

6. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 the Following Principles Should Be Respected When the Necessity of Disclosure is Stated: Absence of Reasonable Alternative Measures, Outweighing Legitimate Interest (Protection of Human Life, prevention of major crime, defense of a person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime). Under which criteria can the interest in the disclosure outweigh the interest in the non-disclosure?

These two main ideas have to be considered: There must not be any other reasonable alternative measure. Accordingly we need a situation in which it is not possible to handle a problem by using a less intrusive measure than forcing a journalist to disclose information identifying his or her source. Secondly there must be an outweighing legitimate interest in the disclosure. The journalistic right not to publish information identifying a source is very important, but there might be a case in which something else is even more important and has to be protected. It is disputable which criteria must be given in order to affirm an outweighing legitimate interest in the disclosure.

In Germany there are situations in which the authorities have more options to make the journalists disclose information identifying their sources. This might happen especially within the topic of inner safety.

6.1. Change of the BKAG (Federal Criminal Police Office Law) in 2009

One important point concerning the journalistic right not to disclose a source is the change of the BKAG, which has taken place a few years ago.

6.1.1. Function of the BKA

The BKA (Federal Criminal Police Office of Germany) is responsible for preventing or illuminating crimes that have an extensive or international meaning. Therefore the BKA collects and analyses information and data in cooperation with the respective law enforcement agency.¹⁰³

6.1.2. Change of the BKAG

In 2009 the BKAG (Federal Criminal Police Office Law) has been significantly changed: Since that point, the BKA is allowed to force journalists to disclose information identifying their source when they think there might be a terroristic danger. Of course the right to refuse to testify in general still exists, but journalists can be punished for not disclosing their source when they are writing about terrorism. Many people, especially those working as journalists, criticized the change of this law as an offence to the freedom of the press.¹⁰⁴

In that case the disclosure of information might help to prevent terrorism, which can be labelled as a major crime, since terrorists usually try to kill people or at least to harm them. The protection of human life is that important, so it possibly outweighs the interest in non-disclosure in certain situations. The outweighing legitimate interest can accordingly be given when a journalist writes about terroristic danger. This is one of the most important points at the moment, since terrorism is currently that present in Europe.

6.2. Case „Cicero“

In general there are certain tensions between safety and freedom, in this special case the freedom of the press.¹⁰⁵ For example in 2005 the editorial offices of the German magazine “Cicero” and the private apartment of one journalist working there were searched after the journalist had quoted from confidential documents of the Federal Criminal Police Office concerning a conjectural terrorist.¹⁰⁶ The police wanted to find out how the journalist got to know about this confidential document. In that case the authorities decided that the public safety was more important than the rights of the journalists affected by this measure.

6.3. Other Crimes for which a Disclosure is Possible

As it was explained in 5.3., there are certain crimes for which a disclosure might be possible. These crimes are listed in §53 paragraph 2 StPO. Some of them are peace betrayal, endangering the democratic rule of law, treason or endangering the exterior safety.¹⁰⁷ All of these crimes can ¹⁰³ Beck'scher Online-Kommentar StPO/Krauß RiStBV Rn. 1.

¹⁰⁴ Hans-Jürger Jakobs: Staat macht Journalisten zu Hilfspolizisten, in: Süddeutsche Zeitung, 17. Mai 2010.

¹⁰⁵ Dieter Kugelmann: Pressefreiheit ohne Informantenschutz?, in: Zeitschrift für Rechtspolitik (ZRP) 2005, 260.

¹⁰⁶ Dieter Kugelmann: Pressefreiheit ohne Informantenschutz?, in: ZRP 2005, 260.

¹⁰⁷ §53 paragraph 2 Nr. 1.

be called major crimes, since their aim is to endanger the inner or exterior safety, that are both vital to a peaceful way of living for the people. Furthermore the prevention of such a crime might in many cases protect human life, which is a very important criteria to justify an outweighing legitimate interest in the disclosure of information.

Another type of crime that might lead to a disclosure is a criminal act against the sexual self-determination of a person.¹⁰⁸ This is a very important individual right, so in such a situation there might be an outweighing legitimate interest in the disclosure as well.

According to §53 paragraph 2 no. 3 StPO money laundering may cause a disclosure as well. In these situations the person usually embezzled very much money, so the public interest in this case is reasonable, since everyone benefits from a state that has enough money to fulfil all the obligations.

Again the concept of necessity is a really important criteria to find out whether a journalist can be forced to disclose information identifying a source or not. Even if there is an outweighing legitimate interest, the authorities still have to think about alternative measures that are less intrusive before they are allowed to order a disclosure. This principle is fixed in §53 paragraph 2 StPO as well.

All in all it can be noticed that the absence of reasonable alternative measures and an outweighing legitimate interest in the disclosure of journalistic sources may be affirmed when there is one of the crimes mentioned in 6.3. that has been committed and that can only be illuminated with this special information. This can be the case within the topics inner and exterior safety, for example when a journalist is writing about a terroristic danger. In some situations the public interest in preventing major crimes and saving lives might outweigh the interest of the journalist in concealing the identity of his informant.

Regarding all the aspects mentioned here the German law is in line with the Recommendation No. R (2000) 7.

7. In the Light of the Case Law of the European Court of Human Rights how Do National Courts Apply the Respective Laws with Regard to the Right to Protect Sources? In Particular, How Do They Balance the Different Interests at Stake?

Journalistic freedom has been a cornerstone of German democracy ever since the creation of the Federal Republic of Germany in 1949. Article 5 of the German constitution (German: Grundgesetz or GG) protects the freedom of information and guarantees the freedom of the press. Furthermore, journalistic sources profit from the protection of the privacy of correspondence, post and telecommunication as guaranteed in Article 10 of the constitution.

¹⁰⁸ According to §53 paragraph 2 Nr.2.

German courts have traditionally upheld the rights of journalists, especially with regards to confidentiality. A case that is very important in the context of this question is the so-called “Cicero judgement”, from the 27th of February of 2007.¹⁰⁹

The facts of the case were as follows: The political magazine CICERO published an article about a prominent terrorist, which included a confidential report by the Federal Criminal Police Office (Bundeskriminalamt or “BKA”). The local state prosecution in Potsdam, where CICERO was based, launched an investigation with regards to “betrayal of secrets” (Gebimmisverrat) according to § 353b of the Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch or StGB). The journalist who wrote the offending article was charged with aiding and abetting in the crime. The local court allowed the newspaper’s offices to be searched and any evidence to be confiscated.

In the CICERO case, the German Federal Supreme Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht or BVerfG) ruled that it is unconstitutional to search or confiscate the property of members of the press in order to obtain information that may identify of their sources.¹¹⁰ According to the Court, any journalist has the right to protect the identity of its source even from their own firm.¹¹¹ Furthermore the BVerfG ruled, that if a source commits a criminal act according to § 353b StGB by revealing confidential information to a journalist, the act of publishing this information does not constitute aiding and abetting according to German Criminal Law.¹¹²

In 2012, the German legislation added the paragraph 3a to § 353b, which ensures that journalists, amongst others, cannot be prosecuted for rendering aid for betrayal of secrets, if the aid is limited to accepting, interpreting and publishing the information in question.

As a result, journalist can now publish confidential information from sources without having to fear prosecution, which also makes it impossible to search or confiscate their property with regards to this information.

109 BVerfG, Urteil v. 27.02.2007, Az. 1 BvR 538/06, 1 BvR 2045/06

110 BVerfG Urteil v. 27.02.2007, Az. 1 BvR 538/06, 1 BvR 2045/06, official Summary

111 BVerfG, Urteil v. 27.02.2007, Az. 1 BvR 538/06, 1 BvR 2045/06, Nr 27

112 BVerfG, Urteil v. 27.02.2007, Az. 1 BvR 538/06, 1 BvR 2045/06, official Summary

8. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information? Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, and foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

Under the German constitution, Article 10 guarantees the privacy of correspondence, post and telecommunication is. However, this privacy can be limited by law. If the limitation of privacy in question is required for the “protection of the democratic order or the preservation of the Federation or one of its States”, invasions into the privacy of an individual can be conducted without the affected person’s knowledge.

Right to Deny Testimony According to § 53 StPO

Journalists enjoy a special protection under German law, which is centred around is the journalist’s right not to give testimony as guaranteed in § 53 StPO. Under this statute, certain professions are not required to give witness in criminal proceedings. The list includes members of parliament, (medical) doctors, clerics as well as defence attorneys and notaries public, amongst others. The special status is owed to the significant public roles these professions have in society, which requires absolute trust in their confidentiality by the public.¹¹³ As a result, their right to confidentiality is generally considered more important than the state’s interest in the establishment of truth.¹¹⁴ With regards to journalists, the special public interest in having a well-functioning, trustworthy press means that the journalists cannot even

It should be noted, that § 53 I No. 5 StPO does not explicitly mention “journalists” as the protected group. Instead, the statute’s effect extends to “all individuals who, as part of their profession, were or are involved in the creation or distribution any forms of media intended for the information of the public.”¹¹⁵ This definition of “creation or distribution” also includes the acquisition of the relevant information as well as journalistic research.¹¹⁶ The right not to give testimony extends to the Name of the informant as well as any facts, which might help with the discovery of his identity.¹¹⁷

113 Ludwig Hennemann, Pressefreiheit und Zeugnisverweigerungsrecht (Dunker &Humboldt, 1978) 97 [German]

114 Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof/ BGH) StB 8/13 - Beschluss vom 18. Februar 2014 (the judgement speaks only of attorneys, however the reference to § 53 StPO also covers journalists and other professions)

115 See § 53 StPO

116 Dr. Jürgen Peter Graf, Beck’scher Online-Kommentar StPO (C.H. Beck, 2016) § 53 StPO Rn. 28 [German]

117 Dr. Jürgen Peter Graf, Beck’scher Online-Kommentar StPO (C.H. Beck, 2016) § 53 StPO Rn. 30 [German]

§ 164 a states that any investigative action by the prosecution is invalid if it targets a person protected by § 53 StPO and it is likely that the investigation will reveal information about which the person would be allowed to refuse testimony. Additionally, all information acquired in this way must immediately be deleted. The fact that this information was acquired must be recorded, as well as the act of deletion.

Apart from these “basic” legal protections, there are more specific statutes regarding electronic surveillance of telecommunications as well as search and seizure operations, respectively:

Electronic Surveillance

Surveillance of telecommunications is regulated according to articles 100a and following of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Strafprozessordnung or StPO). Apart from general requirements for surveillance of telecommunications, the article also contains a comprehensive list of offenses that permit such surveillance.

According to § 100a StPO section I, surveillance is possible, if:

- There is a suspicion that the target of the investigation committed or is planning to commit an offense as stated in the article, or has prepared for one of the listed offenses by committing another offense.
- the criminal act in question is especially severe
- investigating the case or determining the location of the suspect would be impossible otherwise

Section II of the article contains a list of all offenses that qualify for surveillance. These include such crimes as murder and manslaughter, high treason, genocide and crimes against humanity, crimes against sexual self-determination or personal freedom, as well as different forms of organized crime. Additionally, a number of economic crimes, tax avoidance as well as assisting in illegal immigration do qualify for surveillance.

The court may order the surveillance only on written motion by the prosecution. The motion automatically fails if the court does not confirm it within three days. Surveillance may only be ordered for a term of no more than three months, however the deadline can be extended if the results of the surveillance show that original requirements for the decision persist.

All providers of telecommunications must assist the court and the prosecution with the surveillance and supply relevant information. Finally it is stated in § 100a StPO section 3, that all surveillance action according to § 100a StPO must be reported annually to the Federal Office of Justice (Bundesamt für Justiz or BfJ).

The Office is required to publish a list of the number of investigations that were ordered.

Search and Seizure

All articles referring to search and seizure actions against journalists refer back to the wording of § 53 I No. 5. § 97 V StPO prohibits the seizure of all written correspondence and storage devices for data, video, or sound relevant to the prosecution of a criminal case, which are in the possession of a journalist or their respective publishing house or broadcasting company. This protection covers the same objects as the journalist's right to deny testimony.¹¹⁸

It should be noted however, that § 97 V StPO only mentions information in the journalist's personal possession. Data which is stored in any form of online storage medium, such as clouds, is not explicitly protected. In 2012, the then Federal Commissioner for Data Protection and Freedom of Information, Peter Schaar, advised journalists not to store confidential information online.¹¹⁹

The German law provisions are easily accessible, as they can be found within the regular Code of Criminal Procedure.

§ 100a StPO is written in a precise way and the article contains a comprehensive list of all offenses and felonies, which may lead the court to allow a surveillance action. These requirements of § 100a StPO are easy to research even by a layman, with only little introduction to the area of law. Therefore, the likelihood of surveillance action being requested can be recognized. It should be noted, however, that the ultimate decision lies with the overseeing judge, which result in a certain amount of uncertainty. In case the legitimacy of a surveillance action is questionable, it is easy for outside parties to point out any inconsistencies with the law. This ensures that there is little abuse or misinterpretation by the responsible agencies.

§ 97 StPO, which details journalistic protection from search and seizure operations, is slightly more complex, as it includes references to definitions made in other parts of the law. Still, all cases in which an individual journalist may be exempted from this protection are clearly stated in the article. § 160a II clearly states, that the interest of the prosecution will usually lose to the interests of a journalist targeted by possible surveillance, unless the investigation concerns a particularly severe offense. This highlights the special protection afforded to journalist by German law and ensures that few journalists will become the target of criminal investigations.

As a result of these extensive privileges, journalists can rest assured that they are safe from seizure and surveillance unless there is clear evidence of criminal activities.

9. Can Journalists Rely on Encryption and Anonymity Online to Protect Themselves and Their Sources Against Surveillance?

In the conventional world, it is understood that almost all daily activities are done anonymously. In the use of electronic procedures, for example the Internet, this rule is reversed. An activity leaves electronic traces that can be allocated under certain circumstances and with a certain

118 Dr. Jürgen Peter Graf, Beck'scher Online-Kommentar StPO (C.H. Beck, 2016) § 97 StPO Rn. 19 [German]
119 <https://www.taz.de/Unsicherer-Informantenschutz/15068088/> also [https://www.teletrust.de/startseite/pressemeldung/?tx_ttnews\[tt_news\]=564&cHash=4613815145db85ab49f9863ad8204a84](https://www.teletrust.de/startseite/pressemeldung/?tx_ttnews[tt_news]=564&cHash=4613815145db85ab49f9863ad8204a84)

effort. To avoid the loss of informational self-determination, it must be legally and technically possible to leave no mark on the use of electronic procedures, i.e. to act anonymously or pseudonymously.¹²⁰

For this reason journalists cannot rely in general on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance. The current providers offer different types of encryption therefore it is of decisive significance for the journalist to investigate which one of them offers the best encryption for his specific needs. Furthermore they have to differentiate between using an e-mail program and surfing the Internet.

9.1. Internet

Basically, the inventory data, traffic data and content data of internet users are protected by the right to informational self-determination and the telecommunications secrecy under Article 10 I Grundgesetz.¹²¹ Fundamental rights entitled are all individuals and domestic legal persons, who are involved in the writing or using telecommunications mediated communication process.¹²² This fundamental right, however, does not guarantee anonymity on the Internet.

When communicating on the Internet an IP address is automatically passed. This is required so that the user can ever receive the desired website. Normally requests to pages are stored with a time stamp. But not only thereby users are leaving tracks on the Internet. Also by careless behaviour they leave their marks, and with technical tricks much information can be collected through this.

A so-called proxy can conceal the true identity. A user sends a request in this case not directly on the server you want, but to a proxy, the communication then leads to the server. It sends the request, receives the response and then forwards them to the user. The degree of anonymity is different: While a normal Web Proxy Internet provider passes usually only disguises the IP address of the sender and all other information (such as the browser identification), anonymization proxies go considerably further and conceal also other information. A so-called anonymizer may obscure the own steps on the Internet. There are some very fundamentally different approaches and qualities of anonymity.¹²³

120 Heinrich A. Wolff/Stefan Brink, Moritz Karg, Beck'scher Online Kommentar Datenschutzrecht (14th edn, Beck 2016) BDSG Anlage, 44 [German].

121 Wolfgang Kilian/Benno Heussen, Thilo Weichert, Computerrechts-Handbuch (26th edn, Beck 2008) Telekommunikation und Internet, I. 31 [German].

122 Horst Dreier, Georg Hermes, Grundgesetz Kommentar (3 edn, Mohr Siebeck 2013) 1164 [German].

123 Besim Karadeniz, Anonymität im Internet (netplanet, 1998 – 2016) <<http://www.netplanet.org/sicherheit/anonym.shtml>> accessed April 13 2016 [German].

9.2. E-Mail

In Germany there are two different online mailing options. On the one hand the usually used e-mail and on the other hand de-mail. De-mail is a system based on e-mail technology, but with a technically separated communication medium for reliable, confidential, usually detectable communication on the Internet.

There are different protection mechanisms to secure a usually used e-mail, for one thing encryption. Without any protection mechanism an e-mail is less safe than a normal postcard.¹²⁴ It is either possible to encrypt the carriage of an e-mail or the e-mail itself. Nowadays all major email providers usually offer a transport encryption. Thereby the transportation of the e-mail is encrypted.¹²⁵ If this transport is however cracked the content of e-mail is easy to read. Therefore some e-mail providers offer end-to-end-encryption (asymmetric encryption). This method does not depend on the encryption of transportation. Instead the e-mail is encrypted with diverse keys of the sender and recipient. Every user has two different keys, a public and a private key. The private key of the sender and the public key of the recipient encrypt the e-mail. Only the recipient is able to open the e-mail afterwards with his private key. Thereby the email is unusable for others when intercepted on the way.¹²⁶ Yet end-to-end-encryption is merely optional. Furthermore it needs to be installed by the user and is not generally included by the e-mail program.¹²⁷

The legal requirements of the de-mail law provides in accordance with § 5 III a De-Mail-Gesetz (de-mail law) an appropriate transport encryption. However, the state-accredited provider decrypt de-mails in between in order to examine for spam or malware. Thus everybody with an access to the servers of the provider has the possibility to trap those sensitive messages.¹²⁸

Since the aforementioned criticism in the opinion of the Conference of Data Protection Commissioners of the Federation and the Countries regarding the encryption within the communications networks of the federal and state governments' only end-to-end-encryption considers the necessary requirements for the protection of communication.¹²⁹ This suggests that 124 Matthias Bergt, Schutz Personenbezogener Daten bei der E-Mail-Bestätigung von Online Bestellungen in NJW (2011) 3752, 3753 [German].

125 Urs Mansmann, E-Mail-Provider Stellen auf Transportverschlüsselung um (heise online, March 30 2014) <<http://www.heise.de/newsticker/meldung/E-Mail-Provider-stellen-auf-Transportverschlueselung-um-2157950.html>> accessed April 13 2016 [German].

126 Michael Schmidl, IT-Recht von A – Z: Accessprovider bis Zwischenspeicherung (2nd edn, Beck 2014) 23 [German].

127 Mansmann, E-Mail-Provider Stellen auf Transportverschlüsselung um (heise online, March 30 2014) <<http://www.heise.de/newsticker/meldung/E-Mail-Provider-stellen-auf-Transportverschlueselung-um-2157950.html>> accessed April 13 2016 [German].

128 Bergt, Schutz Personenbezogener Daten bei der E-Mail-Bestätigung von Online Bestellungen in NJW (2011) 3752, 3753 [German].

129 Wolff/Brink, Karg, Beck'scher Online Kommentar Datenschutzrecht (14th edn, Beck 2016) BDSG Anlage, l. 45b [German].

for those who want to protect their communication an end-to-end encryption is of great importance.

State authorities may come to the communication data of individuals over the operator under certain requisites. Therefore the right of personal privacy in the telecommunications sector (telecommunications secrecy) needs to be limited. Individual wiretaps must be approved judicially in each individual case, are always limited in time and the recorded data may only be made within the framework of the investigation within the interception measure was notified.¹³⁰

However the legal requirements for data transmission on the Internet are disregarded on masse. Partially will forgo any encryption or unsafe encryption methods are used.¹³¹ Accordingly, users should investigate each provider's encryption technology.

9.3. Conclusion

To conclude, if a journalist does not want to rely on the protection of the Internet in general or any program there is the possibility to anonymise and encrypt appearance and communication on the Internet by himself. However for this thorough knowledge of it is required. Any particular legal framework about anonymity and encryption on the Internet to protect journalists and their sources does not exist in Germany.

In the end it is not possible to simply turn of the risks of the Internet, there is only the possibility to minimize them.¹³² At least police and secret service are not allowed to easy read along. Encryption prohibitions, which enable reading especially for police and secret service were discussed at length in Germany and rejected for good reasons.¹³³

10. Are Whistle-blowers Explicitly Protected Under Law Protecting Journalistic Sources? Is There Another Practice Protecting Whistle-blowers? Is the Legislation Prohibiting Authorities and Companies from Identifying Whistle-blowers?

As understood in Germany whistleblowing is the process of issuing evidence by employees of a company, which point to irregularities in the company or the violation of a code of conduct. The disclosure can be carried out to the public, public authorities, or to the company itself.¹³⁴

130 Karadeniz, Anonymität im Internet (netplanet, 1998 – 2016) <<http://www.netplanet.org/sicherheit/anonym.shtml>> accessed April 13 2016 [German].

131 Bergt, Verschlüsselung nach dem Stand der Technik als rechtliche Verpflichtung in CR (2014) 726, 730 [German].

132 Kilian/Heussen, Weichert, Computerrechts-Handbuch (26th edn, Beck 2008) Grundlagen Datenschutz, Datensicherheit und Kommunikationssicherheit, I. 2 [German].

133 Kilian/Heussen, Weichert, Computerrechts-Handbuch (26th edn, Beck 2008) Systemdatenschutz, I. 9 [German].

¹³⁴ Schmidl, IT-Recht von A – Z: Accessprovider bis Zwischenspeicherung (2nd edn, Beck 2014) 289 [German].

Germany has no specific legislation on protecting whistle-blowers.¹³⁵ Though whistle-blowers are protected by different solution, which are reflected in the law in diverse ways.

10.1. Protection Under Law Protecting Journalistic Sources

There is no law in Germany, which protects whistle-blowers explicitly under law protecting journalistic sources. Nevertheless a whistle-blower's anonymity is protected indirectly by article 5 I 2 Grundgesetz, if they are journalistic sources. Furthermore the journalist has a right to refuse to give evidence referred to § 53 I 1 no. 5 Strafprozessordnung and § 383 I no. 5 Zivilprozessordnung.¹³⁶

10.2. Protection Under Labour Law

The labour law has various regulations. Generally employees and public officers are obligated to good conduct and discretion against their employer. A different behaviour would be contrary to duty. Nevertheless they are exceptionally allowed to contact public authorities in special occasions. Therefore the law or jurisdiction needs exclusion:¹³⁷

- Employees and public officers are allowed to contact the responsible public authorities if their employer does not react sufficiently on the protection of his labours (§ 17 II 1 Arbeitsschutzgesetz (Act on the Implementation of Measures of Occupational));
 - Employees are entitled to report offenses from their professional surroundings as long as they do not raise knowingly or recklessly false allegation;¹³⁸
 - Public officers are only allowed to report offenses against supervisors or collegians if they have attempted all reasonable measures for an internal clarification;¹³⁹
 - Public officers may only call on the media at most serious violations of top legal and constitutional values, or after exhausting all other remedies;¹⁴⁰
 - Whether private workers are allowed to go to the press is still unclear.¹⁴¹
- Labour Law also protects employees and public officers after whistle blowing:

¹³⁵ COM(2014) 38 final Annex 5 (Germany to the EU Anti-Corruption Report) 2014, 4.

¹³⁶ Wolff/Brink, Marie-Theres Tinnefeld/Benedikt Buchner, Beck'scher Online Kommentar Datenschutzrecht, (14th edn, Beck 2016) Medien, I. 36 [German].

¹³⁷ Andrei Király, Whistleblower in Deutschland und Großbritannien – Lehren aus dem Fall Heinisch in RdA (2012) 236, 236 [German]; Király, Der Rechtliche Schutz von Whistleblowern in ZRP (2011) 146, 146 [German].

¹³⁸ BVerfG, Zeugenaussagen Gegen Arbeitgeber Kein Kündigungsgrund in NJW (2001) 3474, 3476 [German].

¹³⁹ BVerwG, Wissentlich Unwahre oder Leichtfertige Erstattung einer Strafanzeige Gegen Vorgesetzten in NJW (2001) 3280, 3280 [German].

¹⁴⁰ BVerfG, Verfassungsmäßigkeit des § 353b StGB; Voraussetzungen des Rechts von Beamten und Öffentlichen Angestellten auf Unterrichtung der Öffentlichkeit über Verfassungswidriges Handeln ihrer Behörde – Fall Pätsch in NJW (1970) 1498, 1501 [German].

¹⁴¹ Király, Der Rechtliche Schutz von Whistleblowern in ZRP (2011) 146, 146 [German].

- Employees are protected by the general ban on disciplinary treatment (Germ.: “Maßregelungsverbot”) in accordance with § 612a Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch. This prohibits discrimination on the basis of a permissible exercise of rights.
- For public officers the duty of care of the employer and disciplinary procedures are relevant. These exclude arbitrary disciplinary measures and retributive personnel decisions. The duty of care is regulated in § 78 Bundesbeamtengesetz (federal public officers law) and § 45 Beamtenstatusgesetz (public officers status law). The disciplinary procedures are regulated in § 45 Bundesdisziplinargesetz (federal disciplinary law) and the various federal state laws.

Nevertheless employees and public officers meet the substantive burden of proof.¹⁴² If the repressions are however cleverly disguised, for instance by advancing plausible reasons for disciplinary procedures or informal retributions are exercised, the protection functionality is virtually ineffective.¹⁴³

10.3. Protection of the Whistle-blowers Identity

To circumvent the restrictive viewing or the modest effectiveness of ban on disciplinary treatments, the whistle-blower can try to conceal his identity in the professional environment. The whistle-blower is most secure when not even the addressee knows his identity. However this may jeopardise the investigation of grievances because the addressee does not trust an unknown informant. Above all feedback options would be missing. Therefore whistle-blowers often disclose their identity and demand confidential treatment.¹⁴⁴ Nevertheless there are some statues protecting the identity of whistle-blowers.

- Authorities may appeal to the whistle-blower confidentiality, since the data protection and confidential information and inspection of files titles of the concerned withdraw regularly. This is settled in § 19 IV 1 no. 1 Bundesdatenschutzgesetz (federal data protection act), § 29 II Verwaltungsverfahrensgesetz (administrative procedure law), § 99 I 2 Verwaltungsgerichtsordnung (administrative court procedures code).¹⁴⁵
- The problem arises when the whistle-blower is about to act as a witness. The witness identity can only be concealed in criminal proceedings, if he is in danger to life, limb or liberty (§ 68 III 1 Strafprozessordnung). Under very restrictive

¹⁴² BAG, Kündigung als Verbot gegen Benachteiligungsverbot in NZA (1988) 18, 19 [German]; BAG, Unwirksamkeit einer Kündigung vor Erfüllung der Wartezeit bei Diskriminierung wegen Herkunftsbedingter Kultureller Überzeugungen in NJOZ (2004) 1258, 1265 [German]; Ferdinand O. Kopp/Wolf-Rüdiger Schenke, Verwaltungsgerichtsordnung Kommentar (16th edn, Beck 2015) § 108 I. 13 [German].

¹⁴³ Király, Der Rechtliche Schutz von Whistleblowern in ZRP (2011) 146, 146 f. [German].

¹⁴⁴ Király, Der Rechtliche Schutz von Whistleblowern in ZRP (2011) 146, 147 [German].

¹⁴⁵ BVerwG, Anspruch auf Benennung des Informanten in NJW (1992) 451, 452 [German]; BVerwG, Informantenschutz im Luftsicherheitsrecht in NVwZ (2010) 1493, 1494 [German]; Király, Der Rechtliche Schutz von Whistleblowern in ZRP (2011) 146, 147 [German].

conditions authorities can also explicitly guarantee sensitivity for this case (§ 158 StPO; guideline on the use of informants and police informers, Appendix D to Richtlinie für das Strafverfahren und das Bußgeldverfahren (Directive for criminal procedures and fines)).¹⁴⁶

- Media can conceal the identity of their informants readily by constantly prior jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court. This comes within the scope of the press and broadcasting freedom from article 5 I 2 Grundgesetz.¹⁴⁷ Furthermore the protection is also procedurally protected by § 383 I Nr. 5 Zivilprozessordnung, §§ 53 I 2, 97 V 1, 100c VI 1 Strafprozessordnung.¹⁴⁸

Still the concealment of the whistle-blowers identity settles his weak legal position only limited.¹⁴⁹

10.4. Protection of Identification from Authorities and Companies

The legislation prohibits authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers only by article 5 I 2 Grundgesetz. However this prohibition relies only to journalistic sources. Therefore authorities and companies are allowed to use other sources, because in Germany there is no specific legislation protecting whistle-blowers in such a case.¹⁵⁰

10.5. Aim of the Politics

On April 30 2014 the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe adopted the Recommendation CM/Rec(2014)7. For this they have developed 29 principles that strengthen the position of whistle-blowers.¹⁵¹ Since most member States of the Council of Europe did not have comprehensive regulations for the protection of whistle-blowers, they want to encourage member States to put in place such regulations. Compared to the meaning of the Recommendation Germany already has an arrangement of various normative, institutional and judicial elements which, together, provide a comprehensive and coherent whole. It is questionable, whether all requirements of the Recommendation are implemented in German law.

- The material scope (principle 1-2) is already protected by the previous implementation of the protection of whistle-blowers into German law.

¹⁴⁶ Király, Der Rechtliche Schutz von Whistleblowern in ZRP (2011) 146, 147 [German].

¹⁴⁷ BVerfG, Spiegel-Teilurteil in NJW (1966) 1603, 1604 ff. [German]; BVerfG Auskunft über Telefonverbindungsdaten von Journalisten an Strafverfolgungsbehörden in NJW (2003) 1787, 1793 [German]; BVerfG, Durchsuchung und Beschlagnahme im Ermittlungsverfahren gegen Presseangehörige – CICERO in NJW (2007) 1117, 1118 [German].

¹⁴⁸ Király, Der Rechtliche Schutz von Whistleblowern in ZRP (2011) 146, 147 [German].

¹⁴⁹ Király, Whistleblower in Deutschland und Großbritannien – Lehren aus dem Fall Heinisch in RdA (2012) 236, 240 [German].

¹⁵⁰ COM(2014) 38 final Annex 5 (Germany to the EU Anti-Corruption Report) 2014, 4.

¹⁵¹ Recommendation CM/Rec(2014)7 adopted by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe (Protection of Whistleblowers) 2014, 6-10.

- The aim of the personal scope (principle 3-6) is that all personal groups are covered by the protection. As it is clear from the protection areas set out above, this is the case. Special rules regarding matters of state do not exist.
- The normative framework (Principle 7-11) should represent a comprehensive approach that helps simplify the reporting and disclosure.
- The principles 12-17 demand a promotion of channels for reporting and disclosure. Clear channels should be put in place for public interest reporting and disclosures and recourse to them should be facilitated through appropriate measures. Internal reporting and analysis of the reports is to be funded. The state has not adopted such a channel. Nonetheless some public authorities and companies voluntarily offer hotlines, websites or ombudsman to their employees. In addition, in Germany there is a whistle blowing system under the name Business Keeper Monitoring System. This system allows the anonymous complaint of maladministration in electronic form. However, only a few federal states use this technology.¹⁵²
- From principle 18 confidentiality is required, which includes the identity as well as it guarantees a due process. This is as shown secured within the opportunity.
- The principles 19-20 regulate acting on reporting and disclosure. There is desired a quick review and editing of the allegations. For internal reporting, the whistleblower shall be informed about the further procedure.
- Protection against retaliation is required by the principles 21-26. That applies to employer's general ban on disciplinary treatment and the duty of care by government agencies (see above).
- The advice, awareness and assessment are demanded by principle 27-29. It is desired that the development of the national framework should be encouraged. Furthermore confidential advice and access to information should be provided, when it comes to a report on a public interest. To ensure this regularly a review by the national authorities should take place. There are no helpdesks in Germany. (Potential) whistle-blower can catch up on their legal status only by lawyers or on Internet sites like <http://www.whistleblower-net.de/>. The extent to which a periodic review of the protection of whistle-blowers takes place is unknown.

Accordingly the implementation of the Recommendation CM/Rec(2014)7 has not been carried out deliberately in Germany. Nevertheless, the regulations are partly consistent with the desired. Not all politicians in Germany are pleased by the legal situation of whistle-blowers. These results from the fact that there were various legislative initiatives announced in Germany, for example of three federal ministries in year 2008¹⁵³, the bundestag fraction DIE LINKE in year 2011¹⁵⁴, ¹⁵² COM(2014) 38 final Annex 5 (Germany to the EU Anti-Corruption Report) 2014, 4-5.

¹⁵³ Committee printed matter 16(10)849 (Proposal for a legally binding nature of the informant protection for workers in the Civil Code) 2008 [Vorschlag für eine gesetzliche Verankerung des Informantenschutzes für Arbeitnehmer im Bürgerlichen Gesetzbuch].

¹⁵⁴ Bundestag printed matter 17/6492 (Proposal) 2011 [Antrag].

the bundestag fraction SPD in year 2012¹⁵⁵ and the bundestag fraction BÜNDNIS 90/DIE GRÜNEN in year 2012¹⁵⁶. However, not even since the Recommendation CM/Rec(2014)7 has been released, nothing was changed in the legal status of whistle-blowers previously.

10.6. Conclusion

Although in Germany there is no law protecting whistle-blowers explicitly under law protecting journalistic sources, there are in the different parts of the German legislative mechanisms to protect them. Compared with the Recommendation CM/Rec(2014)7 and the various German legislative initiatives is still room up to strengthen the protection of whistle-blowers.

¹⁵⁵ Bundestag printed matter 17/8567 (Proposal) 2012 [Antrag].

¹⁵⁶ Bundestag printed matter 17/9782 (Proposal) 2012 [Antrag].

11. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

11.1. Case Law

- BVerfG, Zeugenaussagen Gegen Arbeitgeber Kein Kündigungsgrund in NJW (2001) 3474, 3476 [German].
- BVerwG, Wissentlich Unwahre oder Leichtfertige Erstattung einer Strafanzeige Gegen Vorgesetzten in NJW (2001) 3280
- BVerfG, Verfassungsmäßigkeit des § 353b StGB; Voraussetzungen des Rechts von Beamten und Öffentlichen Angestellten auf Unterrichtung der Öffentlichkeit über Verfassungswidriges Handeln ihrer Behörde – Fall Pätsch in NJW (1970) 1498
- BAG, Kündigung als Verbot gegen Benachteiligungsverbot in NZA (1988) 18
- BAG, Umwirksamkeit einer Kündigung vor Erfüllung der Wartezeit bei Diskriminierung wegen Herkunftsbedingter Kultureller Überzeugungen in NJOZ (2004) 1258
- BVerwG, Anspruch auf Benennung des Informanten in NJW (1992) 451
- BVerwG, Informantenschutz im Luftsicherheitsrecht in NVwZ (2010) 1493
- BVerfG, Spiegel-Teilurteil in NJW (1966) 1603
- BVerfG, Auskunft über Telefonverbindungsdaten von Journalisten an Strafverfolgungsbehörden in NJW (2003) 1787
- BVerfG, Durchsuchung und Beschlagnahme im Ermittlungsverfahren gegen Presseangehörige – CICERO in NJW (2007) 1117

11.2. Books and articles

- Jens Meyer-Ladewig, Europäische Menschenrechtskonvention (3rd edn, CH Beck 2011) EMRK Artikel 10, l. 39
- Otto Teplitzky/Karl-Nikolaus Peifer, Wolfgang B. Schünemann, Großkommentar – Gesetz gegen unlauteren Wettbewerb (2nd edn, De Gryter 2013)
- Dirk Ehlers, Europäische Grundrechte und Grundfreiheiten (3rd edn, De Gryter Lehrbuch 2009)
- ¹Jens Meyer-Ladewig, Europäische Menschenrechtskonvention (3rd edn, CH Beck 2011)
- Gerhard Schricker, Verlagsrecht (3rd edn, CH Beck 2001)
- Volker Epping/ Christian Hillgruber, Franz Schemmer, Beck'scher Online-Kommentar Grundgesetz (27th edn, CH Beck 2015)
- Theodor Maunz/ Günter Dürig, Roman Herzog, Grundgesetz Kommentar (53rd edn, CH Beck 2009)
- Hubert Gersdorf/ Boris P. Paal, Matthias Cornils, Beck'scher Online-Kommentar Informations- und Medienrecht (11th edn, CH Beck 2016)
- NJW 1984, 1741 „Schutz der Redaktionsarbeit durch die Vertraulichkeit der Pressefreiheit“
- Christoph Hauschka/ Klaus Moosmeier/ Thomas Lösler, Corporate Compliance – Handbuch der Haftungsvermeidung in Unternehmen (3rd edn. CH Beck 2016)

- Renate Damm/ Klaus Rehbock, 'Widerruf, Unterlassung und Schadensersatz in den Medien' (3rd edn. CH Beck 2008)
- Kurt Haag/ Geigel, 'Der Haftpflichtprozess mit Einschluss des materiellen Haftpflichtrechts' (27th edn. CH Beck 2015)
- Reinhart Ricker, Johannes Weberling, Handbuch des Presserechts (6th edn, CH Beck 2012)
- Federal Constitutional Court of Germany Report Volume 20 [1962] 176 [German]; Bodo Pieroth, Bernhard Schlink, Thorsten Kingreen, Ralf Poscher, Grundrechte Staatsrecht II (29th edn, CF Müller 2013)
- DJV Guidelines to admission, 2016
- Ricker, Weberling, Handbuch des Presserechts 3.
- Ernst Fricke, Recht für Journalisten: Presse – Rundfunk – Neue Medien (1st edn, UVK Verlagsgesellschaft 2010)
- Benjamin Bröcker; Redaktionsgeheimnis und Quellenschutz in Frankreich und Deutschland
- Schriftenreihe zum internationalen Einheitsrecht und zur Rechtsvergleichung Band 48, (1st edn, Verlag Dr Kovac 2015)
- Fricke, Recht für Journalisten: Presse – Rundfunk – Neue Medien 92
- Brian Valerius, Beck'scher Online Kommentar StGB, (30th edn, Bernd von Heintschel-Heinegg, CH Beck 2015) § 193 I 11
- Carsten Paul Karlsruher Kommentar zur Strafprozessordnung (7th edn, Rolf Hannich, CH Beck 2013)
- Senge Karlsruher, Kommentar zur Strafprozessordnung (7th edn, CH Beck 2013) § 53 StPO
- Compare: Roxin, Klaus/ Schönemann, Bernd: Strafverfahrensrecht: ein Studienbuch, 28. edition, München
- Beck'scher Online-Kommentar StPO/Krauβ RiStBV
- Dieter Kugelmann: Pressefreiheit ohne Informantenschutz?, in: ZRP 2005
- Neue Juristische Wochenschrift, 'Zur Frage der Verfassungsmäßigkeit von Durchsuchungen in Presseräumen' (NJW CH Beck 1966)
- Hubert Gersdorf/ Boris P. Paal, Stefan Söder, 'Beck'scher Online-Kommentar Informations- und Medienrecht' (11th edn, CH Beck 2016)
- Heinrich A. Wolff/Stefan Brink, Moritz Karg, Beck'scher Online Kommentar Datenschutzrecht (14th edn, Beck 2016)
- Wolfgang Kilian/Benno Heussen, Thilo Weichert, Computerrechts-Handbuch (26th edn, Beck 2008)
- Horst Dreier, Georg Hermes, Grundgesetz Kommentar (3 edn, Mohr Siebeck 2013)
- Matthias Bergt, Schutz Personenbezogener Daten bei der E-Mail-Bestätigung von Online Bestellungen in NJW (2011)
- Urs Mansmann, E-Mail-Provider Stellen auf Transportverschlüsselung, 2016
- Michael Schmidl, IT-Recht von A – Z: Accessprovider bis Zwischenspeicherung (2nd edn, Beck 2014)
- Bergt, Verschlüsselung nach dem Stand der Technik als rechtliche Verpflichtung in CR (2014)

- Andrei Király, Whistleblower in Deutschland und Großbritannien – Lehren aus dem Fall Heinisch in RdA (2012)
- Király, Der Rechtliche Schutz von Whistleblowern in ZRP (2011)
- Ferdinand O. Kopp/Wolf-Rüdiger Schenke, Verwaltungsgerichtsordnung Kommentar (16th edn, Beck 2015)
- Roxin, Klaus/ Schünemann, Bernd: Strafverfahrensrecht: ein Studienbuch, 28. edition, München 2014, §35.
- Dieter Kugelmann: Pressefreiheit ohne Informantenschutz?, in: Zeitschrift für Rechtspolitik (ZRP) 2005, 260.
- Heinrich A. Wolff/Stefan Brink, Moritz Karg, Beck'scher Online Kommentar Datenschutzrecht (14th edn, Beck 2016) BDSG Anlage
- Wolfgang Kilian/Benno Heussen, Thilo Weichert, Computerrechts-Handbuch (26th edn, Beck 2008) Telekommunikation und Internet
- Horst Dreier, Georg Hermes, Grundgesetz Kommentar (3 edn, Mohr Siebeck 2013)
- Matthias Bergt, Schutz Personenbezogener Daten bei der E-Mail-Bestätigung von Online Bestellungen in NJW (2011)
- Michael Schmidl, IT-Recht von A – Z: Accessprovider bis Zwischenspeicherung (2nd edn, Beck 2014) 23 [German].
- Mansmann, E-Mail-Provider Stellen auf Transportverschlüsselung um (heise online, March 30 2014) accessed April 13 2016
- Bergt, Schutz Personenbezogener Daten bei der E-Mail-Bestätigung von Online Bestellungen in NJW (2011) 3752, 3753
- Wolff/Brink, Karg, Beck'scher Online Kommentar Datenschutzrecht (14th edn, Beck 2016)
- Karadeniz, Anonymität im Internet (netplanet, 1998 – 2016) accessed April 13 2016
- Bergt, Verschlüsselung nach dem Stand der Technik als rechtliche Verpflichtung in CR (2014)
- Hannes Radthe, ‚Parteiverbote unter dem Grundgesetz und der EMRK‘ (Deutscher Bundestag, Wissenschaftliche Dienste, 02/2013), <<https://www.bundestag.de/blob/193480/e1c02208cc129970754653b8053ac1fc/partei-verbote-data.pdf>> accessed 18 April 2016 [German].
- Udo Branahl/ Patrick Donges, ‚Warum Medien wichtig sind: Funktionen in der Demokratie‘ (Informationen zur politischen Bildung, Massenmedien, 309/2010)
- COM(2014) 38 final Annex 5 (Germany to the EU Anti-Corruption Report) 2014
- Recommendation CM/Rec(2014)7 adopted by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe (Protection of Whistleblowers) 2014
- Committee printed matter 16(10)849 (Proposal for a legally binding nature of the informant protection for workers in the Civil Code) 2008 [Vorschlag für eine gesetzliche Verankerung des Informantenschutzes für Arbeitnehmer im Bürgerlichen Gesetzbuch]
- Bundestag printed matter 17/6492 (Proposal) 2011 [Antrag]
- Bundestag printed matter 17/9782 (Proposal) 2012 [Antrag]

11.3. Internet sources

- Jens Meyer-Ladewig, Europäische Menschenrechtskonvention (3rd edn, CH Beck 2011) EMRK Artikel 10, l. 39 [German].
- Hannes Radthe, Parteiverbote unter dem Grundgesetz und der EMRK (Deutscher Bundestag, Wissenschaftliche Dienste, 02/2013), <<https://www.bundestag.de/blob/193480/e1c02208cc129970754653b8053ac1fc/partei-verbote-data.pdf>> accessed 18 April 2016 [German].
- Otto Teplitzky/Karl-Nikolaus Peifer, Wolfgang B. Schönemann, Großkommentar – Gesetz gegen unlauteren Wettbewerb (2nd edn, De Gryter 2013), Book I, Introduction §§ 1- 13, 65 [German].
- Theodor Maunz/ Günter Dürig, Roman Herzog, Grundgesetz Kommentar (53rd edn, CH Beck 2009) Art. 1 II GG l. 41 [German].
- Dirk Ehlers, Europäische Grundrechte und Grundfreiheiten (3rd edn, De Gryter Lehrbuch 2009) 31 [German].
- Jens Meyer-Ladewig, Europäische Menschenrechtskonvention (3rd edn, CH Beck 2011) EMRK Artikel 10, l. 31 [German].
- Udo Branahl/ Patrick Donges, Warum Medien wichtig sind: Funktionen in der Demokratie (Informationen zur politischen Bildung, Massenmedien, 309/2010)
- <<http://www.bpb.de/izpb/7492/warum-medien-wichtig-sind-funktionen-in-der-demokratie?p=all>> accessed 18 April 2016 [German].
- Volker Epping/ Christian Hillgruber, Franz Schemmer, Beck'scher Online-Kommentar Grundgesetz (27th edn, CH Beck 2015) Art. 5 GG ll. 38-41 [German].
- BVerfGE 85, 1 (13).
- Theodor Maunz/ Günter Dürig, Roman Herzog, Grundgesetz Kommentar (53rd edn, CH Beck 2009) Art. 5 I, II l. 132 [German].
- Hubert Gersdorf/ Boris P. Paal, Matthias Cornils, Beck'scher Online-Kommentar Informations- und Medienrecht (11th edn, CH Beck 2016), Art. 10 EMRK l. 23 [German].
- Neue Juristische Wochenschrift, , Zur Frage der Verfassungsmäßigkeit von Durchsuchungen in Presseräumen' (NJW CH Beck 1966) 1603 [German]
- Hubert Gersdorf/ Boris P. Paal, Stefan Söder, Beck'scher Online-Kommentar Informations- und Medienrecht (11th edn, CH Beck 2016), § 823 BGB l. 111 [German].
- <http://www.bundesverfassungsgericht.de/SharedDocs/Entscheidungen/DE/2016/04/rs20160420_1bvr096609.html> accessed 6th May 2016 [German].
- Hubert Gersdorf/ Boris P. Paal, Stefan Söder, Beck'scher Online-Kommentar Informations- und Medienrecht (11th edn, CH Beck 2016) BGB § 823 BGB l. 220 [German].
- Grenzen der Berichterstattung (Westdeutscher Rundfunk 2016), <http://www1.wdr.de/unternehmen/der-wdr/medienrecht_infotext100.pdf> accessed 18 April 2016 [German].
- Christoph Hauschka/ Klaus Moosmeier/ Thomas Lösler, Corporate Compliance – Handbuch der Haftungsvermeidung in Unternehmen (3rd edn. CH Beck 2016) § 57 Compliance im Presse- und Verlagswesen, § 57 ll. 30 [German].
- Renate Damm/ Klaus Rehbock, Widerruf, Unterlassung und Schadensersatz in den Medien (3rd edn. CH Beck 2008) l. 675 [German].

- Kurt Haag/ Geigel, Der Haftpflichtprozess mit Einschluss des materiellen Haftpflichtrechts (27th edn. CH Beck 2015) l. 67-72 [German].
- NJW 1984, 1741 Schutz der Redaktionsarbeit durch die Vertraulichkeit der Pressefreiheit [German].

12. Table of Provisions

Provisions in native language	Corresponding translation
Art. 2, Grundgesetz Freie Entfaltung der Persönlichkeit, körperliche Unversehrthe (1) Jeder hat das Recht auf die freie Entfaltung seiner Persönlichkeit, soweit er nicht die Rechte anderer verletzt und nicht gegen die verfassungsmäßige Ordnung oder das Sittengesetz verstößt. (2) Jeder hat das Recht auf Leben und körperliche Unversehrtheit. Die Freiheit der Person ist unverletzlich. In diese Rechte darf nur auf Grund eines Gesetzes eingegriffen werden.	Article 2 , German Constitution Personal freedoms (1) Every person shall have the right to free development of his personality insofar as he does not violate the rights of others or offend against the constitutional order or the moral law. (2) Every person shall have the right to life and physical integrity. Freedom of the person shall be inviolable. These rights may be interfered with only pursuant to a law.
Art. 5, Grundgesetz Meinungsfreiheit (1) Jeder hat das Recht, seine Meinung in Wort, Schrift und Bild frei zu äußern und zu verbreiten und sich aus allgemein zugänglichen Quellen ungehindert zu unterrichten. Die Pressefreiheit und die Freiheit der Berichterstattung durch Rundfunk und Film werden gewährleistet.	Art. 5, German Constitution Freedom of expression, arts and sciences (1) Every person shall have the right freely to express and disseminate his opinions in speech, writing and pictures, and to inform himself without hindrance from generally accessible sources. Freedom of the press and freedom of reporting by means of broadcasts and films shall be guaranteed. There shall be

Eine Zensur findet nicht statt. (2) Diese Rechte finden ihre Schranken in den Vorschriften der allgemeinen Gesetze, den gesetzlichen Bestimmungen zum Schutze der Jugend und in dem Recht der persönlichen Ehre. (3) Kunst und Wissenschaft, Forschung und Lehre sind frei. Die Freiheit der Lehre entbindet nicht von der Treue zur Verfassung.	no censorship. (2) These rights shall find their limits in the provisions of general laws, in provisions for the protection of young persons, and in the right to personal honour. (3) Arts and sciences, research and teaching shall be free. The freedom of teaching shall not release any person from allegiance to the constitution.
Artikel 10, Grundgesetz Brief-, Post- und Fernmeldegeheimnis (1) Das Briefgeheimnis sowie das Post- und Fernmeldegeheimnis sind unverletzlich. (2) Beschränkungen dürfen nur auf Grund eines Gesetzes angeordnet werden. Dient die Beschränkung dem Schutze der freiheitlichen demokratischen Grundordnung oder des Bestandes oder der Sicherung des Bundes oder eines Landes, so kann das Gesetz bestimmen, daß sie dem Betroffenen nicht mitgeteilt wird und daß an die Stelle des Rechtsweges die Nachprüfung durch von der Volksvertretung bestellte Organe und Hilfsorgane tritt.	Article 10, German Constitution Privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications (1) The privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications shall be inviolable. (2) Restrictions may be ordered only pursuant to a law. If the restriction serves to protect the free democratic basic order or the existence or security of the Federation or of a Land, the law may provide that the person affected shall not be informed of the restriction and that recourse to the courts shall be replaced by a review of the case by agencies and auxiliary agencies appointed by the legislature.

§ 612a Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch Maßregelungsverbot Der Arbeitgeber darf einen Arbeitnehmer bei einer Vereinbarung oder einer Maßnahme nicht benachteiligen, weil der Arbeitnehmer in zulässiger Weise seine Rechte ausübt.	§ 612a, German Civil Code Prohibition of victimisation The employer may not discriminate against an employee in an agreement or a measure because that employee exercises his rights in a permissible way.
§ 98, Verwaltungsgerichtsordnung Vorschriften über die Beweisaufnahme Soweit dieses Gesetz nicht abweichende Vorschriften enthält, sind auf die Beweisaufnahme §§ 358 bis 444 und 450 bis 494 der Zivilprozeßordnung entsprechend anzuwenden.	§ 98, Code of Administrative Court Procedure Unless this Act contains any derogatory provisions, sections 358 to 444 and 450 to 494 the Code of Civil Procedure shall apply mutatis mutandis to the taking of evidence.
§ 99 Verwaltungsgerichtsordnung (1) Behörden sind zur Vorlage von Urkunden oder Akten, zur Übermittlung elektronischer Dokumente und zu Auskünften verpflichtet. Wenn das Bekanntwerden des Inhalts dieser Urkunden, Akten, elektronischen Dokumente oder dieser Auskünfte dem Wohl des Bundes oder eines Landes Nachteile bereiten würde oder wenn die Vorgänge nach einem Gesetz	§ 99 Code of Administrative Court Procedure (1) Authorities shall be obliged to submit certificates or files, to transmit electronic documents and provide information. If the knowledge of the content of these certificates, files, electronic documents or this information would prove disadvantageous to the interests of the Federation or of a Land, or if the events

oder ihrem Wesen nach geheim gehalten werden müssen, kann die zuständige oberste Aufsichtsbehörde die Vorlage von Urkunden oder Akten, die Übermittlung der elektronischen Dokumente und die Erteilung der Auskünfte verweigern.

(2) Auf Antrag eines Beteiligten stellt das Oberverwaltungsgericht ohne mündliche Verhandlung durch Beschluss fest, ob die Verweigerung der Vorlage der Urkunden oder Akten, der Übermittlung der elektronischen Dokumente oder der Erteilung von Auskünften rechtmäßig ist. Verweigert eine oberste Bundesbehörde die Vorlage, Übermittlung oder Auskunft mit der Begründung, das Bekanntwerden des Inhalts der Urkunden, der Akten, der elektronischen Dokumente oder der Auskünfte würde dem Wohl des Bundes Nachteile bereiten, entscheidet das Bundesverwaltungsgericht; Gleiches gilt, wenn das Bundesverwaltungsgericht nach § 50 für die Hauptsache zuständig ist. Der Antrag ist bei dem für die Hauptsache zuständigen Gericht zu stellen. Dieses gibt den Antrag und die Hauptsacheakten an den nach § 189 zuständigen Spruchkörper ab. Die oberste Aufsichtsbehörde hat die nach Absatz 1 Satz 2 verweigerten Urkunden oder Akten auf Aufforderung dieses Spruchkörpers vorzulegen, die elektronischen Dokumente zu übermitteln oder die verweigerten Auskünfte zu erteilen. Sie ist zu diesem Verfahren beizuladen. Das Verfahren unterliegt den Vorschriften des materiellen Geheimnisses. Können diese nicht eingehalten werden oder macht die zuständige Aufsichtsbehörde geltend, dass besondere Gründe der Geheimhaltung oder des Geheimnisses der Übergabe der Urkunden oder Akten oder der Übermittlung der elektronischen Dokumente an das Gericht entgegenstehen, wird die Vorlage oder Übermittlung nach Satz 5 dadurch bewirkt, dass die Urkunden, Akten oder elektronischen Dokumente dem Gericht must be kept strictly secret in accordance with a statute or due to their essence, the competent supreme supervisory authority may refuse the submission of certificates or files, the transmission of the electronic documents and the provision of information.

(2) On request by a party concerned, the Higher Administrative Court shall find by order without an oral hearing whether the refusal to submit certificates or files, to transmit the electronic documents or to provide information is lawful. If a supreme federal authority refuses the submission, transmission or information on grounds that the interests of the Federation would be impaired were the content of the certificates or files, of the electronic documents and the information to become known, the Federal Administrative Court shall decide; the same shall apply if the Federal Administrative Court has jurisdiction for the main case in accordance with section 50. The application shall be filed with the court which has jurisdiction for the main case. The latter shall assign the application and the main case files to the adjudication bodies with jurisdiction in accordance with section 189. The supreme supervisory authority shall submit the certificates or files refused in accordance with subsection 1, second sentence on request by this panel of judges, transmit the electronic documents or provide the refused information. It shall be subpoenaed to these proceedings. The proceedings shall be subject to the provisions of substantive classification of information. If these cannot be complied with, or if the competent supervisory authority claims that special reasons of confidentiality or classification of information oppose the submission of the certificates or files or the transmission of the electronic documents to the court, the submission or transmission shall be effected in accordance with the fifth sentence by the certificates, files or electronic documents being made available to the court

in von der obersten Aufsichtsbehörde bestimmten Räumlichkeiten zur Verfügung gestellt werden. Für die nach Satz 5 vorgelegten Akten, elektronischen Dokumente und für die gemäß Satz 8 geltend gemachten besonderen Gründe gilt § 100 nicht. Die Mitglieder des Gerichts sind zur Geheimhaltung verpflichtet; die Entscheidungsgründe dürfen Art und Inhalt der geheim gehaltenen Urkunden, Akten, elektronischen Dokumente und Auskünfte nicht erkennen lassen. Für das nichtrichterliche Personal gelten die Regelungen des personellen Geheimschutzes. Soweit nicht das Bundesverwaltungsgericht entschieden hat, kann der Beschluss selbständig mit der Beschwerde angefochten werden. Über die Beschwerde gegen den Beschluss eines Oberverwaltungsgerichts entscheidet das Bundesverwaltungsgericht. Für das Beschwerdeverfahren gelten die Sätze 4 bis 11 sinngemäß.	on premises designated by the supreme supervisory authority. Section 100 shall not apply to the files and electronic documents submitted in accordance with the fifth sentence, and to the special reasons claimed in accordance with the eighth sentence. The members of the court shall be obliged to maintain confidentiality; the grounds for the decision may not provide an indication of the nature and content of the secret certificates, files, documents and information. The regulations of the classification of information for staff shall apply to the non-judicial staff. Unless the Federal Administrative Court has ruled, the order may be independently challenged with a complaint. The Federal Administrative Court shall rule on the complaint against the order of a Higher Administrative Court. The fourth and eleventh sentences shall apply mutatis mutandis to the complaint proceedings.
§ 193, Strafgesetzbuch Wahrnehmung berechtigter Interessen Tadelnde Urteile über wissenschaftliche, künstlerische oder gewerbliche Leistungen, desgleichen Äußerungen, welche zur Ausführung oder Verteidigung von Rechten oder zur Wahrnehmung berechtigter Interessen gemacht werden, sowie Vorhaltungen und Rügen der Vorgesetzten gegen ihre Untergebenen, dienstliche Anzeigen oder Urteile von seiten eines Beamten und ähnliche Fälle sind nur insofern strafbar, als das Vorhandensein einer Beleidigung aus der Form der Äußerung oder	§193. German Criminal Code Fair comment; defence Critical opinions about scientific, artistic or commercial achievements, utterances made in order to exercise or protect rights or to safeguard legitimate interests, as well as remonstrations and reprimands by superiors to their subordinates, official reports or judgments by a civil servant, and similar cases shall only entail liability to the extent that the existence of an insult results from the form of the utterance of the circumstances under

aus den Umständen, unter welchen sie geschah, hervorgeht.	which it was made.
§ 201, Strafgesetzbuch Verletzung der Vertraulichkeit des Wortes (1) Mit Freiheitsstrafe bis zu drei Jahren oder mit Geldstrafe wird bestraft, wer unbefugt 1. das nichtöffentlich gesprochene Wort eines anderen auf einen Tonträger aufnimmt oder 2. eine so hergestellte Aufnahme gebraucht oder einem Dritten zugänglich macht. (2) Ebenso wird bestraft, wer unbefugt 1. das nicht zu seiner Kenntnis bestimmte nichtöffentlich gesprochene Wort eines anderen mit einem Abhörgerät abhört oder	§201, German Criminal Code Violation of the privacy of the spoken word (1) Whosoever unlawfully 1. makes an audio recording of the privately spoken words of another; or 2. uses, or makes a recording thus produced accessible to a third party, shall be liable to imprisonment not exceeding three years or a fine. (2) Whosoever unlawfully 1. overhears with an eavesdropping device the privately spoken words of another not intended for his attention; or

2. das nach Absatz 1 Nr. 1 aufgenommene oder nach Absatz 2 Nr. 1 abgehörte nichtöffentlich gesprochene Wort eines anderen im Wortlaut oder seinem wesentlichen Inhalt nach öffentlich mitteilt. Die Tat nach Satz 1 Nr. 2 ist nur strafbar, wenn die öffentliche Mitteilung geeignet ist, berechnigte Interessen eines anderen zu beeinträchtigen. Sie ist nicht rechtswidrig, wenn die öffentliche Mitteilung zur Wahrnehmung überragender öffentlicher Interessen gemacht wird. (3) Mit Freiheitsstrafe bis zu fünf Jahren oder mit Geldstrafe wird bestraft, wer als Amtsträger oder als für den öffentlichen Dienst besonders Verpflichteter die Vertraulichkeit des Wortes verletzt (Absätze 1 und 2). (4) Der Versuch ist strafbar. (5) Die Tonträger und Abhörgeräte, die der Täter oder Teilnehmer verwendet hat, können eingezogen werden. § 74a ist anzuwenden.	2. publicly communicates, verbatim or the essential content of, the privately spoken words of another recorded pursuant to subsection (1) No 1 above or overheard pursuant to subsection (2) No 1 above. shall incur the same penalty. The offence under the 1st sentence No 2 above, shall only entail liability if the public communication may interfere with the legitimate interests of another. It is not unlawful if the public communication was made for the purpose of safeguarding overriding public interests. (3) Whosoever, as a public official or a person entrusted with special public service functions violates the privacy of the spoken word (subsections (1) and (2) above) shall be liable to imprisonment not exceeding five years or a fine. (4) The attempt shall be punishable. (5) The audio recording media and eavesdropping devices which the principal or secondary participant used may be subject to a deprivation order. Section 74a shall apply.
§ 353b, Strafgesetzbuch Verletzung des Dienstgeheimnisses und einer besonderen Geheimhaltungspflicht	§ 353b, German Criminal Code Breach of official secrets and special duties of confidentiality

(1) Wer ein Geheimnis, das ihm als <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Amtsträger, 2. für den öffentlichen Dienst besonders Verpflichteten oder 3. Person, die Aufgaben oder Befugnisse nach dem Personalvertretungsrecht wahrnimmt, anvertraut worden oder sonst bekanntgeworden ist, unbefugt offenbart und dadurch wichtige öffentliche Interessen gefährdet, wird mit Freiheitsstrafe bis zu fünf Jahren oder mit Geldstrafe bestraft. Hat der Täter durch die Tat fahrlässig wichtige öffentliche Interessen gefährdet, so wird er mit Freiheitsstrafe bis zu einem Jahr oder mit Geldstrafe bestraft.	(1) Whosoever unlawfully discloses a secret which has been confided or become known to him in his capacity as <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. a public official; 2. a person entrusted with special public service functions; or 3. a person who exercises duties or powers under the laws on staff representation and thereby causes a danger to important public interests, shall be liable to imprisonment not exceeding five years or a fine. If by the offence the offender has negligently caused a danger to important public interests he shall be liable to imprisonment not exceeding one year or a fine.
(2) Wer, abgesehen von den Fällen des Absatzes 1, unbefugt einen Gegenstand oder eine Nachricht, zu deren Geheimhaltung er <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. auf Grund des Beschlusses eines Gesetzgebungsorgans des Bundes oder eines Landes oder eines seiner Ausschüsse verpflichtet ist oder 2. von einer anderen amtlichen Stelle unter Hinweis auf die Strafbarkeit der Verletzung der Geheimhaltungspflicht 	(2) Whosoever other than in cases under subsection (1) above unlawfully allows an object or information to come to the attention of another or makes it publicly known <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. which he is obliged to keep secret on the basis of a resolution of a legislative body of the Federation or a state or one of their committees; or 2. which he has been formally put under an obligation to keep secret by another official agency under notice of criminal liability for a violation of the duty of secrecy,

förmlich verpflichtet worden ist, an einen anderen gelangen läßt oder öffentlich bekanntmacht und dadurch wichtige öffentliche Interessen gefährdet, wird mit Freiheitsstrafe bis zu drei Jahren oder mit Geldstrafe bestraft. (3) Der Versuch ist strafbar. (3a) Beihilfehandlungen einer in § 53 Absatz 1 Satz 1 Nummer 5 der Strafprozessordnung genannten Person sind nicht rechtswidrig, wenn sie sich auf die Entgegennahme, Auswertung oder Veröffentlichung des Geheimnisses oder des Gegenstandes oder der Nachricht, zu deren Geheimhaltung eine besondere Verpflichtung besteht, beschränken. (4) Die Tat wird nur mit Ermächtigung verfolgt. Die Ermächtigung wird erteilt 1. von dem Präsidenten des Gesetzgebungsorgans a) in den Fällen des Absatzes 1, wenn dem Täter das Geheimnis während seiner Tätigkeit bei einem oder für ein Gesetzgebungsorgan des Bundes oder eines Landes bekanntgeworden ist, b) in den Fällen des Absatzes 2 Nr. 1;	and thereby causes a danger to important public interests shall be liable to imprisonment not exceeding three years or a fine. (3) The attempt shall be punishable. (3a) Acts of aiding by a person listed under section 53(1) 1st sentence No 5 of the Code of Criminal Procedure shall not be deemed unlawful if they are restricted to the receipt, processing or publication of the secret or of the object or the message in respect of which a special duty of secrecy exists. (4) The offence may only be prosecuted upon authorisation. The authorisation shall be granted 1. by the president of the legislative body (a) in cases under subsection (1) above if the secret became known to the offender during his service in or for a legislative body of the Federation or a state; (b) in cases under subsection (2) No 1 above;
---	---

2. von der obersten Bundesbehörde a) in den Fällen des Absatzes 1, wenn dem Täter das Geheimnis während seiner Tätigkeit sonst bei einer oder für eine Behörde oder bei einer anderen amtlichen Stelle des Bundes oder für eine solche Stelle bekanntgeworden ist, b) in den Fällen des Absatzes 2 Nr. 2, wenn der Täter von einer amtlichen Stelle des Bundes verpflichtet worden ist; 3. von der obersten Landesbehörde in allen übrigen Fällen der Absätze 1 und 2 Nr. 2.	2. by the highest Federal public authority: (a) in cases under subsection (1) above if the secret became known to the offender during his service in or for a public authority or in another official agency of the Federation or for such an agency; (b) in cases under subsection (2) No 2 above if the offender was under put under obligation by an official agency of the Federation; 3. by the highest state public authority in all other cases under subsections (1) and (2) No 2 above.
§ 53 Strafprozessordnung Auskunftsverweigerungsrecht (1) Jeder Zeuge kann die Auskunft auf solche Fragen verweigern, deren Beantwortung ihm selbst oder einem der in § 52 Abs. 1 bezeichneten Angehörigen die Gefahr zuziehen würde, wegen einer Straftat oder	§ 53 Code of Criminal Procedure [Right to Refuse Testimony on Professional Grounds] (1) The following persons may also refuse to testify: 1. clergymen, concerning the information that was entrusted to them or became known to

einer Ordnungswidrigkeit verfolgt zu werden. (2) Der Zeuge ist über sein Recht zur Verweigerung der Auskunft zu belehren.	them in their capacity as spiritual advisers; 2. defence counsel of the accused, concerning the information that was entrusted to them or became known to them in this capacity; 3. attorneys, patent attorneys, notaries, certified public accountants, sworn auditors, tax consultants and tax representatives, doctors, dentists, psychological psychotherapists, psychotherapists specializing in the treatment of children and juveniles, pharmacists and midwives, concerning the information that was entrusted to them or became known to them in this capacity. In this respect other members of a Bar Association shall be deemed to be attorneys; 3a. members or representatives of a recognized counselling agency pursuant to sections 3 and 8 of the Act on Pregnancies in Conflict Situations, concerning the information that was entrusted to them or became known to them in this capacity; 3b. drugs dependency counsellors in a counselling agency recognized or set up by an authority, a body, an institution or a foundation under public law, concerning the information that was entrusted to them or became known to them in this capacity; 4. members of the Federal Parliament, of the Federal Convention, of the European Parliament from the Federal Republic of Germany or of a Land parliament, concerning persons who have confided certain facts to them in their capacity as members of these bodies, or to whom they have confided facts in this particular capacity, as well as concerning the facts themselves; 5. individuals who are or have been professionally involved in the preparation,
---	---

production or dissemination of periodically printed matter, radio broadcasts, film documentaries or in the information and communication services involved in instruction or in the formation of opinion.

The persons named in number 5 of the first sentence may refuse to testify concerning the author or contributor of comments and documents, or concerning any other informant or the information communicated to them in their professional capacity including its content, as well as concerning the content of materials which they have produced themselves and matters which have received their professional attention. This shall apply only insofar as this concerns contributions, documentation, information and materials for the editorial element of their activity, or information and communication services which have been editorially reviewed.

(2) The persons designated in subsection (1), first sentence, numbers 2 to 3b, may not refuse to testify if they have been released from their obligation of secrecy. The right of the persons named in subsection (1), first sentence, number 5, to refuse to testify concerning the content of materials which they have produced themselves and matters which have received their professional attention shall lapse if the testimony is required to assist in clearing up a felony, or if the object of the investigation is

1. a crime against peace and of endangering the democratic state based on the rule of law, or of treason and of endangering external security (sections 80a, 85, 87, 88, 95, also in conjunction with sections 97b, 97a, 98 to 100a of the Criminal Code),

2. a crime against sexual self-determination pursuant to sections 174 to 176 and section

	179 of the Criminal Code, or 3. money-laundering or concealment of unlawfully acquired assets pursuant to section 261 subsections (1) to (4) of the Criminal Code, and an enquiry into the facts and circumstances or an investigation as to the whereabouts of the accused would otherwise offer no prospect of success or be much more difficult. The witness may refuse to testify even in such cases, however, where testimony would result in disclosure of the identity of the author or contributor of comments and documents, or of any other informant, or of the information communicated to him in his professional capacity pursuant to subsection (1), first sentence, number 5, or of the content of such communication.
§ 68 Strafprozessordnung Vernehmung zur Person; Beschränkung von Angaben, Zeugenschutz (1) Die Vernehmung beginnt damit, dass der Zeuge über Vornamen, Nachnamen, Geburtsnamen, Alter, Beruf und Wohnort befragt wird. Ein Zeuge, der Wahrnehmungen in amtlicher Eigenschaft gemacht hat, kann statt des Wohnortes den Dienstort angeben. (2) Einem Zeugen soll zudem gestattet	§ 68 Strafprozessordnung Examination as to Witness' Identity (1) The hearing shall begin with the witness being asked to state his first name, last name, name at birth, age, occupation and place of residence. A witness who has made observations in his official capacity may state his place of work instead of his place of residence. (2) A witness shall furthermore be permitted

werden, statt des Wohnortes seinen Geschäfts- oder Dienstort oder eine andere ladungsfähige Anschrift anzugeben, wenn ein begründeter Anlass zu der Besorgnis besteht, dass durch die Angabe des Wohnortes Rechtsgüter des Zeugen oder einer anderen Person gefährdet werden oder dass auf Zeugen oder eine andere Person in unlauterer Weise eingewirkt werden wird. In der Hauptverhandlung soll der Vorsitzende dem Zeugen bei Vorliegen der Voraussetzungen des Satzes 1 gestatten, seinen Wohnort nicht anzugeben.

(3) Besteht ein begründeter Anlass zu der Besorgnis, dass durch die Offenbarung der Identität oder des Wohn- oder Aufenthaltsortes des Zeugen Leben, Leib oder Freiheit des Zeugen oder einer anderen Person gefährdet wird, so kann ihm gestattet werden, Angaben zur Person nicht oder nur über eine frühere Identität zu machen. Er hat jedoch in der Hauptverhandlung auf Befragen anzugeben, in welcher Eigenschaft ihm die Tatsachen, die er bekundet, bekannt geworden sind.

(4) Liegen Anhaltspunkte dafür vor, dass die Voraussetzungen der Absätze 2 oder 3 vorliegen, ist der Zeuge auf die dort vorgesehenen Befugnisse hinzuweisen. Im Fall des Absatzes 2 soll der Zeuge bei der Benennung einer ladungsfähigen Anschrift unterstützt werden. Die Unterlagen, die die Feststellung des Wohnortes oder der Identität des Zeugen gewährleisten, werden bei der Staatsanwaltschaft verwahrt. Zu den Akten sind sie erst zu nehmen, wenn die Besorgnis der Gefährdung entfällt.

(5) Die Absätze 2 bis 4 gelten auch nach Abschluss der Zeugenvernehmung. Soweit dem Zeugen gestattet wurde, Daten nicht anzugeben, ist bei Auskünften aus und Einsichtnahmen in Akten sicherzustellen, to state his business address or place of work or another address at which documents can be served instead of stating his place of residence if there is well-founded reason to fear that legally protected interests of the witness or of another person might be endangered or that witnesses or another person might be improperly influenced by the witness stating his place of residence. If the conditions set out in the first sentence obtain at the main hearing, the presiding judge shall permit the witness not to state his place of residence.

(3) If there is well-founded reason to fear that revealing the identity or the place of residence or whereabouts of the witness would endanger the witness' or another person's life, limb or liberty, the witness may be permitted not to provide personal identification data or to provide such data only in respect of an earlier identity. However, if so asked at the main hearing, he shall be required to state in what capacity the facts he is indicating became known to him.

(4) If there are sufficient indications that the conditions set out in subsections (2) or (3) obtain, the witness is to be advised of the rights provided thereunder. In the case of subsection (2), the witness shall be assisted in specifying an address at which documents can be served. Documents establishing the witness' place of residence or identity shall be kept by the public prosecution office. They shall only be included in the files when the fear of danger ceases.

(5) Subsections (2) to (4) shall also apply after conclusion of the examination of the witness. Insofar as the witness was permitted not to provide data, it must be ensured in the course of provision of information from or inspection of files that this data is not made known to other persons, unless a danger within the meaning of subsections (2) and (3)

dass diese Daten anderen Personen nicht bekannt werden, es sei denn, dass eine Gefährdung im Sinne der Absätze 2 und 3 ausgeschlossen erscheint.	appears to be ruled out.
§ 97 Strafprozessordnung Beschlagnahmeverbot (1) Der Beschlagnahme unterliegen nicht 1. schriftliche Mitteilungen zwischen dem Beschuldigten und den Personen, die nach § 52 oder § 53 Abs. 1 Satz 1 Nr. 1 bis 3b das Zeugnis verweigern dürfen; 2. Aufzeichnungen, welche die in § 53 Abs. 1 Satz 1 Nr. 1 bis 3b Genannten über die ihnen vom Beschuldigten anvertrauten Mitteilungen oder über andere Umstände gemacht haben, auf die sich das Zeugnisverweigerungsrecht erstreckt; 3. andere Gegenstände einschließlich der ärztlichen Untersuchungsbefunde, auf die sich das Zeugnisverweigerungsrecht der in § 53 Abs. 1 Satz 1 Nr. 1 bis 3b Genannten erstreckt.	§ 97 Strafprozessordnung Objects Not Subject to Seizure (1) The following objects shall not be subject to seizure: 1. written correspondence between the accused and the persons who, according to Section 52 or Section 53 subsection (1), first sentence, numbers 1 to 3b, may refuse to testify; 2. notes made by the persons specified in Section 53 subsection (1), first sentence, numbers 1 to 3b, concerning confidential information entrusted to them by the accused or concerning other circumstances covered by the right of refusal to testify; 3. other objects, including the findings of medical examinations, which are covered by the right of the persons mentioned in Section 53 subsection (1), first sentence, numbers 1 to 3b, to refuse to testify.

(2) Diese Beschränkungen gelten nur, wenn die Gegenstände im Gewahrsam der zur Verweigerung des Zeugnisses Berechtigten sind, es sei denn, es handelt sich um eine elektronische Gesundheitskarte im Sinne des § 291a des Fünften Buches Sozialgesetzbuch. Der Beschlagnahme unterliegen auch nicht Gegenstände, auf die sich das Zeugnisverweigerungsrecht der Ärzte, Zahnärzte, Psychologischen Psychotherapeuten, Kinder- und Jugendlichenpsychotherapeuten, Apotheker und Hebammen erstreckt, wenn sie im Gewahrsam einer Krankenanstalt oder eines Dienstleisters, der für die Genannten personenbezogene Daten erhebt, verarbeitet oder nutzt, sind, sowie Gegenstände, auf die sich das Zeugnisverweigerungsrecht der in § 53 Abs. 1 Satz 1 Nr. 3a und 3b genannten Personen erstreckt, wenn sie im Gewahrsam der in dieser Vorschrift bezeichneten Beratungsstelle sind. Die Beschränkungen der Beschlagnahme gelten nicht, wenn bestimmte Tatsachen den Verdacht begründen, dass die zeugnisverweigerungsberechtigte Person an der Tat oder an einer Datenhehlerei, Begünstigung, Strafvereitelung oder Hehlerei beteiligt ist, oder wenn es sich um Gegenstände handelt, die durch eine Straftat hervorgebracht oder zur Begehung einer Straftat gebraucht oder bestimmt sind oder die aus einer Straftat herrühren. (3) Die Absätze 1 und 2 sind entsprechend anzuwenden, soweit die Hilfspersonen (§ 53a) der in § 53 Abs. 1 Satz 1 Nr. 1 bis 3b Genannten das Zeugnis verweigern dürfen. (4) Soweit das Zeugnisverweigerungsrecht der in § 53 Abs. 1 Satz 1 Nr. 4 genannten Personen reicht, ist die Beschlagnahme von Gegenständen unzulässig. Dieser Beschlagnahmeschutz erstreckt sich auch auf Gegenstände, die von den in § 53 Abs. 1 Satz	(2) These restrictions shall apply only if these objects are in the custody of a person entitled to refuse to testify unless the object concerned is an electronic health card as defined in section 291a of Part Five of the Social Code. Objects covered by the right of physicians, dentists, psychological psychotherapists, psychotherapists specializing in the treatment of children and juveniles, pharmacists and midwives to refuse to testify shall not be subject to seizure either if they are in the custody of a hospital or a service provider which collects, processes or uses personal data for the persons listed, nor shall objects to which the right of the persons mentioned in Section 53 subsection (1), first sentence, numbers 3a and 3b, to refuse to testify extends, be subject to seizure if they are in the custody of the counselling agency referred to in that provision. The restrictions on seizure shall not apply if certain facts substantiate the suspicion that the person entitled to refuse to testify participated in the criminal offence, or in accessoryship after the fact, obstruction of justice or handling stolen goods, or where the objects concerned have been obtained by means of a criminal offence or have been used or are intended for use in perpetrating a criminal offence, or where they emanate from a criminal offence. (3) Insofar as the assistants (Section 53a) of the persons mentioned in Section 53a subsection (1), first sentence, numbers 1 to 3b, have a right to refuse to testify, subsections (1) and (2) shall apply mutatis mutandis. (4) The seizure of objects shall be inadmissible insofar as they are covered by the right of the persons mentioned in Section 53 subsection (1), first sentence, number 4, to refuse to testify. This protection from seizure shall also
---	---

1 Nr. 4 genannten Personen ihren Hilfspersonen (§ 53a) anvertraut sind. Satz 1 gilt entsprechend, soweit die Hilfspersonen (§ 53a) der in § 53 Abs. 1 Satz 1 Nr. 4 genannten Personen das Zeugnis verweigern dürften. (5) Soweit das Zeugnisverweigerungsrecht der in § 53 Abs. 1 Satz 1 Nr. 5 genannten Personen reicht, ist die Beschlagnahme von Schriftstücken, Ton-, Bild- und Datenträgern, Abbildungen und anderen Darstellungen, die sich im Gewahrsam dieser Personen oder der Redaktion, des Verlages, der Druckerei oder der Rundfunkanstalt befinden, unzulässig. Absatz 2 Satz 3 und § 160a Abs. 4 Satz 2 gelten entsprechend, die Beteiligungsregelung in Absatz 2 Satz 3 jedoch nur dann, wenn die bestimmten Tatsachen einen dringenden Verdacht der Beteiligung begründen; die Beschlagnahme ist jedoch auch in diesen Fällen nur zulässig, wenn sie unter Berücksichtigung der Grundrechte aus Artikel 5 Abs. 1 Satz 2 des Grundgesetzes nicht außer Verhältnis zur Bedeutung der Sache steht und die Erforschung des Sachverhaltes oder die Ermittlung des Aufenthaltsortes des Täters auf andere Weise aussichtslos oder wesentlich erschwert wäre.	extend to objects which the persons mentioned in Section 53 subsection (1), first sentence, number 4, have entrusted to their assistants (Section 53a). The first sentence shall apply mutatis mutandis insofar as the assistants (Section 53a) of the persons mentioned in Section 53 subsection (1), first sentence, number 4, have a right to refuse to testify. (5) The seizure of documents, sound, image and data media, illustrations and other images in the custody of persons referred to in Section 53 subsection (1), first sentence, number 5, or of the editorial office, the publishing house, the printing works or the broadcasting company, shall be inadmissible insofar as they are covered by the right of such persons to refuse to testify. Subsection (2), third sentence, and Section 160a subsection (4), second sentence, shall apply mutatis mutandis, the participation provision of subsection (2), third sentence, however, only where the particular facts substantiate strong suspicion of participation; in these cases, too, seizure shall only be admissible, however, where it is not disproportionate to the importance of the case having regard to the basic rights arising out of Article 5 paragraph (1), second sentence, of the Basic Law, and the investigation of the factual circumstances or the establishment of the whereabouts of the perpetrator would otherwise offer no prospect of success or be much more difficult.
§ 100c Strafprozessordnung Akustische Wohnraumüberwachung	§ 100c Strafprozessordnung Measures Implemented Without the Knowledge of the Person Concerned

(1) Auch ohne Wissen der Betroffenen darf das in einer Wohnung nichtöffentlich gesprochene Wort mit technischen Mitteln abgehört und aufgezeichnet werden, wenn <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. bestimmte Tatsachen den Verdacht begründen, dass jemand als Täter oder Teilnehmer eine in Absatz 2 bezeichnete besonders schwere Straftat begangen oder in Fällen, in denen der Versuch strafbar ist, zu begehen versucht hat, 2. die Tat auch im Einzelfall besonders schwer wiegt, 3. auf Grund tatsächlicher Anhaltspunkte anzunehmen ist, dass durch die Überwachung Äußerungen des Beschuldigten erfasst werden, die für die Erforschung des Sachverhalts oder die Ermittlung des Aufenthaltsortes eines Mitbeschuldigten von Bedeutung sind, und 4. die Erforschung des Sachverhalts oder die Ermittlung des Aufenthaltsortes eines Mitbeschuldigten auf andere Weise unverhältnismäßig erschwert oder aussichtslos wäre. (2) Besonders schwere Straftaten im Sinne des Absatzes 1 Nr. 1 sind:	(1) Private speech on private premises may be intercepted and recorded using technical means also without the knowledge of the person concerned if <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. certain facts give rise to the suspicion that a person, either as perpetrator or as inciter or accessory, has committed a particularly serious criminal offence referred to in subsection (2) or, in cases where there is criminal liability for attempt, has attempted to commit such an offence; and 2. the offence is one of particular gravity in the individual case as well; and 3. on the basis of factual indications it may be assumed that the surveillance will result in the recording of statements by the accused which would be of significance in establishing the facts or determining the whereabouts of a co-accused; and 4. other means of establishing the facts or determining a co-accused's whereabouts would be disproportionately more difficult or offer no prospect of success. (2) Particularly serious criminal offences for the purposes of subsection (1), number 1, shall be:
--	---

1. aus dem Strafgesetzbuch: a) Straftaten des Friedensverrats, des Hochverrats und der Gefährdung des demokratischen Rechtsstaates sowie des Landesverrats und der Gefährdung der äußeren Sicherheit nach den §§ 80, 81, 82, 89a, 89c Absatz 1 bis 4, nach den §§ 94, 95 Abs. 3 und § 96 Abs. 1, jeweils auch in Verbindung mit § 97b, sowie nach den §§ 97a, 98 Abs. 1 Satz 2, § 99 Abs. 2 und den §§ 100, 100a Abs. 4, b) Bildung krimineller Vereinigungen nach § 129 Abs. 1 in Verbindung mit Abs. 4 Halbsatz 2 und Bildung terroristischer Vereinigungen nach § 129a Abs. 1, 2, 4, 5 Satz 1 Alternative 1, jeweils auch in Verbindung mit § 129b Abs. 1, c) Geld- und Wertzeichenfälschung nach den §§ 146 und 151, jeweils auch in Verbindung mit § 152, sowie nach § 152a Abs. 3 und § 152b Abs. 1 bis 4, d) Straftaten gegen die sexuelle Selbstbestimmung in den Fällen des § 176a Abs. 2 Nr. 2 oder Abs. 3, § 177 Abs. 2 Nr. 2 oder § 179 Abs. 5 Nr. 2,	1. pursuant to the Criminal Code: a) crimes against peace, high treason, endangering the democratic state based on the rule of law, treason, and endangering external security pursuant to sections 80, 81, 82, 89a, pursuant to section 94, section 95 subsection (3) and section 96 subsection (1), in each case also in conjunction with section 97b, as well as pursuant to section 97a, section 98 subsection (1), second sentence, section 99 subsection (2), section 100 and section 100a subsection (4); b) formation of criminal groups pursuant to section 129 subsection (1) in conjunction with subsection (4), second part of the sentence, and formation of terrorist groups pursuant to section 129a subsections (1), (2), (4) and subsection (5) first sentence, first alternative, in each case also in conjunction with section 129b subsection (1); c) counterfeiting money and official stamps pursuant to sections 146 and 151, in each case also in conjunction with section 152, as well as pursuant to section 152a subsection (3) and section 152b subsections (1) to (4); d) crimes against sexual self-determination in the cases referred to in section 176a subsection (2), number 2, or subsection (3), section 177 subsection (2), number 2, or section 179 subsection (5), number 2;
---	---

e) Verbreitung, Erwerb und Besitz kinderpornografischer Schriften in den Fällen des § 184b Absatz 2, f) Mord und Totschlag nach den §§ 211, 212, g) Straftaten gegen die persönliche Freiheit in den Fällen der §§ 234, 234a Abs. 1, 2, §§ 239a, 239b und Menschenhandel zum Zweck der sexuellen Ausbeutung und zum Zweck der Ausbeutung der Arbeitskraft nach § 232 Abs. 3, Abs. 4 oder Abs. 5, § 233 Abs. 3, jeweils soweit es sich um Verbrechen handelt, h) Bandendiebstahl nach § 244 Abs. 1 Nr. 2 und schwerer Bandendiebstahl nach § 244a, i) schwerer Raub und Raub mit Todesfolge nach § 250 Abs. 1 oder Abs. 2, § 251, j) räuberische Erpressung nach § 255 und besonders schwerer Fall einer Erpressung nach § 253 unter den in § 253 Abs. 4 Satz 2 genannten Voraussetzungen,	e) distribution, acquisition and possession of pornographic writings involving children in the cases referred to in section 184b subsection (3); f) murder and manslaughter pursuant to sections 211 and 212; g) crimes against personal liberty pursuant to section 234, section 234a subsections (1) and (2), sections 239a and 239b, and trafficking in human beings for the purpose of sexual exploitation and for the purpose of exploitation of labour pursuant to section 232 subsection (3), subsection (4) or subsection (5), section 233 subsection (3), in each case to the extent that it concerns a felony; h) gang theft pursuant to section 244 subsection (1), number 2, and aggravated gang theft pursuant to section 244a; i) aggravated robbery and robbery resulting in death pursuant to section 250 subsection (1) or subsection (2), section 251; j) extortion resembling robbery pursuant to section 255 and a particularly serious case of extortion pursuant to section 253 under the conditions set out in section 253 subsection (4), second sentence; k) commercial handling of stolen goods or gang handling of stolen goods or commercial
--	---

k) gewerbsmäßige Hehlerei, Bandenhehlerei und gewerbsmäßige Bandenhehlerei nach den §§ 260, 260a, l) besonders schwerer Fall der Geldwäsche, Verschleierung unrechtmäßig erlangter Vermögenswerte nach § 261 unter den in § 261 Abs. 4 Satz 2 genannten Voraussetzungen, beruht die Strafbarkeit darauf, dass die Strafflosigkeit nach § 261 Absatz 9 Satz 2 gemäß § 261 Absatz 9 Satz 3 ausgeschlossen ist, jedoch nur dann, wenn der Gegenstand aus einer der in den Nummern 1 bis 7 genannten besonders schweren Straftaten herrührt, m) besonders schwerer Fall der Bestechlichkeit und Bestechung nach § 335 Abs. 1 unter den in § 335 Abs. 2 Nr. 1 bis 3 genannten Voraussetzungen, 2. aus dem Asylgesetz: a) Verleitung zur missbräuchlichen Asylantragstellung nach § 84 Abs. 3, b) gewerbs- und bandenmäßige Verleitung zur missbräuchlichen	gang handling of stolen goods pursuant to sections 260 and 260a; l) a particularly serious case of money laundering or concealment of unlawfully acquired assets pursuant to section 261 under the conditions set out in section 261 subsection (4), second sentence; m) a particularly serious case of taking and offering bribes pursuant to section 335 subsection (1) under the conditions set out in section 335 subsection (2), numbers 1 to 3; 2. pursuant to the Asylum Procedure Act: a) inducing an abusive application for asylum pursuant to section 84 subsection (3); b) commercial or gang inducement of an abusive application for asylum pursuant to section 84a subsection (1);
--	---

Asylantragstellung nach § 84a Abs. 1, 3. aus dem Aufenthaltsgesetz: a) Einschleusen von Ausländern nach § 26 Abs. 2, b) Einschleusen mit Todesfolge oder gewerbs- und bandenmäßiges Einschleusen nach § 27, 4. aus dem Betäubungsmittelgesetz: a) besonders schwerer Fall einer Straftat nach § 29 Abs. 1 Satz 1 Nr. 1, 5, 6, 10, 11 oder 13, Abs. 3 unter der in § 29 Abs. 3 Satz 2 Nr. 1 genannten Voraussetzung, b) eine Straftat nach den §§ 29a, 30 Abs. 1 Nr. 1, 2, 4, § 30a, 5. aus dem Gesetz über die Kontrolle von Kriegswaffen: a) eine Straftat nach § 19 Abs. 2 oder § 20 Abs. 1, jeweils auch in Verbindung mit § 21,	3. pursuant to the Residence Act: a) smuggling of aliens pursuant to section 96 subsection (2); b) smuggling resulting in death and commercial and gang smuggling pursuant to section 97; 4. pursuant to the Narcotics Act: a) a particularly serious case of a criminal offence pursuant to section 29 subsection (1), first sentence, numbers 1, 5, 6, 10, 11 or 13, subsection (3) subject to the requirements of section 29 subsection (3), second sentence, number 1; b) a criminal offence pursuant to section 29a, section 30 subsection (1), numbers 1, 2, and 4, or section 30a; 5. pursuant to the War Weapons Control Act: a) a criminal offence pursuant to section 19 subsection (2), or to section 20 subsection (1), in each case also in conjunction with section 21;
--	---

b) besonders schwerer Fall einer Straftat nach § 22a Abs. 1 in Verbindung mit Abs. 2, 6. aus dem Völkerstrafgesetzbuch: a) Völkermord nach § 6, b) Verbrechen gegen die Menschlichkeit nach § 7, c) Kriegsverbrechen nach den §§ 8 bis 12, 7. aus dem Waffengesetz: a) besonders schwerer Fall einer Straftat nach § 51 Abs. 1 in Verbindung mit Abs. 2, b) besonders schwerer Fall einer Straftat nach § 52 Abs. 1 Nr. 1 in Verbindung mit Abs. 5. (3) Die Maßnahme darf sich nur gegen den Beschuldigten richten und nur in Wohnungen des Beschuldigten durchgeführt werden. In Wohnungen anderer Personen ist die	b) a particularly serious case of a criminal offence pursuant to section 22a subsection (1) in conjunction with subsection (2); 6. pursuant to the Code of Crimes against International Law: a) genocide pursuant to section 6; b) crimes against humanity pursuant to section 7; c) war crimes pursuant to sections 8 to 12; 7. pursuant to the Weapons Act: a) a particularly serious case of a criminal offence pursuant to section 51 subsection (1) in conjunction with subsection (2); b) a particularly serious case of a criminal offence pursuant to section 52 subsection (1), number 1, in conjunction with subsection (5). (3) The measure may be directed only against the accused and may be implemented only on the private premises of the accused. The measure shall be admissible on the private
---	---

Maßnahme nur zulässig, wenn auf Grund bestimmter Tatsachen anzunehmen ist, dass <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. der in der Anordnung nach § 100d Abs. 2 bezeichnete Beschuldigte sich dort aufhält und 2. die Maßnahme in Wohnungen des Beschuldigten allein nicht zur Erforschung des Sachverhalts oder zur Ermittlung des Aufenthaltsortes eines Mitbeschuldigten führen wird. Die Maßnahme darf auch durchgeführt werden, wenn andere Personen unvermeidbar betroffen werden. (4) Die Maßnahme darf nur angeordnet werden, soweit auf Grund tatsächlicher Anhaltspunkte, insbesondere zu der Art der zu überwachenden Räumlichkeiten und dem Verhältnis der zu überwachenden Personen zueinander, anzunehmen ist, dass durch die Überwachung Äußerungen, die dem Kernbereich privater Lebensgestaltung zuzurechnen sind, nicht erfasst werden. Gespräche in Betriebs- oder Geschäftsräumen sind in der Regel nicht dem Kernbereich privater Lebensgestaltung zuzurechnen. Das Gleiche gilt für Gespräche über begangene Straftaten und Äußerungen, mittels derer Straftaten begangen werden. (5) Das Abhören und Aufzeichnen ist unverzüglich zu unterbrechen, soweit sich während der Überwachung Anhaltspunkte dafür ergeben, dass Äußerungen, die dem Kernbereich privater Lebensgestaltung zuzurechnen sind, erfasst werden.	premises of other persons only if it can be assumed on the basis of certain facts that <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. the accused named in the order pursuant to Section 100d subsection (2) is present on those premises; and that 2. applying the measure on the accused's premises alone will not lead to the establishment of the facts or the determination of a co-accused person's whereabouts. The measures may be implemented even if they unavoidably affect third persons. (4) The measure may be ordered only if on the basis of factual indications, in particular concerning the type of premises to be kept under surveillance and the relationship between the persons to be kept under surveillance, it may be assumed that statements concerning the core area of the private conduct of life will not be covered by the surveillance. Conversations on operational or commercial premises are not generally to be considered part of the core area of the private conduct of life. The same shall apply to conversations concerning criminal offences which have been committed and statements by means of which a criminal offence is committed. (5) The interception and recording is to be interrupted without delay if during the surveillance indications arise that statements concerning the core area of the private conduct of life are being recorded. Recordings of such statements are to be deleted without
---	--

Aufzeichnungen über solche Äußerungen sind unverzüglich zu löschen. Erkenntnisse über solche Äußerungen dürfen nicht verwertet werden. Die Tatsache der Erfassung der Daten und ihrer Löschung ist zu dokumentieren. Ist eine Maßnahme nach Satz 1 unterbrochen worden, so darf sie unter den in Absatz 4 genannten Voraussetzungen fortgeführt werden. Im Zweifel ist über die Unterbrechung oder Fortführung der Maßnahme unverzüglich eine Entscheidung des Gerichts herbeizuführen; § 100d Abs. 4 gilt entsprechend. (6) In den Fällen des § 53 ist eine Maßnahme nach Absatz 1 unzulässig; ergibt sich während oder nach Durchführung der Maßnahme, dass ein Fall des § 53 vorliegt, gilt Absatz 5 Satz 2 bis 4 entsprechend. In den Fällen der §§ 52 und 53a dürfen aus einer Maßnahme nach Absatz 1 gewonnene Erkenntnisse nur verwertet werden, wenn dies unter Berücksichtigung der Bedeutung des zugrunde liegenden Vertrauensverhältnisses nicht außer Verhältnis zum Interesse an der Erforschung des Sachverhalts oder der Ermittlung des Aufenthaltsortes eines Beschuldigten steht. § 160a Abs. 4 gilt entsprechend. (7) Soweit ein Verwertungsverbot nach Absatz 5 in Betracht kommt, hat die Staatsanwaltschaft unverzüglich eine Entscheidung des anordnenden Gerichts über die Verwertbarkeit der erlangten Erkenntnisse herbeizuführen. Soweit das Gericht eine Verwertbarkeit verneint, ist dies für das weitere Verfahren bindend.	delay. Information acquired by means of such statements may not be used. The fact that the data was obtained and deleted is to be documented. If a measure pursuant to the first sentence has been interrupted, it may be re-continued subject to the conditions set out in subsection (4). If in doubt, a court decision on the interruption or continuation of the measures should be sought without delay; Section 100d subsection (4) shall apply mutatis mutandis. (6) In the cases referred to in Section 53 a measure pursuant to subsection (1) shall be inadmissible; if during or after implementation of the measure it becomes apparent that a case referred to in Section 53 is applicable, subsection (5), second to fourth sentences, shall apply mutatis mutandis. In the cases referred to in Sections 52 and 53a, information acquired through a measure pursuant to subsection (1) may only be used if, taking into consideration the significance of the underlying relationship of trust, this is not disproportionate to the interest in establishing the facts or determining the whereabouts of an accused person. Section 160a subsection (4) shall apply mutatis mutandis. (7) Insofar as a prohibition on use pursuant to subsection (5) is conceivable, the public prosecution office shall obtain a decision without delay from the court which made the order, as to whether the information acquired may be used. Insofar as the court does not approve such use, the decision shall be binding for the further proceedings.
§ 158 Strafprozessordnung	§ 158 Strafprozessordnung

Strafanzeige; Strafantrag	Criminal Informations; Applications for Prosecution
(1) Die Anzeige einer Straftat und der Strafantrag können bei der Staatsanwaltschaft, den Behörden und Beamten des Polizeidienstes und den Amtsgerichten mündlich oder schriftlich angebracht werden. Die mündliche Anzeige ist zu beurkunden. Dem Verletzten ist auf Antrag der Eingang seiner Anzeige schriftlich zu bestätigen. Die Bestätigung soll eine kurze Zusammenfassung der Angaben des Verletzten zu Tatzeit, Tatort und angezeigter Tat enthalten. Die Bestätigung kann versagt werden, soweit der Untersuchungszweck, auch in einem anderen Strafverfahren, gefährdet erscheint. (2) Bei Straftaten, deren Verfolgung nur auf Antrag eintritt, muß der Antrag bei einem Gericht oder der Staatsanwaltschaft schriftlich oder zu Protokoll, bei einer anderen Behörde schriftlich angebracht werden. (3) Zeigt ein im Inland wohnhafter Verletzter eine in einem anderen Mitgliedstaat der Europäischen Union begangene Straftat an, so übermittelt die Staatsanwaltschaft die Anzeige auf Antrag des Verletzten an die zuständige Strafverfolgungsbehörde des anderen Mitgliedstaats, wenn für die Tat das deutsche Strafrecht nicht gilt oder von der Verfolgung der Tat nach § 153c Absatz 1 Satz 1 Nummer 1, auch in Verbindung mit § 153f, abgesehen wird. Von der Übermittlung kann abgesehen werden, wenn	(1) Information of a criminal offence or an application for criminal prosecution may be filed orally or in writing with the public prosecution office, with authorities and officials in the police force, and with the Local Courts. An oral information shall be recorded in writing. (2) In the case of criminal offences which may be prosecuted only upon application, the application shall be made in writing or orally for the record to a court or to the public prosecution office; where the application is made to another authority, it shall be made in writing. (3) If an aggrieved person resident in Germany files information of a criminal offence committed in another Member State of the European Union, the public prosecution office shall, upon the application of the aggrieved person, transmit the information to the competent criminal prosecuting authority of the other Member State if the offence is not subject to German criminal law or if prosecution of the offence is dispensed with pursuant to Section 153c subsection (1), first sentence, number 1, also in conjunction with Section 153f. Transmission may be dispensed with if

1. die Tat und die für ihre Verfolgung wesentlichen Umstände der zuständigen ausländischen Behörde bereits bekannt sind oder 2. der Unrechtsgehalt der Tat gering ist und der verletzten Person die Anzeige im Ausland möglich gewesen wäre. (4) Ist der Verletzte der deutschen Sprache nicht mächtig, erhält er die notwendige Hilfe bei der Verständigung, um die Anzeige in einer ihm verständlichen Sprache anzubringen. Die schriftliche Anzeigebestätigung nach Absatz 1 Satz 3 und 4 ist dem Verletzten in diesen Fällen auf Antrag in eine ihm verständliche Sprache zu übersetzen; Absatz 1 Satz 5 bleibt unberührt.	1. the offence and the circumstances of relevance for its prosecution are already known to the competent foreign authority or 2. the injustice done through the offence is minimal and it would have been possible for the aggrieved person to file the information abroad.
§ 160a, Strafprozessordnung Maßnahmen bei zeugnisverweigerungsberechtigten Berufsheimnisträgern (1) Eine Ermittlungsmaßnahme, die sich gegen eine in § 53 Absatz 1 Satz 1 Nummer 1, 2 oder Nummer 4 genannte Person, einen Rechtsanwalt, eine nach § 206 der Bundesrechtsanwaltsordnung in eine Rechtsanwaltskammer aufgenommene Person oder einen Kammerrechtsbeistand richtet und voraussichtlich Erkenntnisse erbringen würde, über die diese das Zeugnis verweigern	§ 160 a, German Criminal Code Procedure Investigation Measures Where Person Has Right to Refuse Testimony (1) An investigation measure directed at a person named in Section 53 subsection (1), first sentence, numbers 1, 2 or 4, an attorney, a person who has been admitted to a Bar Association pursuant to section 206 of the Federal Regulations for Practising Lawyers or a non-attorney provider of legal services who has been admitted to a Bar Association shall be inadmissible if it is expected to produce

dürfte, ist unzulässig. Dennoch erlangte Erkenntnisse dürfen nicht verwendet werden. Aufzeichnungen hierüber sind unverzüglich zu löschen. Die Tatsache ihrer Erlangung und der Löschung der Aufzeichnungen ist aktenkundig zu machen. Die Sätze 2 bis 4 gelten entsprechend, wenn durch eine Ermittlungsmaßnahme, die sich nicht gegen eine in Satz 1 in Bezug genommene Person richtet, von dieser Person Erkenntnisse erlangt werden, über die sie das Zeugnis verweigern dürfte.

(2) Soweit durch eine Ermittlungsmaßnahme eine in § 53 Abs. 1 Satz 1 Nr. 3 bis 3b oder Nr. 5 genannte Person betroffen wäre und dadurch voraussichtlich Erkenntnisse erlangt würden, über die diese Person das Zeugnis verweigern dürfte, ist dies im Rahmen der Prüfung der Verhältnismäßigkeit besonders zu berücksichtigen; betrifft das Verfahren keine Straftat von erheblicher Bedeutung, ist in der Regel nicht von einem Überwiegen des Strafverfolgungsinteresses auszugehen. Soweit geboten, ist die Maßnahme zu unterlassen oder, soweit dies nach der Art der Maßnahme möglich ist, zu beschränken. Für die Verwertung von Erkenntnissen zu Beweis Zwecken gilt Satz 1 entsprechend. Die Sätze 1 bis 3 gelten nicht für Rechtsanwälte, nach § 206 der Bundesrechtsanwaltsordnung in eine Rechtsanwaltskammer aufgenommene Personen und Kammerrechtsbeistände.

(3) Die Absätze 1 und 2 sind entsprechend anzuwenden, soweit die in § 53a Genannten das Zeugnis verweigern dürften.

(4) Die Absätze 1 bis 3 sind nicht anzuwenden, wenn bestimmte Tatsachen den information in respect of which such person would have the right to refuse to testify. Any information which is obtained nonetheless may not be used. Any recording of such information is to be deleted without delay. The fact that the information was obtained and deleted shall be documented. Where information about a person referred to in the first sentence is obtained through an investigation measure that is not aimed at such person and in respect of which such person may refuse to testify, the second to fourth sentences shall apply mutatis mutandis.

(2) Insofar as a person named in Section 53 subsection (1), first sentence, numbers 3 to 3b or number 5, might be affected by an investigation measure and it is to be expected that information would thereby be obtained in respect of which the person would have the right to refuse to testify, this shall be given particular consideration in the context of examining proportionality; if the proceedings do not concern a criminal offence of substantial importance, then, in principle, no overriding interest in prosecuting the criminal offence should be presumed. Insofar as is expedient, the measure should be dispensed with or, to the extent possible for this type of measure, restricted. The first sentence shall apply mutatis mutandis to the use of information for evidential purposes. The first to third sentences shall not apply to attorneys, persons who have been admitted to a Bar Association pursuant to section 206 of the Federal Regulations for Practising Lawyers and non-attorney providers of legal services who have been admitted to a Bar Association.

(3) Subsections (1) and (2) are to be applied mutatis mutandis, insofar as the persons named in Section 53a would have the right to refuse to testify.

(4) Subsections (1) to (3) shall not apply where

Verdacht begründen, dass die zeugnisverweigerungsberechtigte Person an der Tat oder an einer Datenhehlerei, Begünstigung, Strafvereitelung oder Hehlerei beteiligt ist. Ist die Tat nur auf Antrag oder nur mit Ermächtigung verfolgbar, ist Satz 1 in den Fällen des § 53 Abs. 1 Satz 1 Nr. 5 anzuwenden, sobald und soweit der Strafantrag gestellt oder die Ermächtigung erteilt ist. (5) Die §§ 97, 100c Absatz 6 und § 100g Absatz 4 bleiben unberührt.	certain facts substantiate the suspicion that the person who is entitled to refuse to testify participated in the offence or in accessoryship after the fact, obstruction of justice or handling stolen goods. If the offence may only be prosecuted upon application or with authorization, the first sentence shall apply in the cases referred to in Section 53 subsection (1), first sentence, number 5, as soon as and insofar as the application for prosecution has been filed or the authorization granted. (5) Section 97 and Section 100c subsection (6) shall remain unaffected.
§ 312, Strafprozessordnung Zulässigkeit Gegen die Urteile des Strafrichters und des Schöffengerichts ist Berufung zulässig.	§ 312, German Criminal Code Procedure Admissibility An appeal on fact and law shall be admissible against judgments of the criminal court judge and of the court with lay judges.
§ 383 Zivilprozessordnung Zeugnisverweigerung aus persönlichen Gründen (1) Zur Verweigerung des Zeugnisses sind berechtigt:	§ 383 Code of Civil Procedure Refusal to testify on personal grounds (1) The following persons are entitled to refuse to testify:

1. der Verlobte einer Partei oder derjenige, mit dem die Partei ein Versprechen eingegangen ist, eine Lebenspartnerschaft zu begründen; 2. der Ehegatte einer Partei, auch wenn die Ehe nicht mehr besteht; 2a. der Lebenspartner einer Partei, auch wenn die Lebenspartnerschaft nicht mehr besteht; 3. diejenigen, die mit einer Partei in gerader Linie verwandt oder verschwägert, in der Seitenlinie bis zum dritten Grad verwandt oder bis zum zweiten Grad verschwägert sind oder waren; 4. Geistliche in Ansehung desjenigen, was ihnen bei der Ausübung der Seelsorge anvertraut ist; 5. Personen, die bei der Vorbereitung, Herstellung oder Verbreitung von periodischen Druckwerken oder Rundfunksendungen berufsmäßig mitwirken oder mitgewirkt haben, über die Person des Verfassers, Einsenders oder Gewährsmanns von Beiträgen und Unterlagen sowie über die ihnen im Hinblick auf ihre Tätigkeit gemachten Mitteilungen, soweit es sich um Beiträge, Unterlagen und Mitteilungen für den	1. The fiancé of a party, or that person to whom the party has made a promise to establish a civil union; 2. The spouse or former spouse of a party; 2a. The partner or former partner under a civil union with a party; 3. Those who are or were directly related to a party, either by blood or by marriage, or who are or were related as third-degree relatives in the collateral line, or who are or were second-degree relatives by marriage in the collateral line; 4. Clerics, with a view to what was entrusted to them in the exercise of their pastoral care and guidance; 5. Persons who collaborate or have collaborated, as professionals, in preparing, making or distributing printed periodicals or radio or television broadcasts, if their testimony would concern the person of the author or contributor of articles or broadcasts and documents, or the source thereof, as well as the information they have been given with regard to these persons' activities, provided that this concerns articles or broadcasts, documents and information published in the editorial part of the periodical or broadcast;
---	---

redaktionellen Teil handelt; 6. Personen, denen kraft ihres Amtes, Standes oder Gewerbes Tatsachen anvertraut sind, deren Geheimhaltung durch ihre Natur oder durch gesetzliche Vorschrift geboten ist, in Betreff der Tatsachen, auf welche die Verpflichtung zur Verschwiegenheit sich bezieht. (2) Die unter Nummern 1 bis 3 bezeichneten Personen sind vor der Vernehmung über ihr Recht zur Verweigerung des Zeugnisses zu belehren. (3) Die Vernehmung der unter Nummern 4 bis 6 bezeichneten Personen ist, auch wenn das Zeugnis nicht verweigert wird, auf Tatsachen nicht zu richten, in Ansehung welcher erhellt, dass ohne Verletzung der Verpflichtung zur Verschwiegenheit ein Zeugnis nicht abgelegt werden kann.	6. Persons to whom facts are entrusted, by virtue of their office, profession or status, the nature of which mandates their confidentiality, or the confidentiality of which is mandated by law, where their testimony would concern facts to which the confidentiality obligation refers. (2) The persons designated under numbers 1 to 3 are to be instructed about their right to refuse to testify prior to being examined. (3) Even if the persons designated under numbers 4 to 6 do not refuse to testify, their examination is not to be aimed at facts and circumstances regarding which it is apparent that no testimony can be made without breaching the confidentiality obligation.
§ 19 Bundesdatenschutzgesetz Auskunft an den Betroffenen (1) Dem Betroffenen ist auf Antrag Auskunft zu erteilen über	§ 19 Federal Data Protection Act Provision of information to the data subject (1) The data subject shall, at his request, be provided with information on

1. die zu seiner Person gespeicherten Daten, auch soweit sie sich auf die Herkunft dieser Daten beziehen, 2. die Empfänger oder Kategorien von Empfängern, an die die Daten weitergegeben werden, und 3. den Zweck der Speicherung. In dem Antrag soll die Art der personenbezogenen Daten, über die Auskunft erteilt werden soll, näher bezeichnet werden. Sind die personenbezogenen Daten weder automatisiert noch in nicht automatisierten Dateien gespeichert, wird die Auskunft nur erteilt, soweit der Betroffene Angaben macht, die das Auffinden der Daten ermöglichen, und der für die Erteilung der Auskunft erforderliche Aufwand nicht außer Verhältnis zu dem vom Betroffenen geltend gemachten Informationsinteresse steht. Die verantwortliche Stelle bestimmt das Verfahren, insbesondere die Form der Auskunftserteilung, nach pflichtgemäßem Ermessen. (2) Absatz 1 gilt nicht für personenbezogene Daten, die nur deshalb gespeichert sind, weil sie aufgrund gesetzlicher, satzungsmäßiger oder vertraglicher Aufbewahrungsvorschriften nicht gelöscht werden dürfen, oder ausschließlich Zwecken der Datensicherung oder der Datenschutzkontrolle dienen und eine Auskunftserteilung einen unverhältnismäßigen Aufwand erfordern	1. stored data concerning him, including any reference in them to their origin, 2. the recipients or categories of recipients to whom the data are transmitted, and 3. the purpose of storage. The request should specify the type of personal data on which information is to be provided. If the personal data are stored neither by automated procedures nor in non-automated filing systems, information shall be provided only in so far as the data subject supplies particulars making it possible to locate the data and the effort needed to provide the information is not out of proportion to the interest in such information expressed by the data subject. The controller shall exercise due discretion in determining the procedure for providing such information and, in particular, the form in which it is provided. (2) Sub-Section 1 above shall not apply to personal data which are stored merely because they may not be erased due to legal, statutory or contractual provisions on their retention or exclusively serve purposes of data security or data protection control and the provision of information would require disproportionate effort.
---	--

würde. (3) Bezieht sich die Auskunftserteilung auf die Übermittlung personenbezogener Daten an Verfassungsschutzbehörden, den Bundesnachrichtendienst, den Militärischen Abschirmdienst und, soweit die Sicherheit des Bundes berührt wird, andere Behörden des Bundesministeriums der Verteidigung, ist sie nur mit Zustimmung dieser Stellen zulässig. (4) Die Auskunftserteilung unterbleibt, soweit <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. die Auskunft die ordnungsgemäße Erfüllung der in der Zuständigkeit der verantwortlichen Stelle liegenden Aufgaben gefährden würde, 2. die Auskunft die öffentliche Sicherheit oder Ordnung gefährden oder sonst dem Wohle des Bundes oder eines Landes Nachteile bereiten würde oder 3. die Daten oder die Tatsache ihrer Speicherung nach einer Rechtsvorschrift oder ihrem Wesen nach, insbesondere wegen der überwiegenden berechtigten Interessen eines Dritten, geheim gehalten werden müssen und deswegen das Interesse des Betroffenen an der Auskunftserteilung zurücktreten muss. (5) Die Ablehnung der Auskunftserteilung bedarf einer Begründung nicht, soweit durch die Mitteilung der tatsächlichen und rechtlichen Gründe, auf die die Entscheidung gestützt wird, der mit der Auskunftsverweigerung verfolgte Zweck gefährdet würde. In diesem Fall ist der Betroffene darauf hinzuweisen, dass er sich	(3) If the provision of information relates to the transfer of personal data to authorities for the protection of the constitution, to the Federal Intelligence Service, the Federal Armed Forces Counterintelligence Office and, where the security of the Federation is concerned, other authorities of the Federal Ministry of Defence, it shall be admissible only with the consent of such bodies. (4) Information shall not be provided if <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. this would be prejudicial to the proper performance of the duties of the controller, 2. this would impair public safety or order or otherwise be detrimental to the Federation or a Land or 3. the data or the fact that they are being stored must be kept secret in accordance with a legal provision or by virtue of their nature, in particular on account of an overriding justified interest of a third party and for this reason the interest of the data subject in the provision of information must be subordinated. (5) Reasons need not be stated for the refusal to provide information if the statement of the actual and legal reasons on which the decision is based would jeopardize the purpose pursued by refusing to provide information. In such case it shall be pointed out to the data subject that he/she may appeal to the Federal Commissioner for Data Protection and
--	---

an die Bundesbeauftragte oder den Bundesbeauftragten für den Datenschutz und die Informationsfreiheit wenden kann. (6) Wird dem Betroffenen keine Auskunft erteilt, so ist sie auf sein Verlangen der oder dem Bundesbeauftragten für den Datenschutz und die Informationsfreiheit zu erteilen, soweit nicht die jeweils zuständige oberste Bundesbehörde im Einzelfall feststellt, dass dadurch die Sicherheit des Bundes oder eines Landes gefährdet würde. Die Mitteilung der oder des Bundesbeauftragten an den Betroffenen darf keine Rückschlüsse auf den Erkenntnisstand der verantwortlichen Stelle zulassen, sofern diese nicht einer weitergehenden Auskunft zustimmt. (7) Die Auskunft ist unentgeltlich.	Freedom of Information. (6) If no information is provided to the data subject, it shall at his/her request be supplied to the Federal Commissioner for Data Protection and Freedom of Information unless the relevant supreme federal authority determines in a particular case that this would jeopardize the security of the Federation or a Land. The transfer from the Federal Commissioner to the data subject must not allow any conclusions to be drawn as to the knowledge at the disposal of the controller, unless the latter consents to more extensive information being provided. (7) Information shall be provided free of charge.
§ 17 Arbeitsschutzgesetz Rechte der Beschäftigten (1) Die Beschäftigten sind berechtigt, dem Arbeitgeber Vorschläge zu allen Fragen der Sicherheit und des Gesundheitsschutzes bei der Arbeit zu machen. Für Beamtinnen und Beamte des Bundes ist § 125 des Bundesbeamtengesetzes anzuwenden. Entsprechendes Landesrecht bleibt unberührt. (2) Sind Beschäftigte auf Grund konkreter Anhaltspunkte der Auffassung, daß die vom	§ 17 Act on the Implementation of Measures of Occupational (1) Workers are entitled to make suggestions to their employer in regard to all aspects of safety and health protection at work. Section 125 of the Federal Civil Service Act (Bundesbeamtengesetz, BBG) shall apply mutatis mutandis to civil servants. Corresponding Land legislation shall remain unaffected. (2) Where, based on specific indications, workers are of the opinion that the measures taken and means made available by the

Arbeitgeber getroffenen Maßnahmen und bereitgestellten Mittel nicht ausreichen, um die Sicherheit und den Gesundheitsschutz bei der Arbeit zu gewährleisten, und hilft der Arbeitgeber darauf gerichteten Beschwerden von Beschäftigten nicht ab, können sich diese an die zuständige Behörde wenden. Hierdurch dürfen den Beschäftigten keine Nachteile entstehen. Die in Absatz 1 Satz 2 und 3 genannten Vorschriften sowie die Vorschriften der Wehrbeschwerdeordnung	employer are not sufficient to guarantee safety and health protection at work and the employer does not remedy any complaints raised by the workers in this regard, they may contact the competent authority. The workers may suffer no disadvantages as a result thereof. The provisions referred to in subsection (1), second and third sentence, and the provisions set out in the Military Law Complaints Code (Wehrbeschwerdeordnung, WBO) and in the Act on the Parliamentary Commissioner for the Armed Forces (Gesetz über den Wehrbeauftragten des Deutschen Bundestages, WBeauftrG) shall remain unaffected.
--	---

ELSA GREECE

Contributors

National Coordinator

Anastasios Kalergis

National Academic Coordinator

Angelina Vlachou

National Researches

Stavroula Chaloulou

Chrysa Solaki

Eugnosia Papadopoulou

Ilias Tzeremes

Despina Ziana

Sofia Andreadaki

Lamprini Xenou

Olga Gkotsopoulou

Kornilia Pipidi-Kalogirou

Pinelopi Briffa

Stephania Efstathiou

National Linguistic Editors

Lamprini Koletsi

National Academic Supervisor

Pr. Triantafillia (Lina) Papadopoulou

1. Introduction

In a democratic society, the Press can only operate well when it is a means of free dissemination of information and criticism of the state's malfunctions. In order, however, for this to be possible, there is a necessity for guaranteed secrecy of the sources which provide the information. This is why, in many European countries there is special legislation establishing journalist privilege, through obligation of discretion to all the media factors. There are of course some exceptions that are allowed to make this general principle of journalist privilege retreat. The freedom of journalism is subject to certain limitations, in order to reduce the conflicts of legitimate goods established constitutionally, at national as well as international level. However, we cannot support that de jure and a priori the freedom of expression is to be oppressed whenever a conflict with public interest occurs. Therefore, a specific check of the conditions and balance of interests at stake has to be conducted in every such occasion of conflict. These conditions are to be analysed further upon in the research. What is more, other ways of protection of the journalists against state's invasive measures will be presented, along with the national courts' practice.

1. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information? What type of legislation provides this protection? How exactly is this protection construed in national law?

1.1. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information?

1.1.1. The Freedom of Press as the Legal Basis of the Right

Since the press came into existence in 1780, it has played a crucial role in shaping public opinion and perceptions, but it is also considered as the fourth pillar of the society. In fact, it is widely accepted that the press is the backbone of a healthy democracy, since it not only functions for the dissemination of information, but also as means of government control and political criticism.

Therefore, in the context of the Freedom of Expression, the press is protected by the Greek Constitution wherein article 14 § 2a it is stated that "The press is free. Censorship and any other precautionary measure are forbidden". According to the historical decision No. 10541/1976 provided by the Magistrate's Court of Athens, the journalists' duty and right not to disclose their source of information is recognized as a subject requiring legal protection. Indeed, at the court's conclusive sentence the interpretation of the article 14 § 2a of the Constitution referring to the Freedom of Press was, among others, presented as the legal basis for the protection of this right.

1.1.2. Definition of the Right

Accordingly, it was proven that the Right to Freedom of Expression, a significant precondition in order to guarantee the stable and proper operation of the state's institutions, serves as the starting point regarding the comprehension of the definition of the journalists' right not to disclose their source of information. The press is able to fulfill its mission to the society, if only the secrecy of its sources is secured. To that end, those who co-operate or have co-operated as professionals in the preparation, production and publication of periodicals and radio or television broadcasting, have the right to deny the testimony before a court, concerning the editor or the person that provided the information appearing on articles and documents.

The lack of protection of the journalistic sources would cause concerns about the reliability of the press, since the journalists would only have access to a limited amount of evidence, unable to keep the public sufficiently updated. Moreover, in the condition of lack of protection, the communicators, namely individuals with access to critical positions within public authorities¹ or private companies, would be unwilling to provide valuable information to the press at their own cost, due to the threat of legal penalties.² This would constitute an excessive restriction of the constitutionally established Right to Freedom of Expression of the press, as much as the state's interventions would have an inhibitory effect to the press's function.

Consequently, although the confidentiality of the journalistic sources is not legally established by any Greek law, the Greek courts have recognised that they are protected by virtue of constitutional provisions (article 14 § 2) safeguarding the Right to Freedom of Press. The journalists have also the right to deny their testimony, as they are not obliged to reveal their sources of information, even if it is requested by the police.

1.2. What type of legislation provides this protection?

1.2.1 Provisions in the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Criminal Code

The absence of specific legal provisions protecting directly the right of the journalists not to disclose their sources of information from the Greek legal order could be proven to have led to serious violations, concerning the validity and independence of the press.

Indeed, article 212 § 1 of the Greek Code of Criminal Procedure, under the title "Professional confidentiality of the witnesses", states that if professionals belonging to several categories are examined as witnesses, either during the prejudgment, or the main proceedings "the procedure (of testimony) is invalid". Due to the fact that journalists are not explicitly mentioned into this provision, their testimony is not considered as forbidden evidence.³ Thus, they are not prohibited from testifying as witnesses before the criminal court disclosing information gained from the exercise of their profession. On the contrary, article 209, entitled “Obligation to testify”, states that “If someone is legally requested to testify before the court, he or she cannot deny it, aside from the exceptions that are explicitly mentioned in the code”, which practically reiterates the assertion that during interrogation journalists, if requested, are obliged to disclose their sources of information.

¹ K.Chrisogonos, "Individual and Social Rights", 3rd revised edition, (Nomiki Vivliothiki Athens 2006), pp. 301-304 [Greek]

² A.I. Korgopoulos, 'Journalistic privacy: Foundation of the Right and Provisions of Implementation and Recession' [2008], p.159 [Greek].

It has been argued that the journalists’ right not to disclose their sources of information is supported in article 371 of the Greek Criminal Code, entitled “Violation of professional secrecy” which in paragraph 1 states that “Clergies, lawyers and any kind of legal counsels, notaries, doctors, midwives, nurses, pharmacists and others, to which people usually entrust, as well as, the assistants of these individuals, due to their profession or capacity, are punishable by fine or imprisonment up to one year if they disclose confidential information that they have been entrusted or informed about”. It has been claimed that journalists are included in the category of “...others, to which people entrust, due to their profession or capacity, confidential information”.⁴ However, according to opposite claims, journalists cannot be included in the aforementioned category, since their main duty is to inform the public, not to safeguard their communicants’ names.⁵ Thus, regarding the professional secrecy of journalists, the author’s name is the only confidential part, excluding his/her work, which, in contrary, is possible to be published. In this case, journalists are no more exempted from the obligation to testify before the criminal court.

Concluding, it seems that the provision does not provide sufficient legal protection to journalists,⁶ since it neither mentions them explicitly as a category of professional, nor excepts them from the obligation to testify. However, they could be subject of this provision, as it can be interpreted as such.

Article 223 § 4 of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides partial procedural protection to journalists, as an exception from article 371 of the Criminal Code, as it states that “The witness is not obliged to testify about incidents from which their guilt of wrongdoing could emerge”. In that case, journalists requested to testify before the court are protected and eligible to deny disclosing their sources, on the supposition that they have committed a crime.

³ A. Konstantinidis, “Journalistic Privacy” [1994] Penal Journal Vol.4597 [Greek].

⁴ Karanikas Εγχειρίδιο Ποινικού Δικαίου (part 3, Special Mention 1962), 324 [Greek], who argues that journalists are partially included in the art. 371 of the Greek Criminal Code, and as a result they have the right to deny their testimony, regarding their sources of information, when they are confidential.

⁵ Vougioukas Το ποινικό δίκαιο των ειδικών ποινικών νόμων (part2b Sakkoulas Athens 1965), 67 [Greek].

⁶ K. Μπεϊς Το απόρρητο των πηγών του δημοσιογράφου. Ένα θέμα που χρειάζεται νομοθετική ρύθμιση [1982] Ελευθεροτυπία 7/01/1982 [Greek].

1.2.2 National Case-Law

The Greek Courts have established significant limits to the complexity of this issue, by recognising the journalists' right not to disclose their sources since 1976, despite not being explicitly described in any of the provisions. Even before the European Court of Human Rights, the courts in Greece initially adjudged this right as an integral part of the constitutionally established in article 14 § 2 Right to Freedom of Press. However, according to a subsequent decision with opposite substance,⁷ article 212 of the Code of Criminal Procedure was considered as the legal basis of which, avoided protecting this right.⁸

Over recent years, national courts started referring directly to article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights and article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as legislations with overriding supremacy and returning back to the initial judgement, because the application of provision of the Criminal Code and Code of Criminal Procedure does not comply with ECtHR case law. Since 1999, there has been a decision which indicates that "...as it emerges from article 14 § 2 of the Greek Constitution 1975/1986, the journalists' right not to disclose their sources of information is based on the constitutionally established Right to Freedom of the Press, and for this reason the constitutional provision prevails in case the journalist justifiably wishes not to disclose his or her knowledge and sources, since the opposite would result to the restriction of the Right to Freedom of the Press...".⁹

1.2.3. Other provisions

The secrecy of journalistic sources is also protected by the principle of non-legally binding documents. Article 2 § 9 of Journalists' Union of Athens Daily Newspapers and Panhellenic Association of Journalistic Unions Code of Ethics states that "Journalists have the right and obligation to: [...] respect the professional confidentiality with respect to their sources of information which have extracted in strict confidence". This is not considered as a detailed provision, since it lacks foreseeing details regarding the circumstances under which journalists should disclose their sources.¹⁰

1.3. How exactly is this protection construed in national law?

1.3.1. Constitutional Provisions as Legal Basis of this Protection

The Greek Constitution recognises the crucial role of the press towards society, as it is in the position not only to influence public opinion, but also to guarantee social stability and democracy.

⁷ Supreme Court of Greece (ΑΠ) Case No. 980/1987 [1987] Pinika Chronika Vol. 37 [1987] 797.

⁸ Karras Πονηρό Δικονομικό Δίκαιο (Nomiki Vivliothiki 1993), 616 [Greek].

⁹ Magistrate's Court of Athens 4092/1999 [1999] Pinika Chronika Vol. 49 [1999] 1057.

¹⁰ A. Damaskou 'Protection of Sources' <http://journalism.cmpf.eui.eu/maps/protection-of-sources/> [English].

Because of the importance of Press's function, the confidentiality of its sources appears as a sine qua non element in order for the journalists to fulfill their social mandate. An obligation to disclose the sources would damage its efficiency and its existence. Moreover, precautionary censorship would also affect the press's independence, since governments would have access and power to control everything published and distributed to the public.

Provided that the journalists' right not to disclose their sources of information is basically protected by the virtue of the constitutional provisions, it is inferred that in the context of the Right to Freedom of Press journalists are also provided with the right to deny their testimony before the court. In that case, article 209 of the Code of Criminal Procedure does not apply on journalists. Although, the journalists maintain the right to testify voluntarily or if they are willing to do so after the court has requested it, which a contrario means that if they deny it, they must not be examined. Even if a journalist is forced to testify, the findings are forbidden to be used as evidence, and this person will not face any penalties for his action.

2. Is There, in Domestic Law, a Provision that Prohibits a Journalist from Disclosing his/her Sources? How Exactly is This Prohibition Construed in National Law? What is the Sanction?

The Press has a very important role in society because it is a means of spreading ideas and information. It contributes to informing and shaping public opinion and it could be said that it is a form of exercise control of state power. Because of its primary role in social life, enshrined in our national constitution with explicit provision the Freedom of the Press in Article 14§2a¹¹ "the Press is free. Censorship and every precautionary measure is prohibited..." However the ensuring of the secrecy of sources is necessary about the correct and complete exercise of the Press's role. Otherwise, the relation of trust between the informant and the representative of Press is collapsed as a result the correct public information to be drastically reduced. And this because who will provide information when he knows that it will not be abided secrecy and will be revealed his identity, something that could have a direct influence on his private life; Thus the laws of many countries included legislative provisions for the confidentiality of sources of Press.¹² Relevant instructions issued also the European Union, which obliges the Member States to include relevant recognition in their national legislation.¹³

The meaning of the protection of sources lies in the obligation of the journalists not to disclose their sources even to the Court about the information on subjects they notified or are going to notify at the public.¹⁴ In the following it will be clarified if this prohibition exists in any provision in domestic law. First of all, the obligation of the journalists not to disclose their sources is based on the Constitutional Law in Article 14§2 as it was referred but not explicit. The Greek Courts have integrated the protection of sources in the freedom of expression and press something that it is obvious in many decisions such as ΠλημμΑθ 1054/1976, ΠοινΧρον ΚΣΤ 667 where at the reason for judgment is clearly mentioned that the protection of sources is resulted from the constitutional right of Article 14§2. In the field of Criminal Substantive Law, there is the opinion that the Article 371 about the professional secrecy covers also the journalists.¹⁵ More specifically in according with this article “Clergymen, lawyers and any kind of legal counsel, notaries, doctors, midwives, nurses, pharmacists and others to whom some usually they trust because of their profession or their status, private secrets and assistants of such persons, are punished by fine or imprisonment up to one year if they reveal private secrets that others trusted them or learned them because of their profession or their status”. The journalists are not a part of the group of professions they are covered by the confidentiality, they are not included explicit. Although there is the opinion that they are included in the meaning “others to whom some usually they trust because of their profession” the prevailing opinion at theory and case law is that neither at this category falls into the prohibition of disclosure the sources.¹⁶ The reason is that, in contrast with the relations referred by the article 371, the purpose of the confidentiality between Press and informants is not the protection of them but the collection of information in order to inform the public. For these reasons it could not be claimed that the prohibition of disclosure is based also at criminal law. Even if that could be acceptable and journalists could disclose their sources at the base of this article, they could not finally testify as witnesses regarding the article 212 of Criminal Procedural Law because the list of person they are excluded from the task of testimony is exclusive.¹⁷ Thereafter, the prohibition of disclosing the journalistic sources is not be protected under Criminal Substantive or Procedural Law and it has still as legislative framework the article 14§2 of the Constitutional Law.

¹¹ Ioannis Karakostas, The Press Law 23-25 [Το Δίκαιο των ΜΜΕ]; Prodromos Dagtoglou, Constitutional Law-Individual Rights 565... [Συνταγματικό Δίκαιο- Ατομικά Δικαιώματα].

¹² Alexandros Kargopoulos, The Protection of Sources, Press Law 158... [Το Δημοσιογραφικό Απόρρητο. Δίκαιο Μέσων Ενημέρωσης και Επικοινωνίας- ΔΙΜΕΕ].

¹³ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7.

The presidential decree 77/2003¹⁸ in article 8§3 defined that the journalist has the right not to disclose his sources. However, it could not be claimed that this provision enshrines the prohibition of disclosing. First of all this presidential decree regards the journalistic television and radio broadcasts and not the other types of Press. More specifically the article 1 mentions that the rules of this decree apply to news- journalistic and political broadcasts on public and private radio and television. Furthermore the provision refers “the right of journalists” that means that they have the right not to disclose their sources. It is not an obvious obligation that law orders it.

¹⁴ The Protection of Sources, Press Law 158.

¹⁵ Argiris Karras, Criminal Code 119 [Ποινικός Κώδικας].

¹⁶ Aggelos Konstantinidis, The Protection of Sources Criminal Annals 897...[Το Δημοσιογραφικό Απόρρητο Ποινικά Χρονικά]; Constitutional Law-Individual Rights §696 [Συνταγματικό Δίκαιο]; Magistrate’s Court of Athens 10541/1976, Criminal Annals 667, Magistrate’s Court of Athens 4092/1999 Criminal Annals 1057 [ΠλημμΑθ10541/1976, ΠοινΧρον, ΠλημμΑθ 4092/1999, ΠοινΧρον].

¹⁷ The Press Law 230.

¹⁸ Προεδρικό Διάταγμα 77/2003 (Φ.Ε.Κ. 77-Α' 28-3-2003).

Apart from that provision there is also at greek system one more Code of Conduct about the journalists and the protection of sources. It is the Code from Journalist's Union of Athens daily Newspapers which explicit in article 2h mentions that the journalists must not disclose their sources.¹⁹ On one side it could be claimed that it is the only explicit provision about the prohibition of disclosing but it has a limited scope of application. This provision includes only the member of the Union and it binds someone if he has signed collective labor contract which includes the binding of Code. Its violation has the result of disciplinary penalties because it has not formal validity of law. This Code includes also provision about the sanction in case of violation of secrecy sources. Article 8 states that there are two Disciplinary Councils which are responsible for the controlling of any violations of the Code and they decide in joint session.

The Greek case-law has not appeared at the same position as many cases about the prohibition of disclosure of sources. In one case, it was recognised the right of the protection of sources and the accused of perjury writer must be declared innocent.²⁰ However, the base at another case,²¹ about the acquittal was not the prohibition of disclosure of sources but the excusable error of the journalist about the right of confidentiality. Furthermore, this decision of the Court was not based in other regulated supports as Constitution or international Law like the first decision. Its legal basis was the Article 212 of the Greek Criminal Procedural Law (professional secret witness) where the journalists are not included at the exhaustive list of professions.

The same act has also the ECtHR which has as basic line the article 10 ECHR about the freedom of expression where is included the meaning of prohibition of journalists not to disclose their sources. However from many cases it could be concluded that the European Court does not accept immediately this prohibition but weigh them up with many facts that is the public interest.

The European Court of Human Rights in the case ECHR Goodwin v United Kingdom,²² considered excessive the order of the authorities to the journalist to reveal the source of his information about a confidential business plan.

However, on the decision Nordisk Film & TV APS in Denmark, the European Court found that the order of the national court to the TV station to uncover research material which was acquired by a journalist for a documentary on pedophilia in Denmark (who -with secret identity; involved in a pedophile group) was a proportionate (and therefore allowed) interference in freedom of the journalist, for crime prevention in relation to a serious child abuse case.²³

¹⁹ <http://www.esica.gr/arxes-deontologias/>

²⁰ Magistrate's Court of Athens 10541/1976, Criminal Annals 667,668. This decision mentions not only the protection of sources but also the relation between this protection and the freedom of Press.

²¹ Magistrate's Court of Athens 36773/1980 [ΠλημμΑθ 36773/1980].

²² Goodwin v United Kingdom 27.03.1996.

²³ Nordisk Film & TV A/S 08.12.2005.

In case of Financial Times vs. United Kingdom, the ECtHR ruled in favour of the protection of journalistic sources to refuse four newspapers and a news agency to reveal the source of their information about an impending brewing absorption agreement.²⁴

To conclude, as far as we can see, there is no explicit provision in domestic law about the protection of journalistic sources. The prohibition of not to disclose them is included at the constitutional right of freedom of expression and Press. The national also European case law based on article 14 (Constitutional Law) and 10 (ECHR) about the protection of sources but their decision in each case is different and they do not accept this right without balancing.

3. Who is a “journalist” according to the national legislation? Is it in your view a restricted definition for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources? What is the scope of protection of other media actors? Is the protection of journalists’ sources extended to anyone else?

3.1. Who is a “Journalist” according to the National Legislation?

Greek legislation does not provide with a definition of a “journalist”. According to Art. 14 par. 8 of the Greek Constitution, “the conditions and the qualifications needed for the exercise of the journalistic profession are defined by law” but there is not a clear term provided in any regulation.

However, some valuable definitions have been provided in theory, and a journalist can be described as a person exercising the journalistic profession through newspapers, magazines, television and the radio. It is science focused on gathering, recording and publishing the news on the one hand, and being critical towards every person or situation, on the other.²⁵

Moreover, some unions of journalists include in their statute only some prerequisites for someone to become one of their members and not a specific definition. Such an example constitutes Journalists Union of Athens Daily Newspapers that focuses on elements such as the age (being over 21 and under 40 years old), a minimum of education (having completed the secondary level of education) and domicile (being a resident of Athens) as conditions for a person’s membership. Of course, these necessary features vary among the different unions and cannot be considered as parts of the definition of a “journalist”.

²⁴ Financial Times vs. United Kingdom 15.12.2009.

²⁵ Sklavounis G.N. “Introduction to the Journalistic Science”, Ellin, 2002.

Some important elements for the definition of “journalists” can occur from the criminal legislation, and especially from articles that either exclude journalists from the privilege to not testify for information they gathered during doing research (Art. 212 criminal procedure code) or can ensure that they also have the right to professional secrecy (Art. 371 penal code).

3.2. Is it, in your view, a restricted definition for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources? What is the scope of protection of other media actors? Is the protection of journalists’ sources extended to anyone else?

Firstly, we must emphasise the role of the journalist not only as a mere exponent of opinion and subject of the constitutionally guaranteed individual freedom of expression as it is stated in article 14 paragraph 1, but also as a factor of the press under its institutional dimension, enshrined in article 14 para 2. Thus, the journalistic profession is the only profession with the sole object of the exercise of a constitutionally guaranteed freedom, the one of the freedom of expression.²⁶ He also contributes to the shaping of the political will of the public and therefore the proper functioning of democracy. This institutional dimension of the press is not only enshrined in the above national provisions but also in supranational provisions, such as Article 10 ECHR and Article 19 paragraph 2 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

The aforementioned dual aspect of the freedom of the press both as an individual right and as an institutional guarantee that justifies a special privileged status of “non intervention of public authorities”, explains why the journalistic profession remains currently unregulated and freely accessible.²⁷ The existence of the provision of Article 14, paragraph 8 of the Constitution which favours the legal definition of the conditions and qualifications for the exercise of the journalistic profession, besides being a dictatorial residue, can only be viewed critically, as it could possibly lead to manipulation of the press by the state.²⁸ It is supported in theory²⁹ and case-law that restrictions placed by the Constitution that are receptive of legal regulation of the press are interpreted as formal requirements for the exercise of the journalistic profession. Furthermore, such restrictions are acceptable if they regulate salary issues, insurance and other matters of the journalist's profession, such as their participation in the relevant professional and trade unions³⁰ (such as the Union of the daily newspaper editors of Athens) or the issue of the confidentiality

²⁶ Charalampos Anthopoulos, ‘The self-regulation of the media-General aspects’, (1999), issue 3-4, The Constitution, 467 with references to P. Dagtoglou, Press and Constitution, ‘A, Athens-Komotini 1991, 136 and K. Chrysogonos, Individual and Social Rights, Athens-Komotini, 1998, 253.

²⁷ Elsa I. Deligianni, Ethics of the media -Journalistic Ethics, Sideris, Athens, 2004, 82. See Also Supreme Court judgement n. 66/1982 regarding the potential adoption of a law of para 8 concerning the conditions and qualifications of the exercise of the journalistic profession .

²⁸ Ioannis K. Karakostas, The law of the media, Nomiki Vivliothiki, Athens, 2012, 581 with reference to P. Dagtoglou, Media and the Constitution, ‘A, Athens-Komotini, 1991, 771.

²⁹ See Konstantinidis, ‘The protection of journalistic sources, Criminal Chronicles ΜΔ’ (1994), 897 with further references.

³⁰ K. Chrysogonos, Individual and social rights, (3rd revised edition), Nomiki Vivliothiki, Athens, 2006, 307.

of journalists' sources. However, it has been held³¹ that regulations requiring the mandatory membership in a professional association as a necessary element for the proof of the journalistic status are incompatible with the individual constitutional freedoms (in this case the freedom of association) and the freedom of the press.

The ratio of the provision of Article 14 paragraph 8 of the Constitution does not involve taking the role of the evaluator in terms of the state that will distinguish between those who are worthy and unworthy in order to enter the journalistic profession by introducing criteria such as a diploma, professional experience, etc. This would considerably limit the number of the subjects of freedom of expression through the press.³² Instead, the ratio must be located to the goal of quality improvement of the press and the exercise of objective and effective journalistic investigation.

Accordingly, those entitled to the right of invoking the protection of journalistic sources who are also bearers of the freedom of the press, are natural or legal persons engaged professionally or occasionally with any activity or work related to the press.³³ This is also demonstrated through the common legislation, namely in the Article 1 of the Mandatory Law n. 1092/1938 where the 'press' is interpreted with a very broad sense, including not only the printing industry but also any mechanical or chemical means by which the production of a large number of identical copies, images, illustrations, etc is achieved in paper, fabric, metal, plastic, glass or other material.³⁴

Another aspect that needs to be taken into consideration for the protection of journalistic sources, in general, is that the right to research and obtain information is actually an aspect of the constitutionally protected freedom of expression (Art. 14 par 1 of the Greek Constitution). Therefore, there is the defensive right of repeling any interference of the State during the conduct of journalistic research³⁵ and any actor involved in the process can enjoy appropriate protection from obstacles in their work. This means that a "journalist" can invoke this defensive right not only when they conduct research themselves but also to protect the activity of any person that conducts research for them. Thus, there is a wide group of people that can freely obtain information, which constitutes an integral part of journalistic activity.³⁶

Finally, it has also been argued that there exists an additional condition as far as the bearers of the right of the protection of journalistic sources are concerned. This includes the fact of

³¹ Judgement of the Plenary Session of the Council of State n. 3198/1990, Armenopoulos 1990, 1143 who ruled on regulations of the tax legislation and the repealed of the Decree n. 1004/1971

³² K. Chrysogonos, Individual and social rights, (3rd revised edition), Nomiki Vivliothiki, Athens, 2006, 307. Also compare: Charalampos Anthopoulos, 'The self-regulation of the media-General aspects', (1999), issue 3-4, The Constitution, 467.

³³ Ioannis K. Karakostas, The law of the media, Nomiki Vivliothiki, Athens, 2012, 4.

³⁴ Cf Supreme Court judgement n. 669/1985, Nomiko Vima 1986, 447.

³⁵ Case 2209/1997, Council of State, To Syntagma, [1997], 636.

³⁶ Ioannis K. Karakostas, The law of the media, Nomiki Vivliothiki, Athens, 2012, 188.

receiving the relevant information "in the exercise and for the purposes of their professional activity".³⁷ On the one hand, this limits the number of the entities, without upsetting the substantially broad definition prevailing in the subjective limits of the scope of the protection of journalistic sources.

The notion of the journalist as resulting from the national legislation and case law, as outlined above, is compatible with the one resulting from the case law of the ECtHR. The latter, applies the definitions of the relevant Recommendation and the related interpretative memorandum under which the 'journalist' is any natural or legal person or professional practitioner who engages systematically with the collection and dissemination of information to the general public through the media.³⁸ Therefore, according to the ECtHR, the right to non-disclosure of journalistic sources is not just a privilege for journalists, but also an aspect of the right to information.³⁹

4. What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources? How are the laws implemented? How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?

Initially, it should be noted that the protection of journalistic sources is not explicitly guaranteed by any provision of the national legislation or the Constitution. In terms of the relevant jurisprudence, the protection of sources is only stated indirectly and implicitly leading to the conclusion that the jurists rather prefer a stance of abstinence of witness as far as the journalists are concerned whenever that is considered reasonable from the particular surrounding circumstances.⁴⁰ The legal basis of this broad interpretation, while it seems quite not a sufficient foundation⁴¹ is the provision of Article 371 paragraph 1 of the Criminal Code. More specifically, where it refers to "others to whom some usually trust private secrets because of their profession or their status", thus leaving the field open for the journalists. The categories of professionals that are entitled to invoke the right to confidentiality of the information they know due to their profession can be found in the affined to Article 371 provision of Article 212 of Criminal Procedure Code. However, journalists or all those involved in journalistic activities in general are not included in this provision. Thus, even when they invoke the protection of professional secrecy they may be found accountable for a series of offences, such as: perjury (Art. 224 par. 2

³⁷ Alexandros-Ioannis Kargopoulos, study-opinion, 'Law of the media', 2/2008, 158.

³⁸ Case of telegraf Media Nederland landelijke B.V and others V. The Netherlands, 22.02.2013 etc.

³⁹ Tina Stavriniaki, in Sicilianos Linos-Alexander and others (eds), European Human Rights Convention interpretation according to article (Rights-admissibility-restitution-execution), Nomiki Vivliothiki, Athens, 2013, 400 with reference to Tillack V .Belgium (judgment of 27.11.2007).

⁴⁰ Pappas J. Basil, 'The terrorist violence, the expert and the judge, fair trial and the journalistic confidentiality', Greek Justice, issue March-April 1978, 184.

⁴¹ See also, Penal Code, interpretation per article, Volume second (Articles 235-473), 2nd edition, Nomiki Vivliothiki, 2014, edited by A. Charalampakis, 2996-2997, which mentions that journalists are not included in the persons amenable, with references to bibliography and jurisprudence.

of Criminal Code), false testimony (Art. 225 of Criminal Code), fomentation of criminals (Art 231 of Criminal Code), disobedience (Art. 169 of Criminal Code). Another aspect which arose and is consistently maintained by the case-law⁴² and for some theorists⁴³ seems to be a non-secure legal basis, relates the protection of the sources with the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of the press, considering it its integral part while also protecting this confidentiality.

Journalistic ethical code in the form of legislation is absent from the Greek legal system, as it is incompatible as a notion with the current Constitution⁴⁴ and could lead to a limitation of the freedom of the press. The regulation of this issue therefore lies in terms of professional ethics. Namely, through general and abstract rules adopted by the union organized profession which are binding for the members of the latter⁴⁵ and refer to the freedoms of expression and information as well as the "duties and responsibilities" which accompany them.⁴⁶

As regards to the determination of their nature as legal or moral rules (customary commercial practices), it should be noted that it depends on whether coercive sanctions imposed either by the relevant internal control bodies within their respective professional organizations or by independent authorities in terms of external control system of self-regulation rules, exist or not.⁴⁷

The Code of ethics of UNDEA (Union of the daily newspaper editors of Athens) (19-20.05.1998), which has been accepted by PFEU (Panhellenic Federation of Editor Unions) constitutes an example of self-regulation of the journalistic profession.⁴⁸ However, the force of this Code, which is an internal decision of a union is limited, since it can only be applied with the exercise of disciplinary powers of the unions that accept it.⁴⁹ For instance, electronic media journalists, that are not members of UNDEA and cause the major problems of unethical behavior, are not bound by this Code.⁵⁰ In the field of broadcasting, which is subject to a public regulation regime (article 15 paragraph 2 of the Constitution), along with the code of UNDEA

⁴²Magistrate's court of Athens judgement n. 10541/1976 Poinika Chronica ΚΣΤ' (1976), 667 επ., Magistrate's court of Athens judgement n. 4092/1999 Poinika Chronica ΜΘ' (1999) 1057 επ., Magistrate's court of Hraklium judgement N.60/1999 (nomos), Magistrate's court of Arta judgement n. 125/1995 Poinika Chronika ΜΕ' (1995), 977 επ.

⁴³ K. Mpeis, 'The confidentiality of journalist's sources. An issue that needs legislative regulation', Article published in Eleftherotypia, January 7, 1982: "... the constitutional guarantee of the freedom of the press is not a secure interpretive basis, where the reporter can support his refusal to punishment without the risk of being subjected to criminal prosecution or other sanctions. "

⁴⁴ Charalampos Anthopoulos, The self-regulation of the media-General aspects, legal magazine: The Constitution, issue 3-4/1999, 465.

⁴⁵ Elsa I. Deligianni, Ethics of the media -Journalistic Ethics, Sideris, Athens, 2004, 104.

⁴⁶ Charalampos Anthopoulos, 'Aspects of fundamental rights in the journalistic code of ethics of UNDEA (Union of the daily newspaper editors of Athens)', Armenopoulos 1999, 1039 επ.

⁴⁷ Charalampos Anthopoulos, The self-regulation of the media-General aspects, legal magazine: The Constitution, issue 3-4/1999, 440; Elsa I. Deligianni, Ethics of the media -Journalistic Ethics, Sideris, Athens, 2004, 107.

⁴⁸ Ioannis K. Karakostas, The law of the media, Nomiki Vivliothiki, Athens, 2012, 585.

⁴⁹ Ioannis K. Karakostas, The law of the media, Nomiki Vivliothiki, Athens, 2012, 586.

⁵⁰ Elsa I. Deligianni, Media Codes of Ethics, Armenopoulos 1999, 1032 επ, 1038.

there are the codes of ethics⁵¹ of National Council of Broadcasting (NCB) that are applied. Additionally, there exists a system of administrative sanctions that are provided in the broadcasting law in case of violations of the latter, which are in principle not susceptible to suspension⁵². Rules of conduct can also be included in collective labour agreements, such as the one signed between National Radio & Tv (NRT)- UNDEA on 07/25/1989.

Thus, the protection of journalistic confidentiality is ensured as follows: a) in the Statute of UNDEA (Article 7 paragraph 1η), b) in the Code of Ethics of UNDEA (Article 2 section Θ'-I'), c) in the collective NRT-UNDEA agreement (Annex 4 section IX), d) in the Code of Ethics of newscast and other journalistic and political emissions (Presidential Decree n. 77/2003, Article 8, paragraph 3) and e) Regulation n. 1/1991 NRT (Sheet of Government Paper B' 421) "on journalistic ethics in broadcasting" (journalistic ethics Code), Article 9 Paragraph 2.

It is worth noting that in a democratic society, press accountability must be disconnected from excessive political or judicial intervention and instead, independent enforcement mechanisms⁵³ composed of professionals from the journalistic field⁵⁴ must be promoted. Press Councils are a non-governmental institution with self-regulation character, responsible for supervising the observance of codes of conduct and dispute resolution amongst the media, the public and the public authorities, through arbitration without being able to impose its decisions.⁵⁵ The institution of Ombudsman (counsel for the listener-viewer-reader) is a part of these mechanisms. It is a single body composition, ie a journalist operating inside a media enterprise and its mission is to receive and convey complaints.⁵⁶ In contrast to those two institutions, there exist the Disciplinary Councils, which have a sanctioning capacity, following a complaint or ex officio.⁵⁷ They are divided into primary and secondary councils, and their final decisions are challenged before the regular justice.⁵⁸ Its disadvantage is that as long as they are provided by the Article 7 of the Statute of UNDEA they only have the capacity of indirect reference to the principles of the Code of Conduct of UNDEA, until the time the relevant article is reviewed and ⁵¹ Presidential Decree n. 77/2003 " Code of Ethics of the newscast and other journalistic and political programs' (Newspaper sheet of the Governmet n. A' 75).

⁵² Ioannis K. Karakostas, The law of the media, Nomiki Vivliothiki, Athens, 2012, 81.

⁵³ William Gore, Self-regulatory bodies-Ensuring respect for a code of ethics, (The Media Self-Regulation Guidebook, Vienna 2008)< <http://www.osce.org/fom/31497?download=true> > accessed 15 March 2016, 34.

⁵⁴ Miklos Haraszti, 'Foreword: The merits of media self-regulation, Balancing rights and responsibilities', (The Media Self-Regulation Guidebook, Vienna 2008)< <http://www.osce.org/fom/31497?download=true> > accessed 15 March 2016, 11.

⁵⁵ Ognian Zlatev, The press council: The archetype of a self-regulatory body, (The Media Self-Regulation Guidebook, Vienna 2008)< <http://www.osce.org/fom/31497?download=true> > accessed 15 March 2016, 45-46; Elsa I. Deligianni, Ethics of the media -Journalistic Ethics, Sideris, Athens, 2004, 135-136.

⁵⁶ Veronique Maurus, The ombdudsman: Media self-regulation within a news outlet, (The Media Self-Regulation Guidebook, Vienna 2008)< <http://www.osce.org/fom/31497?download=true> > accessed 15 March 2016, 67-74, 78; Elsa I. Deligianni, Ethics of the media -Journalistic Ethics, Sideris, Athens, 2004, 136-137.

⁵⁷ Elsa I. Deligianni, Media Codes of Ethics, Armenopoulos 1999, 1032 επ, 1037.

⁵⁸ Elsa I. Deligianni, Media Codes of Ethics, Armenopoulos 1999, 1032 επ, 1037.

included in the new Code.⁵⁹ In case of surrender orders/injunctions and disclosure of sources, the safeguard applied as a compensation is the preventive control by a judge or any other body that is neutral and independent towards the involved parties. The role of this body is to decide whether there is an overriding public interest and determine whether the latter takes precedence in relation to the principle of protection of journalistic sources. Moreover, this body shall examine the proportionality of the means chosen by authorities to intervene and remove the protection of sources. Greek legislation lacks a regulation of this issue and there is neither statutory procedural regulation nor independent audit body setting for this purpose. This constitutes a violation of the procedural aspect of the right of freedom of expression (Article 10 Paragraph 2 ECHR) and the requirement deriving from it, that there shall be a relevant procedure prescribed by law.

5. In the respective national legislation, are the limits of non-disclosure of the information in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7? What are the procedures applied? Is the disclosure limited to exceptional circumstances, taking into consideration vital public or individual interests at stakes? Do the authorities first search for and apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to right of journalists not to disclose information?

Principles 1 and 2 of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 of the Council of Europe “urge” the member-states to protect the right of non-disclosure of the sources both for journalists and for people, who acquire knowledge of information by their collaboration with journalists. However, the situation in the Greek legal practice is different.

The Greek courts, according to articles 14 par. 2 and 87 par. 2 of the Greek Constitution, are obliged to convict and not obey to any administrative and legislative measure, which can be characterised as a preventive measure, able to limit the freedom of expression. So, it is totally reassured that the legal status of the journalistic confidentiality is protected, as it is being entrenched by a constitutional provision (article 14 par. 2) and constitutes an individual right, which gives the power to the citizens to demand from the authorities not to intervene to the private sphere of this right (status negativus), according to the Greek constitutional theory.⁶⁰

However, in the Greek criminal legal practice, things are different. According to article 212 of the Greek Criminal Procedure Code, there are some categories of people, who, due to their profession, are exempted from testifying in a criminal case, because of the rule of confidentiality, whom violation constitutes criminal act and is liable to fine (150- 15.000€) and imprisonment of ⁵⁹ Elsa I. Deligianni, Media Codes of Ethics, Armenopoulos 1999, 1032 επ, 1037.

⁶⁰ Konstantinos Chrysogonos, Ατομικά και Κοινωνικά Δικαιώματα, Νομική Βιβλιοθήκη [2006] 30 [Greek]

ten days up to one year (articles 57 and 371 of the Greek Criminal Code). The Greek criminal theory and case-law⁶¹ do not include journalists to the categories, which are covered by professional confidentiality, so they are not exempted by the obligation of testimony (article 209 of the Greek Criminal Procedure Code). Moreover, if journalists – witnesses have been informed details that testify from other sources, they have to reveal them to the court (article 224 par.1 of the Greek Criminal Procedure Code).⁶²

The reason that both the Greek theory and case-law follow that opinion is that the list of the categories in article 212 of the Greek Criminal Procedure Code is exclusive (numerus clausus) and, as a consequence, article 371 of the Greek Criminal Code cannot support adequately the legal recognition of the journalistic confidentiality.⁶³ However, the 1976 decision recognises the journalist's right not to disclose information acquired by third persons in a criminal case, as there is narrow bond between journalistic confidentiality and freedom of expression.⁶⁴ Historically interpreted, this judicial decision comes out two years after the restoration of democracy in Greece after the seven years' military dictatorship (1967-1974) and the Greek judges desired to show that they follow the democratic climate of the newly-adopted Constitution of 1975, the most liberal constitution in the Greek constitutional history.

The right of non-disclosure is subjected to limitations, as they identified in the Greek and European case-law. First limitation could be identified as the right of the article 6 par. 2 of the European Convention of Human Rights, the presumption of innocence.⁶⁵ The Multimember First Instance Court of Veroia⁶⁶ recognised the fact that the right of free expression and non-disclosure has to be limited, in order the presumption of innocence of the defendant to be protected, as the case was still in the stage of the preliminary examination, and, as a consequence, the controversial newspaper article could create pieces of partiality in the judicial persons involved in the criminal procedure, so the newspaper had to compensate the plaintiff.

Another important restriction of the right of non-disclosure is the right to private life, as protected both by article 9 par. 1 of the Greek Constitution and article 8 of the European Convention of Human Rights. As private life can be defined an individual's general "sphere of confidentiality", for instance, his sexual life, health problems, arguments among the family members etc.⁶⁷

⁶¹ Decision 980 [1987] Supreme Court of Greece (Criminal Section), Criminal Chronicles 1987, 797 [Απόφαση 980/1987 Αρείου Πάγου (Ποινικό Τμήμα), Ποινικά Χρονικά 1987, 797]

⁶² Argyrios Karras, Κώδικας Ποινικής Δικονομίας, Εκδόσεις Σάκκουλα [2004] 120 [Greek]

⁶³ Ioannis Karakostas, Το Δίκαιο των ΜΜΕ, Εκδόσεις Σάκκουλα [2005] 230 [Greek]

⁶⁴ Decision 10541 [1976] Three-Member Misdemeanours Court of Athens, Criminal Chronicles 1976, 667 [Απόφαση 10541/1976 Τριμελούς Πλημμελειοδικείου Αθηνών, Ποινικά Χρονικά 1976, 667]

⁶⁵ Decision European Court of Human Rights November 24 2005, Case 53886/2000, Tourancheau and July v. France, NOMOS (Γράπεζα Νομικών Πληροφοριών)

⁶⁶ Decision 25 [2014] Multimember First Instance Court of Veroia, NOMOS (Forum for Legal Information) [Απόφαση 25/2014 Πολυμελούς Πρωτοδικείου Βέροιας, ΝΟΜΟΣ (Γράπεζα Νομικών Πληροφοριών)]

⁶⁷ George Michailidis-Nouaros, Το απαράβιαστο του ιδιωτικού βίου και η ελευθερία του τύπου, Το Σύνταγμα [1983] 379-380 [Greek]

The Supreme Administrative Court of Greece decided that the Personal Data Protection Authority rightly drew pecuniary penalty to TV station, according to articles 7 and 21 of Law 2472/1997,⁶⁸ who acquired from third sources photos from a couple's sexual life, as the rights of free expression and non-disclosure can be restricted towards the protection of personality, honour and private life, according to the article 10par.2 of the European Convention of Human Rights. Moreover, the TV station should compensate the couple, due to violation of the right to human dignity (article 2 par.1 of the Greek Constitution).⁶⁹

The right of non-disclosure can also be restricted when the prestige and dignity of a juvenile can be taken offence. In one of its decisions the Supreme Administrative Court of Greece decided that the National Radio-Television Council rightly drew sanctions to TV station, who publicized information about an 8-year old boy, who was suffering from a body disease.⁷⁰ The Court explained that the knowledge of this kind of illness could be adverse for the juvenile, because it could lead to his social isolation from his classmates. Moreover, found out violations of articles 8par.1 and 10par.1 of the Presidential Decree 77/2003⁷¹ were found, because the TV station's journalists were illegally spying the juvenile's school and showed those photos in national broadcast without the permission of the juvenile's parents.

Another example of restriction of the right of non-disclosure is the crime of unlawful impersonation of cleric of the Greek Orthodox Church (article 175 par. 2 of the Greek Criminal Code). The Supreme Administrative Court of Greece decided that this action was violating articles 6par.3 and 8par.1 of the Presidential Decree 77/2003 and the restriction of article 5A of the Greek Constitution, because the necessity of acquiring information comes contrary to other rights, such as the citizens' right to demand the Church confidentiality.⁷²

Finally, the right of non-disclosure can also be restricted in front of the right to medical confidentiality. Medical confidentiality is being regulated by article 13 of Law 3418/2005,⁷³ which manifestly mentions that doctors are obliged both to protect and not disclose information about their clients' data or history. According the Greek case-law, the right of journalistic investigation and all the relevant rights of a journalist are able to be restricted, in order medical confidentiality

⁶⁸ Law No. 2472/1997 [Protection of the Citizens from the Processing of their Data] [Προστασία των Πολιτών από την Επεξεργασία των Προσωπικών τους Δεδομένων] 1997

⁶⁹ . Decision 3545 [2002] Supreme Administrative Court of Greece, Criminal Justice 2003, 132 [Απόφαση 3545/2002 Συμβουλίου της Επικρατείας, Ποινική Δικαιοσύνη 2003, 132]

⁷⁰ . Decision 3294 [2014] Supreme Administrative Court of Greece, NOMOS (Forum for Legal Information) [Απόφαση 3294/2014 Συμβουλίου της Επικρατείας, ΝΟΜΟΣ (Τράπεζα Νομικών Πληροφοριών)]

⁷¹ Presidential Decree No. 77 [Code of Conduct of Reportorial and Other Journalistic and Political Shows] [Κώδικας Δεοντολογίας Ειδησεογραφικών και άλλων Δημοσιογραφικών και Πολιτικών Εκπομπών] 2003

⁷² Decision 900 [2015] Supreme Administrative Court of Greece, NOMOS (Forum for Legal Information) [Απόφαση 900/2015 Συμβουλίου της Επικρατείας, ΝΟΜΟΣ (Τράπεζα Νομικών Πληροφοριών)]

⁷³ Law No 3418 [Medical Ethics Code] [Κώδικας Ιατρικής Δεοντολογίας] 2005 to be protected, due to the fact that it constitutes a ius cogens provision, which has been passed by law towards the regular and correct function of public (and private) hospitals.⁷⁴

The same opinion is being adopted and by the European Court of Human Rights, which in the case of Plon v. France, recognised that everybody are entitled to enjoy the right to medical confidentiality, even the high-ranked persons, because the relevant provisions are law of public order. However, the principle of proportionality shall always be taken into consideration, when such a restrictive measure comes in force.⁷⁵

As a final thought, it is really necessary to underline that there are some steps missing in the Greek legislation, whom fulfillment can “open” the road for the secure regulation of the journalistic confidentiality. Firstly, it is vital an explicit legislation about the journalistic confidentiality, which can be strongly invoked by journalists or any other person relevant to journalism and, secondly, a simultaneous amendment of both article 212 of the Greek Criminal Procedure Law Code and article 371 of the Greek Criminal Code about the protection of professional confidentiality, which is going to include journalists to the protective spirit of the provisions.

6. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 the following principles should be respected when the necessity of disclosure is stated: absence of reasonable alternative measures, outweighing legitimate interest (protection of human life, prevention of major crime, defense of a person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime). Under which criteria can the interest in the disclosure outweigh the interest in non-disclosure?

According to Greek constitutional theory, both individual and social rights are able to be restricted. The mainest restriction is inherent, which means that it comes from the constitutional rights themselves, due to the fact that they are incorporated to the Constitution, the most fundamental and supreme law of the state, and are able to determine their own narrower or wider scope, as far as the extent of protection that provide.⁷⁶ Restrictions are being established, in order the individual and general interest to be outweighed.

⁷⁴ Decision 3880 [2002] Supreme Administrative Court of Greece, Legal Step 2003, 1987 [Απόφαση 3880/2002 Συμβουλίου της Επικρατείας, Νομικό Βήμα 2003, 1987]

⁷⁵ Nikos Alivizatos, Σχολιασμός στην Υπόθεση Plon v. France, Δίκαιο Μέσων Ενημέρωσης [1/2005] 16-17 [Greek]

⁷⁶ Dimitrios Tsatsos, Συνταγματικό Δίκαιο· Τόμος Γ', Εκδόσεις Σάκκουλα [1988] 229-232 [Greek]

First criterion for outweighing the disclosure and non-disclosure of the journalistic sources is the abusive exercise of this right. According to the article 25, paragraph 3 of the Greek Constitution, all the rights entrenched by the Greek Constitution's provisions is prohibited to be exercised abusively. This provision has the meaning that prohibits the exercise of a behaviour, which aims to illegal or out of the spirit of the Constitution purposes and, simultaneously, capsulizes the content of these rights, as the Greek constitutional theory accepts.⁷⁷ Moreover, there is abusive exercise of the right, when actions obviously exceed the ethics, as far as the social and economic intent of the it.⁷⁸ In this case it is right to decide in favour of disclosure.

Another criterion shall be the fundamental principle of the Greek Constitution, the principle of proportionality (article 25par.1 of the Greek Constitution). According to this, a restriction in a constitutional right is able to be established, if the measure that has been taken is appropriate to the purpose intended.⁷⁹ Moreover, the principle of proportionality is containing the principle of necessity, which has the meaning that the restriction has to be constituted with the necessary measure, which does not lead to the annulment of the right.⁸⁰

These principles are able to function when there is a conflict between the right of free expression and non-disclosure and the right of respect of the personality. The theory upon this matter accepts that firstly it is necessary to examine any insult of the right in personality. If this step is fulfilled, it is examined the possibility a person to has set out of the protection some aspects of his personality or these interventions in his personality to come out from the kind of life that he has chosen to live. Moreover, the time, the place and the ad hoc conditions shall be taken into consideration. Taken all them into consideration, the judge is able to decide in favour the right of non-disclosure or the right in personality.⁸¹ A characteristic example is the case of Nordisk Film & TV A/S v. Denmark. The European Court of Human Rights found that the Danish authorities rightly confiscated journalistic material of sources, due to the fact that the defendant journalist was using them, while participating into a network of paedophilia.⁸²

Furthermore, it is accepted that a measure has to be taken in favour the right of personality, it should be examined as far as its necessity concerned. The judge has to decide according to the ⁷⁷ Aristovoulos Manesis, Ατομικές Ελευθερίες, Εκδόσεις Σάκκουλα [1982] 88-89 [Greek]

⁷⁸ Constantinos Chrysogonos, Ατομικά και Κοινωνικά Δικαιώματα, Νομική Βιβλιοθήκη [2006] 70 [Greek]

⁷⁹ Ibid 90

⁸⁰ Decision 1149 [1988] Supreme Administrative Court of Greece, The Constitution 1988,325 [Απόφαση 1149/1988 Συμβουλίου της Επικρατείας], Το Σύνταγμα 1988, 325

⁸¹ Catherine Voulgari, Το δικαίωμα της δημοσιογραφικής έρευνας· Σκιαγράφηση του περιεχομένου του και οριοθέτησή του σε σχέση με το δικαίωμα της προσωπικότητας, Δίκαιο Μέσων Ενημέρωσης [3/2007] 362 [Greek]

⁸² Case of Case of Nordisk Film & TV A/S v. Denmark, ΔΙΚΟΓΡΑΦΙΑ [2012] 10 (Νομικό Περιοδικό του Δικηγορικού Συλλόγου Λάρισας)

facts of a case. A characteristic example is the Case of Delfi AS v. Estonia.⁸³ In this case the European Court of Human Rights decided that the “symbolic” penalty (320€) that the holder of a blog site established to a user, was within the scope of the article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights and the Estonian judge outweighed correctly the right of free expression and non-disclosure with the right of respect of personality.

Another criterion that the European Court of Human Rights’ case-law accepts is the truth of the details described by a journalist, although the relevant information has been obtained illegally. However, a journalist is able to use this material, if it is necessary a supreme interest to be served. The European Court of Human Rights accepted that the Slovakian authorities had violated article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights, because the journalists had an obligation to inform citizens about the management of a public insurance company, which is a political matter, although this conversation had illegally bugged.⁸⁴

Moreover, the European Court of Human Rights condemned Switzerland in the Case of Haldimann and Others v. Switzerland, because the judges decided that there was violation of article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights, due to the fact that the controversial documentary was right, it was of informative character and under no circumstances was able to harm the insurance companies’ reputation. Moreover, the situation in the insurance companies described by the documentary was real, as was proven by the Swiss courts.⁸⁵

Important criteria for the outweighing between the disclosure and non-disclosure are constituted by article 14 paragraph 3 of the Greek Constitution. According to Greek constitutional theory, newspapers can be confiscated, if the controversial newspaper or magazine article insults the Greek Orthodox religion or any other known religion, the President of the Hellenic Republic, provides information of military character or intends to violent overthrow of democracy, puts in danger the territorial integrity of Greece and it is amoral. Especially in the case that there is possibility of disclosure of information of military character, the Public Prosecutor is able to issue a writ of confiscation, even if the controversial articles haven’t been publicised, because the military confidentiality of the Greek army is not accessible to foreign armies or Greek citizens and possible acknowledgement on behalf of them could harm the Greek citizens’ right to demand insurance and integrity of their territory.⁸⁶ This reasoning seems compatible with the European Court of Human Rights case-law, according to which restrictions to the freedom of the article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights can be established if there is “coercive social necessity”, whom existence can examine both the

⁸³ Decision European Court of Human Rights November 24 2005, Case 64569/2009, Delfi AS v. Estonia, NOMOS (Τράπεζα Νομικών Πληροφοριών)

⁸⁴ Case of Radio Twist SA v. Slovakia, Δικαιο Μέσων Ενημέρωσης [2007] 139

⁸⁵ Case of Haldimann and Others v. Switzerland, Ελληνική Επιθεώρηση Ευρωπαϊκού Δικαίου [2/2015] 237-238

⁸⁶ Prodromos Dagtoglou, Ατομικά Δικαιώματα· Τόμος Α', Εκδόσεις Σάκκουλα [1991] 525 [Greek]

member-states and the European Court of Human Rights. At any case, such measures should be fully justifiable and describe the reason of restriction.⁸⁷

As a final thought, we can conclude that the Greek legal theory is in line with the Recommendation No R (2000) 7, because the Greek Constitution recognises that the journalistic confidentiality has to be outweighed with other legitimate interests and requirements. There is the Greek judge's relevant obligation to define the protective spirit of criminal and other provisions of various legal nature and, taking into consideration the facts, to be adjudged in favour of the journalistic confidentiality or any other public interest. However, this compliance is theoretical. In practice, there are not judicial decisions of major interest in the Greek judicial practice, especially by the criminal courts, in order to examine this matter by another scope, the judicial one.

7. In the light of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, how do national courts apply the respective laws with regard to the right to protect sources? In particular, how do they balance the different interests at stake?

The Greek case-law concerning the protection of journalistic sources, even though it is limited, appears very lenient towards that protection. The Greek courts generally accept that the protection of journalistic sources is a general principle of the Greek law system. They also state that a journalist's professional duty is to keep confidential the identity of its sources. Furthermore, based on Greek constitutional and common legislation, not only do they take a stand on the issue of the disclosure of journalistic sources, but they also promulgate that the freedom of the press is inextricably connected to that right of non-disclosure. It is also worth mentioning that the Greek courts have mentioned the above, since the 1970s.

7.1. Case-Law

7.1.1. Minor crimes' court (Πλημμελειοδικείο) of Heraklion - 60/1999

Background

That case concerns a publication in a local newspaper announcing a decision of the local police department of Heraklion. The decision ordered the juror administrative examination of a police officer named I.M., who had firstly examined (during an investigation) N.D (a minor police officer who worked at the immigration department), for the last had been accused by two foreign women for having acted culpably towards them. N.D. accused I.M. for having violated the penal procedure during the first examination. As a result, the Ministry of Public Order and Security ordered the mentioned above administrative examination.

⁸⁷ Paroula Naskou- Perraki, Διεθνής Προστασία Ανθρωπίνων Δικαιωμάτων, Εξδόσεις Παπαζήση [2008] 411 [Greek]

That newspaper publication, not only announced the administrative proceeding and its cause (N.D's accuses towards I.M.) but also criticized the decision taken by the Ministry. After that, the Police department ran the juror administrative examination of I.M. immediately, in order to find out who had given this information to the press and seek potential penal responsibility. Assistant Director. E.K. undertook that examination.

E.K. examined the Director of the newspaper E.M. as a witness during the examination. The latter accepted whole responsibility for the publication but denied to mention the author and its sources, as he was bound by the journalists' right of non-disclosure of sources. After that, E.M. was accused for constant perjury under articles 98 and 224par. 1&2 of the Penal Code.

7.1.2. Court's Legal Thought

The Court firstly found that under the scope of article 224 of the Penal Code, the perpetrator of the crime of perjury is the one who, while being examined by an authority in charge of prosecuting juror administrative examinations, consciously lies or denies or hides the truth. This rule is bended only when it comes to people who are bound by the professional secrecy. Article 212 of the Penal Code lists restrictively which categories of professionals are bound by the professional secrecy, however, the journalists are not among them. Article 371 of the Penal Code does not include journalists either. Consequently, the Supreme Court in Areios Pagos (ΑΠ 980/1987 ΠρωΧρ ΑΖ` 797) has judged that there is no such prohibit for the journalists to testify as witnesses and provide with every information they collected during their professional duties. It is also worth mentioning that according to article 200 of the new penal procedure code, the journalists-members of recognised professional unities, are not obliged to mention the identity of the sources which supplied them with confidential information, unless it is found that they are absolutely essential for a judged crime and their truthfulness can be confirmed only by the source's reveal.

From the above, it is clear that, at least under their present form, the articles mentioned above don't provide with a legal base that can excuse journalists from denying to reveal their sources. However, this last issue has to be judged with regard to the freedom of the press, which is guaranteed by the freedom of expression (which also includes the right to receive and transmit information).

This right is enshrined with the Unites Nations' General Assembly Universal Declaration of Human Rights of the year 1948 (article 19), while article 10 of the Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms of the year 1950 states that "Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas"

The press's important mission, as it consists the means of expression and transmission of thoughts and information and a factor which forms the public opinion, imposed its constitutional protection. Article 14 par. 1&2 of the actual Constitution (1975) state that : "Everyone is able to express and transmit verbally or via the press his/ her personal thoughts, while respecting the national law.

The press is free. Censorship and any other preventive means are prohibited". The constitutionally enshrined right of receiving and imparting information premises the freedom of its sources, which is only achieved by the protection of their secrecy. Consequently, the right of the journalists not to disclose the identity of the source, can be based on the above mentioned constitutional article.

It also has to be mentioned, that, as far as the journalistic deontology is concerned, there is an international acceptance of the fact that a journalist should never reveal its sources (article 6 of the preamble of the "Code of honour of journalists", which was adopted by the international Federation of journalists, at their second congress at Bordeaux, in 1954), while article 7 of the statutory of the Editors' Union of Everyday Newspapers of Athens inserts equal regulation in Greece.

7.1.3. Court's Decision

Under these circumstances, the accused journalist and director of the "E" newspaper, by denying to reveal the source of his sources, exercised a legal right of his, and acted inside the limits of the mentioned constitutional articles, aiming to preserve the secrecy of the newspaper's sources, a vital component for the acceptance and transmission of information.

7.2. Minor Crimes' Court of Athens – 10541/1976

In the present case, the accused for perjury journalist denied to identify his sources to the investigator. The Court found out that this very denial was not illegal, and he had to be acquitted. According to the decision's reasoning:

- The revealing of the identity of the victim-prisoner who got raped would offend violently the human dignity and would consist an infringement of her personal and family life. These goods are enshrined by the Constitution and their protection is a major obligation of the State and a right of each person alone.
- The investigator's compulsory intervention in the accusant's mind is contrary to article 14 of the Constitution, according to which "Everyone is able to express and transmit verbally or via the press his/her personal thoughts, while respecting the national law"
- The accused, while being examined as a witness, has the right not to provide with any information with which he could be blamed for committing detraction.
- The accused was blamed for the particular facts in a negative way, so he has no obligation to answer for their positive scope.
- Lastly, the journalist-accused completed his professional duty to keep his sources secret.

8. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information? Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

8. 1 What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information?

However important might be the role of press and journalism in the development of genuine democracy, it is important to set certain limits to this great power. Human dignity and protection of individuality are a common ground of violations during the conduction of journalistic research, as a result conflicts between the freedom of journalistic research/ freedom of expression and other legal interests is inevitable. Fortunately, it is usual in legal theory these battles to be resolved by the method of the evaluation of conflicting interests when the implementation of harmonization is unattainable.

Between the states of the European Union, which all are considered as mature democracies, private life is under a very special protection, which is reflected at their existing Statues. Accordingly interferences are allowed only after there has been applied computation of legitimate interest and the principle of proportionality. In this context, respectively it has been structured the basic aspects of the provisions about confidentiality of communications, which are in accordance with the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

Consequently, electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws are part of state's policies which put forward certain other interests, besides the one of freedom of expression, although it doesn't have necessarily to conclude at it's circumvention. Especially these policies might include practices such as interception of communications, surveillance actions, search or even seizure actions, in order to achieve the superior goal of ensuring a public good. Despite the invasive nature of those measures they are governed through some specific principles, which prevent the arbitrary application of the referred authorities' practices and actions.

Firstly, according to the Community Law⁸⁸ telecommunication's surveillance must be conducted under the principles of necessity and proportionality of the selected measure compared to the protection of person's privacy. As a result personal surveillance must be restricted according to those principles, legitimate interest must be evaluated, also the degree of assault of the private sphere must be proportional according to the protected public interest, and finally there must be an examination of the choice of the proper and necessary measure, according to feasibility of the particular case.⁸⁹ Considering the above for example, according to the Art. 10 of the Convention,

⁸⁸ I. P Xoxlioyros, Security Issues Electronic Infrastructure and Applications(Athens,Sakkoulas,2007)45[Greek]

⁸⁹ K.X Boulgari, The right of journalistic investigation , (ΔiMEE,2007/3)363[Greek]

only in cases of serious felonies personal surveillance is allowed, although the person under investigation has the right to be informed about the conducted procedures, as long as this knowledge doesn't prevent the proper conduction of the investigation.⁹⁰

Alongside, according to existing legal status of European States members, surveillance actions in the field of communication, even if conducted by authorities in order to assure the protection of public security, national defense and the security of the state from criminal and terrorist actions, are considered unlawful if they are not enacted under certain conditions and according to the above principles. As a result, authorities could proceed to the use of surveillance actions only as long as there are legal safeguards about the protection of the compromised rights, applying in that way the principle of transparency.⁹¹

The degree of protection that eventually is being received from the European citizens depends on the development and the adjustment of each national's legal framework to the contemporary reality of cyber revolution. In Greek legal order, the provisions about surveillance are being located at the Article 9A where it's being introduced the right for the protection of a human's personal data, especially by electronic means. All the above are ensured by the creation of an independent authority, which is constituted by law.⁹² Furthermore, in Article 19 of Greek Statue it is being ensured the absolute inviolable of secrecy of letters and other forms of free correspondence or communication. "The guaranties under which the judicial authority shall not be bound by this secrecy for reasons of national security or for purpose of investigating especially serious crimes, shall be specified by law."⁹³ This provision has been structured in the same way as the Article 10 of the Convention for the Protection for Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, since both of them take into consideration the same criteria to create the conditions of exception.

Furthermore, according to 9A and 19§2 specific independent authorities shall be specified by law in order to facilitate the protection of Personal Data and the Assurance of Secrecy of Communications.⁹⁴ Also, it must be mentioned that no Greek authority can proceed to the process of lifting the confidentiality according to Article 19 C since the use of evidence which are not complied with provisions 19, 9, 9A , are declared illegal after a substantive control from the ASC.⁹⁵ In that context, it is of great importance to take into considerations the recommendation of Council of Europe Committee of ministers⁹⁶ about the right of journalist not to disclosure their sources. According to the above provisions surveillance must be in accordance to the specific status of journalists. "For example Police or judicial authorities might

⁹⁰ I. P Xoxlioyros, Security Issues Electronic Infrastructure and Applications(Athens,Sakkoulas,2007)45[Greek]

⁹¹ Ibis.52

⁹² Statute of Greece 2008, 9A

⁹³ Statute of Greece2008, Art. 19.

⁹⁴ N.3115 (Authority assurance of confidentiality of communications.)2003[Αρχή διασφάλισης του Απορρήτου των Επικοινωνιών.]

⁹⁵ I. P Xoxlioyros, Security Issues Electronic Infrastructure and Applications(Athens,Sakkoulas,2007)46[Greek]

⁹⁶ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7.

keep journalists under surveillance for legal reasons not related to their sources. In such a case, the surveillance order and action should not reveal any information identifying a source.⁹⁷

Finally, due to the rapid development of internet era and cyber communications it is obvious that has occur the need of legislation for updating, in this aspect there has been the development of law 3471/2006⁹⁸ about “Protection of personal data and privacy in the electronic sector”, which modifies the law. 2472/1997. Noted that it is forbidden every kind of monitoring, surveillance from other besides the users, without their consent, except in cases legally authorised.⁹⁹

As far as anti-terrorism provisions are concerned things are quite less complicated either because at first governments didn't consider terrorism as a major problem for Greek society, either because it has been believed that the common penal legislation was adequate in the struggle to halt terrorists.¹⁰⁰ In this context, governments, at first, limited their actions in adopting international conventions, although later they created anti-terrorism laws such as the 1916/1990 and the most recent 2928/2001. Law 1916/1990¹⁰¹ holds a special interest in our study since it's relevant with suppression of freedom of press. According to its provisions the main purpose was to prevent terrorist organisations communicating with society through the press. However, generally it was considered as a censorship measure which is not consistent with the Statutory provisions. The recent law, 2928/2001, seems to be more of state's effort, alongside with the existing penal provisions, to show it's political will to cope with the matter. In fact every case is being dealt individually, since the involvement of the judicial control and independent authorities is extensive.

8.2. Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

The significance of the above question is based on the importance of these provisions. Since they result in a restriction of individual freedoms for certain acts, they should be defined in a clear and objective manner, so as to avoid the risk of application the restriction in cases of limited importance. It is worth mentioning that in the European Convention for the 'suppression of terrorism', signed in Strasbourg on 27.1.1977,¹⁰² a quite broad definition of terrorist offenses was adopted, so the distinction between those crimes and the individual common penal law crimes was not obvious, considering the fact that no other delimitation has been set(e.g State attack purpose).

⁹⁷ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7, Art.56.

⁹⁸ Government Gazette A 133 28/06/2006

⁹⁹ I. P Xoxlioyros, Security Issues Electronic Infrastructure and Applications(Athens,Sakkoulas,2007)52[Greek]

¹⁰⁰ L.Margaritis, The Trial of 17N,the appeals were rejected but the legal culture level downgraded.(ΠοινΔ,2003/3)301 [Greek]

¹⁰¹Law1916 (To protect society from organized crime)1990 [Για την προστασια της κοινωνιας απο το οργανωμένο έγκλημα]

¹⁰² European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism, Strasbourg, January ,1977.

Respectively, the same problem exists in Law 2928/2001 which was the latest one law adopted in Greece, aimed as it was stated to counter terrorism. In the process, the objective of course is generally viewed as confronting organised crime - although it is known that political terrorism doesn't have the basic characteristics of organised crime.¹⁰³ Actually, the text of the law makes no reference either to organised crime or to terrorist activity or even to some of their basic characteristics. Instead, the legislation includes a wide catalogue of felonies that covers almost the Criminal Code, which affects everyone who has just joint one organisation, regardless of the fact they might not fulfill the requirements of terrorisms or organized crime as it stated in Article 2 of the Palermo Treaty.¹⁰⁴ The outcome of such a vagueness can be extremely severe. For example in order to elucidate a terrorist attack the telephone privacy of all citizens and not only of those for whom there is sufficient guilt clues may be lifted. Therefore, the profuse invoking of terrorism might in some cases legitimise the basis for a substantial and widespread curtailment of civil liberties of all citizens.

On the other hand, the protection of personal data is explicitly guaranteed by constitutional norm (Article 9A). At the level of the common law, the protection guaranteed by Law 2472/1997, while specific rules for the electronic communications sector identified in Law 2774/1999. Currently, the Ministry of Justice has filed a Draft Law, which introduced into domestic law the provisions of Directive 2002/58 and modified by extensive way the Law 2472/1997, to better align with Directive 95/46.¹⁰⁵ Furthermore, special safety tools are being introduced at the use of personal data, for example the contribution of judicial control has been reinforced by the establishment of the independent authority of the Assurance of Privacy of Communications in 2003 (Law 3115/2003). In fact, if there is a specific request of the prosecuting authorities for access to telecommunications data, the institutional framework is being activated to lift the confidentiality of communications. In order to happen so, the procedure for removing the secrecy is governed by Decree 47/2005, which covers the existing legal loopholes, while it's arranged in accordance with the constitutional mandate of Article 19 only by a judicial authority.

Concluding, in the field of protection of personal data it seems that the legal framework covers the necessary "areas", especially by the Decree 47/2005 in which specified all the types of communications related to the lifting of confidentiality. On the other hand anti-terrorism provisions might not be considered as much precise, due to the fact that there are still some implication on how to distinguish common penal crimes from terrorist acts.

¹⁰³ Key characteristics of organized crime considered to be the business structure and purpose of making a profit, which are not typical of political terrorism. C. Milonopoulos, Law 2928/2001 about protection of citizens by illegal actions of criminals organizations. (Πλογ,2001)794,[Greek]

¹⁰⁴ United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime , Palermo, Italy, December,2000.

¹⁰⁵ H. Simeonidou-Kastanidou, Definition of Terrorism. (ΠοινΔτ,1/2001)62, [Greek]

9. Can journalists rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance?

The right of journalists to encryption and anonymity to protect themselves consists the right and obligation of a journalist to refuse, even before court principles, the disclosure of sources and the identification of the origin of his information and data received for issues that either already has or is willing to disclose to the public.¹⁰⁶ The protection of sources is inextricably linked to the right of anonymity and the right of freedom of expression which is guaranteed by the Greek Constitution on Article 14.¹⁰⁷ Even if it is not stated clearly article 14 guarantees the protection of journalist and their sources on internet.¹⁰⁸

Art. 14 of the Greek Constitution

“1. Every person may express and propagate his thoughts orally, in writing and through the press in compliance with the laws of the State.

2. The press is free. Censorship and all other preventive measures are prohibited.

3. The seizure of newspapers and other publications before or after circulation is prohibited.

Seizure by order of the public prosecutor shall be allowed exceptionally after circulation and in case of: a) an offence against the Christian or any other known religion, b) an insult against the person of the President of the Republic, c) a publication which discloses information on the composition, equipment and set-up of the armed forces or the fortifications of the country, or which aims at the violent overthrow of the regime or is directed against the territorial integrity of the State, d) an obscene publication which is obviously offensive to public decency, in the cases stipulated by law.

4. In all the cases specified under the preceding paragraph, the public prosecutor must, within twenty-four hours from the seizure, submit the case to the judicial council which, within the next twenty-four hours, must rule whether the seizure is to be maintained or lifted; otherwise it shall be lifted ipso jure. (...)”

After the directive of the Council of Europe in 2000, urging the Member States to adopt explicitly and recognise to their own legislation the journalistic privacy, while setting limits to the right to confidentiality of journalistic sources Greece started adopted many innovated case-law. However the protection of sources in Europe was founded by the ECtHR judgment in Goodwin and has further reinforced by subsequent cases. Greek courts have adopted the principles of the ECHR and have recognised the protection of sources through the inclusion of freedom of expression of journalists guaranteed by the Constitution and other international contracts.

More specifically, in Greece, the right of anonymity has not been established by the relevant case law on the right to freedom of the press but the confidentiality of journalists' sources is legally protected. Besides Article 14 of the Greek Constitution the Greek law is very liberal regarding the freedom of press and the protection of journalists on internet and has also adopted the Code of Professional Deontology which ensures the freedom of information and expression in the light of autonomy and dignity of journalist. The Code of Professional Deontology enshrined the ¹⁰⁶ . K. Chrysogonos, Personal and social rights

¹⁰⁷ Article 14 of Greek Constitution as revised since 2007

¹⁰⁸ Panagiotis Mantzoufas, Article: Protection of freedom of expression and Internet, 2010 obligation to respect the confidentiality regarding the sources and the identity of the informant, an opinion supported also by the Greek case law. The effective exercise of this right presupposes a trust relationship between the journalist and informants.

Art 14. Protection of sources- Code of Professional Deontology

“The journalists have a moral obligation to observe professional secrecy regarding the source of information obtained confidentially. Journalist is not obliged to reveal the source of his information. At the same time, it is the duty of the journalist to ensure that the sources of the information they provide is valid.”

Greek law does not explicitly recognise to journalist the right of anonymity and encryption or the right to refuse to testify. More specifically, Article 371 of Greek Penal Code mentions:

- 1. Clergymen, lawyers and any kind of legal counsel, notaries, doctors, midwives, nurses, pharmacists and others to whom some trust usually because of their profession or status of private secrets and assistants of such persons, be punished by a fine or by imprisonment up to one year if they reveal private secrets of the trust or the learned because of their profession or their status.*
- 2. Similarly punished, after the death of one of the faces of para. 1, and from this cause is document owner or notes of the deceased on the exercise of his profession, or of his status and these reveal private secrets.*
- 3. The prosecution only by indictment.*
- 4. The practice is not unfair and goes unpunished if the perpetrator intended to fulfill his duty or to safeguard legitimate or otherwise justified substantial interest * public or himself or another, which could not be preserved otherwise.”*

Article 371 of the Criminal Code which punishes the violation of professional secrecy does not recognize explicitly the duty of professional confidentiality of journalists. However it has been supported that press is an important social vocation, because it provides an important social mission to people.¹⁰⁹ Since then, journalists are under obligation to respect professional secrecy, especially when the events accredited by the privacy of the individual.¹¹⁰ Also, Greek courts have interpreted this provision and have included also the protection of journalists'. The Supreme Court of Greece in the case number 980/1987 granted the protection of sources and highlighted the close connection with the freedom of the press. What is more, the confidentiality of journalist relies mainly on maintaining anonymity including whichever might lead to the disclosure of the informant.¹¹¹ Therefore, journalist's duty of confidentiality contents events, which closely linked to the informant¹¹² and especially when the source of the information is, confidential and under the scope of the protection of private life.¹¹³

¹⁰⁹ Misdemeanor Court of Heraklion, 60/1999

¹¹⁰ Vougiouka, The Criminal Law of Special Criminal Regulations, 67

¹¹¹ Misdemeanor Court of Athens, 10541/1976

¹¹² Appeal Court of Athens, 9975/1986

¹¹³ Karanikas, Manual of Criminal Law, 324

10. Are whistle-blowers explicitly protected under law protecting journalistic sources? Is there another practice protecting whistle-blowers? Is the legislation prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers?

Following many Greek scandals, originating both from the public and private sector and the refusal of involved parties to break their silence, something had to be done. The term protection of journalistic sources is a major characteristic of most national legal regimes regarding journalism and consists of the right and the obligation that a journalist has, to refuse, even in judicial proceedings, disclosure of sources, the identification of the origin of the information and data received on matters that either already has been or will be disclosed to the public.¹¹⁴ Greek legislation decided to acknowledge that and established a system of protection, as we will see further on.

A whistle-blower is a person who exposes any kind of information or activity that is deemed illegal, unethical or not correct within an organisation that is either private or public.¹¹⁵ Those people who disclose wrongdoing play a critical role in the fight against corruption, because detection is a precondition to initiate investigations that will lead to prosecution. The information of alleged wrongdoing can be classified in many ways: violation of company policy/rules, law, regulation, or threat to the “ordre public”/national security, as well as fraud, and corruption. Those who become whistle-blowers can choose to bring information or allegations to surface either internally or externally. Internally, a whistle-blower can bring his/her accusations to the attention of other people within the accused organisation. Externally, a whistle-blower can bring allegations to light by contacting a third party outside of an accused organisation. He/She can reach out to the media, government, law enforcement, or those who are concerned. Whistle-blowers differ from the so called “witnesses” in the Greek legal system, as the whistle-blower comes forward to provide information always on his own initiative and the illegal or wrongful act comes to light for the first time thanks to the disclosure made by the whistle-blower.¹¹⁶ Regarding the behavior of (potential) whistle-blowers it has been observed that in many cases, people who knew did not provide information, as they failed to acknowledge the offence or the abusive act that was taking place in their surroundings.¹¹⁷ Furthermore, senior executives tend to become whistle-blowers with greater frequency, employees tend to become ¹¹⁴Kargopoulos, A. (2008/2), The protection of journalistic sources. Entitlement and conditions of implementation and downturn, Media law, p. 158

¹¹⁵Vandekerckhove, Wim (2006). Whistleblowing and Organizational Social Responsibility : A Global Assessment. Ashgate.

¹¹⁶ European Parliament – Directorate General Internal Policies of the Union – Budgetary Support Unit – Budgetary Affairs, Whistleblowing Rules: Best Practice; Assessment and Revision of Rules Existing in EU Institutions, pp. 9.

¹¹⁷ Ethics Resource Center, Inside the Mind of a Whistleblower - a Supplement Report of the 2011 National Business Ethics Survey, 2012.

whistle-blowers more often when they feel that the financial situation of the institution in which they work is good, when they themselves feel financially secure and protected by retaliation. In this regard, it is noted that employees who are members of the relevant workers' union tend to become whistle-blowers with greater frequency!¹¹⁸

Third-party groups like Wikileaks and others offer protection to whistle-blowers, but that protection can only go so far. Whistle-blowers face legal action, criminal charges, social stigma, and termination from any position, office, or job. Two other classifications of whistleblowing are private and public. The classifications relate to the type of organisations someone chooses to whistle-blow on: private sector, or public sector. Both can have different results that depend on many factors. However, whistleblowing in the public sector organisation is more likely to result in federal felony charges and jail-time. A whistle-blower who chooses to accuse a private sector organisation or agency is more likely to face termination and legal and civil charges. Deeper questions and theories of whistleblowing and why people choose to do so can be studied through an ethical approach. Whistleblowing is truly an entirely ethical decision, and action. In the case of many like Edward Snowden, whistleblowing is seen as the last ethically right thing to do. Legal protection can also be granted to protect whistle-blowers, but that protection is subject to many stipulations. Hundreds of laws grant protection to whistle-blowers, but stipulations can easily cloud that protection and leave whistle-blowers vulnerable to retaliation and legal trouble. Whistleblowing is not a new phenomenon. In fact, it is thousands of years old. However, the decision and action has become far more complicated with recent advancements in technology and communication.¹¹⁹ Whistle-blowers frequently face reprisal, sometimes at the hands of the organization or group which they have accused, sometimes from related organisations, and sometimes under law. Questions about the legitimacy of whistleblowing, the moral responsibility of whistleblowing, and the appraisal of the institutions of whistleblowing are part of the field of political ethics.¹²⁰

The protection of journalistic sources is guaranteed by the Greek Constitution, as an aspect of the active right to information. The right to information is specifically protected under the Article 5A of the Greek Constitution, as revised by the parliamentary resolution of May 27th 2008 of the VIII Revisionary Parliament. Accordingly, "1. All persons have the right to information, as specified by law. Restrictions to this right may be imposed by law only insofar as they are absolutely necessary and justified for reasons of national security, of combating crime or of protecting rights and interests of third parties. 2. All persons have the right to participate in the Information Society. Facilitation of access to electronically transmitted information, as well as of the production, exchange and diffusion thereof, constitutes an obligation of the State, always in observance of the guarantees of articles 9, 9A and 19."

¹¹⁸ Providing an Alternative to Silence: Towards Greater Protection and Support for Whistle-blowers in the EU Country Report - Greece, Transparency International, April 2013

¹¹⁹Delmas, Candice (January 2015). "The Ethics of Government Whistleblowing". Social Theory and Practice.

¹²⁰Wikipedia, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Whistle-blower>

The legality of the information collection, in particular when it is imposed by the public interest,¹²¹ goes hand-in-hand with the legality of the information publication, under the condition that the concerned journalist did not take part in the illegal collection/acquisition of information.¹²² Until recently, Greece was not in disposition of a law for the specific, efficient and sufficient protection of whistle-blowers, while there was little or no political momentum to address these shortcomings, despite the considerable number of big financial and political scandals in combination with the alleged threats against whistle-blowers and journalists.^{123 124}

Albeit, in 2014 in accordance with the international obligations that Greece undertook with the ratification of the United Nations Convention Against Corruption (Art.33),¹²⁵ the Council of Europe Civil Law Convention on Corruption¹²⁶ in combination with the Council of Europe Criminal Law Convention on Corruption (Art.22)^{127 128} and its commitments established with the Memorandum of Understanding on Economic and Financial Policies concerning the overall reform of tax administration¹²⁹ as well as its anti-corruption policy objectives presented in the national anti-corruption action plan of 2013,¹³⁰ the Law 4254/2014 (85/Α/7-4-2014) was issued, providing under the auspices of Article 1, para. XV (in Greek: IE) and its subparagraphs 15, 16 and 17 for the first time in the Greek criminal law specific protection for the “whistle-blowers”.¹³¹ In particular, according to the Article 45B of the Criminal Procedure Code, which was added with the afore-mentioned subparagraph 15, every person who contributes essentially thanks to the information he/she gives to the Authorities, without being personally involved in the particular case and without having a personal interest in the reporting and processing of ¹²¹ Guja v. Moldova, [2008] European Court of Human Rights [Grand Chamber] 26.

¹²² See the Decision 122/2012 issued by the Hellenic Data Protection Authority and the Decision of the Supreme Administrative Court 1213/2010 [Grand Chamber].

¹²³ M. Worth (2013), Whistleblowing in Europe: Legal protections for whistle-blowers in Europe, Transparency International, 49-50.

¹²⁴ Transparency International Hellas (2013), Alternative to silence: Effective protection and support of the whistle-blowers in European Union [Greek], 11-14.

¹²⁵ Law n.3666 (Ratification and application of the United Nations Convention Against Corruption and amendment of the relevant Criminal Code provisions) 2008 [Κύρωση και εφαρμογή της Σύμβασης των Ηνωμένων Εθνών κατά της Διαφθοράς και αντικατάσταση των συναφών διατάξεων του Ποινικού Κώδικα].

¹²⁶ Law n. 2957 (Ratification of the Council of Europe Civil Law Convention on Corruption) 2001 [Κύρωση και εφαρμογή της Σύμβασης του Συμβουλίου της Ευρώπης για θέματα Αστικού Δικαίου περί διαφθοράς].

¹²⁷ Law n. 3560 (Ratification of the Council of Europe Criminal Law Convention on Corruption) 2007 [Κύρωση και εφαρμογή της Σύμβασης Ποινικού Δικαίου για τη διαφθορά και του Πρόσθετου σε αυτήν Πρωτοκόλλου].

¹²⁸ Act of the Athens Appeals Court Prosecutor n. 7 (Definition of the whistle-blower – international/european/national application of the institution-Meaning and consequences) 2015 [ΠραξΕισΕφΑθ 7/2015 -Έννοια μάρτυρα δημοσίου συμφέροντος (whistle-blower) – Διεθνής/ευρωπαϊκή/ εθνική κατοχύρωση θεσμού – Έννοια και συνέπειες] ΠΟΙΝΙΚΗ ΔΙΚΑΙΟΣΥΝΗ Τεύχος 5/2015, Μάιος [Greek]. With this Act, the first whistleblower in Greece, with regards to the new law provisions, was recognised.

¹²⁹ European Commission, Greece to the EU anti-corruption report, Brussels 2014, 4.

¹³⁰ Hellenic Republic, Ministry of Justice, Transparency and Human Rights, Transparency: National anti-corruption action plan, January 2013, 66.

¹³¹ Law n. 4254 (Measures for the support and development of the Greek economy within the application framework of the Law n. 4046/2012 and other provisions) 2014 [Μέτρα στήριξης και ανάπτυξης της ελληνικής οικονομίας στο πλαίσιο εφαρμογής του ν. 4046/2012 και άλλες διατάξεις].

cases related to bribery - including both giving and receiving a bribe - of politicians,¹³² of state employees,¹³³ of law officers¹³⁴ as well as commerce/influence of intermediaries,¹³⁵ and all the acts related to them, may be called “whistle-blower” (in Greek: witness of public interest – μάρτυρας δημοσίου συμφέροντος) and be provided with special protection measures, as seen hereinafter.

Furthermore, according to Art. 45B, a person may be recognized as “whistle-blower” with the Act of the competent Prosecutor, after the consent of the Deputy Public Prosecutor of the Supreme Criminal Court. This Act may be revoked at any stage of the criminal process, if the Prosecutor judges that the reasons for its issue lack their validity. If a complaint is pending against the whistle-blower concerning crimes of perjury, false accusation, malicious slander, as well as infringement of the professional confidentiality or of personal data, the Deputy Public Prosecutor of the Supreme Criminal Court may request the permanent refraining from prosecution, as long as the prosecution of the whistle-blower is not necessary for the protection of the public interest.

The Law 4254/2014 also added in the Art. 9 of the Law 2928/2001 (141/A/27-06-2001)¹³⁶ a 7th paragraph,¹³⁷ which permits the effective protection of whistle-blowers against alleged acts of threat and revenge under the provisions of Art. 9 par. 1 till 5 of the latter law and extends the protection as well to their relatives – if necessary. The suggested process of protection includes the following:

- Protection offered by qualified police staff;
- Recording of the whistle-blower statement with the use of audiovisual or only audio means;
- No-reference of the whistle-blower’s name, birthplace, residence and workplace address, profession and age on the statement/examination report;
- Alteration of the whistle-blower’s identity data;
- Relocation of state employees for an undetermined time period, with the issue of a ministerial decision satisfying all the necessary precautions of confidentiality.

¹³² as described in Art. 159 and 159A (Bribery of state officials) [Δωροληψία και δωροδοκία πολιτικών Αξιωματούχων] of the Criminal Code.

¹³³ as described in Art. 235 and 236 (Bribery of employee)[Δωροληψία και δωροδοκία υπαλλήλου] of the Criminal Code.

¹³⁴ as described in Art. 237 (Bribery of law officers) [Δωροληψία και δωροδοκία δικαστικών λειτουργών] of the Criminal Code.

¹³⁵ as described in Art. 237A (Commerce/influence of intermediaries)[Εμπορία επιρροής – Μεσάζοντες] of the Criminal Code.

¹³⁶ Law n.2928 (Modification of provisions of both the Criminal Code and the Code of Administrative Procedure as well as other provisions for the protection of the citizen against crimes committed by criminal organizations) 2001 [Τροποποίηση διατάξεων του Ποινικού Κώδικα και του Κώδικα Ποινικής Δικονομίας και άλλες διατάξεις για την προστασία του πολίτη από αξιόποινες πράξεις εγκληματικών οργανώσεων].

¹³⁷ Art.1, para. XV subpara. 2 of the Law n. 4254/2014.

Leniency measures are enforced, on the grounds of the Art. 263B of the Criminal Code¹³⁸ when the person who is involved in the crimes of the aforementioned Art. 236 para. 1, 2 and 3 and 237 para. 2 and 3 as well as 237B para. 1 of the Criminal Code¹³⁹ voluntarily confesses his/her acts to the competent Prosecutor or any other competent authority. In this case, the concerned person is not prosecuted. If the liable person or an associate reveals to the Authorities the participation of another employee in the above-mentioned crimes as well as those described in Articles 239 - 261 and article 390 of the Criminal Code,¹⁴⁰ then his/her sentence gets reduced.¹⁴¹ Similarly, lenient treatment may be adopted for crimes described in Articles 235 - 261 and 390 of the Criminal Code in the following cases: a) the liable person or associate who contributes essentially in the disclosure of corruption acts conducted by an employee in a higher position, conveys all the goods he/she has illegally obtained to the state,¹⁴² b) the liable person provides proof when current or vice members of the government are involved in corruption cases.¹⁴³

As far as it concerns in particular the state employees who disclose corruption cases, two categories of protection may be detected: a) state employees, recognised as “whistle-blowers” and b) state employees, not recognised as “whistle-blowers”, but with essential contribution in the revelation and prosecution of cases under the above-mentioned Art. 45B of the Criminal Procedure Code. Under the category (a), according to the Art. 26 of the Code for the Status of State Political Administrative Employees and Employees of Legal Entities of Public Law as ratified with the Law n. 3528/2007¹⁴⁴ and revised with the Art. 1, para. XV, subpara. 17 of the Law n. 4254/2014, state employees recognised as “whistle-blowers” are offered the following guarantees: they are considered for the promotion process, cannot be subjects of disciplinary processes or punishment, cannot be fired and do not face directly or indirectly any other unfavorable treatment - mainly, with regards to promotion, transfer or hiring, during the necessary for the case investigative time, carried out by the court. Under the category (b), the state employees who have contributed essentially but they are not recognised as “whistle-blowers”, are protected against any arbitrary disciplinary prosecution – the burden of proof is ¹³⁸ Art. 263B of the Criminal Code (Protection and leniency measures for those who contribute in the disclosure of corruption acts) [Μέτρα Προστασίας και Επειρείας για Όσους Συμβάλλουν στην Αποκάλυψη Πράξεων Διαφθοράς].

¹³⁹ Art. 237B of the Criminal Code (Bribery in the private sector) [237B: Δωροληψία και δωροδοκία στον ιδιωτικό τομέα].

¹⁴⁰ Art. 239 – 261 and 390 of the Criminal Code (under the general category: offences related to Abuse of Office) [εγκλήματα σχετικά με την υπηρέσια].

¹⁴¹ On the grounds of Art. 44 para. 2 (a) of the Criminal Code (Withdrawal from the act) [Υπαναχώρηση].

¹⁴² Art. 263B para. 3 of the Criminal Code.

¹⁴³ Art. 263B para. 4 (a) of the Criminal Code.

¹⁴⁴ Law n. 3528 (Ratification of Code for the Status of State Political Administrative Employees and Employees of Legal Entities of Public Law) 2007 [Κύρωση του Κώδικα Κατάστασης Δημοσίων Πολιτικών Διοικητικών Υπαλλήλων και Υπαλλήλων Ν.Π.Δ.Δ].

reversed and affects the disciplinary committee, which starts the process.¹⁴⁵ Moreover, their anonymity is totally protected during the preliminary investigation, as long as they are not involved in any way in the crimes or they do not aim to make a personal profit out of them.¹⁴⁶

After the preliminary investigation, the anonymity is protected only if the concerned employee becomes subject of the protection of the Art. 9 of the Law 2928/2001, as read above.

Concerning employees in private companies - based on the OECD Good Practice Guidance on Internal Controls, Ethics, and Compliance - many Greek companies appear to have developed some form of corporate compliance, internal controls and ethics programmes, often followed by the issue of Codes of Corporate Ethics, where provisions about whistle-blowers are included.¹⁴⁷ Nevertheless, even for companies that have compliance programmes which deal with bribery and other forms of crime, it is not entirely clear that these programmes have been fully implemented, while at the same time there is a deficiency of legal provisions establishing a harmonised national framework and a general standard of codes of ethics.¹⁴⁸ Last but not least, civil society has also implemented initiatives for reporting bribes or corrupt practices, mostly through anonymous online report mechanisms.¹⁴⁹

All in all, despite the positive steps that can be observed the last years, especially after the frustrating conclusion of the Third Evaluation Phase Compliance Report on Greece, adopted by GRECO in 2012,¹⁵⁰ where Greece was found to comply with only one of the 27 recommendations contained in the Third Round Evaluation Report adopted in 2010 concerning anti-corruption measures, there is still space for improvement, always bearing in mind the recent decisions of the EctHR about freedom of expression. Particularly, some of the critics to the current legislation and policy refer to the lack of a central agency where whistle-blowers can bring their cases, the fact that whistleblowing may be protected when related to a few specific criminal offences – mostly bribery cases - but not all of them, the problematic of anonymous complaints in Greek law and last but not least, the lack of regulation for the private sector.

¹⁴⁵ Art. 110, para. 6 of the Law n. 3528/2007, ibid.

¹⁴⁶ Art. 125, para. 4 of the Law n. 3528/2007, ibid.

¹⁴⁷ M. Worth (2013), Whistleblowing in Europe: Legal protections for whistle-blowers in Europe, Transparency International, 49-50.

¹⁴⁸ OECD, Phase 3 report on implementing the OECD anti-bribery convention in Greece, June 2012, 33.

¹⁴⁹ European Commission, Greece to the EU anti-corruption report, Brussels 2014, 4. For instance: <http://www.edosafakelaki.org/>

¹⁵⁰ Council of Europe and Group of States against Corruption (GRECO), Compliance Report on Greece "Incriminations (ETS 173 and 191, GPC 2) and "Transparency of Party Funding", June 2012,11.

11. Conclusion

To sum up, this is the legal basis and the courts' practice in Greece, as far as the topic of disclosure of journalists' sources is concerned. Even if there is no special legislation, clearly recognising the journalist privilege, neither explicit right for refusal of testimony, it constitutes, however, one of the widely recognised rights. It is getting empowered through practice, which has established a precedence protecting it over conflicting rights. The journalist privilege is an integral part of freedom of Press, therefore belonging to the core of the jus cogens international rules. The conditions under which it can retreat have been presented above, with a hope that even more stable legal guarantees will be enacted in the future. The ECtHR's jurisprudence is always pioneer in setting the pace for this protection; there is, therefore, anticipation from the Greek legislators to introduce a new, specific legal frame.

The freedom of Expression is a significant precondition for the stable and proper operation of a democratic state, so the Press is only able to fulfil its mission in the society, if the secrecy of its sources is really secured.

After all, "Freedom of Press is not an end in itself, but a means to the end of achieving a free society"-Felix Frankfurter

12. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

12.1. Legislation

- Προεδρικό Διάταγμα 77/2003 (Φ.Ε.Κ. 77-Α' 28-3-2003).
- Recommendation No. R (2000) 7.

12.2. Case Law

- Goodwin v United. Kingdom 27.03.1996.
- Nordisk Film & TV A/S 08.12.2005.
- Financial Times vs. United Kingdom 15.12.2009.
- Magistrate's Court of Athens 10541/1976, Criminal Annals 667, [ΠλημμΑ010541/1976 , ΠοινΧρον].
- Magistrate's Court of Athens 36773/1980 [ΠλημμΑ0 36773/1980].
- Magistrate's Court of Athens 4092/1999 Criminal Annals 1057, [ΠλημμΑ0 4092/1999 , ΠοινΧρον].

12.3. Books and articles

12.3.1 English titles

- Vandekerckhove, Wim (2006). Whistleblowing and Organizational Social Responsibility: A Global Assessment. Ashgate
- Delmas, Candice (January 2015). "The Ethics of Government Whistleblowing". Social Theory and Practice.
- Worth, M. (2013), Whistleblowing in Europe: Legal protections for whistle-blowers in Europe, Transparency International.

12.3.2. Greek titles

- Argiris Karras, Criminal Code 119 [Αργύρης Καρράς, Ποινικός Κώδικας 119].
- Ioannis Karakostas, The Press Law [Ιωάννης Καράκωστας, Το Δίκαιο των ΜΜΕ](Νομική Βιβλιοθήκη 2012).
- Prodromos Dagtoglou, Constitutional Law- Individual Rights [Πρόδρομος Δαγτόγλου, Συνταγματικό Δίκαιο- Ατομικά Δικαιώματα] (Εκδόσεις Σάκκουλα 2012).
- Kargopoulos, A. (2008/2), The protection of journalistic sources. Entitlement and conditions of implementation and downturn, Media law
- Transparency International Hellas (2013), Alternative to silence: Effective protection and support of the whistle-blowers in European Union [Greek].
- Aggelos Konstantinidis, The Protection of Sources Criminal Annals [Άγγελος Κωνσταντινίδης, Το Δημοσιογραφικό Απόρρητο Ποινικά Χρονικά 1994].

- Alexandros Kargopoulos, The Protection of Sources. Press Law [Αλέξανδρος Καργόπουλος, Το Δημοσιογραφικό Απόρρητο. Δίκαιο Μέσων Ενημέρωσης και Επικοινωνίας- ΔΙΜΕΕ].

12.4. Internet Sources

- <http://www.esica.gr/arxes-deontologias/>

13. Table of Provisions

Provisions in native language	Corresponding translation
Σύνταγμα της Ελλάδος	Greek Constitution
Άρθρο 14: 1. Καθένας μπορεί να εκφράζει και να διαδίδει προφορικά, γραπτά και δια του τύπου τους στοχασμούς του τηρώντας τους νόμους του Κράτους. 2. Ο τύπος είναι ελεύθερος. Η λογοκρισία και κάθε άλλο προληπτικό μέτρο απαγορεύονται. 3. Η κατάσχεση εφημερίδων και άλλων εντύπων, είτε πριν από την κυκλοφορία είτε ύστερα από αυτή, απαγορεύεται. Κατ' εξαίρεση επιτρέπεται η κατάσχεση, με παραγγελία του εισαγγελέα, μετά την κυκλοφορία: α) για προσβολή της χριστιανικής και κάθε άλλης γνωστής θρησκείας, β) για προσβολή του προσώπου του Προέδρου της Δημοκρατίας, γ) για δημοσίευμα που αποκαλύπτει πληροφορίες για τη σύνθεση, τον εξοπλισμό και τη διάταξη των ενόπλων δυνάμεων ή την οχύρωση της Χώρας ή που έχει σκοπό τη βίαιη ανατροπή του πολιτεύματος ή στρέφεται κατά της εδαφικής ακεραιότητας του Κράτους, δ) για άσεμνα δημοσιεύματα που προσβάλλουν ολοφάνερα τη δημόσια αιδώ, στις περιπτώσεις που ορίζει ο νόμος. 4. Σ' όλες τις περιπτώσεις της προηγούμενης παραγράφου ο εισαγγελέας, μέσα σε είκοσι τέσσερις ώρες από την κατάσχεση, οφείλει να υποβάλει την υπόθεση στο δικαστικό συμβούλιο, και αυτό, μέσα σε άλλες είκοσι τέσσερις ώρες, οφείλει να αποφασίσει για τη διατήρηση ή την άρση της κατάσχεσης, διαφορετικά η κατάσχεση αίρεται αυτοδικαίως. Τα ένδικα μέσα της έφεσης και της	Article 14 1. Every person may express and propagate his thoughts orally, in writing and through the press in compliance with the laws of the State. 2. The press is free. Censorship and all other preventive measures are prohibited. 3. The seizure of newspapers and other publications before or after circulation is prohibited. Seizure by order of the public prosecutor shall be allowed exceptionally after circulation and in case of: a) an offence against the Christian or any other known religion, b) an insult against the person of the President of the Republic, c) a publication which discloses information on the composition, equipment and set-up of the armed forces or the fortifications of the country, or which aims at the violent overthrow of the regime or is directed against the territorial integrity of the State, d) an obscene publication which is obviously offensive to public decency, in the cases stipulated by law. 4. In all the cases specified under the preceding paragraph, the public prosecutor must, within twenty-four hours from the seizure, submit the case to the judicial council which, within the next twenty-four hours, must rule whether the seizure is to be maintained or lifted; otherwise it shall be lifted ipso jure. An appeal may be lodged with the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Civil and αναίρεσης επιτρέπονται στον εκδότη της εφημερίδας ή άλλου εντύπου που κατασχέθηκε και στον εισαγγελέα.

5. Καθένας ο οποίος θίγεται από ανακριβές δημοσίευμα ή εκπομπή έχει δικαίωμα απάντησης, το δε μέσο ενημέρωσης έχει αντιστοίχως υποχρέωση πλήρους και άμεσης επανόρθωσης. Καθένας ο οποίος θίγεται από υβριστικό ή δυσφημιστικό δημοσίευμα ή εκπομπή έχει, επίσης, δικαίωμα απάντησης, το δε μέσο ενημέρωσης έχει αντιστοίχως υποχρέωση άμεσης δημοσίευσης ή μετάδοσης της απάντησης. Νόμος ορίζει τον τρόπο με τον οποίο ασκείται το δικαίωμα απάντησης και διασφαλίζεται η πλήρης και άμεση επανόρθωση ή η δημοσίευση και μετάδοση της απάντησης.

6. Το δικαστήριο, ύστερα από τρεις τουλάχιστον καταδίνες μέσα σε μία πενταετία για διάπραξη των εγκλημάτων που προβλέπονται στην παράγραφο 3, διατάσσει την οριστική ή προσωρινή παύση της έκδοσης του εντύπου και, σε βαριές περιπτώσεις, την απαγόρευση της άσκησης του δημοσιογραφικού επαγγέλματος από το πρόσωπο που καταδικάστηκε, όπως νόμος ορίζει. Η παύση ή η απαγόρευση αρχίζουν από την ημερομηνία της απόφασης ή της αμετάκλητης.

7. Νόμος ορίζει τα σχετικά με την αστική και ποινική ευθύνη του τύπου και των άλλων μέσων ενημέρωσης και με την ταχεία εκδίκαση των σχετικών υποθέσεων.

8. Νόμος ορίζει τις προϋποθέσεις και τα προσόντα για την άσκηση του δημοσιογραφικού επαγγέλματος.

9. Το ιδιοκτησιακό καθεστώς, η οικονομική κατάσταση και τα μέσα χρηματοδότησης των μέσων ενημέρωσης πρέπει να γίνονται γνωστά, όπως νόμος ορίζει. Νόμος προβλέπει τα μέτρα και τους περιορισμούς που είναι αναγκαίοι για την πλήρη διασφάλιση της διαφάνειας και της πολυφωνίας στην ενημέρωση. Απαγορεύεται η συγκέντρωση του

Criminal Court by the publisher of the newspaper or other printed matter seized and by the public prosecutor.

 5. Every person offended by an inaccurate publication or broadcast has the right to reply, and the information medium has a corresponding obligation for full and immediate redress. Every person offended by an insulting or defamatory publication or broadcast has also the right to reply, and the information medium has a corresponding obligation to immediately publish or transmit the reply. The manner in which the right to reply is exercised and in which full and immediate redress is assured or publication and transmission of the reply is made, shall be specified by law.

6. After at least three convictions within five years for the criminal acts defined under paragraph 3, the court shall order the definitive ban or the temporary suspension of the publication of the paper and, in severe cases, shall prohibit the convicted person from practising the profession of journalist as specified by law. The ban or suspension of publication shall be effective as of the date the court order becomes irrevocable.

 7. Matters relating to the civil and criminal liability of the press and of the other information media and to the expeditious trial of relevant cases, shall be specified by law.

8. The conditions and qualifications requisite for the practice of the profession of journalist shall be specified by law.

 9. The ownership status, the financial situation and the means of financing of information media must be made known as specified by law. The measures and restrictions necessary for fully ensuring transparency and plurality in information shall be specified by law. The concentration of the control of more than one

ελέγχου περισσότερων μέσων ενημέρωσης της αυτής ή άλλης μορφής. Απαγορεύεται ειδικότερα η συγκέντρωση περισσότερων του ενός ηλεκτρονικών μέσων ενημέρωσης της αυτής μορφής, όπως νόμος ορίζει. Η ιδιότητα του ιδιοκτήτη, του εταίρου, του βασικού μετόχου ή του διευθυντικού στελέχους επιχείρησης μέσων ενημέρωσης είναι ασυμβίβαστη με την ιδιότητα του ιδιοκτήτη, του εταίρου, του βασικού μετόχου ή του διευθυντικού στελέχους επιχείρησης που αναλαμβάνει έναντι του Δημοσίου ή νομικού προσώπου του ευρύτερου δημόσιου τομέα την εκτέλεση έργων ή προμηθειών ή την παροχή υπηρεσιών. Η απαγόρευση του προηγούμενου εδαφίου καταλαμβάνει και κάθε είδους παρένθετα πρόσωπα, όπως συζύγους, συγγενείς, οικονομικά εξαρτημένα άτομα ή εταιρείες. Νόμος ορίζει τις ειδικότερες ρυθμίσεις, τις κυρώσεις που μπορεί να φθάνουν μέχρι την ανάκληση της άδειας ραδιοφωνικού ή τηλεοπτικού σταθμού και μέχρι την απαγόρευση σύναψης ή την ακύρωση της σχετικής σύμβασης, καθώς και τους τρόπους ελέγχου και τις εγγυήσεις αποτροπής των καταστρατηγήσεων των προηγούμενων εδαφίων.	information media of the same type or of different types is prohibited. More specifically, concentration of more than one electronic information media of the same type is prohibited, as specified by law. The capacity of owner, partner, major shareholder or managing director of an information media enterprise, is incompatible with the capacity of owner, partner, major shareholder or managing director of an enterprise that undertakes towards the Public Administration or towards a legal entity of the wider public sector to perform works or to supply goods or services. The prohibition of the previous section extends also over all types of intermediary persons, such as spouses, relatives, financially dependent persons or companies. The specific regulations, the sanctions, which may extend to the point of revocation of the license of a radio or television station and to the point of prohibition of the conclusion or to the annulment of the pertinent contract, as well as the means of control and the guarantees for the prevention of infringements of the previous sections, shall be determined by law.
Άρθρο 15: 1. Οι προστατευτικές για τον τύπο διατάξεις του προηγούμενου άρθρου δεν εφαρμόζονται στον κινηματογράφο, τη φωνογραφία, τη ραδιοφωνία, την τηλεόραση και κάθε άλλο παρεμφερές μέσο μετάδοσης λόγου ή παράστασης. 2. Η ραδιοφωνία και η τηλεόραση υπάγονται στον άμεσο έλεγχο του Κράτους. Ο έλεγχος και η επιβολή των διοικητικών κυρώσεων υπάγονται στην αποκλειστική αρμοδιότητα του Εθνικού Συμβουλίου Ραδιοτηλεόρασης που είναι ανεξάρτητη αρχή, όπως νόμος ορίζει. Ο άμεσος έλεγχος του Κράτους, που λαμβάνει και τη μορφή του καθεστώτος της προηγούμενης άδειας, έχει ως σκοπό την αντικειμενική και με ίσους όρους μετάδοση πληροφοριών και ειδήσεων, καθώς και προϊόντων του λόγου και της τέχνης, την εξασφάλιση της ποιοτικής στάθμης των προγραμμάτων που επιβάλλει η κοινωνική αποστολή της ραδιοφωνίας και της τηλεόρασης και	Article 15 1. The protective provisions for the press in the preceding article shall not be applicable to films, sound recordings, radio, television or any other similar medium for the transmission of speech or images.  2. Radio and television shall be under the direct control of the State. The control and imposition of administrative sanctions belong to the exclusive competence of the National Radio and Television Council, which is an independent authority, as specified by law. The direct control of the State, which may also assume the form of a prior permission status, shall aim at the objective and on equal terms transmission of information and news reports, as well as of works of literature and art, at ensuring the quality level of programs mandated by the social mission of radio and television and by the cultural development of the Country, as well as at the

η πολιτιστική ανάπτυξη της Χώρας, καθώς και το σεβασμό της αξίας του ανθρώπου και την προστασία της παιδικής ηλικίας και της νεότητας. Νόμος ορίζει τα σχετικά με την υποχρεωτική και δωρεάν μετάδοση των εργασιών της Βουλής και των επιτροπών της, καθώς και προεκλογικών μηνυμάτων των κομμάτων από τα ραδιοτηλεοπτικά μέσα.	respect of the value of the human being and the protection of childhood and youth. Matters relating to the mandatory and free of charge transmission of the workings of the Parliament and of its committees, as well as of the electoral campaign messages of the political parties by radio and television, shall be specified by law.
Άρθρο 19: 1. Το απόρρητο των επιστολών και της ελεύθερης ανταπόκρισης ή επικοινωνίας με οποιονδήποτε άλλο τρόπο είναι απόλυτα απαραβίαστο. Νόμος ορίζει τις εγγυήσεις υπό τις οποίες η δικαστική αρχή δεν δεσμεύεται από το απόρρητο για λόγους εθνικής ασφάλειας ή για διακρίβωση ιδιαίτερα σοβαρών εγκλημάτων. 2. Νόμος ορίζει τα σχετικά με τη συγκρότηση, τη λειτουργία και τις αρμοδιότητες ανεξάρτητης αρχής που διασφαλίζει το απόρρητο της παραγράφου 1. 3. Απαγορεύεται η χρήση αποδεικτικών μέσων που έχουν αποκτηθεί κατά παράβαση του άρθρου αυτού και των άρθρων 9 και 9Α.	Article 19 1. Secrecy of letters and all other forms of free correspondence or communication shall be absolutely inviolable. The guaranties under which the judicial authority shall not be bound by this secrecy for reasons of national security or for the purpose of investigating especially serious crimes, shall be specified by law.  2. Matters relating to the constitution, the operation and the functions of the independent authority ensuring the secrecy of paragraph 1 shall be specified by law.  3. Use of evidence acquired in violation of the present article and of articles 9 and 9A is prohibited.
Άρθρο 9Α: Καθένας έχει δικαίωμα προστασίας από τη συλλογή, επεξεργασία και χρήση, ιδίως με ηλεκτρονικά μέσα, των προσωπικών του δεδομένων, όπως νόμος ορίζει. Η προστασία των προσωπικών δεδομένων διασφαλίζεται από ανεξάρτητη αρχή, που συγκροτείται και λειτουργεί, όπως νόμος ορίζει.	 Article 9A All persons have the right to be protected from the collection, processing and use, especially by electronic means, of their personal data, as specified by law. The protection of personal data is ensured by an independent authority, which is constituted and operates as specified by law.

Άρθρο 25: 1. Τα δικαιώματα του ανθρώπου ως ατόμου και ως μέλους του κοινωνικού συνόλου και η αρχή του κοινωνικού κράτους δικαίου τελούν υπό την εγγύηση του Κράτους. Όλα τα κρατικά όργανα υποχρεούνται να διασφαλίζουν την ανεμπόδιση και αποτελεσματική άσκησή τους. Τα δικαιώματα αυτά ισχύουν και στις σχέσεις μεταξύ ιδιωτών στις οποίες προσιδιάζουν. Οι κάθε είδους περιορισμοί που μπορούν κατά το Σύνταγμα να επιβληθούν στα δικαιώματα αυτά πρέπει να προβλέπονται είτε απευθείας από το Σύνταγμα είτε από το νόμο, εφόσον υπάρχει επιφύλαξη υπέρ αυτού και να σέβονται την αρχή της αναλογικότητας. 2. Η αναγνώριση και η προστασία των θεμελιωδών και απαράγραπτων δικαιωμάτων του ανθρώπου από την Πολιτεία αποβλέπει στην πραγμάτωση της κοινωνικής προόδου μέσα σε ελευθερία και δικαιοσύνη. 3. Η καταχρηστική άσκηση δικαιώματος δεν επιτρέπεται. 4. Το Κράτος δικαιούται να αξιώνει από όλους τους πολίτες την εκπλήρωση του χρέους της κοινωνικής και εθνικής αλληλεγγύης.	Article 25  1. The rights of the human being as an individual and as a member of the society and the principle of the welfare state rule of law are guaranteed by the State. All agents of the State shall be obliged to ensure the unhindered and effective exercise thereof. These rights also apply to the relations between individuals to which they are appropriate. Restrictions of any kind which, according to the Constitution, may be imposed upon these rights, should be provided either directly by the Constitution or by statute, should a reservation exist in the latter's favour, and should respect the principle of proportionality. 2. The recognition and protection of the fundamental and inalienable rights of man by the State aims at the achievement of social progress in freedom and justice. 3. The abusive exercise of rights is not permitted. 4. The State has the right to claim of all citizens to fulfil the duty of social and national solidarity.
Ελληνικός Ποινικός Κώδικας	Greek Criminal Code or Penal Code
Άρθρο 371 1. Κληρικοί, δικηγόροι και κάθε είδους νομικοί παραστάτες, συμβολαιογράφοι, γιατροί, μαίες, νοσοκόμοι, φαρμακοποιοί και άλλοι στους οποίους κάποιος εμπιστεύονται συνήθως λόγω του επαγγέλματος τους ή της ιδιότητάς τους ιδιωτικά απόρρητα, καθώς και οι βοηθοί των προσώπων αυτών, τιμωρούνται με χρηματική ποινή ή με φυλάκιση μέχρι ενός έτους αν φανερώσουν ιδιωτικά απόρρητα που τους τα εμπιστεύτηκαν ή που τα έμαθαν λόγω του επαγγέλματος τους ή της ιδιότητάς τους.	Article 371 1. Clergymen, lawyers and any kind of legal counsel, notaries, doctors, midwives, nurses, pharmacists and others to whom some trust usually because of their profession or status of private secrets and assistants of such persons, be punished by a fine or by imprisonment up to one year if they reveal private secrets of the trust or the learned because of their profession or their status. 2. Similarly punished, after the death of one of the faces of para. 1, and from this cause is

2. Όμοια τιμωρείται όποιος, μετά το θάνατο ενός από τα πρόσωπά της παρ. 1, και απ' αυτή την αιτία γίνεται κάτοχος εγγράφων ή σημειώσεων του νεκρού σχετικών με την άσκηση του επαγγέλματός του, ή της ιδιότητάς του και από αυτά φανερώνει ιδιωτικά απόρρητα. 3. Η ποινική δίωξη γίνεται μόνο με έγκλιση. 4. Η πράξη δεν είναι άδικη και μένει ατιμώρητη αν ο υπάιτιος απέβλεπε στην εκπλήρωση καθήκοντός του ή στη διαφύλαξη έννομου ή για άλλο λόγο δικαιολογημένου ουσιώδους συμφέροντος,* δημόσιου ή του ίδιου ή κάποιου άλλου, το οποίο δεν μπορούσε να διαφυλαχθεί διαφορετικά.	document owner or notes of the deceased on the exercise of his profession, or of his status and these reveal private secrets. 3. The prosecution only by indictment. 4. The practice is not unfair and goes unpunished if the perpetrator intended to fulfill his duty or to safeguard legitimate or otherwise justified substantial interest * public or himself or another, which could not be preserved otherwise.
Ελληνικός Κώδικας Ποινικής Δικονομίας	Greek Criminal Procedural Code
Άρθρο 45B 1. Σε υποθέσεις σχετικές με τις αξιόποινες πράξεις των άρθρων 159, 159Α, 235, 236, 237 και 237Α του Ποινικού Κώδικα και τις συναφείς με αυτές πράξεις, είναι δυνατόν, μετά από έγκριση του Αντεισαγγελέα του Αρείου Πάγου που εποπτεύει και συντονίζει το έργο των Εισαγγελέων Εγκλημάτων Διαφθοράς, να χαρακτηρίζεται ως μάρτυς δημοσίου συμφέροντος με πράξη του κατά τόπον αρμόδιου εισαγγελέα πλημμελειοδικών ή του Εισαγγελέα Εγκλημάτων Διαφθοράς όποιος, χωρίς να εμπλέκεται καθ' οιονδήποτε τρόπο στις εν λόγω πράξεις και χωρίς να αποβλέπει σε ίδιον όφελος, συμβάλλει ουσιωδώς, με τις πληροφορίες που παρέχει στις διωκτικές αρχές, στην αποκάλυψη και δίωξή τους. Η κατά το προηγούμενο εδάφιο πράξη του εισαγγελέα μπορεί να ανακαλείται με τον ίδιο τρόπο και σε οποιοδήποτε στάδιο της ποινικής δίκης, αν ο εισαγγελέας κρίνει ότι δεν συντρέχουν οι λόγοι που τον οδήγησαν στην έκδοσή της. 2. Αν έχει υποβληθεί έγκλιση ή μήνυση για τα εγκλήματα της ψευδορκίας, της ψευδούς καταμήνυσης, της συκοφαντικής δυσφήμισης ή της παραβίασης υπηρεσιακού απορρήτου του Ποινικού Κώδικα ή για τις πράξεις των παραγράφων 4 ή 8 του άρθρου 22 του ν. 2472/1997 σε υπόθεση σχετική	Article 45B 1. In cases related to the offences of the articles 159, 159A, 235, 236, 237 and 237A of the Criminal Code and the related to them acts, it is possible, after the consent of the Vice Prosecutor of the Supreme Criminal Court who supervises and coordinates the work of the Corruption Crimes Prosecutors, for somebody to be characterized as whistle-blower, with the Act of the competent Prosecutor [...], when this person, without being involved in any way in those acts and without aiming at the satisfaction of own interests, contributes essentially with the information that he/she provides the investigation authorities with, to the disclosure and prosecution of these offences. The Act of the Prosecutor, as described in the previous point, may be revoked in the same way and in any stage of the criminal trial, if the Prosecutor judges that the reasons, which led to its initial issue, lack their validity. 2. If a complaint is filed for the crimes of perjury, false accusation, malicious slander or infringement of the professional confidentiality of the Criminal Code or for the acts of the paragraphs 4 or 8 of the article 22 of the Law

με τις αξιόποινες πράξεις που αναφέρονται στην προηγούμενη παράγραφο, ο αρμόδιος για την άσκηση της ποινικής δίωξης εισαγγελέας, πριν από κάθε άλλη ενέργεια, ενημερώνει σχετικά τον Αντεισαγγελέα του Αρείου Πάγου που εποπτεύει και συντονίζει το έργο των Εισαγγελέων Εγκλημάτων Διαφθοράς. 3. Αν ο Αντεισαγγελέας του Αρείου Πάγου που εποπτεύει και συντονίζει το έργο των Εισαγγελέων Εγκλημάτων Διαφθοράς, κρίνει μετά από την κατά την προηγούμενη παράγραφο ενημέρωσή του, ότι η ποινική δίωξη των εγκλημάτων της ψευδορκίας, της ψευδούς καταμήνυσης, της συκοφαντικής δυσφήμισης ή της παραβίασης υπηρεσιακού απορρήτου ή των εγκλημάτων των παραγράφων 4 ή 8 του άρθρου 22 του ν. 2472/1997, δεν είναι απαραίτητη για την προστασία του δημοσίου συμφέροντος, μπορεί να παραγγείλει στον αρμόδιο για την άσκηση της ποινικής δίωξης εισαγγελέα την οριστική αποχή από την ποινική δίωξη για τις εν λόγω πράξεις.	2472/1997 in a case related to the offences mentioned in the previous paragraph, the competent Prosecutor, before any other act, may inform the Vice Prosecutor of the Supreme Criminal Court, who supervises and coordinates the work of the Corruption Crimes Prosecutors. 3. If the Vice Prosecutor of the Supreme Criminal Court who supervises and coordinates the work of the Corruption Crimes Prosecutors, after his/her briefing as seen in the previous paragraph, that the prosecution of the crimes of perjury, false accusation, malicious slander or infringement of the professional confidentiality or for the acts of the paragraphs 4 or 8 of the article 22 of the law 2472/1997, judges that is not necessary for the protection of the public interest, may order the competent Prosecutor to refrain permanently from the prosecution of those offences.
Άρθρο 212 1. Η διαδικασία ακυρώνεται, αν εξεταστούν στην προδικασία ή στην κύρια διαδικασία : α) οι κληρικοί σχετικά με όσα έμαθαν από την εξομολόγηση β) οι συνήγοροι, οι τεχνικοί σύμβουλοι και οι συμβολαιογράφοι σχετικά με όσα τους εμπιστεύτηκαν οι πελάτες τους· οι συνήγοροι και οι τεχνικοί σύμβουλοι κρίνουν σύμφωνα με τη συνείδησή τους αν και σε ποιο μέτρο πρέπει να καταθέτουν όσα άλλα έμαθαν με αφορμή την άσκηση του λειτουργήματός τους γ) οι γιατροί, οι φαρμακοποιοί και οι βοηθοί τους, καθώς και οι μάιες σχετικά με όσα εμπιστευτικά πληροφορήθηκαν κατά την άσκηση του επαγγέλματός τους, εκτός όπου ειδικός νόμος τους υποχρεώνει να τα αναγγείλουν στην αρχή και δ) οι δημόσιοι υπάλληλοι, όταν πρόκειται για στρατιωτικό ή διπλωματικό μυστικό ή μυστικό που αφορά την ασφάλεια του κράτους, εκτός αν ο αρμόδιος υπουργός με αίτηση της δικαστικής αρχής ή κάποιου από τους διαδίκους ή και αυτεπαγγέλτως τους εξουσιοδοτήσει σχετικά.	Article 212 1. The process is canceled, if they are examined during preliminary or main process: a) clerics for what they learned from the confession b) lawyers, technical consultants and notaries for these trusted to them by their customers; advocates and advisory judge should judge according to their conscience whether and to what extent they should testify what have learned in response to the discharge of their duties c) doctors, pharmacists and their assistants and midwives about what confidential learned in the exercise their profession, except where special law oblige them to announce it at the beginning and d) civil servants when it comes to military or diplomatic secret or secret concerning security of the state, unless the Minister at the request of a judicial authority or someone of the litigant or their authorized on its own initiative.

ELSA HUNGARY

Contributors

National Coordinator

Nóra Dorottya Nagy

National Researchers

Dóra Greiner
Balázs Áron Mravik
Kamilla Gál
Balázs Gáti
Krisztián Jebudenszki

National Linguistic Editors

Ádám Gergely
Kálmán Varga
Miklós Vida

National Academic Supervisor

Professor Gábor Halmai

Introduction

The protection of sources is very important question, because in some cases if it is not assured, it would make the source fall silent in fear of the consequences about the matters that require absolute publicity for themselves in favour of the public. That is why the protection of journalistic sources is one of the most important cornerstones within the freedom of the press. Regarding the importance of journalists, the Hungarian Constitutional Court also defines that the journalist is one of the most focal participants in a democratic state.¹

1. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information? What type of legislation provides this protection? How exactly is this protection construed in national law?

First of all, defining some basic phenomena concerning the field of this article.

According to the Council of Europe's recommendation, the definition of a journalist is: "it means any natural or legal person who is regularly or professionally engaged in the collection and dissemination of information to the public via any means of mass communication." Information means any "statement of fact, opinion or idea in the form of text, sound and/or picture." Source means any person who provides information to a journalist." The term of "information identifying a source" means, as far as this is likely to lead to the identification of a source

- the name and personal data as well as voice and image of a source,
- the factual circumstances of acquiring information from a source by a journalist,
- the unpublished content of the information provided by a source to a journalist
- personal data of journalists and their employers related to their professional work.²

What does the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information mean? This right simply protects the relationship of trust between the journalists and their sources.³

In the Hungarian legal system, the definition of the journalist and the journalistic sources are similar to the definitions above. We will present them within the frame of Questions 3 and 4.

¹ Constitutional Court Decision no.: 37/1992. (VI. 10.) Due to the 4th Amendment of the Fundamental Law, this decision is not in force anymore, this is an important decision under the previous constitution, and since the provisions on freedom of the press are more or less identical in the old and the new constitution, it should still apply, and the CC usually accept this.

<http://public.mkab.hu/dev/dontesek.nsf/0/261126A74CAFE513C1257ADA005277C3?OpenDocument> (2016.02.15.)

² Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information

http://www.coe.int/t/dghl/standardsetting/media/doc/cm/rec\(2000\)007&expmem_EN.asp007&expmem_EN.asp) (2016.02.12)

³ Koltay András, Nyakas Levente Magyar és európai médijog, [p. 403] Wolters Kluwer Kft. 2013

1.1. Basic Facts and Statements

At the top of the national legal system, – like other countries – we have the Hungarian Constitution – now called the Fundamental Law – which provides these rights, in that: “Everyone shall have the right to freedom of speech”.⁴ Hungary shall recognise and protect the freedom and diversity of the press, and shall ensure the conditions for free dissemination of information necessary for the formation of democratic public opinion.⁵ The detailed rules relating to the freedom of the press and the organ supervising media services, press products and the communications market shall be laid down in a Cardinal Law.^{6,7}

Also, Article VI of the Fundamental Law of Hungary could be relevant – because it is disposed about the further requirements according to this subject as the most important document in the Hungarian legal system – which provision stipulates that: “The application of the right to the protection of personal data and to access data of public interest shall be supervised by an independent authority established by a cardinal Act.” Furthermore, we will be more specific and we will present the cardinal acts mentioned and other criminal and administrative laws. In public life regarding the past few years, the topic chiefly has been affiliated with the much criticised new media act⁸. The act was used to regulate the source-protection in the following way: “if the journalist refuses to disclose the source of her or his information, he or she needs to prove, that the information is concern to public interest”. This part of the act has been annulled by the Hungarian Constitutional Court which appended the following reasoning to its annulment: ‘it would be wrong to stipulate a basic right or constitutional principle which if enforced, would justify tying in the protection of the information source with the duty to provide evidence.’ As a result of this decision, the right of the press to withhold the source of information has been declared as a general and unconditional right of the press.⁹ In its decision, the Constitutional Court has defined the requirements – which applies both to the electronic media and the printed press – under which the violation of the Constitution by legislative omission may be remedied.

These criteria include:

-opportunity to resort to preliminary Court revision against the first verdict;

⁴ Subsection 1 of Article IX of THE FUNDAMENTAL LAW OF HUNGARY (We quoted only the relevant paragraphs) www.kormany.hu/download/e/02/00000/The%20New%20Fundamental%20Law%20of%20Hungary.pdf

⁵ Subsection 2 of Article IX of THE FUNDAMENTAL LAW OF HUNGARY (I quoted only the relevant paragraphs) www.kormany.hu/download/e/02/00000/The%20New%20Fundamental%20Law%20of%20Hungary.pdf

⁶ Subsection 6 of Article IX of THE FUNDAMENTAL LAW OF HUNGARY www.kormany.hu/download/e/02/00000/The%20New%20Fundamental%20Law%20of%20Hungary.pdf

⁷ Cardinal law, which are defined by the Fundamental Law (FL) need a 2/3 majority of the MPs present.

⁸ Act CLXXXV of 2010 on Media Services and Mass Communication http://hunmedialaw.org/dokumentum/153/Mttv_110803_EN_final.pdf

⁹ Decision 165/2011. (XII. 20.) AB; <http://mertek.eu/en/article/ruling-no-1652011-xii-20-ab-of-the-constitutional-court-summary>

- the statutory limitation shall be in accordance with the provisions of Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights, that is, limitation shall be properly substantiated;
- limitation is possible only when the Authorities do not have alternative ways to obtain the particular information;
- the limitation should be proportionate, that is, revealing the identity of information sources should take place in exceptional cases only, when so justified by threat to human life or health or particularly significant public interest;
- in the context of protecting information sources, the opportunity to reject delivery of documents, deeds and data media shall also be provided for;¹⁰
- no burden of proof may be required for the exercise of the right of information source protection.¹¹;

The journalist also has the right to reject testifying when the protection of the source needs it.

There is also a paragraph in the Act on General Rules of Administrative Proceedings and Services.¹² The Subsection (2) of Section 50/A of this Act stipulates about the properties which could expose the information source: „[...]Any person who cannot be heard as a witness shall not be compelled to surrender the property, nor any person who has the right to refuse to testify under Paragraph c) of Subsection (4) of Section 53 if having the property surrendered would expose the identity of a person from whom he receives information”.

1.2. The Limits of the Right

We also need to see where the limits are of these rights. It is possible to get the journalist to disclose her or his source of information. In this cases there are a few criteria to comply with. First of all the keyword in any circumstances must be proportionality. The criteria are written in the Act XIX of 1998 on Criminal Proceedings. The cornerstones of the regulation are the following: seriousness, purposefulness a 3-year term of confinement or more, when the Authorities do not have alternative ways to obtain the particular information.¹³

The most important element in the regulation is that only the court – which is separated from the other branches of power – could compel the journalist to disclose her or his source of information. So, neither the National Media and Infocommunications Authority (NMHH), nor other institutions of authority can do this.

¹⁰ Act CLXXXV of 2010 on Media Services and Mass Media
http://english.nmhh.hu/dokumentum/164596/media_act_final_updated_140930.pdf

¹¹ 155§ (5) b): the Authority may not oblige the media content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in a work-related legal relationship with a media content provider to provide any data, or to hand over any deed, instrument or document that would reveal the identity of the person delivering information to him/her in connection with the media content provider's activities.

¹² http://hunmedialaw.org/dokumentum/94/08_1652011_Abh_final.pdf

¹³ Act CXL of 2004 on the General Rules of Administrative Proceedings and Services

¹⁴ Act XIX of 1998 on Criminal Proceedings 82§ (6)

2. Is there, in domestic law, a provision that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his/her sources? How exactly is this prohibition construed in national law? What is the sanction?

First and foremost it shall be stated, that there is no dedicated provision for this question in the domestic law. However, we will present some means of application and some sanctions against the journalists who disclose his/her sources.

2.1. Prohibitions Form Another Perspective

The right of the source can be a prohibition at the same time for the journalist as long as Hungary does not have a correct prohibition which is regulated by the Hungarian criminal code.

In this question, the regulations of the Fundamental Law of Hungary governs as follows: "Everyone shall have the right to have his or her private and family life, home, communications and good reputation respected. Everyone shall have the right to the protection of his or her personal data, as well as to access and disseminate data of public interest. The application of the right to the protection of personal data and to access data of public interest shall be supervised by an independent authority established by a cardinal Act."¹⁴

The journalists who disclose their sources, definitely will be punished by the Hungarian National Committee of Journalists (MUOSZ)¹⁵, (which is just a self-regulatory entity, but its sanction indirectly may cause the end of the career for the journalist) because this violates section 8.2 in the Committee's Code of Ethics¹⁶. The reprimands include:

- verbal caution
- reprimand
- serious reprimand
- if a chosen candidate did something against the ethic codex the council could call him/her back
- suspension of membership for 1 year
- expelled from the organisation

The question can be viewed from the perspective of the victim in this case from the view of the disclosed source. We mean firstly the defence of the inherent rights, furthermore within this category: the protection of personal data. The question may be the victim's - in this case, the disclosed source of information - point of view is to look at. The focus is the legal protection of personality, the right to a good reputation and protection of personal data within it. The cases of defamation: responsibility regarding any person, orally or in writing is realized directly or indirectly: information obtained from others, adding further information. The determination of infringement is sufficient to determine whether the communication is suitable for a person is wrong, or has a negative perception. It does not need to examine the results, that is, to actually adversely change the social judgement of that person. In terms of the protection of personal data in the Basic Law sets out its rules: the personal data of the private sector, privacy and personality, the protection of private assets. There is a need to return to a row that we have under Hungarian law constituting personal data. Personal data is data relating to the data subject, in particular by reference to the name and identification number of the data subject or one or more factors specific to his physical, physiological, mental, economic, cultural or social identity as well as conclusions drawn from the data in regard to the data subject;¹⁷ The Hungarian Criminal Code describes it in the following way:

¹⁴ Article VI of THE FUNDAMENTAL LAW OF HUNGARY

¹⁵ <https://muosz.hu/>

¹⁶ <https://muosz.hu/kodex.php?page=etikai&sub=etikaikk09> The violated rules are in the 8§

(1) Any person who, in violation of the statutory provisions governing the protection and processing of personal data:

a) is engaged in the unauthorized and inappropriate processing of personal data; or
b) fails to take measures to ensure the security of data; is guilty of a misdemeanour punishable by imprisonment not exceeding one year.

(2) The penalty, in accordance with Subsection (1) above, shall also be imposed upon any person who, in violation of the statutory provisions governing the protection and processing of personal data, fails to notify the data subject as required, and thereby imposes significant injury to the interests of another person or persons.

(3) Any misuse of personal data shall be punishable by imprisonment not exceeding two years if committed in connection with special data.¹⁸

3. Who is a “journalist” according to the national legislation? Is it in your view a restricted definition for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources? What is the scope of protection of other media actors? Is the protection of journalists’ sources extended to anyone else?

3.1. Who is a “Journalist” According to the National Legislation?

In the last 10 years have seen huge swings in media-consumption patterns, and innovations in technology — from mobile applications to the Internet — have created new channels for people to communicate with mass audiences. That has complicated efforts to define a journalist. As technology has transformed communications and become inexpensive and user-friendly, anyone can share his or her views with the world, putting them almost on the same playing field as traditional journalists.

¹⁷ Act CXII of 2011 on the Right of Informational Self-Determination and on Freedom of Information, Section 3

¹⁸ Act C of 2012 on the criminal code

In their efforts to define the right to protect sources, some international bodies have opted to entirely avoid the term 'journalist'. The Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression adopted by the LACMHR states: "Every social communicator has the right to keep his/her source of information, notes, personal and professional archives confidential." Other bodies have instead been careful to formulate a very wide definition of 'journalist', covering anyone who serves as a conduit of information to the public, regardless of whether they would normally be perceived as journalists. According to the Hungarian legislation what is based on the adaptation of the Recommendation of the CoE's Committee of Ministers states: "The term 'journalist' means any natural or legal person who is regularly or professionally engaged in the collection and dissemination of information to the public via any means of mass communication."¹⁹

- a) A journalist is typically a natural person. The holder of the information provided by the source may be, however, not only the journalists themselves but also their employers. Therefore, legal entities like publishing companies or news agencies are also to be protected like "journalists" under this Recommendation.
- b) A journalist typically works regularly and receives some form of remuneration for his or her work. Therefore, the Recommendation uses the terms "regularly or professionally engaged". This must not exclude, however, journalists who work freelance or part-time, are at the beginning of their professional career, or work on an independent investigation over some time. Professional accreditation or membership is not necessary.
- c) The term "collection and dissemination (...) to the public via any means of mass communication" shall refer to the fact that information is made available to the public at large or to a wider and open group of recipients, like subscribers, customers or members. Persons engaged in the creation and dissemination of personalised correspondence or advertisements are not meant hereby. All kinds of communication techniques can be used, including non-periodical publications and audiovisual works. Therefore, press journalists, photo journalists, radio journalists, audiovisual journalists and journalists working for computer-based media are equally included.

3.2. Is it, in Your View, a Restricted Definition for the Purpose of the Protection of Journalistic Sources?

The right to preserve the confidentiality of sources is usually referred to, both in international and domestic law, as a right of journalists. Nevertheless, it can sometimes be validly invoked by persons who would not normally identify themselves, or be identified by the general public, as journalists. The purpose of the right is to ensure that sources are not deterred from conveying important information to the public through a 'middleman'. It is the middleman who is entitled to invoke the right to protect his or her sources. In most cases, this role is played by a 'traditional' journalist in the service of a mass media outlet; but there is no reason to apply a different rule when the middleman is someone else whose profession involves collecting and disseminating information, such as an NGO activist or academic commentator.

¹⁹ Article 19, 'Protection of sources' (Article n.d.) <<https://www.article19.org/pages/en/protection-of-sources-more.html>> accessed 10 May 2016

However this definition is broad and includes professional full-time reporters, analysts and citizen journalists as well, like bloggers and others who engage in forms of self-publication in print, on the Internet or elsewhere. In circumstances where a person provides information on the basis that he will not be named or compromised in any way it is one of the key rules of journalism.

Given the nature of their profession, journalists are not required to maintain confidentiality or, more precisely: such obligations may originate not from the nature of the profession (as is the case with doctors and attorneys), but from an agreement concluded with their sources. This means that the obligation they are subject to is not related to their profession but to a civil agreement, which may be concluded by anyone -non-journalists, too - with the source of important information.²⁰

Furthermore journalists would find it difficult to gain access to places and situations where they can report on matters of public interest and fulfil their role as watchdogs if they cannot when necessary give a strong and genuine promise of confidentiality to their sources. If they cannot guarantee a source's anonymity, then they may not be able to report at all. One side will view such a source as a disloyal, untrustworthy employee who needs to be found and removed; the other side sees them as a whistle-blower acting in the public interest.²¹

3.3. What is the Scope of Protection of Other Media Actors?

In those member States where systems of protection of sources already exist, protection was originally intended for journalists working for the traditional mass media (e.g. newspapers, broadcasters). However, there is no argument to limit such protection to these persons and to apply a different regime to those working professionally in the collection and dissemination of information via new means of communication such as the Internet. This being said, member States may find it more difficult to define the characteristics of the professional work of journalists who exclusively use these new means of communication, in order to justify the same protection, due to the development of new professions in this area. The main protections that apply to journalists should apply to bloggers (including the right to protect sources, accreditation and guarantee of safety.)²² Hungary's new legislation extends to online news portals and blogs that either "inform, entertain, or educate," have any kind of advertising content and have an editor. This means that a blog with a Google ad falls under the new definition of the "press" and can be fined and shut down for publishing content deemed offensive to public morals, for instance, at the media authority's discretion. This goes against the most fundamental notion of press independence. The government should not have the power to determine what news is.²³

²⁰ Prof. dr. Dirk Voorhoof, "The media in a democratic society: reconciling freedom of expression with the protection of human rights" (2002) <http://www.coe.int/T/E/Com/Files/Events/2002-09-Media/intervention_voorhoof.asp> accessed 11 May 2016

²¹ Gill Phillips, 'On Protection of Journalistic Sources' (2014) <<http://journalism.cmpf.eui.eu/discussions/on-protection-of-journalistic-sources/>> accessed 6 May 2016

3.4. Is the Protection of Journalists' Sources Extended to Anyone Else?

The right to maintain the confidentiality of sources (Article 6 of the Press Freedom Act) Pursuant to Article 6 (1) of the Press Freedom Act, all media service providers, and publishers of press products, and journalists are entitled "to the right to keep the identity of their confidential informants." The general right of confidentiality also applies to judicial and administrative proceedings. Therefore, this enables the media to be exempt from the duty to testify.²⁴ Other persons who, by their professional relations with journalists, acquire knowledge of information identifying a source through the collection, editorial processing or dissemination of this information, should equally be protected under the principles established.

In other words, the right to withhold a source's identity belongs not only to the 'middleman', but also to others collaborating with him or her. The purpose of this rule is, of course, to prevent the protection of sources from being simply side-stepped by going around the 'middleman'.

4. What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources? How are the laws implemented? How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?

4.1 Overview of the Decisions of the European Court of Human Rights

Before analysing the Hungarian safeguards, we must overview the decisions of The European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in the topic. Promise of confidentiality is significant as sometimes anonymous sources are the only key to unlock a story. The Goodwin v United Kingdom

²² Explanatory Memorandum (EC) to Recommendation No. R (00) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information [2000] Adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 8 March 2000 at the 701st meeting of the Ministers' Deputies

²³ Amy Brouillette, 'Hungarian Chill' (2011) <http://www.cjr.org/behind_the_news/hungarian_chill.php> accessed 7 May 2016

²⁴ The Press Freedom Act (2010) Article 6

case²⁵ was the first significant decision of the ECtHR in the topic, it was concerned a disclosure order imposed on a journalist requiring him to reveal the identity of his source. According to ECtHR view there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the legitimate aim pursued by the disclosure order and the means deployed to achieve the aim. The order requiring the applicant to reveal his source and the fine imposed upon him because he refused to reveal his source gave rise to a violation of his right to freedom of expression under Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights.²⁶

“Protection of journalistic sources is one of the basic conditions for press freedom. ...Without such protection, sources may be deterred from assisting the press in informing the public on matters of public interest. As a result, the vital public-watchdog role of the press may be undermined, and the ability of the press to provide accurate and reliable information be adversely affected. ... [A]n order of source disclosure ...cannot be compatible with Article 10 of the Convention unless it is justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest.”²⁷

4.2 The Hungarian Legislations

In light of an example from the ECtHR case law it is time to analyse the Hungarian regulations and safeguards. First of all, let's have a look at the relevant paragraphs of the Fundamental Law of Hungary:

Article IX

- (1) Everyone shall have the right to freedom of speech.
- (2) Hungary shall recognise and protect the freedom and diversity of the press, and shall ensure the conditions for free dissemination of information necessary for the formation of democratic public opinion.

In 2010 the Hungarian parliament adopted new media regulation which created tension among journalists and received several criticisms in Hungary and abroad. The original regulation in 2010 would allow police officers to demand to identify the journalists' source. Later on, according to Decision 165/2011 (XII. 20.) AB (The Constitutional Court of Hungary) the Hungarian government modified the law. The relevant paragraphs of the current regulation are the following:

Article 6

- (1) A media content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in other work-related legal relationship with a media content provider shall be entitled, as stipulated by the respective Act, to keep the identity of a person delivering information to him/her in connection with the media content provider's activities (hereinafter as: journalists' source) in the course of court or regulatory procedures, as well as to refuse to hand over any documents, objects or data carriers that could potentially reveal the identity of the journalists' source.

²⁵ [http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i%3D001-57974#{"itemid":\["001-57974"\]}](http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i%3D001-57974#{)

²⁶ http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Convention_ENG.pdf

²⁷ http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/FS_Journalistic_sources_ENG.pdf

(2) In order to investigate a crime, the court has the right – in exceptionally justified cases as defined by law – to oblige the media content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in other work-related legal relationship with a media content provider to reveal the identity of the journalists' source or to hand over any document, object, or data carrier that could potentially identify the journalists' source.

Pursuant to Article 6 (1) of the Press Freedom Act, all media service providers, and publishers of press products, and journalists are entitled “to the right to keep the identity of their informants confidential”. This general right of confidentiality also applies to judicial and administrative proceedings, thereby enabling the media to be exempt from the duty to testify. The 1986 Press Act failed to provide protection for the press in the most important cases, namely in criminal proceedings, when it failed to guarantee the right of confidentiality, but referred the resolution of the issue within the scope procedural law. According to Article 11(1)(b) of the previous Press Act, journalists „are entitled—and are obliged upon his request—to keep the identity of the person providing information confidential. When receiving information pertaining to a criminal act, the provisions of criminal law shall prevail.” Thus, as a general rule, in civil litigations and administrative proceedings, refusal to reveal information sources was permitted. At the same time, pursuant to Article 82(1)(c) of the Criminal Procedure Act, testimony may be refused when a person is bound by confidentiality due to the nature of his profession. Given the nature of their profession, journalists are not required to maintain confidentiality or, more precisely: such obligations may originate not from the nature of the profession (as is the case with doctors and attorneys), but from an agreement concluded with their sources. This means that the obligation they are subject to is not related to their profession but to a civil agreement, which may be concluded by anyone -non-journalists, too-with the source of important information. Prior to the new regulation, therefore, journalists could be obliged to reveal their sources in criminal proceedings. Under the new rule, the general right of confidentiality is not unlimited. It does not cover the protection of journalists' sources transmitting classified data without authorisation and, in exceptionally justified cases during judicial and proceedings by investigating authorities, media content providers may be obliged to reveal their sources “in the interests of protecting national security and public order or uncovering or preventing criminal acts”. The scope of exceptions is narrow and justifies the restriction of journalists' rights to confidentiality (even the most debated category of “public order” can be interpreted based on criminal law jurisprudence). The courts and competent authorities must construe these exceptions narrowly in order to ensure that the freedom of the press is respected. However, the Media Council cannot be regarded as an authority entitled to proceed under Article 6(3) of the Press Freedom Act in the investigation of sources. Under the new rule, the general right of confidentiality is not unlimited. It does not cover the protection of journalists' sources transmitting classified data without authorization and, in exceptionally justified cases during judicial and proceedings by investigating authorities, media content providers may be obliged to reveal their sources “in the interests of protecting national security and public order or uncovering or preventing criminal acts”. The scope of exceptions is narrow and justify the restriction of journalists' rights to confidentiality (even the most debated category of “public order” can be interpreted based on criminal law jurisprudence). The courts and competent authorities must construe these exceptions narrowly in order to ensure that the freedom of the press is respected. However, the Media Council cannot be regarded as an authority entitled to proceed under Article 6(3) of the Press Freedom Act in the investigation of sources. First of all, the Media Council is not an investigating authority. Article 182(c) of the Media Act precisely defines the administrative powers of the Media Council concerning the supervision of the obligations set forth in the Press Freedom Act (“the Media Council shall... supervise compliance with requirements set forth in Articles 13-20 of the Press Freedom Act”). Article 182 and other provisions of the Media Act provide an exhaustive list, in accordance with the Administrative Proceedings Act, on the Media Council’s administrative powers. Meanwhile, based on relevant judicial and Constitutional Court jurisprudence, the “narrowly defined” range of The right to maintain the confidentiality of information with respect to criminal proceedings is created by the Press Freedom Act. The Press Freedom Act also defines the exceptions from the right to confidentiality, but none of these pertain to the media authority, so it could not oblige journalists to reveal their sources. administrative powers is unambiguous and therefore cannot be extended (pursuant to the Administrative Proceedings Act, a decision made in absence of authority is to be annulled). For purposes of Article 6(3) of the Press Freedom Act, no additional administrative powers or cases are being introduced under the Media Act, and Article 6(3) of the Press Freedom Act also falls outside the investigative rights in administrative proceedings, as no references to such powers on data provision are made even in the procedural rules of the Media Act. Accordingly, the provisions of the Media Act on clarifying the facts (Article 155) and on data provision (Article 175) cannot be applied in connection with Article 6 of the Press Freedom Act. Obviously, it is not the task of the Media Council to protect „public order” and „national security” and investigate and prevent „criminal acts”; as these are tasks of the police and the authority responsible for national security. Provided, strictly on a theoretical level, that the Media Council would decide to use the above provisions for the disclosure of sources, the media service provider or publisher concerned could, in all cases, seek legal remedy under the Administrative Proceedings Act against such order of the Council, and the order would be adjudicated by the administrative court. Furthermore, the court conducting the legal review may not consider the annulment of the respective administrative decision, since decisions made without authority are void.²⁸

The media regulation made its progress as originally the government wanted to give police officials the power to demand the name of journalist's source. Now only a judge can decide whether a journalist must name his source so this regulation is rather coherent with ECHR because the court is independent.

4.3 Outside the Law: Media Self-Regulation and Media Co-Regulation

There is another safeguard outside the law which is called self-regulation. What does media self-regulation mean? According to Miklós Haraszti, “Media self-regulation is a joint endeavour by media professionals to set up voluntary editorial guidelines and abide by them in a learning process open to the public. By doing so, the independent media accept their share of responsibility for the quality of public discourse in the nation, while fully preserving their editorial autonomy in shaping it.” Complaints launched with self-regulatory bodies come at no cost which is a huge advantage for the average citizen. Media self-regulation advances the transition from a government-owned, state-controlled press to one owned and controlled by civil society.²⁹ Although in Hungary self-regulation doesn't have a long history its principals can set a good model to follow. When it comes to media co-regulation in July 2011, the Media Council of the National Media and Infocommunications Authority concluded public administration agreements on media co-regulation with the four Hungarian media self-regulatory bodies: the Association of Hungarian Content Providers (MTE), the Advertising Self-regulatory Body (ÖRT), the Association of Hungarian Publishers (MLE) and the Association of Hungarian Electronic Broadcasters (MEME). The Act CLXXXV of 2010 on Media Services and Mass Media regulates the media co-regulation in chapter VI. (Act 190-202), which is a completely new element of the Media Act and provides an opportunity for self-regulatory organisations to participate in the arrangement of cases that would fall under the competences of the Media Council.³⁰

²⁸ http://mediatanacs.hu/dokumentum/2791/1321457199hungary_new_media_regulation_eng_web.pdf

5. In the respective national legislation are the limits of non-disclosure of the information in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7? What are the procedures applied? Is the disclosure limited to exceptional circumstances, taking into consideration vital public or individual interests at stake? Do the authorities first search for and apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the right of journalists not to disclose information?

Principle 1 of Recommendation No R (2000) 7³¹ is the right of non-disclosure of journalists.

Hungarian media regulation ensures a general right of non-disclosure of journalists, which means a limited protection with some exceptions. The basis of the current media regulation is Act CIV of 2010 on Freedom of Press and Fundamental Rules of Media Contents³² (hereinafter: Press Freedom Act) and Act CLXXXV of 2010 on Media Services and Mass Communication³³ (hereinafter: Media Act). Both have come into force on 1 of January, 2011. The Press Freedom Act specifies unified rules, content rules and obligations.

²⁹ The Media Self-Regulation Guidebook <http://www.osce.org/fom/31497?download=true>

³⁰ http://hunmedialaw.org/dokumentum/162/coregulation_summary_final.pdf

³¹ Recommendation No.R(2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information

³² Act CIV of 2010 on Freedom of Press and Fundamental Rules of Media Contents'

³³ Act CLXXXV of 2010 on Media Services and Mass Communication

For Sources of information of journalists the amendment adopted in June 2012, has created the necessary procedural guarantees and the possibility for judicial remedy prevailing in each case based on Decision 165/2011. (XII. 20.)³⁴ of the Constitutional Court.

Act LXIV of 2012 on Amending Acts related to Media-services and Press-products³⁵ has re-regulated the provision related to protection of information sources of the Press Freedom Act and determined the conditions of rules of procedure of the possibility of refusal of testimony of journalists, and incorporated them into the laws of criminal procedure, civil procedure, administrative procedure, and offences.

Rules of the Press Freedom Act related to source protection have been amended according to the following:

Based on Paragraph (1) of Article 6 a media content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in other work-related legal relationship with a media content provider shall be entitled, as stipulated by the respective Act, to keep the identity of a person delivering information to him/her in connection with the media content provider's activities (hereinafter as: journalists' source) in the course of court or regulatory procedures, as well as to refuse to hand over any documents, objects or data carriers that could potentially reveal the identity of the journalists' source.

According to Paragraph (2) of Article 6 in order to investigate a crime, the court is the only entitled authority– in exceptionally justified cases as defined by law – to oblige journalists to reveal the identity of their source. “National security” and “official secret” are not part of the enabling conditions of disclosure anymore, because the legislature has classified these categories obscure. Therefore the case of exceptional justification can only be assessed by court, strictly in case of a crime.

Thus, the exceptions of source protection are regulated in Act XIX of 1998 on Criminal Proceedings³⁶ (hereinafter: Criminal Proceedings Act).

According to the new provisions journalist not only have the right of non-disclosure but can also deny the disclosure of document, object, or data carrier that could potentially identify the journalists' source. The right of non-disclosure is extended to every judicial and magisterial procedure, and it is extended to the protection of sources which hand over classified information without authorization.³⁷

³⁴ Decision 165/2011. (XII. 20.) AB of the Hungarian Constitutional Court on the Media Regulation

³⁵ Act LXIV of 2012 on Amending Acts related to Media-services and Press-products
<http://mkogy.jogtar.hu/?page=show&docid=a1200066.TV>

³⁶ Act XIX of 1998 on Criminal Proceedings https://www.icrc.org/ihl-nat.nsf/0/033d3f79294dc84ec1257163002cd383/\$FILE/Act%20XIX%20of%201998.pdf

³⁷ Kóczyán Sándor: Hungarian media regulation and the protection of sources of information

Article 155 Paragraph (2) of Media Act entitles Media Authority only to collect information concerning business secrets. In order to establish the facts of the case, the Authority shall have the right to view, examine and make duplicates and extracts of any and all instruments, deeds and documents containing data related to the media service, the publication of the press product or the media service distribution, even if such instrument, deed or document contains business secrets.³⁸

The Authority may not oblige the media content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in a work-related legal relationship with a media content provider to provide any data, or to hand over any deed, instrument or document that would reveal the identity of the person delivering information to him/her in connection with the media content provider's activities. (Paragraph (5) b) of Article 155)

Any client or other participant of the proceeding obliged to provide data or to hand over or present any deed, instrument, or document despite of having recourse to the exemption stipulated in Paragraph (5) may seek legal remedy with suspensive effect. (Paragraph (7) and (Paragraph (5) b) of Article 155)

The exemption specified under Paragraph (5) shall remain valid even after the legal relationship justifying the exemption is terminated. (Paragraph (6) of Article 155)

Due to procedural rules journalists can practice their rights not only in media- and criminal procedure, but also in civil, administrative and misdemeanour procedure. The right is extended to refuse to hand over any documents, objects or data carriers that could potentially reveal the identity of the journalists' source.

Based on the supplement Act No III of 1952 on the Code of Civil Procedure³⁹ (hereinafter: Civil Procedure Code) journalist can deny testimony (deposition), is his deposition could potentially reveal the identity of the journalists' source in the related question. (Paragraph (1) f) of Article 170)The exemption shall remain valid even after the legal relationship justifying the exemption is terminated. (Paragraph (6) a) of Article 170)

Based on General Rules of Administrative Proceedings and Services Act⁴⁰ (hereinafter: Administrative Proceedings and Services Act) journalists can also deny deposition in administrative procedure if the deposition could potentially reveal the identity of the person delivering information to him/her in connection with the media content provider's activities in the related question. (Paragraph (4) c) of Article 53 of Administrative Proceedings and Services

³⁸ Opinion of TASZ (Society for Freedoms) right defender organization on Act LXIV of 2012 on Amending Acts related to Media-services and Press-products Rec. No. T/7022/37. unitary recommendation http://tasz.hu/files/tasz/imce/2011/tasz_velemenymedia_modositas_0523.pdf

³⁹ Act No III of 1952 on the Code of Civil Procedure
http://net.jogtar.hu/jr/gen/hjegy_doc.cgi?docid=95200003.TV

⁴⁰ General Rules of Administrative Proceedings and Services Act

Act). The exemption shall remain valid even after the legal relationship justifying the exemption is terminated. (Paragraph 8 of Article 53)

Journalist is exempt from confiscation, is not obliged to hand over the good if it would reveal the identity of the source. The exemption from the handover shall remain valid even after the legal relationship justifying the exemption is terminated. (Paragraph (2)-(2) a) of Article 50) The same exemption is concerning to report obligation a (Paragraph (4) a) c) of Article 51) and to inspection. (Paragraph 7 of Article 57/A) The obliged may seek legal remedy with suspensive effect. (Paragraph (5) of Article 50/A, Paragraph (4) b) of Article 51)

Act II of 2012 on offences, the procedure in relation to offences and the offence record system⁴¹ (hereinafter: Act on Offences) contains similar exemptions for journalists: deny of deposition, (Article 60/(C)), which shall remain valid even after the legal relationship justifying the exemption is terminated. (Article 60/(A)) exemption from confiscation (Paragraph (1) a) of Article 76.) and from inspection (Paragraph (2) a) of Article 70.).

Limits to the right of non-disclosure are in line with Principle 3. Limits to the right of non-disclosure are regulated by Paragraph (2) of Article 6) of Press Freedom Act only empowers the judicial authorities to oblige journalist to disclose information, if it is required in case of revealing a crime and only in exceptionally justified cases.

Based on Paragraph 2 of Press Freedom Act, courts can only oblige media content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in other work-related legal relationship with a media content provider to hand over any documents, objects or data carriers in case of revealing a crime, in exceptional and legally specified case.

Exceptions are regulated in the Criminal Proceedings Act, not in the Press Freedom Act, based on Paragraph 6 of Article 82:

Courts can only oblige media content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in other work-related legal relationship with a media content provider to reveal the identity of his source, for revealing onerous, intentional crime, which is ordered to be punished with 3-year term of confinement or more, the identity of the source of the information is essential, and the expected evidence cannot be substituted.

Probably due to legal aspects, we were not able to find concrete pieces of cases which contains explicit data about the co-operation of a media-content provider (journalist), concerning the revelation of its source during any criminal procedure.

It probably has procedural reasons, because of the principle of protecting the identity of the witness or any other person who provides information for the authorities, based on Article 95 of the Criminal Proceedings Act.

⁴¹ Act II of 2012 on offences, the procedure in relation to offences and the offence record system

An appeal can be submitted against the binding resolution, with suspensive effect. (Paragraph 4 of Article 293 of Criminal Proceedings Act) Before submitting the indictment, the investigational judge decides about the obligation of revealing. (Paragraph (2) f) of Article 207 of Criminal Proceedings Act)

Against the resolution of the investigating judge an appeal can be submitted as well, with suspensive effect. (Paragraph (5) a) of Article 215 of Criminal Proceedings Act

Based on the current regulation, journalist cannot be obliged to reveal the sources of their information nor in civil, administrative and offence procedure, thus they shall only use other available evidence for the purpose of establishing the allegation, in line with Principle 4.

Article 82 has been amended by an act, which regulates the refusal of deposition among the barriers of deposition.

Based on the rules of the Criminal Proceedings Act, journalists can refuse deposition, if his deposition would reveal the identity of his source, except for if the court obliged him to reveal the source. (Paragraph (1) b) of Article 82). The exemption shall remain valid even after the legal relationship justifying the exemption is terminated. (Paragraph 4 of Article 83) Exemption is extended into the confiscation of objects containing information. (Paragraph (3)-(4) of Article 152), except for the compulsory injunction of the Court. (Paragraph (5) d) of Article 152)

In Principle 5, conditions concerning disclosures are actually basic procedural guarantees, which shall be applied by all courts. The Hungarian regulation is in line with Principle 5, however it is not in strong relation with this question.

In line with Principle 6, Media Act, the Administrative Proceedings and Services Act, and the Act on Offences, journalist enjoy exemption to hand over any documents, objects or data carriers that could potentially reveal the identity of the journalists' source. Only criminal court can oblige journalist to reveal the source of his information. The decision depends on the investigational judge. (Paragraph (2) f) of Article 207 of Act of Criminal Proceedings). Against his injunction further remedy shall be submitted.

During criminal procedure, exemption is extended to the confiscation of objects containing information of the source. (Paragraph (3)-(4) of Article 152 of Criminal Proceedings Act), except for the Court obliged the journalist to reveal the identity of the source. (Paragraph (5) d) of Article 152 Criminal Proceedings Act)

The provisions of the Criminal Code related to depositions, are in line with Principle 7. Based on the rules of the Criminal Proceedings Act, journalists can refuse deposition, if his deposition would reveal the identity of his source, except for if the court obliged him to reveal the source. (Paragraph (1) d) of Article 82). The exemption shall remain valid even after the legal relationship justifying the exemption is terminated. (Paragraph (4) of Article 83) Exemption is extended into the confiscation of objects containing information. (Paragraph (3)-(4) of Article 152), except for the compulsory injunction of the Court. (Paragraph (5) d) of Article 152)

It is still uncertain, who can enjoy the right of non-disclosure. The Press Freedom Act only denotes the media-content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in other work-related legal relationship with a media content provider amongst the exempted ones.

Journalist cannot be obliged to reveal the identity of their sources, if they themselves are media content providers or persons in an employment relationship or in other work-related legal relationship with a media content provider, however the exemption shall remain valid even after the legal relationship justifying the exemption is terminated.⁴² Thus protection is not extended to freelancer journalists, nor sources of bloggers dealing with public issues. The effect of Media Act is not extended to professional blogs, (for instance economic, public or educational blogs), if blogging is not conducted commercially, for achieving profits. The protection is explicitly extended for online press products, functioning as economic undertakings providing mass media.⁴³ Thus the provisions of thus are not extended for bloggers. Due to the recommendation of the European Commission,⁴⁴ the term journalist means any natural or legal person who is regularly or professionally engaged in the collection and dissemination of information to the public via any means of mass communication. Thus the definition considers journalists persons who are regularly engaged in the collection and dissemination of information as well as professionals.

Experts of the European Commission has explicated in their Opinion on Media Legislation of Hungary, that the extension of the protection to freelancer journalists would be justifiable, whom might get information prior to those, who are in legal relationship with any media content provider.⁴⁵

The party who refers to the right of non-disclosure shall provide that the respective information was obtained in relation with media content, therefore during journalistic activity. Thus the regulation should be amended in favour of freelancer journalists.

In Hungary, the general investigating authority is the police. (Paragraph (1) of Article 36 of Criminal Proceedings Act.) It shall fall within the exclusive competence of the prosecutor's office to conduct investigation in criminal offences determined under Article 29 of the Criminal Proceedings Act.

In Hungary, no investigating authority can decide about the necessity of disclosure, the authority itself only reveals information from alternative sources. The category "alternative sources" involves all information, facts and data that can be acquired by any other investigative method as an alternative measure.

⁴² Kóczyán Sándor: Hungarian media regulation and the protection of sources of information

⁴³ Koltay András (2011) The constitutionality of media content in the new Hungarian media regulation. Médiakutató, autumn

⁴⁴ Recommendation No R (2000) 7

⁴⁵ Experts of the European Commission has explicated in their Opinion on Media Legislation of Hungary, Page 25-26, Report by Nils Muižnieks commissioner for human rights of the Council of Europe following his visit to Hungary from 1 to 4 July 2014 https://www.ecoi.net/file_upload/1226_1421659549_com-instranet.pdf

These authorities are bound by the particular provisions of the Criminal Proceedings Act. The decision depends on the investigational judge. Against his injunction further remedy shall be submitted.

6. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 the following principles should be respected when the necessity of disclosure is stated: absence of reasonable alternative measures, outweighing legitimate interest (protection of human life, prevention of major crime, defence of a person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime). Under which criteria can the interest in the disclosure outweigh the interest in the non-disclosure?

Limits to the right of non-disclosure are regulated by Paragraph (2) of Article 6) of Act CIV of 2010 on Freedom of Press and Fundamental Rules of Media Contents⁴⁶ (hereinafter: Press Freedom Act) only empowers the judicial authorities to oblige journalist to disclose information, if it is required in case of revealing a crime and only in exceptionally justified cases.

Based on Paragraph 2 of Press Freedom Act, courts can only oblige media-content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in other work-related legal relationship with a media content provider to hand over any documents, objects or data carriers in case of revealing a crime, in exceptional and legally specified case.

Thus, exceptions are regulated in Article 82 of Act XIX of 1998 on Criminal Proceedings⁴⁷ (hereinafter: Criminal Proceedings Act), not in Press Freedom Act.
Based on Article 82 of Criminal Proceedings Act:

Courts can only oblige media content -provider or a person in an employment relationship or in other work-related legal relationship with a media content provider to reveal the identity of his source, for revealing onerous, intentional crime, which is ordered to be punished with 3-year term of confinement or more, the identity of the source of the information is essential, and the expected evidence cannot be substituted.

An appeal can be submitted against the binding resolution, with suspensive effect. (Paragraph 4 of Article 293) Before submitting the indictment, the investigational judge decides about the obligation of revealing. (Paragraph (2) f) of Article 207)

Against the resolution of the investigational judge an appeal can be submitted as well, with suspensive effect. (Paragraph (5) a) of Article 215)

⁴⁶ Act CIV of 2010 on Freedom of Press and Fundamental Rules of Media Contents'

⁴⁷ Article 82 of Act XIX of 1998 on Criminal Proceedings

Based on Paragraph (2) f) of Article 207 of Criminal Proceedings Act, only criminal court can oblige journalist to reveal the source of his information. The decision depends on the investigational judge. Against his injunction further remedy shall be submitted.

These are the required conditions to oblige a media content provider to disclose information. As it is drafted in the Criminal Proceedings Act, the regulation is in accordance with the principle of „absence of reasonable alternative measures”.

However, outweighing legitimate interest is a wider category in the Hungarian regulation, than in the Recommendation. Due to the provisions of the Criminal Proceedings Act, the condition of the necessity of disclosure is in case of an intentional crime, which is ordered to be punished with 3-year term of confinement or more.

There are many crimes in the Hungarian Criminal Code which are ordered to be punished with the extent mentioned above, thus the Hungarian regulation ensures more discretionary power for the investigational judge when deciding about the necessity of disclosure. Therefore in Hungary, protection of human life, prevention of major crime, defence of a person accused or convicted of having committed a major crime is not an exclusive circle for obliging the media-content provider to disclosure.

As a consequence, from this particular aspect, the Hungarian regulation is not absolutely in accordance with the principles of the Recommendation.

7. In the light of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, how do national courts apply the respective laws with regard to the right to protect sources? In particular, how do they balance the different interests at stake?

7.1. The Case Law of ECtHR

The European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms was opened for signature by The Council of Europe in 1950, and taken effect in 1953. Article 10 of this Convention protects the freedom of expression. The European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as: “Court”) has no authority to annul the decisions of the member state’s courts, or start modification of the national law, but the default judgement will have consequences in the given state. “The case-law of the judiciary mediates legal culture without fail and it is a legal treasure, common value. It shows the development of an era” - says András Baka, the prior Hungarian judge of the Strasbourg Court. The Court tries to define a common minimum requirement connected to the human rights. This standard, the disciplines and practice of judgements formed by the Court can be strict in different ways in certain fundamental rights, moreover within the rights, too. The public debates, the protection of political expressions and the free review of public figures get priority in the exercise of justice. The same can be told in the some question of the liberty of press, like the journalist’s right to keep in secret the sources. In these cases the Court acted tolerably active, so they have put the collective minimum standard on a high level. In the case of other kinds of speeches the Court satisfies with keeping alive the already existing collective minimum, like racism expressions, which are otherwise controlled in every state. In a third group the Court leaves the sweep of the members relating to the restricting rules of the freedom of expression, for example reviling religious and words against the public moral.⁴⁸ The decisions of The European Court of Human Rights exemplify, that they keep the press as the public watchdog of democracy, which is inspired to have in tow the democratic order, so the media can be restricted in only extraordinary cases, shows by the adjudicative power. Despite retaining the jurisdiction of the member state, alias the principle of margin of appreciation has basic importance in the practice of the Court. The freedom of expression can be limited only with the numerous reasons contained in Article 10, Subsection (2), however the guarantees of restriction are written in the text.⁴⁹

7.2. Justice in Hungary

7.2.1. Introduction

The Convention had been signed by Hungary in November of 1990 and ratified two years later, then enacted as the Act XXXI of 1993.⁵⁰ How does the case-law of Strasbourg and the ECHR affect the internal law of the partial states? The text of the Convention only prescribes, that the adjudication power of the Court extends all issues relating to the interpretation and application of the Convention and its protocols (Article 32, Subsection (1.)) Based on the Article 46., Subsection (1.) of binding force and execution of judgments, the states undertake, that they accept, that the judgements of the Court have binding force, when they are parties in a case. This provision doesn't contain the wider interpretation agreed by lots, which includes, that the text of the Convention as an undertaken obligation in an international treaty and the whole case-law of the Strasbourg Court oblige the Hungarian dispensation of justice. The Convention is not only binding because of it is an international treaty, but also a part of the internal law since 1993, therefore the national courts have to apply it based on the principle of nullum crimen sine lege. But it is solely refers to the text, so it is not applicable for know the exact limits and the restriction opportunities of the fundamental rights, however it gives clue better, than the Constitution anyway.⁵¹

48 András Koltay: A szólásszabadság alapvonalai, page 51.-54.

<https://jak.ppke.hu/uploads/articles/12332/file/Koltay%20Andr%C3%A1s%20PhD.pdf>

49 Perry Keller : Európai és nemzetközi médiajog (European and International Media Law, page 234.-238.

50 http://net.jogtar.hu/jr/gen/hjegy_doc.cgi?docid=99300031.TV

51 András Koltay: A szólásszabadság alapvonalai, page 55.

<https://jak.ppke.hu/uploads/articles/12332/file/Koltay%20Andr%C3%A1s%20PhD.pdf>

7.2.2. Restriction of the Freedom of Expression

In the Decision 30/1992. (V. 26.)⁵² the Constitutional Court - affected by the joint to the ECHR – gave expression to the opinion, which says, that the freedom of expression is the "mother law" of communication rights. Furthermore, it declares that this right is not unrestrictable, but the restricting rules of law have to be interpreted tight. There are no defined occasions by the Constitution, when this fundamental right can be limited, but they declared, that the freedom of press principally has aerial limits, including the press emendation and this right is ensured by the non-intervention of the government (Decision 37/1992. (VI. 10.) AB).⁵³ Our authoritative act of press,⁵⁴ the Conventional, together with the Decree-law 8. of 1976 on the Proclamation of International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights⁵⁵ contains provisions to restrict the freedom of expression next to certain conditions.⁵⁶

7.2.3. Justice Formed by the Constitution

The Constitutional Court - who keeps guard above the Constitution – always recons with the case law of Strasbourg in its practice? This comes with a good effect that the Constitutional Court's decisions can strain of the limits of the law, which are unacceptable for Strasbourg. This can be happened, because they interpret the Hungarian acts and the Constitution by the judgements of ECtHR, too. If any Hungarian law falls foul of the practice of Strasbourg, the Constitutional Court solves the conflict. An important example for this is Decision 165/2011 (XII.20.) AB57. It says, that the provisions - refer to the rules of media contents and the journalist's protection of sources from the Act CIV of 2010 on the Freedom of the Press and the Fundamental Rules of Media Content⁵⁸, together with the obligation to render information and the rules refer to the Media – and Broadcasting Commissioner from the Act CLXXXV of 2010 on Media Services and Mess Media⁵⁹ – are against the Constitution. The ECHR is underlying for the explanation on more points, even more they refer to the case law of the ECtHR, inter alia the significant case of W. Goodwin contra The United Kingdom. The Constitutional Court declares, that the restriction of the act has to have correspondence with the Article 10, Subsection (2). For the same reasons they refused the government's proposal, that recommended to interpret again the Article IX. of the Constitution about the freedom of press (Decision 21/2012. IV.17.AB).⁶⁰ It is an indirect effect, when the case law of ECtHR appears in

52 <http://public.mkab.hu/mkab/dontesek.nsf/0/C12579890041A608C125798800473E9B?OpenDocument>

53 <http://public.mkab.hu/dev/dontesek.nsf/0/261126A74CAFE513C1257ADA005277C3?OpenDocument>

54 http://nmhh.hu/dokumentum/162262/smtv_110803_en_final.pdf

55 http://net.jogtar.hu/jr/gen/hjegy_doc.cgi?docid=97600008.TVR

56 Pákozdy Csaba: A véleménynyilvánítás szabadsága és a nemzetközi jog, különös tekintettel az EJEB joggyakorlatára, page 209-210.

57 <http://public.mkab.hu/mkab/dontesek.nsf/0/C12579890041A608C125798F004FEC26?OpenDocument>

58 http://nmhh.hu/dokumentum/162262/smtv_110803_en_final.pdf

59 http://hunmedialaw.org/dokumentum/153/Mttv_110803_EN_final.pdf

60 http://www.mediajogfigyelo.hu/uploads/files/6_21_2012.pdf

the practice of the Constitutional Court, forms it and causes modifications in the national law system. The case law of Strasbourg can turn up in the practice of the national courts, but it is pretty rare in Hungary. This can lead to problems for example at the area of the freedom of expression.⁶¹ There was a meaningful problem, when a new act by the current government named the Constitution of Media in 2010, restricted many provisions regard to the freedom of press. It caused a mess, because the Hungarian rule was reverse of the Convention. The Constitutional Court earlier alluded to the constitutional requirement, that the courts have to take notice of the ECHR, even more later in a decision they put down, that the opinion of the European Court of Human Rights forms and binds the Hungarian practice of law (Decision 18/2004. (V.25.)).⁶² Finally, the modification of the Media Constitution (Act CIV of 2010 on the Freedom of the Press and the Fundamental Rules of Media Content) by the Constitutional Court terminated the dispute, as I mentioned above.⁶³

7.2.4. Example for the Effect of the Case-law of Strasbourg

Hungary joined the European tendency that the freedom of expression is playing down the criminal sanctions. It doesn't mean that a perpetrator has no responsibility, just the current rules of human rights extend in the application of law. The Constitutional Court employed the "necessity test" shaped by the Strasbourg Court in the case of Sunday Times v. United Kingdom in 1979. Based on the test the complaint about the restriction has to be examined, that is it necessary in a democratic state or not, furthermore how much is it proportional with the legal goal. In the same Decision (36/1994. (VI. 24.))⁶⁴ of the ECtHR, which dealt with the expression of freedom regard to public figures (Lingens v. Austria, a Castells v. Spain, az Oberschlick v. Austria és a Thorgeirson v. Iceland). National law practice implemented the consideration of the public persons can get bigger amount of critics, than private persons according to the rules of ECtHR's case-law.⁶⁵

61 <https://jak.ppke.hu/uploads/articles/12332/file/Koltay%2520Andr%25C3%25A1s%2520PhD.pdf>

62 <http://public.mkab.hu/dev/dontesek.nsf/0/4EA2726C0A3F263EC1257ADA00529A10?OpenDocument>

63 http://www.mediakutato.hu/cikk/2011_01_tavasz/02_uj_mediatorveny

64 <http://net.jogtar.hu/jr/gen/getdoc2.cgi?docid=994H0036.AB>

65 http://www.mediakutato.hu/cikk/2006_03_osz/06_kozszereplok_szemelyisegvedelme

8. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information? Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

8.1 What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information?

According to the Hungarian National Security Services Act CXXV of 1995, the Intelligence Office shall gather information on organised crime abroad threatening national security, in particular, on terrorist organisations, illegal drug and arms trafficking, as well as on the illegal international circulation of weapons of mass destruction and the components thereof, and the materials and means required for their production. The national security services may only use special means and methods of intelligence gathering, if the data required for the fulfilment of the tasks specified in this Act cannot be acquired in any other manner.

The directors general of the national security services may authorise the gathering of intelligence until a decision is made by the authoriser, if having the intelligence gathering authorised by an outside organ would bring about a delay that would obviously interfere with the interest in the successful operation of the national security service in the given matter. The directors general of the national security services shall submit the proposal for outside authorisation simultaneously with the granting of their authorization. Unless a new fact arises that directly threatens national security, the gathering of intelligence may be ordered only once in the same matter on the basis of the exceptional authorization specified above.

As part of the gathering of intelligence, the national security services

- a) may ask for information;
- b) may gather information by concealing the national security nature thereof;
- c) may establish secret contacts with private individuals;
- d) may establish and use information systems promoting the gathering of intelligence;
- e) may set a trap that does not cause injury or impair health;
- f) may prepare and use cover documents for the protection of their own staff members and the natural persons co-operating with them, as well as for the concealment of the national security nature involved;
- g) may establish and maintain cover organizations;
- h) may put the persons affected by their tasks under surveillance, together with the rooms, buildings, and other installations, sectors and route sections, vehicles, and events that may be associated with them, and may record the observations using technical means;
- i) may tap conversations, and may record the observations using technical means;

j) may gather information from telecommunications systems and other data storage systems subject to licence.

Law enforcement agencies may be used as cover organizations, and the documents thereof may be used as cover documents only with the information thereof of the competent Minister and the national head of the organisation concerned.⁶⁶

The National Security Special Service upon written request, shall provide services, using the special means and methods of intelligence gathering subject to legal rules, for the intelligence gathering activities of organisations authorized by the law to do so; based on the requirements of organisations authorized by the law, shall provide the special technical means and materials needed for the intelligence gathering activities furthermore it shall provide special telecommunications connection for users specified by the Government and oversee, in the capacity of authority, the protection of security documents.

The Hungarian Criminal Procedure distinguishes two forms of secret data collection. The so called covert intelligence gathering is executed by the authorities before the opening of the criminal procedure and can be performed for purpose of criminal investigation or for other purposes (particularly for national security). The covert intelligence gathering shall be permitted by a judge or by the minister of justice depending on its purpose. The other form is the covert data gathering. This shall follow only purposes of criminal investigation and can be performed during the criminal procedure. This data gathering shall be permitted by the investigation judge who afterward controls whether this secret operation has been performed under the law. If the performing authority goes beyond legal limits, the investigation judge terminates the covert data collection and the results cannot be used as evidence. Covert data gathering may be applied if the proceedings are conducted upon suspicion of a criminal offence or preparations for a criminal offence that have been committed intentionally and is punishable by five years or more imprisonment or other felonies. Furthermore, generally, the power of seizure belongs to the public prosecutor, to the court and to the investigating authority, but some objects can be seized only upon order of the court. Seizure means divesting the owner of a property of his/her right of disposal in order to obtain evidence or ensure the confiscation or forfeiture of the property. The object of seizure can be property and also computer system or data medium containing data recorder.

Hungary's parliament moved to increase surveillance of high-level public officials, with the modification of the National Security Law on 24 May 2013. It was designed to allow the state to identify any risks that could lead to someone influencing or blackmailing a person under surveillance, which would in turn cause state security issues, the law says. The range of positions in the secret service's focus is detailed: the people subject to such surveillance are ambassadors, state secretaries, heads of administrative bodies and councils, the management of parliament, the head of the military forces and army generals, police commanders and superintendents, and heads and board members of state-owned companies. The person in question needs to sign an approval for the surveillance to be allowed. Refusal to sign means they lose their jobs. The modification has raised concerns on the part of the ombudsman and civil rights groups, and sparked comments that the secret service's reach into people's private lives would now be "total". The bill also lifts the earlier requirement of a court nod for the secret gathering of information on people by opening their letters, making audio and video recordings or searching and bugging their homes.

⁶⁶ Act on the National Security Services 1995 s 54 (1)

Apart from allowing surveillance of a selected group of people without letting them seek legal remedy, the law provides no regulations that limit who can see the information, what can be done with it, or how long it can be stored. The law also allows for employees to be fired for conduct outside the workplace, for as yet unspecified reasons. It means that Hungary now allows investigation of particular individuals without any need to demonstrate a specific reason why every aspect of a person's life must be reviewed. That is unusual in democratic states. The new national security law has really created an Orwellian landscape in Hungary.⁶⁷

In other words, it is possible for virtually any person in Hungary to be subjected to secret surveillance as the legislation does not describe the categories of persons who, in practice, may have their communications intercepted. The authorities simply have to identify to the responsible minister the name of the individual(s) or the "range of persons" to be intercepted, without demonstrating their actual or presumed relation to any terrorist threat. Furthermore, under the legislation, when requesting permission from the Minister of Justice to intercept an individual's communications, the anti-terrorism task force is merely required to argue that the secret intelligence gathering is necessary, without having to provide evidence in support of their request. In particular, such evidence would provide a sufficient factual basis to apply such measures and would enable an evaluation of their necessity based on an individual suspicion regarding the targeted individual. The Court reiterated that any measure of secret surveillance which did not correspond to the criteria of being strictly necessary for the safeguarding of democratic institutions or for the obtaining of vital intelligence in an individual operation would be prone to abuse by authorities with formidable technologies at their disposal. Another element which could be prone to abuse is the duration of the surveillance. It is not clear from the wording of the law whether the renewal of surveillance warrant (on expiry of the initial 90 days stipulated under the National Security Act) for a further 90 days is possible only once or repeatedly. Moreover, these stages of authorisation and application of secret surveillance measures lacked judicial supervision. Although the security services are required, when applying for warrants, to outline the necessity of the secret surveillance, this procedure does not guarantee an assessment of whether the measures are strictly necessary, notably in terms of the range of persons and the premises concerned. For the Court, supervision by a politically responsible member of the executive, such as the Minister of Justice, did not provide the necessary guarantees against abuse. External, preferably judicial control of secret surveillance activities offers the best guarantees of independence, impartiality and a proper procedure.⁶⁸

⁶⁷ Éva Tomássy, 'Data retention and the use of spy software in Hungary' (Report 2014) <<https://giswatch.org/en/country-report/communications-surveillance/hungary>> accessed 3 June 2016

On January 12, in the Szabó and Vissy vs. Hungary case, the European Court of Human Rights (“ECHR”) condemned the surveillance of individuals by Hungarian authorities for anti-terrorism purposes. The case concerned the 2011 Hungarian legislation on secret anti-terrorist surveillance operations (“Legislation”). Under the Legislation, a special anti-terrorism task force has specific powers for purposes of intelligence gathering, including that it may conduct secret house searches and surveillance with recording, open letters and parcels, and check and record the contents of electronic or computerised communications – all this without the consent of the persons concerned.

Hungarian legislation on secret anti-terrorist surveillance does not have sufficient safeguards against abuse. In particular, the ECtHR criticised:

- that virtually anyone in Hungary may be subjected to covert surveillance as this does not require the authorities to demonstrate an actual or presumed relation to any terrorist threat;
- the fact that when requesting permission to intercept an individual’s communication, the anti-terrorism task force is merely required to argue that the secret intelligence gathering is necessary without having to provide evidence in support of their request;
- the fact that the Legislation does not clearly limit the duration of the surveillance;
- the lack of judicial oversight of the surveillance program – under the Legislation, covert surveillance only requires authorisation by the executive without an assessment of whether it is strictly necessary and without any external judicial or other control;
- the fact that affected citizens are at no point in time informed that they have been the subject of secret surveillance; and
- the lack of any effective remedy against secret surveillance measures.

Hungary has three months to request that the matter be considered by the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR. If this request is not made, Hungary will have to amend its laws in order to create safeguards and oversight of its surveillance activities.⁶⁹

⁶⁸ edecapitani, 'Strasbourg Court: Hungarian legislation on secret anti-terrorist surveillance does not have sufficient safeguards against abuse' (14 January 2016) <<http://free-group.eu/2016/01/14/strasbourg-court-hungarian-legislation-on-secret-anti-terrorist-surveillance-does-not-have-sufficient-safeguards-against-abuse/>> accessed 23, October 2016

⁶⁹ Denise Lebeau-Marianna, 'Hungary condemned for its mass surveillance program' (2016) <<http://www.bakerinform.com/home/2016/2/19/hungary-condemned-for-its-mass-surveillance-program>> accessed 22 October 2016

8.2 Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

The principle of legal certainty is essential to the confidence in the judicial system and the rule of law the state must make the text of the law easily accessible. It has also a duty to respect and apply, in a foreseeable and consistent manner, the laws it has enacted. Foreseeability means that the law must where possible be proclaimed in advance of implementation and be foreseeable as to its effects: it has to be formulated with sufficient precision to enable the individual to regulate his or her conduct. Legal certainty requires that legal rules are clear and precise, and aim at ensuring that situations and legal relationships remain foreseeable⁷⁰

There was growing concern about the powers of the Hungarian intelligence agency, the Anti-Terrorism Task Force (TEK), under the Police Act of 1994. The Act provided one set of surveillance powers exercisable in the context of criminal investigations (which subjected surveillance to judicial authorisation), and another set of powers (in section 7/E(3)) applicable to intelligence gathering in the context of national security. The national security surveillance powers were subject to ministerial, rather than judicial, authorisation; were not linked to a particular crime; and required a warrant to relate only to a premises persons concerned, or “a range of persons,” and was thus potentially executable against any person. In conclusion the wording of the law is not clear, virtually anyone in Hungary may be subjected to covert surveillance, the Legislation does not clearly limit the duration of the surveillance and there is not an effective remedy against secret surveillance measures.⁷¹

Regarding to the anti-terrorism provisions the Hungarian Parliament is set to amend several acts in order to enhance the effectiveness of the state in combatting terrorism.

Previous versions of the bill would have banned end-to-end encryption, and imposed criminal sanctions for their users and providers. While the current version is much more moderate, there are several provisions that would impose disproportionate restrictions on fundamental rights.

⁷⁰ Venice Commission, 'European Commission for Democracy through Law' (Report 2011) <http://www.venice.coe.int/webforms/documents/default.aspx?pdffile=CDL-AD\(2011\)003rev-e003rev-e)> accessed 6 May 2016

⁷¹ Carly Nyst, 'The European Court of Human Rights Constrains Mass Surveillance ' (Article 2016) <<https://www.justsecurity.org/28939/ecthr-constrains-mass-surveillance/>> accessed 13 May 2016

9. Can journalists rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance?

9.1 Right to a Name

As we know media get many relevant information from anonymous sources but do journalists have a right to write under assumed names? The Act V of 2013 on the Civil Code of Hungary declares journalists right to a name in section 2:49:

“(1) Literary, artistic or scientific activities or activities accompanying public performances may be pursued under an assumed name, provided that it does not result in any harm to the relevant lawful interests of other persons.

(2) If the name of a person engaged in literary, artistic or scientific activities or in activities accompanying public performances can be confused with the name of another person who has already been engaged in similar activities, at the request of the relevant person such name may be used with a distinctive addendum or omission while engaged in such activities.”⁷²

9.2 The Hungarian Media Regulation and its Material Scope

The Hungarian media law (Act CIV of 2010 on the Freedom of the Press and the Fundamental Rules of Media Content) and Act CLXXXV of 2010 on media services and mass media (the Media Act) give a description on their material scope. The Acts define the concept of establishment in accordance with the AVMS Directive. Article 1(1) of the Media Act divides the basic services under its scope into two large groups: media services and press products. The new regulation refers to the providers of the two different services as media content providers. Media service shall mean “any independent service of a commercial nature, as defined in Articles 56 and 57 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, provided on a regular basis, for profit, by taking economic risks, for which the media service provider bears editorial responsibility, the primary aim of which is the delivery of programmes to the general public for informational, entertainment or educational purposes through an electronic communications network.

Press products shall mean “individual issues of daily newspapers or other periodical papers, online newspapers or news portals, which are offered as a business service, for the content of which a natural or legal person, or a business association without legal personality has editorial responsibility, and the primary purpose of which is to deliver textual or image content to the general public for information, entertainment or educational purposes, in a printed format or through any electronic communications network. Editorial responsibility shall mean the responsibility for the actual control over the selection and composition of the media content and shall not necessarily result in legal responsibility in connection with the press product. Business service shall mean any independent service of a commercial nature, provided on a regular basis, for profit, by taking economic risks.”

⁷² Act V of 2013 on the Civil Code of Hungary

Both services are business services, for which the provider of the service bears editorial responsibility and whose main purpose is the provision of the service to the general public for information, entertainment or education purposes.⁷³

As a consequence, internet blogs which are not qualified as economic services are not regulated in the statute; however general regulations apply to them, for example Act C of 2012 on the Criminal Code and Act V of 2013 on the Civil Code.

9.3 The Hungarian Media Regulation and Its Problems

In 2010, the Hungarian parliament adopted new media regulation which included many changes and created a heated argument in Hungary and in Europe too. The European Parliament and the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) have voiced concern over the changes in the law. In December 2011, the Constitutional Court of Hungary decided that the protection of journalists' sources is not sufficiently guaranteed by the new media law. The court's decision states that the protection of journalist's sources has to be ensured in criminal investigations and civil procedures too. In individual cases it is the state authority that has to prove the court that the identification is justifiable the information cannot be obtained in any other way. After a few months the Hungarian government modified the media law:

Article 6

(2) In order to investigate a crime, the court has the right – in exceptionally justified cases as defined by law – to oblige the media content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in other work-related legal relationship with a media content provider to reveal the identity of the journalists' source or to hand over any document, object, or data carrier that could potentially identify the journalists' source.

Under the new rule, the general right of confidentiality is not unlimited. It does not cover the protection of journalists' sources transmitting classified data without authorization and, in exceptionally justified cases during judicial and proceedings by investigating authorities, media content providers may be obliged to reveal their sources “in the interests of protecting national security and public order or uncovering or preventing criminal acts”. The scope of exceptions is narrow and justifies the restriction of journalists' rights to confidentiality (even the most debated category of “public order” can be interpreted based on criminal law jurisprudence). The courts and competent authorities must construe these exceptions narrowly in order to ensure that the freedom of the press is respected.⁷⁴

⁷³ http://hunmedialaw.org/dokumentum/95/Mediaszolg_sajtoterm_fogalma_IAS_EN_FINAL_20120117_final.pdf

⁷⁴ http://mediatanacs.hu/dokumentum/2791/1321457199hungary_new_media_regulation_eng_web.pdf

Encryption and Anonymity of the Sources

Anonymity is primarily characteristic of the online press. Anonymous journalism or journalistic activity conducted under a pen-name does not, of course, entail a waiver of legal liability. When it comes to the right of public figures and private persons to privacy, similarly to the protection of reputation and honour, there are differences in the extent of privacy protection afforded to public figures and private persons. The private life of a public figure has a huge impact on his or her position. According to decision No. 60/1994 (XII.24) of the Constitutional Court, in order to serve the purposes of a democratic public life and of public opinion, constitutionally protected extent of privacy afforded to state officials and other public figures in politics is more limited than the privacy of others (...) With regard to persons exercising state powers and undertaking a public role for political purposes, the right of others- especially of voting citizens- to the disclosure of public interest data is given priority over the right to the protection of the personal data of the former persons if such personal data may be relevant to the public activities- or to the evaluation thereof- of such persons [justification, Part IV/2, Point ba].

Nevertheless, even the most prominent politicians have a certain degree of privacy. According to the erga omnes presumption stipulated in [Article 8(7) of] the Freedom of Information Act, “permission shall be deemed as granted by the subject in relation to personal data disclosed or released for publication by the subject during a public appearance.”⁷⁵

Investigative journalists often use encryption software in order to protect their data. One popular data protecting software called Pretty Good Privacy (PGP) is freely available without government interference. National Security services can “gather information from telecommunications systems and other data storage devices” without a warrant. According to the Electronic Communications Act, electronic communications service providers are obligated to “cooperate with organizations authorized to perform intelligence information gathering and covert acquisition of data.” Additionally, the act states that “the service provider shall, upon the written request from the National Security Special Service, agree with the National Security Special Service about the conditions of the use of tools and methods for the covert acquisition of information and covert acquisition of data.” In accordance with the EU Directive 2006/24/EC on data retention, ISPs and mobile phone companies in Hungary must retain user data for up to one year, including personal data, location, caller phone numbers, the duration of phone conversations, IP addresses, and user IDs for investigative authorities and security services. There is no data on the extent of these activities, even though there is a legal obligation to provide the European Commission with statistics of the queries for data made by the investigating authorities. However, in April 2014, the European Court of Justice declared the EU Data Retention Directive invalid, causing a number of countries within the EU to rethink their data retention legislation.⁷⁶

⁷⁵ András Koltay, Hungarian Media Law (2012)

⁷⁶ http://nhit.hu/dokumentum/72/Freedomhouse_HU1209.pdf

10. Are whistle-blowers explicitly protected under law protecting journalistic sources? Is there another practice protecting whistle-blowers? Is the legislation prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers?

10.1 The Question's Appearance in Hungary

The protection of sources and informants in Hungary had been unclear for a long time. Protection of insider informants incidentally became part of the common talk as well as part of the principal priority of the governance's anti-corruption program, right after Stephen M. Kohn's – chief of the American Nation Whistleblower Center – visit to Hungary in 2008. The summit was attended by high ranked Hungarian politicians and government representatives as well as members of the Anticorruption Advisory Board, which was set up by the Hungarian government. Information about the American whistleblowing policy's practice caused severe misinterpretations. Since then, in government pronouncements and press releases, domain policy concerning the delivering insider information had been presents as the major tool for the Anti-corruption fight, which had been widely spread in developed democracies. The hurriedly made Hungarian regulations in turn worked out procedures for the protection of informants and for the purpose of incentive material compensations. According to the newly introduced American example – the government decided to set up a General Welfare Bureau⁷⁷.

10.2. The Historical Motives Behind the Regulation

Despite the existence of several progressive international regulations, an act winded up source protection from January 1, 2011, which was imposed by the next government. Several American member states' shield-laws or the European Court of Human Rights' verdicts could have served as a bench-mark (Sanoma Uitgevers B.V. v. The Netherlands, 2010). Nevertheless, in the name of law, solely sources concerning public welfare could enjoy the benefit of source protection. Protection act tied to the indeterminable public welfare does not have subjective right nature. The by-laws say that in exceptionally justified cases, the source of the information can be forced to disclosure by the court or any other authorities for the purpose of protecting state-security and public order, or felony reconnaissance and prevention. This means that the disclosure of the informant practically can be forced, referring to any obscure cause, without the need for judicial decision. The act remains silent on harmonies with procedural laws (especially criminal laws), this also pints to the fact that the regulation is not prudent.⁷⁸

⁷⁷ Szente Zoltán: A bennfentes informátorok(whistleblower) alkalmazásának lehetőségei a korrupcióellenes küzdelemben (The opportunities of applying whistleblowers in the fight against corruption) page 1.-2.

⁷⁸ <http://tasz.hu/politikai-szabadsagjogok/mediatorveny-elemzese-also-resz>

In May 2012 the Hungarian parliament recognized the change of the “media-constitution”, which significantly extended the protection of journalist’s sources. This was triggered by the impact of national and international media coverage and a precedent that caused general public outcry. In June 2011, a department of the Budapest Police Headquarters had ordered Hungary’s leading news website chief editor to reveal informants, only a few days after the Constitution came into force in media provisions that allowed it. Thomas Bodoky – of course – did not disclose the source, referring to the acts of the Constitutional Law and European Human Rights. During the long legal procedure, the police and the prosecutor’s office rejected the request, and then in December 2011, the Constitutional Court stated: the legislator inadequately regulated the journalistic source protection. The National Cooperation System – in an uncharacteristic manner – five months later prepared the act-proposal, moreover in the parliament debate; it accepted an amendment from the opposition⁷⁹.

10.3. The Executory Regulation

According to the new regulation, sources of journalists can only be disclosed in criminal proceedings and has to be supported by judicial decisions only. This can only take place if the knowledge of the identity of a source of information is essential in detecting the crime in the current case, the expected evidence from the source is irreplaceable, and the interest of detecting the crime in the particular case outweighs the interest of the protection of the information’s source. There is only one problem with the provision: in almost all criminal cases, the journalist can be forced by the court to disclose the source’s identity, although this can only be allowed in serious crimes – according to the European Human Rights. In practice, this conflict can be resolved, if the acting judges can measure up properly the interest of the society in each case.⁸⁰

The amendment added to the Code of Civil Procedure (Act III of 1952 170.§ (1) f))⁸¹, the Criminal Procedure (Act XIX of 1998. 82.§ (1) d))⁸² and General Rules of Administrative Proceedings and Services (Act CXL of 2004. 53.§ (4) c)), that a media service or a third party that is in contract with the mentioned body, may refuse to testify, if that leads to the disclosure of the informant’s identity. Also, it added that a person can only be forced to disclosing a source’s identity, if the court decides so, but only if conditions stated in the acts of basic rules of press’ freedom and media contents are met. In addition, the current law on the topic (Act CIV of 2010 on the Freedom of the Press and Fundamental Rules of Media Content basic rules)⁸³ also states that a media service cannot be held responsible for any infringement that was committed for the purpose of collecting information that concerns public interest (in controlled framework, e.g. the act of collection cannot be in conflict with criminal laws).

⁷⁹ http://hvg.hu/cimke/Bodoky_Tam%C3%A1s

⁸⁰ <http://atlatszo.hu/2012/05/25/ujzagiroi-forrasvedelem-mukodik-a-nemzeti-egyuttmukodes-rendszere/>

⁸¹ http://net.jogtar.hu/jr/gen/hjegy_doc.cgi?docid=95200003.TV

⁸² http://net.jogtar.hu/jr/gen/hjegy_doc.cgi?docid=99800019.TV

⁸³ http://nmhh.hu/dokumentum/162262/smtv_110803_en_final.pdf

The Section 78 Subsection (1) of Labour Code (Act I of 2012 on the Labour Code, the Labour Code)⁸⁴, states that an employer or employee may terminate an employment relationship by extraordinary dismissal in the event that the other party

- a) wilfully or by gross negligence commits a grave violation of any substantive obligations arising from the employment relationship, or
- b) otherwise engages in conduct rendering further existence of the employment relationship impossible. No deviation from this provision shall be considered valid.

From this it cannot be validly derogated from. Although the scope of the “substantive obligations” arising from the employment relationship cannot be accurately determined (that should be considered in each case separately), according to the Labour Code, today in Hungary an employer is entitled to dismiss an employee, who is delivering insider information to an outside body, because the 10. § (2) paragraph of the Act states that, [a] Employers may only disclose facts, data and opinions concerning an employee to third persons in the cases specified by law or with the employee's consent.” This provision – which is one of the “fundamental rule” of meeting obligations in the Labour Code – itself is also incompatible with external “whistleblowing”, because the exact principle is that, someone is delivering confidential information about the organisation to other body or person, who has the possibility to perform against the misdemeanour or infringement. But it is in contradiction to the so called internal whistleblowing, where the concerned organisation does not have the institutional procedure that provides for receiving and investigating such notifications. So the insider information trading is per definition classified as serious violation of obligation by the Hungarian Labour Act, which renders the most severe employer sanction – the termination of employment with extraordinary notice.⁸⁵ Although from 2014, privately held companies are also entitled to set up a statutory abuse-reporting system, under which employees may report securely about suspicious events inside the company.

The Act CLXV of 2013 on Complaints and General Interest's Notification is a positive development, but Hungary may not yet be classified to the “most advanced announcer-protection law practicing states” on the list of Transparency International, because it does not currently have a particular program, that would ensure the effective protection of announcers against the possible negative sanctions. According to the domestic law, the person concerned with the investigation can handle the personal data of the announcers and people involved in the announcement without prior consent, assuming that the operation of the system is reported to the data protection register and comply with the other statutory obligations.⁸⁶

⁸⁴ <http://www.1x1forditiroda.hu/Act I of 2012 on the Labor Code.pdf>

⁸⁵ Szente Zoltán: A bennfentes informátorok(whistleblower) alkalmazásának lehetőségei a korrupcióellenes küzdelemben (The opportunities of applying whistleblowers in the fight against corruption) page 15.
http://www.kozigkut.hu/doc/szente_09okt.pdf

⁸⁶ <http://www.haszon.hu/archivum/10409-vedett-vallalati-besugok.html>

Article 257 of Act IV of 1978 of the old Criminal Code existed for the protection of insider informants and was directly applicable, which makes the retaliation against the “public concern announcer” a criminal offense, when it states that “Any person who takes any detrimental action against a person who has made an announcement of public concern is guilty of a misdemeanour punishable by imprisonment for up to two years, community service work, or a fine.” The new Code regulates only the abuse of data relating to a public concern: misdemeanour is committed when a person conceal, destroy, or falsify data after the court has obliged the person to release the data (Article 220 Subsection (1) of Act C of 2012 on new Criminal Code).⁸⁷

12. Conclusion

Based on this research we can see that freedom of the press does not mean that journalism have no legal restrictions and controls. However we have limits in every field of our lives, we can still be free. The key is to define the limits precisely and find balance.

In the case of the press the obligation for the journalists - where they are forced to disclose the source- is quite clear and exact. First of all after some disappointing incident (like the Bodoky-case⁸⁸) the legislators corrected the inaccuracy and follow the amendment of the law. It is partly the result of the Constitutional Court's control, and partly the reasonable thinking in the parliament. Secondly, originally the government wanted to give police officials the power to demand the name of a journalist's source. Now only a judge can decide whether a journalist must name their source. So it is already a development.

Besides legal safeguards for the press have special significance as the freedom of expression is an essential and very sensitive pillar in democratic societies. Although the Hungarian law tries to protect the freedom of expression and contains guarantees the right of the journalist to not disclose the source of information the Hungarian legal system really needs to improve.

We can claim that the justice of Hungary tries to implement the practice of the Strasbourg Court. Our Constitutional Court's decisions are the safeguards of the respect of the ECHR. Traversed the last twenty years the Constitutional Court adopted about 1500 decisions from which they referred to the culture of the human right's protection of Strasbourg at about 150 occasions. The asked Courts in Hungary said that they do not allude to the Convention in their sentences, but the judges are reckon with the principles of the Convention and the practice formed by the case law of the ECtHR.

⁸⁷ Szente Zoltán: A bennfentes informátorok (whistleblower) alkalmazásának lehetőségei a korrupcióellenes küzdelemben (The opportunities of applying whistleblowers in the fight against corruption) page 16.

http://www.kozigkut.hu/doc/szente_09okt.pdf

⁸⁸ In 2011 the Hungarian police confiscated a hard drive which was the property of Tamas Bodoky the co-founder and editor in chief of atlazo.hu investigative site. Tamas Bodoky made a complaint and the case ended up in a law amendment. (with the help of CC of Hungary's decision)

To sum up Hungary should regulate this matter (prohibition for the journalists) much detailed and should defend the sources much more – if needed even against the journalists – like other European countries do it. But we made our own progress and it slowly gets closer to the European standards.

13. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

13.1. Legislation

- Fundamental Law of Hungary
- Act CLXXXV of 2010 on Media Services and Mass Communication
- Act CXL of 2004 on the General Rules of Administrative Proceedings and Services
- Act XIX of 1998 on Criminal Proceedings
- Act V of 2013 on the Civil Code of Hungary
- Act CXII of 2011 on the Right of Informational Self-Determination and on Freedom of Information
- Act CIV of 2010 on Freedom of Press and Fundamental Rules of Media Contents'
- Act LXIV of 2012 on Amending Acts related to Media-services and Press-products
- Act II of 2012 on offences, the procedure in relation to offences and the offence record system
- Decision 165/2011. (XII. 20.) AB of the Hungarian Constitutional Court on the Media Regulation
- Explanatory Memorandum (EC) to Recommendation No. R (00) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information [2000] Adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 8 March 2000 at the 701st meeting of the Ministers' Deputies
- Recommendation No.R(2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information

13.2. Books

- Kóczián Sándor: Hungarian media regulation and the protection of sources of information, Médiakutató, 2013/3.sz.,
- Koltay András (2011) The constitutionality of media content in the new Hungarian media regulation. Médiakutató, autumn
- Koltay András : Comparative Perspectives on the Fundamental Freedom of Expression(Wolters Kluwer Kft. 2015)
- Koltay András, Nyakas Levente Magyar és európai médiajog, Wolters Kluwer Kft. 2013
- Pákozdy Csaba, Phd disszertáció: A véleménynyilvánítás szabadsága és a nemzetközi jog, különös tekintettel az EJEB joggyakorlatára
- Perry Keller : Európai és nemzetközi médiajog (Complex Kiadó)
- Szalai Anikó: Az Emberi Jogok Európai Bírósága ítélezésének megjelenése a magyar Alkotmánybíróság gyakorlatában , Külvilág 2004/1
- Szente Zoltán: A bennfentes informátorok(whistleblower) alkalmazásának lehetőségei a korrupcióellenes küzdelemben (The opportunities of applying whistleblowers in the fight against corruption)

- Székely László: Magyar sajtó- és médiajog (Nordex. Kft, Dialóg Kampus Kiadó, 2007)

13.3. Internet sources

- <http://public.mkab.hu/dev/dontesek.nsf/0/261126A74CAFE513C1257ADA005277C3?OpenDocument> (2016. 02. 15.)
- http://www.coe.int/t/dghl/standardsetting/media/doc/cm/rec\(2000\)007&expmem_EN.asp007&expmem_EN.asp)
- <http://mertek.eu/en/article/ruling-no-1652011-xii-20-ab-of-the-constitutional-court-summary>
- http://hunmedialaw.org/dokumentum/94/08_1652011_Abh_final.pdf
- <https://muosz.hu/>
- <https://www.article19.org/pages/en/protection-of-sources-more.html> accessed 10 May 2016
- Prof. dr. Dirk Voorhoof, "The media in a democratic society: reconciling freedom of expression with the protection of human rights" (2002) http://www.coe.int/T/E/Com/Files/Events/2002-09-Media/intervention_voorhoof.asp accessed 11 May 2016
- Gill Phillips, 'On Protection of Journalistic Sources' (2014)
<http://journalism.cmpf.eui.eu/discussions/on-protection-of-journalistic-sources/> accessed 6 May 2016
- Amy Brouillette, 'Hungarian Chill' (2011)
http://www.cjr.org/behind_the_news/hungarian_chill.php accessed 7 May 2016
- [http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i%3D001-57974#{"itemid":\["001-57974"\]}](http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i%3D001-57974#{)
- http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Convention_ENG.pdf
- http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/FS_Journalistic_sources_ENG.pdf
- http://mediatanacs.hu/dokumentum/2791/1321457199hungary_new_media_regulation_eng_web.pdf
- The Media Self-Regulation Guidebook
http://www.osce.org/fom/31497?download=truehttp://hunmedialaw.org/dokumentum/162/coregulation_summary_final.pdf
- <http://mkogy.jogtar.hu/?page=show&docid=a1200066.TV>
- https://www.icrc.org/ihl-at.nsf/0/033d3f79294dc84ec1257163002cd383/\$FILE/Act%20XIX%20of%201998.pdf
- http://tasz.hu/files/tasz/imce/2011/tasz_velemenymedia_modositas_0523.pdf
- http://net.jogtar.hu/jr/gen/hjegy_doc.cgi?docid=95200003.TV
- https://www.ecoi.net/file_upload/1226_1421659549_com-instranet.pdf
- András Koltay: A szólásszabadság alapvonalai, page 51.-54.
- <https://jak.ppke.hu/uploads/articles/12332/file/Koltay%20Andr%C3%A1s%20PhD.pdf>
- http://net.jogtar.hu/jr/gen/hjegy_doc.cgi?docid=99300031.TV

- <https://jak.ppke.hu/uploads/articles/12332/file/Koltay%20Andr%C3%A1s%20PhD.pdf>
- <http://public.mkab.hu/mkab/dontesek.nsf/0/C12579890041A608C125798800473E9B?OpenDocument>
- <http://public.mkab.hu/dev/dontesek.nsf/0/261126A74CAFE513C1257ADA005277C3?OpenDocument>
- http://nmhh.hu/dokumentum/162262/smtv_110803_en_final.pdf
- http://net.jogtar.hu/jr/gen/hjegy_doc.cgi?docid=97600008.TVR
- <http://public.mkab.hu/mkab/dontesek.nsf/0/C12579890041A608C125798F004FEC26?OpenDocument>
- http://nmhh.hu/dokumentum/162262/smtv_110803_en_final.pdf
- http://hunmedialaw.org/dokumentum/153/Mttv_110803_EN_final.pdf
- http://www.mediajogfigyelo.hu/uploads/files/6_21_2012.pdf
- <http://net.jogtar.hu/jr/gen/getdoc2.cgi?docid=994H0036.AB>
- http://www.mediakutato.hu/cikk/2006_03_osz/06_kozszereplok_szemelyisegvedelme
- <http://www.kul-vilag.hu/2010/04/szalai.pdf>
- <http://free-group.eu/2016/01/14/strasbourg-court-hungarian-legislation-on-secret-anti-terrorist-surveillance-does-not-have-sufficient-safeguards-against-abuse> accessed 23, October 2016
- Venice Commission, 'European Commission for Democracy through Law' (Report 2011) http://www.venice.coe.int/webforms/documents/default.aspx?pdffile=CDL-AD\(2011\)003rev-e003rev-e) accessed 6 May 2016
- Carly Nyst, 'The European Court of Human Rights Constrains Mass Surveillance' (Article 2016) <https://www.justsecurity.org/28939/ecthr-constrains-mass-surveillance/> accessed 13 May 2016
- http://hunmedialaw.org/dokumentum/95/Mediaszolg_sajtoterm_fogalma_IAS_EN_FINNAL_20120117_final.pdf
- <http://atlatszo.hu/2012/05/25/ujsgairoi-forrasvedelem-mukodik-a-nemzeti-egyuttmukodes-rendszer/>
- http://net.jogtar.hu/jr/gen/hjegy_doc.cgi?docid=95200003.TV
- http://net.jogtar.hu/jr/gen/hjegy_doc.cgi?docid=99800019.TV
- http://nmhh.hu/dokumentum/162262/smtv_110803_en_final.pdf
- http://www.1x1forditoiroda.hu/Act_I_of_2012_on_the_Labor_Code.pdf
- <http://www.haszon.hu/archivum/10409-vedett-vallalati-besugok.html>
- http://www.kozigkut.hu/doc/szente_09okt.pdf
- <http://tasz.hu/politikai-szabadsagjogok/mediatorveny-elemzese-else-resz>
- http://hvg.hu/cimke/Bodoky_Tam%C3%A1s

14. Table of provisions

Provisions in native language	Corresponding translation
Alaptörvény IX. Cikk (1) Mindenkinek joga van a véleménynyilvánítás szabadságához. (2) Magyarország elismeri és védi a sajtó szabadságát és sokszínűségét, biztosítja a demokratikus közvélemény kialakulásához szükséges szabad tájékoztatás feltételeit.	Fundamental Law Article IX (1) Everyone shall have the right to freedom of speech. (2) Hungary shall recognise and protect the freedom and diversity of the press, and shall ensure the conditions for free dissemination of information necessary for the formation of democratic public opinion.
a Polgári Törvénykönyvről szóló 2013. évi V. törvény 2:49. § (1) Irodalmi, művészeti, tudományos vagy közéleti szerepléssel járó tevékenységet felvett névvel is lehet folytatni, ha ez nem jár mások lényeges jogi érdekének sérelmével. (2) Ha az irodalmi, művészeti, tudományos vagy közéleti szerepléssel járó tevékenységet folytató személy neve összetéveszthető a már korábban is hasonló tevékenységet folytató személy nevével, az érintett személy kérelmére a név - e tevékenység gyakorlása során - megkülönböztető toldással vagy	Act V of 2013 on the Civil Code of 2:49: (1) Literary, artistic or scientific activities or activities accompanying public performances may be pursued under an assumed name, provided that it does not result in any harm to the relevant lawful interests of other persons. (2) If the name of a person engaged in literary, artistic or scientific activities or in activities accompanying public performances can be confused with the name of another person who has already been engaged in similar activities, at the request of the

elhagyással használható.	relevant person such name may be used with a distinctive addendum or omission while engaged in such activities.”
Büntetőeljárásról szóló 1998. évi XIX. törvény 36. § (1) bekezdés Az általános nyomozó hatóság a rendőrség.	Criminal Procedure Act of 1998 Article 36 (1) The general investigating authority is the police.
82. § (1) bekezdés A tanúvallomást megtagadhatja: b) az, aki a (4) bekezdés esetét kivéve magát vagy hozzátartozóját bűncselekmény elkövetésével vádolná, az ezzel kapcsolatos kérdésben, akkor is, ha a tanúvallomást az a) pont alapján nem tagadta meg, c) - a 81. § (2) bekezdésében foglalt titoktartási kötelezettség esetét ide nem értve - az, aki a foglalkozásánál vagy közmegebízásánál fogva titoktartásra köteles, ha a tanúvallomással a titoktartási kötelezettségét megsértené, kivéve, ha ez alól a külön jogszabály szerint jogosult felmentette, vagy külön jogszabály szerint a bíróság, az ügyész, illetőleg a nyomozó hatóság megkeresésére a titoktartási kötelezettség alá eső adat továbbítása a felmentésre jogosult számára kötelező,	Article 82(1) The following may refuse to testify as a witness: b) Those who – with the exception of subsection (4) – would incriminate themselves or their relatives, on the related issues, even if they have not refuse to testify under item a) c) those – excluding the case of secrecy obligation set forth in 81 (2) who are bound by secrecy owing to their profession or public office, if their testimony would violate such secrecy obligation, unless they have been relieved by a person authorised pursuant to a separate legal regulation, or unless the person authorised pursuant to a separate legal regulation is obliged to transmit the data subject to secrecy obligation under a separate legal regulation at the request of the court, the prosecutor or the investigating authority.

82. § (6) bekezdés A bíróság akkor kötelezheti a médiatartalom-szolgáltatót, valamint a vele munkaviszonyban vagy munkavégzésre irányuló egyéb jogviszonyban álló személyt a számára a médiatartalom-szolgáltatói tevékenységgel összefüggésben információt átadó személy kilétének felfedésére, ha három évig terjedő vagy ennél súlyosabb szabadságvesztéssel büntetendő szándékos bűncselekmény felderítése érdekében az információt átadó személy kilétének ismerete nélkülözhetetlen, az ettől várható bizonyíték mással nem pótolható, továbbá a bűncselekmény felderítéséhez fűződő érdek - különösen a bűncselekmény tárgyi súlyára tekintettel - olyan kiemelkedő, amely az információforrás titokban maradásához fűződő érdeket egyértelműen meghaladja.	Article 82.(6) The court will compel the media content provider , as well as other person who has legal relationship with him or who is employed or working for him in the context of media content service activity information source identity disclosure, if up to 3 or more years serious punishable with imprisonment for an intentional crime detection information transfer knowledge is essential to identify the person , if the expected evidence is irreplaceable, and if the and moral interests of crime detection (especially in view of the seriousness of the crime) is an outstanding source of information which clearly exceeds the interest in maintaining the confidentiality of the information source
95. § A tanú életének és testi épségének vagy személyes szabadságának védelme, valamint annak érdekében, hogy a tanú a vallomástételi kötelezettségének eleget tegyen és a vallomását megfélemlítés nélkül tegye meg, a tanút az e törvényben meghatározottak szerint védelemben kell részesíteni.	Article 95 In order to protect the life, physical integrity or personal freedom of the witness as well as to ensure that the witness fulfils the obligation of giving testimony and the testimony is given without any intimidation, the witness shall be provided protection as specified in this Act.
152. § (3) bekezdés Nem foglalhatók le a terhelt és a tanúvallomás megtagadására a 82. § (1) bekezdése alapján jogosult személy	Article 152 (3) Letters and other written communication between the defendant and a person who may refuse to testify as a witness

között váltott levelek és más írásbeli közlések, feltéve, ha a dolgot a tanúvallomás megtagadására jogosult személy őrzi.	under Section 82 (1) may not be seized, when they are kept by the latter person.
152. § (4) bekezdés Nem foglalhatók le azok az iratok sem, amelyeknek tartalmára a tanúvallomás megtagadható, ha az iratot a tanúvallomás megtagadására jogosult személy őrzi. Ez a korlátozás kiterjed annak a személynek a hivatali helyiségében őrzött iratokra és dolgokra, aki a 82. § (1) bekezdés c) pontja alapján a tanúvallomást megtagadhatja.	Article 152(4) Documents the contents of which may be subject to the refusal of a testimony may not be seized, either, when they are kept by the person who may refuse to testify as a witness. This restriction shall also apply to the papers and properties kept at the official premises of a person who may refuse to testify as a witness pursuant to Section 82 (1) c)
2004. évi CXL. törvény a közigazgatási hatósági eljárás és szolgáltatás általános szabályairól 50/A. § (2) bekezdés A lefoglalás érdekében a dolog birtokosát fel kell szólítani, hogy a dolgot adja át. Nem köteles a dolog átadására az, aki tanúként nem hallgatható meg, valamint az, aki az 53. § (4) bekezdés c) pontja alapján a tanúvallomást megtagadhatja, ha a számára információt átadó személy kilétét a dolog átadásával felfedné.	Act CXL of 2004 on the general rules of administrative proceedings and services 50/A. Article (2) In the process of implementation of the seizure the holder of the property shall be advised to surrender the property. Any person who cannot be heard as a witness shall not be compelled to surrender the property, nor any person who has the right to refuse to testify under Paragraph c) of Subsection (4) of Section 53 if having the property surrendered would expose the identity of a person from whom he receives information.

50/A. § (2a) bekezdés Az 53. § (4) bekezdés c) pontja alapján a tanúvallomás megtagadására jogosult személynek a dolog átadása alóli mentessége az annak alapjául szolgáló jogviszony megszűnése után is fennmarad.	50/A. Article (2a) The exemption of any person who has the right to refuse to testify under Paragraph c) of Subsection (4) of Section 53 from having to surrender the property shall remain to apply after the underlying relationship is terminated.
50/A. § (5) bekezdés A lefoglalást elrendelő, valamint a lefoglalás megszüntetése iránti kérelmet elutasító végzés ellen önálló fellebbezésnek van helye. A fellebbezésnek a végzés végrehajtására nincs halasztó hatálya, kivéve, ha a lefoglalás elrendelésére az 53. § (4) bekezdés c) pontjára hivatkozás ellenére került sor.	50/A. Article (5) The ruling ordering seizure, and the ruling declining a request for the termination of the effect of the seizure may be appealed independently. The appeal shall have no suspensory effect on the enforcement of the ruling, unless seizure is ordered notwithstanding reference to Paragraph c) of Subsection (4) of Section 53.
51§ (4) bekezdés A törvényen vagy kormányrendeleten alapuló adatszolgáltatást hivatalból folytatott eljárásban az ügyfél, illetve kérelemre indult eljárásban az ellenérdekű ügyfél akkor tagadhatja meg, ha b) nyilatkozatával saját magát vagy hozzátartozóját bűncselekmény elkövetésével vádolná c) az ügyfél, illetve az ellenérdekű ügyfél médiatartalom-szolgáltató, vagy vele munkaviszonyban vagy munkavégzésre irányuló egyéb jogviszonyban álló személy, és nyilatkozatával a számára a médiatartalom-szolgáltatói tevékenységgel összefüggésben információt átadó személy kilétét felfedné.	Article 51(4) Where the disclosure of data is prescribed by an act or government decree, the client in proceedings opened ex officio, or the adverse party in proceedings opened upon request may refuse to comply if: b) compliance would implicate himself or his relative in some criminal activity; or c) the client or the adverse party is a media content provider or any person it employs under contract of employment or some other form of employment relationship, and his statement would expose the identity of any person from whom they receive information relating to the media content they provide

53§ (4) bekezdés A tanúvallomás megtagadható, ha a) a tanú az ügyfelek valamelyikének hozzátartozója, b) a tanú vallomásával saját magát vagy hozzátartozóját bűncselekmény elkövetésével vádolná, vagy c) A cselekvőképtelen és a korlátozottan cselekvőképes tanú meghallgatását csak a tanú törvényes képviselőjének jelenlétében lehet lefolytatni.	Article 53(4) Testimony may be refused if: a) the witness is a relative of any of the clients; b) it would implicate the witness himself or his relative in some criminal activity; or c) Questioning of an incompetent person or person of limited legal capacity may take place only if the witness's legal representative is present
53§ (8) bekezdés A (4) bekezdés c) pontjában foglalt mentesség az annak alapjául szolgáló jogviszony megszűnése után is fennmarad.	Article 53 (8) The exemption described in Paragraph c) of Subsection (4) shall remain to apply after the underlying relationship is terminated.
57/A § (7) bekezdés Ha a szemletárgy birtokosa médiatartalom-szolgáltató, vagy vele munkaviszonyban vagy munkavégzésre irányuló egyéb jogviszonyban álló személy, nem kötelezhető a szemletárgy felmutatására, ha ezzel a számára a médiatartalom-szolgáltatói tevékenységgel összefüggésben információt átadó személy kilétét felfedné. Ez a mentesség az annak alapjául szolgáló jogviszony megszűnése után is fennmarad.	Article 57/A (7) The holder of the subject-matter of the inspection, if a media content provider or any person it employs under contract of employment or some other form of employment relationship, may not be ordered to present the subject-matter of the inspection if it would expose the identity of any person who supplies information relating to the media content provided. Such exemption shall remain to apply after the underlying relationship is terminated.

Munka törvénykönyvéről szóló 2012. évi I. törvény 78. § (1) A munkáltató vagy a munkavállaló a munkaviszonyt azonnali hatályú felmondással megszüntetheti, ha a másik fél a) a munkaviszonyból származó lényeges kötelezettségét szándékosan vagy súlyos gondatlansággal jelentős mértékben megszegi, vagy b) egyébként olyan magatartást tanúsít, amely a munkaviszony fenntartását lehetetlenné teszi.	Labour Code Section 78 (1) An employer or employee may terminate an employment relationship without notice if the other party: a) willfully or by gross negligence commits a grave violation of any substantive obligations arising from the employment relationship; or b) otherwise engages in conduct that would render the employment relationship impossible.
10. § (2) A munkáltató köteles a munkavállalót tájékoztatni személyes adatainak kezeléséről. A munkáltató a munkavállalóra vonatkozó tény, adatot, véleményt harmadik személlyel csak törvényben meghatározott esetben vagy a munkavállaló hozzájárulásával közölhet.	Article 10(2) Employers shall inform their workers concerning the processing of their personal data. Employers shall be permitted to disclose facts, data and opinions concerning a worker to third persons in the cases specified by law or upon the worker's consent.
a médiaszolgáltatásokról és a tömegkommunikációról szóló 2010. évi CLXXXV. törvény 1. § (1) A törvény hatálya kiterjed a Magyarországon letelepedett médiatartalom-szolgáltató által nyújtott médiaszolgáltatásra	Act CLXXXV of 2010 on Media Services and Mass Communication Article 1 (1) The Act shall apply to media services and press products provided and published by media content providers

és kiadott sajtótermékre.	established in Hungary.
155.§ (2) bekezdés A Hatóság a tényállás tisztázása érdekében jogosult a médiaszolgáltatással, sajtótermék kiadásával, illetve műsorterjesztéssel kapcsolatos, akár üzleti titkot is magában foglaló adatot tartalmazó valamennyi eszközt, iratot, dokumentumot megtekinteni, megvizsgálni, azokról másolatot, kivonatot készíteni.	Article 155 (2) In order to establish the facts of the case, the Authority shall have the right to view, examine and make duplicates and extracts of any and all instruments, deeds and documents containing data related to the media service, the publication of the press product or the media service distribution, even if such instrument, deed or document contains business secrets
155.§ (5)b) a Hatóság nem kötelezheti a médiatartalom-szolgáltatót, valamint a vele munkaviszonyban vagy munkavégzésre irányuló egyéb jogviszonyban álló személyt olyan adatszolgáltatásra, valamint olyan irat, eszköz, dokumentum átadására, amellyel az a számára a médiatartalom-szolgáltatói tevékenységgel összefüggésben információt átadó személy kilétét felfedné.	Article 155 (5) b) the Authority may not oblige the media content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in a work - related legal relationship with a media content provider to provide any data, or to hand over any deed, instrument or document that would reveal the identity of the person delivering information to him/her in connection with the media content provider's activities.
155.§ (6) bekezdés Az (5) bekezdés szerinti mentesség az annak alapjául szolgáló jogviszony megszűnése után is fennmarad. Az (5) bekezdés a) pontjában foglalt tilalom alól az ügyfél felmentést adhat.	Article 155 (6) The exemption specified under Paragraph (5) shall remain valid even after the legal relationship justifying the exemption is terminated. The client may grant an exemption regarding the prohibition stipulated in Point a) of Paragraph (5).

a nemzetbiztonsági szolgálatokról szóló 1995. évi CXXV. törvény 54. § (1) bekezdés A titkos információgyűjtés keretében a nemzetbiztonsági szolgálatok a) felvilágosítást kérhetnek; b) a nemzetbiztonsági jelleg leplezésével információt gyűjthetnek; c) titkos kapcsolatot létesíthetnek magánszeméllyel; d) az információgyűjtést elősegítő információs rendszereket hozhatnak létre és alkalmazhatnak; e) sérülést vagy egészségkárosodást nem okozó csapdát alkalmazhatnak; f) a saját személyi állományuk és a velük együttműködő természetes személyek védelmére, valamint a nemzetbiztonsági jelleg leplezésére fedőokmányt készíthetnek és használhatnak fel; g) fedőintézményt hozhatnak létre és tarthatnak fenn; h) a feladataik által érintett személyt, valamint azzal kapcsolatba hozható helyiséget, épületet és más objektumot, terep- és útvonalszakaszt, járművet, eseményt megfigyelhetik, az észlelteket technikai eszközzel rögzíthetik; i) az 56. §-ban foglaltakon kívül beszélgetést lehallgathatnak, az észlelteket technikai	Act on the National Security Services 1995 Article 54 (1) As part of the gathering of intelligence, the national security services a) may ask for information; b) may gather information by concealing the national security nature thereof; c) may establish secret contacts with private individuals; d) may establish and use information systems promoting the gathering of intelligence; e) may set a trap that does not cause injury or impair health; f) may prepare and use cover documents for the protection of their own staff members and the natural persons co-operating with them, as well as for the concealment of the national security nature involved; g) may establish and maintain cover organizations; h) may put the persons affected by their tasks under surveillance, together with the rooms, buildings, and other installations, sectors and route sections, vehicles, and events that may be associated with them, and may record the observations using technical means; i) may tap conversations, and may record the observations using technical means;
---	--

eszközökkel rögzíthetik; j)¹²⁰ hírközlési rendszerekből és egyéb adattároló eszközökből információkat gyűjthetnek.	j) may gather information from telecommunications systems and other data storage systems subject to licence.
a sajtószabadságról és a médiatartalmak alapvető szabályairól 2010. évi CIV. törvény 6§ (1) bekezdés A médiatartalom-szolgáltató, valamint a vele munkaviszonyban vagy munkavégzésre irányuló egyéb jogviszonyban álló személy törvényben meghatározottak szerint jogosult a számára a médiatartalom-szolgáltatói tevékenységgel összefüggésben információt átadó személy (a továbbiakban: információforrás) kilétét a bírósági és hatósági eljárások során titokban tartani, továbbá bármely, az információforrás azonosítására esetlegesen alkalmas dokumentum, irat, tárgy vagy adathordozó átadását megtagadni.	the Press Freedom Act (2010) Article 6 (1) A media content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in other work-related legal relationship with a media content provider shall be entitled, as stipulated by the respective Act, to keep the identity of a person delivering information to him/her in connection with the media content provider's activities (hereinafter as: journalists' source) in the course of court or regulatory procedures, as well as to refuse to hand over any documents, objects or data carriers that could potentially reveal the identity of the journalists' source.
6§ (2) bekezdés A bíróság - bűncselekmény elkövetésének felderítése érdekében - törvényben meghatározott, kivételesen indokolt esetben az információforrás felfedésére, valamint az információforrás azonosítására esetlegesen alkalmas dokumentum, irat, tárgy vagy adathordozó átadására kötelezheti a médiatartalom-szolgáltatót, valamint a vele munkaviszonyban vagy munkavégzésre irányuló egyéb jogviszonyban álló személyt.	Article 6 (2) In order to investigate a crime, the court has the right – in exceptionally justified cases as defined by law – to oblige the media content provider or a person in an employment relationship or in other work-related legal relationship with a media content provider to reveal the identity of the journalists' source or to hand over any document, object, or data carrier that could potentially identify the journalists' source.

--	---

ELSA IRELAND

Contributors

National Coordinator

Kaleb Honer

National Academic Coordinator

Kaleb Honer

National Researchers

Declan Gardiner

Gemma Hayes

Ina Mizkulin

Kelly O'Brien

Kevin O'Reilly

Kuiying Meng

Leanne Digney

Naoise Duffy

Sam Elliott

Sarah Redmond

1. Introduction

The legal position of journalists in Ireland is somewhat unclear due to a distinct lack of legislative oversight. Ambiguity is a reoccurring theme when addressing the protection of journalistic sources - this is evident from the lack of an explicit definition of a journalist, and direct protection of sources. However, this gap in the law has been filled to an extent by cases guided by the European Convention on Human Rights namely, Mahon and Others v Keena and Kennedy.¹ The aim of this report is to analyse the legal position of journalistic sources in Ireland with reference to the European Convention on Human Rights.

2. Does The National Legislation Provide (Explicit or Otherwise) Protection of the Right of the Journalists Not to Disclose Their Source of Information? What Type of Legislation Provides this Protection? How exactly is this Protection Construed in National Law?

2.1. Introduction

Under current Irish national legislation, there are no safeguards to protect journalistic sources, express or otherwise. Any protections in the Irish jurisdiction arise under common law precedent and have been granted by the Supreme Court, the highest court in the State, most notably in Mahon and Others v Keena and Kennedy.² Protection of journalistic sources is considered to be central to preserving the flow of information from members of the public to the media and essential for a democratic state to exist and thrive. According to Byrne: "...without such protection, sources would be deterred from assisting the press and the public would, as a consequence, not be informed about matters of public interest... protection of confidential journalistic sources is therefore one of the basic conditions for press freedom and for a properly functioning democracy."³ Bills were introduced in 1995 to amend national defamation legislation which contained provisions ensuring protection of journalistic sources. The Defamation Bill (No.5 of 1995) sought to require disclosure of a journalist's sources only where it was necessary in the interests of justice, national security, or for prevention of disorder or crime.⁴ Another bill, the Contempt of Court Bill (No. 2 of 1995) was also proposed with the aim of protecting journalistic sources, yet neither were enacted by Dáil Éireann (Irish House of Parliament).

¹ Mahon and Others v Keena and Kennedy [2010] 1 IR 336

² Mahon and Others v Keena and Kennedy [2010] 1 IR 336

³ Damian Byrne, The Law on Protection of Journalistic Sources in Ireland, (2009) 14(6) The Bar Review, 119

⁴ Marie McGonagle, Media Law (2nd edn, Round Hall 2003) page 195

The Irish Courts had previously refused to recognise the entitlement of journalists to maintain confidentiality of their sources.⁵ Many have called for express protection to be recognised by national legislation, due to the Mabon case; article 40.6.1 of Bunreacht na hÉireann (Constitution of Ireland); and Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights, which both offer protection to an individual's right to freedom of expression. Until Mabon, no journalistic privilege of refusal to answer questions in court existed in this State and this was solidified by precedent. Hyde notes that; "... historically in Ireland there has been a certain antipathy to the notion of an informer. Academics have highlighted how there has often been a reluctance in the Irish psyche to "speak truth to power".⁶ This research paper will outline the precedent which has contributed to the Irish position on protection of journalists' sources, and question whether protection through common law is sufficient. Further, this paper will assess whether the Irish jurisdiction is in compliance with the rulings of the European Court of Human Rights.

2.2. Precedent

In 1974, in the case of Re Kevin O'Kelly, a journalist at the trial of an accused person was questioned by counsel about an interview with the accused he had published.⁷ The prosecution was relying upon the journalist's evidence to establish that the accused was a member of an illegal organisation. The journalist refused to reveal the identity of the person he interviewed, citing it as a breach of journalistic ethics to disclose the name of confidential sources. The Court found the journalist to be in contempt of court and was sentenced to three months' imprisonment. Applicability of Article 40.6.1^o considered in O'Kelly, where the Court of Criminal Appeal declined to recognise any form of journalistic privilege.⁸ Walsh J commented: "Journalists and reporters are not any more constitutionally or legally immune than other citizens from disclosing information received in confidence. The fact that a communication was made under terms of express confidence or implied confidence does not create a privilege against disclosure."⁹

In DPP v O'Keefe, a journalist refused to identify her sources in front of a tribunal investigating irregularities in the Irish meat processing sector.¹⁰ These irregularities were highlighted by the defendant's documentary which was broadcasted by Channel 4 in the United Kingdom. McGonagle argues that journalists in this scenario could argue that the source documents are not in their power of control, but that of the broadcaster company.¹¹ The case failed due to lack of evidence.

⁵ Eoin Carolan and Ailbhe O'Neill, Media Law in Ireland (1 edn, Bloomsbury Professional 2010), page 130

⁶ Joanne Hyde, The Protected Disclosures Act 2014: An Overview, (2014) 11(4) Irish Employment Law Journal 114

⁷ Re Kevin O'Kelly (1974) 63 ILTR 97

⁸ Damien Murphy, A Privilege Worthy Of Protection: Journalists And Their Sources (2012) 30 TCL Rev 1

⁹ Re Kevin O'Kelly (1974) 63 ILTR 97

¹⁰ DPP v O'Keefe, The Irish Times, January 28 1995

¹¹ Marie McGonagle, Media Law (2nd edn, Round Hall 2003) page 195

The Irish court diverged from the O'Kelly decision in Mahon in 2012.¹² This case concerned an anonymous letter received by the first named defendant, Keena, a journalist for The Irish Times newspaper. The correspondence included letters from the Tribunal of Inquiry Into Certain Planning Matters and Payments, (hereafter “the Mahon Tribunal”) seeking information in relation to certain payments made to the then Taoiseach (Prime Minister), Mr Bertie Ahern.¹³ The Mahon Tribunal was investigating corrupt payment made to certain Irish politicians in the 1990s. As a result of the anonymous correspondence, The Irish Times published a report on September 21st 2006 with the headline “Tribunal Examines Payments to Taoiseach”. Some days later, the Mahon Tribunal ordered the defendants to produce all documents which made up the communication received by The Irish Times which lead to the September 21st publication. The second named defendant, the editor of the newspaper, revealed that this was not possible, as they had been advised by legal counsel to destroy the correspondence. The Irish Times disputed the right of the Tribunal to require the production of these documents on the grounds that their production would run the risk of identifying journalistic sources, thereby jeopardising the primary obligation of every editor and journalist to protect their sources of information, and that it was in the public interest that this obligation and right was protected in the production of a story which, in itself, was published in the public interest.¹⁴ The newspaper further argued that the Mahon Tribunal’s case for disclosure was weakened by the fact that the source of the letter could not be established due the anonymous nature of the correspondence. Murphy highlights that this meant there was a very real possibility that no concrete benefit would accrue as a result of piercing the journalists’ privilege to protect their source’s identity.¹⁵

The Supreme Court held on appeal that the journalists were not required to reveal the identity of their confidential source to the Mahon Tribunal. Fennelly J, whilst condemning The Irish Times’ decision to destroy the letter, held with concern: “I raise the question as to whether it can truly be said to be in accord with the interests of a democratic society based on the rule of law that journalists, as a unique class, have the right to decide for themselves to withhold information from any and every public institution or court regardless of the existence of a compelling need, for example, for the production of evidence of the commission of a serious crime ... In the event of conflict, whether in a civil or criminal context, the courts must adjudicate and decide, while allowing all due respect to the principle of journalistic privilege. No citizen has the right to claim immunity from the processes of the law.”¹⁶ In coming to their decision, the majority relied on cases from the European Court of Human Rights, such as Goodwin v United Kingdom, which declared: “Protection of journalistic sources is one of the basic conditions for press freedom ... Without such protection, sources may be deterred from assisting the press in informing the public on matters of public interest.”¹⁷ This is also in accordance with Article 10(2) of the

¹² Mahon and Others v Keena and Kennedy [2010] 1 IR 336

¹³ Damian Byrne, The Law on Protection of Journalistic Sources in Ireland, (2009) 14(6) The Bar Review, 119

¹⁴ Diarmuid Murphy, A Privilege Worthy Of Protection: Journalists And Their Sources (2012) 30 TCL Rev 1

¹⁵ ibid (2012) 30 TCL Rev 1

¹⁶ Mahon v Keena and Kennedy [2010] 1 IR 336

¹⁷ Goodwin v United Kingdom (1996) 22 EHRR 123

ECHR. This privilege is not absolute but restrictions must be in accordance with law, pursue a legitimate aim and be considered necessary in a democratic society, as per Goodwin.¹⁸

2.3. Conclusion

It is submitted that if journalists could be judicially compelled to depart from their undertaking of confidentiality, the relationship of trust and confidence between journalist and confidential source would be endangered. If it was known that there was a likelihood that an earlier promise of confidentiality could later be overruled by a court of law, it would act as a barrier to the freedom of the press, the public's right to know, and freedom of expression. After Ireland enacted the European Convention on Human Rights Act 2003, it can firmly be asserted that Re O'Kelly is no longer good law, due to the protection of freedom of expression under Article 10. This was recognised by the Supreme Court in Mahon, where the court appeared to acknowledge the right of non-disclosure of journalistic sources as a discreet category of private privilege. Nonetheless, there is no question of journalism as a profession enjoying an absolute privilege against disclosure of confidential sources — it is subject to judicial discretion, to be weighed against competing rights and interests on a case-by-case basis. Journalists will still be compelled to answer questions or reveal sources by a court if disclosure is deemed justified “by an overriding requirement in the public interest”.¹⁹

This judicial power is too restrictive on a journalist's right to freedom of expression and does not act as an adequate protection of journalistic privilege. A common law protection is not enough to protect journalistic sources, especially when it is subjected to judicial discretion. The Irish legislature should develop upon the rights conferred under the ECHR, the ECHR Act 2003, and as implied by the Supreme Court in Mahon, and enact provisions which guarantee protection of journalistic sources and their freedom of expression. Article 40.3.1^o of the Irish Constitution reads: “The State guarantees in its laws to respect, and, as far as practicable, by its laws to defend and vindicate the personal rights of the citizen”.²⁰ As such, the State is required to vindicate the rights to a journalist's freedom of expression, and in extension, the protection of journalistic sources through legislation and common law.

¹⁸ ibid

¹⁹ Damian Byrne, The Law on Protection of Journalistic Sources in Ireland, (2009) 14(6) The Bar Review, 119

²⁰ Bunreacht na hÉireann, Article 40.3.1^o

3. Is there, in domestic law, a provision that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his/her sources? How exactly is this prohibition construed in national law? What is the sanction?

In Ireland the right to freedom of expression is enshrined in Article 40.6 of the 1937 Constitution²¹. The right to freedom of expression is of course laid down in the European Convention on Human Rights in Article 10 and Courts in Ireland are obliged in so far as possible to give effect to these rights when interpreting Irish law²². However there is no explicit reference to a prohibition on the disclosure of journalistic sources in either the Irish Constitution or Article 10. Neither is there express protection for freedom of press in both of these articles, however courts have consistently acknowledged the important role that the press plays in the exercise of freedom of expression rights²³ and the position of journalists and media as the eyes and ears of the public. Some legislation in Ireland limits the broadcasting of information on the basis of protecting a public interest such as the Radio and Television Act 1988, such a ban must be prescribed by law, pursuing a legitimate aim and necessary in a democratic society²⁴. There is no overarching rule in Ireland in statute that prohibits the disclosure of journalistic sources, such a rule would severely impact the power of the courts to limit the extent of journalistic privilege. This creates a conflict where the confidentiality and trust between a journalist and their network of sources comes into contact with a duty in proceedings to disclose sources.

3.1. National Codes of Conduct

Journalists in Ireland, and also the UK, may be members of the National Union of Journalists (NUJ) which is one of the largest unions of its kind in the world. One of the key aims of the NUJ alongside protection of employment rights is the protection of press freedom. One of the principles of the code of conduct is to protect; 'the identity of sources who supply information in confidence and material gathered in the course of her/his work'²⁵. The NUJ states that journalists have a right to apply this code and claims that it will support journalists who act in accordance with this code and the NUJ does provide legal aid to member journalists²⁶. While this does not constitute a prohibition on disclosure for the purposes of Irish law it does create an interesting dynamic whereby journalists prioritise the confidentiality of sources where to do so could possibly hold them in contempt of court.

²¹ Constitution of Ireland Article 40.6.

²² European Convention on Human Rights Act 2003 s.2

²³ Angel Fahy, 'Confidential Sources and Contempt of Court: An argument for change' (2009) DIT, p3.

²⁴ Murphy v Ireland [2003] ECHR 352.

²⁵ National Union of Journalists Code of Conduct, 2011. URL: <https://www.nuj.org.uk/about/nuj-code/> Accessed on: February 28 2016.

²⁶ Ibid.

The Press Council of Ireland which was established in 2008 also provides a code of practice. Principle 6 briefly states that; 'Journalists shall protect confidential sources of information'²⁷. At the same time the Press Council highlights the importance of protecting the public interest and fair procedures²⁸. Does this mean that the duty not to disclose information should give way where the journalist is compelled to do so by law? The consequences of a breach of this code of practice is determined by the Office of the Press Ombudsman through a process of mediation. The downside is that the ombudsman has no power to fine publications, it can only oblige the publication to publish the decision on the front page²⁹. The problem with this is that it cannot undo the damage of revealing the name of a source which could be in breach of the code of practice, even an apology or redaction could not remedy such a breach. It is interesting to note however that the source of the complaint can ask to maintain their anonymity in the complaints procedure. The Council of Europe also recognised that journalists may sign up to codes of conduct and that due recognition must be given to these³⁰. The Council also recommended that authorities should attempt to limit public disclosure where relevant in order to protect confidentiality³¹. Although these two provisions could contradict one another where the disclosure of journalistic sources is concerned the latter principle appears to be phrased more strongly so as to offer greater protection to confidentiality rather than freedom of expression.

3.2. The Public Interest

In many situations the public interest requires the opposite of a prohibition on the disclosure. The main reason why prohibitions on disclosure of sources don't exist in Ireland seems to be a conflict arising in the interests of protecting confidential information and protecting confidential sources. For example the Freedom of Information Act 1997 excludes certain classes of information from being publicly accessible³². One of the most recent Irish Supreme court decisions concerning court ordered disclosure of journalistic sources is *McMahon Tribunal v Keena*³³. In this case the High Court made an order under Tribunal of Inquiries (Evidence) (Amendment) Act 1997³⁴ compelling the journalist to reveal his confidential sources. It seems from this case that in an attempt to prohibit the disclosure of confidential information, the court wanted to order the disclosure of the confidential source of this information. Fennelly J. giving judgement in the Supreme Court ultimately found that the order compelling the disclosure of the source had not been justified by an overriding public interest required by Art 10 ECHR looking especially at the case of *Goodwin v The United Kingdom*³⁵. It seems then that the Irish courts are ²⁷ Press Council of Ireland, Code of Practice, 2016. URL: <http://presscouncil.ie/code-of-practice.150.html>

Accessed on: February 28 2016.

²⁸ Ibid, Principle 3.

²⁹ Eoin Carolan, Media Law in Ireland, (Dublin, 2010, Bloomsbury Professional) [9.20-9.22].

³⁰ Council of Europe Committee of Ministers, Recommendation No. R (2000) 7.

³¹ Ibid, Principle 5e.

³² Part III.

³³ [2009] IESC 64.

³⁴ Section 4.

³⁵ [2002] 35 EHRR 18

trying to align themselves better with ECHR law to achieve a better balance between counter-veiling public interests and protecting sources.

3.3. Criminal Law Prohibitions

Another area of law that could prohibit disclosure derives from common law and only applies to court proceedings. Journalists can be held to be in civil contempt of court if they frustrate an order of confidentiality³⁶. For example in the case of Council of the Bar of Ireland v Sunday Business Post Ltd a journalist that breached an injunction designed to protect a confidential letter was held to have interfered with the process of the court³⁷. Civil contempt can also apply to other proceedings for example tribunals of inquiry³⁸. The consequences of being held in civil contempt of the court could be a fine or imprisonment and such punitive measures may continue until the contempt is remedied.

In an effort to deal with Ireland's deteriorating reputation in relation to corruption and whistleblowing the legislature introduced the Protected Disclosures Act 2014. Section 16(1) prevents disclosure of information that might identify the person that made the protected disclosure. Disclosures may also be made directly to the media and for this there is a much higher standard that must be reached in order for the disclosure to be protected³⁹. Some of the protections offered in part III of the act are for immunity from suit, protection from dismissal and possible tort action to recover for any detriment suffered.

4. Definition of Journalist in Irish Law and the Scope of Application

4.1. Who is a "Journalist" According to the National Legislation?

Under current national legislation, there is no explicit definition of a journalist in Ireland. However, there are a number of related definitions considered in certain statutes in Irish law and an important consideration set out in the Irish Constitution. Furthermore, as Ireland has a common law legal system, there is essential case law to be considered in terms of defining a journalist.

The role of the media is set out in the Irish Constitution⁴⁰ in Article 40.6.1.

The most relevant aspects of Article 40.6.1 in the current context is the mention of the importance of "education of public opinion" by the "organs of public opinion". A journalist could be seen to fall under the capacity of an organ of public opinion. The Article clearly

³⁶ Carolan (n 8) [5.61]

³⁷ HC, Unreported, 30 March 1993; Carolan (n 8).

³⁸ Tribunals of Inquiry Acts 1921-1979; Carolan (n 8) [5.88].

³⁹ Section 10.

⁴⁰ Bunreacht na hÉireann, Article 40.6.1° recognises the freedom of expression of the media with particular reference to allowing criticism of government policy. This further conveys the importance of the role of the media in ensuring constitutional democracy.⁴¹

The position of a journalist in Irish law was further considered in case law. In the case of *Re Kevin O'Kelly*⁴², Walsh J set out that, subject to the restrictions above in the Constitution, “a journalist has a right to publish news and that right carries with it, of course, as a corollary the right to gather news. No official or governmental approval or consent is required for the gathering of news or the publishing of news.” This conveys that a journalist is an individual who gathers news and this individual has a right to publish such news, recognising the function and importance of newsgathering. This case’s main point of consideration involved journalistic privilege and disclosure of sources where it was found that “journalists are no more constitutionally or legally immune than other citizens from disclosing information received in confidence”. This judgment was departed from in the Supreme Court decision of *Mahon v Keena*⁴³, in terms of journalistic privilege. However, the description of a journalist’s right to gather information and the right to publish news has not be distinguished and can be seen to remain relevant.

It can be further seen in the 2012 High Court ruling in *Cornec*⁴⁴, that an individual who may not be a journalist in the “strictest sense” can still be recognised under Article 40.6.1 and that the traditional distinction between a journalist and a lay person has broken down in recent times. The individual in this case had been chronicling the activities of religious cults and it was found that his activities fell squarely within the “education of the public” conceived in the Constitution. This established that a person who blogs on an internet site can constitute an “organ of public opinion”. This provides constitutional protection to those outside the traditional notions of journalism.⁴⁵ This may appear to broaden the scope of a traditional journalist to provide for protection for those not historically seen to be journalists.

The Defamation Act 2009 also provides legislative strength to the Press Council of Ireland. The Press Council’s Code of Practice sets out in its Preamble that there is a freedom to publish which includes the right of a print and online news media to publish what it considers to be news and the right to comment upon it. Furthermore, with this freedom of press comes the responsibility to maintain the highest ethical and professional standards.

In relation to defamation, a journalist, who is involved with a member of the Press Council, would be required to uphold the standards set out in the Press Council’s Code of Practice and these standards apply to both print and online media.

⁴¹ Eoin Carolan and Ailbhe O'Neill, Media Law in Ireland (Bloomsbury Professional 2010) 19

⁴² Re Kevin O'Kelly (1974) 108 ILTR 97

⁴³ Mahon v Keena [2009] 2 ILRM 373

⁴⁴ Cornec v Morrice & Ors [2012] IEHC 376

⁴⁵ Eoin Carolan, "The Implications of Media Fragmentation and Contemporary Democratic Discourse for "Journalistic Privilege" and the Protection of Sources" [2013] 49(1) The Irish Jurist 187

4.2. Is it in your view a Restricted Definition for the Purpose of the Protection of Journalistic Sources?

As there is no explicit definition of a journalist in Irish legislation, it is difficult to expressly state whether it is restrictive for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources.

The Constitution's description of "organs of public opinion" does not set out exact limits as to who or what qualifies under this description but includes the press, radio and cinema. However, it does contain a restriction in stating that these organs of public opinion shall not be used to undermine the authority of the state or public order and morality. This can still be seen to be open for interpretation by the courts, which will be discussed by reference to a number of cases in this text.

While Irish Courts initially appeared to hold the view that a journalist does not have a greater right to privilege than the ordinary citizen⁴⁶, there has been a shift from this viewpoint in which the Irish courts have developed a method of protecting journalistic sources unless the disclosure of said sources is necessary for the administration of justice.⁴⁷ The description of a journalist in the case of Re Kevin Kelly is based on a right to gather and publish news and the description itself is not restrictive and appears to be quite broad. However, there are certainly restrictions imposed upon the individual who gathers and publishes news surrounding the concept of journalistic privilege and protecting journalistic sources.

The significant cases in this regard are the previously mentioned Irish Supreme Court decision in *Mahon v Keena*⁴⁸ and the European Court of Human Rights cases considered in this judgment.⁴⁹ In Ireland, the privilege to refuse to answer questions can be employed by solicitors, clergymen and members of the Oireachtas in certain circumstances, but this right was not enjoyed by journalists.⁵⁰ However, the decision in Mahon v Keena departed from this blanket restriction.⁵¹ The Mahon case involved a journalist and an editor for The Irish Times who refused to answer questions about a source for a tribunal. The source took place in the form of a letter and this was subsequently destroyed. Justice Fennelly in this judgment acknowledged that while the tribunal was entitled to inquire about the disclosure of such information, the information in question was "a matter of public interest which a newspaper would in the ordinary way be entitled to print".⁵² The Supreme considered the case of *Goodwin v United Kingdom*⁵³ and observed that the national courts had a margin of appreciation in deciding whether to order the disclosure of a source. In order to make this decision the court needs to ascertain "whether there is a pressing need for

⁴⁶ Re Kevin O'Kelly (1974) 108 ILTR 97

⁴⁷ Damien Byrne, 'The Law on Protection of Journalistic Sources in Ireland' [2009] 14(6) The Bar Review 122

⁴⁸ Mahon v Keena [2009] 2 ILRM 373

⁴⁹ Goodwin v United Kingdom (1996) EHRR 123. Also Fressoz and Roire v France (1999) 31 EHRR 28

⁵⁰ Eoin Carolan and Ailbhe O'Neill, Media Law in Ireland (Bloomsbury Professional 2010) 163

⁵¹ Ibid 164

⁵² Mahon v Keena [2009] 2 ILRM 373

⁵³ Goodwin v United Kingdom (1996) EHRR 123

such a restriction” under Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights.⁵⁴ The court noted the importance of the availability of sources in order for the free press to function and keep the public informed and also described journalists as a “unique class”.⁵⁵ Fennelly J ultimately decided that in the event of either a criminal or civil conflict, the courts must be the ones to adjudicate and decide whether a journalist’s source should be protected, while also allowing “all due respect to the principle of journalistic privilege”.⁵⁶ This ultimately provides journalists a manner of protection for their sources in Irish law, even if there are limits.

In relation to the Press Council’s Code of Practice of newspapers and periodicals, it is also of interest to note under Principle 6 that “journalists shall protect confidential sources of information.”⁵⁷ This confirms the high standards of confidentiality in the profession of journalism in this regard.

4.3. What is the Scope of Protection of other Media Actors? Is the Protection of Journalists’ Sources Extended to Anyone Else?

In terms of the scope of protection of other media actors, it is necessary to consider those who may not traditionally fall within the description of a journalist. Once again, the protection of journalistic privilege and of freedom of the press relates to the Constitution’s identification of “organs of public opinion”.⁵⁸ These organs of public opinion include the press, radio and cinema. Organs of public opinion have a role to play in facilitating and informing the public debate.⁵⁹

In terms of analysing the scope and parameters of journalistic privilege under Irish law, it is necessary to examine two High Court decisions. The first case is that of *Cornec v Morrice*⁶⁰ and the second is *Walsh v News Group Newspapers*⁶¹.

In the Cornec case, it was stated that the public interest in ensuring the protection of journalist’s sources is high as journalism is central to the free flow of information. This judgment appears to, through its considerations, support the notion that these “organs of public opinion” enjoy constitutional protection in this regard because of what they do, rather than what they are.⁶² Journalists are central to the process of dissemination of information and encouraging public

⁵⁴ Mabon v Keena [2009] 2 ILRM 373

⁵⁵ Ibid

⁵⁶ Ibid

⁵⁷ Damien Byrne, 'The Law on Protection of Journalistic Sources in Ireland' [2009] 14(6) The Bar Review 119

⁵⁸ Bunreacht na hÉireann, Article 40.6.1°

⁵⁹ Eoin Carolan, 'The Implications of Media Fragmentation and Contemporary Democratic Discourse for "Journalistic Privilege" and the Protection of Sources' [2013] 49(1) The Irish Jurist 183

⁶⁰ Cornec v Morrice & Ors [2012] IEHC 376

⁶¹ Walsh v News Group Newspapers [2012] IEHC 353

⁶² Eoin Carolan, 'The Implications of Media Fragmentation and Contemporary Democratic Discourse for "Journalistic Privilege" and the Protection of Sources' [2013] 49(1) The Irish Jurist 186 debate. Carolan argues that the Constitution is concerned with protecting the process rather than to provide privileges to particular personnel.⁶³

Therefore, it can be seen that the Cornec case adopted a broad approach to the scope of journalistic privileges and to whom these protections can be extended. This expansive approach was based on facilitating the journalistic endeavour in the name of public interest.⁶⁴ Based on this analysis, the court concluded that these protections could be invoked by individuals who were not journalists but who performed an essentially analogous role.⁶⁵ In the case of Cornec, this individual was a blogger for an internet site and he was found to be equally entitled to rely on the constitutional protection. The court further acknowledged that the traditional distinction between ordinary citizens and the traditional media has broken down in recent times, partially due to the existence of social media.⁶⁶ The individual's actions in this case fell "squarely within the education of public opinion" originating from the constitution and therefore his sources were to be protected to the same extent as that of a journalist. This appears to create a flexibility in terms of this constitutional protection regardless of the person or medium and their links to traditional journalism and media.

However, it is important to note that this does not mean that all blogs can garner this protection. Justice Hogan specifically limited this protection by stating "it is probably not necessary here to discuss questions such as whether the casual participant on an internet discussion site could invoke Goodwin-style privileges"⁶⁷.

It is also important to briefly consider the case of *Walsh v News Group Newspapers*⁶⁸ which confirms that protection of journalistic sources can be limited by the courts based on the public interest. This allows the protection of sources to be contextual even when concerning an established news organisation or journalist.⁶⁹ This case involved a false accusation made by an individual and it was alleged that a sum of money had been offered by the journalist if the individual lodged said false complaint. While the journalist stated the individual was not relied upon as a source and therefore the court did not need to adjudicate on whether the journalistic protection was extended to this conduct, the court's tone illustrates it may have been reluctant to protect the activity in this case. O'Neill J. stated that this conduct could merit the description of "improper journalism".⁷⁰ It was also stated that it could not be contended that financial inducements of this nature could benefit from such privileged protection. The court also held that, in relation to a member of An Garda Síochána, discovery could be sought in a respect of any communications on the basis that the public interest did not protect unlawful disclosure of

⁶³ Ibid

⁶⁴ Ibid

⁶⁵ Ibid 187

⁶⁶ Cornec v Morrice & Ors [2012] IEHC 376

⁶⁷ Ibid

⁶⁸ Walsh v News Group Newspapers [2012] IEHC 353

⁶⁹ Eoin Carolan, "The Implications of Media Fragmentation and Contemporary Democratic Discourse for "Journalistic Privilege" and the Protection of Sources" [2013] 49(1) The Irish Jurist 190

⁷⁰ Walsh v News Group Newspapers [2012] IEHC 353

information by these officers. The Garda Síochána Act 2005 criminalised such disclosure in certain circumstances as mentioned by O'Neill J. The basis of this measure relates to the European Convention on Human Rights which states that the prevention of disorder or crime would be justified in interfering with the normal freedom of the media.⁷¹ This can be seen to relate to the report on the protection of journalists' sources to the Committee on Culture, Science and Education in 2010, which states the public authorities must not demand the disclosure of a source unless the Convention requirements are met and that the interest in the disclosure outweighs the public interest in non-disclosure. The Walsh case conveys that protection of journalistic sources in Ireland can be limited on public interest grounds, and possibly rejected if the court finds it is outweighed by public interest.

5. Legal Safeguards Regarding the Protection of Journalistic Sources

5.1. What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources?

5.1.1. Constitutional Protection

Article 40.6.1^o(i) of the Constitution of Ireland provides for the right to freely express opinions and for the education of the public by organs of public expression, such as the press. It also sets out the circumstances in which these rights may be limited, including to protect morality and public order. The provision's vaguely defined potential limitations have led to multiple calls for its reform, including by a Constitutional Review Group (CRG) in 1996 who recommended it be amended along the lines of Article 10 ECHR, calling the provision 'weak and heavily circumscribed'.⁷² These amendments were never introduced, and the call for reform was echoed over a decade later by a Joint Committee tasked with reviewing Article 40.6.1^o(i).⁷³ However, the Joint Committee found that due to the courts' less restrictive interpretation of the provision in recent years, such amendments were not 'immediately necessary', and that it should therefore be amended 'whenever an appropriate opportunity arises'.⁷⁴ No such amendments have yet taken place, nor are there any scheduled in the near future.

5.1.2. ECHR and Other Domestic Protection

Journalists may also rely on Article 10 ECHR to protect them from being forced to disclose their sources, by virtue of The ECHR Act 2003, which incorporated the provisions of the ECHR into Irish law. Article 2 of the ECHR Act obliges courts to interpret any legal provision in a manner which is compatible with the provisions of the ECHR.

⁷¹ European Convention on Human Rights, Art. 10(2)

⁷² The Constitutional Review Group, Report of the Constitution Review Group (1996) 268.

⁷³ Joint Committee on the Constitution, First Report of the Joint Committee on the Constitution: Article 40.6.1.i – Freedom of Speech (2008) 69.

⁷⁴ ibid 75.

Other legal safeguards may include the Protected Disclosures Act 2014, which will be discussed in Section 10, and judicial review proceedings. A journalist ordered by an administrative body, such as a tribunal, to disclose their sources may seek a judicial review by the High Court of the body's decision-making process and whether they had the authority to make such an order.⁷⁵ Relief may be granted in the form of an injunction, damages or by quashing the order. Though there have been a number of cases where journalists have been ordered by tribunals to disclose their sources,⁷⁶ judicial review proceedings have never been used to safeguard journalistic privilege.

5.1.3. Where a Journalist Wishes to Disclose the Identity of a Confidential Source

In the event that a journalist wishes to disclose the identity of a previously confidential source, due to, for example, public interest concerns, there is no specific legislation outlining the steps to be taken, nor do the Press Council of Ireland (PCI) or Press Ombudsman offer any direction. In the context of broadcast journalism, the national broadcaster Raidió Teilifís Éireann (RTÉ) outlines in its 'Journalism Guidelines' that the approval of the Managing Director who initially granted confidentiality to a source must be sought if the journalist in question wishes to no longer honour 'an assurance given in relation to conditions of participation, use of content, confidentiality or anonymity'.⁷⁷ It is likely that the internal practices of a publication may similarly determine the procedure to be followed in such a scenario involving print media outlets (for whom there are no equivalent published guidelines available, save for the PCI's Code of Practice⁷⁸).

5.2. How are the laws implemented?

5.2.1. Pre-ECHR Act 2003

Historically, Article 40.6.1^o(i) was applied in an inconsistent and often restrictive manner. The first case taken under the provision in 1982 saw the Supreme Court set a low threshold to be met to justify a restriction on the rights guaranteed by Article 40.6.1^o(i), namely that they not be restricted on 'any irrational or capricious ground',⁷⁹ yet just two years later the same court stressed that those rights could only be curtailed if necessary for the administration of justice.⁸⁰ Article 40.6.1^o(i) therefore served as a weak and uncertain protection for journalists wishing to protect their sources, a failing which was acknowledged by the CRG in 1996.⁸¹

⁷⁵ RSC Ord 84.

⁷⁶ Mahon v Keena [2009] IESC 64; Mahon v Post Publications [2009] IESC 15.

⁷⁷ RTÉ 'Journalism Guidelines' (April 2012) 25 < <http://www.rte.ie/documents/about/rte-journalism-guidelines-april3-2012.pdf> > accessed 13 April 2016.

⁷⁸ 'Code of Practice' < <http://www.presscouncil.ie/code-of-practice.150.html> > accessed 22 February 2016.

⁷⁹ The State (Lynch) v Cooney [1982] 1 IR 361.

⁸⁰ Cullen v Toibin [1984] ILRM 577.

⁸¹ The Constitution Review Group, Report of the Constitution Review Group (1996) 268.

5.2.2. Adoption of ECHR Act 2003

The adoption of the ECHR Act in 2003 created a new impetus for the development and clarification of the position of journalistic privilege in Ireland.⁸² Irish courts began to interpret journalistic privilege to reflect ECtHR case law in the area, and it became accepted that the privilege was an important part of Irish jurisprudence which journalists could rely on.⁸³ Recent cases taken under Article 40.6.1^o(i) such as *Cornec v Morrice*⁸⁴ have seen the courts adopt a proportionality doctrine, as well as balancing the competing interests at stake to determine whether the privilege should apply.

In most cases concerning journalistic privilege, however, the courts have tended to rely on Article 10 ECHR in lieu of Article 40.6.1^o(i).⁸⁵ In Mabon v Post Publications,⁸⁶ which concerned a journalist refusing to disclose sources following an order for disclosure by a tribunal of inquiry, both the High and Supreme Courts focused their consideration almost exclusively on Article 10 and ECtHR case law. In refusing the tribunal's request for an injunction, both courts found that the tribunal had not established relevant or sufficient reasons for the order, nor was the order sought proportionate.⁸⁷

The court adopted a similar approach in Mabon v Keena,⁸⁸ whose facts were broadly similar to those of Mabon v Post Publications. After considering ECtHR case law, the High Court granted the tribunal's order for disclosure, stating that the identification of the source of leaked confidential information was a pressing social need which satisfied the ECtHR's 'necessary in a democratic society' test, thereby justifying the order.⁸⁹ An important issue was the fact that the journalists had destroyed the documents sought by the tribunal after being asked to disclose them, which the court called 'reprehensible conduct'.⁹⁰ This view was reiterated by the Supreme Court, however they overturned the High Court's ruling, finding that the journalists' conduct was not a relevant consideration in whether journalistic privilege could be asserted, and that the tribunal had not established a sufficiently clear benefit to justify the order for disclosure.⁹¹ However, the court directed that legal costs be awarded against the journalists, stressing that in the event of a conflict, it is only for the court to decide whether a journalist should be compelled to reveal their ⁸² Eoin Carolan, 'The Implications of Media Fragmentation and Contemporary Democratic Discourse for 'Journalistic Privilege' and the Protection of Sources' (2013) 49 The Irish Jurist 182, 184.

⁸³ Cornec v Morrice [2012] IEHC 376; Louis Walsh v The News Group Newspapers Limited [2012] IEHC 353.

⁸⁴ [2012] IEHC 376.

⁸⁵ Dr Pascale Duparc-Portier, 'Media Reporting of Trials in France and in Ireland' (2006) 6 Judicial Studies Institute Journal 197, 202.

⁸⁶ [2005] IEHC 307 affd [2007] IESC 15.

⁸⁷ Mabon v Post Publications [2007] IESC 15 [98].

⁸⁸ [2007] IEHC 348 revd [2009] IESC 64.

⁸⁹ Mabon v Keena [2007] IEHC 348.

⁹⁰ ibid.

⁹¹ Mabon v Keena [2009] IESC 64 [100].

sources.⁹² This was upheld by the ECtHR following an appeal of the costs decision. The court did not accept that the decision would have a 'chilling effect' on freedom of expression, stating that it would have no impact on journalists who 'vehemently protected their sources yet recognised and respected the rule of law'.⁹³

While the ECHR Act and ECtHR case law have undoubtedly been beneficial to the judicial interpretation of journalistic privilege in Ireland, the courts' tendency to rely on Article 10 means there has been little clarification or elaboration on the difficult constitutional questions posed by Article 40.6.1^o(i), such as when the vaguely defined restrictions listed in the provision may be invoked.⁹⁴ This has resulted in a great deal of uncertainty as to the scope of the safeguards of journalistic privilege available under the Constitution.

5.3. How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?

Formed in 2008, The Press Council of Ireland (PCI) is independent of both media and government, though it is statutorily recognised by section 44 of the Defamation Act 2009. The PCI acts as an independent regulator of the press through its complaints mechanism and Code of Practice, which sets out the ethical standards which all member publications must comply with.

If a publication or journalist's behaviour is in breach of the Code of Practice, any individual or organisation affected may make a complaint for free to the Press Ombudsman. If the complaint is upheld by the Ombudsman, the offending publication may be ordered to publish the decision in line with the PCI's publication guidelines.⁹⁵ Any decision of the Ombudsman may also be appealed to the PCI. This 'dual system' of the Ombudsman and PCI has been seen as providing a more 'thorough and efficient' complaints mechanism.⁹⁶

If a matter complained of is already the subject of legal proceedings in Ireland, the complaint will not be processed by the Ombudsman until the proceedings have concluded. This is provided that the proceedings conclude within 2 years and the complaint is submitted to the Ombudsman within the standard 3 month deadline.

⁹² Mahon v Keena [2009] IESC 78.

⁹³ Keena & Kennedy v Ireland App no 29804/10 (30 September 2014) [50].

⁹⁴ Tom Daly 'Strengthening Irish Democracy: A Proposal to Restore Free Speech to Article 40.6.1^o(i) of the Constitution' (2009) 31 Dublin University Law Journal 228, 229.

⁹⁵ 'Press Council's Publication Guidelines' (April 2014) <<http://www.pressombudsman.ie/cases-and-appeals/publication-guidelines-for-newspapers-and-periodicals.1162.html>> accessed 22 February 2016.

⁹⁶ Annabel Brody 'Pressing Times Ahead: The Evolution of Press Councils in an Age of Media Convergence' (2011) 16 Communications Law 106, 108.

The Ombudsman receives an average of 383 complaints per year, however just 39 of these on average are subject to a decision by the Ombudsman.⁹⁷ Principle 6 of the Code of Practice, which requires journalists to protect their confidential sources, is the principle under which the least complaints are made, with no complaints being made in 2008, 2011, 2012, 2013 or 2014.⁹⁸ In contrast, an average of 152 complaints are made per year in relation to the most frequently cited principle, which deals with truth and accuracy in reporting.⁹⁹

6. In the respective national legislation are the limits of non-disclosure of the information in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7? What are the procedures applied? Is the disclosure limited to exceptional circumstances, taking into consideration vital public or individual interests at stake? Do the authorities first search for and apply alternative measures, which adequately protect their respective rights and interests and at the same time are less intrusive with regard to the right of journalists not to disclose information?

6.1. Constitutional Protection of the Freedom of Expression

Talking about the freedom of expression in Ireland, the 1937 Constitution, specifically article 40.6.1. is the starting point, which provides the right to freely express opinions and for the education of the public by organs of public expression, such as the press.¹⁰⁰

Originally, the Constitution was not interpreted in a way to offer sufficient protection against disclosure of journalistic sources. This is also visible from the wording of the provision stressing the fact that the limitations of the freedom of expression are public order, morality or the authority of the State¹⁰¹. This authority of the State was imposed on the journalists prior to Mahon v Keena. In the *Re Kevin O'Kelly*¹⁰², Walsh J stated that journalists are no different than any other citizen and they may be charged with common law offence of contempt of court for failing to reveal their sources.

Although this Constitutional provision did not offer a great level of protection being too wide to guarantee the defense of the journalists' rights to freedom of expression, recent jurisprudence of ⁹⁷ 'Statistics' 2008-2014 <<http://www.presscouncil.ie/case-and-statistics.152.html>> accessed 16 February 2016.

⁹⁸ ibid.

⁹⁹ ibid.

¹⁰⁰ Bunreacht na hÉireann, Article 40.6.1°

¹⁰¹ Eoin Carolan, Constitutionalizing Discourse: Democracy, Freedom of Expression and the Future of Press (2014), 51(1), The Irish Jurist, 1-27, 7

¹⁰² Re O'Kelly (1974) 108 ILTR 97

the Irish Courts set clear parameters for protection of journalistic privilege in line with the article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights and the decisions of the ECHR.¹⁰³ An act of the Irish Parliament, the European Convention on Human Rights Act 2003, gave further power to the Convention in Ireland requiring the Irish Courts to interpret legislation in accordance with its provisions. Reading through the recent Irish case law it is clear that the provisions of the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 are respected even though the Recommendation itself has not been formally incorporated in the Irish legislature.

6.2. Case Law

The first Irish case that acknowledged the right of non-disclosure of journalistic sources and engaged in balancing the public interest in protecting the journalistic sources and countervailing benefits of their disclosure was *Mahon v Keena*¹⁰⁴. The Court confirmed that the journalistic privilege is protected in Irish law but with certain limitations.

In the subsequent case Cornec v Morrice, Justice Hogan restated the Court's opinion from the Mahon v Keena. *"Yet the public interest in ensuring that journalists can protect their sources remains very high, since journalism is central to the free flow of information which is essential in a free society (...) If journalism and the media did not enjoy at least a general protection in respect of their sources, that robust political debate – a sine qua non in any democratic society – would be still born. Only the naïve would suggest otherwise."*¹⁰⁵ This role of the press as the "public watchdog" was previously identified by the ECHR in the case *Sanoma Uitgevers BV v Netherlands*¹⁰⁶.

In this, very important ruling, Nicola Tallant and Mike Garde objected to the orders to compel them to testify in the US proceedings. They objected on the ground of journalistic privilege. While Mr. Tallant was a journalist of Sunday World, Mr. Garde was a blogger and a director of Dialogue Ireland, an organisation promoting freedom of religious choices. Nevertheless, the judge made an analogy between blogging and a traditional journalism as both activities fall within "education of public opinion".

It was decided that Constitution protects this kind of speech and his right to impart information. *"Mr. Garde's activities fall squarely within the "education of public opinion" envisaged by Article 40.6.1. A person who blogs on an internet site can just as readily constitute an "organ of public opinion" as those which were more familiar in 1937 and which are mentioned (but only as examples) in Article 40.6.1, namely, the radio, the press and the cinema."*¹⁰⁷ The court even expanded the scope of the privilege from the protection of the journalistic sources to the protection of the content, even in the cases when the identity of the source is known. The fact that the identity of the person is revealed should be just one of the

¹⁰³ Carolan (n1) 7

¹⁰⁴ Mahon v Keena [2009] 2 ILRM 373

¹⁰⁵ 2012 IEHC 376 at para 46

¹⁰⁶ Sanoma Uitgevers BV v Netherlands App. no. 38224/03 (EctHR, 2010)

¹⁰⁷ Cornec v Morrice (n9) at paras 65-67

fact that could weight in favour of the proportionality of the measure aiming at disclosure of information.¹⁰⁸

6.2. Limits on Principle of Non-Disclosure

After concluding that the Irish courts recognize the principle of non-disclosure, it is important to explore the limits of such a protection. Recommendation of the Council of Europe sets clear limits of non-disclosure, enumerating the situations in which the disclosure could be regarded as necessary. The importance of the procedure applied to limit the journalistic privilege and of finding the balance between public interest to protect the journalistic sources and countervailing public interest, was touched upon in Mahon v Keena. *“While the present case does not concern information about the commission of serious criminal offences, it cannot be doubted such a case could arise. Who would decide whether the journalist's source had to be protected? There can be only one answer. In the event of conflict, whether in a civil or criminal context, the courts must adjudicate and decide, while allowing all due respect to the principle of journalistic privilege. No citizen has the right to claim immunity from the processes of the law.”*¹⁰⁹

Similarly, the ECHR in Uitgevers BV v Netherlands, ruled that *“First and foremost among these safeguards is the guarantee of review by a judge or other independent and impartial decision-making body. (...) The requisite review should be carried out by a body separate from the executive and other interested parties, invested with the power to determine whether a requirement in the public interest overriding the principle of protection of journalistic sources exists prior to the handing over of such material and to prevent unnecessary access to information capable of disclosing the sources' identity if it does not.”*¹¹⁰

In *Walsh v News Group Newspapers*¹¹¹ the Court allowed limited disclosure of journalists notes. The documents in question were obtained from a member of Garda, which constituted criminal offence and they could not be protected by the journalistic privilege. The Court, to support its findings, turned to the article 10.2 of the Convention, “prevention of disorder and crime” as a basis of interference with the freedom of expression, which is necessary in democratic society. In addition to that, the source was already identified. Nevertheless, the Court allowed any part of evidence that might lead to the identification of any yet unknown source to remain undisclosed.¹¹²

¹⁰⁸ Eoin Carolan, The Implications of media fragmentation and contemporary democratic discourse for “journalistic privilege” and the protection of sources, (2013) 49, The Irish Jurist, 182-192, 187

¹⁰⁹ Mahon v Keena [2009] 2 ILRM 373

¹¹⁰ Sanoma Uitgevers (n10) para 90

¹¹¹ Walsh v News Group Newspapers [2012] IEHC 353 (HC)

¹¹² Carolan (n12) 191

7. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 the Following Principles Should be Respected When the Necessity of Disclosure is Stated: Absence of Reasonable Alternative Measures, Outweighing Legitimate Interest (Protection of Human Life, Prevention of Major Crime, Defence of a Person Accused or Convicted of Having Committed a Major Crime). Under Which Criteria Can the Interest in the Disclosure Outweigh the Interest in the Nondisclosure?

7.1. The History of Journalistic Privilege in Ireland

Until quite recently the concept of journalistic privilege did not exist in any real sense in Ireland, let alone any legal discourse on scenarios whereby interest in disclosure outweighed nondisclosure in relation to journalistic sources. The Constitution grants protection to the freedom of expression in Ireland, however with set limitations and conditions.¹¹³ Immediately it is established that every citizen's right to freely express their convictions and opinions is not absolute, and is in fact 'subject to public order and morality', and establishes that the organs of public opinion must not undermine 'public order, morality or the authority of the State.' Therefore, it is clear that the Irish Constitution is not a strong protector of freedom of expression, but rather instead confines 'organs of public opinion' to restrictions which are 'open-ended and evasive of precise definition.'¹¹⁴ In fact, the Report of the Constitution Review Group recommended that this particular passage from the Constitution be replaced with something more similar to Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights, as it viewed the existing phrasing as "weak and heavily circumscribed."¹¹⁵

A prime example of the initial lack of any journalistic privilege in Ireland, let alone any discourse on potential nondisclosure of sources exists in O'Brennan v Tully, which resulted in a fine for the editor of a local newspaper for refusing to answer a relevant question, which may have identified his source.¹¹⁶ Walsh J, in Re Kevin O'Kelly, stated that 'journalists or reporters are not any more constitutionally or legally immune than other citizens from disclosing information received in confidence' as 'the public has a right to every man's evidence except for those persons protected by a constitutional or other established or recognized privilege.'¹¹⁷ O'Kelly believed that had he responded to the line of questioning, which required him to identify a voice on a tape recording, he would have damaged his credibility as a journalist and would have also threatened the free exchange of public opinion, thereby negatively impacting the public good.¹¹⁸

¹¹³ Article 40.6.10°

¹¹⁴ Diarmaid Murphy, "A Privilege Worthy of Protection: Journalists and their Sources" [2011] 14 TCLR 97.

¹¹⁵ Report of the Constitution Review Group (Stationery Office, 1996)

¹¹⁶ O'Brennan v Tully [1933] 69 ILTR 116

¹¹⁷ Re Kevin O'Kelly [1974] 108 ILTR 97

¹¹⁸ Marie McGonagle, Media Law (2nd edn, Roundhall 2003) 190

7.2. The European Approach to Journalistic Privilege

Recent developments at a European level have done much to establish journalistic privilege through the Committee of Ministers Recommendation R(2000) 7, which, among other principles, sets out suggestions for the limits to the right of nondisclosure for journalists, such as an overriding requirement in the public interest and, if circumstances are of a sufficiently vital and serious nature, encourages the seeking out of alternative evidence to journalists' sources where appropriate, as well as outlining some conditions concerning disclosure.¹¹⁹ Furthermore, due to the recent incorporation of the European Charter of Human Rights into Irish law through the 2003 Act, Ireland subsequently has to take such recommendations into consideration and is now influenced by cases from other jurisdictions that come before the European Court of Human Rights.¹²⁰

7.3. Disclosure versus Non-Disclosure at a European Level

Fressoz concerned a leaked tax document and its' inclusion in a French satirical publication, which had the outcome of the applicants being convicted and fined by French Courts.¹²¹ The European Courts noted that, despite certain protection of sources being acknowledged, journalists cannot be completely released from their duty to obey the ordinary criminal law.¹²² On foot of the facts that in this case the good faith and accuracy of the published material, along with the fact that there was not overriding necessity compelling protection of the published information, the court found that in this instance there had in fact been a violation of Article 10, as there was an absence of 'a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the legitimate aim pursued by the journalists' conviction and the means deployed to achieve that aim given the interest a democratic society has in ensuring and preserving freedom of the press.'¹²³

Fennelly also considered Goodwin, a landmark case in relation to journalistic privilege and in establishing the criteria necessary for disclosure or nondisclosure in contentious situations. In Goodwin, the European Court notably stated that the order for disclosure of journalists' sources 'cannot be compatible with Article 10 of the convention unless it is justified by an over-riding requirement in the public interest.'¹²⁴ Furthermore, it also stated that any limitations to journalistic privilege in relation to the nondisclosure of source required the 'most careful scrutiny by the court.'¹²⁵ This is in line with the guidelines issued by the Committee of Ministers.¹²⁶

¹¹⁹ Committee of Ministers Recommendation R (2000) 7

¹²⁰ European Convention on Human Rights Act 2003, Number 20

¹²¹ Eoin Carolan and Ailbhe O'Neill, Media Law in Ireland (Bloomsbury Professional 2010) 167

¹²² Eoin Carolan and Ailbhe O'Neill, Media Law in Ireland (Bloomsbury Professional 2010) 167

¹²³ Fressoz and Roire v France (1999) 31 EHRR 28

¹²⁴ Goodwin v UK (1996) EHRR 123

¹²⁵ Eoin Carolan and Ailbhe O'Neill, Media Law in Ireland (Bloomsbury Professional 2010) 167

¹²⁶ Committee of Ministers Recommendation R (2000) 7.

Fennelly J in deliberating the case crucially determined that in hypothetical future scenarios concerning a journalists' sources and the issue of whether there was a compulsion to disclose or a right to nondisclosure of source in situations where a serious crime is involved, it would be 'up to the courts in the event of a conflict, either civil or criminal, to adjudicate and decide while allowing due respect to the principle of journalistic privilege'.¹²⁷ 'No citizen', he claimed, 'has the right to claim immunity from the processes of the law'.¹²⁸ Fennelly believed that the discovery of the source would, in fact, be of little benefit to the Tribunal and as such there was 'no overriding requirement in the public interest' that would justify the negative effects of disclosure.¹²⁹

In Financial Times v UK the subject of disclosure came before the European Court of Human Rights once again, however this time it was in the context of the common law Norwich Pharmacol Principle, whereby if a person through no fault of their own becomes involved in the wrongdoing of others so as to facilitate that wrongdoing, he becomes obligated to assist the person wronged by furnishing them with all the relevant information and disclosing the identity where necessary.¹³⁰ Also unusual in this scenario was the inclusion of false information with correct information.¹³¹ The European Court of Human Rights held that an enforcement order, as was issued in this instance, though not as yet enforced against the applicants, was still sufficient to constitute an interference with freedom of expression under Article 10¹³² but that it was 'prescribed by law' within the meaning of article 10 (2).¹³³ The court was of the opinion that ordering the disclosure of a journalist's source, considering the 'chilling effect' that this could potentially have, would only be employed as a last resort where there are no alternative, less invasive methods to uncover the source and, importantly, where the risk is 'sufficiently serious and defined'.¹³⁴ It was determined that this was not the case in these proceedings as it was not clear whether or not other avenues had been explored.¹³⁵ In this case the public's interest in the protection of journalist's sources prevailed. The European Court of Human Rights also warned against allowing the conduct of the source to be a determinative issue in Financial Times v United Kingdom.¹³⁶

Sanoma Uitgevers BV v Netherlands is an example of another case which debates the criteria necessary for the interest in disclosure to outweigh the perceived right to nondisclosure by journalists. While the previously mentioned 'chilling effect' that disclosure can produce as a result of compelling the production of information that could help to identify source, which in this case were photographs, was acknowledged, the majority in the Third Chamber attached

¹²⁷ Mahon v Kenna [2009] 2 ILRM 373.

¹²⁸ ibid.

¹²⁹ Eoin Carolan and Ailbhe O'Neill, Media Law in Ireland (Bloomsbury Professional 2010) 168

¹³⁰ Norwich Pharmacol Co v Customs and Excise Commissioners [1974] AC 133, 175, HL

¹³¹ Financial Times Ltd v UK (Application No 821/03) 15 December 2009 (Forth Section)

¹³² Council of Europe, Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (European Convention on Human Rights, as Amended) (ECHR) Art 3, 1950

¹³³ Financial Times Ltd v UK (Application No 821/03) 15 December 2009 (Forth Section)

¹³⁴ Eoin Carolan and Ailbhe O'Neill, Media Law in Ireland (Bloomsbury Professional 2010) 170

¹³⁵ Eoin Carolan and Ailbhe O'Neill, Media Law in Ireland (Bloomsbury Professional 2010) 171

¹³⁶ Financial Times v United Kingdom (2010) 50 EHRR 46

more credence to the importance of the following: the disclosure order in this case was not intended to identify the applicant's source; no reasonable, alternative possibility to identify the vehicle, which was involved in a serious crime, was feasible; and the applicant's sources were never put to any inconvenience over the street race, which was the nature of the journalists' involvement with these particular sources.¹³⁷ With this in mind, the court determined that infringement on the applicant's Article 10 rights was legitimate and allowable.¹³⁸ The European Court of Human Rights found that the case was in violation of Article 10, as there had been a lack of procedural safeguards, such as a pre-emptive review of the seizure by an independent and impartial third party.¹³⁹ The investigating judge in this case, it transpired, had a role that was more advisory, which was inadequate.¹⁴⁰ This case is a prime example of the fail-safes put in place by the Recommendation No R (2000) 7 to avoid misuse of the limitations that are in place regarding the disclosure of journalists' sources.

7.4. Concluding Remarks on the Criteria under which the Interest in Disclosure Outweighs the Need for Non-Disclosure

The law in relation to journalistic privilege is still some way from achieving clarity in Ireland, and therefore so too is the distinction between scenarios when the need for disclosure outweighs the need for nondisclosure. However, upon reviewing the limited case law in Ireland, and the cases brought before the European Court of Human Rights from other jurisdictions, an indication of some of the criteria that need to be met in order for the interest in disclosure to outweigh the interest in nondisclosure can be seen. Firstly, and arguably most importantly, is the necessity for there to be an over-riding requirement in the public interest that outweighs the consistently strong desire for a free and unfettered press in a democratic society, such as, but not limited to, the prevention or prosecution of a serious crime. Secondly, there must not exist an alternative, less invasive and damaging method whereby the desired information can be ascertained which would not require the disclosure of the journalists' source, and such routes must be explored. Lastly, it is clear that certain procedural safeguards must be met in order for the disclosure to be perceived as legitimate, such as the inclusion of an independent, impartial third party to review seizures of documents that could potentially disclose a journalists' source. Though the courts in *Mahon v Keena and Kennedy*¹⁴¹ appear to have recognised the right of nondisclosure of journalistic sources, there can be no doubt that the reasons for forced disclosure are not limited to the criteria set out in the Commission, and that it is, in fact, subject to judicial discretion, and will no doubt be judged on a case by case basis. It is necessary, therefore, in order to protect the rights of journalists and ensure that the balance between when it is necessary to disclose a source and when it is prudent for the source to remain anonymous, that the recommendations set out by the Council should be incorporated into statute.

¹³⁷ Sanomo Uitgevers BV v Netherlands (2009) ECHR 994, (2010) ECHR 1284

¹³⁸ Diarmaid Murphy, "A Privilege Worthy of Protection: Journalists and their Sources" [2011] 14 TCLR 97

¹³⁹ Sanomo Uitgevers BV v Netherlands (2009) ECHR 994, (2010) ECHR 1284

¹⁴⁰ ibid.

¹⁴¹ Mahon Tribunal v Keena [2009] IESC 64

8. In the light of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights how do national courts apply the respective laws with regard to the right to protect sources?

8.1. Pre-ECHR Implementation Irish Case Law regarding the Right to Protect Sources

Protection of journalistic sources is seen as the foundation of journalistic ethics. The Press Council of Ireland published the Code of Practice which dictates the standards of ethics, which the journalist of Ireland are expected to uphold. Principle 6 explicitly states that journalists shall protect confidential sources of information.¹⁴²

In the 1974 Irish case of *Re O'Kelly*¹⁴³ an RTÉ journalist was called as a prosecution witness before the Special Criminal Court. Mr Seán McStíofán, the accused, had been charged with being a member of an unlawful organisation. The journalist in question gave evidence that he had tape-recorded an interview with a man, thought to be the accused; he identified the tape in court but refused to identify the man as he believed it would be a breach of journalistic ethics to disclose the name.

The journalist was held in contempt of court and was sentenced for three months for his refusal. The sentence was appealed to the Court of Criminal Appeal where Walsh J rejected the concept of a journalist's right to not disclose sources. Walsh J stated in his decision that, "Journalists and reporters are not any more constitutionally or legally immune than other citizens from disclosing information received in confidence... so far as the administration of justice is concerned the public has a right to every man's evidence except for those persons protected by constitutional or other established and recognised privilege."¹⁴⁴

While the journalist in question did not serve the balance of his sentence, the case did set an assertion by the Court of Criminal Appeal that in the event that the administration of justice is being inhibited, journalists cannot in fact claim any privileges regarding the non-disclosure of sources.

It is important to note that the Court of Criminal Appeal found that the question of confidentiality did not arise in the case, nor did Kevin O'Kelly appeal the conviction for contempt of court, merely the sentence. Therefore it is important to express that Walsh J's comments on the matter be regarded as obiter dicta.

¹⁴² Principle 6.1, Code of Practice, The Press Council

¹⁴³ Re O'Kelly [1974] 108 ILTR 97

¹⁴⁴ Re O'Kelly [1974] 108 ILTR 97

The position taken by the Irish Courts in the O'Kelly case took place before the European Convention of Human Rights¹⁴⁵ was incorporated in Irish law in 2003. Article 10 of the Convention declares;

*"1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression." And, 2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society..."*¹⁴⁶

The issue that arises, pertaining to journalistic sources, is therefore whether the forceful disclosure of sources is a contravention of the right to free speech which is encompassed in Article 10.

However, even up to the year 2007, in the case of Gray v Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform,¹⁴⁷ whereby a journalist refused to identify members of An Garda Síochána as the sources to the publication in question in the case, Quirke J expressed scepticism about the journalists attempt to exercise "a questionable privilege in support of his refusal".¹⁴⁸ Although these statements were made obiter dicta, it highlights the aspersions of the judiciary, relating to the validity of this journalistic privilege, in the Irish Jurisdiction, as recently as the year 2007.

8.2. Relevant ECtHR Case Law

The leading ECtHR authority in this area is the case of Goodwin v United Kingdom.¹⁴⁹ The case arose when a journalist was put in contempt of court for not revealing his confidential source. The reason the identity of the source was being investigated was because they had revealed corporate plans of a company and the company in question was seeking an injunction on further publication of such information. In this case the European Court of Human Rights ruled in a majority of 11 to 7, that to compel a journalist to reveal his sources was contrary to article 10 of the ECHR. The court held that

*"Having regard to the importance of the protection of journalistic sources for press freedom in a democratic society and the potentially chilling effect an order of source disclosure has on the exercise of that freedom, such a measure cannot be compatible with Article 10 (art. 10) of the Convention unless it is justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest."*¹⁵⁰

In the case of Roemen and Schmit v Luxembourg,¹⁵¹ a journalist published an article in Lëtzebuurger Journal where he alleged that a minister had committed tax fraud. He concluded that the minister's conduct was particularly shameful as he was a public figure and should be setting a good example. To establish the truth of these statements the investigating judge issued two

¹⁴⁵ European Convention on Human Rights Act 2003

¹⁴⁶ European Convention on Human Rights Act 2003, s 10

¹⁴⁷ Gray v Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform [1994] 2 I.R. 61

¹⁴⁸ Gray v Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform [1994] 2 I.R. 61

¹⁴⁹ Goodwin v The United Kingdom [1996] EHRR 123

¹⁵⁰ Goodwin v The United Kingdom [1996] EHRR 123, Para 39

¹⁵¹ Roemen and Schmit v Luxembourg (App no. 51772/99) [2003]

search warrants for searches to be made in the applicant's home and workplace. Both warrants were executed on 19 October 1998, but no evidence was found. The applicant then sought orders setting aside the warrants on the grounds that the searches constituted an interference with his rights under Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights. The search warrants had been issued in order to discover the identity of the journalist's source of information. The court unanimously held that this constituted a breach of the journalist's right of non-disclosure and therefore was a breach of his rights under article 10.

In the more recent case of *Voskuil v the Netherlands*¹⁵² the importance of the freedom of the press was acknowledged and the international instruments that reflect that freedom were considered. One such international instrument being; the Council of Europe's Committee of Ministers Recommendation No. R (2000) 7¹⁵³ on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information.¹⁵⁴ In Voskuil a journalist was summoned to court to reveal his sources for a story written about arms trafficking. The purpose of his testimony was in the interests of the accused and to aid the defence. Voskuil however invoked his right of non-disclosure and as a result the court ordered immediate detention. When the case was referred to the ECtHR, it was upheld that journalists have a right to not disclose their sources and that requiring disclosure of sources is not compatible with Article 10¹⁵⁵ unless it is justified by an overriding public interest, echoing the test in Goodwin.¹⁵⁶

In the case of *Tillack v Belgium*¹⁵⁷ the ECtHR stressed that a journalist's right to not reveal his/her sources was not a mere privilege that could be given and taken away, and that the right itself should be treated with caution.¹⁵⁸ The court held that The European Anti-Fraud Office OLAF's investigation and attempt to identify Tillack's informant was indeed contrary to Article 10 of the ECHR.

Similarly in the case of *Sanoma Uitgevers B.V. v The Netherlands*¹⁵⁹ an illegal street race was held in January 2002 on the outskirts of the town of Hoorn. Journalists of Autoweek were invited to the event by the organisers and as such were in attendance. The applicant company intended to publish an article about illegal car races. This article would be accompanied by photographs of the street race held in January 2002, however the photograph's would be edited so as to endure anonymity. The police and prosecuting authorities were afterwards led to suspect that one of the vehicles participating in the street race had been used as a getaway car following a ram raid.

¹⁵² Voskuil v the Netherlands (App No. 64752/01) [22 November 2007]

¹⁵³ Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the Right of Journalists not to Disclose their Sources of Information

¹⁵⁴ Voskuil v the Netherlands (App No. 64752/01) [22 November 2007] Para 65

¹⁵⁵ European Convention on Human Rights Act 2003, s 10

¹⁵⁶ Goodwin v The United Kingdom [1996] EHRR 123

¹⁵⁷ Tillack v Belgium (App no. 20477/05) [27 November 2007]

¹⁵⁸ Damien Byrne, The Law on Protection of Journalistic Sources in Ireland, (2009) 14(6) The Bar Review, 119

¹⁵⁹ Sanoma Uitgevers BV v The Netherlands (App no. 38224/03) [14 September 2010]

Subsequently a police officer contacted Autoweek summoning the editors to surrender to the police all photographic materials concerning the street race. At a domestic level, both in the regional and supreme courts that the principles of proportionality had been complied with and that the interference had thus been justified.

The ECtHR, however, found that the quality of the law was deficient as there were no adequate legal safeguards for Autoweek to enable an independent assessment as to whether the interest of the criminal investigation overrode the public interest in the protection of journalistic sources. This therefore resulted in a violation of Article 10 of the Convention, not because there was interference but because the interference in question was not “prescribed by law”.

8.3. The Irish Perspective after the Implementation of the ECHR and the Consideration of Case Law from the ECtHR

In the Irish jurisdiction, the issue was contemplated in wake of the implementation of the ECHR and in light of the ECtHR case law outlined above, in the case of *Mabon v Keena and Kennedy*¹⁶⁰.

One substantial effect that the Convention has had on Irish free speech law is to use of the proportionality test favoured by the ECtHR. This doctrine is now regularly applied by Irish courts in their interpretation of Article 40.6.1 °.¹⁶¹ For example, in the case *Mabon v Post Publications*¹⁶² Kelly J used the proportionality doctrine, holding that any restriction on press freedom “must be proportionate and no more than is necessary to promote the legitimate object of the restriction”.¹⁶³ Fennelly J approved this approach on appeal.¹⁶⁴

The Supreme Court in Mabon referred to the approach taken by the ECtHR in *Goodwin*¹⁶⁵ where it was held that it is a requirement to take into consideration the role that journalists play in ensuring a democratic society and the disastrous effects that would occur if journalists were compelled to reveal their sources.

The decision in *Mabon v Keena & Kennedy*¹⁶⁶ is very much at odds with the decision in *Re Kevin O'Kelly*¹⁶⁷. This is a direct result of the incorporation of the European Convention On Human Rights into Irish Law by virtue of the 2003 Act and indeed because of the precedents set down by case law regarding journalistic protection, emanating from the ECtHR.

¹⁶⁰ Mabon v Keena and Kennedy [2009] IESC 64

¹⁶¹ Eoin Carolan and Ailbhe O'Neill, Media Law in Ireland (1 edn, Bloomsbury Professional 2010), p 19

¹⁶² Mabon v Post Publications [2007] 3 IR 338

¹⁶³ Mabon v Post Publications [2007] 3 IR 338 Para 72

¹⁶⁴ Mabon v Keena and Kennedy [2009] IESC 64

¹⁶⁵ Goodwin v The United Kingdom [1996] EHRR 123

¹⁶⁶ Mabon v Keena and Kennedy [2009] IESC 64

¹⁶⁷ Re O'Kelly [1974] 108 ILTR 97

8.4. How do they balance the different interests at stake?

The primary issue in the Mahon case was the balancing of tribunals' right to conduct an inquiry and the defendants' right to freedom of expression, which is guaranteed under Article 40.6.1 ° of the Constitution¹⁶⁸ and Article 10 of the ECHR¹⁶⁹

The High Court¹⁷⁰ declared that it had to consider and determine three issues, 1) whether the tribunal actually had the power to conduct an investigation into the identity of the source 2) whether the tribunal is entitled to conduct such investigations in a private sphere and 3) assuming positive answers to the first two questions, how that right of the tribunal is to be balanced against the defendants' aforementioned rights.

Following the reasoning of the European Court in the Goodwin case,¹⁷¹ an order compelling the defendants to answer questions for the purpose of identifying their source could only be "justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest". In this case the public interest requirement was not met and so by using the proportionality test, which was established in the ECtHR case law mentioned above, it was decided that in the balancing of rights, the right to freedom of expression must be upheld in this case.

9. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information? Are the national law provisions accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative norms in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

9.1. The Statutory Basis for Electronic Surveillance

The seminal sources of surveillance law in Ireland are the Criminal Justice (Surveillance) Act 2009 and the Interception of Postal Packets and Telecommunications Messages (Regulation) Act, 1993.¹⁷² The 2009 act provides a statutory basis for state surveillance by way of electronic devices (such as clandestine recordings).¹⁷³ The 1993 act provides limited provision for the ¹⁶⁸ Article 40.6.1 °

¹⁶⁹ European Convention on Human Rights Act 2003, s 10

¹⁷⁰ Mahon v Post Publications [2007] 3 IR 338

¹⁷¹ Goodwin v The United Kingdom [1996] EHRR 123

¹⁷² Ibid

¹⁷³ John Barry, 'The Criminal Justice (Surveillance) Act 2009: An Examination of the Compatibility of the New Act with Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights' [2010] 1(1) Cork Online Law Review interception of phone calls, postal communications, and governs the interception of electronic messages.¹⁷⁴

Irish law does not distinguish between journalist's sources and other intelligence for the purposes of surveillance. Both the 1993 act and 2009 act do not differentiate as to the source of the information itself, nor do they offer any specific protection for the media or other bodies.

9.1.1. The 1993 Act and the Interception of Messages and Stored Data

The 1993 act sets out the offense of interception of communications.¹⁷⁵¹⁷⁶ Protection is limited to messages being transmitted by 'authorized undertakings', which broadly covers telephone service providers and ISPs.¹⁷⁷ Third party services – such as Gmail, iMessage, Skype etc – do not fall within this definition.¹⁷⁸ Privacy International note that 'it is unclear what protections, if any, are in place for users of [third party] services'.¹⁷⁹ They further note that there is no regulation regarding access to stored communications, and that the Irish authorities regularly request access to archived communications held by 3rd party providers.¹⁸⁰

The lack of clear – or indeed, any – boundaries results in the law on interception being imprecise, unforeseeable, and absent of adherence to legislative norms. There is no requirement for any prior judicial authorization, nor is there any requirement that subjects be notified that they have been subject to surveillance.¹⁸¹ Furthermore, the statute offers no specific protection for media sources – confidential or otherwise.

9.1.2. Oversight and Transparency in the 1993 Act

Whilst the 1993 act provides for a 'designated judge' to be given responsibility for oversight on the legislation¹⁸², the resultant annual report is relatively minimalist.¹⁸³ By way of example, a 2010 case involving the inappropriate use of a data retention system to spy on a former partner resulted in a single sentence response in the subsequent report of the Designated Judge.¹⁸⁴

<<http://corkonlinelawreview.com/editions/2010/CRIMINAL%20JUSTICE-BARRY.pdf>> accessed 7 December 2015 (herein Barry)

¹⁷⁴ Ibid

¹⁷⁵ Privacy International 'The Right to Privacy in Ireland' (2016) privacyinternational.org accessible at <<https://www.privacyinternational.org/node/748>> accessed 4 March 2015 (herein Privacy International)

¹⁷⁶ Telecommunications Services Act 1983, as amended by the Telecommunications Messages (Regulation) Act 1993

¹⁷⁷ Privacy International 10

¹⁷⁸ ibid

¹⁷⁹ ibid

¹⁸⁰ Ibid; "Microsoft Law Enforcement Requests Report," (2015) microsoft.com accessible at

<<http://www.microsoft.com/about/corporatecitizenship/en-us/reporting/transparency/>> accessed 4 March 2016

¹⁸¹ Privacy International 5

¹⁸² Interception of Postal Packets and Telecommunications Messages (Regulation) Act, 1993 s8

¹⁸³ Privacy International 5

¹⁸⁴ Ibid 6

Therefore, we can conclude that there is a marked lack of both transparency and oversight as regards the 1993 act. The result is largely inaccessible law, with little guidance available to the public and to practitioners.

9.1.3. The 2009 Act and Electronic Monitoring and Surveillance

The 2009 act allows for 'monitoring, observing, listening to or making a recording of a particular person or group of persons' using surveillance devices.¹⁸⁵ A broad definition is given to 'surveillance devices' – as any apparatus designed or adapted for use in surveillance – but explicitly excludes night vision apparatus, CCTV, and photographic cameras.¹⁸⁶

9.1.4. Authorization for Deployment of Surveillance Measures under the 2009 Act

Superior officers of An Garda Síochána¹⁸⁷, the Irish Defence Forces, and the Revenue Commissioners may submit an application for authorization to a judge assigned to any District Court district.¹⁸⁸

Applications by the Gardaí may be made where the superior officer has reasonable grounds to believe that the surveillance is necessary for the purposes of obtaining information as to whether an offence has been committed. Applications may also be made where Gardaí are seeking to obtain evidence for the purposes of proceedings in relation to the offence. Finally, surveillance may be authorized for the purpose of 'maintaining the security of the State'.¹⁸⁹

9.1.5. Interpretation of the Statutory Criteria for the 2009 act

Whilst there is little ambiguity as regards arrestable offences, the term 'security of the State' is not defined in the legislation.¹⁹⁰ This provision of the 2009 act has not been examined since enactment.

Some guidance may be found in the earlier judgment in *Kennedy v Ireland*¹⁹¹, wherein the plaintiff brought proceedings for damages following the unlawful tapping of their telephones by the State. The plaintiffs were well known political correspondents with Irish national newspapers.¹⁹²

¹⁸⁵ Criminal Law (Surveillance) Act 2009 s1

¹⁸⁶ Ibid

¹⁸⁷ An Garda Síochána – which translates to 'the Guardian of the Peace' – are the principal Irish law enforcement body.

¹⁸⁸ Criminal Law (Surveillance) Act 2009 s4 (1) – (3) & s5 (2)

¹⁸⁹ ibid s4 (1) – (3)

¹⁹⁰ Barry 9

¹⁹¹ [1987] IR 587 (Kennedy herein)

¹⁹² ibid

The telephones were tapped on the back of warrants authorized by the Minister for Justice. The State admitted in evidence that there was ‘no justification for the tapping of either of the two telephones in question’.¹⁹³

The plaintiffs submitted that the State had breached their unenumerated right to privacy under Article 40 (3) of Bunreacht na hEireann.¹⁹⁴¹⁹⁵ Hamilton P accepted this argument, noting that the tapping was deliberate, conscious, and unjustifiable.¹⁹⁶ Particular attention was given to the fact that the tapping ‘went beyond what could be explained as just an error of judgment’, and that the systematic safeguards to ensure justifiable surveillance had been ignored by the Minister for Justice.¹⁹⁷ However tapping for security reasons and the investigation of serious crime are recognized as justifiable reasons in the context of the judgment.¹⁹⁸

The ambiguity in the 2009 act also appears to be at odds with the judgment in *Weber & Savaria v Germany*¹⁹⁹ wherein the blanket justification of ‘national security’ – in German surveillance law – was ruled incompatible with article 8 of the ECHR.²⁰⁰²⁰¹ This potential incompatibility has not yet been examined in domestic courts.

As with the 1993 act, the precise circumstances wherein an individual may be subject to surveillance remain unclear. There is stronger regulation and delineation of the rules surrounding access to data, but the statute itself remains mostly untested by the Courts. There is no specific protection for journalists, nor their sources. Whilst Privacy International note that there is stronger oversight from the respective Designated Judge²⁰², there is still no requirement that individuals be notified if they have been subject to surveillance.

Overall, the lack of sufficient precision and foreseeability within the act runs contrary to the judgment in Sunday Times v UK.²⁰³ Therein the ECtHR established that – in order to allow for restrictions to freedom of speech under Article 10 (2) of the ECHR – a state must demonstrate

¹⁹³ ibid

¹⁹⁴ The Constitution of Ireland. Available at <https://www.constitution.ie/Documents/Bhunreacht_na_hEireann_web.pdf>.

¹⁹⁵ Whilst there is no general right to privacy contained within Bunreacht na hEireann, the Irish Courts have recognized unenumerated rights emanating from Article 40 (3). These rights are effectively unwritten, but come into existence by way of an obligation on the State to vindicate the personal rights of citizens therein.

¹⁹⁶ Echoing Henchy J in Norris v AG [1984] I.R. 36. Norris is a seminal case on the right to privacy under Irish law, albeit in the content of a ban on the then-illegality of homosexual intercourse.

¹⁹⁷ Kennedy at 589

¹⁹⁸ Ibid at 595

¹⁹⁹ [2008] 46 EHRR SE5.

²⁰⁰ Barry 9.

²⁰¹ Under the European Convention of Human Rights Act, 2003, Irish Courts are obligated to interpret legislation in accordance with the ECHR as far as is possible. However, incompatible provisions do not cease to be enforceable.

²⁰² Privacy International 9; the Designated Judges having been noted to provide lengthy annual reports, provide statistics as to trends within state surveillance, and to undertake periodic reviews of random cases.

²⁰³ Application No. 6538/74

that the restriction is 'prescribed by law'.²⁰⁴ The ECtHR set two further requirements for a restriction to be 'prescribed by law': the law must be accessible, so as to allow citizens to see where the law is applicable, and a norm cannot be regarded as 'law' if citizens cannot regulate their behavior to be compliant.²⁰⁵

The need for foreseeable and obeyable law is further reiterated in the judgment in *Huvig v France*²⁰⁶, wherein surveillance carried out by the French state was deemed not to have breached Article 8. Of particular note is the Court's view that judicial oversight does not give a carte blanche for compatible surveillance, unless said oversight is combined with clear limits on the circumstances wherein surveillance is appropriate.^{207/208}

Given that the boundaries of the 2009 act are not defined, it appears that Ireland is in breach of the rule in Sunday World and Huvig. It is not clear as to under what circumstances the law can be – and is being – used. Furthermore, it is not clear as to where the limits of the 'national security' justification lie.

9.2. Search and Seizure

There are no extraordinary powers granted to Irish authorities to seize information – journalistic or otherwise – under Irish anti-terrorism law.

There is no specific Search Warrant Act under Irish law.²⁰⁹ One of the most commonly used provisions is s10 of the Criminal Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1997. The section empowers a District Court judge to issue a search warrant where satisfied by information on oath that evidence of, or relating to, the commission of an arrestable offense is to be found at any place.²¹⁰ There are further, specific legislative provisions allowing senior members of an Garda Síochána to issue search warrants without judicial approval.²¹¹

Whilst the law on search and seizure is relatively robust from the perspective of individual rights, a unified Search Warrant Act would bring welcome clarity as to the rules and exceptions. However, the provisions are relatively accessible, foreseeable, and adhere to legislative norms.²¹²

²⁰⁴ Ibid at 46; this is synonymous with 'in accordance with law'.

²⁰⁵ Ibid

²⁰⁶ Application no. 11105/84

²⁰⁷ Ibid para 34

²⁰⁸ A similar conclusion was reached in Valenzuela Contreras v Spain [1998] Application no. 58/1997/842/1048

²⁰⁹ Law Reform Commission 'Issues Paper on Search Warrants' (2014) lawreform.ie accessible at <http://www.lawreform.ie/_fileupload/Issues%20Papers/Issues%20Paper%20on%20Search%20Warrants%2031%20Jan%202013%20final.pdf> accessed 6 March 2016

²¹⁰ Ibid 3

²¹¹ Ibid 9

²¹² Supra 214

10. Can journalists rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance?

Yes, journalists can rely on encryption and anonymity online to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance.

Protection of journalists and their sources as a freedom of press according to Article 10 of European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and other national provisions.

10.1. Journalists aspect to protect themselves and their sources

“Protection of journalistic sources is one of the basic conditions for press freedom.”²¹³

In case of *Financial Times Ltd & Ors v United Kingdom*²¹⁴, person X, as an anonymous information provider, disclosed a copy of document about a contemplated takeover by Interbrew of SAB to some media presses and then journalists of these newspapers investigated and reported this news according to X’s disclosure.²¹⁵ At the end of 2001, the British courts asked the four newspapers to identify X’s information with the reason that “[i]t was on any view a maleficent one, calculated to do harm whether for profit or for spite, and whether to the investing public or Interbrew or both.”²¹⁶ However, the European Court of Human Rights believed that the British courts’ judgment neglected the journalist’s right of protection of sources. The ECtHR came to the conclusion that although Interbrew would like to prevent further damage to their interests by identifying X, it was insufficient to outweigh the public interests in protecting journalists’ sources, so that the British courts violated journalists’ right of protecting sources under Article 10 of the Convention.²¹⁷

On the other hand, in 2010, the judges of the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR in the case *Sanoma Uitgevers B.V. v. the Netherlands*²¹⁸ came to the conclusion that the opinion to hand over a CD-ROM with photographs in the possession of a journalist was a violation of Article 10 of the Convention that it violated the journalists’ right to protect their sources.²¹⁹ It is not only because the disclosure of the sources. In this judgment, the ECtHR emphasized the importance on protecting journalists’ sources. Furthermore, it noted that if the CD-ROM content was leaked, there would be an impact on “members of public who had an interest in receiving information

²¹³ Goodwin v United Kingdom [1996] 22 EHRR 123 [39]

²¹⁴ Financial Times Ltd & Ors v United Kingdom [2009] ECHR 821/03

²¹⁵ IRIS 2010-2/1

²¹⁶ Interbrew v. Financial Times et al. [2002] EWCA Civ 274 [55]

²¹⁷ Interbrew v. Financial Times et al. [2002] EWCA Civ 274

²¹⁸ Sanoma Uitgevers B.V. v. the Netherlands [2010] ECHR 1284

²¹⁹ IRIS 2010-10/2

imparted through anonymous sources”²²⁰. It shows the meaning that the anonymous sources is one method where the public as well as the journalists receive the information and it is regarded as the similar journalists’ sources protected by Article 10 of the Convention.

In Ireland, *Re O’ Kelly*²²¹ is the start dealing with the journalists’ sources as well as journalist privilege. Kevin O’Kelly, who was a journalist in RTE, refused to reveal a source and faced a sentence because he reckoned that if he revealed the sources, it would damage the confidence between clients and journalists all over Ireland and the public. In the end, Mr. O’ Kelly was sentenced as not answering the question he was asked rather than he did not disclose the source.²²² It is not a strong case to interpret the protection of journalists’ sources and there is not a clear provision about it in Ireland yet. Meanwhile, in Media Law in Ireland, Dr. Carolan refers it as the journalistic privilege but states ‘...there was no recognition in this jurisdiction of such a privilege (refuse to answer questions in court in certain circumstances) for journalists seeking to protect their sources.’²²³ However, at least, it shows the courts’ consideration on journalist privilege and confidential sources.

10.2. Surveillance against journalists: *Telegraaf Media Nederland Landelijke Media B.V. and Others v. the Netherlands*²²⁴

The Netherlands security and intelligence services (AIVD) used the power of surveillance, which was lack of legal basis, against two journalists, whose sources were telephone tapped and discovered.²²⁵ The ECtHR found that the Netherland institution violated the journalists’ right of sources to be protected under Article 10 of the Convention.

According to these cases, it is a need for the journalists to protect themselves and their sources against surveillance by encryption and anonymous. On one hand is that it is the basic right for them to protect their sources under Article 10 of the Convention. On the other hand, it is not easy to find that they themselves and their sources are under surveillance but easy for authorities to monitor the journalists, for example, Telegraaf v. the Netherlands (2012) was the third time that the ECtHR found Netherland authorities disrespected the right of journalists to protect their sources.²²⁶ Encrypting and anonymizing themselves or their sources is an efficient way to prevent their privacy and freedom of speech being violated and monitored, which is a prevention method rather than remedy after the violation happens.

²²⁰ [2010] ECHR 1284

²²¹ Re O’Kelly (108) ILTR 97.

²²² Ibid.

²²³ Eoin Carolan and Ailbhe O’Neill, Media Law in Ireland (Bloomsburg Professional, 2010) 163-4

²²⁴ Telegraaf Media Nederland Landelijke Media N.V. and Others v. the Netherlands App no 39315/06 (ECHR 22 November 2012)

²²⁵ ibid.

²²⁶ IRIS 2013-2/2

10.3. Anonymity and encryption under national provisions

There is not any case law on the topic, but Anglo case, where the police accessed to the encrypted documents, could be cited. Gardai could not examine about a third of the documents without passwords, under the request of sec. 28 of the Electronic Commerce Act 2000.²²⁷ At the same time, there is a trend that electronic discovery groups attempt to bypass the encryption files.²²⁸

Sec. 28 of the Act explains the confidentiality of deciphering data as '[n]othing in this Act shall be construed as requiring the disclosure or enabling the seizure of unique data, such as codes, passwords, algorithms, private cryptographic keys, or other data, that may be necessary to render information or an electronic communication intelligible.' As well as interpreted by the sec. 48 of the Theft and Fraud 2001, a computer, a place, a document or a record search warrant, by the need of evidence or the commission of an offence, shall be applied under authority. On the other hand, Criminal Justice (Surveillance) Act 2009 states that the applications of surveillance should be carried under authorization by a judge, when they are relating to the offence or the security of the State.

Data Protection Acts 1998 and 2003 provide the protection of individuals' privacy. Under sec. 2(1)(d) and 2C, journalists, as the data controllers who control and use other person's data as their sources, can take all reasonable use of appropriate security measures against authority actions with their sources. The protection of journalists themselves and their sources is necessary, without an authorised order or warrant and irrelevant with the offences, regarding as protecting their free expression as well as others' privacy.

However, the use of encryption and anonymous has limitations. In Report of the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression, David Kaye states the use of the encryption and anonymous for individuals to protect their rights of free expression in the digital world.²²⁹ In his report, he addresses three strict tests of necessity and proportionality for using encryption and anonymous to protect one's rights:

- (1) Any encryption or anonymous must be precise²³⁰, public²³¹ and transparent²³², and avoid providing State authorities with unbounded discretion to apply the limitation.²³³
- (2) Encryption and anonymous may only be protected specified interests such as rights or

²²⁷ Tom Brady, Shane Phelan and Tim Healy, 'Anglo chiefs facing quiz on missing passwords' (New Irish News, 10 November 2010) <http://www.independent.ie/irish-news/anglo-chiefs-facing-quiz-on-missing-passwords-26698319.html> accessed 14 April 2016

²²⁸ eDiscovery Group of Ireland, 'Good practice guide to Electronic Discovery in Ireland' (Version 1.0 - 16 April 2013) 60

²²⁹ General Assembly, Promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression (A/HRC/29/32, 2012)

²³⁰ Human Rights Committee, general comment No. 34 (2011) [35]

²³¹ Human Rights Committee, general comment No. 34 (2011)

²³² Human Rights Committee, general comment No. 34 (2011) [39]

²³³ General Assembly, Promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression (A/HRC/29/32, 2012)

reputations of others; national security; public order; public health or morals.²³⁴ This restriction is according to Article 19 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights that "...these shall only be such as are provided by law and are necessary: (a) For respect of the rights or reputations of others; (b) For the protection of national security or of public order (ordre public), or of public health or morals."²³⁵

(3) The restriction on encryption and anonymous must be "necessary".²³⁶

These restrictions are strict. In the judgment of Goodwin v. the United Kingdom, the court outweighed the public interest in protecting the journalist's sources and required the applicant to reveal his source.²³⁷ In Nagla v. Latvia, Ms Nagla claimed that the action of searching her home violated her privacy and her sources might be disclosed which violated the protection of the freedom of speech and journalists' sources under Article 10 of the Convention.²³⁸ However, the ECtHR stated that "[w]hile recognizing the importance of securing evidence in criminal proceedings, the Court emphasizes that a chilling effect will arise wherever journalists are seen to assist in the identification of anonymous sources."²³⁹

Although the journalists and their sources should be protected and encryption and anonymous is one method to achieve their aims, the courts still consider the three restrictions above to avoid misuse of journalists' rights. Even though there is not journalistic privilege, journalists are different from the normal public. What they access is much broader and deeper than us. Especially in the digital age, journalists can rely on technologies, like encryption and anonymous, to protect themselves and their sources.

11. The Scope of Whistle-Blowing Legislation in Ireland Regarding Journalistic Sources.

11.1. Are whistle-blowers explicitly protected under law protecting journalistic sources?

As discussed above there is a severe lack of legislation which protects journalistic sources under Irish law. There is no legislation setting out the rights afforded to journalistic sources and therefore no protection of Whistle-blowers within that context. However, Ireland possesses a common law system and therefore a great amount of weight should be placed on the protection of Whistle-blowers as provided by the Courts. In the case of Burke v Central Independent

²³⁴ ibid.

²³⁵ International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights [1966]

²³⁶ Human Rights Committee, general comment No. 34 (2011) [2]; General Assembly, Promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression (A/HRC/29/32, 2012); European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms [1950] ECHR, art10

²³⁷ Goodwin v United Kingdom [1996] 22 EHRR 123

²³⁸ Nagla v. Latvia App no 73469/10 (ECHR,16 July 2013)

²³⁹ Nagla v. Latvia App no 73469/10 (ECHR,16 July 2013); see also [2009] ECHR 821/03

*Television*²⁴⁰ the Supreme Court decided that journalists do not have to disclose their sources where the life of those sources would be in danger if revealed. The case of *Mahon v Keena*²⁴¹ went further as to enshrine into the Irish constitution the concept of protection of journalistic sources; however the case made no explicit reference to the general protection of Whistle-blowers.

Despite this lack of protection for Whistle-blowers under any Irish law protecting journalistic sources, the Protected Disclosures Act (2014) is a distinct piece of legislation which aims to protect Whistle-blowers who reveal any corrupt practises within their course of employment.

11.2. Is there another practice protecting whistle-blowers?

There was a distinct need for The Protected Disclosures Act (2014) after a number of scandals in Irish society; most notably the discloser by a number of Irish Police members about corrupt practices within the force as well as a decade of revelations about abuse perpetrated by Catholic Clergy. Despite these reasons for the Irish government to legislate for Whistle-blowing, it is quite clear that the Act (2014) was created in a direct response to the Committee of Ministers Recommendation CM/Rec (2014) 7. The object of the Recommendation is to reaffirm the Freedom of Expression as protected under Article 10 of the European Convention²⁴² and to recognise that Whistle-blowers can contribute to strengthening transparency and democratic accountability in facilitating the exchange of information which is fundamental to the functioning of a genuine democracy.²⁴³

The Protected Disclosures Act (2014) aims to prevent an employer from dismissing or in any way penalising any worker who makes a protected discloser; Whistle-blowing. It is important to note that the Act (2014) only applies to workers who reveal some otherwise unknown information which they have discovered within the course of their employment. This definition in the Act (2014) derives strongly from the Committee Recommendation.²⁴⁴ For the purposes of the Recommendation a Whistle-blower is 'any person who reports or discloses information on a threat or harm to the public interest in the context of their work-based relationship'.²⁴⁵ The Irish definition is provided by S1 of the Unfair Dismissals Act (1977) and is understood to be an individual who has entered into work under a contract of employment.²⁴⁶ While the Irish definition is simply following that of the Committee Recommendation, it is narrower than that which is generally accepted by the academic community. The more extensively used definition was developed by Near and Miceli in their 1985 research; a Whistle-blower must possess four elements (1) that the Whistle-blower is an 'insider' of the organisation which is allegedly carrying out the wrong doing, (2) who lacks the authority to change the conduct of the activity of the organisation (3) who ²⁴⁰ (1994) 2 IR 61.

²⁴¹ Mahon & Ors v Keena [2010] 1 IR 336.

²⁴² European Convention on Human Rights.

²⁴³ Recommendation CM/Rec(2014) 7 of the Committee of Ministers, 5.

²⁴⁴ Ibid.

²⁴⁵ Ibid at 6..

²⁴⁶ Unfair Dismissals Act 1977, s1.

remains, at least partly anonymous for the duration of the Whistle-blowing and; (4) that the Whistle-blower occupies the position to which the wrongful activity is being prescribed.²⁴⁷ Essentially a whistle blower is fundamentally an organisational or institutional insider who reveals some wrong doing with the organisation or institution to someone else with the intention of effect that action should be taken to address it.²⁴⁸ The main difference between the generally accepted academic definition and that included in the Irish legislation is the prerequisite for employment in the course of the relationship between the organisation and the Whistle-blower. Criticism must be levelled at the Protected Disclosures Act (2014) and indeed the Committee Recommendation in focusing only in protecting employees. The Protected Disclosures Act (2014) leaves a number of groups vulnerable to redress where they have 'blown the whistle.' For those who are involved in an organisation or institution which is not public or with whom they do not possess a contract of employment, such as volunteers, then they are not protected in circumstance where they 'blow the whistle'. This lacuna in the law is surprising in the Irish context given the last decade of revelations about the Catholic Church which left many questioning how the abuse was never brought to the public's attention – in failing to step outside the remit of the Committee Recommendation to protect non-employees, the Irish drafters of the legislation are allowing history to repeat itself.

Unlike the definition of a Whistle-blower, the drafters of the Protected Disclosure Act (2014) went beyond the Committee Recommendation in defining which content from a disclosure will be protected. Section 5 of the Act (2014) provides that a Protected Discloser is either the reasonable belief of an employee which shows wrongdoing on the part of the employer²⁴⁹ or is wrongdoing which came to the attention of the employee within the course of their employment.²⁵⁰ Section 5(3) of the Act then goes on to set out the type of wrongdoing which concerns this Act:

- A criminal offence has or will be committed;
- Where the employer has failed to comply with any legal obligation;
- A miscarriage of justice has or is likely to occur;
- Health and safety or the environment is endangered;
- There has been an unlawful or improper use of a public body or funds;
- There is an act or omission by a public body which is oppressive, discriminatory, grossly negligent or constitutes gross mismanagement; or,
- That information tending to show any matter falling within the rest of the act is being or likely to be concealed or destroyed.²⁵¹

²⁴⁷ Janet Near and Marcia Miceli, 'Organisational Dissidence: A Case for Whistle-blowing' (1985) 4(1) Journal of Business Ethics, 1.

²⁴⁸ David Lewis, AJ Brown and Richard Moberly, International Handbook on Whistleblowing Research (Edward Elgar 2014).

²⁴⁹ Protected Disclosures Act (2014), S5(2)(a).

²⁵⁰ Ibid, S5(2)(b).

²⁵¹ Protected Disclosures Act (2014), s5(3)(a)-(h).

As the above demonstrates the Protected Disclosures Act (2014) is concerned with a wide variety of sources which may reveal information of public interest and is therefore protected. At this point another criticism of the Act should be made, this time in the view of employers. Regardless of whether the claim made in the Protected Disclosures has a factual basis or not, the Whistle-blower is protected from any civil liability even where they make an incorrect disclosure which has the potential to damage the business of their employer.²⁵² This may be the trade-off required to ensure that those who have founded concerns do not remain silent for fear of repercussion. However it is worth noting that the Protected Disclosures Act (2014) moves away from the Committee Recommendation in one key element. In accordance with European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) judgments the Committee Recommendation notes that one of the channels of reporting information to the public is through journalistic sources. Meanwhile Section 10 of the Protected Disclosures Act (2014) limits the disclosure of information to a journalistic source, this is in order to allow the employer to address the wrong-doing and prevent and reputational damage that could be caused by an incorrect “Whistle-blowing”. Despite the fact that Whistle-blowing, particularly to the media, is one of the most effective ways of uncovering corrupt behaviour, the Act (2014) only envisages disclosure to a journalistic source when other channels of disclosure have failed to bring the issue to sufficient public attention.²⁵³ This conception by the Irish legislation differs from the standard as provided for by the ECtHR. The case of *Goodwin v United Kingdom*²⁵⁴ was the first case which the ECtHR ruled on in relation to the protection of Whistle-blowers under Article 10 of the ECHR in what is considered the Court’s landmark case on the protection of journalistic sources. The Court found that any requirement that a journalist would have to reveal his sources would be a violation of the Freedom of Expression as established in Article 10 of the ECHR. Further holding that in failing to protect journalistic sources, such sources – Whistle-blowers – may be deterred from coming forward with information of great public importance.²⁵⁵ While the Irish law is in no way requiring journalists from revealing their sources, it does not offer protections to employees who do go to the press and disclose some information about their employer. Following this landmark judgment, in the case of *Guja v Moldova*²⁵⁶ the ECtHR found that the Freedom of Expression could only be limited where it is necessary for the proper functioning of a democratic society, a test which was confirmed in the case of Matúz v Hungary.²⁵⁷ Section 10 of the 2014 Act does not explicitly operate to limit the freedom of expression in Article 10 of the ECHR, but rather attempts to confine the disclosure to protect both the Whistle-blower from legal action and the employer from a false or defamatory claim. As the Protected Disclosures Act (2014) is such a new piece of legislation that it will be interesting to see how the Irish Courts interpret it in light

²⁵² Protected Disclosure Act (2014), s13; s14.

²⁵³ David Lewis, AJ Brown and Richard Moberly, International Handbook on Whistleblowing Research (Edward Elgar 2014); Protected Disclosures Act (2014), s10.

²⁵⁴ (1996) App no 25680/94 (ECtHR, 27 March 1996).

²⁵⁵ Ibid.

²⁵⁶ (2008) App no 14277/04 (ECtHR, 12 February 2008).

²⁵⁷ (2014) App no 73571/10 (ECtHR, 21 October 2014).

of not only their own decisions in *Burke*²⁵⁸ and *Mahon*²⁵⁹, but also to the principles established by the ECtHR case law²⁶⁰ and the European Committee Recommendation.²⁶¹

10.3. Is there legislation prohibiting authorities and companies from identifying whistle-blowers?

Section 16 of the Protected Disclosures Act (2014) provides for the protection of the identity of the individual making a protected disclosure. However, the section does not go into detail as to how this protection is to be realised. The Committee Recommendation does elaborate in so far as to say that Whistle-blowers should be entitled to have the confidentiality of their identity maintained, subject to fair trial guarantees.²⁶² The Protected Disclosures Act does however provide for a number of other strong provisions which may protect the Whistle-blower. Section 11 of the Act provides for an unfair dismissal procedure where the contract of employment with the employee who made the Protected Disclosure has been terminated.²⁶³ Section 12 provides for protection from any other penalty as a result of making a Protected Disclosure, while sections 13 and 14 of the Act provide that the maker of a Protected Disclosure is free from any Tort action and immunity from civil liability relating to the disclosure respectively. Finally, Section 15 of the Act provides that making a Protected Disclosure is not a criminal offence.

12. Conclusion

In a recent report carried out by the European University Institute²⁶⁴, Media Pluralism was assessed with reference to four indicators; Protection of Freedom of Expression, Protection of Right to Information, Journalistic Profession, Standards and Protection, and Independence of National Authorities. The highest risk outlined by the report related to the Journalistic Profession, Standards and Protection indicator which was presented as a 38% risk (medium). This report is reflective of the finding of this paper - Ireland has safeguards to protect journalistic sources, however, this protection is not explicit in legislation but is contained in case law guided by the European Convention on Human Rights.

²⁵⁸ Burke v Central Independent Television (1994) 2 IR 61.

²⁵⁹ Mahon & Ors v Keena [2010] 1 IR 336.

²⁶⁰ Goodwin v United Kingdom (1996) App no 25680/94 (ECtHR, 27 March 1996); Guja v Moldova (2008) App no 14277/04 (ECtHR, 12 February 2008); Matúz v Hungary (2014) App no 73571/10 (ECtHR, 21 October 2014).

²⁶¹ Recommendation CM/Rec(2014) 7 of the Committee of Ministers.

²⁶² Ibid.

²⁶³ S6(2)(ba) of the Unfair Dismissals Act as inserted by S11 of the Protected Disclosures Act.

²⁶⁴ Roderick Flynn, 'Media Pluralism Monitor 2015 – Results (Ireland)' (European University Institute, 1 October 2015) <<http://monitor.cmpf.eui.eu/mpm2015/results/ireland/>> accessed 1 June 2016

The findings of this paper highlight, that these safeguards are adequate and allow for a free media, but the question on whether explicit legislative address is necessary remains.

13. CASE LAW, LEGISLATION, BIBLIOGRAPHY AND ONLINE RESOURCES

13.1. Legislation

- Telecommunications Services Act 1983, as amended by the Telecommunications Messages (Regulation) Act 1993
- Bunreacht na hÉireann
- European Convention on Human Rights Act 2003
- Tribunals of Inquiry Acts 1921-1979
- Criminal Law (Surveillance) Act 2009
- Unfair Dismissals Act 1977
- Protected Disclosures Act (2014)
- Council of Europe Committee of Ministers, Recommendation No. R (2000) 7.
- The Constitution Review Group, Report of the Constitution Review Group (1996) 268
- Joint Committee on the Constitution, First Report of the Joint Committee on the Constitution: Article 40.6.1.i – Freedom of Speech (2008) 69.
- Roderick Flynn, 'Media Pluralism Monitor 2015 – Results (Ireland)' (European University Institute, 1 October 2015) <<http://monitor.cmpf.eui.eu/mpm2015/results/ireland/>> accessed 1 June 2016
- Press Council of Ireland, Code of Practice, 2016. URL: <http://presscouncil.ie/code-of-practice.150.html>
- National Union of Journalists Code of Conduct, 2011. URL: <https://www.nuj.org.uk/about/nuj-code/> Accessed on: February 28 2016.
- RTÉ 'Journalism Guidelines' (April 2012) 25 <<http://www.rte.ie/documents/about/rte-journalism-guidelines-april3-2012.pdf>> accessed 13 April 2016.
- Privacy International 'The Right to Privacy in Ireland' (2016) privacyinternational.org accessible at <<https://www.privacyinternational.org/node/748>> accessed 4 March 2015
- "Microsoft Law Enforcement Requests Report," (2015) microsoft.com accessible at <<http://www.microsoft.com/about/corporatecitizenship/en-us/reporting/transparency/>> accessed 4 March 2016
- eDiscovery Group of Ireland, 'Good practice guide to Electronic Discovery in Ireland' (Version 1.0 - 16 April 2013) 60

13.2. Case Law

- Mahon and Others v Keena and Kennedy [2010] 1 IR 336
- Re Kevin O'Kelly (1974) 63 ILTR 97

- DPP v O'Keefe, The Irish Times, January 28 1995
- Cornec v Morrice & Ors [2012] IEHC 376
- Walsh v News Group Newspapers [2012] IEHC 353
- The State (Lynch) v Cooney [1982] 1 IR 361
- Cullen v Toibin [1984] ILRM 577
- O'Brennan v Tully [1933] 69 ILTR 116
- Council of the Bar of Ireland v Sunday Business Post Ltd HC, Unreported, 30 March 1993
- Gray v Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform [1994] 2 I.R. 61
- Mabon v Post Publications [2007] 3 IR 338
- Burke v Central Independent Television (1994) 2 IR 61
- Norwich Pharmacal Co v Customs and Excise Commissioners [1974] AC 133, 175, HL
- Interbrew v. Financial Times et al. [2002] EWCA Civ 274 [55]
- Murphy v Ireland [2003] ECHR 352
- Sanoma Uitgevers BV v Netherlands App. no. 38224/03 (EctHR, 2010)
- Fressoz and Roire v France (1999) 31 EHRR 28
- Goodwin v United Kingdom (1996) 22 EHRR 123
- Financial Times Ltd v UK (Application No 821/03) 15 December 2009
- Voskuil v the Netherlands (App No. 64752/01) [22 November 2007]
- Tillack v Belgium (App no. 20477/05) [27 November 2007]
- Telegraaf Media Nederland Landelijke Media N.V. and Others v. the Netherlands App no 39315/06 (ECHR 22 November 2012)
- Nagla v. Latvia App no 73469/10 (ECHR, 16 July 2013)

13.3. Books and articles

- Marie McGonagle, Media Law (2nd edn, Round Hall 2003)
- Eoin Carolan and Ailbhe O'Neill, Media Law in Ireland (1 edn, Bloomsbury Professional 2010)
- David Lewis, AJ Brown and Richard Moberly, International Handbook on Whistleblowing Research (Edward Elgar 2014)
- Damian Byrne, The Law on Protection of Journalistic Sources in Ireland, (2009) 14(6) The Bar Review, 119
- Joanne Hyde, The Protected Disclosures Act 2014: An Overview, (2014) 11(4) Irish Employment Law Journal, 114
- Diarmuid Murphy, A Privilege Worthy Of Protection: Journalists And Their Sources (2012) 30 TCL Rev 1
- Angel Fahy, 'Confidential Sources and Contempt of Court: An argument for change' (2009) DIT,

- Eoin Carolan, 'The Implications of Media Fragmentation and Contemporary Democratic Discourse for "Journalistic Privilege" and the Protection of Sources' [2013] 49(1) The Irish Jurist 187
- Pascale Duparc-Portier, 'Media Reporting of Trials in France and in Ireland' (2006) 6 Judicial Studies Institute Journal 197, 202
- Tom Daly 'Strengthening Irish Democracy: A Proposal to Restore Free Speech to Article 40.6.1°(i) of the Constitution' (2009) 31 Dublin University Law Journal 228
- Annabel Brody 'Pressing Times Ahead: The Evolution of Press Councils in an Age of Media Convergence' (2011) 16 Communications Law 106,
- Eoin Carolan, 'Constitutionalizing Discourse: Democracy, Freedom of Expression and the Future of Press' (2014), 51(1), The Irish Jurist, 1-27,
- John Barry, 'The Criminal Justice (Surveillance) Act 2009: An Examination of the Compatibility of the New Act with Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights' [2010] 1(1) Cork Online Law Review <<http://corkonlinelawreview.com/editions/2010/CRIMINAL%20JUSTICE-BARRY.pdf>> accessed 7 December 2015
- Tom Brady, Shane Phelan and Tim Healy, 'Anglo chiefs facing quiz on missing passwords' (New Irish News, 10 November 2010) <<http://www.independent.ie/irish-news/anglo-chiefs-facing-quiz-on-missing-passwords-26698319.html>> accessed 14 April 2016
- Janet Near and Marcia Miceli, 'Organisational Dissidence: A Case for Whistle-blowing' (1985) 4(1) Journal of Business Ethics, 1

14. Table of Provisions

Provisions in native language	Corresponding translation
Protected Disclosures Act, 2014 Section 5 5. (1) For the purposes of this Act “protected disclosure” means, subject to subsection (6) and sections 17 and 18 , a disclosure of relevant information (whether before or after the date of the passing of this Act) made by a worker in the manner specified in section 6 , 7 , 8 , 9 or 10 . (2) For the purposes of this Act information is “relevant information” if— (a) in the reasonable belief of the worker, it tends to show one or more relevant wrongdoings, and (b) it came to the attention of the worker in connection with the worker’s employment.

(3) The following matters are relevant wrongdoings for the purposes of this Act—

(a) that an offence has been, is being or is likely to be committed,

(b) that a person has failed, is failing or is likely to fail to comply with any legal obligation, other than one arising under the worker's contract of employment or other contract whereby the worker undertakes to do or perform personally any work or services,

(c) that a miscarriage of justice has occurred, is occurring or is likely to occur,

(d) that the health or safety of any individual has been, is being or is likely to be endangered,

(e) that the environment has been, is being or is likely to be damaged,

(f) that an unlawful or otherwise improper use of funds or resources of a public body, or of other public money, has occurred, is occurring or is likely to occur,

(g) that an act or omission by or on behalf of a public body is oppressive, discriminatory or grossly negligent or constitutes gross mismanagement, or

(h) that information tending to show any matter falling within any of the preceding paragraphs has been, is being or is likely to be concealed or destroyed.

Section 10

(1) A disclosure is made in the manner specified in this section if it is made otherwise than in the manner specified in sections 6 to 9 and—

(a) the worker reasonably believes that the information disclosed, and any allegation contained in it, are substantially true,

(b) the disclosure is not made for personal gain,

(c) any one or more of the conditions in subsection (2) is met, and

(d) in all the circumstances of the case, it is reasonable for the worker to make the disclosure.

(2) The conditions referred to in subsection (1)(c) are—

(a) that, at the time the worker makes the disclosure, the worker reasonably believes that the worker will be subjected to penalisation by the worker's employer if the worker makes a disclosure in the manner specified in section 6 , 7 or 8 ,

(b) that, in a case where no relevant person is prescribed for the purposes of section 7 in relation to the relevant wrongdoing, the worker reasonably believes that it is likely that evidence relating to the relevant wrongdoing will be concealed or destroyed if the worker makes a disclosure in the manner specified in section 6 ,

(c) that the worker has previously made a disclosure of substantially the same information—

(i) in the manner specified in section 6 , or

(ii) in the manner specified in section 7 or 8 , and (d) that the relevant wrongdoing is of an exceptionally serious nature. (3) In determining for the purposes of subsection (1)(d) whether it is reasonable for the worker to make the disclosure regard shall be had, in particular, to— (a) the identity of the person to whom the disclosure is made, (b) in a case falling within subsection (2) (a), (b) or (c), the seriousness of the relevant wrongdoing, (c) in a case falling within subsection (2)(a), (b) or (c), whether the relevant wrongdoing is continuing or is likely to occur in the future, (d) in a case falling within subsection (2)(c), any action which the employer of the worker or the person to whom the previous disclosure was
---	--

made has taken or might reasonably be expected to have taken as a result of the previous disclosure, and

(e) in a case falling within subsection (2)(c)(i), whether in making the disclosure to the employer the worker complied with any procedure the use of which by the worker was authorised by the employer.

(4) For the purposes of this section a subsequent disclosure may be regarded as a disclosure of substantially the same information as that disclosed by a previous disclosure as mentioned in subsection (2)(c) even though the subsequent disclosure extends to information about action taken or not taken by any person as a result of the previous disclosure.

(5) In subsection (1)(b) “personal gain” excludes any reward payable under or by virtue of any enactment.

Section 16

(1) A person to whom a protected disclosure is made, and any person to whom a protected disclosure is referred in the performance of that person’s duties, shall not disclose to another person any information that might identify the person by whom the protected disclosure was made.

Criminal Justice (Surveillance) Act, 2009

Section 4

(1) A superior officer of the Garda Síochána may apply to a judge for an authorisation where he or she has reasonable grounds for believing that—

(a) as part of an operation or investigation being conducted by the Garda Síochána concerning an arrestable offence, the surveillance being sought to be authorised is necessary for the purposes of obtaining information as to whether the offence has been committed or as to the circumstances relating to the commission of the offence, or obtaining evidence for the purposes of proceedings in relation to the offence,

(b) the surveillance being sought to be authorised is necessary for the purpose of preventing the commission of arrestable offences, or

(c) the surveillance being sought to be authorised is necessary for the purpose of maintaining the security of the State.

(2) A superior officer of the Defence Forces may apply to a judge for an authorisation where he or she has reasonable grounds for believing that the surveillance being sought to be authorised is necessary for the purpose of maintaining the security of the State.

(3) A superior officer of the Revenue Commissioners may apply to a judge for an authorisation where he or she has reasonable grounds for believing that—

(a) as part of an operation or investigation being conducted by the Revenue Commissioners concerning a revenue offence, the surveillance being sought to be authorised is necessary for the purpose of obtaining information as to whether the offence has been committed or as to the circumstances relating to the commission of the offence, or obtaining evidence for the purpose of proceedings in relation to the offence, or

(b) the surveillance being sought to be authorised is necessary for the purpose of preventing the commission of revenue offences.

Section 5

(2) Subject to subsection (4), the judge shall issue such authorisation as he or she considers reasonable, if satisfied by information on oath of the superior officer concerned that—

(a) the requirements specified in subsection (1), (2) or (3), as the case may be, of section 4 are fulfilled, and

(b) to do so is justified, having regard to the matters referred to in section 4 (5) and all other relevant circumstances.

Interception of Postal Packets and Telecommunications Messages (Regulation) Act, 1993

Section 8

(1) The President of the High Court shall from time to time after consultation with the Minister invite a person who is a judge of the High Court to undertake (while serving as such a judge) the duties specified in this section and, if he accepts the invitation, the Government shall designate him for the purposes of this Act.

(2) A person designated under this section (referred to in this Act as “the designated judge”) shall hold office in accordance with the terms of his designation and shall have the duty of keeping the operation of this Act under review, of ascertaining whether its provisions are being complied with and of reporting to the Taoiseach—

(a) at such intervals (being intervals of not more than twelve months) as the designated judge thinks desirable in relation to the general operation of the Act, and

(b) from time to time in relation to any matters relating to the Act which he considers should be so reported.

(3) For the purpose of his functions under this Act, the designated judge—

(a) shall have power to investigate any case in which an authorisation has been given, and

(b) shall have access to and may inspect any official documents relating to an authorisation or the application therefor.

(4) The designated judge may, if he thinks it desirable to do so, communicate with the Taoiseach or the Minister on any matter concerning interceptions.

(5) Every person who was concerned in, or has information relevant to, the making of the application for, or the giving of, an authorisation, or was otherwise concerned with the operation of any provision of this Act relating to the application or authorisation, shall give the designated judge, on request by him, such information as is in his possession relating to the application or authorisation.

(6) If the designated judge informs the Minister that he considers that a particular authorisation that is in force should not have been given or (because of circumstances arising after it had been given) should be cancelled or that the period for which it was in force should not have been extended or further extended, the Minister shall, as soon as may be, inform the Minister for Transport, Energy and Communications and shall then cancel the authorisation.

(7) The Taoiseach shall cause a copy of a report under subsection (2) of this section together with a statement as to whether any matter has been excluded therefrom in pursuance of subsection (8) of this section to be laid before each House of the Oireachtas.

(8) If the Taoiseach considers, after consultation with the designated judge, that the publication of any matter in a report under subsection (2) of this section would be prejudicial to the prevention or detection of crime or to the security of the State, the Taoiseach may exclude that matter from the copies of the report laid before the Houses of the Oireachtas.

European Convention on Human Rights Act, 2003

Section 2

(1) In interpreting and applying any statutory provision or rule of law, a court shall, in so far as is possible, subject to the rules of law relating to such interpretation and application, do so in a manner compatible with the State's obligations under the Convention provisions.

(2) This section applies to any statutory provision or rule of law in force immediately before the passing of this Act or any such provision coming into force thereafter.

ELSA ITALY

Contributors

National Coordinator

Natasha Divina Renzetti

National Academic Coordinator

Desara Dushi

National Researchers

Giada Azadi

Fabrizio De Gregorio

Mariano Delli Santi

Chiara Nuzzaci

Carmine Emanuele Papa

National Academic Supervisor

Prof. Marina Castellaneta

1. Introduction

“Domestic law and practice in member states should provide for explicit and clear protection of the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source in accordance with Article 10 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms”¹

This fundamental principle of Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Council of Europe, supported also by other international legislation and case-law, shows the great importance of the right to protection of journalistic sources as part of one of the fundamental freedoms, which is the freedom of expression. On this basis, this report explains the current level of protection of journalistic sources in Italy through an analysis of legal provisions regarding this issue, case-law, and compliance with international legal standards in the field. The situation in this country is not so clear due to a number of factors which are explained throughout the report, such as: a lack of an explicit and clear definition of ‘journalist’ and the existence of a stratification of the profile of a journalist. The main national legislation regulating issues related to the journalistic profession in Italy is Law no. 63 of 1969 on the Organisation of the Journalistic Profession. Through this law, together with other legal provisions, the Italian legislator has tried to adapt its national legislation to meet as much as possible the international standards for the protection of freedom of expression and journalistic sources.

2. Does the national legislation provide (explicit or otherwise) protection of the right of the journalists not to disclose their source of information? What type of legislation provides this protection? How exactly is this protection construed in national law?

2.1 The Construction of the Right of the Journalist not to Disclose their Sources

The starting point of the analysis on the protection of the right of journalist not to disclose their sources of information are the constitutional guarantee provided for in Articles 15 and 21 of the Italian Constitution. Article 15 affirms the freedom and confidentiality of any kind of communication, without any external interference. In the light of this article, there is not an effective freedom in communicating without the respect of secrecy and confidentiality. Article 21, instead, refers to the right to freedom of expression. It recognises the press as unconditioned, independent, uncensored and limitations are allowed exclusively in the cases prescribed by law. Article 21 grants especially to the press the right of freedom of expression, recognising it as the main right and duty holder in order to inform and critically argue the reality, in an unbiased way.

¹ Council of Europe, "Recommendation No. R (2000) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information", appendix, Principle 1

Besides, Art. 21, as interpreted by the Constitutional Court, grants to journalists the right/duty to inform, also including the right to gather and receive information.²

Nevertheless, within the Italian Legal system the right of journalists not to disclose their sources is primarily the expression of a duty affirmed both on a professional and on a criminal law level. Before the reform of the Code of Criminal Procedure (hereafter CCP) in 1987, the criminal procedural legislation did not provide any possibility for journalists to protect the secrecy of their sources. Due to the lack of correspondence between the material and the procedural provisions, the reform acknowledged the right not to disclose sources to professional journalists and editors.³ The discipline introduced represents the result of a balancing, never attempted before, between the interest in justice and the interest of press freedom. However, the construction of the legislation gives priority to the former configuring an obligation for the journalists to disclose their sources, whenever the information is necessary for the ascertainment of the offence.⁴ Therefore, in the opinion of the majority of scholars, detecting the current contradiction between the duty to respect the professional secret on confidential sources laid down in Article 2 of the professional Law no. 69 of 1963 and the criminal procedural legislation, the issue of the journalistic secret on sources remains controversial.⁵

2.2 The Professional Duty of Journalists not to Disclose Confidential Sources

According to Article 2, paragraph 3 of Law no. 69 of 1963 on the Organisation of the Journalistic Profession, journalists and editors are obliged to respect the professional secret on the source of information, when this is required by the confidential character of it [...].⁶ In light of the duty to respect the substantial truthfulness of facts, the provision aims to ensure a deeper control on the information flow.⁷ The right/duty of journalists to protect their confidential sources is also affirmed by the Ethics Charter.⁸ The violation of the professional duty entails the disciplinary liability of the journalist as established by Art. 48 of Law no. 69 of 1963, according to which:

² 1 [1981] Constitutional Court.

² Valeria Falcone., Segreto giornalistico ed esigenze processuali (Altalex, 25 January 2008) < <http://www.altalex.com/documents/news/2008/01/24/segreto-giornalistico-ed-esigenzeprocessuali#sdfootnote10sym> > accessed 10 January 2016.

⁴ Paolo Tonini, Manuale di Procedura Penale (14th edn, Giuffrè Editore 2013) 300.

⁵ Paolo Caretti, Ugo de Siervo, Istituzioni di Diritto Pubblico (10th edn, G.Giappichelli Editore) 482 [Italian]; see also Paolo Caretti, I diritti fondamentali (3th edn, G.Giappichelli Editore) 385 [Italian]; Franco Abruzzo, Il Segreto Professionale dei Giornalisti (2003) <http://www.diritto.it/articoli/editoria/abruzzo6.html> accessed 8 January 2016.

⁶ The Legislative Decree no 150 of 2011, modified Law no 69 of 1963 but did not influence the substantive content of the protection on journalistic sources.

⁷ Art. 2, Law no 63 (Organisation of the Journalistic Profession) 1969 [Ordinamento della Professione di Giornalista]: [...] it is a binding duty to respect the material truthfulness of the facts, in compliance with the duties imposed by loyalty and good faith; M. Pedrazza Gorlero, Giornalismo e Costituzione (Dott. Antonio Milani) 77 [Italian].

⁸ Interregional Code of Piemonte and Valle d'Aosta; Charter of Journalist's Duties, Protocol 1993.

‘Anyone registered on the list or on the registry, guilty of facts inconsistent with the decorum and the professional dignity, or guilty of facts compromising its reputation or the dignity of the Association, shall be subject to the disciplinary procedure. The procedure starts ex officio by the regional or the inter-regional Council or also on request of the general prosecutor competent according to Art. 44.’

2.3 The Protection of the Right of the Journalists not to Disclose their Sources and the Treatment of Personal Data

In relation to the treatment and the protection of personal data, Article 138 of the Data Protection Code of 2003, which reorganised the different laws enacted on the treatment of personal data,⁹ also repealing Article 13, paragraph 5, Law no 675 of 1996 which recognised to journalists the application of the provisions on the protection of the professional secret, with a limitation to the source of the information. The Data Protection Code acknowledges the journalists’ right not to disclose their sources as a prevalent right in respect of the right of the persons to know the origin of personal data related to them.¹⁰

2.4 The Protection of the Right of Journalists not to disclose their Sources Within the Criminal Procedural Law

Before the reform of the CCP was enabled, the debate focused on the contrast between Articles 351 and 348 of the former code. The former Art. 351 provided an exception from the general duty to witness established in Art. 348 Section II, without including journalists within the category of professionals entitled to abstain from testify.¹¹ Several Courts questioned the legitimacy of these provisions, noticing the violation of the principles of equality and freedom of expression, both protected respectively by Art. 3 and Art. 21 of the Italian Constitution. The Constitutional Court rejected the claim of the violation of the principle of equality relying on the structural and functional difference of the cases; whilst, in regard to the alleged prejudice to the freedom of expression the Constitutional Court acknowledged the existence of ‘a real press freedom of journalists – inclusive of the acquisition of information – as a passive aspect of freedom of expression’, but assumed the interest in justice to be prevalent on freedom of expression, urging the legislator to ⁹ Legislative Decree no 196 (Data Protection Code) 2003 [Codice in Materia di Protezione dei Dati Personali].

¹⁰ Valeria Falcone, Segreto giornalistico ed esigenze processuali
<http://www.altalex.com/documents/news/2008/01/24/segreto-giornalistico-ed-esigenze-processuali#sdfootnote10sym> accessed 10 January 2016.

¹¹ Former Art. 351, CCP: ‘Cannot be compelled to give evidence of what they have learned by reason of their status, office or profession, except in cases in which they have an obligation to report to the Court: a) the ministers of religious denominations, whose statutes are not in conflict with the Italian legal system; b) lawyers, authorized private investigators, technical consultants and notaries; c) doctors and surgeons, pharmacists, midwives and any other conducting a health profession; d) conductors of other offices or professions to which the law recognizes the right to refuse to testify determined by legal privilege’.

reasonably decide on the balance of the two interests.¹² Through the reform of the Code of Criminal Procedure, intervened with Law no 81 of 1987, the legislator affirmed a limited right of journalists not to disclose their sources.¹³ The provision contained in the first section of Art. 200 of the new CCP merely repeats the content of former Art. 351; even though, under paragraph 3, the right to abstain from witnessing conferred by the first section has been extended to 'professional journalists registered in their professional association, exclusively to the names of the person from whom they obtained confidential information while practicing the profession.' The protection accorded finds its restraints in the following lines of the same article:

'If the information is essential to prove that the offence being prosecuted has been committed and its truthfulness may be ascertained only by identifying the source of information the judge shall order to the journalists to disclose its source.'

The majority of scholars recognize that Art. 200 ensures the protection of journalistic activities; and within this uniform evaluation some of them consider the requirement of confidentiality of the source as fully satisfied, to the extent to constitute a right to anonymity. Unlike, other scholars believe to be instead protected the interest of the carrier, specifically identified in the exercise of his profession: in this view the secret receives protection only if attacked through its holder.¹⁴

The discipline provided by Article 200, Section III, relies on the prevalence of the interest of justice over the interest of the journalist not to disclose the source; therefore, when the secret opposed by the journalist on his sources is deemed to be legitimate by the judge, the information disclosed by the journalist can be used within the trial for the purpose of the decision.

Materially, the right of journalists to abstain from witnessing covers only the identity of the source of the information, not its content, which is supposed to be already public.¹⁵ The Italian Supreme Court recently affirmed that 'the protection of the right of the journalist not to disclose its sources extends to all the information which is likely to facilitate the identification of the source of the confidential information'.¹⁶ Nevertheless, Article 200, paragraph 2 allows the judge to overcome the right not ¹² 1 [1981] Constitutional Court: '[...] The question posed in reference to Art. 3 of the Constitution, cannot be said in itself to have a basis, because the comparative situations are not equal, nor broadly homogeneous, but rather different in several aspects, structural and functional. And, indeed, already structurally it differs from the journalistic secrets listed in Art. 351 of the criminal procedural code, as it protects the sole source and not even the information: that indeed is confided to a journalist with the aim that he will disclose it. Even functionally, the comparison of journalistic secret with the cases provided for by Art. 351 has no consistency.

In the latter can be raised, as has been mentioned, the consideration of the confidentiality requirement in correlation to the fulfilment of fundamental interests of the person providing the information...It is then up to the legislator to considering if the journalistic secret is so essential or has an effective instrumental utility for the freedom of expression to such an extent to prevail on the interest in justice [...].'

¹³ Luca Grilli, La Pubblicazione degli Atti e il Segreto Professionale del Giornalista [1990] Giust. Penale 565 [Italian].

¹⁴ The latter scholar's view has been affirmed taking into account the provision of Art. 200, paragraph 3, which restrains the protection exclusively to confidential sources. Cf. M. Di Camillo, Segreto Giornalistico e Diritto di Cronaca nel Diritto Sostanziale e Processuale alla Luce della Riforma del 1988 [1999] Giur. Merito 668 [Italian]; Rarafaci, Segreto del Giornalista e Processo Penale [1991] Cass. Pen 919 [Italian].

¹⁵ 1 [1981] Constitutional Court [Italian].

¹⁶ 22397 [2004] Supreme Court of Cassation [2004] Giust Penale III, 282; Paola Spagnolo, Il Segreto Giornalistico nel Processo Penale (Giuffrè) 199 [Italian].

to disclose a source of information, by verifying the validity of the secret opposed, the registration to the order of the journalist and the circumstances under which the information was acquired.¹⁷

When the judge assesses the respect of the professional ethics and duties in gathering the information, he/she can order also the disclosure of the source under specific conditions which will be further explained in the sixth part of this report. Recent case-law of the District Court of Rome and the Criminal Court of Treviso demonstrated that Courts are in favor of the right of the journalists not to disclose their sources, supporting the existence of an absolute protection provided by the aforementioned provision. However, the Courts confirmed the exceptional character of the derogations, subjected to the strict fulfillment of the criteria which will be explained later in this report.¹⁸

The right of journalists not to disclose their sources is ensured also by other provisions. Article 271, paragraph 2 of CCP establishes the discipline of wiretapping of individuals identified by Article 200. The provision prohibits to use the content of the conversations concerning information or facts known by reason of profession or office, unless the person of interest disclosed the information in a deposition or in other ways. In relation to invasive measures ordered by the judicial authority, according to Article 256 CCP journalists are entitled to oppose the professional secrecy towards the request of public authorities to produce acts, documents, computer programs, data and information.

3. Is there, in domestic law, a provision that prohibits a journalist from disclosing his/her sources? How exactly is this prohibition construed in national law? What is the sanction?

3.1 National Provision Envisaging the Prohibition for Journalists from Disclosing their Sources

The main provisions of the Italian legal system on the disclosure of confidential sources by journalists were introduced in the previous chapter: Article 2, Law no. 69 of 1963, Organisation of the Journalistic Profession, Article 138, Data Protection Code, Charter of Duties of the Journalists published in 1983.¹⁹ These rules are enforced through a sanctioning system provided by articles 51 to 55, Law 63 of 1969 on the Organisation of Journalistic Profession, as already examined.

¹⁷ L. Biagioni, Note sul riconoscimento del segreto professionale ai giornalisti professionisti nel nuovo C.p.p [1991] Giur. It. 477 [Italian].

¹⁸ [21/02/1994] District Court of Rome; 252 [14/01/2000] Criminal Court of Treviso.

¹⁹ Boneschi, La Deontologia del Giornalista; Charter of the Duties of Journalist [1993] (Carta dei doveri del giornalista).

3.2 The Prohibition of Disclosure of Sources within the Italian Criminal Code

In addition to the aforementioned prescriptions, the Italian Criminal Code (hereafter CC) should be considered for the purpose of the analysis. Although it does not contain a specific provision prohibiting journalists to disclose their sources, the majority of scholars admit that the conduct of revealing a source of information held by the journalist falls within the applicability of Art. 622, CC,²⁰ which states as follows:

*'Whoever, having news of a secret, by reason of their status or office, or profession, or art, reveal it without a justified reason, or uses it in order to gain an advantage for himself or others, shall be punished, if his conduct causes a damage, with imprisonment up to one year or a fine ranging from EUR 30 to EUR 516.'*²¹

The disclosure of the professional secret is qualified as a crime against the individual freedom.²²

The duty was established principally in the interest of the client, aiming to protect the *'freedom and security of intimate and professional relations determined by necessity or almost necessity'*²³ of the client to enjoy the professional services provided by a precise category of individuals. Therefore, the prohibition assumes a general public relevance²⁴ on the ground of the trust relationship between a professional and his client. Since the purpose of the provision is the protection of personal freedom, the crime can be prosecuted exclusively upon complaint *ex parte*²⁵ and derogations are allowed solely with the consensus of the victim.²⁶

²⁰ Lonardo, Informazione Giornalistica e Segreto Professionale 367; Manzini, Trattato di Diritto Penale Italiano (5th edn, Torino 1986) 1019 [Italian]; Monaco, Art. 622 (4th edn, Padova) 2065; Vigna, Dubolino, Segreto (Reati in Materia di) 1089 [Italian].

²¹ The crime encountered many difficulties in achieving a full recognition within the legal system. Ancient Roman criminal law used to include the crime under the sphere of iniuria. Later, the first Italian Criminal Code qualified it as a crime against the personal honor. Currently, the crime is envisaged as a crime against the inviolability of secrets.

²² Cesare Protetti, Il Giornalismo nella Giurisprudenza (CEDAM) 634 [Italian].

²³ The necessity of the client arises because of: a) the lack or insufficiency of technical competence, b) the material impossibility or juridical prohibition to satisfy personal needs, c) the duty or juridical burden of being subject to controls, d) the obligations deriving from religion. The distinction with other types of relationships is marked by the absolute or relative necessity of the professional intervention, which justifies the protection accorded by criminal law. See Mantovani, Diritto Penale 651; Manzini, Trattato di Diritto Penale Italiano (4th edn 1964) 1013-14.

²⁴ Protetti, Il Giornalismo nella Giurisprudenza 635; Cf. Lago, Art. 622, in Comm. Dolcini, Marinucci, Parte Speciale 4391 [Italian]; Vigna Dubolino, Segreto (reati in materia di) in ED XLI (1989) 1086 [Italian].

²⁵ ibid 635; Crespi, La Tutela Penale del Segreto 100; Giovanni Fiandaca, Enzo Musco, Diritto Penale Parte Speciale, vol II, I delitti contro la Persona (4th edn Zanichelli 2013) 219 [Italian].

²⁶ The consent must derive from the person to whom the secret refers to, and it prevents the occurrence of the offence. The consent can be also expressed after the professional gains knowledge of the secret. Furthermore, it can be replaced by the lack of complaints by the individual entitled to exercise his right to report. See Manzini, Trattato di Diritto Penale Italiano 1028-30.

Unlike, some scholars partially disagree on the extension of the provision to the conduct of journalists who disclose their sources because the ratio of the incrimination would be missing, if the information is provided to the journalist in order to be published.²⁷

3.2.2 The Substantial Regulation of the Crime of Secret Disclosure

In regard to the material discipline of the crime, Article 622 CC prescribes a necessary requirement for the realisation of the conduct: the cognition of a secret, whose knowledge must be necessary and causally connected with the exercise of the profession. The general reference to the exercise of the profession is linked to the protection of personal freedom: the legislator did not restrict the range of protection using strict categories, but decided to introduce notions, such as status, employment, arts, profession, capable to include uncountable professional activities.²⁸ Furthermore, the information aliunde known by the professional is excluded by the protection accorded,²⁹ since it must exist a strict functional connection between the knowledge of the secret and the exercise of the profession. The information protected as a secret can pre-exist respect the professional relation or arise after the trust relation is established.³⁰ Besides, the interest in personal freedom fulfilled by the provision may come into consideration only when the secret regards facts or relationships concerning the intimate sphere of the client.³¹ Furthermore, the information receives protection by Article 622 CC irrespectively of its lawfulness, while the disclosure shall always comply with the essential legal requirements.³² According to Article 2, Law no 69 of 1963 the journalistic secrecy applies only for 'confidential sources'.

²⁷ ibid 965; Santucci, Il Segreto Professionale (1964) 645 [Italian]; Protetti, Il Giornalismo nella Griurisprudenza 635.

²⁸ Fiandaca, Musco, Diritto Penale, Parte Speciale (2006) 318 [Italian]. The notion of status is defined as the situation realized through the continuative exercise of a social activity, or as the juridical situation derived from family relationship. Employment means the private or public activity which is exercised temporarily or permanently by an individual, which does not constitute a profession in the strict sense. Public functions are excluded from the notion of employment. See Giuliano Marini, Mario la Monica e Leonardo Mazza, Commentario al Codice Penale, Vol. IV (UTET 2002) 3073 [Italian]; Guido Papa e Roberto Garofoli, Manuale di Diritto Penale, Parte Speciale, Vol. 3 (Nel Diritto Editore 2015) 713 [Italian]. Finally, the notions of profession and arts are defined as the habitual activities consistent in providing personal services or real performances for people who require or need them. The notions share some common features, such as a) the reception of confidential information or the cognition of secrets as a moment of the exercise of the activity, b) the continuity of the activity, c) the absence of profit, d) the morality or legitimacy of the activity. See Mantovani, Diritto Penale, Parte Speciale, Delitti contro la Persona 649.

²⁹ Professional secrecy does not apply when the information is obtained a) for extra-professional reasons, solidarity or friendship, b) when the person requires the aid of the professional to achieve an illegal purpose, c) when the information has been acquired unlawfully. See Mantovani, Diritto Penale, Parte Speciale, Delitti contro la Persona 651.

³⁰ Marini, la Monica, Mazza, Commentario al Codice Penale, 3073; Mantovani, Diritto Penale, Parte Speciale, Delitti contro la Persona 652; Manzini, Trattato di Diritto Penale Italiano 1020.

³¹ Such as honor, family, religion, politic opinion, body, property asset, etc. See Manzini, Trattato di Diritto Penale Italiano 1020; Cf Mantovani, Diritto Penale, Parte Speciale, Delitti contro la Persona; which affirms that the exercise of the profession may require the knowledge of information by third parties, who need the same protection accorded to clients.

³² Mutti, Segreto Professionale in Digesto Pen., XIII, Torino, 1997, 128.

As a consequence of the combination of the two provisions, the protection is only accorded to information acquired by the journalist during the exercise of his profession, as long as they do not have a social and public relevance.³³ In order to protect the category, case-law has confirmed that when information is publicly available, the disclosure by the journalist does not have any criminal relevance. In this circumstance, the provision would no longer be applicable as the need of protection cease to exist. Along with this orientation, the Court of Naples specifically assessed that the knowledge of the secret by the professional does not undermine the obligations of loyalty and privacy imposed on him: these obligations terminate only because of the “notoriety” of the information.³⁴

The European Court of Human Rights (hereafter ECtHR) ruled on the situation of a journalist who published information of public relevance obtained as a consequence of the violation of professional secret committed by someone else.³⁵ The ECtHR defined the dissemination of information of general public interest as an inalienable right of the journalists. Additionally, it recognised as an unreasonable limit to the freedom of expression, the conviction of journalists for receiving stolen goods and publishing documents received as a result of the disclosure of professional secret perpetrated by someone else, when the journalist acts in accordance with ethical rules.³⁶ The Court urged States to extend the protection of freedom of expression, declaring incompatible with Article 10, ECHR searches within editorial offices and press rooms and seizures of informatics and printed material ordered by judges.

The abovementioned measures entail the conviction of a State before the Court.³⁷ In the case Görmuş and others v. Turkey, the ECtHR ruled against Turkey for the measures undertaken against a magazine that published confidential military information, probably gathered by a whistleblower.³⁸ In the view of the ECtHR, these measures are not only incompatible with the Convention, they also undermine freedom of expression. Moreover, the decision of the ECtHR underlined the importance of the evaluation of the public interest and general relevance of the information, regardless of its origins. Every restriction on press freedom should be exceptional and linked to an imperative social need which must be proved.

³³ The information having public social relevance falls under the right to freedom of expression, Article 21 of the Italian Constitution. See Manzini, Trattato di Diritto Penale Italiano 1019; Mantovani, Diritto Penale, Parte Speciale, Delitti contro la Persona 579.

³⁴ 1238 [15 January 2003] Tribunal of Naples.

³⁵ Fressoz and Roire v. France [1999] European Court of Human Rights. Legal summary : ‘In essence, that Article [10] left it for journalists to decide whether or not it was necessary to reproduce such documents to ensure credibility. It protected journalists’ rights to divulge information on issues of general interest provided that they were acting in good faith and on an accurate factual basis and furnished “reliable and precise” information in accordance with the ethics of journalism’.

³⁶ Art. 648 CC: ‘Except for the cases of concurring in crime, whoever purchases, receives, conceals money on things originating from any offence whatsoever, or in all cases meddles to have them purchased, received or concealed, in order to obtain an advantage for himself or others, shall be punished with imprisonment from two to eight years and a fine from 516 to 10.329 euros’.

³⁷ Marina Castellaneta, Protezione delle fonti dei giornalisti blindata da Strasburgo <<http://www.marinacastellaneta.it/blog/protezione-delle-fonti-dei-giornalisti-blindata-da-strasburgo.html>>
accessed 23 April 2015.

³⁸ Görmuş and others v. Turkey [2016] European Court of Human Rights [French].

Article 622 CC punishes alternatively the disclosure of the secret whenever it is revealed or used to gain profits, to the advantage of the author of the crime or others. The crime does not exist if the information is disclosed to someone who already has knowledge of it. The offence refers to the act of disclosure and to the omission, the latter occurring when someone allows a third party to know the confidential information, being sufficient the extension of the information beyond the number of persons entitled to know it in order to incur in the criminal offence.³⁹

Article 200, CCP, must be recalled here, the provision acknowledges the right to abstain from witnessing on facts apprehended in the exercise of the profession to a wide range of professionals, including journalists. As mentioned at the beginning of this analysis, Article 622 of the Criminal Code should be also read in conjunction with Article 200 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. While scholars agree on the theoretical distance between the ratio of the two provisions, concrete issues arise as a consequence of the decision taken at a procedural level.⁴⁰ The procedural code envisages the attribution to witnesses with specific qualification, of a duty-power not to answer to questions during the criminal hearing whenever the answer would cause the violation of the professional secret.

4. Who is a “journalist” according to the national legislation? Is it in your view a restricted definition for the purpose of the protection of journalistic sources? What is the scope of protection of other media actors? Is the protection of journalists’ sources extended to anyone else?

4.1 The Definition of Journalist

The Italian legal system does not provide a simple and sole definition of who is a journalist. The provisions on the topic create a system of definitions reciprocally linked, in most cases confusing or contradictory, which need to be coordinated. In order to build a definition of “journalist” the research should examine both legal provisions and self-regulatory mechanisms, having in mind the constitutional guarantees. Furthermore, the identification of a satisfactory definition has to consider also the reality of an evolving profession, as well as the definition of journalism itself. There is a methodological and logical difficulty in building the system of definitions, due to the fatal obsolescence, and consequential inefficacy, of the tools that can be used, which are dated back to the sixties, decades before the social media revolution.

³⁹ Lago, Art. 622, in Comm. Dolcini, Marinucci, Parte Speciale (2006) 4397; Mutti, Segreto Professionale 129.

⁴⁰ The ratio of Art. 200 was identified in the free exercise of professions directed to satisfy fundamental constitutional interests, which imply privacy instances.

As already explained at the beginning of this report, the main guarantee of freedom of expression in the Italian legislation is Article 21 of the Constitution, which refers mainly to the press and journalists.

4.1.2 The Definition Provided by the Law no. 69 of 1963: professional journalists and publicists

To assert that journalists are the ones who professionally carry out journalism would rightly seem tautological, but this is the case. Law no. 69 of 1963 established the Association of Journalists, explicitly referring to the figure of journalist in order to give a definition of it. Article 1 introduces the dichotomy between 'professional journalists and publicists'. Accordingly, a professional journalist 'exercises exclusively and continuously the profession of journalist'; while a publicist 'practice the journalistic activity not occasionally and upon payment, even though they exercise other professions or jobs'. Both the mentioned figures of journalists have to be registered in the professional order.

To better understand the real impact of this legislation, it would be helpful to explain how individuals can gain the title of journalist, whether professional or publicists. As prescribed by the abovementioned law, the Association has the power to control the iter to be followed: in order to obtain the license as publicists, it is required to work for a period of two years, upon payment, and to write a fixed number of articles for a legally registered newspaper, with a certain frequency. Once the candidate obtains the license, he/she can enter an exam to become a professional journalist. The law created a system in which journalists are members of a closed order, which is divided into two main categories. The division is made on the basis of an exam, which does not deem seniority, nor years of experience or the position covered within the editorial staff of a newspaper.⁴¹

The difference between the two categories of journalists is relevant to the research theme, since professional journalists benefit of a broader protection of their sources than publicists. Indeed, Article 200 of the CCP⁴² provides limitations to the disclosure of sources only for professionals, while publicists can only rely on the guarantee and the duty affirmed by the third paragraph of Article 2, of the Law no 69 of 1963⁴³.

⁴¹ Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court equalised the main part of two classes' powers, during the years; it is remarkable the judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 98 of 1968 which recognized to the freelancer the possibility to cover also the position of managing director.

⁴² The Criminal Procedure reform provided by Law no. 81 of 1987 extended the right to abstain from witnessing, also to other categories of professional workers, than the ones identified in paragraph 1:

'The provisions referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 shall apply to professional journalists registered in their professional association, exclusively to the names of the person from whom they obtained confidential information while practicing the profession. If the information is essential to prove that the offence being prosecuted has been committed and its truthfulness may be ascertained only by identifying the source of information the judge shall order to the journalists to disclose its source.'

4.1.4 The Definition Provided by Case-Law

The definition is not exhaustive, yet, indeed, it is useful to examine the case-law, in order to highlight the real implementation of the mentioned provisions. It is not possible to build a system of definitions basing it exclusively on the possession of a press card or the enrolment in a professional registry. An explicit definition is needed in order to better understand and complete the drawing of semantic boundaries, to find where the legislation must be corrected and implemented, to know the risks connected with a revision, and finally to enforce the protection of journalistic sources at a higher level.

During the debate on a labour case, by delivering the judgment no. 1827 of 1995, the Italian Supreme Court of Cassation affirmed that:

'Journalistic activity' is meant as an intellectual performance in order to gather, comment and elaborate news aimed to be the object of an interpersonal communication through the means of mass communication. Therefore, the journalist is a mediator between the fact and the dissemination of it [...], the difference with other professions is the promptness of information directed to stimulate citizens to be aware of important issues'.

The definition, as drawn by the Court, included journalism in the genus of intellectual activities, which aims to disseminate news and information, and identified it as a particular species, whose peculiarities are the promptness of information and the purpose of cultural stimulation. The combination of this definition with the disposition of Article 45 of the Law no. 69 of 1963, which prohibits anyone to use the title of journalist without being registered in the professional association, referring also to Articles 348⁴⁴ and 498⁴⁵ CC, provides the basis to build up a final definition of journalist. The journalist would be a professional figure in the broader sense who spreads its knowledge quickly, acting as a mediator between the facts and the audience, irrespectively of the qualification as publicist, gained after an apprenticeship, or professional in the strict sense, a status obtained by passing an exam. Clearly, there are two elements which are only partially coincident: one described by the legal provision, in which the discriminating factors are the legal thresholds, and the other one referred to reality, in which journalists' peculiarities can be distinguished on the ground of their actual activity.

⁴³ Art. 2, Law no 63 (Organisation of the Journalistic Profession) 1969 [Ordinamento della Professione di Giornalista] "Journalists and editors are obliged to respect the professional secret on the source of information, when this is required by the confidential character of it".

⁴⁴ "Whoever unlawfully exercises a profession, for which a special authorization of the State is required, shall be punished with imprisonment up to six months or with a fine from EUR 103 to EUR 516."

⁴⁵ "Whoever, apart from cases envisaged by Article 497-ter illegally holds public uniform or distinctive signs of an office or public employment, or a political body, administrative or judicial, or a profession for which a special authorization of the State is required, or improperly wears clerical garb in public, shall be punished with fine from 150 to 929 Euros."

The sanctions are applied to anyone who arrogates dignity or academic degrees, titles, decorations or other public honorary insignia, ie qualities inherent to any of the offices, jobs or professions, indicated in the earlier provision. For violations referred to in this Article shall apply the sanction of the publication of the measure ensures that the violations in the manner established by art. 36 and do not qualify for reduced payment provisions of art. 16 of the Law 24 November 1981 no. 689."

4.1.3 The Definition of Journalist at European Level

Indeed, it is appropriate to compare this notion with the one provided by the Recommendation No. R (2000) 7. Rightly, the Council of Europe clarifies the term “journalist” as subject to the protection of sources. Firstly, the appendix to this recommendation “Principles concerning the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information” illustrates at the letter a of Definitions section that, for the purposes of this Recommendation, ‘the term “journalist” means any natural or legal person who is regularly or professionally engaged in the collection and dissemination of information to the public via any mean of mass communication’. Point 11 (a) of the Explanatory Memorandum to the Recommendation provides that ‘it is generally understood that the right to freedom of expression implies free access to the journalistic profession, i.e. the absence of the requirement of an official admission by state organs or administrations.’ The Recommendation cites also the Recommendation No. R (96) 4 on the protection of journalists in situations of conflict and tension, which have the same ratio, a fortiori “in situations of conflict and tension”,⁴⁶ and also the Resolution No. 2 on Journalistic Freedoms and Human Rights by the 4th European Ministerial Conference on Mass Media Policy (Prague, 1994) that in Principle 3 (a) specifies the importance of an ‘unrestricted access to the journalistic profession’ for ‘journalism to contribute to the maintenance and development of genuine democracy.’ Looking also at the Goodwin case,⁴⁷ it should be noticed that the ECtHR defined Mr Goodwin as a journalist because he had been employed for three months within the editorial staff of a newspaper, even though he was just a trainee.

4.2 The Protection of Journalistic Sources Accorded to Professional Journalists and Publicists

Referring back to the Italian legal system, a particular attention should be paid on the free access to journalism, which is meant not only in the sense of freedom to start the journalistic career, but mostly as an extension of the protection accorded to professional journalists and their sources to everyone who practice journalism.

The original aim of the law founding the Association of Journalists was to protect the profession from abuses, and to constitute a status/shield that has fostered a professionalisation of media operators, which can be actually considered a prerequisite for the social, cultural and democratic development. There is no need to invoke the risks of a completely independent self-regulation of information, even for an advanced society. These risks are actual, since the social media evolution allowed an anarchy that has been producing an inflation of news and comments, whose truthfulness and accountability is too often hard to ensure.

⁴⁶ Indeed, it is clear that in situations hard for the intrinsic existence of democracy, these guarantee must be even more protected: a further confirmation of their social value.

⁴⁷ Goodwin c. United Kingdom [1996] European Court of Human Rights [English].

In order to achieve free access to journalism, a lot of prerogatives reserved for professionals were constitutionally extended to freelancers,⁴⁸ and there is a long history of case-law that requires the same contract as for journalists also to their employment relations. Furthermore, it appears logically inexplicable a real distinction de facto (de jure, as said, it is clear) between who has the title of “publicist” and who, simply, carries out an activity that may coincide to the definition of journalism made by the Italian Supreme Court of Cassation. The inconsistency between the legal truth and the real exercising of journalism is at this point irreconcilable. Moreover, the picture is complicated considering those parallel phenomena to journalism, like blogging or citizen journalism which are avoided or even openly ostracized.

The Riolo case⁴⁹ confirms the urgency of the problem. This relevant case had many consequences in the matter of equal balancing of interests in prosecuting defamation, and - more generally - for the implementation of Article 10, ECHR. Furthermore, it highlighted that the journalistic activity must be protected itself, without strict boundaries as the ones provided by the Italian system. Although Mr. Riolo is not a journalist regularly enrolled in the professional association, the fact that he wrote articles published on a newspaper was evaluated by the Court as a sufficient threshold to extend the protection on his activity, considered as journalistic.⁵⁰

For all these reasons, it is easy to understand the necessity to support the need to reform this closed system, also considering the legitimate fear for the consequences of de-professionalisation. As a matter of fact, the legal system as described so far is totally inefficient in containing the inflation of information, since it is sufficient to report and comment news to invoke the right to freedom of expression, without declaring oneself a journalist to remain in the legal boundaries. The Law no. 69 of 1963 did not established structures able to systematically control the truthfulness and accountability of the news or the validity of online means of mass communication. The efficacy of safeguards projected for the sixties is null and void for the millennials' necessities. Rather than unconditionally attack everyone who spreads news, it would be logical to distinguish rationally and legally the ones who propagate false or purposefully incorrect contents, from the one who, even in an amorous way, disseminate and comment real news. It would even be convenient to create and structure a semi-professional regime like the freelancer one: citizen journalism is a reality which cannot be ignored anymore.

Currently, the law is simply harmful, rather than a safeguard; in Italy, there is no protection of sources for who practices journalism without falling into the categories set out by the law, nor for anyone else, or any assurance from being acquitted if sued for defamation, even if the reported news corresponds to the truth. It is unequivocal the need to rethink an outdated system, ensuring the real and free access to journalism and its attached guarantees, being - on the other side - aware of the risks of de-professionalisation.

⁴⁸ 98 [1968] Constitutional Court [Italian]. It allowed to become newspaper managing directors also to publicists.

⁴⁹ Riolo c. Italy [2008] European Court of Human Rights [English].

⁵⁰ Marina Castellaneta, Libertà di stampa nel diritto internazionale ed europeo (Cacucci Editore, 2012) [Italian].

5. What are the legal safeguards for the protection of journalistic sources? How are the laws implemented? How are the legal safeguards combined with self-regulatory mechanisms?

5.1 The Legal Safeguards on the Protection of Journalistic Sources

In the Italian legal system, the protection of journalistic sources is guaranteed on two different grounds: in the framework of criminal proceedings (Articles 200-205 CCP), and within the special protection accorded by the Law no. 69 of 1963 to the sources themselves, which seems to assign to journalists more of a duty than an entitlement of non-disclosure, enforcing it with administrative deterrents. That basic dichotomy of fields of application – whom is related a dichotomy of sanctioning methods – has the most important impact on the effective application of the protection. Therefore, only practical approach can clarify what are the legal safeguards, how the law is implemented, how the State tangibly operates.

5.2 The Implementation of the Laws

It is appropriate to analyse the case-law in its most meaningful tendency. As already mentioned, the most relevant field of application of the protection of the sources derives from the Code of Criminal Procedure. Summarising, Article 200 CCP prescribes that a judge can order the disclosure of sources only to a professional journalist,⁵¹ if this information is indispensable in order to prove the crime and its veracity can be ascertained only through the identification of the sources. It is already clear a key safeguard: only a judge can order the disclosure, in order to prevent arbitrary decisions which could be made by the prosecution, and to grant the right to defense in contradictory. Indeed, in front of a motion filed by the prosecutor, the defendant can oppose. Furthermore, the case-law established that the necessity has to be verified on the published news, in the sense that it must be present the urgency to ensure the truthfulness of the news, since it is a tool of last resort to prove the crime. This tendency was introduced by the District judge of Rome with the decision of 21 February of 1994 and reaffirmed, among others, by the Court of First Instance in Alba.⁵² The latter clearly specifies the two thresholds: the information provided by the source is necessary to prove the crime; and the veracity of the information can be ensured only through disclosure.⁵³

The respect of the rules established for criminal proceedings is necessary to ensure the protection of journalistic sources, as reaffirmed by many judgments of the Supreme Court. A lot of cases concern to the seizure of sensitive devices, to which the protection is extended when the information protected by the professional secret is stored there. However, Article 256 of the CCP requires the formal opposition of the secret in case of order of seizure or search warrant, through the exhibition of documents.⁵⁴ Beyond the necessary link between the seized object and the facts under investigation, the case-law has affirmed the necessary observance of the procedural iter (exhibition order – opposition of the secret – controls and examinations – eventual seizure), provided to grant the professional secret of journalists. This principle and the necessity to balance the right of non-disclosure with the procedural demands is further confirmed by the judgment no. 48587 of 2011 of the Supreme Court. The protection granted by Article 200 is also applicable to any kind of information acquired by the prosecutor through interrogations, according to Article 362 CCP.

⁵¹ Professional journalists enjoy the protection provided by the Code on Criminal Procedure. Unlike, publicists are protected exclusively by Law no. 69 of 1963.

⁵² The registration to judicial authority no 601/2000 of 21 January 2001.

⁵³ Franco Abruzzo, Il segreto professionale dei giornalisti [2003].

The judgment no. 22397 of 2004 by the Supreme Criminal Court, VI section is crucial to better understand the scope of legislation. The Supreme Court implemented the provision⁵⁵ of Article 200, CCP which provides protection only on the disclosure of the name, through an extension also to 'any information capable to reveal the identity of the source'. This means that the professional secret covers largely any type of disclosure and protects journalists from breaching their right in any way, even indirectly. The integration definitely strengthened the protection, finally allowing a broader application of a safeguard also recognised at the international level by the ECtHR.

Every time the disclosure of a source becomes necessary for the proceeding to continue, Articles 200-205, CCP act as a reservation clauses, enacting a cornerstone system in order to ensure the protection of journalistic sources. This kind of references operates for the inner coherence of the whole set of rules and it avoids legal safeguards to be bypassed.

5.3 Legal Safeguards and Self-Regulatory Mechanisms

Nevertheless, it is evident that the relation between the legislation and the self-regulatory mechanism can be dangerously asymmetrical. Firstly, it is appropriate to remember that the main journalistic institution, the Association of Journalists, has been established by the national Law no. 69 of 1963, which created the mechanisms of self-regulation, including the dichotomy professional/publicist, the organisation of the association, the basic ethics and sanctions. There is an inevitably original hybrid nature, which has its influence: established by a national law, the Association of Journalist is a professional organization of individuals, which operates on the base of a set of rules established by the Association itself. Obviously, it has operated as a formal independent institution during the years, but without the flexibility indispensable to adapt itself to the new needs of an evolving profession. The legal safeguards resulting from the application of the laws have to be coordinated with the rules provided by the Association, which often integrates them or obliges the interpreter to meditate to rebuild an organic system.

⁵⁴ 144 [1997] Supreme Court of Cassation, II section [Italian].

⁵⁵ In the Italian system Courts do not have the power to create law, nor to amend the legislation; nothing similar to stare decisis exists. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has a principal authority in the interpretation of laws. This phenomenon is even more incisive when the legislator lack of authority is more acute.

As said, the self-regulatory system provides more of a sources oriented protection rather than a right of non-disclosure for journalists. It is clear from the mentioned law,⁵⁶ but also from the Charter of Journalists, a code of ethics, entered into force in 1993, which affirms, under the title “Sources”, that: ‘When the sources request for non-disclosure, the journalist has the duty to respect the professional secret and shall inform the readers of that peculiar circumstance.’

This duty/right of journalists binds both professional and publicists, without any distinction. It produces the main asymmetry from the legislation, since the protection granted by Article 200-205 CCP is reserved only to the professional. Whereas a publicist has the duty to protect his/her sources in the case of a trustworthy relation, in order not to incur in the penalties provided by Article 48 of Law no. 69 of 1963, he/she must disclose the identity of the sources during the trial. The results are even more paradoxical if a publicist and a professional are coauthors of an article where information provided by a secret source is published: on the ethics and self-regulatory ground neither of them must disclose the identity of the source; whilst during a proceeding the publicist has the duty to disclose the sources in any case, when required by a judge.

Article 622 CC and Article 48 of Law no. 69 of 1963 provide penalties for the violation of the professional secrecy by the journalists. The first operates as a stricter legal safeguard, establishing two types of punishments (fine from 30 to 516 euros or detention until 1 year). On the other side, Article 48, Law no. 69 of 1963, inflicts a disciplinary sanction, which produces consequences mainly in the field of the exercise of the profession. Accordingly, the disciplinary sanctioning procedure can be started by the Regional or Interregional Office or by the general prosecutor competent pursuant to Article 44; if the journalist’s responsibility is ascertained the sanctions provided by Article 51 of Law no. 69 of 1963 are: the warning; the censure; the suspension from the exercise of the profession for a period between two months and one year or the expulsion from the association.

If Article 622 would not apply to the secret of journalists, a precious safeguard would be lost, and the only deterrence to prevent violations of the journalists’ duty would be the administrative sanction. In that case, the role of self-regulatory mechanisms is evident: they intervene to cover a loophole in the legislation concerning ethical violations, under the authorisation of a State-law, in a contradictory framework that protects sources discontinuously.

⁵⁶ Art. 2, para 3, Law no 63 (Organisation of the Journalistic Profession) 1969 [Ordinamento della Professione di Giornalista]

6. In the Respective National Legislation, are the Limits of Non-Disclosure of the Information in Line with the Principles of the Recommendation No R (2000)7? What are the Procedures Applied? Is the Disclosure Limited to Exceptional Circumstances, Taking into Consideration Vital Public or Individual Interests at Stake? Do the Authorities First Search for and Apply Alternative Measures, which Adequately Protect their Respective Rights and Interests and at the Same Time are Less Intrusive with Regard to the Right of Journalists not to Disclose Information?

In the Italian legal system the limits of non-disclosure of the information are formally in line with the principles of the Recommendation No R (2000)7. A proof of this statement is the fact that Article 10 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, which provides an explicit and clear protection on the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source, is well integrated into the Italian domestic law. Integration of this article in the domestic law is an explicit requirement of the Recommendation No R (2000)7, which in its first principle states that:

*'Domestic law and practice in member states should provide for explicit and clear protection of the right of journalists not to disclose information identifying a source in accordance with Article 10 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms [...].'*⁵⁷

Due to the importance of the information released by media, which can be immediately transmitted on a global level thanks to the internet, in order to protect the confidentiality of journalistic sources the national legislation shall provide accessible, precise and predictable protection for whom is taking the risk to communicate any type of information and for the journalists that are receiving and disseminating them. Furthermore, it is in the interest of journalists and their sources, but also of public authorities, to have a clear and precise legislation on the topic. These standards should be based on Article 10, ECHR, as interpreted by the ECtHR in its judgments, in addition to this Recommendation.

A more extensive protection of the confidentiality of journalistic sources is not excluded by the Recommendation, since the principles established in it should be considered as minimum standards for the respect of this right.⁵⁸ If a right to non-disclosure exists, journalists should have the right/duty to refuse the disclosure of information and the identification of a source, without being exposed to any responsibilities on civil or criminal grounds, or to any penalty which may be inflicted for their refusal.

⁵⁷ Recommendation No R (2000)7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states

⁵⁸ Recommendation No R (2000)7, of the Committee of Ministers to member states.

Indeed, Article 21 of the Italian Constitution, which guarantees freedom of expression and press freedom, is perfectly in line with the principle of non-disclosure. Moreover the right to non-disclose the sources is very noticeable in the balancing with the fundamental right to privacy (Data Protection Code). Article 4, paragraph 1(b) of the Legislative Decree no. 196 of 2003 defines personal data as: 'any information concerning a natural person, legal person, institution or association, identified or identifiable, even indirectly, by reference to any other information including a personal identification number'. Personal data are not only the identity and the image of an individual, but also the ID card number, the mobile number and the credit card number, the social security number, the e-mail address, the license plate, the voice, the fingerprints and so on.

With regard to the constitutional protection of the personality, scholars deployed on two opposing positions: on the one hand, the personality is protected as a unique and general right to which lead all aspects related to the human person (confidentiality, honor, decorum, the identity, the interest in the protection of personal data), on the other the autonomous consistency and protection must confer rights on individuals that contribute to tracing its outline.

On both sides, on jurisprudential level and on doctrinal level, we can see in the Article 2 of the Italian Constitution a general protection to the right of privacy.

In particular, if privacy is linked to personal freedom, this right covers two aspects: on one hand as a negative freedom, which is defined through the concept of non-interference, meaning that no one can interfere in the private sphere of the individual freedom. The aforementioned negative aspect shows a side of the right to privacy, which is the right to withhold certain information against any intrusion. On the other hand, as a positive freedom, which must be related to the power and control concepts in the sense of giving the subject the full autonomy granting him the opportunity to speak in front of others' actions which disturb, attack or falsify their lives in society.⁵⁹

Special rules are provided regarding the use of private data/information by the journalists instead. No authorisation of the Italian Data Protection Authority for the private data/information is required and the journalist who carries out actions regarding use of the private data has no obligation to obtain the consent of the person involved, even if the process concerns sensitive data.⁶⁰ This means that journalists can freely and independently create their own databases. However, at the time of gathering personal data, the journalist should be obliged to inform the person who is transmitting the information, on which personal data will be used by the journalist. The legal basis of the obligation of the journalist relies in article 13 of the Data Protection Code, even though it is a requirement certainly negligible when compared with the obligations that other kind of controllers should have on receiving personal information. Simplified forms taken by Article 2 of the Code of Ethics, which requires journalists to inform the person on his role as source of the information, to communicate only 'their own identity, their profession and the purposes of the collection of the data and dispensing them from the obligation to provide all other elements as described in Article 13 of the Data Protection Code. The same rule also allows journalists not to identify themselves and not to inform the person on the data collection purposes when 'this could cause any risks to the safety of the source or make it impossible to exercise the informative function'.

⁵⁹ A. Baldassarre, Diritti della persona e valori costituzionali (G. Giappichelli Editore 1997) [Italian].

⁶⁰ Art. 137, para 1 and 2 Legislative Decree No.196 (Data Protection Code) 2003 [Codice in materia di protezione dei dati personali].

The only limits that journalists meet in processing personal data concern exclusively their communication and dissemination. It is not enough that the communication and the diffusion of the information are functional to the exercise of the work of the journalist and for the exclusive use of its purposes, as it is required for other types of treatment.

According to Article 137, paragraph 3 of the Data Protection Code, the communication and dissemination of personal data meet 'the limitations imposed on freedom of the press to protect the rights as per Article 2, in particular concerning materiality of the information with regard to facts of public interest, shall be left unprejudiced'. It means that the dissemination of personal data, particularly the identity and the image of the person, must meet the traditional requirements on which freedom of the press is based. Consequently, in addition to being accurate and truthful, the dissemination of personal data must meet a real need for the interest of the public audience.

As matter of fact, if the disclosure is limited to exceptional circumstances, our legal system establishes some restrictions to the right to non-disclosure when it counteracts with the public interest in the administration of justice and in the repression of crimes.

The same criteria is also expressed by Article 10, paragraph 2, ECHR:⁶¹ when public security issues or situations that can be dangerous for the country or the Constitutional system arise exceptional measures shall be undertaken.

Therefore, as the right to freedom of expression is subjected to the respect of public order, the secrecy of the source of the information is not an absolute principle, as it seems. Indeed, Article 200 CCP demonstrates the relationship between the obligation to give evidence in front of the judge and the professional secrecy that the journalist may invoke on the names of the sources of the confidential information.⁶² However, if the information are essential to prove a crime and their veracity can be ascertained only through the identification of the source who has provided the confidential information, the judge can order to the journalist to reveal the his source of information. Thus, the professional secrecy can be removed with an order from the judge exclusively when meeting the following requirements: a) the information that comes from a ⁶¹ Art.10, para 2 [4 November 1950] Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedom: 'The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary'.

⁶² Art.200, Code of Criminal Procedure.

trusted source is essential for the evidence of the crime; b) the veracity of the information can be determined by the identification of the source.

These are the major aspects that the Italian legal system provide concerning the disclosure of information, taking into consideration the rights and the interests of the institutions and of the journalists.

7. In the Recommendation No R (2000) 7, the Following Principles Should be Respected when the Necessity of Disclosure is Stated: Absence of Reasonable Alternative Measures, Outweighing Legitimate Interest (Protection of Human Life, Prevention of Major Crime, Defense of a Person Accused or Convicted of Having Committed a Major Crime). Under which Criteria can the Interest in the Disclosure Outweigh the Interest in the Non-Disclosure?

The identification of the criteria under which the interest in the disclosure outweighs the interest in the non-disclosure requires a careful analysis of national case-law and legislation. At the outset, the Italian legal system sets the right of the journalists not to disclose their sources as a fundamental right, warranted by the recall of Article 10 of the ECHR,⁶³ as well as by Article 21 of the Italian Constitution,⁶⁴ which recognises the right to freedom of expression and freedom of the press.⁶⁵

The essential nature of this right entails the recognition of its inviolability, thus it can be limited exclusively in the case it counteracts with other fundamental rights, which are considered as prevalent in a specific circumstance. The evaluation of prevalence identifies the legitimate exceptions to the right to non-disclosure and it is carried out with a judgment of weighting or balancing, in order to overcome the absence of a hierarchy of fundamental rights.⁶⁶ The judgment of balancing is based on the criterion of the ordinary prevalence of the right to non-

⁶³ 1418 [1989] Supreme Court of Cassation, Criminal chamber, Rivista internazionale dei diritti dell'uomo [1990] 419 [Italian]; 6672 [1998] Supreme Court of Cassation, Civil chamber, Rivista italiana di Diritto Pubblico Comunitario [1998] 1380 [Italian].

⁶⁴ According to which 'The right of journalists not to disclose their source is part of their right to freedom of expression under Article 10 of the Convention'. See also Explanatory Memorandum to Recommendation no. R (2000) 7, Principle 1, Right of non-disclosure of journalists, paragraph 21.

⁶⁵ 31735 [2014] Supreme Court of Cassation, IV Criminal chamber [Italian] '...the national legal system guarantees the professional confidentiality (of journalists) not as a personal privilege, but as a fundamental defence of information activities, that must be free and unreserved'.

⁶⁶ R. Bin, Diritti e argomenti. Il bilanciamento degli interessi nella giurisprudenza costituzionale (Giuffrè 1992) 337 [Italian]; U. Natoli, Conflitto di diritti [1998] Digesto Discipline Privatistiche - Sez. civile, III, 447, 451 [Italian]; G. Pino, Teoria e pratica del bilanciamento: tra libertà di manifestazione del pensiero e tutela dell'identità personale [2003] Danno e Responsabilità 527 [Italian].

disclosure, therefore the restraints on the same right are entirely exceptional even on the domestic level.⁶⁷

7.1. Balancing with the Right to Privacy

The prevalence of the right to non-disclosure of journalistic sources is particularly noticeable in the balancing with the fundamental right to privacy.⁶⁸

The right to privacy is currently regulated by the Legislative Decree no. 196 of 2003, also known as the Privacy Code, which regulates the activity of processing personal data and provides certain rights to those whom such data relate. The legislation also recognises to the interested parties the right to obtain the indication ‘[...]of the source of the personal data...’⁶⁹ by the data controller, i.e. the source of the news disclosed.

Therefore, in a comparison between an individual’s right to the knowledge of the source (functional to the protection of privacy) and the right and duty of journalists to keep their sources confidential, the Italian law considered the latter clearly prevalent, expressly providing in the Privacy Law, that in the case of request about the origin of personal data under Article 7, paragraph 2, letter a) remain firm the rules on journalists’ professional secrecy, with reference to the sources of the news.⁷⁰ Accordingly, even in the case of a legitimate request by a private individual to know the source of their personal data, a journalist maintains the full right not to disclose those sources,⁷¹ without incurring in any criminal or disciplinary sanction.

7.2. Balancing with the Public Interest in the Administration of Justice and in the Repression of Crimes

On the other hand, the Italian legal system establishes some limited restrictions to the right to non-disclosure when such a right counteracts with the public interest in the administration of justice and in the repression of crimes.

⁶⁷ In accordance with Recommendation no. R (2000) 7, Principle 3, Limits to the right of non-disclosure. See also Explanatory Memorandum to Recommendation no. R (2000) 7, Principles 3, letter a), paragraph 28 ‘The disclosure of information identifying the source should therefore be limited to exceptional circumstances where vital public or individual interests are at stake and can be convincingly established’ (see Goodwin v. the United Kingdom [1996] ECtHR para. 37).

⁶⁸ The right to privacy is acknowledged in Articles 14, 15 and 21 of the Italian Constitution (respectively concerning the domicile, the secrecy of correspondence and freedom of expression), as well as in Article 8 of ECHR, Article 8 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and in the EU Directives no.95/46/EC and no.2002/58/EC.

⁶⁹ Article 7, para 2(a) Legislative Decree no. 196 (Data Protection Code) 2003 [Codice in materia di protezione dei dati personali]. The Article also provides the right to update, change or rectify data and the right to deny their use.

⁷⁰ See the repealed Law no 675 (Privacy Law) 1996 [Legge sulla Privacy] Article 13, para 5, which provided ‘The provision on the professional secrecy of those exercising the journalist profession shall apply, limited to the source of information’.

⁷¹ Although the protection of human life, to which the right to privacy relates, is included in the list referred to Article 10, para 2 of the Convention.

Firstly, the exceptions provided by the law are all formally legitimate and are also in compliance with the protection of interests included in the mandatory list referred to in Article 10, paragraph 2, ECHR. Furthermore, any restriction can be imposed exclusively by a Court, as stated in the Convention.⁷² The criteria for balancing between the right to non-disclose and the interest in the administration of justice are identified in the following Articles: Article 200, paragraph 1-3; Article 256, paragraph 2; Article 271, paragraph 2 and Article 362, CCP.⁷³

Article 200 CCP is the cornerstone of the system and it regulates the relationship between the duty to testify in criminal proceeding (prescribed in Article 198 CCP) and the professional secrecy, which is recognised also to journalists when they collect confidential information in the exercise of their profession.⁷⁴ This general rule⁷⁵ is limited by the second paragraph, which provides: 'If the information is essential to prove that the offence being prosecuted has been committed and its truthfulness may be ascertained only by identifying the source of information the judge shall order to the journalists to disclose its source.' This provision sets out the conditions under which the interest in the repression of crime outweighs the interest in the non-disclosure of sources, thus stated the necessity of their revelation. These conditions are:

- the uncertain authenticity of the news (implicit requirement);
- the indispensability of the news for the evidence of crime;
- the impossibility to verify the authenticity of the information with other instruments than the identification of its source (procedural requirement).

Rebus sic stantibus, for the lawful imposition of the disclosure of sources 'it is not enough the simply nexus of "pertinence" between the news and the general theme of the investigation, but it is also necessary that the interference with the protection of sources represents the extrema ratio to achieve the evidence necessary to prove the crime'.⁷⁶ Instead, the disclosure of sources must be excluded whenever the assessment of the crime can be based on other evidences and/or the veracity of the news can be ascertained with alternative instruments (eg, consultation of documents, spot checks, etc.).

⁷² Recommendation no. R (2000) 7, Principles 5, Conditions concerning disclosures. See also Explanatory Memorandum to Recommendation no. R (2000) 7, Principle 3 (a), paragraph 24; Goodwin v. the UK [1996] ECtHR, para. 31.

⁷³ Ex multis, Paolozzi G., Saracino N.G., Tutela Processuale del Segreto [1992], Enciclopedia Giuridica Treccani, XXVIII 4; Abruzzo, Il Segreto Professionale dei Giornalisti [2013]; Calderone R.C., Segreto del Giornalista ed Essenzialità della Giustizia [1986], Quaderni Giustizia, 58, 27; Gregori G., Informazione e Segreto professionale: Tutela del Giornalista e del Cittadino [1984], Diritto Radiodiffusioni, 505; Pisa P., Il «Segreto Giornalistico» nel Processo Penale: Spazi Stretti per una Prospettiva di Riforma [1982], Rivista italiana Diritto e Procedura Penale, 291; Conso G., Il Segreto Giornalistico dopo la Sentenza della Corte Costituzionale (Nota a Corte costit., 28 gennaio 1981, n. 1, Massa) [1981], Giurisprudenza costituzionale, I 8.

⁷⁴ Article 362 CCP extends the scope of the provision to the gathering of information by the public prosecutor during the preliminary investigation. With reference to the case-law of the Article see further Section no. 7.2.1.

⁷⁵ Which excludes the criminal responsibility of journalists for crimes of perjury or false information to the public prosecutor -provided by Articles 374 and 371 of the Criminal Code- whenever the refusal relates to the disclosure of the news's sources.

⁷⁶ 31735 [2014] Supreme Court, VI criminal chamber [Italian].

The aforementioned provision outlines a judgment of balancing in compliance with the principles of the ECHR, which evaluates the actual prevalence of the interest, the suitability of the source's disclosure to preserve the prevalent right and the lack of alternative measures to ensure an equivalent protection.⁷⁷ The only deviation from the conventional rules is the lack of provision on the right of journalist to be informed about its right to refuse to witness,⁷⁸ an exclusion which is set by the Italian law and also confirmed by national case-law.⁷⁹

Similar remarks may be carried out about Article 256, CCP which – still balancing the procedural requirements to testing with the protection of the confidentiality of sources – sets out the relationship between the duty of exhibition and the professional secrecy. According to this article, professionals identified in articles 200 and 201, including journalists, can legitimately oppose to the order to exhibit documents if 'if they declare in writing that they are covered by either State, public service or professional secrecy'. This general rule can be waived within the limits specified in the second paragraph, according to which, if the declaration covers a professional secret, 'If the declaration involves a public service or professional secret, the judicial authority shall proceed with the necessary ascertainments if there are reasonable grounds to doubt about the legitimacy of the declaration and it believes it cannot proceed without gathering the documents and documentary evidence or the objects referred to in paragraph 1. If the declaration results groundless, the judge shall order the seizure.'

The abovementioned provision identifies the conditions under which the interest in the repression of crime outweighs the interest in the non-disclosure of sources. These conditions are: the reasonable uncertainty about the truthfulness of the statement and the indispensability of the acquisition for the procedural purpose.

Furthermore, the occurrence of such conditions does not simply justifies the seizure, but also legitimates the judge to carry out investigations about the truthfulness of the declaration, which must be "appropriate" (i.e. fit for the purpose). The negative outcome of those investigations, highlighting the lack of any need for protection of sources, allows the seizure by the judicial authorities.

⁷⁷ See Recommendation no. R(2000)7, Principles 4, Alternative evidence to journalists' sources; Explanatory Memorandum to Recommendation no. R (2000) 7, Principle 3 (a), paragraphs 26-27, Principles 3 (b), paragraphs 29-34, 36-38, 44-45. See also ECHR Sunday Times v. the United Kingdom (no. 2) [1991] ECtHR [English], para. 50; Fressoz and Roire v. France [1999] ECHR [English] para. 51.

⁷⁸ Recommendation no. R (2000) 7, Principles 5 (b), Conditions concerning disclosure 'Journalists should be informed by the competent authorities of their right not to disclose information identifying a source as well as of the limits of this right before a disclosure is requested'. See also Explanatory Memorandum to Recommendation no. R (2000) 7, Principles 5 (b), para 47. In the Italian legal system the Procedural duty of information not foreseen for the professional secrecy, as well as for the other secrets referred Article 200 of the Italian Code of Criminal Procedure, in the supposed knowledge of the right to abstain by the professionals (unlike the provisions on the right to abstain of the close relatives, with respect to which the duty of information is fixed by law).

⁷⁹ Biagioni, Note sul Riconoscimento del Segreto Professionale ai Giornalisti Professionisti nel Nuovo CPP 477.

As a result, with the adoption of restraint measures the Court must strictly respect the principle of proportionality between the content of the ablativ order and the needs of the procedural investigations, aiming to the minimum limitation of the personal and professional freedom of the journalist.⁸⁰ Moreover, the Courts must prove the proper exercise of their ablativ powers with an adequate motivation of the adopted measure, which concerns the existence of a link between the news and the investigative theme, the essential needs of the news for the procedural and the respect of the proportionality test.⁸¹

As a conclusion, the criteria of balancing provided by Article 256 CCP complies with the conventional prescriptions.⁸² Also the judicial enforcement of such criteria highlights the full application – even at domestic level – of the principle of proportionality and of the duty of motivation,⁸³ allowing journalists to appeal against the unlawful measures.

Finally, Article 271 of the Italian Code of Criminal Procedure should be mentioned: it sets a general prohibition on the use of interceptions 'related to conversations or communications of the persons referred to in Article 200, paragraph 1[...] if they relate to facts known on account of their function, service or profession'. This rule, which could only be derogated if 'the said persons have testified on these same facts or have disclosed them in some other way', implements the protection of journalistic sources, in accordance with the principles of conventional law.⁸⁴

7.3. Concluding Considerations

In the light of the framework briefly outlined, the national criteria under which the interest in disclosure outweighs the interest in non-disclosure reveals the attention of the Italian Authorities for the protection of journalistic sources, which complies with the provisions of the Convention, the Principles of the Recommendation No. R (2000)7 and the provisions of the Explanatory Memorandum.

However, the Italian legal system only provides procedural criteria to set out the prevalence of the rights of journalists not to disclose their sources on the interest in the repression of crimes, without considering the substantial nature of the rights infringed by the crimes. In the absence of more stringent criteria depending on the severity of the offences, the procedural rules are applied in the same way for all crimes, irrespective of the violations prosecuted. Therefore, the Courts could cover the lack of substantial balancing only partially, by evaluating the importance of the rights infringed when all the legal requirements of the disclosure are set. In any other case, those rights could not be examined, whether the criminal proceeding concerns, for example, a murder ⁸⁰Castellaneta M., Tutela delle fonti: contrarie alla Convenzione le perquisizioni nelle redazioni giornalistiche [2012] Guida al Diritto – Il Sole 24 ore, n. 31 [Italian].

⁸¹ 31735 [2014] Supreme Court of Cassation, VI criminal chamber [Italian].

⁸² See notes 21-22-23.

⁸³ Explanatory Memorandum to Recommendation no. R (2000) 7, Principles 3 (b), paragraph 30, 33, 35.

⁸⁴ Recommendation no. R (2000) 7, Principles 6, Interception of communication, surveillance and judicial search and seizure; Explanatory Memorandum to Recommendation no. R (2000) 7, Principle 5, paragraph 55.

or a tax offence. In the light of those considerations, it might be desirable to identify criteria of balancing also related to the different nature of the interests protected by the criminal law, making at least a distinction between the crimes against person and the crimes against patrimony. Finally, the rigidity of the mentioned criteria -although is able to ensure the legal certainty and the protection of journalistic sources- bounds the Courts to such rules, so that there is not, in the national case-law, any other criteria that assist the judges to rule towards disclosure of sources.

8. In the Light of the Case Law of the European Court of Human Rights, how do National Courts Apply the Respective Law with Regard to the Right to Protect Sources? In Particular, how do they Balance the Different Interests at Stake?

A careful examination of national case-law on the protection of journalistic sources is necessary in order to assess the compliance of the Italian legal system with the ECHR's principles. Indeed, the legal provisions relating to the journalists secrecy are not sufficient to ensure the effective protection of the interest in the non-disclosure of sources. The material protection of that interest rather depends on how the national courts apply such legal provisions, thus outlining the ubi consistam of the protection instruments provided for under national law

8.1. National Case-law on the Balancing with the Right to Privacy

No major problems seem to exist concerning the balancing between the right to privacy and the interest in the non-disclosure of sources, which is covered by Article 138, Privacy Code.⁸⁵ The Italian courts, as well as the Data Protection Authority,⁸⁶ constantly held that the duty to discover the sources of personal data processed may be fulfilled by the journalists in two different ways: by communicating the sources to the interested parties, or by communicating to such parties 'that the source of the information is covered by professional secrecy based on the trust relationship existing between the journalist and the source'.⁸⁷ The Data Protection Authority also clarified that the feedback received from the journalist must be in any case adequate to presumably demonstrate the lawfulness of the data acquisition and the existence of a trust relationship between the journalist and the source.⁸⁸

⁸⁵ Legislative Decree no. 196 (Data Protection Code) 2003 [Codice in materia di protezione dei dati personali].

⁸⁶ The Privacy Authority is an independent administrative authority set up by Law no. 675 (Privacy Act) 1996 [Legge sulla privacy] and currently governed by Legislative Decree no. 196 (Data Protection Code) 2003 [Codice in materia di protezione dei dati personali].

⁸⁷ Press release of Privacy Authority [2000] January 10, cit.

⁸⁸ See Privacy Authority, Bollettino 4 [24th March 1998] 50; Privacy Authority, Bollettino 8 [13th March 2008] 30.

As a result, it is possible to confirm that the Italian case-law outlines an equilibrate balance between the right to privacy and the right of the journalists not to disclose their sources, according to which:

- in the light of a legitimate private request to know the source of personal data processed, a journalist has the full right not to disclose his confidential sources;
- the acknowledgment of the right not to disclose the confidential sources does not dispense the journalist to provide an adequate response to the private request;
- the opposition of the professional secrecy relieves the journalist to disclose his/her sources only when such opposition is expressed, communicated to the interested parties and allegedly verifiable (in order to exclude spurious objections).

It follows that the right of journalists not to disclose their sources outweighs the right to privacy each time the first right exists and the existence of that right is shared with the interested parties (requirements under which the restriction of the fundamental right to privacy is lawful).

8.2 National Case-law on the Balancing with Public Interest in the Administration of Justice and the Repression of Crimes

On the other hand, the comparison between the right of journalists not to disclose their sources and the public interest in the administration of justice results more difficult.

The Italian case-law was focused on such comparison long before the adoption of any legislative act on the issue. Indeed, already in 1981,⁸⁹ the Italian Constitutional Court was recalled to decide on the exclusion of journalists from those professionals entitled to abstain from testifying under Article 351 of the former Italian Code of Criminal Procedure.⁹⁰ Particularly, three district courts⁹¹ raised a question of constitutional legitimacy of the combined provisions of Article 2 of Law no. 69 of 1963⁹² and Articles 348(2) and 351 of the former Code of Criminal Procedure,⁹³ related to the violation of Articles 3 and 21 of the Italian Constitution (respectively affirming the principle of equality and freedom of expression). Those cases highlighted that the exclusion of the right of ⁸⁹ 1 [1998] Constitutional Court [Italian].

⁹⁰ Code of Criminal Procedure (also known as Codice Rocco), adopted with Royal Decree of 19th October 1930.

⁹¹ [24th March 1976] District Judge of Cagliari [Italian]; [5th October 1976] District Judge of Rome [Italian]; [15th September 1977] District Judge of Sondrio 15 [Italian].

⁹² Law no. 69 (Organisation of the Journalistic Profession) 1963 [Ordinamento della Professione di Giornalista] Article 2, which provides the duty of journalists to keep the confidential of their sources.

⁹³ Article 348(2) CCP which provided the duty to testify in criminal proceedings, and Article 351, which identified a mandatory list of persons who were entitled to abstain from testifying, thus excluding the journalists from such guarantee.

the journalists to abstain from testifying in criminal proceedings could narrow the investigation activities, thus affecting the freedom of the press. In fact, the national legislation -while giving to journalists the option to disclose their sources (in breach of Article 2, Law no. 69 of 1963) or otherwise to be prosecuted for the criminal offence of perjury (according to Article 372 CC) - might lead the journalists not to publish a piece, as well as could lead the sources not to share their information.

The abovementioned considerations, although were not sufficient to establish a general prevalence of the interest in the non-disclosure of sources, seem to be in line with the subsequent case-law of the ECtHR, according to which:

*'[...] the protection of journalistic sources is one of the basic conditions for press freedom...without such protection, sources may be deterred from assisting the press in informing the public on matters of public interest. As a result, the vital public-watchdog role of the press may be undetermined and the ability of the press to provide accurate and reliable information may be adversely affected.'*⁹⁴

Furthermore, those considerations greatly influenced the new Italian Code of Criminal Procedure (currently in force),⁹⁵ which lays down the right of the journalists not to disclose their sources as usually dominant on the public interest in the administration of justice,⁹⁶ '...in line with the constitutional case-law [...] and with the recent case-law of the European Court of Human Rights'.⁹⁷ Nevertheless, the case-by-case evaluation involves a certain degree of discretion, which might lead to an inconsistent application of the journalists' rights.

8.2.1. Duty to Testify in Criminal Proceedings

The risk must be analysed with reference to Article 200, paragraph 3 CCP.⁹⁸ The already-mentioned disposition establishes the personal scope of the whole legal framework of journalistic secrecy,⁹⁹ limiting such scope to 'professional journalists registered in their professional registry'. By applying this general rule, the national courts have strictly and literally interpreted the concept of "professional journalist",¹⁰⁰ thereby excluding publicists, trainees, those who are ⁹⁴ Goodwin v. the UK [1996] ECtHR para 39. See, ex multis, also, Roemen e Schmit v. Luxembourg [2003] ECHR [English]; ECHR, Martin v. France [2012] 20th March [English]; Görmüş and others v. Turkey [2016] ECtHR [French].

⁹⁵ Code of Criminal Procedure [1988] adopted with Royal Decree no. 447, effective from 24th October 1989.

⁹⁶ Articles 200 (1-3), 256(2), 271(2) and 362 CCP provide only exceptional restraints on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources and entrust to the courts, as independent and impartial bodies, the case-by-case evaluation of such legal exceptions. For a deeper analysis see Section no. 6.2.

⁹⁷ M. Cuniberti, B. Lamarque, B. Tonoletti, G.E. Vigevani, M.P. Viviani Schlein, Percorsi di diritto dell'informazione (3rd edn, Giappichelli, 2011) 218 [Italian].

⁹⁸ Italian Code of Criminal Procedure, Article 200, para 3 (Professional secrecy) [Segreto professionale]. It should be noted that the following considerations could be entirely applied with reference to the Article 362 CCP, which extends the right of the journalists to refuse to give evidence to the request of information from the Prosecutor.

⁹⁹ According to the reference provided by Articles 256(2), 271(2) and 362 CCP, which all establish their personal scope relating to "...the persons referred to in Article 200 CCP".

¹⁰⁰ While adopting a subjective interpretation, also known as "functionalist". See C. Esposito, La libertà di manifestazione del pensiero nell'ordinamento italiano (Giuffrè 1958) 9 [Italian].

enrolled in the special lists referred to in Article 28, Law no. 69 of 1963 and more generally, anyone who objectively works as journalist (even not professionally or continuously).¹⁰¹

Such strict and subjective interpretation counteracts, however, with the settled case-law of the ECtHR, which ensured an objective and extensive interpretation of the concept of “journalist”, including but not limited to the “professional journalists” as intended by the Italian courts.¹⁰² According to the European case-law, the subjective scope of the right of the journalists not to disclose their sources exists whenever is found an objective link between the information activities and the need to protect the sources.¹⁰³

A revision of the settled case-law became increasingly necessary in order to ensure its compliance with ECHR standards, especially in view of new judicial practices, which exploit the subjective limits of the journalists' secrecy to avoid the legal protection of the sources. For example, the Italian courts sometimes order to produce the documents covered by the professional secrecy directly against the publishing or the broadcasting companies, which hold the materials required for the identification of the sources but cannot refuse to obey such order by opposing the professional secrecy. This practice has been recently adopted by the Public Prosecutor of Rome, which seized a video submitted by an Italian television network directly against the broadcasting companies. More specifically, such video contained the report of an Italian journalist that interviewed an anonymous policeman who deplored the inadequacy of the Italian anti-terrorism protection system. Therefore, the seizure was finalised to identify the policeman (i.e. the source of the information disclosed), by bypassing the right of the journalist not to disclose his sources.¹⁰⁴ Similar practices allow an indirect identification of the journalists' sources, counteracting with the ECHR's standards and involves the risk to “gag the journalists”, compromising the fundamental activities of the press.

Unlike, surely in compliance with the ECtHR judgments are the interpretation of the material scope¹⁰⁵ and of the limits of the right concerned.¹⁰⁶

¹⁰¹*Id est* foreign journalists and director of periodical journal on technical, professional or scientific issues, and also occasional employees, freelancer, blogger etc.

¹⁰²See Goodwin c. United Kingdom [1996] ECtHR which recognized the right not to disclose a source to the “journalist stagier” William Goodwin, who worked in a journal for only three months.

¹⁰³See De Haes e Gijssels c. Belgium [1997] ECtHR [English], which applied Article 10 of ECHR to an employee of a journal, even if he was not a journalist and due to his simple knowledge of the sources (acquired during the exercise of his job).

¹⁰⁴Prosecutor of Rome, order for seizure of 12th January 2016. The video, which contains a journalistic services of Antonino Monteleone, was submitted on 26th November 2015 by the television network La7, during the television programme Piazzapulita. Similar orders of seizure have been previously disposed against the television network Rai (related to a video submitted during the television programme Ballarò), as well as against the publishing companies Il Fatto o Il Corriere della Sera (related to some published interception).

¹⁰⁵The Italian Courts adopted an extensive and teleological interpretation of Article 200(3) CCP, thereby extending the field of its application according to the ECtHR standards. See, ex multis, 22397[2004] Supreme Court of Cassation, VI criminal chamber [Italian], according to which the professional secrecy concerns not only 'the name

8.2.2. Searches and Seizures

More complex issues are involved in the application of the judicial measures which could directly affect the confidentiality of the sources, such as searches, seizures or interception of communications. With specific regard to Article 256, paragraph 2, CCP¹⁰⁷ the courts established the general prohibition of search and seizure, which are unlawful whenever finalized to discover the sources of information. Therefore, the courts must strictly respect the principle of proportionality between the content of the ablativo order and the needs of the procedural investigations, and must prove the proper exercise of their ablativo powers with an adequate motivation of the measures adopted.¹⁰⁸

On this point, the decision no. 31735, 2014 of the Italian Supreme Court is exemplary.¹⁰⁹ The judgment concerned the lawfulness of the seizure order adopted against a journalist by the Prosecutor of the Court of Reggio Calabria, which established the confiscation of many professional goods, including personal computer, note-book, DVDs, pen-drives, smartphones, MP3 players and recorders. Such seizure was adopted in a criminal proceedings against persons unknown for the crimes referred to in Articles 416-bis and 326, CC¹¹⁰ and in Article 7 of the Law no. 203 of 1991¹¹¹ (relating to the disclosure of public documents covered by secret of office) and that no criminal charges was brought against the journalist, not even for concurrency. The mentioned seizure, confirmed by the Court of Reggio Calabria, was therefore challenged by the journalist for the violation of Articles 252, 253, 370, 256 e 200, CCP and of Article 10, ECHR.

The Supreme Court, recalling the ECtHR and national case-law,¹¹² upheld the appeal and clarified that the seizure order adopted by the Court of Reggio Calabria was unlawful, for the failure to previously identify the object of the ablativo measure and to prove the link existing *of the persons which provide confidential information to the journalists' but also 'all the information that might lead to the identification of the sources'. Therefore, 'the information relating to the telephone lines used by the journalist' and 'any other element (ie the places where the journalist has been in such period) that might have a link with the source, thus helping its identification' are all covered by professional secrecy. See Chelo Manchia A., Segreto giornalistico: un segreto davvero tutelato? [2005] Cassazione Penale 5, 1548 [Italian].*

¹⁰⁶See 14 [2000] Court of Treviso [Italian]; [21st February 1994] District Judge of Rome [Italian]. For a deeper analysis of the criteria of balancing see Section no. 6.2.

¹⁰⁷Article 256, para 2 CCP Duty of Exhibition and Secret [Dovere di esibizione e segreti].

¹⁰⁸See, ex multis, 31735 [2014] Supreme Court of Cassation; 25755 [2007] Supreme Court of Cassation, I criminal chamber [Italian]; 48587 [2011] Supreme Court of Cassation, II criminal chamber [Italian]; 40380 [2007] Supreme Court of Cassation, VI criminal chamber [Italian].

¹⁰⁹See also, 48587 [2009] Supreme Court of Cassation, and 31735 [2014] Supreme Court of Cassation.

¹¹⁰ Article 416-bis Criminal Code Mafia-type criminal association [Associazione di tipo mafioso anche straniera] and Article 326 CC Disclosure and use of secrets of office [Rivelazione e utilizzazione di segreti di ufficio].

¹¹¹ Article 7 Law no. 203 (External participation in a mafia syndicate) 1991 [Concorso esterno in associazione mafiosa].

¹¹² Martin c. France [2012] ECtHR [English]; 48587 [2011] Supreme Court of Cassation; 40380 [2007] Supreme Court of Cassation.

between the goods seized and the procedural purpose (link that plays a particular role in the present case, not being the journalist a suspect or accused person).¹¹³

Another issue concerns the search of digital supports (i.e. personal computer, tablet, hard-disk, smart-phone etc.) and the subsequent seize of digital data. At the outset, the possibility to search and/or seize the digital data of journalists (indeed established by the national case-law since 2007)¹¹⁴ was expressly included in Article 251, paragraph 2 by Law no. 48 of 2008,¹¹⁵ which extends the material scope of this disposition to 'data, information and digital programs, also by copy on a support'.¹¹⁶ However, the Italian courts increasingly provide the acquisition of journalists' digital data by print or copy on external support. Such acquisitions are made during the searches provided by the Prosecutor, without the adoption of any order to produce them. In the light of the above, it is therefore clear that similar practices - allowing the direct identification of the journalists' sources- are completely unlawful and they constitute in a violation of Article 251 paragraph 2, as well as the entire ECHR jurisprudence.

Such consideration has been recently confirmed by the Italian Supreme Court in the judgment delivered on the 25th October 2015.¹¹⁷ In a criminal proceeding for the crime referred to in Article 326 CC,¹¹⁸ the Prosecutor of the Court of Bari searched the office of a journalist, who was not investigated for the crime, in order to seize a specific document. During the search of a personal computer, the judicial police acquired, by printing them, four electronic mail messages and annexes not related to the document searched. The report of such acquisition was contested by the journalist, which highlighted that the search of his personal computer was indeed finalised to the identification of the journalistic sources. Thereby, the acquisition of his private mail messages imported the seizure of his personal data, with subsequent breach of the duty of motivation and violation of the professional secrecy covered by Article 200, 256 and 191 CCP. The Court of Appeal of Bari dismissed the motion presented, arguing that the print of the messages searched in the personal computer does not import the seizure of such data. Therefore, the decision was challenged before the Italian Supreme Court, which clarifies that:

- according to the Law no. 48 of 2008, it is possible to seize digital data, thereby the detection of a copy of such data involves their seizure, even when the original electronic storage medium has been returned to their owner;

¹¹³ For a deeper analysis of the procedural criteria of balancing see Section no. 6.2.

¹¹⁴ 40380 [2007] Supreme Court of Cassation. See also 25755 [2007] Supreme Court of Cassation, I criminal chamber [Italian].

¹¹⁵ Law no. 48 (Ratification and implementation of the Council of Europe's Convention on computer crime, executed in Budapest on November 23, 2001, and provisions updating Italian laws) 2008 [Ratifica ed esecuzione della Convenzione del Consiglio d'Europa sulla criminalità informatica, fatta a Budapest il 23 novembre 2001, e norme di adeguamento dell'ordinamento interno].

¹¹⁶ Article 256, para 2 CCP Duty of Exhibition and Secret [Dovere di esibizione e segreti].

¹¹⁷ 24617 [2015] Supreme Court of cassation, criminal chamber [Italian].

¹¹⁸ Article 326 Criminal Code Disclosure and use of secrets of office [Rivelazione e utilizzazione di segreti di ufficio].

- the right of the journalists not to disclose their sources, as provided by Article 200 CCP, excludes search and seizure in order to identify the source, unless the conditions of legal exceptions are ex ante fulfilled;
- the seizure of the entire computer or of the overall hardware, which leads to the apprehension of the entire information for evidential purpose, infringes the proportionality and adequacy principle, except when it has a specific justification.

8.3 Concluding Considerations

Although the Italian case-law quite complies with the ECHR framework it would be desirable to directly include the ECtHR principles in the Italian legal system, by undertaking a general revision of the national specific legislation on the protection of journalistic sources. Indeed, such revision might better ensure the right application of those principles, while eliminating the need of a strict control on the concrete enforcement of the European regulations made by the Courts.

9. What are the criteria for using electronic surveillance and anti-terrorism laws, which may include measures such as interceptions of communications, surveillance actions and search or seizure actions in order to identify journalists' sources of information? Are the national law clauses accessible, precise, foreseeable and include clear legislative provisions in the context of surveillance and anti-terrorism provisions?

9.1. Anti-terrorism Provisions

After the World Trade Centre attack in 2001, the Italian Criminal Code was amended by several legislative reforms, aimed at providing better legal instruments to fight the terroristic phenomena. Alongside the original crime of subversive association, provided by Article 270, CC, a new type of offence was introduced. Article 270-bis CC defines terrorist associations as 'aimed at committing acts of violence with the purpose of terrorism or subversion of democratic order' but within the Italian legislative context no explicit definition of "terrorism" was provided, until Law no 155 of 2005 introduced Article 270-sexies CC, stating as follows:

'Any activity that, by its nature or context, may seriously damage a country or an international organisation [...] is considered as having a terroristic purpose, as well as any other conduct defined as terrorism of with terrorism purposes by conventions or other international laws binding for Italy.'

Nevertheless, even before the legislative intervention, the Italian Supreme Court tried to define terrorism in several occasions, as 'a fighting method aimed at spreading panic and disorder',¹¹⁹ with the purpose of 'spreading terror within the community by means of indiscriminate criminal actions',¹²⁰ and characterised by 'the systematic adoption of especially violent means, such as excessive, ruthless, gratuitous violence'.¹²¹

¹¹⁹ [5 November 1987] Italian Supreme Court, I criminal chamber [Italian].

Bearing this definition in mind, the first issue at stake is to identify the legal interests protected by Article 270-bis CC. Originally determined only by the Italian constitutional order, and consequently excluding any act of violence towards a foreign state, paragraph 3 of the abovementioned article was already rephrased by the Law no. 438 of 2001, which included in the definition 'acts of violence towards foreign states, institutions and international organisations'. As some scholars noticed, the aim of the provision could now be considered 'the safeguard of the international community'.¹²² However, this interpretation does not seem to be fully accepted by the Italian Supreme Court which, regarding this issue, held that 'founding an organisation aimed at subverting the constitutional order of a foreign state does not fall under the terms of Article 270-bis CC'.¹²³

In conclusion, the aforementioned provision only regards the conduct of association, but the Italian law provides also other types of offences, sanctioning any conduct aimed at assisting¹²⁴, recruiting¹²⁵ and training¹²⁶ with the purpose of terroristic offences. These provisions were recently integrated by Law no 43 of 2015, which introduced a new type of offence regarding the organization of transports with terroristic purposes.¹²⁷ The same law amended the previous articles and innovated in the field of precautionary injunctions and procedural rules regarding the topic, with the aim of providing better tools to contrast the foreign fighters phenomenon.

9.1.1 Terrorism and the Protection of Journalistic Sources

As in one of the latest decisions on the topic,¹²⁸ the Italian Supreme Court recognized Article 10 ECHR as a cornerstone for the protection of journalistic sources. This judgment can be considered as the starting point of the interference between anti-terrorism law and the exercise of this fundamental right. The right provided in Article 10 is a qualified right, since its paragraph 2 allows public authorities to lawfully interfere with the right to freedom of expression. The essence of those boundaries are better specified by Principle 7 of the Council of Europe Recommendation No R (96) 4, which states that any of such interferences must:

- be prescribed by law and formulated in clear and precise terms;
- pursue a legitimate aim as indicated in relevant provisions of human rights instruments [...]
- be necessary in a democratic society [...].

¹²⁰ [21st of October 1983] Italian Supreme Court [Italian].

¹²¹ [27th of October 1987] Italian Supreme Court [Italian].

¹²² Insolera, Reati associativi, delitto politico e terrorismo globale (2004) Dir. Pen. e proc. 1325 [Italian].

¹²³ [1st of July 2003] Italian Supreme Court, in Foro.it, 2004, II, 217 [Italian].

¹²⁴ Art. 270-ter Criminal Code [Italian].

¹²⁵ Art. 270-quater Criminal Code [Italian].

¹²⁶ Art. 270-quinquies Criminal Code [Italian].

¹²⁷ Art. 270-quater1 Criminal Code [Italian].

¹²⁸ 31735 [2014] Supreme Court of Cassation.

An overriding public interest, in the context of terrorism crimes, is likely to be invoked in order to ask the disclosure of the sources of information, and the issue at stake is whether and in which terms terrorism may be considered a legitimate aim to limit freedom of expression under Article 10 ECHR. The Council of Europe specifies, under Principle 5 of Recommendation No R(96) 4, that 'Having regard to the importance of the confidentiality of sources used by journalists in situations of conflict and tension, member states shall ensure that this confidentiality is respected'. This means that *'this principles must be respected even in time of crisis'*¹²⁹ and that these requirements have to be 'strictly justified under Article 10(2) [ECHR] – for example as necessary to bring a serious criminal to justice'.¹³⁰

Referring back to Italian law, Article 200 paragraph 3, CCP states that the journalists' right not to disclose the sources of their information is protected with the only exception which are explained in the previous sections. No particular exception is provided in case of terroristic offences, except by Article 204, paragraph 1, CCP which allows, the disclosure of information only with regard of official and state secrecy, in cases of proceedings involving crimes of subversion of the constitutional order. Therefore, it is clear that this provision excludes professional and journalistic secrecy.

9.2 Investigations and Search and Seizures Actions

In order to be substantially respected, the aforementioned necessity to defend the confidentiality of sources needs to be enforced also during the investigative phase. Under Italian law, Article 361 CCP extends the protection accorded by Art. 200 CCP also to the interrogation phase made by the judicial authority during the investigative stage of the proceedings, and Article 351, paragraph 1 CCP further extends these boundaries to police forces.

Regarding search and seizures actions, Article 256 CCP allows journalists to oppose to any request made by the judicial authority to release documents, items and information which may identify their sources.

As these provisions regulate the case of a direct violation of this fundamental guarantee, it is important to notice that there are many activities which may indirectly lead to the disclosure of sources of information during the investigations phase. The fear of terroristic offences arose concerns about public security, inducing EU member states to allow new means of investigation: a trend well displayed by Article 15 of Council of Europe Convention on the Prevention of Terrorism 196 of 2005, where each member state is asked to 'take such measures as may be necessary under its domestic law to investigate the facts'.

A first issue involves the objective area of application which the protection of journalistic sources is subjected to, as the use of those means of investigation may prospect the danger that ¹²⁹ Directorate General of Human Rights and Legal Affairs Council of Europe, Freedom of expression in time of crisis [2008] Guidelines of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe 26 [English].

¹³⁰ Ibid

interception of correspondence, surveillance of journalists or search and seizure of information could circumvent the protection of journalistic sources.

In the Italian legal system, the Supreme Court has established that it includes the name of the source and any information or circumstances which may lead to its identification.¹³¹ It is also relevant, for the purpose of the analysis, how the public interest to investigate crimes should be balanced with the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information. In 2007, the Supreme Court stated that the seizure of the computer of a journalist could be allowed, against his opposition of professional secrecy, under the following conditions:

- by proving the groundlessness of his opposition
- by proving the relevance of the item for the investigation
- by conducting the investigation in such a way that does not compromise the journalist's confidentiality on his correspondence and sources.¹³²

A similar case was brought to the Supreme Court in 2014,¹³³ and the Court ruled that any interference of public authorities in the disclosure of journalistic sources are subjected to the following terms:

- a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the investigations needs;
- appropriate guarantees, in particular with regard of the conduct of the investigation, by a third and impartial body;
- an appropriate balance between the public interest of conducting investigations and the need to protect freedom of information
- a specific duty of the judicial authority to motivate the adopted measures.

9.3 Interceptions of Communication

Interceptions of communications are regulated by Article 266 CCP. According to this article, interceptions of phone communications are allowed in order to prosecute specific crimes (in particular, intentional crimes under certain terms, crimes against public administration, crimes related to terrorism and mafia organizations). The same regulation applies also for digital communications. Further limits are provided in cases of the interceptions provided for in Article 614 CC. According to this article, interceptions in private residences are allowed exclusively when there is a reasonable ground to believe that a criminal activity is taking place in there.¹³⁴

Interceptions must be authorised either by a motivate decree released by the judicial authority, or by a provisional decree released by the public prosecutor, which has to be approved by a judge

¹³¹ 22397 [2004] Supreme Court of Cassation, VI criminal chamber [Italian].

¹³² 25755 [2007] Supreme Court of Cassation, VI criminal chamber [Italian].

¹³³ 31735 [2014] Supreme Court of Cassation [Italian].

¹³⁴ Article 266, para 2 Code of Criminal Procedure.

within 24 hours.¹³⁵ The Italian courts clarified that any defect concerning this decree must result in the irremediable illegitimacy of the interceptions, and that the duty of motivation needs to be substantially respected.¹³⁶

The Italian legislative body recognises also another mean of interception, as stated by Article 226 of the rules of implementation of the Code of Criminal Procedure. This article allows the Minister of Internal Affairs, in the position of the responsible for the security services and police officials, to enact preventive interception of communications, without the need of any crime report, under the an explicit authorisation of the public prosecutor, when investigations are related to the crimes of terrorism offences and criminal organizations. These interceptions should be limited to 40 days, but they may be further extended for 20 days, if the previous terms are still respected.

It is important to notice that this mean of interception can be used for investigative purposes only, which means that any information gathered under these terms can never be taken to court as an evidence. Furthermore, the records of such interceptions should be destroyed within 5 or 10 days, according to paragraph 4, of Article 226 CCP.

Concerning the protection of journalistic sources, the key provision is Article. 271 CCP, which according to paragraph 1 does not allow any use of interceptions outside the boundaries set by the law and, at paragraph 2, extends the previous boundaries to any information acquired in breach of the limits stated by Article 200 CCP.

Finally, it is important to point out that there is no provision explicitly allowing or limiting the use of illegitimate interceptions as a crime report, in order to start investigations, but such a limit was firstly provided in the decree¹³⁷ that, later converted in law, amended Article 240 CCP.¹³⁸

9.4 Electronic and Traffic Data Surveillance

Nevertheless, interceptions are not the only mean of surveillance. During the last 10 years, there have been many legislative interventions aimed at fighting the treat of terroristic offences by amending Article 132 of Legislative Decree no. 196 of 2003, which regulates the storage of traffic data record by network operators for investigative purposes. Article 132 of this Decree imposes network operators to save phone traffic data (including missed calls) up to 24 months, and digital traffic data up to 6 months. These time periods are doubled for investigative purposes

¹³⁵ Article 267, Code of Criminal Procedure.

¹³⁶ [29th of November 2005] Supreme Court of Cassation (2006) Campenni, Dir. Pen. Proc., , 330 [Italian].

¹³⁷ Legislative Decree n.259 (Urgent Measures on reformation of the regulations on phone tapping) 2006 [Disposizioni urgenti per il riordino della normativa in tema di intercettazioni telefoniche].

¹³⁸ Chukwuemeka Abiakam, Chiara Battistoni, Vincenzo Calabrese, Raffaele Caravella, Daniel Giuliano, Giovanni Lucantoni, La disciplina delle intercettazioni Tra presupposti di legittimità, divieti d'uso e distruzione [2012/2013] 21.

involving terrorism and crimes related to criminal organisations. The judicial authority may ask network operators, through a motivated decree, to provide these data.

The European Parliament has well perceived the need to protect the confidentiality of journalistic sources from such means of surveillance: in a parliamentary report on the issue has highlighted that: 'Internet service providers and telecommunication companies should not be obliged to disclose information which may lead to the identification of journalists' sources in violation of Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights'.¹³⁹ The same necessity is affirmed also by Recommendation No. R (87) 15 which reiterates that police forces are invoked to collect personal data only 'if it is necessary for the prevention of a real danger or the suppression of a specific criminal offence'.

To conclude, it is important to notice here that the Italian Supreme Court through a decision released in 2004, has included the storage of phone calls among the items protected from the right of nondisclosure of journalists' sources of information.¹⁴⁰

9.5 Does the National Law Include Clear, Precise, Foreseeable and Accessible Legislative Norms in the Context of Electronic Surveillance?

Within the Italian legal system, the issue of Electronic Surveillance primarily concerns the definition of interception and consequently, the field of application of its regulation during the investigative phase. Article 617 of the Italian Criminal Code deals with the crime of illicit interception of communication but it does not provide a clear definition of what an interception is. In 1993, the national legislator introduced other four different provisions (Art. 617-bis, 617-ter, 617-quarter and 617-quinquies CC)¹⁴¹ by deteriorating even more the situation, since these articles included several definitions of interceptions regarding both investigative actions and substantive criminal type of offences.

This raised some difficulties of interpretation in the doctrine, and even though the Italian Supreme Court has defined interceptions as:

*'a means of investigation which involves an occult and simultaneous apprehension of the content of a conversation, such as a communication between two subjects, with means that are objectively suitable for the purpose and able to neutralise any caution which has been possibly taken in order to protect the confidentiality of the dialogue'*¹⁴²

¹³⁹ The protection of journalists' sources, Council of Europe, Committee of Culture, Science and Education, Doc. 12443 Report.

¹⁴⁰ 22397 [2004] Supreme Court of Cassation, VI criminal chamber [Italian].

¹⁴¹ Law no 547 (Modifications and integrations to the Criminal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure on cybercrime) 1993 [Modificazioni ed integrazioni alle norme del codice penale e del codice di procedura penale in tema di criminalità informatica].

¹⁴² 36747 [2003] Supreme Court of Cassation, joined criminal chambers [Italian].

The final result should probably be considered not precise, according to the numerous jurisprudential debates and orientation changes which are latter exposed.

It has been discussed whether the seizure of correspondence should be considered as an interception, thus regulated by Article 266 CCP, or as a seizure measure falling under the provisions of Article 254 CCP. Initially the Italian Supreme Court agreed with the first hypothesis¹⁴³ but, later, with a joined chamber decision,¹⁴⁴ reverted its previous decision opting for the second opinion.

Capturing GPS data is unanimously excluded from the definition of interception and it has been regulated as another means of investigation under the terms of Art. 189 CCP.¹⁴⁵ Data records (such as phone or digital records) were previously included¹⁴⁶ and later excluded¹⁴⁷ from the boundaries of Article 266 and 267 CCP by the Italian Supreme Court. The Italian Constitutional Court also scrutinised the controversy at stake, affirming that external data are not directly addressed by interceptions but they rather fall under the terms of Article 254 CCP.¹⁴⁸ For example, filming should not be considered an interception of communications until it involves “communicational behaviours”.¹⁴⁹

Article 266 CCP paragraph 2 also includes two different provisions regarding eavesdropping, setting further limits when this action is done in a private place under the terms of Article 614 CC. The Italian case-law has peacefully agreed that it involves a greater extent, compared to the definition given by article 43 of the Italian Civil Code,¹⁵⁰ and that it includes ‘any place where an area of intimacy and privacy is temporarily guaranteed’.¹⁵¹ The Italian Supreme Court has excluded from the previous definition: car cabins, places which are open to the public in order to exercise a business, hospital rooms, public toilets, and jail cells.¹⁵²

Therefore, the Italian jurisprudence may be considered quite foreseeable with regard of electronic surveillance, given all the definitions of the controversies abovementioned.

A serious discussion concerns the provision of Article 240 CCP, by which the judicial authorities are apparently obliged to destroy any record coming from an illegitimate interception. The extent of this provision is argued, as it seems that the article was meant to include only illicit interceptions, the ones breaking the provisions stated by Article 617 to 617-quinquies CC. The term illegal, extending the field of application of this provision to any interception acquired in ¹⁴³ 20228 [1978] Supreme Court of Cassation, II criminal chamber [Italian].

¹⁴⁴ 28997 [2012] Supreme Court of Cassation, joined criminal chambers [Italian].

¹⁴⁵ 16130 [2002] Supreme Court of Cassation, V criminal chamber [Italian].

¹⁴⁶ 21 [1998] Supreme Court of Cassation, joined criminal chambers [Italian].

¹⁴⁷ 6 [2000] Supreme Court of Cassation, joined criminal chambers [Italian].

¹⁴⁸ 81 [1993] Constitutional Court [Italian].

¹⁴⁹ 135 [2002] Constitutional Court [Italian].

¹⁵⁰ Art. 43 paragraph 2 Civil Code: The residence is the place where the person set his habitual abode.

¹⁵¹ 7063 [2000] Supreme Court of Cassation, IV criminal chamber [Italian].

¹⁵² Abiakam, Battistoni, Calabrese, Caravella, Giuliano, Lucantoni, La disciplina delle intercettazioni Tra presupposti di legittimità, divieti d'uso e distruzione [2012/2013] 11 breach of any procedural regulation, is most probably the result of an error of transcription made during the parliamentary works, a thesis which is confirmed by paragraph 6 of the same article by which:

'The destruction shall be recorded in the dedicated minutes, which shall contain information on the illegal interception, holding or gathering of the documentary evidence, media and documents referred to in paragraph 2, as well as to the procedures or tools used and the persons concerned, without any reference whatsoever to the content of such evidence, media and documents.'

The topic has been discussed by the Constitutional Court, which interpreted the aforementioned provisions as involving any illegal interceptions.¹⁵³ The court contextually lifted the limits provided by paragraph 6, imposing the duty to write a legal record of the contents related to the circumstances of interception, detention or illicit acquisition of the evidences, to the safeguard of the interest of justice. This ruling has been severely criticised by the doctrine, as it would result in a report 'containing an evaluation of the illicit conduct, rather than the material evidence which have been destroyed'.¹⁵⁴

10. Can journalists Rely on Encryption and Anonymity Online to Protect Themselves and their Sources against Surveillance?

10.1 Anonymity and the Italian Constitution

The examination of the Italian constitutional law is the first step in order to determine whether anonymity is a legitimate tool to protect journalists and their sources against surveillance. Even though there is not an express provision on the issue, several rules concerning secrecy and right to privacy can be considered for the purpose of the analysis.

For instance, the Italian Constitution forbids secret associations by Article 18, but expressly allows and protects secrecy with regard to the right to vote,¹⁵⁵ which sometimes is set as a rule,¹⁵⁶ sometimes as an exception,¹⁵⁷ especially with regard to parliamentary voting and procedures.

Among those rules, Article 15 of the Italian Constitution provides the right to freedom and confidentiality of correspondence and communications, and the same article is commonly interpreted as a general protection of the right to privacy and personal data, when read in conjunction with Articles 2, 3, 13 and 14 of the Constitution. Furthermore, Article 22 protects ¹⁵³ 173 [2009] Constitutional Court [Italian].

¹⁵⁴ F. Palazzo, Tolleranza zero per le intercettazioni illecite? (2006) Dir. pen. Proc. 1326.

¹⁵⁵ Art. 48, para 2 Italian Constitution

¹⁵⁶ Art. 83 para 3 Italian Constitution, dealing with the elections of the President of the Republic

¹⁵⁷ Art. 64 para Italian Constitution, dealing with parliamentary works the right to a name and, according to some legal theorists,¹⁵⁸ could provide the right not to be identified, neither to be linked with its own biographical data.

Clearly, the right to remain anonymous is not generally guaranteed, but it is considered as a mean to protect other constitutional rights.¹⁵⁹

10.1.1 Freedom of Expression and Anonymity

While the fundamental values of transparency and openness, shared by the Italian Constitution with regard of the political debate, surely would not suggest to promote or protect anonymity, freedom of expression is commonly considered crucial for the functioning of a democratic society and the issue at stake is whether anonymity could be allowed in order to protect this fundamental right. The cornerstone of the protection accorded by the Italian Constitution is Article 21, whose first paragraph states as follows: 'Anyone has the right to freely express their thoughts in speech, writing, or any other form of communication.'

The first point to highlight from this statement is the word "own", which establishes a link between freedom of expression and the assumption of responsibility,¹⁶⁰ a correlation further reinforced by paragraph 3 of the same provision by which 'Seizure may be permitted only by judicial order stating the reason and only for offences expressly determined by the law on the press or in case of violation of the obligation to identify the persons responsible for such offences.'

Accordingly, the provisions with the aim of revealing the responsible or the author of an expressed thought are allowed, and even the protection accorded to freedom of press from actions of seizure is given under the condition that the responsible is identified. The same principle can be found in Article 57, CC, which appoints press directors as responsible for any content released within their publications, and further underlines the strong link between taking advantage of the guarantees provided by the law and assuming the duties which comes from the use of such a fundamental right. Finally, paragraph 4 of Art. 21, by asking editors to make their financial sources publicly available, shows once again a clear favour of the Italian constitutional law towards transparency over means of communication which may interfere within the free marketplace of ideas.

However, clearly the Constitution do not consider anonymity as a fundamental right, neither provides any protection, as well as any general prohibition towards secrecy or anonymity cannot be found as well. It means that any law imposing an indiscriminate obligation to individuals in order to expose their identity would not be constitutionally legitimate, but indeed any duty ¹⁵⁸ Giulio Enea Vigevani, Anonimato, responsabilità e trasparenza nel quadro costituzionale italiano (2014) 6 [Italian].

¹⁵⁹ G. M. Riccio, Diritto all'anonimato e responsabilità civile del provider, in L. Nivarra, V. Ricciuto, Internet e il diritto dei privati 26 [Italian].

¹⁶⁰ Marco Betzu, Anonimato e responsabilità in rete (2011) Costituzionalismo.it 4 [Italian].

regarding this matter should be allowed under the condition that this sacrifice is meant to protect other constitutional rights, such as honour, reputation or privacy.¹⁶¹

10.1.2 Anonymity Online and Responsibility

Finally, anonymity needs to be considered in relation with cyberspace. The importance of anonymity as a tool to protect individuals from undue interferences and breach of their own individual sphere is dramatically raising within the context of digital societies, a trend well displayed by the increasing number of authors¹⁶² which lead some scholars to define anonymity as a 'fundamental element of our digital citizenship'.¹⁶³ Nevertheless, these conclusions are not shared by most Italian scholars, which position is well-synthesised by the following statement 'Freedom of the web, as the first realization of a free marketplace of ideas truly accessible to all in our society, would not be sustainable if this would be followed by a systematic breach of the principle of responsibility'.¹⁶⁴

The Italian law does not provide any regulation on this problematic topic, except for Article 17, Legislative Decree no. 70, 9th of April 2003 which excludes a providers' general duty of gathering information regarding the contents transmitted towards their own services. This policy shows the well-known fear that giving any responsibility to the providers could lead to 'self-protective and over-broad private censorship, often without transparency and the due process of the law'.¹⁶⁵ On the other side, some authors noticed that anonymity online, which may concern the authors of crimes, cannot be considered structurally different from the *'anonymity of someone throwing rocks from the top of an overpass'*¹⁶⁶ and that 'someone needs to be in charge of tracking the users of their services, either to be identified as responsible'.¹⁶⁷

A solution to this issue is far from being established, however, a good starting point could be considered the principle that:

'Any regulation willing to truly respect the Constitutional provisions could not but equally be divided between the provider and the author, and with the full acknowledgement of the issues involving the matter at stake, the responsibility to allow the identification of the author of any content which may breach the law'.¹⁶⁸

10.2 Encryption and Protection from Surveillance

¹⁶¹ Vigevani, Anonimato, responsabilità e trasparenza nel quadro costituzionale italiano 10 [Italian].

¹⁶² G. Finocchiaro, Conclusioni, in Ead (a cura di) Diritto all'anonimato 414 [Italian].

¹⁶³ S. Rodotà, Il diritto di avere diritti (Editori Laterza 2013) 392 [Italian].

¹⁶⁴ G. Gardini, Le regole dell'informazione (3rd edn Torino 2013) 21 [Italian].

¹⁶⁵ Frank la Rue, A/HRC/17/27 [2011] 40.

¹⁶⁶ S. Sica V. Zeno-Zencovich, Legislazione, giurisprudenza e dottrina nel diritto dell'Internet, (2010) Dir. Informaz. e Informatica 389 [Italian].

¹⁶⁷ Ibid

¹⁶⁸ M. Cuniberti, Disciplina della stampa e dell'attività giornalistica e informazione in rete (Giuffrè 2008) 234 [Italian].

The process of ‘Converting information or data into a code, especially to prevent unauthorised access’¹⁶⁹ lies far back in the past, as a military technology aimed at denying the content of the message to interceptors. Although, the so-called digital revolution gave access to this technology to a wider audience of users, thus raising the necessity to find a good balance between the opposite interests of privacy and IT security on one side, and the interest of law and national security on the other side.¹⁷⁰

Firstly considered exclusively as a military good, encryption was regulated with the purpose to limit the export of this technology to trusted national states, an aim pursued by different multilateral agreements such as the CoCom (Coordinating Committee for Multilateral Export Control, instituted in 1991), and then followed by the Wassenaar Arrangement established in 1996. Both these agreements were joined by Italy, and currently they fall under the provisions adopted by the EU with Council Regulation n. 1334/2000, by which the export of encryption technologies has been largely liberalized, and two different standards were set:

- between member states, exporting encryption technologies is always allowed, with the only exception of sophisticated cryptanalysis tools;
- exporting encryption technologies towards other member states is allowed only if authorised by different kinds of licences, which may vary between different states’.

Recently, the UN Human Rights Council stigmatized State regulations aimed at controlling import or export of encryption tools, affirming at paragraph 41 of A/HRC/29/32 (Report of the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression, David Kaye), that ‘By limiting encryption tools to government-approved standards and controlling the import or export of encryption technologies, States ensure encryption software maintains weaknesses that allow Governments to access the content of communications.’ and later recommending at paragraph 60 A/HRC/29/32 that ‘States should avoid all measures that weaken the security that individuals may enjoy online, such as backdoors, weak encryption standards and key escrows’.

In relation to the private use of encryption as a mean of protecting from surveillance and access to information, the issue firstly appears in Regulation No. R (95) 13, whose Chapter V states that ‘measures should be considered to minimize the negative effects of the use of cryptography on the investigation of criminal offences, without affecting its legitimate use more than it is strictly necessary’. Encryption was then recognized as a technology aimed at protecting the privacy of the citizens and cyber security in 1997, when the European Commission will publish the communication ‘Ensuring Security and Trust in Electronic Communication. Towards a European Framework for Digital Signatures and Encryption’. Finally, the Council of Europe adopted in 2001 the Budapest Convention on Cybercrime, and at the same time published the Explanatory Report to the same convention in which it states that: ‘the modification of data for the purpose of secure communications (e.g. encryption), should in principle be considered a legitimate protection of privacy and, therefore, be considered as being undertaken with right'.¹⁷¹ The Convention was ratified by Italy with the Law no. 48, 18th of March 2008 and came into effect in the same year.

¹⁶⁹ Oxforddictionaries.com, Encryption

¹⁷⁰ Giovanni Ziccardi, Crittografia e diritto (G.Giappichelli 2003) 22 [Italian].

In a wider perspective, it is a common opinion that the EU policy would consist in setting guidelines, leaving member states free to adopt different regulation concerning cryptography.¹⁷² However, it is important to notice that encryption is now commonly considered as a legitimate mean to protect the right of freedom of expression, as well shown by the UN Human Rights Council, which stated that:

'With respect to encryption and anonymity, States should adopt policies of non-restriction or comprehensive protection, only adopt restrictions on a case-specific basis and that meet the requirements of legality, necessity, proportionality and legitimacy in objective, require court orders for any specific limitation, and promote security and privacy online through public education'¹⁷³ and reporting that 'Discussions of encryption and anonymity have all too often focused only on their potential use for criminal purposes in times of terrorism. But emergency situations do not relieve States of the obligation to ensure respect for international human rights law'.¹⁷⁴

Within the context of the Italian legislation, Legislative Decree no 196 of 2003 regulates the protection of personal data and, for what it may concern cryptography, this mean is repeatedly set as a duty in order to ensure the safeguard of data storages: Article 22 explicitly refers at paragraph 6 to the use of 'encryption techniques or identification codes' to protect sensitive and legal data, while Article 34 imposes the adoption of 'implementation of encryption techniques or identification codes for specific processing operations performed by health care bodies, in respect of data disclosing health and sex life'.

11. Are Whistle-blowers Explicitly Protected Under Law Protecting Journalistic Sources? Is There Another Practice Protecting Whistle-blowers? Is the Legislation Prohibiting Authorities and Companies from Identifying Whistle-blowers?

11.1 The Definition of Whistle-blowers

The Recommendation R (2014) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member States defines whistle-blowers as: "any person who reports or discloses information on a threat or harm to the public interest in the context of their work-based relationship, whether it be in the public or private sector".¹⁷⁵

¹⁷¹ Explanatory Report to the Convention on Cybercrime, paragraph 62, available at: <https://rm.coe.int/CoERMPublicCommonSearchServices/DisplayDCTMContent?documentId=09000016800cce5b>, accessed on 06/03/2016

¹⁷² Ziccardi, Crittografia e diritto 117.

¹⁷³ Para 57, A/HRC/29/32 [2015] [English].

¹⁷⁴ Para 58, A/HRC/29/32 [2015] [English].

