II NATIONAL LEGISLATION

1 GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE JURISDICTION

i. A brief history of Malta and of the Maltese governmental regime.

“Malta is a democratic republic founded on work and on respect for the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual.”<sup>39</sup>

The above declaration is enshrined in the first article of the Maltese Constitution which was adopted on the 21st of September 1964, the day Malta acquired Independence from the United Kingdom. Upon Malta becoming a Republic on the 13th of December 1974, this article was subsequently amended to reflect its new status.

ii. The above quoted article is a formal statement by the Maltese government of its paramount obligation to safeguard and promote the fundamental rights and freedoms of individuals. Such commitment towards the protection and application of Human Rights may be observed in the fourth chapter of the Maltese Constitution which sets the core legislative provisions dealing with this subject.

This chapter provides a judicially enforceable Bill of rights, set in the 1961 Constitution which was subsequently retained and further enforced in the Independence Constitution of 1964. The provisions contained therein were modelled upon the European Convention on Human Rights by the Council of Europe. This mirroring relationship between the national legislative instrument and the international declaration conveys Malta’s commitment in safeguarding Human Rights both at a national and an international level. One must highlight that this Convention has been fully ratified into the Maltese legislative framework via Act XIV of 1987 which created the European Convention Act, Chapter 319 of the Laws of Malta. The third article of such Act declares that the provisions of such Convention are “enforceable as part of the laws of Malta” and that in case of inconsistency between the

The principles and regulations set forth in the Constitution form the basis for other subsequent laws. For example, the Protection of Right to Life<sup>41</sup> is addressed in further detail in the articles contained in the Criminal Code<sup>42</sup>, and the Protection of Freedom of Expression<sup>43</sup> sets the foundations for the Press Act<sup>44</sup> and the Broadcasting Act<sup>45</sup>.

With reference to Children's Rights in Malta, the mentioned Constitutional Bill of Rights does not have any particular provisions that relate directly to children or minors<sup>46</sup>. Nevertheless, one must refer to Article 33 of the Constitution which states that "every person in Malta is entitled to the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual". Since the wording of the law provides for "every person" and personhood in Malta is deemed to be attained from birth<sup>47</sup>, one may conclude that the rights contained therein are therefore vested upon children as well.

However, apart from such declaration, the Maltese legal framework is not equipped with a specific Bill of Children's Rights, i.e. a single legal document which provides for all the rights pertaining to minors. Children's Rights are addressed in special provisions either in other chapters of the main law or as subsidiary legislation to the ordinary law.

The primary document which one should refer to when discussing Children's Rights in Malta is the Commissioner for Children Act.<sup>48</sup> This piece of legislation provides for the appointment of a person to the independent office of Child Commissioner whose role is to "promote and advocate the rights and interests of children"<sup>49</sup>. This Act also prescribes for the creation of a Council for Children<sup>50</sup> who shall meet at least once every three months and assist and advice the Commissioner in safeguarding and promoting children's rights. These actions extend to various areas including children's freedom of expression and being heard, children's right for recreation, minimising child poverty, the protection and stability of the family unit (including adequate support for parents), health standards during pregnancy<sup>51</sup> and "to promote compliance with the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child as ratified by Malta and with such other international treaties, conventions or agreements relating to children as are or may be ratified or otherwise acceded to by Malta."<sup>52</sup>

Moreover, Article 9(g) states that one of the functions held by the Commissioner for Children is "to promote the protection of children from physical or mental harm and neglect, including sexual abuse or exploitation."

Hence, the institution of the Commissioner for Children in Malta is especially equipped and vested with the authority to be the main instrument through which Children's Rights are truly promoted, put into practice and safeguarded. One should highlight that the rights adopted by Malta, and which the Commissioner is bound to protect and promote, are the rights promulgated in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UN CRC)<sup>53</sup>. This document served as an inspiration to the creation of the 'Council of Europe Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse'<sup>54</sup> i.e. the Lanzarote Convention. In spite of this, one should remark that the office of the Commissioner of Children does not have any enforcement powers, as it has an educational and monitoring role which seeks to raise awareness and protect children's rights. The primary significance of this role is that the Commissioner does not only act on what adults would perceive to be in the best interests of children, but it acts upon the "children's experiences themselves"<sup>55</sup>.

Another important legislative framework within the Maltese jurisdiction in safeguarding children's rights is the Civil Code<sup>56</sup>. "The Civil Code preserves the principle of the 'best interests of the child”<sup>57</sup> by establishing specific provisions which ensure that a child is entitled for adequate care and custody, maintenance and education.

The compliance of Maltese authorities with international treaties like the UN CRC is essential in ensuring the protection and promulgation of children’s rights. As discussed in previous chapters, Malta ratified the UN CRC on the 30th of September 1990 and its Optional Protocol on the ‘Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography’<sup>58</sup>. However, this is not the sole international legal mechanism adopted by the local legislator to safeguard Children’s Rights. Malta’s membership in the Council of Europe in 1965 binds it to respect the shared values of the member states and to “accept the principles of the rule of law and of the enjoyment by all persons within its jurisdiction of human rights and fundamental freedoms”<sup>59</sup>. This liability is enforced by Malta’s membership in the European Union which through Article 6 of the Treaty of the European Union (TEU) the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights has been given the same legal status of the Treaties. Therefore, the Maltese authorities are bound to legislate in conformity with the principles promulgated by these international institutions.

Until the present date, Malta has ratified the ‘European Convention on the Adoption of Children’ and the ‘European Convention on Recognition and Enforcement of Decisions concerning Custody of Children and on Restoration of Custody of Children’ and the ‘Lanzarote Convention’<sup>60</sup>. It has also signed, but not yet ratified the ‘Convention on Contact concerning Children’ and the ‘European Convention on the Exercise of Children's Rights’<sup>61</sup>. However, Malta still has not given its formal commitment with regards to the ‘European Convention on the Legal Status of Children born out of Wedlock’ and the ‘European Convention on the Adoption of Children (Revised)’<sup>62</sup>. Other international instruments which have been enforced in the Maltese Legislative system include the ‘Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction’ and the ‘European Convention on Recognition and Enforcement of Decisions concerning Custody of Children and on the Restoration of Custody of Children<sup>63</sup>, both ratified by Act XIII of 1999 which promulgated the Maltese ‘Child Abduction and Custody Act<sup>64</sup>. Another recent development in the field of children’s rights is the ratification of The Hague ‘Convention on Jurisdiction, Applicable Law, Recognition, Enforcement and Cooperation in respect of Parental Responsibility and Measures for the Protection of Children<sup>65</sup>’ through Act XXI of 2010. The ratification of such instrument led to the enactment of Chapter 507 of the Laws of Malta, entitled the ‘Protection of Children (Hague Convention) Act’. This document proves to be essential in harmonising local rules with international regulations, by establishing which jurisdiction should apply in a particular case, and therefore, avoiding legal procedures which may detrimental for the child.

Apart from the discussed mechanisms, the Maltese body of laws provides other legislative frameworks aimed towards the protection of minors. The earliest local legislation dealing with children’s rights dates back to 1962 and regulates the placing of protected minors in alternative homes<sup>66</sup>. Since the 1980’s, Chapter 287 of the Laws of Malta entitled the ‘Juvenile Court Act’ has regulated matters with regards to proceedings related to a child or a minor, who for the purposes of such legislation is ‘any person ... under the age of sixteen years’<sup>67</sup>. Having such a legislative mechanism is essential in ensuring a child’s right to a fair hearing which is suitable to his ‘dignity and worth’ as promulgated by Article 40 of the UN CRC. Such regulations would, however, be inadequate without the necessary provisions which stipulate for the suitable care, protection and placement of a child who has been found liable of a criminal offence and is remanded in custody. This situation is addressed by Chapter 285 of the Laws of Malta in the ‘Children and Young Persons (Care Orders) Act’<sup>68</sup>. This document also deals with children who may need protection or control where such protection is not being provided for by their parents or legal guardians, or the environment provided by the parents is detrimental for the child’s well-being. Another mechanism which stipulates specific provisions for children's rights is the 'Broadcasting Code for the Protection of Minors'<sup>69</sup> which deals with the balance that needs to be established between children's rights for freedom of expression and information, and children's vulnerability at being exposed to certain material which is harmful to their development.

The most recent legislative development which provides for children's rights is the 'Protection of Minors Registration Act'<sup>70</sup>. This legislative framework has created a register which lists the names and details of perpetrators subjected to a notification requirement. Such register must be referred to by institutions employing individuals whose position involves contact with children. A notification requirement is a type of criminal retribution imposed on offenders who are found guilty of what the act calls 'scheduled offences' which include: inducing prostitution of minors, violent indecent assault (rape), abduction of minors and defilement of minors. Hence, because of this intrinsic relationship with substantive criminal law, this document must be read together with the particular provisions stipulated in the Criminal Code and other legislation. Both these provisions and the Protection of Minors Registration Act shall be further discussed in subsequent sections of this report.

iii. For an effective pursuit of justice, the adequate legal frameworks must be supported by the necessary judicial mechanisms. In Malta, cases dealing with infringement of human rights fall within the jurisdiction of the Civil Court First Hall, as established by Article 46 of the Maltese Constitution. Such court has exclusive jurisdiction upon issues arising from redress to human rights. In fact, if before another court, whether it is of first or second instance, an issue concerning human rights is raised, the latter court must refer the question to the Civil Court First Hall.<sup>71</sup> Moreover, as per Article 95 of the Constitution, once a decision is issued by the First Hall, either one of the parties may appeal to the Constitutional Court which apart from being by nature an appellate court is also regarded as the guardian of the Constitution and hence the most suitable court to deal with issues concerning human rights as enshrined in the Constitution<sup>72</sup>.

The procedure to be followed when seeking redress via Article 46, due to a breach of a constitutional right is regulated by the ‘Court Practice and Procedure and Good Order Rules’.<sup>73</sup> This Act states that for proceedings to be initiated before the Civil Court First Hall and the Constitutional Courts under their jurisdiction as human rights courts, one must file a rikors - a judicial application. The latter application may be instituted by any individual or legal person who feels that the rights set forth in either the Maltese Constitution or the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms have been breached. This mechanism must contain an outline of the facts which have led to the filed complaint and also “indicate the provision or provisions of the Constitution of Malta or of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms alleged to have been, to be or likely to be contravened.”<sup>74</sup>

Such application must also include the type of redress sought by the applicant; however, the court may of its own motion provide an alternative form of redress which it deems more appropriate.

As one may notice from the above quoted article, the law stipulates that one may also apply on the basis of breaches made to the provisions of the European Convention of Human Rights. Although the Maltese Constitutional Court has jurisdiction to hear and determine cases regarding the Council of Europe’s Convention of Human Rights, the final interpretation of this document falls within the competence of the European Court of Human Rights itself. Therefore, as signed by the Maltese Government in 1966 and 1967, Maltese citizens and all those found within the Maltese jurisdiction, may petition to the Strasbourg Courts. However, it must be noted that recourse to the European Courts is generally deemed to be a solution of last resort once an individual has exhausted all the other ordinary remedies.

“There shall be in and for Malta such Superior Courts having such powers and jurisdiction as may be provided by any law for the time being in force in Malta.”

The Court of Organisation and Civil Procedure then provides that among the superior courts there shall be the Court of Appeal which may have either Civil or Criminal jurisdiction. In the case of the latter, the ‘Court of Criminal Appeal’ as established by article 498 of the Criminal Code, is the final appellate court for criminal matters and it is styled as either ‘The Court of Criminal Appeal - Inferior Jurisdiction’ or ‘The Court of Criminal Appeal - Superior Jurisdiction’. The former is when it is composed by only one Judge and it has jurisdiction upon appeals from the Court of Magistrates<sup>75</sup>. On the other hand, the Court of Criminal Appeal in its Superior Jurisdiction is composed of three Judges, one of them being the Chief Justice. This court hears appeals filed by the convicted party in decisions of the Criminal Court, and also appeals instituted by either the accused or the Attorney General (AG) on the grounds of admissibility of evidence and also preliminary decisions given by the Criminal Court<sup>76</sup>.

When a person in Malta is charged with an offence which its punishment entails more than six months imprisonment, this person is generally tried by the Criminal Courts. If the penalty would not exceed the ten year imprisonment and there is the consent of both the AG and the accused, the case would be brought before the Court of Magistrates in its criminal jurisdiction. This Court is composed by one Magistrate except when it is functioning as a Juvenile Court<sup>77</sup>.

The Court of Magistrates within the criminal law field also occupies the secondary role of a court of criminal inquiry where it is responsible for the compilation of evidence required in a case falling within the competence of the Criminal Court. During such process the Court must decide whether the evidence produced is sufficient for the AG to file a Bill of Indictment before the Criminal Court. The Court of Magistrates as a Court of Criminal Inquiry is different from a Magisterial Inquiry. The latter would generally be carried out where there is a “suspicious or violent death” and criminal procedures would generally start via a Magisterial Inquiry. At this initial stage there is no accused, but a suspect, and the appointed Magistrate would be in charge of the investigation, collection and preservation of material evidence. Moreover, the individual Magistrates are also involved in the actual police investigation of certain offences, for example, the issuing of search and arrest warrants.

Also, in accordance with the official website of the Judiciary of Malta; With the extension in 2003 of the right of appeal of the Attorney General, the work of the Court of Criminal Appeal (Inferior Jurisdiction) has increased considerably. This is shown by the number of cases decided each year from 2002 to 2008: 2002 - 268 cases, 2003 - 316, 2004 - 250, 2005 - 344, 2006 - 379, 2007 - 432 and 2008 - 404.

Cases not heard before the Court of Magistrates would then be tried before the Criminal Court which may be composed in two different manners, either as a Judge sitting alone or a trial by jury. In both cases, proceedings before the court are initiated via the filing of a Bill of Indictment by the AG. When the Criminal Court is composed by a sole Judge its jurisdiction is limited to “the determination of preliminary pleas and pleas as to the admissibility of evidence”<sup>78</sup>, consideration of applications for bail where such consideration would be beyond the competence of the court of Magistrates, review of decisions by the Court of Magistrates and applications under the Money Laundering Act<sup>79</sup>. Therefore, when a Judge sits alone in the Criminal Court it does not have the authority to determine whether the accused is culpable of the accusations brought against him. This responsibility would fall upon the jury in a trial by Jury, where the Criminal Court would be composed of a Judge and nine Jurors. In the context of such trials the Judge’s role is to determine questions related to law and to sum-up the evidence produced before the court in such a way as to “enable the jury to determine whether they are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused.” It is the jurors who would then decide upon the verdict which may be either one of unanimity or qualified. The majority required is generally six to three, although in certain situations, such as the determination of the sanity of the accused at the time of the commission of the offence, a minimum majority of five is to four is sufficient.

v. When discussing the age of criminal liability in relation to minors, one must divide such liability in accordance with three different age groups; minors below the age of nine years, minors in between the age of nine to fourteen and minors who have turned fourteen but are not yet eighteen.

Article 35 of the Maltese Criminal Code establishes that children under the age of nine years are exempt from any kind of criminal liability. Exemption from criminal liability also applies for minors under the age of fourteen when acting without mischievous discretion. However, although these minors may be exempt from criminal responsibility, parents may still be found liable for 'culpa in vigilando' meaning that they are responsible for their child's actions for not exercising the proper diligence required by a parent (the bonus pater familias). Article 36 then provides that minors falling within the nine to fourteen age group who would have committed an offence with mischievous discretion "shall be liable on conviction to the punishments established for contraventions" or else "to the punishment laid down for the offence decreased by three degrees provided that in no case may the punishment exceed four years imprisonment"<sup>80</sup>. A minor who turns fourteen is not exempt from criminal liability and the subsequent penalisation for their offence, however, the punishment shall be decreased by one or two degrees<sup>81</sup>.

Cases where minors are charged with a criminal offence fall within the jurisdiction of the Court of Magistrates. However, in such circumstances it is composed in a different manner and is referred to as the Juvenile Court<sup>82</sup>. Article 4 of the 'Juvenile Court Act', states that such court shall be composed by one Magistrate who shall be assisted by two lay persons one of whom must be a woman. It is important to highlight that according to the definition clause this Act, for the purposes of such legislative document, "'child or young person" means a person who is under the age of sixteen years"<sup>83</sup>. Hence, minors who have turned sixteen are generally prosecuted by the Court of Magistrates. The Court of Magistrates also prosecutes cases where a minor who has not yet attained the age of sixteen is co-accused with a person over the age of sixteen. In general, cases involving minors under the age of sixteen are prosecuted before the Juvenile Court. This different treatment by the judicial system towards minors is a reflection of the notion that minors, although having committed the same offences an adult person would have done, are still "emotionally and socially different from adults"<sup>84</sup>. Therefore, the main objective of proceedings having minors as accused should not be retribution but reformation and constructive social reintegration, especially in the light that most child offenders are victims themselves. Therefore it would be significant if for the latter to receive special reformatory services when in detention.

Currently in Malta there is no official study about Child Prisoners<sup>85</sup>. The latest available statistics date back to 2009 and have been published by the Office of the Commissioner for Children in its Annual Report<sup>86</sup>. The Report stated that in 2009, seven children were housed at the Corradino Correctional Facilities - the main prison structure in Malta. Throughout the report, the situation and mechanisms providing for child prisoners are criticised as being unsatisfactory and also in contravention of Children's Rights as established by the UN CRC. Another study by the foundation 'Mid-Dlam għad Dawl' (From Darkness to Light), which promotes prisoners' rights and assists prisoners, ex-prisoners and their families, shows that the number of child prisoners has increased from two in 2001 to seven in 2006<sup>87</sup>. In 2010, the Office for the Commissioner for Children held an inquiry<sup>88</sup> following a case of imprisonment of two teenagers. As a result of the inquiry the Office issued a number of recommendations which stated that in conformity with Article 40 of the UN CRC, a better detention environment for children in conflict with the law should be provided. A solution would be to transfer the youth section outside of the Corradino Correctional Facility or Mount Carmel Hospital (the latter being a psychiatric Hospital). The Commissioner also suggested alternative types of detention which would be targeted towards the minors' reformation and positive reintegration in society, such as, probation orders, educational programmes and vocational training.<sup>89</sup> One must note that these recommendations were upheld by at the time Justice and Home Affairs Minister Dr. Carmelo Mifsud Bonnici. This resulted in the Young Offenders Unit Rehabilitation Services (YOURS) premises being moved to an undisclosed location in 2011. Such shift also led to the possibility for under-age

2 SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW

2.1 Sexual Abuse

i. Maltese law falls short from defining the term ‘sexual activities’. Nevertheless, the law seems to consider such term broadly since it penalises any act which is deemed to be indecent, and which is capable of offending public decency or morals.

ii. Criminal intent is an important requisite which may determine the guilt or otherwise of a person. The law does not define the term ‘intentionally’ and the intent required depends on the specific type of sexual offence.

For instance the offence of rape requires that the agent had a specific intent to have carnal knowledge accompanied by violence, knowing that the passive subject dissents. In defilement of minors, on the other hand, the prosecution need not prove that the agent committed the lewd acts with the specific intent to defile a minor – the intent is a generic one consisting in the free and conscious will and the intention to commit the lewd acts on the person or in the presence of a minor.

Since the legislator intends to prevent sexual exploitation and sexual abuse, the punishment accorded to the various offences depends upon the seriousness of the offence. If the particular sexual offence is deemed by the legislator as very serious and the intent required is specific, then the punishment is more heinous.

iii. The law does not specifically provide the legal age in which minors can engage in sexual activities. Nonetheless, Article 204C (1) of the Criminal Code<sup>91</sup> provides that “whosoever takes part in sexual activities with a person under age shall... be liable to imprisonment”. This umbrella provision penalises any sexual activity with a minor, independently of whether the minor consents or otherwise to such acts. Since Maltese law provides that a person is considered of age when s/he attains the age of eighteen years<sup>92</sup>, then it is at this age that a person can legally engage in sexual activities.

There is no particular provision which caters for consensual sexual activities between minors. However, since the law criminalises any sexual activity with a minor, it makes no limitation upon the age of the agent and theoretically a minor who engages into sexual activities with another minor is liable for such an offence. Nonetheless, since the state requires the formal complaint of the injured party to prosecute sexual offences, it is unlikely that any of the parties is prosecuted in the case of consensual sexual activities between minors.

iv. The legislator gives paramount importance to the best interest of the child, especially in situations where the offender takes advantage of the vulnerable position of the minor. Consequently, the law provides an increase in punishment whenever the offence is committed by two or more persons acting together<sup>93</sup> or with the involvement of a criminal organisation<sup>94</sup>, thus creating a hostile situation for the child; when the person under age is a vulnerable person within the meaning provided by the Criminal Code<sup>95</sup>; and whenever the offender compels a minor to perform a sexual activity by means of violence or threats.

v. There is no specific provision regulating the crime of incest. However, the legislator is well aware that the most psychologically damaging sexual offences are those committed within the family environment, by persons who ought to protect and take care of the child.

The law increases the punishment whenever the sexual offence is committed by any ascendant by consanguinity or affinity, by the adoptive father or mother, by the tutor<sup>96</sup> of the

<sup>94</sup> Various provisions in the Criminal Code cater for such an aggravation, including; Article 204A (2)(c), Article 204B (2)(c), Article 204C (2)(d)(iii), and Article 208A (1A)(c).

<sup>95</sup> The law (Criminal Code, Chapter 9 of the Laws of Malta; Article 208AC (2)) defines the term ‘vulnerable person’ as any person under the age of fifteen years; or any person suffering from a physical or mental infirmity; or any other person considered by the court to be particularly at risk of being induced into cooperating with the offender or into surrendering to the offender’s will when taking into account the person’s age, maturity, health, pregnancy, disability, social or other conditions including any situation of dependence, as well as the physical or psychological consequence of the offence on that person.

<sup>96</sup> Maltese law (Civil Code, Chapter 16 of the Laws of Malta) provides that a tutor must be appointed to a minor, whose parents have died or have forfeited parental authority, until the minor becomes of age or marries (Article 158). The tutor must take care of the minor, represent him in civil matters, and administer his property as a bonus paterfamilias (Article 172).

minor.<sup>97</sup> Moreover, the Court may order that the offender forfeits every authority and right over the person or property of the victim, or in the case of tutor, his removal from the office of tutor and disability from ever holding such office.<sup>98</sup>

vi. There no specific provisions which regulate offenders who take advantage of their established position in society. Nevertheless, whenever a person who is trusted, even though temporarily, with the care, education, instruction, control or custody of the minor, takes advantage of his position of trust, authority or influence, the punishment prescribed for the particular sexual offence is further aggravated.<sup>99</sup>

Moreover, the aggravating circumstances prescribed for sexual offences against minors provide certain scenarios whereby the punishment should be increased due to the position of the offender and the particular circumstances which were contributory to the offence. These include situations when the offender has availed himself of his capacity of public officer, or when the offender is a servant of the injured party, with salary or other remuneration; when the crime is committed by an institutor; or when the crime is committed on any prisoner by the person charged with the custody or conveyance of such prisoner.<sup>100</sup>

In addition to the punishment, the Court has the discretion to order that the name of the offender be listed in the Child Offenders' Register and the offender thus becomes ineligible for membership of, or any employment or other position with, any institution, establishment or organisation providing or organising any service or activity which involves the education, care, custody, welfare or upbringing of minors, whether such membership, employment or other position is against payment or otherwise.<sup>101</sup>

viii. Maltese law neither defines the term ‘prostitution’ nor the term ‘child prostitution’. Nonetheless, it is commonly understood that the offence will subsist as long as the child is involved in acts of lewdness, in exchange of money or any other form of remuneration or consideration.

ix. The various provisions of the Criminal Code and the White Slave Traffic (Suppression) Ordinance<sup>102</sup>, which deal with child prostitution, seem to suggest that only the recruiter is liable for the offence.

The Criminal Code punishes any person, who in order to gratify the lust of any other person, induces<sup>103</sup> or engages<sup>104</sup> a person under age to practice prostitution; encourages or facilitates the prostitution of a minor<sup>105</sup>; or with violence compels a person under age into prostitution or knowingly makes any gain or derives any benefit there from<sup>106</sup>. Similarly, the White Slave Traffic (Suppression) Ordinance criminalises whoever, in order to gratify the lust of any other person, induces a person under the age of twenty-one years to leave Malta or to come to Malta for purposes of prostitution, or encourages or facilitates his departure from Malta or arrival in Malta for the same purpose<sup>107</sup>; detains or is wilfully a party to the detention of a person, against his will, in any brothel, or in or upon any premises used for purposes of habitual prostitution<sup>108</sup>; and any person who knowingly lives on the earnings of the prostitution of any other person<sup>109</sup>.

Nevertheless, by virtue of recent amendments to the Criminal Code, the user may also be found liable for unlawful sexual activities, since the law punishes any person who participates in sexual acts with a minor, especially where recourse is made to child prostitution.<sup>110</sup>

x. Malta is a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime (Budapest, 23rd November 2001). The Convention was signed on the 17th January 2002 and ratified on the 12th April 2012. The Convention entered into force on the 1st August 2012.

xi. Maltese law fails to define the term ‘child pornography’, yet it punishes any act which is capable of portraying an indecent image of a child. The law defines the term ‘indecent material’ which includes photographs, images, audio or video recordings, digitally created or electronic images, drawings, cartoons, text and simulated representations or realistic images of a minor, even if the minor is non-existent, or of the sexual parts of a child for primarily sexual purposes.<sup>111</sup> This concise definition of the term ‘indecent material’ coincides with the definition ‘child prostitution’ in Article 20(2) of the Lanzarote Convention.

xii. The Criminal Code punishes any person who makes or produces or permits to be made or produced any indecent material or produces, distributes, disseminates, imports, exports, offers, sells, transmits, makes available, procures for oneself or for another, or shows such indecent material.<sup>112</sup> Moreover, the law punishes any person who acquires, knowingly obtains access through information and communication technologies to, or is in possession of, any indecent material which shows, depicts or represents a person under age.<sup>113</sup>

The conduct punished by the Maltese legislator is very similar to that punished by the Lanzarote Convention, and since the provision was recently added to our Code, one may conclude that it was designed purposefully to comply with the Convention.

xiii. The competent authority which controls pornographic materials is the Malta Police Force.

Malta has adopted the Lanzarote Convention without any reservation thereto, and thus it did not use the reservation right that has been given by the Lanzarote Convention in Articles 20(3) and 20(4).

xiv. The law criminalises any person who with violence compels a person under age into participating in a pornographic performance or knowingly makes any gain or derives any benefit there from;<sup>114</sup> or who engages a person under age to participate in pornographic performances;<sup>115</sup> or who knowingly causes, for sexual purposes, a person under age to participate in real or simulated sexually explicit conduct or exhibition of sexual organs, including through information and communication technologies;<sup>116</sup> or who knowingly attends a pornographic performance involving the participation of a person under age.<sup>117</sup> The term ‘knowingly’ portrays the intentional nature of the offence, which requires that the agent is willing to either compel a person to participate in pornographic performances or to attend a pornographic performance involving children.

At face value, it does not seem that the legislator highlight and differentiate between recruitment and coercion. Nonetheless, the punishment attributable to the offence when the agent ‘compels’, ‘knowingly causes’ or ‘knowingly attends’ is somewhat more heinous than when the agent ‘engages’ a child to participate in pornographic performances. This shows that the legislator is more severe when the child is knowingly and intentionally coerced to participate in such performances.

Since the Lanzarote Convention was adopted without any reservation thereto, Maltese law also punishes any person who knowingly attends a pornographic performance involving the participation of a person under age.<sup>118</sup>

2.4 Corruption of Children

xv. The Criminal Code also punishes any person who despite not having defiled a minor, instigates, encourages or facilitates the defilement thereof.<sup>119</sup> This provision extends the offence of defilement to cases whereby the minor is not physically defiled, but nonetheless the act committed by the agent instigates, encourages or facilitates the corruption minor. The wording used by the legislator is quite ambiguous, yet it is clear that the provision intends to punish any sexual act which is not committed on the person of the child but which is likewise contributory to his defilement.

In a separate provision, the law punishes whosoever knowingly causes, for sexual purposes, a person under age to witness sexual abuse or sexual activities, even without causing the said person to participate in the activities.<sup>120</sup> This article, which is based on Article 22 of the Lanzarote Convention, criminalises the intentional causing of a minor to witness sexual abuse or sexual activities, even though not participating therein. The legislator does not define the term ‘causing’, but it is clear that the agent must have intended that such sexual acts are committed in the presence of a child.

2.5 Solicitation of Children for Sexual Purposes

xvi. The law likewise punishes whosoever, by means of information or communication technologies, proposes to meet a minor for the purposes of committing any of the sexual offence provided for by the law, where the proposal is followed by the material acts leading to such meeting.<sup>121</sup> Thus the perpetrator is punished if he proposes to meet a minor by means of information or communication technologies, and such proposal is followed by concrete actions leading to such meeting.

xvii. There seems to be no specific provision regulating aiding or abetting and attempt of the abovementioned activities. Nonetheless, the said offences are regulated by the general provisions of the Criminal Code which deal with complicity<sup>122</sup> and attempt<sup>123</sup>.

2.6 Corporate Liability

xviii. Maltese Company Law adheres to the principle of separate juridical personality of companies, which considers a legal person as a person totally separate and distinct from the persons which compose it. It follows that a legal person can possess the same type of rights and be subject to the same type of duties as a physical person.<sup>124</sup> Consequently, a legal person may incur liability for any act or omission which is performed by a physical person acting on its behalf.

<sup>122</sup> The law (Criminal Code, Chapter 8 of the Laws of Malta; Article 42 (d)) provides that a person shall be deemed to be an accomplice in a crime if he... in any way whatsoever knowingly aids or abets the perpetrator or perpetrators of the crime in the acts by means of which the crime is prepared or completed.

<sup>123</sup> The law (Criminal Code, Chapter 8 of the Laws of Malta; Article 41 (1)) provides that whosoever with intent to commit a crime shall have manifested such intent by overt acts which are followed by a commencement of the execution of the crime, shall be liable on conviction.

The Criminal Code holds that where the person found guilty of any of the above mentioned offences, was at the time of the commission of the offence, the director, manager, secretary or other principal officer of a body corporate or is a person having a power of representation of such a body or having an authority to take decisions on behalf of that body or having authority to exercise control within that body and the offence of which that person was found guilty was committed for the benefit, in part or in whole, of that body corporate, the said person shall be deemed to be vested with the legal representation of the same body corporate which shall be liable to the payment of a fine.<sup>125</sup>

xix. The Criminal Code states that every offence gives rise to a criminal action and a civil action<sup>126</sup>. Therefore, a person which is prosecuted for a criminal offence may also incur civil liability for any damage which might have ensued from the same offence.

xx. Although a company may incur corporate liability for any offence committed by its members acting on its behalf, the law does not exclude individual liability as it provides that every person who at the time of the commission of the offence, was a director, manager, secretary or other similar officer of such body or association, or was purporting to act in any such capacity, shall be guilty of that offence unless he proves that the offence was committed without his knowledge and that he exercised all due diligence to prevent the commission of the offence.<sup>127</sup>

2.7 Aggravating Circumstances

xxi. Each of the sexual offences against minors is accompanied by aggravating circumstances which lead to an increase in punishment of the said offence.

For instance the offence of rape in relation to minors may be aggravated whenever the offender has availed himself of his capacity of public officer, or when the offender is a servant of the injured party, with salary or other remuneration; when the crime is committed by any ascendant, tutor, or institutor on any person under eighteen years of age; when the offender has, in the commission of the crime, been aided by one or more persons; when the offender has, in the commission of the crime, made use of any arms proper; when the person on whom the crime is committed, or any other person who has come to the assistance of that person, has sustained any bodily harm; when the person carnally known has not completed the age of nine years; when the crime is committed in the presence of, or within hearing distance of a minor.<sup>128</sup>

The offence of defilement of minors is aggravated whenever the offence is committed on a person who has not completed the age of twelve years, or with violence; the offence is committed by means of threats or deceit; the offence is committed by any ascendant by consanguinity or affinity, or by the adoptive father or mother, or by the tutor of the minor, or by any other person charged, even though temporarily, with the care, education, instruction, control or custody of the minor.<sup>129</sup> These aggravations also apply when the offender induces, encourages or facilitates child prostitution together with a further aggravation which requires that the offence is committed habitually or for gain.<sup>130</sup>

The offences of instigation with violence or inducing persons under age to prostitution or to participation in pornographic performances is aggravated when the offender wilfully or recklessly endangered the life of the person under age; when the offence involves violence or grievous bodily harm on such person; and when the offence is committed with the involvement of a criminal organisation.<sup>131</sup>

Furthermore, the Criminal Code contains a list of aggravating circumstances which should apply to each of the aforementioned crimes. These apply where the offence results in harm to the physical or mental health of the person under age; where the person under age is a vulnerable person; where the offence is committed by two or more persons acting together; if the offender lives with or is a member of the victim's family; if the offender has been previously convicted of a sexual offence.<sup>132</sup>

2.8 Sanctions and Measures

xxii. The previously discussed offences are all classified as Crimes affecting the good order, peace and honour of the family. The integrity of the family is one of the most fundamental values safeguarded by the Maltese authorities and society, hence the crimes against it are considered as extremely grievous. Therefore, for all of the discussed crimes, the legislator has provided that the adequate sanction should be imprisonment. However, the terms for this deprivation of liberty vary in accordance with the heinous nature of each individual crime.

For a better understanding of the punishment allotted to each individual crime, one may refer to the schedule illustrated below.<sup>133</sup>

Crime	Imprisonment Term	Aggravating circumstances and increase in imprisonment term.
		Minor under the age of 12	Life at risk, Violence, Grievous Bodily Harm	Consanguinity, Affinity or Custody
Sexual Abuse	3-9 Years	increased by one degree	increased by one degree	increased by one degree
Child Prostitution	2-6 years	2-6 years	2-6 years	3-6 years
Child Pornography	12months-5 years	2-8 years	2-9 years	2-9years
Corruption of Children (Defilement)	not exceeding 3 years	3-6 years	3-6 years	3-6 years
Solicitation of Children for Sexual Purposes	not exceeding 2 years	not exceeding 4 years	not exceeding 4 years	not exceeding 4 years

One should remark that in relation to the crime of Corruption (defilement) of Minors, the law states that; “No proceedings shall be instituted in respect of any offence under this article except on the complaint of the injured party”<sup>134</sup>. However, where the offence is accompanied with an aggravating circumstance the proceedings shall be instituted out of the authorities’ own motion.

Apart from the listed offences the Maltese Criminal Code provides an additional offence, ‘Sexual Activities with Minors’<sup>135</sup>. This may be regarded as a more general provision which encompasses an activity that does not fit the characteristics of any one of the other discussed offences. The penalty for the offence of having sexual activities with minors is that of an imprisonment term not exceeding two years. However, following the spirit of the law as promulgated with regards to the other offences, if this offence subsists with an aggravation then the imprisonment term may be from 2-6 years.

Imprisonment is not the only type of penalty contemplated by the law. Another type of retribution is the forfeiture of any supervision or authority exercised on the minor or his property when the offence has been committed by a person having some degree of authority over the minor.

On the 20th of January 2012, a new Act was promulgated by the Maltese Legislator<sup>136</sup>. This Act, entitled ‘Protection of Minors (Registration) Act’ has created an Offender’s Register<sup>137</sup>, where the names of any person found guilty of the accused offences should be listed making them

“ineligible for membership of, or any employment or other position with, any institution, establishment or organisation providing or organising any service or activity which involves the education, care, custody, welfare or upbringing of minors, whether such membership, employment or other position is against payment or otherwise.”<sup>138</sup>

Moreover, the Act imposes an obligation on all those employing or hiring the services of people whose position brings them in contact with children, to request the court for any information contained within the Register about a particular employee or prospective member of staff. Hiring a registered person would result in an offence carrying a term of imprisonment from three months to four years and/or, a fine between €2500 and €50,000<sup>139</sup>. Hence, this relatively new piece of legislation provides for an additional penalty which may be awarded at the discretion of the Judiciary. Therefore, this framework is aimed at preventing a scenario where children, instead of being sheltered and protected, are exposed to a child abuser or a person who has disrespected a child’s dignity.

The ‘Extradition Act’<sup>140</sup> and the ‘Criminal Code’<sup>141</sup> are the main legislative documents regulating extradition proceedings in Malta. Also, various bilateral Treaties have been signed by the Maltese authorities with other foreign jurisdictions as to specifically regulate the procedure for extradition between them. As provided by Article 8 of the Extradition Act, for a person to be extradited from Malta, the offence they are accused of must be one which has been provided for by the ‘arrangement’ between states and must carry at least a twelve month imprisonment term. Also following the principle of the double criminality rule “the act or omission constituting the offence or the equivalent act or omission, would constitute an offence against the law of Malta” if committed within Maltese jurisdiction. This does not imply that the offence must carry the same title or description, but that the offence as recognised within both jurisdictions is substantially the same.

As from 12th April 2012, Malta has also ratified the Council of Europe’s Cybercrime Convention<sup>142</sup>. Through the entering into force of such document, extradition provisions with regards to cybercrime offences such as child pornography<sup>143</sup> through the use of computer technology have become applicable within the Maltese jurisdiction.

xxiii. When asked about the proportionality of the sanctions provided by the Maltese jurisdiction one is inclined to answer positively, as the law seems to cater for a wide range of circumstances, including different aggravating circumstances, with harsh penalties. Moreover, the introduction of the Child Offender’s Register is a positive step forward towards better protection of children’s dignity and rights.

However, one must still comment that in certain areas, the provided sanctions still lack the expected effectiveness and dissuasiveness.

During a meeting held by the Maltese Legal Research Group with the Commissioner for Children on the 25th of June 2012, the Commissioner commented on three main areas which should be targeted in the legislator’s aim to increase sanctions’ effectiveness and dissuasiveness.

Firstly, the Commissioner advocated the drafting and application of harsher penalties with regards to offences concerning sexual abuse or violence, especially those relating to inducing or instigation of child prostitution<sup>144</sup>. Such recommendation results in a dual obligation, one upon drafters of the law to implement harsher penalties and the other upon the judiciary to apply such sanctions.

Secondly, the Commissioner commented on the lack of use by the judiciary of the Child Offender's Register. Until the date of the meeting, the local media had reported that only one name had been listed in the Register from a total of 14 persons being convicted of crimes which as provided by the Schedule of the relevant Act should be listed in the Register<sup>145</sup>. This first name was then later joined by a second on the 1st of November 2012 where the local courts condemned the perpetrator to four years imprisonment simultaneously to having his name listed on the Register.<sup>146</sup> When interviewed about the subject the Commissioner stated that; "It is obvious that this new tool cannot be effective in protecting children from crime unless it is applied whenever possible."<sup>147</sup> One might argue that the lack of effectiveness of this particular sanction is that too much discretion has been left to the judiciary. Hence, two possible solutions would be; either to transform this sanction in a mandatory procedure, or to persuade the courts to resort more frequently (ideally always) to this mechanism. In this author's opinion, the latter solution would be better than the former since one would still retain the judiciary's discretion, which ultimately is the result of wise and well-learned people, while still ensuring that the provided procedures are being implemented resulting in a more dissuasive nature of the stipulated sanctions.

The third comment made by the Commissioner during our meeting was the need for better co-ordination and structuring of the laws, as currently, the various relevant laws are scattered "like a puzzle" throughout the different statutes and chapters of the law. Hence, a better solution would be to have one document which incorporates all the relevant provisions relating to the enforcement of children's rights. This should facilitate procedures making the application of justice much more expedient.

Such criticism towards the effectiveness and dissuasiveness of the sanctions imposed by the Maltese legislator may be also supported by referring to the U.S Trafficking in Persons Report of 2012. With reference to Malta, the Report recognises the commitment of the Maltese authorities in ensuring better prosecution, protection and prevention in relation to Human Trafficking offences and the progress it has made in these areas. However, it remarks that:

“the Maltese government did not identify children in prostitution as sex trafficking victims or provide them with support available under Maltese anti-trafficking laws, but instead charged some of them for loitering for prostitution and sometimes subjected them to punishment.”

In the light of such analysis, one must comment that because of the complexity of this subject what the local jurisdiction requires are not only harsher penalties but also an increased education and awareness programme. This programme would act both as a deterrent to prospective offenders, while simultaneously offer an opportunity to victims to report their cases and seek assistance. In fact, a study by the Eurobarometer<sup>148</sup> across the 27 member states on the Rights of the Child in 2008, showed that when it came to respondent's perceptions about the levels of protection of the Rights of the Child, Malta fared quite well with 27% of respondent's saying that rights in Malta are very well protected, while another 51% saying that they are fairly well protected. However, when it came to responses regarding the likelihood of seeking help when the Rights of the Child have been violated, 85% of respondents answered that they wouldn't report. Therefore, one concludes that apart from the sanctions and the various awareness campaigns held by the various authorities and institutions, a more public debate on the subject which encourages victims to report their abuse should be implemented. It is only through the combined work of all these instruments that the desired effectiveness and dissuasiveness of the intended sanctions may be truly achieved.

xxiv. One of the offences for which the Maltese jurisdiction recognises the criminal liability of legal persons is that of trafficking of minors<sup>149</sup>. When trafficking of minors is carried out by a legal person, or as the law defines it - a body corporate, the penalty of imprisonment cannot be applied. Hence, the law provides that the applicable sanction shall be a hefty fine of not less than €11,646.87 and not exceeding €1,863,498.72. Such liability shall extend to a person within the employment of the body corporate whose lack of prudence in the carrying out of his responsibilities resulted in commission of the offence. This standing of the law

xxv. Articles 667 to 670 of the Maltese Criminal Code provide for the necessary procedures for seizure and confiscation of materials and instruments related to the crime. All property related to the crime must be delivered by the court to the Registrar who shall hold it in its custody until the conclusion of the relevant proceedings. All such property must be “properly catalogued, stored and preserved and kept in a secure place to be determined by the registrar.”<sup>151</sup>

With regards to property not owned by the accused, the law in article 674 provides that if the confiscated property belongs to a third party in good faith, such property shall be returned to him upon the property being released by the court. This return is subject to the third person’s ability to prove his title on the property, and “that there [is] no longer any need that the property remains materially exhibited in the record of the proceedings.”

xxvi. As stated during this report’s analysis of the sanctions imposed by law “the integrity of the family is one of the most fundamental values safeguarded by the Maltese authorities and society”. Hence, when crimes are committed within the family environment - that environment where the child should feel most secure, the grievousness of the crime increases. This heinous nature is reflected in the law’s consideration that when the abuse is carried out by a person who is close to the minor, or even a relative of the minor, this should be deemed as an aggravating circumstance resulting in longer imprisonment terms<sup>152</sup>. Unfortunately, because cases of abuse within the family environment are even more complex and delicate, victims may find it more difficult to report the abuse. Also, removing a child from the home may not always be in the best interest of the child.<sup>153</sup> Moreover, one must remark the lack of adequate facilities which cater for this type of cases.

The main governmental institution which offers its assistance and support to victims and their families is the ‘Aġenzija Appogg’. The agency conducts various educational

3.1 Investigation

i. The provisions on the powers of the Executive Police in the Criminal Code do not expressly enshrine the principle of best interests of the child,<sup>154</sup> but some provisions do reflect a more considerate approach towards minors during investigation of crimes, generally.

The Code of Practice for Interrogation of Arrested Persons, attached to the Fourth Schedule of the Police Act,<sup>155</sup> obliges Policemen to give ‘special attention’ when interrogating minors, irrespective of whether they are the victims. Police are to interrogate the minor, to the extent that it is practicable, before the presence of ‘a parent, tutor, foster carer, social worker, or any other person who has the effective care and custody of the young person’.<sup>156</sup> The Code also requires, to the extent that it is practicable, that minors attending school are not arrested, or interrogated, at school.<sup>157</sup> However, if this is not practicable, then the interrogation is to be conducted before the presence of the head teacher.<sup>158</sup> Both rules allow a certain degree of flexibility to the Police when conducting interrogations to treat each case accordingly on a case by case basis.

In this respect, a recent report commissioned by the Office of the Commissioner for Children, criticised the use of police depots and police stations as unsuitable premises for conducting interrogations with victims, witnesses, and offenders alike, who are not of age.<sup>159</sup> The report went on to recommend that:

“[p]olice and judicial proceedings, especially at the initial stages of the judicial process, should be carried out in a specially dedicated place, known as a ‘children’s house’<sup>160</sup>, where a multidisciplinary team of professionals, including professionals from social welfare services, forensic medical experts, psychologists, the police and prosecutors’ offices can collaborate so that proceedings can be carried out thoroughly whilst ensuring the protection and promotion of the minors’ well-being.”<sup>161</sup>

The rule is that where proceedings relate to a minor who has not, at the time of the proceedings, attained the age of sixteen, the Juvenile Court is competent to hear the case.<sup>162</sup> The Juvenile Court is a dedicated court for hearing cases against minors or where minors are involved. Unless the minor has committed an offence together with an adult in which case the child may – and usually is – tried in the adult court. It is deemed to have the same jurisdiction and powers as a Court of Magistrates, albeit it is more flexible when it comes to appointment of sittings,<sup>163</sup> by default court hearings are not open to the public,<sup>164</sup> and there are considerable restrictions when it comes to newspaper reports relating to hearings before the Juvenile Court.<sup>165</sup>

Where the Juvenile Court is not competent to hear the case, it is generally heard before the Court of Magistrates, whether sitting as a Court of Criminal Judicature or a Court of Criminal Inquiry. In such proceedings there is no need for the minor, as a victim, to be part in criminal proceedings against the perpetrator. However, the minor may appear before the Court and engage an advocate or a legal procurator to assist him.<sup>166</sup> The legal representative may examine or cross-examine witnesses, produce evidence or make, in support of the charge, any other submission which the court may consider admissible.<sup>167</sup> This is only possible if the minor is accompanied by a parent, relative, or guardian.<sup>168</sup>

ii. No there are no special units dedicated specifically to the crimes mentioned earlier, but within the Maltese Police force there are special investigative units that deal with such crimes. The Vice Squad is responsible for investigations relating to child sexual abuse<sup>169</sup>, while the Cyber Crime unit investigates matters relating to the internet; including child pornography, child safety and ‘e-stalking’. The Cyber Crime Unit is authorised to monitor internet use that may potentially produce, distribute or collect any prohibited data.<sup>170</sup> Operation “Rudolph” carried out by the Cyber Crime unit in 2003-2004 successfully brought to justice 13 persons; most of them were found guilty of crimes relating to child pornography. Another similar operation (“Fekruna”) was carried out by the same unit in 2008, but this time the scope of the investigation was widened to more than one p2p network, the Unit successfully arrested 13 persons.<sup>171</sup>

iii. Generally, criminal offences are acted upon without the complaint of the injured party (ex officio), however there are certain cases which require the official complaint of the injured party in order for the police to prosecute the offender (querela da parte). Sexual offences require such formal complaint (querela da parte), in order for the police to be able to initiate criminal proceedings. Nonetheless in the case of defilement of minors, the law provides that proceedings may be instituted without the complaint of the injured party (ex officio) whenever the crime is accompanied by public violence or any other offence affecting the public order or when the act is committed with abuse of parental authority or tutorship.<sup>172</sup>

The Criminal Code further provides that when proceedings cannot be instituted except upon the complaint of the private party (querela da parte), the complainant may, at any time before the final judgement is delivered, withdraw his complaint.<sup>173</sup> Where the offence is prosecuted under the Domestic Violence Act there is no need for a querela and the police must act on receipt of info ex officio.

iv. The statute of limitation is known under Maltese legislation as prescription or prescriptive period. As established by article 688 of the local Criminal Code, criminal action is time barred in accordance with the term of imprisonment imposed by the law. The offences discussed in this report all carry an imprisonment term which is not less than 1 year and some of them even exceed the six year imprisonment term<sup>174</sup>, hence, they are all barred by the lapse of five to ten years<sup>175</sup>.

In determining at what point does the prescriptive period start to run, one must look at the nature of the offence, meaning whether it is completed, continuous or continuing. In the case of a completed offence, prescription commences from day of completion, where it is continuous from the day the last violation took place and continuing from when the continuance ceased<sup>176</sup>. Therefore, in cases of a continuous case of sexual abuse, the prescriptive period shall start to run from the last episode of abuse.

Suspension of this prescriptive period shall commence from the moment the accused is served with a charge or bill of indictment<sup>177</sup>. This suspension shall subsist until the proceedings commenced through this charge or bill, become a res judicata i.e. a final and definitive judgment. Suspension shall also take place when for the criminal proceedings to be instituted a special authorisation must be issued. There is also the possibility for interruption of prescription, meaning that the statute of limitation is not only suspended but it shall run anew from the day it was interrupted<sup>178</sup>. Such procedure occurs when the accused is served with the proper notification of the charges brought against him and when a warrant of arrest or summons is issued.

v. There is no specific reference in the Criminal Code of Malta in relation to an uncertainty with regards to the age of the victims in said offences. Nevertheless, one of the basic principles of criminal law is the presumption of innocence, enshrined both in the Maltese Constitution as well as in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of The European Union:

5) Every person who is charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed to be innocent until he is proved or has pleaded guilty<sup>179</sup>

Everyone who has been charged shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law.<sup>180</sup>

This principles is also referred to by the maxim, onus probandi incumbit qui dicit, non qui negat which implies that the onus of proof, which in criminal cases is beyond reasonable doubt, lies with the prosecution. Thus, it is up to the latter to collect evidence and present facts which prove or indicate that the age of the victim in question, is that which is required by law.

vi. According to the Lanzarote Convention <sup>181</sup> “Each party shall take the necessary legislative or other measures to collect and store, in accordance with the relevant provisions on the protection of personal data and other appropriate rules and guarantees as prescribed by domestic law, data relating to the identity and to the genetic profile (DNA) of persons convicted of the offences established in accordance with this Convention.”

According to section 17 (1) of the Data Protection Act,<sup>182</sup> “Data which relates to offences, criminal convictions or security measures may only be processed under the control of a public authority” sub-article 2 of the same section states that “For this purpose, the Minister may by regulations authorise any person to process the data referred to in sub article (1), subject to such suitable specific safeguards as may be prescribed: Provided that a complete register of criminal convictions may only be kept under the control of a public authority.”

According to information collected from the Office of the Attorney General in Malta<sup>183</sup> the responsibility for the updating and safe keeping of the ‘conviction sheet’ is in the hands of the Police. It is the police who continue to update the latter. According to the same source the ‘conviction sheet’ is filed in Court each time proceedings are instituted and a criminal case commences. The transmission of data to other competent authorities in other states is dealt with by a specific department at the Attorney General’s office also in Valletta, referred to as the department of International Law.

3.2 Complaint Procedure

vii. Sexual offences require that victim or the person having his or her legal representation lodge an official complaint (querela da parte) to the competent authorities i.e. the Executive Police.<sup>184</sup> Nonetheless, when the crime is accompanied by public violence or when the act is committed with abuse of parental authority or tutorship, proceedings shall be instituted even if there is no official complaint of the injured party (ex officio).<sup>185</sup>

Although children may themselves lodge a complaint against their aggressor, parents still have their legal representation, and thus it is ultimately up to the parents to determine whether proceedings are instituted. When the offender is a family member, parents may decide not to institute proceedings in order to prevent further family problems, and thus the aggressor may in certain situations go unpunished. Moreover, a rule of criminal procedure provides that when proceedings require the complaint of the injured party, the complainant may, at any time before the final judgement is delivered, withdraw his complaint.<sup>186</sup> It is therefore possible to have situations whereby parents initially institute proceedings, and then for some reason or other waive their complaint while the case is being heard.

The complaint to the Executive Police may be made either verbally or in writing.<sup>187</sup>

viii. The current Maltese legislative system does not provide a child with the possibility to make a personal request for an advocate to be appointed on his behalf<sup>188</sup>. Such appointment may be done at the discretion of the judge, or upon the request of a mediator or a parent<sup>189</sup>. Hence, a child, even though desiring representation via a child advocate must depend on what adults deem to be adequate in his best interests.<sup>190</sup> Therefore, children in Malta are not vested with a direct and independent right of representation. Such a situation is alarming in cases where a child would have to institute proceedings against either one of his parents, or maybe even both of them. In such a scenario, a child's access to justice would be limited to the will of one custodial parent or only to that of the mediator or a judge.<sup>191</sup>

This same argument applies for the appointment of curators by the superior courts as provided by Article 929 of the Code of Organisation of Civil Procedure.<sup>192</sup> However, in accordance with this article the court ‘shall’ and not ‘may’ appoint a curator. Therefore the obligation to appoint a curator leaves less discretion than that given in the appointment of a child advocate. Nevertheless, in practice, it is very common to find that a parent would be appointed as a ‘curator ad litem’ for the child, which doesn’t necessarily result in the parent working in the best interest of the child. Interesting to note that a child under tutorship may protest against the tutor’s care directly to the court. The newer legislation under the Foster Care Act and Adoption Admin Act and CC amendments give the child the right to a child advocate.

In analysing the above described procedures, one might argue that the Maltese system does not abide with the obligations Malta subscribed to when signing the UN CRC<sup>193</sup>. This international instrument stipulates that states shall assure that a child may express his opinion on all matters which affect him, and that this would include the provision of a system where the child is heard and is adequately represented. It is in the light of both Malta’s international obligations under this Convention, and also of the very need to cater for a more child-friendly justice system, that our authorities are called to legislate on the necessary amendments without further delay.

A level of protection for minors against their parents is offered by Subsidiary Legislation 440.04<sup>194</sup> which stipulates that if any information is ‘derived by any teacher, member of a school administration, or any other person acting in loco parentis or in a professional capacity in relation to a minor’, this person may process the information if in the best interest of the child. Moreover, such person may decide not to seek the permission of the parent or the legal guardian and also to withhold from sharing this information with the parent. Hence, if a child feels safe to confide in an educator or a professional about a particular situation which involves abuse by parents, this person acting in loco parentis may institute the necessary proceedings independently from the knowledge and will of the child's parents. However, one must remark, that in such a context, children are again dependant on an adult to institute the relevant claims.

With regards to the participation of minors in trials, one must refer to article 391.3 of the Criminal Code which provides that witnesses given by minors under the age of sixteen 'shall be examined and cross-examined in one sitting and his testimony shall be recorded by audio-visual means.' It is only for exceptional circumstances that this rule may be derogated from. Moreover, when it comes to the publication of names of minors, it is a common rule of practice exercised by our courts that the names of minors are not disclosed. This prohibition upon both the court's registrar and the media, extends to the publication of the names of relatives or acquaintances related to the minor. The motive behind such custom is the protection of the minor's identity which is especially important in a small and closed community such as the Maltese society.

4 COMPLEMENTARY MEASURES

i. Educational guarantees are enshrined in the Chapter 451 - Mutual Recognition of Qualifications Act which applies to all professionals, including those working with children in the area of sexual exploitation and abuse. In Article 3, it specifies that "no applicant shall be entitled to practice a regulated profession or a regulated professional activity unless he fulfils the conditions for the taking up or pursuit of that profession or activity in accordance with the provisions of this Act".<sup>195</sup> Moreover, in Schedule Article 2, the legislation in relation to the profession of Social Worker is the Social Work Profession Act, Cap. 468. The latter act describes a "registered social worker" or "social worker" means a "person who is registered in the official register of social workers kept by the Board and who has been granted a warrant to practice the profession of social work, in accordance with article 6".<sup>196</sup> Article 3 of such legislation further disqualifies "any person from working as a social worker against payment, assuming such title or holding himself out to be a professional social worker, unless he is a holder of a warrant issued under this act". In the five-year university undergraduate course, Doctors in Malta are trained, among the other areas, in the field of Paediatrics. This subject is described in the Course Description provided by the University of Malta as dealing with the children's health from various perspectives including the social point of view". During these lectures, policies and procedures are outlined so that these professionals will have the knowledge on how to deal with cases of sexual abuse.

To qualify for such a warrant, a person must be:

- h) is a Maltese citizen, or is otherwise permitted to work in Malta under any law; and
- i) is of good conduct; and
- j) is in possession of the Honours Degree in Social Work conferred by the University of Malta or of another professional qualification as the Board may deem equivalent;
- k) satisfies the Board that he has received adequate experience in the practice of the profession of social work for an aggregate period of at least two years fulltime or its equivalent in part-time following the completion of such degree or such other professional qualification under the supervision of a registered social worker.

However, there are other professionals dealing with children in the aforementioned scenarios. Teachers play an essential role in these cases and thus, the Directorate for Quality and Standards in Education together with E-learning, the Secretariat for Catholic Education and Culture are organizing courses to deal with such matters. One of such courses is entitled "Child Abuse: Awareness, Intervention & Policy Procedures" aimed to aid teachers in the class environment by provide a definition of child abuse and tackle other important issues such as awareness of the abuse and what techniques are to be adopted.

ii. There are a lot of programmes intended to educate children on these matters, targeted both to students (from primary to secondary students) and to their parents. On the Sedqa Website, one may find the following variety of curriculums tackling these issues:

In Primary Schools Sedqa delivers interventions via its facilitators and school teachers, by providing "age-appropriate resources to be used during these programmes and educational talks and resources for parents. Sedqa also provides training seminars for professionals within the education system, who are willing to use Sedqa resources."<sup>197</sup> Amongst these programs one may find T.F.A.L. Year 3: B.A.B.E.S Programme, T.F.A.L. Year 5: Programme Workbook , and T.F.A.L. Year 6: Qed Nikber.”

For senior classes in secondary and Post-Secondary schools, there is the LifeForce International Programme described as a Christian Theatre Organization<sup>198</sup> which organizes sessions addressing a variety of topics such addictions, bullying and violence, abuse and decision-making. Parents are also a part of the equation. Talks on such topics are offered in different times of the day to complement the limited availability of the parents. Apart from talks, sessions and lesson plans, Sedqa also offers leaflets which provide useful information both to adults as well as to children so as to be aware of what is abuse and how to deal with such situations.

As part of the Council of Europe Campaign “One in Five” Commission for Children Helen D’Amato launched the translated story book “Kiko and the Hand”. The latter was complemented with a parents’ guide educated them in preventing cases of sexual abuse and violence against children.<sup>199</sup>

iii. Currently, there are no specific intervention programs of this sort yet when there is suspicious behaviour which may give indications that the person in question is prone to commit the crime, psychology is usually the way forward. In the case of minors, Sedqa psychologists come into the picture, whilst in the case of adults, a system of referral comes into place. The latter are referred to private psychologists which will in turn aid in suppressing any negative outcomes.<sup>200</sup>

iv. Yes, Sedqa outlines a selection of programmes providing support, such as: “Kellimni” which, guided by the child helpline international, is a joint project between SOS Malta, Salesian’s of Don Bosco and the two agencies Appoġġ and Agenzija Zghazagh, encompassing support through the internet via e-mail, chat and online forums. “Programm Ulied Darna” comprises professional support and supervision on a voluntary basis, aimed at training parents in their family life by “enhancing their parenting skills, budgeting skills and housekeeping techniques”.<sup>201</sup>

v. Yes, there is a child helpline with the number 179, operated by the agency Apogg. According to the agency's website, this freephone helpline provides "confidential support", serves as a source of useful information with regards to local welfare services, and is used also as a referral hub. Moreover, one can easily contact the agency itself via the number 2295 9000. Agenzija Appogg also makes reference to the EU-Wide Emotional Support Helpline 116 123 which is "available to all local and foreign citizens in Malta". This project is managed by the European Commission. The aim is to have one international number as directed by the European Commission, recognisable in all EU member states, available for all European citizens.

vi. State-directed agencies aid victims of sexual abuse to deal with the aftermath of such a trauma. "Appogg" caters for a wide spectrum of psychological-induced problems. Its services range from and include family therapy, carrying out adoptions and the reporting of child abuse over the internet. Psychologists who work at this same agency make sure that knowledge about the particularity of sexual abuse becomes common as they frequently take interviews on various kinds of media.

There are also specific programmes aimed to aid victims in their recovery, including:

Intake& Protection Services customer care personnel available to help the persons involved in making an appointment with a social worker and also refer them or inform them on any services which they might require. On the other hand, those in charge at the "Appogg" assess the needs of such persons and offer the much needed help within or outside the Agency, as the case may be. This aids to inform the victims about any recovery or intervention programs available for their use. Despite the need to tackle certain issues such as long waiting lists due to lack of psychologists, one should mention the introduction of having the option to record the children's testimonies or else listen to them via video-conferencing.

III NATIONAL POLICY REGARDING CHILDREN

i. Malta holds a solid foundation in the protection of children; not solely by discussing it but by reaching a consensus on the idea that children should be protected in every circumstance of life. Therefore rather than a discussion the State is constantly reminding society of the importance of such a factor by issuing campaigns in all areas of exploitation of children, be they sexual or otherwise. It may also be argued that children's services may come up on the agenda but in general they are still to be acknowledged as rights holders in terms of the CRC and your previous observations re child representation and participation, for instance, reinforce this.

Malta has a Commissioner for Children who is the political representative of children on a State level. Children need a voice as well as the right to be protected, and since many of them do not have the luxury to be represented by a parent, they need an entity that will represent them always.

The role of the Commissioner for Children was embedded in our law through the Commissioner for Children Act<sup>202</sup> which was passed on the 5th of December 2003. Our present Commissioner is Mrs. Helen D' Amato<sup>203</sup> who succeeds two other former commissioners. It is clear that in Malta the issue of a state representative for the protection of children has been present for the last nine year. Can we deem this a very short period and view this act as something very recent? We may. But we may also acknowledge the fact that the need for child protection is not only recognized but has become a priority due to it being embedded in our law to be further developed.

“4. In the exercise of the functions established under this Act, the Commissioner shall act independently and shall not be subject to the direction or control of any other person or authority.”<sup>204</sup>

The Commissioner for Children must act as an independent body from all other State organs whereas being participant in State matters which involve the well-being of children.<sup>205</sup> It is clear that the position of the commissioner is not led by politics or hidden agendas but rather has set principles which guide it:

- “10....(a) that the best interest of children and the family are paramount;
- (b) that all children are to be treated with dignity, respect and fairness;
- (c) disabled children and children with disadvantaged family or social circumstances should enjoy the same quality of life like all other children;

<sup>203</sup> Mrs. D'Amato is the third Commissioner for Children. She has a vast and broad range of experience in this sector, and was appointed as Commissioner on the 20th May 2010, after consultation with the Social Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives

<sup>205</sup> Noteworthy to this is that the Commissioner for Children is dependent on the Ministry with regards to matters relating to funding and although she is appointed by the Prime Minister and not the President, she answers to the Ministry of Justice Dialogue and the Family

- (d) that children and their families are to be provided with opportunities to participate in decisions that affect them and in defining, planning and evaluating services to children; and
- (e) that government, families and communities share the responsibility for the promotion of the development and well-being of children.”<sup>206</sup>

This office is assisted by the Council of Children which is made up of the Commissioner for Children as Chairperson, five other members appointed by different Ministries, Chairperson of the Social Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, two other members co-opted by the Commissioner for Children and approved by the Council, four young persons co-opted by the Commissioner for Children and approved by the Council<sup>207</sup>. As we can see the Council has a wide spectrum of members all emanating from different bodies, however not lacking in expertise when it comes to children. This makes for a wide discussion with tangible solutions due to the knowledge of the subjects and issues at hand.

The functions of the Council according to the same Act mentioned prior are:

- “ 12. (6)(a) to monitor compliance with the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child as ratified by Malta and with all such other international treaties, conventions or agreements relating to children as are or may be ratified or otherwise acceded to by Malta;
- (b) generally to advise and assist the Commissioner in the performance of the functions of the Commissioner as listed in the Act;
- (c) to advise and assist the Commissioner in the promotion of the welfare of children as specified in Article 11 of the Act.”<sup>208</sup>

It is important that as a State we have to be aligned to European and international conventions on the rights of the child, providing the standards set out in these documents and treaties; hence Malta’s ratification to the Children’s Rights Convention in 1990.

These are the principles that hold together this office and as a result the role of the Commissioner for Children can really be seen as Malta’s foundation for the protection of children on a state level.

There are various notions to what constitutes protection of a child as well as there are various dangers that a child must be protected from. Society must aid to eliminate such issues and use a tactic of prevention rather than cure. The state's political discussion can really be reflected in what the Office for the Commissioner for Children is implementing in terms of national policy.

It is best to present various situations through time where political discussions were made and various policies implemented

In 2007/2008 the Commissioner at the time undertook the project called the Manifesto for Children. This manifesto was created to guide political parties contesting the general election in 2008 to generate policies to address children's social problems at the time. In 2008 children's rights were very much in a rudimentary stage and therefore further development was needed. This manifesto was officially launched in February of 2008, creating a perfect scenario for political parties' to make an effort in discussing such issues and providing concrete solution due to the run up to the election.

In that same year the Commissioner for Children focused on children in out of home care. This was a three year project intended to lay down the foundations for a national policy and strategy for out-of-home care in Malta. Due to the issue being a consistent one the office took it upon itself to bring together a team of researchers to embark on a three phase project<sup>209</sup> asking significant questions to compile the necessary factors that would identify this trend. In a recent report<sup>210</sup> it was stated that further progress was made in the completion of this project, and the writing of the synopsis for the three study areas is expected to be finalised in 2012 and published as a book, whilst all research work will be in the form of an e-book.<sup>211</sup>

In 2010 a follow up to the Manifesto for Children was made, giving a sense of continuity and consistency to the principal goals set out in the first draft. This was launched in the beginning of 2011 and focused on principles found in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

In October 2009 the Platform for Children was launched, based on the theme of Poverty and Exclusion. A familiarisation workshop was held as well as various presentations on the issue given by the Commissioner herself and the Social Inclusion Unit within the Ministry for Social Policy. A discussion was held on the various concerns raised such as:

“the lack of a comprehensive legal framework that focuses on the rights of the child; the need for continuous research, monitoring and evaluation of currently available services; the need for community based services and care; the need for more inclusive education; as well as the importance of financial support and human resources for NGOs in order to collectively reach the necessary goals and targets.”<sup>212</sup>

This platform is purely based on the idea of advocacy for children’s rights and creates a system to support NGOs working in this field, to attend meetings and conferences in Europe. Such meetings aid at creating an effective network of NGOs to help promote children’s rights.

In the same year a new programme was envisaged called Be Smart Online! – A Safer Internet Centre for Malta. This project involved the participation of various entities such as the Malta Communications Authority, Agenzija Appogg, the Directorate for Educational Services, the Cyber Crime Unit and the Office of the Commissioner for Children. The aim here was to set up a safe environment for children on the internet and to eliminate any abuse that children might be exposed to through the internet.

“This project is still running with an aim of raising awareness, fighting illegal content on the internet, and empowering and protecting children online. Through this project, stakeholders will establish and maintain partnerships and promote dialogue and exchange of information within this sector on both a national and European level, and adopt an active approach towards increasing safe access to new technologies for children.”<sup>213</sup>

The inexistence of a National Child Policy was severely felt and therefore as a consequence was highly welcomed by the Office in 2012 when invited by the Ministry of Education to formulate such a policy. This drafting was completed in 2011 and launched in November of the same year, with a period of public consultation which should lead to the planning of a strategy consisting of concrete measures to realise these principles set.

The creation of the National Children's Policy<sup>214</sup>, ranges from the very foundations and principles of the best interest of the child, to their protection and also to their right to leisure and creativity. It offers a vision of what has been discussed over the years between various institutions on various issues, combined into one idea and document.

"The KA<sup>215</sup> would like to reiterate that the importance of this document is that it focuses public attention on children and issues related to their vulnerability and protection. The major argument, weaving throughout the document, is that children should be valued for who they are and not for what they can achieve. The KA would like to point out that in order to respond to the needs highlighted by the document, Maltese society needs to clarify its value system and decide what it really values and what it is willing to forfeit in order to safeguard its most prized possession ... the child."<sup>216</sup>

All of the policies mentioned indicate that there is a serious political discussion about children's protection in Malta. Without a doubt the most substantial of them all is the creation of the National Children's Policy which is the best evidence of this political discussion. Having said this, we cannot say that lacunae do not exist especially within the realm of sexual exploitation.

ii. Unfortunately, through extensive research in this area, one has to come to the conclusion that in Malta there are no NGOs dealing with children's sexual abuse and exploitation specifically. The only NGO that deals with children in terms of protection of their rights is Celebrities for Kids<sup>217</sup> set up by Chris Fearne, a paediatric surgeon and father of three, in March 2011. Since his job entails treating children's injuries as well as nursing them back to health he decided to set up this NGO to try and curb any harm that might be forthcoming to them.

Their first campaign in raising awareness in society through this NGO was that called Child Safety and Injury Prevention which focuses on ensuring that kids have a right to a safe environment. It was determined that the most serious injuries for school-aged children are those related to traffic accidents through the arrival and departure to and from school respectively, either through the use of the bus and school bus or even crossing the road. was determined that implementing new measures would help minimise such accidents on children, such as having the presence of a responsible adult on the bus, having the kids buckled into their seats and the necessary equipment to cut them out of such belts should the need arise.

CFK's<sup>218</sup> main goal however is not that dealing specifically with the topic at hand as was mentioned earlier<sup>219</sup>. Therefore Malta seems to be at a loss with regards to NGOs on such matters. By elimination the only agency dealing with child abuse and sexual exploitation is the State agency, Agenzija Appogg.

Having spoken with Ruth Sciberras<sup>220</sup>, an experienced social worker who also works at the resource centre with Agenzija Appogg, she highlighted some of the key events and campaigns that happen through the year on an annual basis.

Agenzija Appogg creates a lot of awareness through the media. It submits various articles to the Times as well as appearing on various local TV programmes to promote the need of volunteers within the agency whilst all the while promoting the work that is done within Appogg. She explained that the agency has a hundred volunteers, ranging between students and older people who feel that they want to contribute in the work being done to protect these children.

Appogg also initiated the Blue Ribbon Campaign<sup>221</sup>, a campaign which has peculiar origins. It originated through the pain of an American lady, a grandmother whose niece was abused and therefore in order to raise awareness she would go around in a van with many blue ribbons each one signifying a bruise on the child's body.

Today it is an information campaign launched by the Foundation for Social Welfare Services, aimed at providing more awareness on how important it is for a child to be loved and respected without being exposed to violence. The main symbol used on the day is a blue ribbon, which is also being used in other countries to mark Child Protection Day.

<sup>219</sup> Its main aim however is to raise awareness on children's rights and to tackle issues in a non-partisan manner. Other issues it deals with are obesity

Ms. Sciberras also explained how Appogg celebrates World Children's Day<sup>222</sup> on an annual basis, an event which falls in November. This is generally part of a month-long Malta Children's Festival presented by the Ministry of Education, Employment and the Family. It is a celebration of children's talents such as music, drama, arts, crafts, parades and much more, which raise awareness with regards to children's rights. Possibly it is the best event of the year focusing on children and creating debates to further discuss current issues that deal with children, such as their well-being, rights and obligations, inclusion in society, social protection and their creativity.

Although it cannot be described as an NGO, there is the Curia Response Team which works in collaboration with Agenzija Appogg and deals specifically with cases that involve sexual abuse on children by the clergy. Some cases do go through Appogg whereas others go to the Police directly.

The state agency Appogg also provides for investigative boards through the use of the Child Protection National Policy in order to investigate alleged situations of child abuse that are reported. Upon determination of the situation the agency has the right to take the necessary action accordingly.

The foundation is embarking on other initiatives to promote positive parenting. These include information for parents and children, parenting skills courses within the community, projects offering support to families in need, and services for families going through difficult situations.

Once can say that Appogg is the only foundation which focuses on child abuse and sexual exploitation among other children's rights, and therefore the idea of NGOs has to be eliminated in the context of Malta. Whilst being state funded, the budget provided is limited and therefore are in constant need of voluntary aid. An issue that may be raised is the lack of NGOs for children.

This data differs from that provided by Appogg due to the fact that at times reports are made directly to Appogg whereas others are made to the police therefore bypassing Appogg, unless officially requested.

iv. Appogg provides for various promotional campaigns in that it provides various schemes that can be adopted by parents in need or implemented on children that are in need. Whereas there are various ways that the agency in Malta has adopted to raise awareness<sup>224</sup>, it also offers various choices in order for broken families or children with various social problems caused by abuse to rehabilitate themselves.

Agenzija Appogg provides a leaflet defining abuse on children called “X’inhu l-abbuz?” stating that it has five forms; physical, sexual, negligence, emotional and through the use of technology. It defines each one and is in a format which is appealable to children through the use of cartoons. It is addressed to children and states that should children find themselves in any one of the situations described in the leaflet then they should call the support line and ask for help. Here Appogg may intervene and help eliminate such abuse.

The agency provides a similar leaflet on domestic violence which defines it and promotes the service offered by it to children and adults alike. Appogg aids in removing such people from danger and restoring their emotional and psychological health.

The Children’s Fund is an idea founded by Appogg however would not actually operate if it were not for people’s donations. The funds are used to buy the basic needs for all children such as nappies, milk, clothes, medicines, uniforms, transport for school and all other basic needs that children require to have the basic quality of life that they have a right to. This fund began in 2003 and helps over 200 children a year. It is given to children, through an application by a social worker, who come from disadvantaged households as a form of supplementary aid. Donations are usually raised through fund raising activities however sometimes direct donations from people or companies are made.

Appogg offers various types of other schemes to continue aiding children in their troubled scenarios such as in out-of-home care, fostering, family therapy as well as monitoring care orders as much as possible.

The Office of the Commissioner for Children also provides a certain degree of effort when it comes to children, abuse and sexual exploitation. The Office has worked in conjunction with the Council of Europe, and has published a child-friendly booklet on sexual abuse. It is called “Kiko u l-Id”<sup>225</sup> and provides simple information on child abuse and how to identify it whilst providing an elementary story helping children identify what is right way for them to be loved and not to misinterpret love and care with abuse. It has been translated in nine languages so far, Maltese being one of them and has been distributed to children who are at a Year 1 stage, in the majority of schools.<sup>226</sup> Also all schools have been given the necessary set of publications for the purposes of PSHD.<sup>227</sup>

v. Having spoken to the Commissioner for Children Mrs. Helen D’Amato she provided some insight as to how the department works and what bearing children have on the entire legislative process. It would seem that in drafting the National Children Policy children were consulted all through the discussion, assembling and drafting of the policy. A child-friendly committee was set up in order for children to feel at ease when discussing certain issues, so that a sound result would be achieved.

Although the office strives to consult children as much as possible in all sectors and surveys that they initiate, this is not so in legislation<sup>228</sup>. Mrs. D’Amato stipulates that until now it is only policy that passes through a period of consultation with children, highlighting the fact that this was also a first. Laws do not pass from this consultative process and do not involve children first hand. The fact that a committee of children was set up in drafting the policy was a stepping stone towards something greater that could infiltrate in the legislative process in the future.

<sup>228</sup> Mrs. D’Amato explained how in all that the Office does, whether it is a study or an activity they take it upon themselves to consult with the relevant group of people that have been affected by such a scheme or policy in the past or who are going to be affected by it in the future. Examples given were the upcoming legal notice on teen parties where teenagers were consulted with the help of Agenzija Zghazagh, and the workshop on children who are in Out of Home Care held by through the European Network through the Ombudsman where Malta presented children who were presently in such a scenario. Other examples are councils in school set up by children which later discuss several issue with this Office as well as a recent survey on leisure and child advertising and electioneering where insight was gathered from children from all over the island.

The office works with the Council for Children which is composed of four members. Two of the children are selected through a live-in called Human Rights for You<sup>229</sup> where the two children are nominated by their peers to participate in such a council. The other two members stay on longer on the Council due to the fact that they would know what policies would have been implemented beforehand and so that there may be a degree of continuity. It is this Council that can have a degree of legislative bearing however this is very minimal.

“Every legislation is going to affect the entire population and children are part of that same population, therefore they should be consulted.”<sup>230</sup>

The main national procedure discussed very recently on how to deal with children is that portrayed in the round table conference held earlier in May 2012. This was a conference organised by Agenzija Appogg which involved the stakeholders involved in the local protection of children.

“Minister Chris Said said that such a national procedure discussed is to be part of the government’s commitment to protect children whilst ensuring better synergy between educators, social workers, the police and the law courts.”<sup>231</sup>

It is essential that the child’s perspective is taken into consideration when proposing legislation, participation rights of the child would be significant.

vi. As mentioned before there is only one NGO working on children’s rights. Mrs D’Amato stated that as an Office they had met with the relevant NGO, Celebrities for Kids to show their support for the work being initiated as well as some issue having been discussed. However, there are a number of NGOs that treat children’s rights within their remit, unfortunately they are not solely dedicated to child rights.

IV OTHER

Recently there have been a couple of issues dealing with children and their abuse. Earlier this year it was proposed that a Sexual Offenders Register be enforced in Malta. However due to various constraints, one being the fact that Malta is an island and therefore a person

whose name is put down on the register can be greatly affected, was taken into consideration and was the cause for this register not to come in force. Instead the register was given a different title; the Protection of Children's Register. The idea is that all harmful acts on children are crimes, not only sexual ones therefore limiting it to sexual offenders would be detrimental to children and their protection. Other persons in the field have criticized this since when sexual offenders are placed on a list on their own everyone is aware of their crime and therefore children's protection will be greater. Putting them on a list with other offenders brings doubt as to the nature of the crime and therefore could reduce the protection provided for children. Nevertheless, access is also restricted since only a limited number of people may ask for the relevant information.

The register comes with its limitations. It is the courts that would decide whether a person should be included in the register - on the basis of the crime that was committed and the circumstances presented in the evidence. In exceptional cases, a court may also issue temporary orders for inclusion in the register, such as when an accused person admitted his crime involving children and before the actual sentence was delivered.<sup>232</sup>

Also such register would not be publicly accessible. It would be kept in the first hall of the Civil Court and it would be the court which would decide whether to divulge information found in the register to persons responsible for children.

This law made recently is among the most important laws, along with amendments to the Civil Code which protected children from pornography and child trafficking. Clearly, the level of protection to children has been substantially raised, a fact also recognised by the European Commission.

A less recent but very valid issue is that of the right of appeal in the context of care orders. In order to further explain the issue we must describe the case. In 2010, the Constitutional Court stated that a mother convicted of being cruel to her daughters did not have her rights violated when she was denied access to the courts following a care order issue on the children, after having filed a constitutional application before the First Hall of the Civil Court.

In 2005 after having been given a suspended sentence and her partner jailed for two year for cruelty on the minor daughters, the children were placed in care with an institute run by nuns. Having ended her relationship she wanted her daughters back and due to the change in circumstances the care order was no longer necessary. Despite her requests the care order remained in vigore. Therefore she opened a constitutional case on the basis of a violation of her right to a fair hearing through an independent and impartial tribunal due to the care order.

The First Hall of the Civil Court upheld her request but the Attorney General appealed to the Constitutional Court composed of Chief Justice Vincent Degaetano, Mr Justice Joseph Filletti and Mr Justice Geoffrey Valenzia. The Constitutional Court said that, since the mother had been found guilty of cruelty to her children and had been given a suspended sentence, certain provisions of the Criminal Code came into effect in her regard. As a result, the mother lost all parental authority and all her rights over her children. This was an automatic consequence that did not even have to be imposed by the Criminal Court in its judgment against the mother. The mother had, therefore, lost all authority over her daughters even before she filed her constitutional application. She could not have filed her constitutional application on behalf of her daughters because once the care order was issued the children were in the custody of the Social Policy Minister.

Referring to the mother's allegation about not being given access to the courts to ask for the revocation of the care order, the Constitutional Court ruled that access was always to be had to the courts for a decision on civil rights and obligations or in criminal cases. The court had, therefore, to decide whether the mother had any right or duty that had to be determined at the time she filed her constitutional application. However, as the court had already established, after the mother had been given a suspended sentence she had lost all her authority and rights over her children. She could vaunt no claim in their regard. The Constitutional Court ruled that there was no violation of the mother's right to a fair hearing and it revoked the first court's judgment.<sup>233</sup>

This case raised an issue in itself however it has shown the extent our courts go to as much as possible give a fair adjudication in terms of the child; in the best interest of the child awarding him/her the protection they deserve.

The Commissioner for Children feels that as a Member State within the union Malta is on its way in terms of children's rights and children's inclusion in society. In terms of abuse and exploitation no amount of help is ever enough however the bar is being set higher in order for Malta develop further in this area.

On a concluding note, it is essential that children are holders of rights, child participation is crucial in responding to child abuse and unless the protection mechanisms are child friendly one may risk that they remain unchecked. The keeping of disaggregated data is vital for present and future action. Finally, all services should have an evaluation process in built so that one can learn from good practice and mistakes but currently this is not done or is done in house instead of independently. The Council of Europe and EU recommend the setting up of a Child Rights Observatory to address this and perhaps this may be taken care through Parliamentary Committees and a Minister or Parliamentary Secretary for Children.

I INTRODUCTION

1 GENERAL

i. To give a complete description of discrimination in Norway would, of course, be impossible. The following is an attempt to present a brief overview.

In 2006 the Equality and Anti-discrimination Ombud (LDO) was established to supervise and ensure laws and administrative practice on discrimination. Between 2007 and 2011, LDO handled approximately 6,800 cases regarding discrimination. Most cases concerned gender discrimination and disability discrimination.<sup>1</sup> According to LDO, the large number of cases concerning discrimination on the grounds of disability was related to the Act on Discrimination and Accessibility (DTL)<sup>2</sup> that entered into force in 2009. LDO reviews questions of discrimination on the grounds of individual complaints. Therefore, their statistics may not be representative of the actual situation. Other factors may be determinative for determining the type of case brought before LDO.

According to a survey from 2009 by Statistics of Norway (SSB), about half of the inhabitants with foreign background say that they have experienced discrimination in one or more areas, including employment, housing, healthcare or nightlife. Young people (age 16-24) claimed to experience discrimination more often than older people (age 55-71). Furthermore, 60 to 70 per cent of people with Somalian, Iranian and Iraqi backgrounds reported they had experienced employment discrimination in the last five years. Examining the tenancy situation, SSB found that people with Asian and African background have higher rental costs than people with Norwegian background. With regard to healthcare, 80 per cent of the inhabitants with a foreign background reported that they felt that they were treated with the same quality of care as the inhabitants with a Norwegian background.<sup>3</sup>

The Labour Research Foundation (FaFo) conducted an overview of the social science knowledge on the living conditions of gays, lesbians, bi-sexuals and the HIV -positive in Norway in 2008. The purpose for this report was to evaluate the possible need to expand the legal protection from discrimination for these groups. FAFO found that people with non-heterosexual orientation report little discrimination in their daily lives, and enjoy the same standards of living as the rest of the population. However, they found that non-heterosexual foster parents are opted out in favour of heterosexual foster parents in accordance with regulations on foster homes.<sup>4</sup> The stated reason for this provision is the interest of the child, but with the Marriage Act equating heterosexual couples and homosexual couples, giving equal status and right to apply for child adoption,<sup>5</sup> it is difficult to see how this is not to be regarded as discrimination. FaFo also found the state regulated practice of the Child Welfare Service ("Barnevernet") in evaluating the suitability of stepparents before adoption to be problematic for homosexual couples.<sup>6</sup>

The indigenous Sami population accounts for approximately 40,000 people in Norway. According to a survey by SAMINOR (University of Tromsø) in 2003/04, Sami people report experiencing more ethnic discrimination and bullying than ethnic Norwegians. The study found that the most common types of discrimination were bullying, gossiping and disparaging remarks at work, in their local community, and at school. The study notes that "[t]hese results are consistent with experiences from other minority and marginalized groups that experienced colonization".<sup>7</sup>

ii. The term "family" is derived from legal theory<sup>8</sup> and the government's report to the Norwegian Parliament (the Storting) St. Meld. Nr. 29 (2002 - 2003). The latter document states that:

“The family includes married couples with or without children, cohabiting couples with or without children, gay partners with or without children, single parents living with their children, non-resident parents, families with foster children and single, living alone.”<sup>9</sup>

In 2008, Section 1 of the Marriage Act was amended to include persons of the same sex to marry each other. In 2001 there were 204 357 people living in cohabitation, a rise from 102 000 in 1990.<sup>10</sup> In 2011 there was a total of 23 135 marriages. 9 067 of these took place in the State Church, while the District Court had 7 481.<sup>11</sup> These numbers show that the total amount of marriages has slightly decreased from 25 356 in 2000. Numbers from 2011 showcases a total of 21 and 12 per cent married women and men, respectively, in the age group 25-29.<sup>12</sup>

The age requirement for independently entering a marriage is 18 years, cf. the Marriage Act Section 1a. The average marital age of the population in Norway for first time marriages was 29.3 years for women in 2001, an increase from 26.2 in 1991. The average was 32.0 years in 2001 for men, an increase from 28.8 in 1991.<sup>13</sup>

iii. In 1991, the Norwegian Government ratified the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC).<sup>14</sup> With this the State is responsible for protecting children against abuse, exploitation or pain. In addition, Norway was the first country to establish an Ombudsman who has “statutory right to protect children and their rights”<sup>15</sup>. The Ombudsman for Children acts as an independent institution, meaning that neither the Parliament nor the Government can give instructions.<sup>16</sup>

The government of Norway has to report on the general status of children's rights every five year. The report is submitted to the UN Child Committee and the fourth and latest report is from 2008. In addition, the Norwegian government sends a report consisting of children and young people's own experiences and opinions on how it is to grow up in Norway (Children and young people report to the UN on their rights).<sup>17</sup> Also other non-governmental parties who are concerned about children's rights can report to the Child Committee. During the last round, the Ombudsman for Children and some other organizations and research centres made their own reports.

The United Nations Child Committee has commented that the Norwegian legislation needs amendments. The UN Child Committee is dissatisfied with Norway's practise of imprisoning minors together with adult prisoners. The committee also comments that there are large and regional differences in the Child Welfare Service throughout the country. Norway should ensure children the same rights, regardless of what part of the country they belong to. The Committee also comments that the Norwegian government does not allow The Ombudsman for Children to receive and follow up complaints from children. Such a complaint procedure could offer children immediate help, and it would provide the government with more knowledge about the issues occupying children. Moreover, the Committee was dissatisfied with the level of knowledge that persons working with children had about Children's Rights.<sup>18</sup> In 2011, the United Nations created a third additional protocol to the CRC which gives children the right to complain about their respective country directly to the United Nations Child Committee. The Norwegian Government has not signed this protocol.<sup>19</sup>

Being one of the most known sexual assault cases in Norway, the Alvdal Case exemplifies horrific abuse of children taking place in this country. It involved parents and their children and it was intensively covered by the media.<sup>20</sup> In this case, five adults were involved in sexual assault and rape against four children under 14 years of age through a period of several years. The accused persons were two pairs of neighbours, both having two children. Another fifth neighbour was involved and five other adults were suspected, but never charged. In this case the prosecutors had photos and videos as evidence against the accused adults. One of the videos showed the stepfather having sex with his stepdaughter and this man was charged with rape and sexual assault against all four children involved in the case. Save the Children Norway states that the Alvdal Case is not unique.<sup>21</sup>

iv. Norwegian legislation has a dualistic approach to the relationship between state law and international treaties. This approach includes the requirement that all international agreements, customary international law and general principles of international law must be implemented into domestic law in order to be applicable and applied by the courts. The dualistic principle in Norwegian legislation is not laid down in the Constitution, but can be deduced from the Constitutions' framework that distinguishes between a legislative, executive and a judicial power. This has been repeatedly confirmed by case law,<sup>22</sup> and is generally accepted as an unwritten legal norm, with the rank of formal law.

The legislator uses three different methods when implementing international treaties; transformation, incorporation and passive transformation (determination by the legislator that the legislation is in conformity with the international law). Other than incorporating human rights treaties in the Act of 21 May 1999 relating to the strengthening of the status of human rights in Norwegian law (the Human Rights Act), the most common method of implementing human rights treaties in Norwegian legislation has been through passive transformation.<sup>23</sup> There is no particular legislation that dictates when the various methods for implementation must be used. This decision will usually depend upon the recommendations of a specialized Committee from the Ministry of Justice.

A limited type of incorporation used in Norwegian legislation is "sector monism," including the premise that international law has precedence over domestic legislation in certain jurisdictions.

Norway ratified the United Nations Convention on rights of the Child on 8 January 1991. The Norwegian Government initially decided to make a reservation regarding Art.

2 THE LANZAROTE CONVENTION

i. Norway ratified the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) in 1952 and it took effect in 1953.<sup>25</sup>

ii. The Lanzarote Convention was signed by Norway on 25 October 2007.<sup>26</sup> However, Norway has not yet ratified the convention. At this point, according to the Ministry of Justice, Norway does not have any plans to make reservations to the Convention.

iii. According to the Ministry of Justice, Norway will ratify the Convention as soon as domestic legislation fulfils the requirements of the Convention.<sup>27</sup> According to the preparatory works for the implementation of the Lanzarote Convention, the General Civil Penal Code of 20 May 2005 no. 28 (the Penal Code of 2005)<sup>28</sup> fulfils the Lanzarote Convention's requirements concerning criminal law.<sup>29</sup> However, the main obstacle is that the Penal Code of 2005 has not yet entered into force due to technical improvements this requires in the police's computer system. Finally, other departments that are affected by the Convention have not yet given their opinion on the matter.

iv. The Norwegian legal system is a hierarchy of legal norms, the Constitution being the superior legal norm. According to the Lex Superior principle, statutory law is subordinate to the Constitution, and regulations are subordinate to statutory law.

What rank the Lanzarote Convention will have in the Norwegian legal system when ratified will depend on the legal area affected by the Convention. We distinguish between those articles which affect the General Civil Penal Code of 22 May 1902 no. 10 (the Penal Code)<sup>30</sup> and the Act of 22 May 1982 no. 25 relating to legal procedure in criminal cases (the Criminal

Procedure Act), where sector monism is applied, and articles that affects other parts of the legislation, where the general principle of presumption applies.

The general principle of presumption is developed by case law and deals with the presumption that Norwegian domestic law is in accordance with international law. The principle applies in all legal areas in which Norway has international obligations. Accordingly, Norwegian law will, as much as possible, be interpreted in accordance with international law, cf. Rt. 2000 p. 1811 Finnanger I.

The articles in the Lanzarote Convention primarily regulate the Penal Code and the Criminal Procedure Act, where sector monism is applied, and thus the principle of presumption is not necessary. Since sector monism applies in both the Penal Code and the Criminal Procedure Act, the Norwegian courts are obligated to apply the law in such a way as to ensure compliance with binding international agreements and customary international law. Norwegian law may therefore be set aside if it is incompatible with the articles in the Lanzarote Convention. The Criminal Procedure Act Section 4 states: “The provisions of this Act shall apply subject to such limitations as are recognized in international law or which derive from any agreement made with a foreign State”<sup>31</sup>. Likewise, the Penal Code Act Section 1 states: “The criminal legislation shall apply subject to such limitations as derived from any agreement with a foreign State or from international law generally”<sup>32</sup>.

The term “limitations” in the Criminal Procedure Act Section 4 shall not be interpreted in the literal sense. International law can also inform the Criminal Procedure Act. For instance, the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR)) requires certain rules of procedure in criminal proceedings. This does not only restrict the Criminal Procedure Act, but also supplements it where national legislation falls short. This is of importance regarding the Lanzarote Convention, for example in Chapter VIII about recording and storing of data.

When it comes to the articles that affect the Penal Code, the Norwegian principle of legality in criminal law requires a domestic and sufficiently precise statutory law in order to convict someone for a crime. This principle is expressed in the Norwegian Constitution Art. 96: “No one may be convicted except according to law”.<sup>33</sup> “Law” has been interpreted to mean formally enacted legislation, passed in conformity with the requirements of the Constitution Sections 76 - 79. Therefore, a Norwegian court will not convict an individual solely based on international law, since it does not fulfil the requirements of the Constitution. This applies although the precedence rule in the Penal Code Act Section 1, construed literally, may suggest otherwise.

In the case of conflict between either the Penal Code or the Criminal Procedure Act and the Lanzarote Convention, the Convention rule will prevail. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has elaborated on this rule in Rt. 2000 p. 996 Bøhlerdommen. In situations where there is a conflict between a convention rule and other Norwegian statutory provisions, the result “cannot be resolved by a general rule, but must depend on a more detailed interpretation of the legal rules in question”. Accordingly, the effect of the precedence rule in both the Penal Code, and in the Criminal Procedure Act will, pursuant to case law, depend on an individual interpretation of both domestic statutory provision and international law.

It is worth mentioning that the precedence rule in the Penal Code Section 1 and in the Criminal Procedure Act Section 4 is not of constitutional rank, and can be repealed by the Parliament as any other law of statutory rank.

The question can be asked whether the Lanzarote Convention would have greater protection in the Norwegian legal system if it was incorporated in the Human Rights Act.<sup>34</sup> The Human Rights Act has a “semi constitutional” rank,<sup>35</sup> and has been considered to be a reinforced version of the principle of presumption. However, the question has not been asked by the government, and will not be an issue when implementing the Lanzarote Convention. .

1 GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE JURISDICTION

i. Norway is a Constitutional Monarchy with a representative parliamentary democracy and a central government. The legal system is based on civil law.

From 1380 through 1814, Norway was in union with Denmark, and then in union with Sweden from 1814 until 1905. As of 1905, Norway has been an independent State. Norway is not a member of the EU but participates in the European Economic Area and the Schengen and Dublin agreements. The Constitution was drafted in 1814, but has been amended several times. The most comprehensive changes were made in 2007. Among other revisions, the parliamentary system of government was formalized after having been recognized as constitutional customary law for over a hundred years.

The Parliament (the Storting) is the legislator and the highest elected organ for the State. The people legitimize the power of the Parliament by electing its members.<sup>36</sup> The Parliament's essential functions are described in Section 75 of the Constitution. Also, The King is given far reaching powers, but because of the constitutional customary law, these are all exercised by the executive power of the Government. Further, the courts of justice decide how laws and administrative regulations shall be interpreted, and the Supreme Court has the power to determine whether laws are in accordance with the Constitution.<sup>37</sup>

Political elections are held every second year, alternately, for the Parliament and the Sámi council, and, with regard to the local elections, for municipal councils (local) and the county councils (regional). Representatives are elected for a four year term. Since 1945, the Social Democratic Labour Party has been the most influential party in Norwegian politics, with the Conservative party acting as its biggest challenger. The current government is a coalition of the Labour Party, the Socialist Party and the Centre Party.

ii. Some human rights are legislated through the Constitution, which grants positive rights to the individual. The fundamental human rights in the Constitution are the right to free speech, the right to property, the right to a fair trial, and the prohibition of unlawful arrest.

The Constitution also contains rights to a healthy environment and imposes responsibility on state authorities to: 1) create conditions enabling every person capable of work to earn a living, 2) to create conditions enabling the Sami people to preserve and develop its language, culture and way of life, and 3) to ensure human rights.<sup>38</sup> However, these rights are not considered to be positive rights that can be claimed by the individual directly through the Constitution.

Legislative proposals to revise and systemize the human rights in the Constitution have been brought before the Parliament this autumn (2012). The proposals include both civil and political, and social and economic rights. If voted for in Parliament, it may be adopted in 2014.<sup>39</sup>

To make amendments to the Constitution, a two thirds majority of the Parliament must vote in favour of the proposal, and at least two thirds of the representatives must be present. The process of amending the Constitution also requires a delay, such that the proposal to amend the Constitutional must be made before one Parliament within one term, and then voted for within the next four year term, when the composition of the Parliament may be different.<sup>40</sup> This requirement helps to avoid rash decisions and ensures real support from the citizens.

In addition to the human rights mentioned in the Constitution, a “Bill of Rights” was adapted to the Norwegian legal framework in 1999, consisting of 1) the European Convention of Human Rights, 2) the UN Declaration on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 3) the UN Declaration on Political and Civil Rights, 4) the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, 5) the UN Convention on Women’s Rights. All these conventions are ratified by Norway, and implemented as positive law in a Bill of Rights (the Human Rights Act). This law is beneath the Constitution in the juridical hierarchy, but above normal legislation, giving it a “semi-constitutional” rank.

iii. There is no Constitutional Court in Norway. Constitutional, criminal and most civil cases are treated in the same court system. Positive constitutional rights can be claimed directly by individuals and legal persons before the courts that deal with civil disputes and criminal cases.<sup>41</sup> As mentioned above, the Human Rights Act implements five international conventions on human rights as positive law, and the rights granted in these Conventions can be claimed directly before the Norwegian courts.

Before an appeal can be made to the Supreme Court, legal questions concerning violations of human rights or violations of constitutional rights must have been brought before the lower court agency. The Norwegian court-system is divided into three agencies. The first agency is the District Court (“Tingretten”) and functions on a local level.<sup>42</sup>

The procedure and application process for civil disputes are described in The Civil Dispute Act. Civil and constitutional action cases are held on the basis of a summons directed to the court, either in written or oral form. The summons must form a basis for the trial, and must therefore contain the legal claims and the desired result, the factual and legal grounds for the claim and the evidence that will be brought before the court. The defendant is usually given three weeks to respond to the summons.<sup>43</sup> If the summons concerns the validity of an administrative decision, the summons is directed to the state organ that made the decision in question.<sup>44</sup>

The court only answers the claims set forth by the parties,<sup>45</sup> and decides on the grounds of the court session (including assertion, documents and other evidence, testimonies, witnesses etc. brought before the court).<sup>46</sup> As a general rule, it is the parties own responsibility to enlighten the court on the case. Exceptions can be made in cases where the parties control over their own affairs is limited. This is the case for children’s rights according to the Children Act and administrative decisions of child welfare.<sup>47</sup> This exception must be seen in relation to the court’s duty to ensure that the presentation of evidence and argumentation provides an accurate image of the actual situation.<sup>48</sup>

A ruling of the District Court can be appealed to the Appeal Court (“Lagmannsretten”). Most appeals on rulings from the District Court must be brought before this court agency before the case can be brought before the Supreme Court. Exceptions can be made for questions of exceptional importance.<sup>49</sup> Not all cases will be accepted by the Appeal Court. To avoid exhausting this agency, disputes over smaller amounts of money may be declined. The Appeal Court also has a limited ability to decline cases where it is not clear that the appeal will lead to a different conclusion. The court proceedings are in most cases equivalent to those of the District Court.<sup>50</sup>

According to the Constitution, the Supreme Court (“Høyesterett”) decides on legal questions at last instance. Before a legal question of any nature will be heard by the Supreme Court, it must go through the Supreme Court’s appeal Committee.<sup>51</sup> Cases are only accepted by the Supreme Court if they are of general interest, or if there are other important reasons why the Supreme Court should treat the questions that the case raises.<sup>52</sup> A case brought before the Supreme Court is usually limited to the still uncertain parts of the claims, and factual grounds and evidence brought before the lower court agencies.<sup>53</sup> Moreover, if the case raises questions about a statute’s validity regarding the Constitution or international obligations, the State has the right to be represented if it is necessary in relation to public interest.<sup>54</sup>

iv. As described above, there is only a general Supreme Court in Norway. The Criminal Procedure Act regulates the procedures before the courts, from investigation and indictment to appeals before the Supreme Court. As a main rule, criminal cases involve the State, represented by the Prosecutor, and the accused.<sup>55</sup> In cases of serious criminal offence, the State will prosecute with or without the consent of the victim.

The accused has the right to a defence, to know his or her position and to read the State’s evidentiary documents in the case.<sup>56</sup> Further, the court may only consider the offences contained in the indictment from the Prosecutor. The indictment must contain actual penal

Unless there are questions of interest beyond the particular case, or other reasons that necessitate a swiftly decision by the Supreme Court, the Appeal Court is the appeal agency for criminal cases.<sup>59</sup>

v. The age of Criminal liability is fifteen years.<sup>60</sup> The Penal Code states that those who were under eighteen years of age when they committed a crime can only be sentenced to prison if absolutely necessary, and not for more than fifteen years.<sup>61</sup> To reduce the number of child prisoners, the Penal Code allows a broad use of community service instead of prison sentence for offenders under the age of eighteen years.<sup>62</sup>

A report from Statistics of Norway from 2003 provides numbers on prisoners in Norway between the age of fifteen and twenty, what crimes they serve prison sentences for, and some demographic information.<sup>63</sup> The statistics show that people between fifteen and twenty years of age serve prison sentences less frequently after being charged for criminal offences than other age groups. From 1993 to 2000, the number of new imprisonments<sup>64</sup> for fifteen to seventeen year olds was between 90 and 160. This corresponds to 60 to 100 imprisonments per 100 000 people in this age group.<sup>65</sup>

The statistics also provide information on what kind of criminal offences people between fifteen and twenty years of age are imprisoned for.<sup>66</sup> The most common is theft, which constitutes the grounds for one third of the imprisonments. Traffic offences and violence constitutes about twenty per cent each.<sup>67</sup> Only eleven per cent of the new imprisoned youth

The Lawyers Association also gathered numbers on the use of detention of children under eighteen, and found that there were 44 cases in 2007, 52 cases in 2008, and 74 cases in 2009.

2 SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW

2.1 Sexual Abuse

i. The Penal Code's chapter on sexual offenses uses different expressions, each with their own definition, denoting actions of different severities. The following will briefly explain the terms “intercourse”, “sexual activity” and “sexual acts”, as they are all important when deciding what penal provision is applicable, and when calculating the penalty.

Intercourse (“samleie”) is deemed as the most qualified of the sexual activities. Under otherwise equal circumstances, intercourse will lead to the strictest penalty. The understanding of the term has undergone a development from a strict to a more broad interpretation. Today, Section 206 of the Penal Code defines intercourse as following:

“When the term sexual intercourse is used in the provisions of this chapter, both vaginal and anal intercourse are meant. Insertion of the penis into the mouth and insertion of an object into the vagina or rectum shall be equated with sexual intercourse. In the case of acts referred to in Section 195 insertion of the penis in and between the labia majora and the labia minora shall also be equated with sexual intercourse.”

As we can see, the wording of Section 206 gives the impression that the introduction of any object of any size into the vagina or rectum is covered by the provision. However, in the interest of balance and coherence in the law, it is assumed that the provision requires a certain degree of severity. This is substantiated by the fact that introduction of fingers into the vaginal or anal opening is not deemed as intercourse, but as “sexual activity”.<sup>71</sup> It would not make sense if even the smallest object would trigger liability as “intercourse”, whereas the introduction of several fingers would be subject to more lenient provisions.<sup>72</sup>

The definition of intercourse was amended in 2000, in order to ensure a better protection for children under the age of 14.<sup>73</sup> In these cases, “intercourse” also includes the introduction of the penis into and between the major and minor labia. The rationale behind the rule is that the traditional definition of intercourse is not suitable when young children are victims of sexual abuse. When the children are particularly young, the introduction of a penis or an object into the vagina or anus might be physically impossible or very difficult. Although the offender would not be successful, the action was deemed as equally offensive and worthy of punishment as an intercourse with complete penetration.<sup>74</sup>

Strangely, the expansion of the definition regarding intercourse with children under the age of 14 only refers to consensual intercourse (Section 195) and not forced intercourse (rape, Section 192). This irregularity, however, does not have any practical significance. Due to the ideal concurrence of the offences<sup>75</sup>, the sentencing will be the same under Sections 195 and 192.<sup>76</sup>

When the Penal Code from 2005 enters into force, there will be a minor extension of the scope of “intercourse.”<sup>77</sup> Penetration or introduction of the penis or an object into the vaginal opening will be sufficient; the penis or the object does not need to enter the vagina. This will apply regardless of age.

Sexual activity (“seksuell omgang”) has also undergone a development towards a rather broad interpretation. The term includes, but is not limited to, intercourse. Intercourse is deemed as qualified sexual activity. Typically, the punishment will be higher if the sexual activity was intercourse. Sexual activity includes actions with a certain intensity. Examples are oral sex which does not include the penetration of the penis into the offender's mouth,<sup>78</sup> sexual movements directed against another person's stomach or buttocks, and the introduction of fingers into the vagina<sup>79</sup> or anus<sup>80</sup>. Many of the penal provisions (e.g. Sections 192 and 199) require, in order to be applicable, that the action in question can be classified as intercourse or sexual activity.

The term sexual acts (“seksuell handling”) is less severe than sexual activity and is deemed to be less grave than the latter. The boundary must be defined after a thorough assessment in the particular case. Typically, it will be relevant whether touching or groping has taken place on bare skin (leaning towards sexual activity), or on the clothes. The typical case of sexual act is groping of breasts or genitalia.<sup>81</sup>

The lower boundary for punishable actions might be problematic, in particular in cases where the actions have no sexual motivation. In a Supreme Court judgment from 2007<sup>82</sup>, a four-year-old girl washed her stepfather's genital area with a sponge and subsequently removed the soap with the hand shower while they were both having a bath. This had happened on several occasions. The man did not encourage the action, and there was no sexual intention. Still, the Supreme Court found that sexual “action” can also include cases where the offender is passive. Particularly in relation to younger children who might not understand the implications of their actions, the lack of setting boundaries or the lack of interruption in the cause of events “might be juxtaposed with an active action.”<sup>83</sup> In this case, the limit was exceeded, as the stepfather should have actively sought to end the action of the child. The court stated that that the omission was in the lower range of what the term “sexual activity” comprised. If the child spontaneously or unintentionally would touch the caregiver's genitalia during a bath, it would not be deemed sufficient to violate the provision.

On the other side, if the caregiver would continue to bath with the child despite the continued touching without stopping the situation, the law might be violated.

Finally, the term sexually offensive behaviour (“seksuelt krenkende adferd”) is used in Section 201. While sexual activity or action entails activity between two or more persons, sexual offensive behaviour occurs in the presence of another person or in a public place. Some typical examples are exhibitionism and masturbation.

ii. “Intentionally”

One out of several conditions that need to be fulfilled in order to be punished by Norwegian law, is subjective guilt, cf. Section 40. In special circumstances prescribed by law, gross negligence is sufficient. As the main rule, however, intent is necessary.

“Intent” is a judicial, rather than a moral term.<sup>84</sup> There is a close relationship between the two, as they both rest on the presumption that the offender is to be blamed. Moral reproach is, however, not necessary for the legal requirement to be fulfilled.<sup>85</sup>

The term “intent” or “intentionally” is not defined in the current Penal Code, but has been defined through case law and legal theory. The new Penal Code of 2005 includes a definition of the term in Section 22, which according to the preparatory works is deemed to codify the current state of the law.<sup>86</sup>

According to the new definition, intent exists when someone acts a) deliberately, b) with the awareness that the action surely or most likely (50 % probability or more) will occur, or if c) the offender foresaw that it was possible that the action would fall within the scope of the objective description in a penal provision, but nevertheless chose to act even though the worst would happen and the consequence would occur. With respect to c), there is a difference between accepting a risk and accepting a consequence – the first can constitute conscious recklessness, which is not covered by the definition of intent. However, a positive acceptance of the consequence will be covered (dolus eventualis by positive acquiescence).

The intent must be present at the moment of the criminal action. However, in cases of on-going activities, the offender can be held responsible if he or she continues after becoming aware of the factual situation.<sup>87</sup>

With regard to what the intent must comprise, the general rule is that the intent must encompass all the elements that make the action a criminal offense (the objective, factual content of the action).<sup>88</sup> If a person has committed an act in a state of ignorance concerning such circumstances that determine criminal liability or increase the penalty for the said act, such circumstances will not be attributable to him, cf. the Penal Code Section 42 (1). Ignorance resulting from self-induced intoxication is not an excuse, cf. third paragraph. The offender will, in these situations, be judged as if he or she were sober. There are certain exceptions to this, for example in cases of pathological intoxication.

The requirement of intent may be fulfilled even though the offender wasn't aware that the act was illegal. Ignorance of the illegal nature of an act at the time of its commission, as regulated in Section 57<sup>89</sup> of the Penal Code, rarely leads to impunity.

However, Section 42 (1)<sup>90</sup> states that if a person has committed an act in a state of ignorance concerning circumstances that determine criminal liability, such circumstances shall not be attributable to him. Regarding children, the Penal Code gives an exception to this general rule. This exception is related to delusion about the child's age. Criminal liability shall not be escaped due to any mistake made regarding the child's age. At this point, the responsibility is objective. However, the law includes one reservation: if the offender has acted with no negligence whatsoever regarding the age, and the age of the child is between 14 and 16 years, the offender cannot be punished (Section 196 (3)).

As stated in the Supreme Court's plenary decision in Rt. 2005 p. 833 para. 88, the term "no negligence whatsoever" is a "very strict criterion", and the accused must prove his innocence by accounting for specific circumstances that supports the claim that he has been "diligent in relation to the victim's age". The Recommendation of the Penal Code Committee for revision of the Penal Code on sexual offences<sup>91</sup> also states that the rule must be guarded as an exemption clause, where only “very weighty reasons” may exempt the offender from punishment. If the offender “in any way” has acted negligently, he cannot be exempted from responsibility.

According to the wording, this exception is not applicable if the child is under 14 years of age, cf. Section 195 (3). However, in 2005,<sup>92</sup> the Supreme Court stated in an unanimous ruling that the objective rule in case of delusion was contrary to the presumption of innocence, as stated in the European Convention on Human Rights Art. 6 (2). Accordingly, the reservation needs to be applied also in cases where the child is under 14 years of age. The wording of Section 195 is still not amended.

The criminal liability of an intentionally committed crime of sexual abuse depends on the action in question. In Norway, the minimum prison sentence is 14 days, cf. the Penal Code Section 17. The maximum time of imprisonment is usually specified in the specific provisions, but in absence of such a specification, the maximum sentence is 15 years. In any case, imprisonment cannot exceed 21 years, which is the maximum penalty in the country.<sup>93</sup>

The new Penal Code of 2005 will keep the minimum imprisonment sentence of 14 days, as well as the maximum penalty of 21 years.<sup>94</sup> However, there will be some technical changes. For example, the maximum penalty for each offence will be included in every provision. Consequently, there will be no rule prescribing a maximum of 15 years for situations where no maximum prison sentence has been prescribed.

The punishment for rape<sup>95</sup>, as described in Section 192 (1), is imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years. A penalty of imprisonment for no less than three years shall be imposed if the sexual abuse consisted of intercourse, or if the victim was unconscious or incapable of resisting the act, and the offender rendered the person in such a state in order to engage in the sexual activity (Section 192 (1) in fine). Under particularly serious circumstances as described in the third paragraph, an imprisonment for a term not exceeding 21 years may be imposed. These grave circumstances include cases where a) the rape has been committed by two or more persons jointly, b) the rape has been committed in a particularly painful or offensive manner, c) the offender has previously been convicted and sentenced pursuant to Sections 192 or 195 concerning sexual activity with children under 14 years of age, and finally, cases where d) the aggrieved person dies or sustains considerable injury to body or health as a result of the act. The circumstances mentioned in litra a-d are not cumulative; it is sufficient that the circumstances described in either of the litras have taken place.

Aiding and abetting another person in engaging in sexual activity by misuse of position or misuse of a relationship of dependence or trust may lead to imprisonment not exceeding six years (Section 193 (1)). If the aiding and abetting concerns exploiting someone's mental illness or mental retardation, the same penalty applies (Section 103 (2)).

Sexual activity with children under 14 years of age is subject to an imprisonment for a term not exceeding 10 years.<sup>96</sup> In these cases, the minimum penalty for sexual intercourse is three years. The maximum penalty of 21 years may be imposed in case of circumstances prescribed in Section 195 (2).<sup>97</sup> These include sexual activities committed jointly by two or more persons, cases where the act was committed in a particularly painful or offensive manner, cases where the child has not reached the age of 10 and there have been repeated assaults, cases of secondary crime (pursuant to this provision or Section 192 regulating rape), and cases where the aggrieved person dies or sustains serious physical or psychological injury as a result of the sexual activity. It is sufficient that only one of the described circumstances has taken place.

Furthermore, according to Section 196<sup>98</sup>, any person engaging in sexual activity with a child younger than 16 years of age shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six years. This limit may be raised to 15 years in some circumstances, inter alia if the act is committed by two or more persons jointly, if the act is committed in a particularly painful or offensive manner, in cases where the offender has previously been convicted and sentenced for violating Sections 196, 192 or 195, or if the aggrieved person dies or sustains considerable injury to body or health.

Sexually transmitted diseases and infectious diseases generally (See Section 1-3, no. 3 cf. no. 1 of the Act relating to control of communicable diseases<sup>99</sup>) shall always be considered as a “considerable” or “serious” injury to body and health in relation to Sections 192, 195 and 196 of the Penal Code. This will, therefore, automatically raise the threshold for the maximum prison sentence that can be imposed on the offender.

Incest with someone in the descending line (children, grandchildren) is punished with imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, cf. Section 197.<sup>100</sup> Incest with a brother or a sister is punished with imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, cf. Section 198.<sup>101</sup>

Anyone who engages in a sexual activity with a foster-child, child in his<sup>102</sup> care, step-child or any other person under 18 years of age which is under his care, or subject to his authority or supervision, faces imprisonment for up to five years.<sup>103</sup> Any person who aids and abets another person to engage in sexual activity with any person with whom he himself has such a relationship shall be liable to the same penalty.

With regard to sexual acts, fines or imprisonment for up to one year may be imposed against any person who commits such an act with any person who has not consented thereto, cf. Section 200 (1). Committing a sexual act with a child under 16 years of age raises the threshold to three years.<sup>104</sup> Misleading a child under 16 years of age to behave in a sexually offensive or otherwise indecent manner is also punishable by up to three years of imprisonment.<sup>105</sup> In the last two mentioned situations, the limit can be raised to six years under especially aggravating circumstances. According to the fourth Section of the provision, which makes reference to the third and fourth paragraphs in Section 196, mistake made with regard to age does not exclude responsibility, except if there was no element of negligence in this respect.

Section 62 provides rules in cases of ideal concurrence. The first paragraph reads as follows:

“If any person has by one or more acts committed more than one felony or misdemeanour punishable by imprisonment or detention, a joint custodial sentence shall be imposed which must be more severe than the highest minimum penalty prescribed for any of the felonies or misdemeanours and must in no case be more than twice the highest penalty prescribed for any of them. The joint custodial penalty shall normally take the form of imprisonment when any of the criminal acts would have been punishable thereby.”

This rule can be very relevant in cases of sexual abuse. For example, in cases where a father forces his 15-year-old daughter to engage in sexual activities with him, he will be criminally liable under Section 192 about rape, Section 19 about sexual activity with children under 16 years of age, and Section 197 about incest.<sup>106</sup>

When a sentence for a specific term is deemed to be insufficient to protect society, a sentence of preventive detention in an institution under the Correctional Services may be imposed instead of a sentence of imprisonment. The requirements are listed in Section 39c. Particularly relevant here is that the offender must be found guilty of having committed or having attempted to commit a sexual felony, and that there is an imminent risk that the offender will again commit such a felony.

The length of preventive detention is regulated in Section 39e. The fixed term might not exceed 21 years. However, upon application by the prosecuting authority the court can extend the fixed term by up to five years at a time.

iii. The legal age for engaging in sexual activities

The general legal age for engaging in sexual activities is 16 years. This emerges implicitly from Section 196 of the Penal Code<sup>107</sup>, where the person who engages in sexual activity with minors under 16 years of age will be punished. The punishment is stricter if the child is under 14 years of age.

In certain cases, the legal age is increased to 18 years, cf. Section 199.<sup>108</sup> The first paragraph of this provision states:

“Any person who engages in sexual activity with a foster-child, child in his care, step-child or any other person under 18 years of age who is under his care, or subject to his authority or supervision, shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.”

Accordingly, the legal age is 18 if the minor is subject to the sexual partner’s care, authority or vigilance. Equivalently, according to the provision's second paragraph, anyone in the position of the caregiver who provides another person with the opportunity to commit such sexual activities with the minor, will be punished.

Section 199 also prohibits sexual activity with foster-children, children in care and stepchildren who are under the perpetrator's care. It was, up until recently, an undecided matter in Norwegian law whether the age limit at 18 only referred to “any other person ... subject to his care”, or whether it also referred to foster children, step children etc. under such care. In a recent judgment from the Supreme Court<sup>109</sup>, a person was sentenced to imprisonment because of sexual activity with his stepdaughter, who at the time was 18 and a half years old. The Supreme Court decided, after a thorough review of the legal history and the preparatory works, that the limit of 18 years of age did not refer to foster children, stepchildren, etc. This legal understanding was not found to be contrary to the principle of legality in the Constitution's Art. 96 or ECHR Art. 7. In conclusion, there is no specified legal age for engaging in sexual activities with foster children etc. Such activities will always be illegal as long as the child is subject to the other person's care.<sup>110</sup>

Regulation of consensual sexual activities between minors

Consensual sexual activities between minors are regulated in the last paragraphs of Sections 195 and 196 of the Penal Code<sup>111</sup>, which have the same wording:

“A penalty pursuant to this provision may be remitted or imposed below the minimum prescribed in the second sentence of the first paragraph if those who have engaged in the sexual activity are about equal as regards age and development.”<sup>112</sup>

The provision covers cases where the participants in the activity are both minors, and where only one participant is a minor.<sup>113</sup> The requirements of approximate equality in age and development are cumulative; they both have to be fulfilled.<sup>114</sup> Thus, the requirement of a “similar development stage” is unfulfilled if the age difference between the two participants is considered to be too vast, and vice versa.

In a Supreme Court judgment from 2005,<sup>115</sup> the girl was 15 years and three months of age, while her male partner was 20 years old. Although the age difference of five years was approaching the acceptable end of the spectrum, it was deemed too vast by the court. An age gap of two years and ten months between a 13 and eight month year old girl and a 16 and six months year old boy was, under the circumstances, deemed legal in a judgment from 2003.<sup>116</sup> The result will thus depend on an overall assessment of several significant factors.

iv. The Norwegian Penal Code has no particular provision that specifically regulates situations where the offender uses force, or takes advantage of threats or disabilities to offend children sexually. Use of force or threats is regulated by the general provision of rape. However, regard has to be given to Section 62 of the Penal Code about ideal concurrence.

Rape is covered by Section 192.<sup>117</sup> The first paragraph states that:

“Any person who

- a) engages in sexual activity by means of violence or threats, or
- b) engages in sexual activity with any person who is unconscious or incapable for any other reason of resisting the act, or
- c) by means of violence or threats compels any person to engage in sexual activity with another person, or to carry out similar acts with himself or herself, shall be guilty of rape and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 10 years. In deciding whether the offender made use of violence or threats or whether the aggrieved person was incapable of resisting the act, importance shall be attached to whether the aggrieved person was under 14 years of age.”

As the paragraph states clearly, the aggravated person’s young age will at times play an important role when ascertaining whether violence or threats were used, or whether the aggrieved person was incapable of resisting the act. Typically, the younger the victim, the more easily the conditions will be found met.

In regards to threats, it is not necessary that the threats were linked to any illegal act. As an illustration, the threats can consist of telling someone a secret that the minor wants to keep hidden. The severity of the threats will be relevant when establishing causation.<sup>118</sup> Similarly, it is not necessary that the perpetrator perform the threatening acts himself. The key issue is that the sexual action is not consensual, and the perpetrator was aware of this fact.

Punishment for rape is attributable to the perpetrator if he or she acts with intent. Gross negligent rape is also subject to punishment, cf. Section 192 in fine.

In the new Chapter 26 from the new Penal Code of 2005 on sexual offenses, several changes have been made to strengthen children's protection against sexual abuse, and to elevate the penalty levels for the most severe sexual crimes.<sup>119</sup> Particularly relevant here is the new Section 299, which states that sexual activities and the most grave sexual acts with children under 14 years of age will be regarded as rape, regardless of how the sexual activity or action was induced.

v. Sections 197-198<sup>120</sup> regulate the crime of incest. Incest is sexual activity between people that are closely related. The rationale behind the rules differ from the rationale behind the provisions that protect minors under 16 years of age from sexual activities, and from the provision that protects victims against rape. While the latter provisions are based on the need to protect the aggrieved person, the provisions regulating incest are intended to serve the interest of the community as a whole. This is particularly true when it comes to incest among adults. In regards to children, it is obvious that the regulations exist additionally to protect them from abuse from close family members. Through the construction of ideal concurrence, the punishment will be greater if the abuser was a close family member of the victim, than if the abuser was a person without such ties to the child. Section 197 states:

“Any person who engages in sexual activity with a blood relation in the descending line shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years. Both biological and adopted descendants shall be regarded as blood relations in the descending line.”

“[I]n the descending line” implies that only the older person is punished. If, for example, a father engages in sexual activity with his daughter, only the father will be held criminally responsible. Parents, grandparents and persons further up in the ascending line are equally covered by the provision.<sup>121</sup>

Sexual activity between foster-parents or stepparents and the child is not regarded as incest, cf. the wording “blood relation”. These cases are governed by Section 199. The rationale behind Section 199 is that children need to be protected not only against family members by blood, but also against family members who are in a position of care or authority and that might abuse that position to initiate a sexual relationship.

Section 198 regulates incest between siblings:

“Any person who has sexual intercourse with a brother or sister shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year.

No penalty shall, however, be imposed on persons under 18 years of age.”

The wording states two important limitations with regard to incest between siblings: (i) the offense is limited to intercourse, and (ii) there will be no punishment imposed on the sibling which is under 18 years of age. Most cases of sibling incest are assumed to take place during adolescence.<sup>122</sup> Finally, complicity in incest is a criminal offense, and is regulated in Section 205.

vi. Misuse of a position or a relationship of dependence or trust is regulated in the Penal Code Section 193. The first paragraph states:

“Any person who engages in or who aids and abets another person to engage in sexual activity by misuse of a position, or a relationship of dependence or trust shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six years.”<sup>123</sup>

The word “misuse” implies that the perpetrator must have taken advantage of the interpersonal relationship that the provision describes. “Position” is not limited to formal positions such as teachers or doctors; for example, a handball coach is sufficient, see Rt. 2003 p. 453. If the sexual activity happens outside of the context of the hierarchical structure between the parties, the provision does not apply. The preparatory works mention situations where the two persons fall in love.<sup>124</sup>

The alternative clauses, “relationship of dependence” and “relationship of ... trust” are applicable in situations where the individual in the position of power, by means of manipulation or deception, develops a relationship with the weaker party, which they subsequently exploit to obtain sexual activity.<sup>125</sup>

Section 194 of the Penal Code<sup>126</sup> regulates sexual activity with inmates and persons under the Correctional Services or the Child Welfare, if that person is under the offender's authority or supervision:

“Any person who engages in sexual activity with any person who is an inmate of or placed in any home or institution under the correctional services or the police or in an institution under the child welfare service and who is there subject to his authority or supervision, shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six years.

The same penalty shall apply to any person who aids and abets another person to engage in sexual activity with any person with whom he himself has such a relationship.”

For the provision to be applicable, it is necessary that the offender's position actually involves “authority or supervision.” Cleaning personnel working in Correctional Services, for example, would therefore not be subject to the provision. This is related to the rationale behind the rule, which is again closely linked to misuse of positions of power as regulated in Section 193 (1) of the Penal Code.

The term “aids and abets” in the second paragraph of Section 194 refers to activity rather than mere participation. For example, encouragement and incitement will often be deemed as aiding and abetting.<sup>127</sup>

Section 194 will cover some of the cases falling in under Section 193.<sup>128</sup> Both provisions may be used in ideal concurrence if necessary to cover all criminal aspects of the situation. The preparatory works mention a scenario where an employee in the Correctional Services engages in sexual activities with a person subject to his authority, while at the same time abuses a relationship of dependence.<sup>129</sup>

Exploiting any person's mental illness or mental retardation, or aiding or abetting another person in doing so, is also illegal and regulated in Section 193 (2) of the Penal Code.

2.2 Child Prostitution

vii. Norway is a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Human Trafficking. The Convention was signed by Norway on 16 May 2005, ratified on 17 January 2008 and entered into force on 1 February 2008.

viii. Prostitution is regulated in Sections 202, 202a and 203 of the Penal Code.<sup>130</sup> According to the third paragraph of Section 202, prostitution is defined as “[engaging] in sexual activity or [committing] a sexual act with another person for payment.” Criminal liability shall not be avoided by any mistake regarding the victim’s age, unless it is made in “good faith without negligence”, cf. Section 202 in fine.

In cases of child prostitution, the definition in Section 202 must be read in conjunction with Section 203<sup>131</sup>, which regulates prostitution where the victim is younger than 18 years of age. Child prostitution carries a higher penalty than prostitution where the victim is older than 18 years of age.

“Payment” includes any kind of remuneration or consideration, such as clothing, drugs or alcohol. An agreement or promise of future payment is equated with made payment. The payment can be made or promised to either the person performing the sexual service, or to any other person, as long as there is causation between the sexual act performed and the payment. It is not required that the payment is made by the person receiving the sexual service.

One isolated case of exchanging sexual acts for payment suffices to qualify the act as prostitution.<sup>132</sup> Finally, the definition is gender neutral.

Considering the above, the national definition of “child prostitution” is perfectly compatible with the definition in Art. 19(2) of the Lanzarote Convention.

ix. National legislation criminalizes both the recruiter and the user. Any person who engages in, or who aids and abets another person to engage in sexual activity with the child, is criminalized, cf. Section 203.<sup>133</sup> Furthermore, the first paragraph of Section 202<sup>134</sup> criminalizes anyone who “promotes the engagement of other persons in prostitution”, or that “lets premises on the understanding that such premises shall be used for prostitution or is grossly negligent in this respect”. Finally, it is illegal to “unambiguously offer, arrange or ask for prostitution” by means of a public announcement, cf. Section 202 (2).

x. Norway is party to the Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime. It was signed by Norway 23 November 2001, and ratified 30 June 2006.<sup>135</sup>

xi. The 1902 Penal Code describes “child pornography” as “any presentation of sexual abuse of children or any presentation of a sexual nature that involves children”. The description is used in the section that criminalizes child pornography (Section 204a), and should serve the definitional purpose in this context<sup>136</sup>.

Art. 20 (2) of the Lanzarote Convention defines “child pornography” as: “any material that visually depicts a child engaged in real or simulated sexually explicit conduct or any depiction of a child’s sexual organs for primarily sexual purposes”.

The main questions here are whether or not the Norwegian provision is compatible with the definition when it comes to 1) “any material”, that is visually depicting a child engaged in 2) “real or simulated sexually explicit conduct”, or depictions of a child’s sexual organs 3) “for primarily sexual purposes”. Secondly, another significant question will be whether the definition of a “child” in the convention is compatible with the definition in the Norwegian legislation.

Art. 20 (2): “any presentation”

According to preparatory work of the Norwegian Penal Code, the term “any presentation” in the Penal Code Section 204a refers to any medium, including text based presentations.<sup>137</sup> This seems to be compatible with the term, “any material”, used in the convention’s definition.

Art. 20 (2): “real or simulated sexually explicit conduct”

According to the Explanatory Report of the Convention, the term “sexually explicit conduct” must be defined by the parties to the Convention. It covers, however, at least sexual intercourse, bestiality, masturbation, sadistic or masochistic abuse in a sexual context and lascivious exhibition of the genitals or the pubic area of a child. As clarified above, the Norwegian Penal Code refers to “any presentation of a sexual nature that involves children” (Section 204a). According to the preparatory works of the Penal Code, this refers to presentations of actions that are sexual in the sense that they are linked to genitals or sexual activity.<sup>138</sup>

It is not a requirement that the acts are sexually motivated.<sup>139</sup> Any presentation that is presenting a child as a sexual object, will, according to the preparatory works, be affected by this provision – for instance where children are forced to pose in sexually provocative positions.

This should at least cover the required criteria clarified in the Explanatory Report. The Norwegian term probably comprises more than the requirements by including presentations that are not sexually motivated, but that appear to be of sexual nature in specific contexts. For example, pictures of young children without clothes on, that were taken for an innocent purpose by their parents, could be regarded as “of sexual nature” if they are spread to unauthorized persons for sexual purposes.

The definition of the convention refers to material that depicts children in sexually explicit conduct that is “real or simulated”. The Explanatory Report does not explain this term, but it seems correct to interpret this so that “child pornography” also includes material which simulates existing or non-existing children engaging in sexual conduct. This interpretation can be supported by the fact that Art. 20 of the Convention, according to the Explanatory Report, was inspired by the Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime Art. 9, which includes “realistic images representing a minor engaged in sexually explicit conduct” in its definition of child pornography. This comprises images that are morphed of natural persons, and also images generated entirely by a computer.<sup>140</sup> The Norwegian Penal Code Section 204a, on the other hand, does not define whether or not simulated images could be classified as child pornography. The more general term “any presentation” is used here.

However, animated or manipulated presentations are considered to be child pornography if they depict sexual abuse or sexualisation of children<sup>141</sup>. This should cover the same material as the term “simulated” in the Lanzarote Convention Art. 20 (2).

The term “primarily sexual purposes”

The Lanzarote Convention’s definition of child pornography includes “any depiction of a child’s sexual organs for primarily sexual purposes”. This sentence modifies the definition, meaning that material having a pure artistic, medical, scientific or similar merit will not be within the ambit of the provision. As a result, presentations could be considered acceptable in some contexts whereas they could be considered to be of “sexual nature” in others.

The Norwegian Penal Code Section 204a (5) and 204 (4) state that “sexual depictions that must be regarded as justifiable for artistic, scientific, informational or similar purposes shall not be regarded as pornographic”. Therefore, Norwegian legislation seems to be compatible with the Convention on this point.

Moreover, “child” is to be, according to the Lanzarote Convention Art. 3, any person under the age of 18 years. “Child” is defined in the Norwegian Penal Code Section 204a. as “any person who is or who appears to be under 18 years of age”. This means that the Norwegian legislation complies with the requirements of the Convention, but also goes a bit further by including persons that “appears to be under 18 years of age”.

Finally, the Convention’s definition of “child pornography” is, according to the Explanatory Report, based on the Optional Protocol to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography. This convention is ratified by the Norwegian government and was implemented in the Norwegian legislation in 2000. During the preparation of the national ratification act, the current Norwegian national legislation was assumed to be compatible with the requirements of the protocol, and new national legislation was not needed for the implementation.<sup>142</sup> This suggests that Norwegian legislation is compatible with the Convention’s Art. 20 (2).

xii. To prepare for ratification of the Lanzarote Convention, amendments to the national legislation relating to child pornography have occurred (in the 2005 Penal Code), but they have not yet entered into force. It is not confirmed when this will happen. The following discussion will be based on the current legislation (the 1902 Penal Code), but the amendments will also be discussed to determine whether or not they satisfy the requirements of the Convention.

Criminal liability related to child pornography in the current Norwegian legislation is essentially regulated in the Penal Code Section 204a (1). Any person who engages in any of the following acts, is to be criminally liable:

- “a. produces, procures, imports, possesses, delivers to another person or for payment or systematically acquaints himself with any presentation of sexual abuse of children or any presentation of a sexual nature that involves children,
- b. concerns himself with presentations of sexual abuse of children or presentations of a sexual nature that involve children in any other way as referred to in Section 204, first paragraph, or
- c. induces any person under 18 years of age to allow pictures of himself or herself to be taken as part of any commercial presentation of moving or non-moving pictures of a sexual nature, or produces such presentations depicting any person under 18 years of age.”

Section 204a litra b is referring to Section 204 (1) litra d, which attributes liability to any person, who: “gives a public lecture or arranges a public performance or exhibition of a pornographic nature”. In addition to this, Section 204a attributes liability to any person who “willfully or negligently fails to prevent the commission in any activity of any act referred to in the first paragraph”. Also, Section 205 states that the liability stated in the provisions in this chapter, “shall also apply to any person who aids and abets the act”.

The Lanzarote Convention Article 20 (1) litra a to litra f attributes criminal liability to those who are producing, offering, making available, distributing, transmitting, procuring or possessing child pornography, and those who are knowingly obtaining access to child pornography. Further, Article 24 (1) and (2), also attributes liability to any person who is intentionally “aiding or abetting the commission” of the offences or “attempts to commit” the offences established in accordance with the Convention.

According to the preparatory works of the amendments to the 2005 Penal Code,<sup>143</sup> it was assumed that the national penal legislation essentially met the requirements of the Lanzarote

Convention. When it comes to the criminal liability regulation, it was assumed that only small amendments were needed to meet the requirements.

Art. 20 (1) litra a: "Producing"

The Lanzarote Convention Article 20 (1) litra a attributes criminal liability to a person who is "producing child pornography". Likewise, the Penal Code Section 204a (1) litra a attributes criminal liability to "Any person who...produces...any presentation of sexual abuse of children or any presentation of a sexual nature that involves children". This provision is upheld in the amended 2005 Penal Code Section 311 (1) litra a.

Art. 20 (1) litra b: "offering or making available"

Article 20 (1) litra b of the Convention also attributes criminal liability to a person who is "offering or making available child pornography". According to the Explanatory Report (paragraph 136), this covers a wide range of cases, for example providing material to others, including creation of websites or web communities of child pornography or publishing material there, which is available for others. On this point, the current Norwegian legislation has been regarded to not fully meet the requirements of the Convention.<sup>144</sup> The Penal Code uses the terms "delivers to another person" (Section 204a (1) litra a), "publishes" and "in any other way attempts to disseminate" (Section 204a (1) litra b cf. 204 (1) litra a)). It seems clear that the terms "delivers to another person" or "publishes" do not cover the convention's "offering or making available". This would probably, in most cases, be covered by the term "in any other way attempts to disseminate" in the current Norwegian provision. However, the interpretation of "attempts to disseminate" is debatable. To make sure the convention is fulfilled on this point, the amended legislation will use the terms "offers" and "makes available", see the 2005 Penal Code Section 311 (1) litra b.

Art. 20 (1) litra c: "distributing or transmitting"

The Convention's Article 20 (1) litra c attributes criminal liability to a person who is "distributing or transmitting child pornography". According to the Explanatory Report, "distribution" is active dissemination of material. The Norwegian Penal Code Section 205 (1) litra a uses the term "attempts to disseminate", which should fulfil the requirements. This provision is continued in the amendments.<sup>145</sup> “Transmitting” does, according to the report, cover actions like sending material through a computer system to other persons, and also providing material such as photographs or magazines. This should in the Norwegian legislation be covered by the terms “delivers to another person” (Section 204a (1) litra a), “publishes”, “sells”, and “in any other way attempts to disseminate” (Section 204 (1) litra). The 2005 Penal Code includes the same elements<sup>146</sup>.

Art. 20 (1) litra d: “procuring”

Article 20 (1) litra d criminalizes procuring of child pornography for one self or for another person. The Norwegian legislation is in the same way criminalizing “procuring” of child pornography in the Penal Code Section 204a (1) litra a, and this is continued in the Code of 2005. Also at this point, the legislation seems to be compatible with the requirements of the Convention.

Art. 20 (1) litra e: “possessing”

In Article 20 (1) litra e of the Convention, criminal liability is attributed to persons who are “possessing child pornography”. The Explanatory Report states that this covers possession by whatever means, such as video cassettes, DVDs, magazines, mobile phones, sorted material in a computer system, storage devices, diskettes etc. Likewise, the Norwegian Penal Code attributes liability to “any person who [...] possesses [...] any presentation of sexual abuse of children or presentations of a sexual nature that involves children”, cf. Section 204a (1) litra a. The same elements are continued in the 2005 Penal Code. On this point, both the Convention and the Norwegian legislation go slightly further than the UN Optional Protocol about sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography. Article 2 of the protocol does not require that the States attribute liability to those who are only possessing child pornography for personal use.

Art. 20 (1) litra f: “knowingly obtaining access... to child pornography”

The Lanzarote Convention Article 20 (1) litra f attributes criminal liability to a person who is “knowingly obtaining access, through information and communication technologies, to child pornography”. The Explanatory Report states that the rationale behind this provision is to also attribute liability to those who are accessing child pornography websites without downloading, and therefore cannot be caught under the offence of procuring or possession. There has to be an intention behind this action, and the person in question has to know that child pornographic material can be found there. According to the preparatory works for the amendments of the 2005 Penal Code regarding child pornography,<sup>147</sup> it was suggested to amend the national legislation on this point to make sure that the requirements of the Convention were met. The current legislation concerning this is to be found in the 1902 Penal Code Section 204 a (1) litra a.

In contrast to the Convention, the Section 311 (1) litra c of the 2005 Penal Code is not limited to access obtained through information and communication technology, therefore including for example printed images, video-cassettes, magazines etc. It has nevertheless been discussed whether or not the term “systematically acquaints himself” covers all cases where somebody after the Convention Art. 20 (1) litra f is “knowingly obtaining access”. The provision has therefore been amended, and the term “intentionally gains access” will be used when the Code enters into force.

It was assumed in the preparatory works that the Convention does not give any qualifying conditions for how access has to be achieved. The Convention’s use of the word “knowingly” could probably embrace a wider area than the wording “intentionally” in the Norwegian amendment. The Explanatory Report does however state that the provision only covers those cases where the access is achieved intentionally. Therefore, the Norwegian legislation has to be assumed to meet the requirements of the convention when the 2005 Penal Code enter into force.

Art. 24 (1): “aiding or abetting the commission”

As mentioned above, Art. 24 (1) of the Convention also attributes liability to any person who intentionally is “aiding or abetting the commission” of the offences established in accordance with the Convention. In the same way, the Norwegian Penal Code Section 205 indicates that the liability stated in the provisions about child pornography shall apply to any person who “aids and abets the act”. This provision has been maintained in the Penal Code of 2005. This being said, it seems clear that the Norwegian legislation is compatible with the requirements of the Convention on this point as well.

xiii. The National Criminal Investigation Service (Kripos),<sup>148</sup> in cooperation with the Norwegian internet provider Telenor, developed in 2004 an internet filter<sup>149</sup> that blocks access to web sites containing child pornographic material. Kripos say they have a good overview of web pages of such material, much because of tips from the public.<sup>150</sup>

When child pornographic material is detected, a “stop” site will show up on the screen. The number of views of this warning in recent years has been at about 15 000-16 000 per day in Norway, but many of the hits are results of virus or redirection without user involvement. The filter does not store information about the IP address or any identifying information about the user, and generates no criminal charges. The filter is used by most internet providers in Norway, and a several other countries have started using similar filters after the same model. As child pornography is an international issue, international cooperation is essential. Therefore, the information that Kripos receives from the investigation of the detected material, is shared with the authorities of other countries.<sup>151</sup>

xiv. The current Norwegian legislation is in the Penal Code Section 224 (1) and (3) attributing criminal liability to any person who “exploits” a person who is under 18 years of age for the purpose of prostitution or “other sexual purposes”, “independently of any use of force or threats”. This includes the act of inducing another person to “allow himself or herself to be used for such purposes”. Section 224 (2) is also attributing criminal liability to any person who “aids and abets such exploitation or inducement”. Under the preparations of the 2005 Penal Code, the Norwegian government assumed that the requirements of the Convention’s Art. 21 (1) litra a and b about recruiting a child into participating in pornographic performances, or coercing or causing a child to participate in such performances, were met by this provision.<sup>152</sup> The wording is continued in the 2005 Penal Code<sup>153</sup>.

To sum up, the Norwegian State does criminalize intentional conduct of making a child participate in pornographic performances, the difference between recruitment and coercion is not highlighted.

The Norwegian legislation has no provisions that clearly attribute criminal liability to persons who attend pornographic performances involving the participation of children. At this point, the Norwegian Government has assumed that amendments are needed to meet the requirements of the Convention's Art. 21 (1) litra c, which is prohibiting the act of "knowingly attending pornographic performances involving participation of children".<sup>154</sup> Therefore, a new provision in the 2005 Penal Code (Section 311) will attribute criminal liability to those who "attend a performance of sexual abuse against children or a performance that sexualizes children".<sup>155</sup>

2.4 Corruption of Children

xv. Before dealing with the details concerning sexual gratification through communication technologies, it is helpful to first establish the main rule in this particular field, given in The Penal Code Section 201:

"Any person who by word or deed behaves in a sexually offensive or otherwise indecent manner

a) in a public place,

b) in the presence of or towards any person who has not consented thereto, or

c) in the presence of or towards children under 16 years of age, shall be liable to fines or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year."

For this section to apply, the person must behave in a "sexually offensive manner." or in an "otherwise indecent manner". These conditions can be met by words or by actions. In addition to these conditions, the behaviour has to be performed either "in a public place, in the presence of or towards any person who has not consented thereto or in the presence of or towards children under 16 years of age." Violation of this provision leads to fines or imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year.

Causing a child to witness sexual activities is a crime pursuant to Section 201 according to the litra c, "in the presence of or towards children under the age of 16." Here, there is no

Section 201(1) litra c, has broad effect and does not specify what “causing” specifically means. This section must therefore cover any situation where a child witnesses sexual activities, and the performance can be considered sexually offensive or otherwise indecent. A typical example is indecent exposure. However, according to the preparatory works, the child must be able to perceive the act as indecent.<sup>157</sup>

Section 201(1) litra b, makes an exception from the main rule in litra a, for situations where the involved person consents to the act. This exception, however, does not exist under litra c, and such actions will therefore always be criminal when they are directed at children under the age of 16, with or without their consent.

2.5 Solicitation of Children for Sexual Purposes

xvi. The next question to discuss is whether Section 201 also applies to situations where sexual exploitation of children is manifested through different information and communication technologies. The section explicitly states that sexually offensive behaviour communicated through information technologies is illegal. A typical example is when a perpetrator contacts children on websites for communication (“chatting”).

The discretionary element located in Section 201 (2), defines what is either a sexually offensive manner or in an otherwise indecent manner. This particular formulation will be briefly explained.

In regard to the term “sexually,” it is clear that for the provision to apply the action needs an element of sexuality. Several acts are included in this term. The scope of “sexually” is delimited by Section 196.<sup>158</sup> Consequently, Section 201 intends to include more situations than Section 196.

With regard to the term “manner,” it is clear that the act does not need to be physical. Actions where victims are not physically touched are also within the scope of the regulation. The last part of the same sentence expands the scope of Section 201. It states that other

indecent manner is criminal. Therefore, situations when the indecent manner is committed over the telephone or the Internet, are regulated by Section 201.

Examples from case law help to illustrate what situations are covered by Section 201 (2). Indecent speech or other obscene communication has several times been classified as illegal. In 2007, a man was sentenced by the Supreme Court for sending text messages containing sexual language and pictures of his genitalia to a young girl.<sup>159</sup> Without further interpretation of the formulation we can determine that the section's scope is compatible with the demands and requirements in the Lanzarote Convention Art. 23.

In the Norwegian Penal Code Section 201a, a further restriction applies to cases where the perpetrator meets children, or proposes to do so, with the intention and purpose of committing any offences in Sections 196, 197 and 200 (2).

“A person who arranges a meeting with a child under the age of sixteen years old with intention to commit either of the acts mentioned in Section 195, 196 or 200 second paragraph is liable to fines or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, when that person has reached the appointed meeting place or a place where the meeting place can be observed from.

Delusion about the child's age does not preclude criminal liability unless no negligence has been committed in this respect.

Criminal liability may no longer apply in cases where the persons that arrange the meeting are about coequal in age or in development.”<sup>160</sup>

The background for this regulation was the corresponding statutory provisions enacted in England in 2004.<sup>161</sup> The NGO Save the Children Norway, with support from the Ombudsman for Children, initiated the work on the implementation of a similar regulation in the Penal Code. The rationale behind the rule was the need for improved protection of children because of rapid development and technical advances. Of particular concern was children's open access to meet other people through different communication technologies such as the Internet. The increased use of mobile phones and online services among children makes them more vulnerable to abuse, as potential abusers can make contact with them more easily.

The regulation criminalizes actions when a person arranges, or proposes to arrange, a meeting with a child under sixteen years of age, when the purpose of this meeting is to commit a crime listed in Section 195, 196 and 200 (2). For this regulation to be applicable the adult has to propose or arrange a meeting with a child under 16 years old. The purpose of the meeting must be to exploit the child for a sexual purpose. In this, an element of intent is found.<sup>162</sup>

The second paragraph in Section 201a states that any mistake made as regards to the child's age does not preclude criminal liability, unless the mistake was made without negligence. This regulation demands that if there is uncertainty as to the age of the other person, the adult has to actively investigate how old he or she is.<sup>163</sup>

This regulation becomes enforceable either when the potential abuser arrives to the agreed meeting place, or to a place where the meeting place can be observed. This means that the act is criminalized as soon as the potential abuser reaches a spot where he can see the meeting place. Consequently, the possibility for withdrawal is precluded a relatively early stage of the act. This also impacts the question of when an action is characterized as an attempt, which will be discussed under.

The regulation also contains an exception. If the offender and the child are approximately equal in age and development, this may have an exonerating effect, based on an overall assessment of the situation<sup>164</sup>.

Although Section 201a., is relatively new, examples from case law exist. In 2008, a person was arrested and charged with violation of this provision. He had arranged a meeting over the Internet with a fifteen years old girl, and they both agreed to have sexual intercourse. The person had first met the child on a website. Later, they arranged a meeting at a hotel for the purpose of having intercourse. The child, however, proceeded to express regret when she met the defendant at the hotel. The defendant accepted this and they did not have any sexual relation. The defendant was sentenced to 30 days of prison.<sup>165</sup>

In a more recent criminal case, a 69-year-old male was sentenced to 30 days in prison after attempting to meet a child. The person was arrested in his car near the appointed meeting place. The place in this case was not deemed as a place where the “meeting place could be observed from”.<sup>166</sup> He was, consequently, not convicted for violating Section 201a., but for attempting, cf. Section 49.<sup>167</sup>

xvii. Aiding and abetting in the mentioned activities are illegal and criminal pursuant to the Penal Code Section 205. This regulation takes effect to every Section in Chapter 19 that applies to sexual violations (Section 191 to 211).

Case law establishes that aiding or abetting includes both physical and mental participation.<sup>168</sup> An example of the latter can be a person encouraging the perpetrator to conduct the crime, or threatening the victim. Physical participation occurs if, for instance, a person prevents the victim from escaping by physically holding the victim back.<sup>169</sup>

Attempting any of the aforementioned actions in subsection a, b, c, d or e is criminal, according to the Penal Code Section 49.

“When a felony is not completed, but an act has been done whereby the commission of the felony is intended to begin, this constitutes a punishable attempt.

An attempt to commit a misdemeanour is not punishable.”

It is necessary to clarify what actions are considered to be attempts. To do so, it is convenient to establish two boundaries. The upper limit is drawn towards actions that are not attempts, but completed. This limit is obvious. A more complex and difficult task is to draw the lower limit toward actions that are not considered attempts. Actions in this category are, for example, preparatory actions.

It is established in case law that the regulation contains two necessary conditions.<sup>170</sup> First, the perpetrator must have the intention to fulfil the crime, and second, there must be actions indicating that the person has this particular intention.<sup>171</sup> The first requirement is a subjective element. The second requirement is often easier to prove. Evidence in this respect might be that the person has acquired necessary equipment, conducted investigations or that the person approaches the place where the action is planned to be committed. These actions can however also be seen as preparatory actions, which in Norwegian law is not criminal. The key factor in this assessment is whether the action shows that the person is about to commit the crime. It depends on the length of the time between the already executed action and the remaining parts. The action's character is also of great significance, along with the action's psychological differences.<sup>172</sup>

xviii. Corporate liability is a supplement to the personal criminal responsibility. This emphasizes two different remedies, both personal responsibility and/or liability on behalf of a corporation. Action on behalf of the corporation can be punished through the provisions in the Penal Code Sections 48a and 48b.

In Section 48a (2), the “enterprise” is defined as a company, society or other association, one-man enterprise, foundation, estate or public activity.

Criminal liability of corporations must be regulated separately since an entity cannot be punished according to the general liability rules. One of the basic conditions for criminal liability is the presence of guilt, which is difficult to conceive in the context of an enterprise. Therefore, corporations are punished on objective grounds for acts committed by persons acting on their behalf, cf. Section 48a.

The conditions for the imposition of a corporate penalty are specified in the first paragraph of Section 48a:

“When a penal provision is contravened by a person who has acted on behalf of an enterprise, the enterprise may be liable to a penalty. This applies even if no individual person may be punished for the contravention.”

Employees of the company make up the main group of persons acting “on behalf of an enterprise”. In addition, the entity can be responsible for the acts made by independent contractors, cf. Section 48a.

An additional condition for corporate liability is violation of a penal provision. The provision is general and applies in principle to any violations of a criminal sanctioned norm.

However, Section 48a, has a special rule for corporate punishment. The first paragraph second sentence, states that the company may be punished even if no individual can be punished for the contravention. This means it is not necessary to identify a responsible person, meaning that both anonymous and known cumulative errors are encompassed.

Even if these conditions are met, the court may choose not to punish the company. This is known as facultative admission. Section 48b provides guidance for the assessment deciding whether a penalty shall be imposed and for the sentencing. The court shall pay “particular consideration” to “the preventive effect of the penalty”, the seriousness of the violation, whether guidelines could have prevented the infringement, whether the offence was committed in the interest of the corporation, whether advantages have been obtained from the violation and the corporation’s financial ability.<sup>173</sup> The same factors are important when determining the penalty fines.<sup>174</sup> The corporation’s financial situation will normally have a greater impact on the assessment of fines than for assessing whether corporate liability shall be imposed.

The Penal Code does not distinguish between leading persons and regular employees.<sup>175</sup> If the offender is employed and acts on behalf of the firm, this can lead to corporate liability regardless of the person’s position.<sup>176</sup> This is in contrast to the Lanzarote Convention cf. Section 26, which distinguishes between persons in position of authority and regular employees.

xix. Norwegian legislation may impose civil and administrative punishment on the corporation, cf. Section 48a:

“The penalty shall be a fine. The enterprise may also by a court judgement be deprived of the right to carry in business or may be prohibited from carrying it on in certain forms, cf. Section 29.”

xx. National legislation does not exclude individual liability when imposing corporate liability. Corporations will normally be punished through restrictions and/or through fines, while the individual can be held criminal responsible according to regular assessment in the Penal Code.

If there are anonymous mistakes, the individual cannot be held responsible. This could nevertheless lead to the punishment of the corporation and it will exclude individual liability. Where it is clear that a company is involved with a crime, but it is not possible to find the culprit, the corporation can be held objectively responsible.<sup>177</sup>

2.7 Aggravating Circumstances

xxi. The crimes of sexual abuse, child prostitution, child pornography, corruption of children and solicitation of children for sexual purposes, have been described above. In this part, these crimes will be linked with aggravating circumstances. For thorough information about aggravating circumstances applied on the crime of sexual abuse of children, see subsection II. 2. a. ii. (The criminal liability for intentionally committed acts of sexual abuse).

Section 61 of the Penal Code states that:

“If a previously convicted person again commits a criminal act of the same nature as that for which he has previously been convicted, the maximum penalty laid down in the penal provision shall be increased to double its prescribed limit, unless it is otherwise provided in the penal provision itself.”

Chapter 19 of the 1902 Penal Code about sexual offences, open for increasing the penalty when aggravating circumstances occur. The purpose of applying aggravating circumstances is to enforce the protection of certain interests that are considered more important than others. Such an interest is, amongst others, the protection of persons who are particularly vulnerable, e.g. children.

Aggravating circumstances for the above mentioned crimes are outlined in Chapter 19 in the Penal Code. The provisions that protect individuals from sexual assault by use of force, violence and intimidation are found in the first chapter, followed by the provisions on abuse of power. Section 202 concerns liability for persons who “promotes the engagement of other persons in prostitution” followed by the incest provisions and the pornography provision.

In the 2005 Penal Code the general rule of aggravating circumstances is found in Section 77. This provision defines (more detailed than the corresponding provisions of the 1902 Penal Code) the circumstances that should be given weight when assessing the sentence. The 1902

Penal Code is the law in force, but the 2005 Penal Code reflects, to a certain degree, the current state of law.

2.8 Sanctions and Measures

xxii. All of the above mentioned crimes are as a general rule sanctioned by either imprisonment or fines depending on the severity of the crime. According to Section 26a of the Penal Code, the court may also impose a fine in addition to a custodial sentence. Besides, community sentence may be imposed instead of a sentence of imprisonment, cf. Section 28 a.

A person who has committed any of the above mentioned crimes may be deprived of any position, now or in the future, or to carry on any enterprise or other activity, cf. Section 29. This is manifested in the fact that for certain positions it is mandatory to provide a satisfactory police certificate of good conduct. The certificate shows, inter alia, whether the person concerned has been charged with, indicted for, or convicted of sexual abuse of children. Positions that require the submission of a police certificate are, among others, positions within health care, social services and most other positions that involve contact with children. For example, persons convicted of sexual abuse of children are barred from employment in kindergartens as well as in the primary and lower secondary school.<sup>178</sup>

According to Section 33, a ban on making contact, with for instance children, may be imposed on an offender. The ban on making contact may entail that the person subject to the ban is prohibited from being present in specific areas, or pursuing, visiting, or in any other way making contact with another person.

Through the provisions in Section 53 relating to deferred sentence, the court may impose various conditions regarding the penalty, for example that the convicted person undergoes psychiatric treatment or that she/he shall stay in a home or institution for up to one year.<sup>179</sup> This is a judgement in a criminal case whereby the court may postpone execution of the passed sentence and lay down certain conditions, so that on the expiry of a specified period and the fulfilment of the conditions imposed, the sentence is entirely remitted.<sup>180</sup>

Further, the court may impose a sentence of compulsory mental health care, cf. Section 39, or a sentence of compulsory care, cf. Section 39a. Also, preventive detention in an institution under the Correctional Services may be imposed instead of a sentence of imprisonment, cf. Section 39c.

The Child Welfare Act Section 4-12 states that a care order may be made, which implies that a parent may lose permanent custody of the child. According to the Child Welfare Act Section 4-20, it can also be decided that the parents shall be deprived of all parental responsibility.

Extradition

To prevent offenders from evading criminal prosecution or execution of a sentence by escaping country, the Norwegian government has signed treaties on extradition with other States. Extradition is primarily regulated by the Extradition Act.<sup>181</sup> Section 1 of the Extradition Act states that “any person who is charged, accused or sentenced by a foreign state by a punishable act, and who is located in Norway” may, on petition of the state, be transferred there compulsory.<sup>182</sup> However, the power to extradite is subject to certain limitations. The Norwegian government does not extradite Norwegian citizens to foreign countries, cf. Section 2. Furthermore extradition may not take place for a political offence, cf. Section 5, or if there is a serious risk that legal safeguards or fundamental values will not be complied with, cf. Section 6. Extradition is precluded if it would conflict with basic humanitarian considerations, cf. Section 7 of the Extradition Act.

Norway is member of Interpol and participates in the Schengen Information System (SIS). The Norwegian police may institute an international search for a person who is charged, accused or convicted in a criminal proceeding in Norway by these two channels in terms of arrest and extradition.<sup>183</sup> Norway has signed treaties on extradition with several countries, which basically entail an obligation to surrender the criminals. Most important is the European Convention on Extradition of 1957. Additionally, Norway has bilateral treaties on extradition with, among many others, the U.S. and Australia. Extradition between the Nordic countries is regulated in the new Act relating to Arrest Warrant.<sup>184</sup>

xxiii. The Norwegian legal system is constantly evolving and there is regular debate about which sanctions are proper and effective. The topic has been much discussed and there is no definitive answer to the question. Research and studies provide for new knowledge in the field and paves the way for the use of new methods and other sanctions.

Recent development has been moving towards stricter penalties. The Government has in its policy platform taken steps to intensify the efforts to prevent violence against children and to heighten the level of punishment for rape and other sexual offenses. The amendment act to the chapter on sexual abuse demonstrates a focus on strengthening the protection of children against abuse and raising the level of punishment for serious sexual offenses. This is maintained in the new Penal Code of 2005.

In general, Norway has a legal system that is intended to ensure a safe society by preventing crime and detecting and prosecuting violations. There are nevertheless different views on how the system works in practice. It is clear that the sanctions have various individual results and that while a punishment may be very effective on one person, it may not have the desired effect on another. To ensure efficiency and proportionality, the Norwegian legal system has different sorts of sanctions, such as those mentioned above.<sup>185</sup> The courts may, under given circumstances, choose between these alternatives and combine them. In this way, the punishment can be adapted to the individual offender.

Efficiency

A general and important goal is to reduce the occurrence of relapse into crime and thereby provide increased security for society.<sup>186</sup> This includes a constant focus on rehabilitation, which with more monitoring and support shall help prevent sexual offenders from committing further crimes. Reduced recidivism is an important measure of whether the sanctions have worked. Unfortunately there is not much research on sexual offenders, and it is difficult to determine whether the sanctions are effective and deterrents.

Figures from Statistics Norway indicate that 36 per cent of the 263 persons accused of sexual crime in 1996, are registered with recidivism in the five years from 1997 to 2001.<sup>187</sup> The statistics are, however, not sufficiently specified thus one can hardly draw conclusions based this.

Experiences from the Nordic countries, gathered in the report by the Nordic Council of Ministers,<sup>188</sup> suggest that imprisonment doesn't work for sexual offenders and that therapy is the only way to change their behaviour. Moreover, mandatory participation in a program for sexual offenders may be given as a condition to a deferred sentence, cf. the Penal Code Section 53 no. 3.<sup>189</sup> The purpose of this provision is, in addition to prevention, to set conditions adapted to the individual convicted person and thereby improve their ability to reintegrate into the society.

Certain treatment programs for sexual offenders in Norway do exist, but these are mostly voluntary. One example is the program in Bergen prison, a joint project between the prison and expertise for safety, prisons, and forensic psychiatry.<sup>190</sup> The goal of the program is to reduce the risk of relapse, by making participants able to cope with their difficulties in a good way.

At the same time, general deterrence is an important principle and it is a goal that the sanctions are dissuasive. For inter alia this reason, imprisonment is still considered an effective sanction.

All over, the Norwegian legal system seems to contain rather proportional and effective sanctions. One can claim that the main issue regarding sexual abuse of children is not the sanctions' efficiency, but rather the amount of detected cases. Another problem is the lack of sufficient support and monitoring that child victims receive by the State. More about this under subsection II. 2. h. xxvi.

xxiv. In subsection II. 2. h. xviii, it was found that legal entities can be held liable when crimes are committed on their behalf. Legal entities held liable for the above mentioned crimes are sanctioned by fines, cf. Section 48a of the Penal Code. The enterprise, by a court judgment, may also be deprived of the right to carry on business or may be prohibited from carrying it on in certain forms, cf. Section 29.

xxv. According to the Penal Code Section 35 (2) cf. the Criminal Procedure Act Section 203, objects that have been used or were intended for use in a criminal act may be confiscated.

Bona fide third parties

The Penal Code Section 36 concerns from whom the confiscation, pursuant to Section 35, may be effected. Section 36 (1) states that confiscation "may be effected from the offender or from the person on whose behalf has acted". Moreover, confiscation may be effected from an owner "who has or should have understood that the object was to be used for a criminal act". This precludes confiscation from bona fide third parties. However, objects that are deemed to be significant as evidence may be seized until a legally enforceable judgement is passed, cf. the Criminal Procedure Act Section 203. This is regardless of whether the owner was acting in good faith. When the seized object is no longer needed as evidence, it will be returned to the aggrieved person, cf. Section 214.

Confiscated properties

The proceeds of any confiscation made by the State shall as a rule accrue to the State Treasury, cf. the Penal Code Section 37d. The court may decide that the proceeds shall be applied to covering any claim for compensation made by the aggrieved person.

Although the proceeds will not go directly to any particular fund, the government funds different measures, hereunder the prevention of sexual abuse of children.

xxvi. In recent years there has been an increased focus on domestic violence in Norway. The government has initiated several plans of action to combat the abuse of children and to ensure the subsequent care of children who have been victims of abuse within the private sphere.<sup>191</sup>

The Children's Houses

In the year 2007, the first Children's House ("Barnehus") was opened in Norway. This public service is provided for children who have witnessed or have been the victims of violence or sexual abuse. The Children's Houses were conceived of as multidisciplinary competence centres, also providing services for mentally impaired adults. They form part of a project between the Ministry of Justice and the Public Security, the Ministry of Children, Equality and Social Inclusion, and the Ministry of Health and Care Services. The Children's Houses have no legal basis, but are established through the mandate of the project.

The Children's Houses are organized in such a way that the necessary services are provided all in one place, so that the child does not need to be transported between different services. This provides a less stressful environment for the children. The Children's Houses are equipped for judicial interviews, medical examination and for treatment and follow-up of the children. Competent workers within different fields are employed to ensure that adequate support and monitoring of the abused children is undertaken. The Children's Houses also offer consultations and support to the child's close family. The use of an institution requires that the relevant crime has been reported to the police. Advice and guidance will be given, however, under any circumstance. Consultation can also be anonymous. Further, the system has become a nationwide initiative, with seven units established across the country (autumn 2012). These new institutions represent a significant improvement in the service of support and monitoring of children who have been victims of sexual abuse within the family or close environment.

Despite their advantages, the Children's Houses are criticized for the fact that the time period that passes between the report of the incident and the subsequent judicial examination is too long. According to the annual report from the Oslo Children's House from 2011, it takes an average of 71 days from the moment the crime is reported to the judicial examination take place.<sup>192</sup> This is a severe deviation from the Criminal Procedure Act Section 239 (4) and the Regulation on judicial examination and observation Section 4,<sup>193</sup> which states that examinations shall be carried out no later than two weeks after the criminal offence has been reported to the police. While the report explains this by pointing to the challenges that follow from the procedure and coordination of investigation and varying expertise on domestic violence, others indicate a lack of resources and insufficient prioritizing.

In case of further need for treatment, the child's care is taken over by other institutions for additional monitoring and support. The Children's Houses cooperate with the local Child Welfare Service and The Children's and Young People's Psychiatric Out-Patient Clinic regarding the progression and support of the child and his or her family. The kind of service provided is supposed to adapt to the needs of the individual child.

The claim to receive assistance from the Child Welfare Service is statutory in Child Welfare Act. When a child has been victim of abuse within the family or close environment, it may be necessary to apply alternative, more drastic measures, such as care orders, cf. Section 4-12 of the Child Welfare Act, and deprivation of parental responsibility, cf. Section 4-20. The purpose of the act is "to ensure that children and young persons who live in conditions that may be detrimental to their health and development receive the necessary assistance and care at the right time" and "to help ensure that children and young persons grow up in a secure environment", cf. Section 1-1. In order to do so, the Child Welfare Act has different provisions such as the right to assistance for children and families with children in Section 4-1.

According to Section 4-12 litra c, a care order may be initiated if the child is mistreated or subjected to other serious abuses at home. This means that the child is taken away from his or her parents and the daily care is transferred to others on behalf of the Child Welfare Service. "If the county social welfare board has made a care order for a child, the county social welfare board may also decide that the parents shall be deprived of all parental responsibility”, cf. Section 4-20 of the Child Welfare Act. The consideration of the child’s best interest is an important principle and is statutory in Section 4-1 of the Act. It states that:

“When applying the provisions of this chapter, decisive importance shall be attached to framing measures which are in the child’s best interests. This includes attaching importance to giving the child stable and good contact with adults and continuity in the care provided.”

Right to access

A problematic issue is the right to access. As a principle, children and parents are entitled to have access to each other. This is founded in the Child Welfare Act Section 4-19.

The courts have been strongly criticized for giving the parents right to access without examining whether there are grounds for allegations of violence against the children. Part of the recent debate on the issue is exemplified in the book “Child custody in the court – when the child’s best interest becomes the child’s worst”, published in the autumn 2012.<sup>194</sup> The book suggests that the system fails to fulfil the principle of the child’s best interest when it comes to the right of access. It suggests that there is a need for both tightening and expanding the rules regarding the right to access.

The Ministry of Children, Equality and Social Inclusion is currently working on a proposition with the aim to strengthen the child's perspective and increase participation of the child.<sup>195</sup> The Ministry demands better evaluations of the child’s need for protection and the possible shielding from a parent. It is also pointed out that families should be monitored more closely than at present. The proposition is intended to make it easier to determine that the right to access should be denied altogether. This applies to cases where the child cannot be protected well enough through supervision, and in cases where the child currently has a strong aversion to contact with their parents.

Abuse committed within the close relations of the child may affect the sentence and impose a stricter penalty.<sup>196</sup> It may also lead to a claim for economic compensation pursuant to the provisions of Act of 13 June no.26 relating to compensation under certain circumstances.

3.1 Investigation

i. The principle of “the best interest of the child”<sup>197</sup> is a legal standard. The principle is mentioned in the Child Act, the Child Welfare Act and it is used as common practice in the public administration. The principle’s main focus is the child’s wellbeing. In practice, the principle is used to describe the minimum standard for a child’s interests and needs.

In a case of sexual abuse or violence, the child may have the right to free legal aid provided by the State, cf. Criminal Procedure Act Section 107a (1) litra a. A counsel for the victim is presumed to protect the child’s interests during the police investigation and ensure the best interests of the child during the process. The counsel is also supposed to assist the child in a civil suit for economic compensation. A police or state attorney will lead the criminal proceedings on behalf of the prosecutors.

The examinations of a witness under the age of 16 shall, in accordance with Regulations of 2 February 1998 no. 925 concerning judicial examination and observation (Regulations of Judicial Examination) Section 13, if possible, not occur more than once. New interviews can only occur if it is found necessary to the case, and if the interests of the witness or other substantial reasons do not give rise to the contrary. The provision’s main objective is to protect the child from being exposed to the stress of having to repeat what he or she has experienced.

When the age of the child or other circumstances so indicate, the judge may decide that before or instead of examination, the child shall be placed under observation in accordance with the Criminal Procedure Act Section 239 (3). The observation is regulated by the Regulation of Judicial Examination Chapter 2 and is based on the rules of procedure for the examinations cf. Section 15 (3). The legislative purpose is here to give the child an opportunity to communicate on its own terms and conditions through play and conversations. In contrast to examinations, observations should take place several times so that there is confidence between the observer and the child in accordance with the Regulation of Judicial Examination Section 17.

ii. Within the Norwegian legal force, the Government has created a special unit, Kripos.<sup>198</sup> This is the national unit for fighting organized and other severe crime and it is designed to function as a central agency for the local police departments. Kripos' main focus is assisting the local police with forensic work and connecting them to the international collaborations such as Interpol and Europol.<sup>199</sup>

Within Kripos there is a special group working on sexual exploitation of children, human trafficking and racism cases and a special group working on Internet related assault cases.

According to Norwegian customary law and other regulations, the police is authorized to carry out covert operations. Kripos collaborates with VGT (Virtual Global Taskforce) as part of several operations initiated by the VGT.<sup>200</sup> The aim is to build an "effective, international partnership of law enforcement agencies, non-governmental organisations and industry to help protect children from online child abuse".<sup>201</sup>

One of the measures the VGT carries out is a so called "honey-pot". The "Honey-Pot" is a website designed to deceive a perpetrator into thinking they are accessing a website containing documented child abuse, such as pictures and videos. The "honey-pots" are part of a covert operation and is designed to catch perpetrators in the act of accessing documented child abuse. When software that is able to analyse 15 minutes of film in just one minute without losing important details. The database is a so-called "Hash Set". This is a system that holds a set of objects, and that is easily and quickly able to determine whether an object is in the set or not. This is meant to assist the local police in efficiently going through material, and will spare the officers the strain and distress caused by witnessing sexually abusive material several times.

Because of the vast amount of child pornographic material distributed across borders, the international collaboration is essential for efficiently identifying a perpetrator enters a “honey-pot” their information is sent directly to the police.<sup>202</sup>

Kripos has developed a national database of material depicting sexual abuse of children. To build up the database more efficiently, Kripos has purchased the material. Kripos is hence working closely with Interpol when it comes to identifying unknown children. Interpol has a database with a large amount of sexually abusive pictures and video clips. The identification of the material and the abused children is organised by a special taskforce in Interpol.

iii. In accordance with the Criminal Procedure Act Section 224 (1), a criminal investigation shall be carried out when: “as a result of a report or other circumstances there are reasonable grounds to inquire any criminal matter requiring prosecution by the public authorities subsists”.

The police has, according to Section 224, an obligation to start a criminal investigation in two cases; with the purpose of solving an already conducted crime, and with the purpose of preventing one. The police does not, however, have an obligation to investigate every suspicion they might have. This is deduced from the wording “reasonable grounds”, which sets a certain limit for when an investigation will be “reasonable” to initiate.

An investigation shall be carried out, either as a result of a “report” or if there are “reasonable grounds” to inquire whether a criminal matter that requires prosecution exists. Therefore, it is not required that a crime is reported in order to be investigated. Nor is it a condition that there must be a suspect in the investigation.

The question whether an investigation should be initiated or not depends on several important factors. Among them is the probability that there exists a criminal offence or plans of conducting one, the seriousness of the case, and what authority is responsible for the investigation.<sup>203</sup>

The most practical restriction for the police is nevertheless their capacity. There are not enough resources in the police force to investigate every offence they become aware of. Therefore, the state attorney has developed general guidelines that indicate which cases are to be given priority.<sup>204</sup> According to the Prosecution Instruction the cases that are the most highly prioritized are violent crimes and serious sexual offenses.

There is no general rule of law that regulates the event of someone withdrawing their statement. Whether a victim's withdrawal should have effect on the investigation depends upon the remaining evidence and the circumstances of the case. Generally, the proceedings of the investigation will still go on, even if the victim's statement is withdrawn.

According to the Criminal Procedure Act Section 224, the issue must be of "criminal matter". As a matter of fact, this requires that the action is an offence in pursuant to the Penal Code. This also includes the act of planning to conduct a criminal offence.

There are, however, several exceptions from this rule. In conformity with Section 224 (2), the police is also obligated to conduct an investigation even though the person was between 12 and 15 years of age on the date the act was committed. A child below the age 15 cannot be punished, cf. the Penal Code Section 46, and therefore, this will not be a "criminal matter".

Another exception from the main rule is deduced from the Penal Code Sections 39 and 39a.<sup>205</sup> The exception is based on the assumption that an investigation will be conducted even though the person was criminally insane in the moment the act was committed. This is also expressly specified in the Prosecution Instruction Section 7-4.3.

iv. According to the Penal Code Section 68 (1), the period of limitation begins to run from the date the criminal activity has ceased. However, in the event of a contravention of Sections 195 or 196, the said period shall begin to run from the day on which aggrieved person reaches 18 years of age. The sections apply to sexual activity and sexual acts with a child under 14 and 16 years of age.

According to the Penal Code Section 67 (1), the period of limitation is determined by the maximum penalty in each penal provision. If a person has committed several crimes with different periods of limitation, the period that is the longest shall be the one that applies.

Sexual activity<sup>206</sup> with a child under the age of 14 will be punished with a 10, 15 or 21 year prison sentence, depending on the circumstances. In these cases, the period of limitation will be 10, 15 or 21 years respectively. Following the same pattern, sexual activity with a child under 16 years of age will have a period of limitation of respectively 10 and 15 years, cf. the Penal Code Section 67 (1). Moreover, Sexual acts<sup>207</sup> with a person under 16 years of age will have the period of limitation of 5 years. If the act was conducted under aggravating circumstances, the period of limitation will be 10 years. The crime of spreading pornographic pictures has a period of limitation of 5 years, cf. the Penal Code Section 67 (1).

The period of limitation is fixed and it is not possible to suspend it in any way. Finally, the Ministry of Justice claims that the periods of limitation are long enough to meet the justification of the Art. 33 in the Lanzarote Convention.<sup>208</sup>

v. All children born in Norway are registered in the national register, cf. Act of 16 January 1970 No. 1 relating to national registration (National Registration Act). The rule applies even if the mother of the child is not a Norwegian citizen.<sup>209</sup>

When children enter the country either through trafficking or immigration there are cases where the age of a victim is not certain. In these cases the Child Welfare Services will contact the local police to investigate. Often, the victims will have unofficial paperwork or no paperwork at all. The police is hence required, in collaboration with the Directorate of Immigration, to try and investigate the age of the victim. If they cannot find the age, practice shows that unofficial paperwork or statement of the child itself is often accepted if this is coherent with the appearance and behaviour of the victim.<sup>210</sup>

vi. Kripos deriving its authority from the National Police Directorate,<sup>211</sup> is responsible for recording and storing data of convicted offenders.<sup>212</sup>

Norway is party to the European Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters (1959) and the Schengen Agreement (1990). Kripos is therefore obligated to transmit relevant data to other competent authorities in other members states of these conventions.

In accordance with Act of 11 June 1971 no. 52 relating to Criminal Registration (Act relating to criminal registration) Section 8, all civil servants are bound to professional secrecy. Therefore, the authorities are obliged to respect the protection of personal data rules, and cannot release personal data to any authority or person without it being in conformity with the law.

3.2 Complaint Procedure

vii. In cases of sexual felonies or misdemeanours against a child under 16 years of age, the examination shall be conducted by a judge separate from the trial, if the judge finds it to be in the child's interest or for other particular reasons, cf. the Criminal Procedure Act Section 239 (1) and the Regulations on Judicial Examination Section 1. The judge must take into account the age and maturity of the child, compared to the character of the offence. When considering whether it is desirable to conduct the examination separate from the court, the judge must also take into consideration the interest of the accused/defendant and whether it is more desirable that the interview is conducted directly to the court.<sup>213</sup>

The case Rt. 1997 p.1288, shows that the judge conducting the judicial examination will be considered prejudiced when the interview is used as evidence in a criminal case, cf. the Criminal Procedure Act Section 243 cf. Section 239. Therefore, the very same judge cannot be part of the hearing. A fundamental principal in Norwegian criminal law is the right to a fair trial conducted by an independent and impartial tribunal.<sup>214</sup> In this case, the court reasoned that the judge would give a statement as to the credibility of the child, cf. the Regulations of Judicial Examination Section 7, and would therefore not be impartial.

According to the preparatory works of the Criminal Procedure Act, judicial examination can be executed without the presence of a relevantly well-qualified person if the judge has the necessary education and experience handling cases of sexual felonies or misdemeanours against children. Practice show that the judge usually summons a well-qualified person to assist during the examination.

The age of the witness at the time of the trial will determine whether the child has to make a statement in court. If the child on the day of the trial has turned 16, the child shall make a statement in court. It will be an exception however if the child invokes the principle of necessity.<sup>215</sup> Essentially, this means that if the statement in court will cause the child unnecessary strain and stress, the child can request not to testify in court.

If the judge decides that the child shall be placed under observation in accordance with the Criminal Procedure Act Section 239, an expert shall carry out the observation of the child. The expert will later have to be a witness during the trial. According to Regulations of Judicial Examination Section 16 (1), the expert should be a child psychologist or child psychiatrist.

According to the Criminal Procedure Act Section 239 (4), examinations or observations of the child shall be carried out within two weeks after a complaint has been reported to the police (see subsection II. 2. h. xxvi.). The aim is to make sure that the child is interviewed as soon as possible. The Ministry of Justice and the Police have accentuated that the above-mentioned timeframe is the deadline and that it is importance that each case is processed as soon as possible<sup>216</sup>. However, as mentioned in subsection II. 2. h. xxvi., this is not the case in practice.

Individual complaint and the formal requirements

There is no age limit as to when a person can make a complaint to the police of a criminal affair. If the child is mature enough to contact the police, it can. This applies both in the case of sexual exploitation of children and in Internet related assaults.

In accordance with the Criminal Procedure Act Section 224 (1), the police can only undertake an investigation when a complaint has been submitted or other circumstances give reasonable grounds for investigation, see subsection II. 3. i. iii. When the police receive information about sexual abuse, they may be obliged to follow up on independent grounds if there are reasonable grounds. A tip to the police does not however replace an actual report of an offence.<sup>217</sup>

viii. Representation of Children

In criminal cases where a child is involved, the child's parents will usually be appointed as legal guardians in accordance with the Act of 22 April 1927 no. 3 relating to legal guardianship (the Guardianship Act) Section 3 cf. the Child Act Chapter 5. It is presumed that the parent will act in the best interests of their child.

However, in a case where one or both of the parents are presumed or accused of not acting in the child's best interest, the act stipulates that a provisional guardian will be appointed cf. the Guardianship Act Section 15 (2). The Act's main objective is to protect the child's interests and prevent the parents from protecting each other over their child. It is sufficient that there is suspicion towards one of the parents; there is no requirement that a complaint has been submitted.

Participation of Minors in Trials

A child will not have to give a statement in court. The Regulations of Judicial Examinations' main objective is to protect the child from being exposed to the stress of having to face the alleged perpetrator and relive any traumatic abuses that previously occurred. This is coherent with the principle of the best interest of the child.

In accordance with the Courts of Justice Act Section 130a<sup>218</sup>, the court can also prohibit the entire court ruling, in consideration of the victim, from being released to the public. The basis of the evaluation will be how the disclosure of the courts proceedings and judgment will affect the child, and whether it is necessary in light of these interests to make the rulings anonymous.

In accordance with the Convention for the protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR) Art. 6 (1), the press and the public may be excluded from all parts of the trial and the judgement where the interests of juveniles so require. This also follows from the International Covenant on Civil and Political rights (ICCPR) Art. 14 (1). The fundamental principle is that any criminal case sentence shall be made public except where the interests of juvenile persons requires otherwise. Adherence to these provisions causes the depersonalization of the trial and judgments.

Norwegian judicial precedents show that the provisions in ECHR and ICCPR give a better protection and more extensive rights to depersonalization of court cases than the Regulations of Judicial Examination. Due to the Human Rights Act Section 3 these international conventions are incorporated into the Norwegian legislation, see the subsection II. 1. ii.

4 COMPLEMENTARY MEASURES

i. In 2007, the Norwegian Centre for Violence and Traumatic Stress (NKVTS)<sup>219</sup> conducted a survey in which future kindergarten teachers, middle school teachers and child welfare workers were questioned about their received education.<sup>220</sup> The results showed that there were deficiencies in the teaching of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, physical and sexual abuse of children and conversation techniques with children. Many students, especially those studying to become kindergarten and middle school teachers, did not feel qualified enough to deal with issues related to domestic violence and child abuse.

As a result, the Ministry of Children and Family Affairs released a report accentuating that:

“Lectures about physical and sexual abuse of children in basic higher education programs are limited. Knowledge about children's sexual development and abnormal sexual behaviours is vital in order to detect signs of abuse [...]. It is important to focus on these issues in specialization programs for relevant professional groups.”<sup>221</sup>

<sup>219</sup> The Ministry of Health and Care Services, the Ministry of Defence, the Ministry of Labour and Social Inclusion, the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of Children and Equality initiated the establishment of the Norwegian Centre for Violence and Traumatic Stress (NKVTS) and are also the main funders of its operations. The centre disseminates knowledge and competence in the field of violence and traumatic stress and its objective is to help, prevent and reduce the health-related and social consequences that can follow from exposure to violence and traumatic stress.

Ever since the release of this NKVTS survey, the Government has worked to strengthen these education programs and increase professionals', especially kindergarten and middle school teachers', knowledge on the subject in order to prevent child abuse. Nowadays, a variety of universities and university colleges offer courses and specialization programs to enhance knowledge about child abuse.

Furthermore, the Norwegian Directorate for Education and Training (Udir)<sup>222</sup> has published elaborate brochures for teachers on topics such as incest, recognizing signs of sexual abuse, talking and listening to children, cooperation with the Child Welfare Service etc. The brochures are meant to familiarize teachers with appropriate preventive, immediate and long-term measures.<sup>223</sup>

The Child Welfare Services must solve complex and demanding cases. The Government has therefore focused on strengthening this agency and in 2011/2012, the number of jobs and the employees' level of expertise increased.<sup>224</sup> Indeed, in Official Norwegian Report (NOU) no. 2009:8, an expert committee listed a number of recommendations for enhanced quality in education that qualifies graduates to work with child welfare.<sup>225</sup> The Ministry of Children, Equality and Social Inclusion cooperates with the Ministry of Education and Research to follow these recommendations. The importance of ensuring the supervision of new employees in the Child Welfare has also been a priority. In 2012, a specialization program that qualifies experienced employees in the Child Welfare to provide professional guidance to graduates and newly employed colleagues was established.<sup>226</sup>

ii. In 2009, Udir published a booklet for schoolteachers to use in their lessons about sexuality and gender.<sup>227</sup> Topics related to sexuality are part of the national curriculum for the 10-year compulsory school. The curriculum elaborates the preamble to the Norwegian Education Act, it sets overall goals for training and includes the cultural and intellectual foundation for primary and secondary education.

In kindergarten, the focus has been on "mastery programs", in which children learn to be conscious of their own bodies and to be respectful towards others.<sup>228</sup> The purpose is partly to teach children how to protect themselves against sexual abuse through empowerment-techniques. Information about the sexual abuse of children is also given to parents in the form of brochures provided by Udir. Supplementary information is available on several websites.<sup>229</sup>

The schools decide independently whether or not they wish to teach about incest and sexual and physical abuse.<sup>230</sup> The Ombudsman for Children argues that the children should all receive necessary information through compulsory classes.

In addition, the Government informs children through the media. In fact, web portals run by the Ministry of Children, Youth and Family Affairs and the Health Directorate provide information about sexual abuse. The Ombudsman for Children has even raised awareness about the topic through a video-sharing website.<sup>231</sup> Several videos have been released informing the general public about sexual abuse of children and other articles in the UN Convention of the Rights of the Child. Besides, a great deal of children's books has been published. For instance, the former Minister of Justice, Knut Storberget, is author of a book about how adults and children experience violence and abuse.<sup>232</sup>

Furthermore, the Government cooperates with a multitude of organizations. The Norwegian Children and Youth Organizations Council (LNU) has published, with support

iii. Experts have on several occasions pointed out the importance of preventive measures aimed at offenders and potential offenders. It has been emphasized that treatments should be created both for offenders who are motivated, seeking help on their own initiative, and for those who are convicted of sexual offenses against children.

In Oslo, the Institute for Clinical Sexology and Therapy (IKST) and Alternatives to Violence (ATV) offer treatments to anyone who fears they may commit a crime.<sup>235</sup> In Bergen, Trondheim and Kristiansand there are courses aimed at prisoners who already are convicted of sexual crimes.<sup>236</sup>

Treatment attempts in Bergen and Kuopio in Finland have shown that although it is difficult to document the effect of such programs, there is reason to believe that the offenders’ knowledge and experience obtained through treatments have a preventive effect on child abuse.<sup>237</sup>

Working preventively is a difficult task, regardless of the issue. In addition to the development of new strategies and initiatives that work, there is a pressing need to coordinate prevention efforts that are being implemented and to systematically evaluate the outcome and long-term effects of these measures.<sup>238</sup>

iv. Treatments facilitated by experienced practitioners take place at psychiatric polyclinics and treatment institutions, child welfare institutions, the Family Counselling, psychologists' and psychiatrists' private practices and sometimes at the Educational Psychological Service.

Some child victims of sexual and physical abuse are not sufficiently protected from new violations and/or do not receive adequate care and are thus placed in foster homes or child welfare institutions in pursuance to the Child Welfare Act Section 4-6. Children who are victims of sexual abuse or violence, or have witnessed such abuse in their families, can receive help and treatment in Governmental Child Houses, see subsection II.2.h.xxvi. Experts with extensive experience welcome children and converse with them, their parents and families. The Child House may recommend and establish contacts with other local services. Also, it can cooperate with the Child Welfare Services, schools, health care services and other support services, and it can accommodate more extensive or prolonged treatment when necessary.

v. In 2005, the Ministry of Children, Equality and Social Inclusion (BLD) decided the Incest Centre in the county of Vestfold would operate a national help line for incest and sexually abused children and adults.<sup>240</sup> The line is connected 24 hours a day, seven days a week and seeks to help individuals to increase their sense of security and self-respect. Furthermore, BLD established in 2009 another free emergency help line for children and adolescents exposed to various forms of violence, abuse or neglect.<sup>241</sup> It operates when the Child Welfare Services' offices are closed. Concerned adults can also call this help line.

Any person acting on behalf of a public body has a duty of confidentiality according to the Public Administration Act Section 13.<sup>242</sup> However, according to the Child Welfare Act Section 6-7, all public authorities have a duty to provide the Child Welfare Services data when there is reason to believe that a child is being abused at home, or if they are subject to other forms of serious neglect. The obligation involves a duty to provide information on their own initiative, and the obligation to provide information if the Child Welfare Services request it.

vi. There are many different forms of therapy to help children overcome their struggles caused by violence or sexual abuse inflicted upon them. These include individual, family and group therapy. Therapy techniques used are drawn from a wide range of psychological theories. Regardless of theoretical orientation, any remedial measures will depend on the circumstances of the abuse, the child's developmental history, the family situation and the social and cultural context.<sup>243</sup>

Most treatments will usually both explore the traumatic event (what happened and the child's understanding of this), the specific symptoms the child is struggling with, and how the event has affected the child's relationships with others. The programmes are aware of the possibility that the children could have sexual behaviour problems in the future. However, studies show that with the help and support from caring adults and good psychological interventions, many children who have been victims of violence or sexual abuse do well later in life.<sup>244</sup>

In the Health Personnel Act<sup>245</sup> Section 10 and in the Patient Rights Act<sup>246</sup> Section 3-2, patients have the right to receive information on their condition and the content and extent of the treatment they are receiving in order to properly participate in the medical discussions.

III NATIONAL POLICY REGARDING CHILDREN

i. The political discussion in Norway is based on topics that are of current interest. During televised debates or in newspapers, the topics of sexual abuse and exploitation of children are not regularly discussed. In recent years the dominating issues have been the rising numbers of children with minority backgrounds in the Child Welfare Services<sup>247</sup> and parent's visiting rights<sup>248</sup>.

This being said, there are cases concerning sexual violence against children that receive much attention in the media. Examples of such cases are the so-called "Christoffer-case", and the most recent and on-going "Øygard-case". In the latter, the Mayor of the municipality Vågå is prosecuted for having had sexual intercourse with a 16-year-old girl (13 at the time when the abusive actions first found place). The family of the girl claims that the Mayor was a close and trusted friend.<sup>249</sup>

These cases are just a few examples of issues that occupy the news media from time to time. The media in Norway are, naturally, in many cases leading the political agenda. The Ombudsman for Children in Norway and several NGOs, such as Save the Children, SMI<sup>250</sup>, DIXI<sup>251</sup>, play an active part in creating news coverage on topics that are related to children's mental and physical health. These NGOs cooperate with various media to boost the focus on these issues.

A blog in Aftenposten (a nationwide newspaper) "Si ;D", offers an opportunity for children and adolescents to write and discuss issues that are of importance to the younger generation. The participants in the debate can write about any topic and the politicians are often active in responding the blog posts.<sup>252</sup>

ii. Various NGOs are actively involved with fighting sexual abuse of children by informing the society and reducing people's notion that this is a taboo. NGOs and public agencies try to highlight these issues by creating campaigns on these matters.<sup>253</sup>

In recent years, one priority for Save the Children Norway has been to educate adults who work with children and adolescents, for instance in schools and kindergartens. Save the Children has worked towards a contingency plan that identify what the staff should do to detect and prevent violence and sexual abuse.<sup>254</sup> This is aligned with Art. 5 and 10 in the Lanzarote Convention dealing with recruitment, training and awareness rising of persons working in contact with children, and with national measures of coordination and collaboration.

An article based on statistics from Statistics Norway, documents a nationwide increase in the number of FTEs (Full Time Employment) in the Child Welfare. From 2010 to 2011 the amount of FTEs rose from 3525,8 to 4017, a rise in a total of 14 per cent. Much of this rise is due to earmarked funds allocated from the State.<sup>255</sup> In the state budget for 2011 the government earmarked 240 million NOK to the Child Welfare. The amount was for the major part allocated to help increase the number of staff members, but also to strengthen skill development among the staff.<sup>256</sup> In a Proposition 1 S (2012–2013) Yellow Book (Gul bok), a parliamentary decision on the state budget, it was suggested to earmark 205 million NOK to the municipal Child Welfare for 2013.<sup>257</sup>

The increase in the number of FTEs in the Child Welfare can be related to the rise in the number of children in the Child Welfare. The number in which children received assistance measures increased from 31.900 in 2000 to 46.500 in 2009, a total of 46 per cent.<sup>258</sup> The number has risen even more, to a total of 52.100 in 2011. Approximately 84 per cent of these were children who received assistance, while around 16 per cent received care measures.<sup>259</sup>

Cases of children with child protection who have been sexually abused and/or have been victim of incest in the period of 2007 to 2011 have increased according to numbers from Statistics Norway. The number of children in the age group 13 – 17, who have been subjected to sexual abuse/incest, has increased from 24 in 2007 to 51 in 2011. The numbers has increased from 18 to 41 in the age group 6 - 12 years, in the same time-period.<sup>260</sup>

These numbers indicate the effort and work the State and NGOs, in recent years, have put towards identifying and revealing individual situations. In order for the Government and the NGOs to raise the public awareness, these numbers are of vital importance. The outcome of such studies is useful when NGOs and the ministries, such as the Ministry of Children, Equality and Inclusion, are working on preparing propositions, which can later result in legislation.

iii. As seen right above, available statistics have shown an increase in the number of child victims. An article by Statistics Norway shows a thorough research conducted in the period 1980 to 2010. Parts of the article showcase the rise in the number of reports made about sexual abuse and violence against children. Since 2003 there have been reports of approximately 600 cases of child abuse annually in the age group 10 to 15 years. For children under the age of 10, there have, in average, been reported 80 instances of incest, and 160 instances of sexual contact annually.<sup>261</sup>

Amongst the crimes registered in 2009, 3 200 people were victims of sexual offences. 740 of these were reports of sexual contact with children under the age of 16. In addition, the reports contain around 1000 victims of rape or attempted rape, in which three out of four were in the age group 13-28 years old. Children are overrepresented in this category, most of which are under 16. 85 per cent of registered crimes to sexual crimes were females in 2009.<sup>262</sup> In 2010 this number rose to 87 per cent. The number of registered sexual crimes rose to 3 400.<sup>263</sup>

iv. Several campaigns are being made and promoted by NGOs and state organizations to highlight problems and difficult issues regarding children.

From 2008 until 2010, Save the Children ran a campaign called “Please Disturb” (“Vennligst forstyrr”). The aim of the campaign was to encourage adults to notify the police or other public authorities, in cases where they suspected that a child might be exposed to violence or abusive actions at home. According to Save the Children, following the campaign, the number of reports to the Child Welfare increased.<sup>264</sup>

During the spring of 2012, Save the Children organized the “Disturbance Weeks” (“Forstyringsuker”) for two weeks. The goal of the weeks (organised each year) is to focus on domestic violence, and promote the need for a healthy and safe upbringing. Rising awareness is also important during the Disturbance Weeks. Statistics suggest that approximately 8 per cent of Norwegian children are subject to violence from a parent.<sup>265</sup>

Dixi (Resource Centre for Victims of Rape and Sexual Abuse) is each year handing out the so-called Dixi Award. The award is given to persons or companies who work diligently to help victims of sexual abuse.<sup>266</sup>

In order to highlight the issue of incest, SMI (Support Centre for Victims of Incest) has created a commercial that currently runs on national television. The message at the end is translated to; “Children exposed to abuse are prematurely adult - if they do not get help”.<sup>267</sup>

v. The children's perspective in the law making process in Norway is represented by NGOs and state agencies that work to promote and maintain the rights of children living in Norway, e.g. Save the Children and the Ombudsman for Children. In many cases, the NGOs and state organs are cooperating with ministries of the Government. They are for example cooperating on the development of various reports, such as the Official Norwegian Reports (NOU) that seeks to provide the Parliament with knowledge before voting on a bill. The Government or the ministries appoint committees and working groups that investigate various matters in society. These committees and groups may consist of NGOs and state organisations whose primary goal is to ensure that the rights of children.<sup>268</sup>

NGOs and public organisations are lobbying with the objective of causing the authorities to make more assessments regarding issues that affect children. The Ombudsman for Children is a public institution and one of the main spokespersons for children and adolescents. Through various forums they provide children the opportunity to express themselves. Through the Youth Panel, the Ombudsman receives advices from adolescents writing about issues that are important to them. The Ombudsman is working closely with the decision makers on national and regional level, and can therefore provide them with important information so that decision makers can preserve the interest of children.<sup>269</sup> The Ombudsman is also stressing the importance of listening to children when important decisions about them are being made. The Youth Panel, and “Si ;D” – the Aftenposten blog, are central areas of which children can express their views. These are also platforms that politicians frequently use.<sup>270</sup> The duties of the Ombudsman for children are written in the Commissioner for Children Act of 6 March 1981 no. 5 relating to the commissioner for children Section 3.

In cooperation with Save the Children, the Parliamentary Network for Children’s Rights is arranging “Children’s Question Hour” in the Parliament. This gives children the opportunity to ask questions directly to the ministers about matters that concern them.<sup>271</sup>

vi. Save the Children is one of the main NGOs playing a role in protecting and maintaining children's rights in Norway. As mentioned about, they are actively involved in creating various campaigns. They also meet up for consultation in the parliament on topics regarding children, and cooperate with the government in the preparation of reports.<sup>272</sup>

SMI is another NGO working to better the conditions for children and adolescents who are victims of sexual violence. The purpose of SMI is to help and support victims of incest. SMI is also working towards the goal of preventing incest, by exposing the problem and opposing the conditions in the society that legitimise, build and maintain sexual abuse of children. SMI has a broad view on the definition of incest. They consider incest not only to be abuse committed by family members; it is enough that the persons engaging in incest are trustees to children.<sup>273</sup> SMI has offers directed towards men who are victims of incest. About 7 – 14 % of all men have been victim of sexual abuse by someone they know, according to statistics from SMI.<sup>274</sup> Finally, SMI offers an alarm phone for those who are victims of sexual abuse, see subsection II. 4. v. p.<sup>275</sup>

DIXI is a resource centre for victims of rape and sexual abuse. They provide information and help create conversation groups for victims and their families. The NGO engages in awareness rising work, and publishes information about rape and sexual abuse in schools and in local communities. They offer free legal aid to victims. Their offers are available to children, adolescents, adults, men and women.<sup>276</sup>

The law making process in Norway is time-consuming and often very complex. The Ministry of Children, Equality and Social Inclusion is in many cases sending bills out for comment/consultation. The Ministry will consider input from concerned parties (public and private institutions, NGOs, etc.) when they are working on a proposal. The government will invite NGOs, such as Save the Children, to write and answer consultation reports.<sup>277</sup> During the consultation process, inputs to research, statistics, etc. can be vital for the outcome of the report. The reason for “out for consultation” process is the desire to better evaluate the consequences of government measures. Such consultations may result in regulations thus giving NGOs the opportunity to engage in the law making process.

The legal issue of most relevance for the data provided in this paper is the status of the new Penal Code of 2005. Norwegian legislation is not, strictly speaking, in accordance with the Lanzarote Convention. This is because the Penal Code of 2005 has not entered into force. Norway will not ratify until national legislation is in conformity with the international obligations of the Convention. In other words, the most relevant issue for this report is the consequence of IT-complications. It is not confirmed when the police's computer system will be able to implement the new Penal Code.

Moreover, some argue that the real challenge Norway faces when it comes to protecting children from sexual violence is not the legislation, but rather the practice in the public administration and in the courts. This is another legal issue that might influence the status of children's rights.

From a theoretical standpoint, the legislation seems to grant children solid legal protection. This, however, tends to be true as long as the interest of the child is not in conflict with the interest of adults. In child welfare-cases and in criminal cases, children are considered much less credible than adults. It is difficult to realize and accept that a child has been sexually exploited by, for example, a parent. In many cases there is no evidence (most offenders do not record and distribute material that documents the abuse); resulting in a situation where the most credible statement prevails.<sup>278</sup> This illustrates the child's difficult situation in practice.

Another example of the disconformity between legislation and practice is the delay of judicial examination of victims in the Children's Houses, see subsection II. 2. h. xxvi. The project has received positive feedback, but the exceeding of the time limit regarding examination of child victims, by an average of 57 days, is a drawback.

A last Norwegian characteristic, from a European perspective, is the size and density of the population.<sup>279</sup> Norway has been criticised by the UN Child Committee for the fact that some municipalities are not offering services at the same level as elsewhere, see subsection I. 1. iii. A reason for this inequality may be the fact that some rural parts of the country have a very <sup>279</sup> As a matter of fact, Norway has the third lowest population density in Europe (15 persons pr. km<sup>2</sup>). Only Russia and Iceland have a lower population density. small population. This makes it difficult, due to human and financial resources, to offer the same services as in the bigger cities. It is therefore plausible that this factor may affect the administrative practice, for instance the Child Welfare Service, public health care and schools, i.e. the institutions that are supposed to ensure children's rights.

V CONCLUSION

This legal report has sought to investigate how the Norwegian legislation protects children from sexual violence. The provided questions have formed the framework of our investigation. As a result, some parts of this research might have deserved more attention than what the guidelines allowed. Due to the large amount of questions, the conclusion is not able to discuss all findings. Therefore, only the most critical points will be summarized here.

First, Norwegian legislation does emphasize human rights. The Human Rights Act has incorporated, inter alia, the UN Convention on the Right of the Child (CRC) into national law. A widespread view is that the legislation, as a whole, establishes an adequate legal protection for children.

Some, however, remain less satisfied. The United Nation Child Committee has pointed out several conditions that Norway should improve. Besides, the Government has not signed the third protocol of the CRC which grants children the right to complain about the State's compliance with the Convention. Finally, and most important to our research, is the fact that Norway has waited, at the time of research, five years to ratify the Lanzarote Convention.

The substantive criminal law section of the report is marked by the fact that Norway is in something of a transition period on this field. A new penal code was passed in 2005 by the Parliament, but has not yet entered into force due to technical challenges relating to the introduction of a comprehensive act into the police's computer system.

The Lanzarote Convention requires a few amendments of the current Penal Code of 1902. The clearest example of disconformity is the prohibition of attending pornographic performances involving children. The Penal Code of 1902 does not fulfil the Convention at this point, resulting in a new provision in the Code of 2005.

Furthermore, Norway's compliance with other requirements is more debatable. The report mentions the attribution of criminal liability relating to acts that involve child pornography.

The research found that it is uncertain whether the Norwegian legislation's terms "delivers to another person", "publishes" and "in any other way attempts to disseminate", comply with the Convention's term: "offering or making available". Also, it is unclear whether the term "systematically acquaints himself" equals the term "knowingly obtaining access", expressed in the Convention. In order to prevent uncertainties on such a sensitive field of law, the legislative body has amended ambiguous wordings of the 1902 Penal Code that relate to the Lanzarote Convention. The new provisions appear in the Penal Code of 2005.

For the reasons mentioned above, Norwegian legislation is not, at present, in absolute accordance with the Lanzarote Convention. The new Code of 2005 is assumed to meet all requirements of the Convention, implying that conformity will occur when ratified.

Moreover, it has been found that, with regard to some specific matters, the Norwegian legislation offers more protection than the Convention. One example is the fact that sexual depiction of a person who appears to be less than 18 years of age is, according to Norwegian law, classified as child pornography.

In addition, our research points out a conflict between national statutory law and the principle of innocence that Norway is internationally bound by. According to the Penal Code, criminal liability is objective when the child is under 14 years of age. This is nevertheless in conflict with the presumption of innocence found in the ECHR. The case was brought to the Supreme Court where the provision was disapplied. As a matter of fact, the effect of precedence causes the provision to be set aside also in future cases.

Further, it has been underlined that the presence of ideal concurrence is particularly present on this field. Criminal offences are typically committed by a person close to the child, meaning that the sentence will reflect the presence of several crimes, e. g. rape, intercourse with an under-age person and incest or abuse of a position of confidence.

Some factual circumstances, influencing this field of law, have been pointed out. First, sexual abuse of children is to some extent a taboo. Besides, some children might feel committed to the perpetrator and fear to harm its own and other people's future. These factors can cause reluctance to use the public services. Measures dealing with this issue are in place. A court can, for instance, decide to close the doors of the trial and the court ruling can be made unavailable to the public in order to serve the best interest of the child.

A second substantive consideration on this field, affecting the legislation, is the special needs of children. Children are exceptionally vulnerable and may therefore require flexible procedures. The Norwegian courts allow examination to take place on the child's terms by releasing him/her from the duty of testifying in court. The child is placed under observation of an expert, the Child Welfare Service will be involved and the Children's House will provide safe surroundings.

The report elaborates on the Children's Houses' important range of services. Experts from a variety of professional background can here merge their knowledge and preserve the best interest of the child. The purpose of this initiative was to create a coherent programme, placed in one institution, which supports the child throughout the different stages of a recovery. This way, the children avoid the stress related to changing conditions, for example new specialists, new contact persons and new institutions.

The report elaborates on the promotion and monitoring of children's rights by NGOs and state organs. These entities are important sources of information, they offer several services and they take active part in the public debate, for instance in the legislative process.

One such state organ is the Child Welfare Service. They can, if necessary, initiate deprivation of parental responsibility. Their main task is to detect and grant assistance when a child, or a family, is in need. Children have limited ability in pleading their own case. Adults should take on this responsibility, but sometimes their motivations, or opinion about the child's best interest, lead to results that in fact do more harm than good. The parental right to access may be one such example. Even though one is innocent until proven guilty, spending time with an accused father is not the most urgent need of a child. The controversy on this specific matter is demonstrated by the on-going discussions in Norway these days. The debate is about the requirements that must be met in denying parental visitation.

We have seen that the police play a fundamental role. The activity of Kripos is one of the State's main tools in the fight against exploitation of children. This special unit is part of an international network and has developed several computer programs that are crucial when investigating criminal cases. The expanding use of technology amongst children, reducing the parent's control, creates a pressing need for certain surveillance measures by the authorities.

The internet has been a rapidly growing arena for paedophiles in the last decade, creating a need for adaptability within the police. Kripos has tried to adapt to this new reality by, inter alia, developing a filter that gives Internet users a warning before entering an illegal web page. Moreover, the dangers relating to chatting have been considered by the legislative body. As a result, arranging a meeting with a child may be, depending on the purpose of the meeting, illegal even though no criminal act has been executed. These two examples manifest that crime prevention on this field strives to, and needs to, keep up with developments in society.

The report also discusses measures taken by the State towards the offenders. A convicted individual may be deprived the right to hold a certain position, and their sentence can contain conditions, for instance mandatory psychological therapy.

Furthermore, there is a trend that sexual offences are subject to longer sentences. This is prominent in the Penal Code of 2005. Also, the definitions of sexual offences have expanded in order to cover more situations. The described development reflects an evolving policy towards the crimes in question. Society has become more aware of the problem, affecting the general public opinion and causing politicians to move towards stricter penalties.

In the Norwegian Correctional Services (“Kriminalomsorgen”), there is a widespread conception that prison is a place for rehabilitation, rather than retributive punishment. One can argue that harder punishments will not make a difference. Sexual abuse of children is so stigmatized that higher prison sentences are not likely to have any further deterrent effect. However, the sentence may say something about how much we value our children and express a general attitude towards the crime.

Finally, the legislation on children’s rights is a result of conflicting interests. The best interest of the child must of course be strongly emphasized, but other factors should be considered too, e.g. the principle of innocence and the right to privacy. Children are, generally speaking, not able to preserve their rights; hence they need a system that takes their particularly fragile position into account. We have seen that the Norwegian legislation is adjusted to this vulnerability in many respects. The report finds grounds to argue that the level of legal protection of children against sexual violence is relatively well developed despite several issues mentioned above. This overall assessment should nonetheless be, as pointed out in Chapter IV, moderated by the fact that there is a difference between theory and practice.

I INTRODUCTION

1 GENERAL

i. Legal equity in Polish legal order has its origin in Constitution as one of the constitutional norms (article 32 of Constitution), and in such international agreements as United Nations Charter (article 55), European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (article 5) or the Treaty of European Union (article 2) and in each of the ratified by Poland agreements. Poland, as a Member State of the EU is obliged to implement the European directives, including the directive on equality, what the result of is the new act on equity that came into force on 1st January 2011<sup>1</sup>

The legal equity is one of the foundations of our democracy. Article 23 of the Constitution states, that everyone enjoys legal equity and should be treated equally by the public authorities.

The matter of equity, defined so clearly in the principles of constitution, comes, unfortunately, not always into the practice. For this purpose it is necessary to distinguish two terms: „equality in law” and „equal justice under law”. The equality in law appears in the level of creating law, but the equal justice under law means the equity while applying this law. In order to avoid the situation of discrimination under law, means unjustified and unequal treating the citizens during the process of applying this law, Polish authorities took steps to call, in the way of draft act, the Ombudsman for Combating Discrimination, but in June 2012 the attempts were blocked by the Legislator Commission<sup>2</sup>, which justified its opinion with argument, that creating this institution would be a breach of Constitution, because the range of activity of the Ombudsman for Combating Discrimination would collide with the range of competences of Ombudsman for Citizens' Rights.

The Ombudsman for Citizens' Rights is constitutional, independent organ of legal protection, which acts on the basis of Constitution of RP (article 212) and Act on Ombudsman for Citizens' Rights. His task is to uphold the human and citizens' rights, defined in the Constitution and other legal principles.

ii. Family is an important value of our society. The way and the efficiency of its protection have significant impact on the feeling of citizens' stability and trustiness to the state, its representatives and the law stated by them. The good law takes care on the family as autonomous, basic social unit.

There is a lack of legal definition of family in Polish legal order, but in the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court<sup>3</sup> we can find, that under the term of „family” in Polish legal order could be understood spouses, their children (their own, a spouse's children, children adopted for their upbringing in the substitute parents, the children under the special legal protection of the state). It is also not to be omitted that many families are not based on the marriage on the parents, but on the concubinage.

The legal protection of the family is guaranteed but the Constitution (article 18) which states, that: “[...],[...] marriage, as the matrimony of a woman and a man, family, maternity and the parentship is under the special protection of Republic of Poland”. This legal protection is moreover precised in the principles of special acts, inter alia in the Code of Family Law<sup>4</sup>, and in the documents of international law, like e.g. Convention on Children's Rights, and in the documents of international law, like e.g. Convention on Children's Rights<sup>5</sup>, which precises the attitude of a state to the matter of family and children's rights.

Every family, as well as their children, have right to state's assistance. Article 71 point 1 of the Constitution states, that the state in its social policy and economy should always take into account the good of family. „The families in difficult economic and social situation, especially the large and single – parent ones; have right to the special assistance of the public authorities”<sup>6</sup>

In addition, children are protected from any forms of violence (Constitution, article 72 paragraph 1).

„The Republic of Poland shall ensure the full protection of children's rights. Everyone can demand from the organs of public authority the protection of a child from violence, cruelty, abuse and demoralization”<sup>7</sup>

In Poland a serious danger for families is rising rate of unemployment<sup>8</sup>, which in August 2012 was about 10,1 %. The higher rate of unemployment contributed into the more and more often emigration in material purposes of the members of families (even the adolescent children)<sup>9</sup>, what puts the family relations into the danger of weakening. It leads to the phenomenon of single – parent family, where only one adult person is responsible for the entire house – keeping matters. If the relationship of parents does not survive the test of long – distance, what happens quite often, and the partners come into new relationships, it comes to the phenomenon of patchwork – family. Such a situation is extremely difficult for the children, who can have some difficulties in accepting their new family, what also requires the assistance of public authorities.

The term of family stays in close relation to the term of marriage, the socially accepted relation of woman and man.

Nowadays, people more and more seldom decide to get married,<sup>10</sup> what is considered as a departure from the rules of catholic tradition, which promotes the idea of marriage. The Catholicism is deeply inrooted in Polish tradition and has influence on the common feeling of duty and buiding a family in the sense of doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church. The tradion teaches the Poles to ive in accordance with their common – sense and the religion. The decreasing number of marriages shows, that we can observe in Poland the greater belief in one's strenght and departing from the religion. It appears at the same time, that in some cases not – getting married by partners places the family in more – favoured position, e.g. in case of getting a place for a child in a nursery or kindergarden. The legal aspects of the civil (or concordate) marriage are regulated in the Code of Family Law, which states, that the person who has not turned 18 cannot get marries, but the legislator introduces the exeptions from that principle. According to the current regulation, a person, who wants to get married before age of 18 has such a possibility in case of submitting the motion in Court for Family Matters. The Courts can permitt the woman before 16. To get married, if the circumstances taken into account while looking into the motion and accepted, would influence the good of a family in a positive way. One of the most common conditions is the woman's pregnancy if she decides to marry a man, who is the father of the baby.

Moreover, the woman getting married gets the full capacity to perform legal acts, which, in case of not getting married, she has to achieve, the age of 18.

In order to protect the good of a family, the legislator introduces into the Polish legal system the principle, which states the wife's pregnancy makes the husband unable to turn to a court with a motion of invalidating the marriage.

iii. In previous periods Poland didn't have the institution of Ombudsman for Children's Rights, but it does not mean that the state was unaware of children's rights. The representatives of our state took part in the discussions around the Convention on Children's Rights, which was adopted in 1989 during the UN General Assembly. The Convention was ratified by Poland in 1991. The first Ombudsman for Children's Rights was called in 2000 on the basis of Article 72 of the Constitution. Currently, the children's rights are protected on the basis of the Article 72, special acts of the Ombudsman for Children's Rights and international agreements, e.g. Convention on the Rights of a Child. Article 72 states, that „Republic of Poland provides full protection of the children's rights, protects them from violence and cruelty.

The Act on Ombudsman for Children's Rights defines the role of Ombudsman for Children's Rights. The Ombudsman must „uphold the children's rights, act for protection of children's rights in respect of rights and duties of parents” (article 1)<sup>11</sup>

Every child has some special rights. They are, for instance, right for social protection and right for the proper standard of living. The law guarantees every child safe development till it becomes an adult person and is free and conscientious enough to take decisions and responsibility for them. Good law supports parents in preparing children for getting duties and coming into adult life.

Obviously, the best care taker for every child is its parents. Unfortunately, it happens that the parents are absent or denied parents' rights. In order to provide child the proper care, the legislator decided to give the possibility of appointing carer. According to the Article 154 of Code of Family Law the carer has a child in his care and serves him the needed help. The carer can be appointed by one of the child's parents (if not denied parent's rights), it can be one of the child's relatives or a person dear to a child. In case of lack of such a person, the court asks the unit of social care system which takes care on juveniles.

Children are endangered on being abused by adults. There are many cases, when the children were forced to begging. The Ombudsman for Children's Rights, having in mind such cases, condemned these delinquencies, recalling article 32 of the Convention on the Rights of a Child, which obliges Poland to „to protect the youngest from, inter alia, economic abuse or doing a work, which could be dangerous or collides with education.<sup>12</sup>

iv. Talking about Polish obligations coming from being a member of various international organizations, which deal with human rights and children rights, we can discuss sever legal documents, that are especially important.

At the very beginning we should talk about Declaration of Children Rights, adopted on 20th November 1959 by General Assembly UN. It was not the first binding document for the member states of UN, but was some kind of kick – off for the further for activity of UNICEF and set the direction for Convention on Children Rights, adopted by General Assembly UN in the 30th anniversary of amendment of the Declaration on 20th November 1989, which this time was document binding its parties. The Convention was ratified after permission expressed Sejm in 27th September 1990, President of Republic of Poland on 7th July 1991, becoming the part of national legal order. The Convention is considered as one of the most important achievements in the area of protection of children rights, because the proposition of amendment of this document and its project was submitted to Commission for Human Rights Protection by Poland in 1978. The text of Convention included the greatest catalogue of children rights and has been accepted by 192 countries in the world. Becoming a party of the Convention, Poland made some reservations concerning general matters related to the right of a child to know his genetic origin, expressing its own will, protection from abuse and political freedom. Despite these reservations, the text of the Convention became a part of legal system, binding citizens and legislative power.

In relation with the change of system and necessity of introducing into legal system many changes in Polish legal system and adjusting of current legal order to the requirements of democratic state of law, the Convention became a tip for the legislator, and its statements influenced modification of many legal acts. The report on execution of the Convention submitted by Poland in 1993 to Committee for Children Rights Protection UN was criticized. The words of critics were expressed in the Report of Committee adopted in 209th meeting on 27th January 1995.

Although not every recommendations of the Committee have been taken into account by the legislator, basing on these suggestions, it introduced the article 40, 48 and 72 of the Constitution of Republic of Poland, make novelization of the act from 7th January 1993 on planning family, protection of human fetus and conditions of possibility of terminating of pregnancy and the act from 25th February 1964 – Family Code. On the 6th June 1997 the new Penal Code came into force, which contained the chapter regulating crimes against family and custody as well as sexual crimes.

v. The European law regulates the matter of children rights and their protection in a very detailed way in many legal documents. To the most important ones belong: European Convention on Human Rights, European Strategy for Children, published by Council of Europe in 1995, European Convention on application of children rights from 1996, Draft Decision of Council 2004/68/WSiSW from 22nd December 2003 on combating sexual abuse of children and children pornography, replacing the mentioned before decision of the Council. The Directive obliged every the MS to implement it into their national legal system till 18th December 2013, creating the need for introducing some changes in some legal acts in Poland. The state of legislative works today is, unfortunately, not the best result. In August this year, the Ministry of Justice as answer to motion on giving information of the object of implementation of the Directive, said that „due to constant evolution of obligations coming from the European law in the area of combating sexual abuse of children (except from directives 2011/93/UE and Lanzarote Convention), and having in mind the need for avoiding too often changes in codification, the project of novelization, that enable full coordination of Polish rules with the duties coming from international instruments will be ready in 2012”. It has been also pointed out, that the partial transposition of the directive is project of novelization of Polish Penal Code, which is being prepared by Commission for Codification of Penal Code and is the object of public consultations. The proposed changes, as the Ministry informs, are to „improve the protection of children, which are victims of sexual crimes and human trafficking. (Project of the article 185a and 185b of the Code of Criminal Procedure.)”. In relation to this information it is worth underlining, that the date of beginning of works on implementation of the directive is doubtful. The start of works in the last one fourth of 2012 (and it is relevant, as it was mentioned before, that the information was passed in the middle of August 2012) lets to suppose that to keep the date (and it is necessary to take into account long time of vacatio legis, required in this kind of cases), the projects of novelization will be created quickly, the consequence of which will be lack of public consultations. It can appear, that the changes will not cover the real needs and they will not be efficient protection from sexual abuse of the youngest citizens.

Coming back to the Directive, we should mention about undoubtedly the controversial article 25, which obliges Member State to monitor websites in order to control information published on them and blocking the ones, which contain pornographic or pedophilic materials. The duty of each legislative body of Member State is introducing changes in the already existing legal documents (in Poland the right act in this area is, inter alia, act Law of Telecommunication). Implementation of the article to the national legal system is difficult, because it requires from the operator knowledge about the information supplied by users, and law does not allow to do so, because such behavior of operator would breach rights protecting personal data and could result with breach of law of other subject in case of blocking also other, legal, materials. Poland belongs to a group of states, which do not have institution controlling information publishes in internet, because creating such a body requires the necessity of spending much money, what the state cannot at the moment afford.

The subject of the last point of the matter is the Convention on protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms that came into force 3rd September 1953. Its task was to guarantee practical obeying of rights included in General Declaration of Human Rights from 1948. On the basis of it was established European Court of Human Rights, which deals with claims on violations of principles of European Convention on Human Rights. Coming into force of this Convention is very important, because it allows citizens of MS to claim all the actions of organs of national administration violating human rights. The Convention is not a remnant of the past, thank to unique institution of additional protocols, which complete it efficiently, it does not contain expired rules, but introduces relevant changes e.g. total prohibition of capital punishment, which is probably the issue that protects the most value – human life. The most significant consequence of accepting Convention is guarantee of possibility of protection of the rights covered by the Convention and its Protocols, what is an additional control of organs of public administration and completes the available in every Member State list of legal instruments – tools of reaction to violation of law.

2 THE LANZAROTE CONVENTION

i. Poland has signed The European Convention of Human Rights on the 26th of November 1991, on the same date that has joined The Council of Europe. The Convention was ratified on the 19th January 1993 and on the same day it has come into force. Since 10th October is a site of protocols number 1 and 4 to The Convention, since 1st November 2000 of protocol number 6, since 1st March 2003 of protocol number 7. Protocol number 12, treating about discrimination was not signed by Poland yet, although protocol number 13 was signed on 3rd of May 2002 but wasn't ratified yet. Moreover, Poland has ratified and signed all protocols to The Convention, treating about procedural issues.<sup>13</sup>

ii. Poland has signed The Lanzarote Convention on the 25th October 2007 and is preparing to ratify it<sup>14</sup>. Poland has not introduced any amendments to The Convention.

iii. Poland is planning to ratify the Convention, however to do so it has to introduce a lot of amendments to the national legislation. Currently is preparing to ratification by introducing changes to the Penal Code.

Convention has been signed for each child to have equal means of defense, to prevent and fight against using and wicked behaviors towards children in sexual means. The Convention indicates requirements, which have to be fulfilled by the countries which have signed the Convention, to provide adequate protection towards kids. Immediately after signing the Convention Poland has started proceedings in the field of adjusting Polish law to requirements of The Convention.

The first change occurred in 2008, it has given people who were victims of sexual act in their childhoods, after becoming adults, the possibility to disclose information about a crime committed, which would launch criminal proceedings. A victim will be able to warn about the crime within 5 years from the day of his 18th birthday. However the question remains, whether 5 years is a long enough period of time. There were voices for extending this period to 10 years or to decline the possibility of crime expiration, according to article 200 of Penal Code. The arguments standing for such regulation were that in majority of cases, using kids in sexual way is caused in their familiar environment and after reaching complete independence, victims are able to deal with their past. But such kind of independence is usually a fact after graduating or giving birth to a child, which can take place later than in the age of 23.<sup>15</sup> However, finally the decision taken is that 5 years is period of time long enough. The change was regulated in a legal act from 24th October 2008, which is the way in which Penal Code has partially adapted to requirements article 33 of the Convention. Article 101 §4 has been addend.

In the draft of regulation, introducing amendments to Penal Code, which at the moment is being proceeded to the adoption by parliament; this article is going to be supplemented by the new type of crime which is grooming, introduced to Polish Penal Code later. Moreover, on the 26th of July as taken place the first reading of the act. The act is going to include the crime of grooming (article 197 of Penal Code) to catalogue of crimes which are not considered as expiring. Draft of a new law was proceeding to Extraordinary Committee, responsible for changes in codifications.<sup>16</sup>

In the same regulation, changing Penal Code from 2008 the term „pornography” has been changed as well in additional article 202 § 4b, after this amendment shall it also include electronically generated, realistic visions of people (including minors) in situations involving pornography.<sup>17</sup>

On the 8th of June 2012 another amendment of Penal Code has been introduced, adapting it to the requirements of The Lanzarote Convention. Grooming has been penalized as follows in article 200a.

Thanks to this change, Polish Penal Code is now consistent with article 23 of The Convention, treating about children solicitation and seduction for sexual aims, via information and communication technologies. This article obliges the parties to undertake any means necessary to punish intentional propositions towards children provided via information and communication technologies and propositions of meetings or undertaking any other activities leading to sexual abuse or committing rime of children prostitution. Poland, after introducing this amendment, punishes aforementioned behaviors whereas before those amendments police could have undertaken actions only when it came to sexual harassment. Act amending Penal Code has also added article 202b.

It leads to situation that all statements which were placed for example in the media, which were about to indicate that pedophilia is positive phenomenon became illegal, and their authors might be lead to legal responsibility.<sup>18</sup> Authors of introducing this article claim that there is no such a thing as positive pedophilia. And there is no way of positive way of hurting anybody.<sup>19</sup> They claim that promoting “positive pedophilia” is closely related to grooming, which is in Poland, since this amendment, a regular crime.

What is more, article 197 §3 of Penal Code, treating about rape on minors below 15 years, has been changed and became qualified as a crime and perpetrator who commits such act will be punished by imprisonment, for not less than 3 years. However protection of harmed child hasn't been improved, because before addition of 3 § to this article, the crime of rape has been punished ex officio, according to article 200. Whereas now to commence prosecution, there should be a notification. Moreover, a victim who is a minor below 15 years has no entitlement to apply for prosecution (only can notify about the event to the guardianship court, which doesn't seem like an adequate protection) and is dependent on his guardians will. Most often because of fear for re-victimisation, victims decide not to give any notice to anybody, so a crime remains unpunished.<sup>20</sup>

Also the aim of this change was responsibility exacerbation for perpetrators of sexual crimes. Because were added in article 95a §1a.

This § introduces even better protection against those who committed rape on minors below 15 years because if perpetrator was sentenced to imprisonment without its temporary suspension than a court can settle perpetrator in custodial institution or refer such person to a forced outpatient treatment, which is pharmacologically connected with psychotherapy, which mainly leads to reduction of sexual desires but other diseases can also be treated, psychiatric or psychological as well, not excluding possibility to recognize the meaning of an act. Court decides whether there is necessity to imprison perpetrator or to refer him to outpatient treatment within half a year before parole or accomplishing the sentence.

According to crimes relating to prostitution, Polish Penal Code punishes even more crimes than The Convention requires.

Despite, The Convention requires punishing just forcing kids to prostitution, in Poland also persuading kids to prostitution is being punished as strictly as forcing them.

Before ratification, national law ought to be in full compliance with the requirements of The Convention. On the 5th of July 2012 Minister of Justice informed that the appraisal has been conducted as to ensure compliance with The Convention and which implies that the only obstacle that stands in the way to ratification is age of the minor who takes part in the process of capturing or producing pornographic contents. Currently article 202 §4 and §4a statute that the responsibility has to be taken by perpetrator who has committed this delinquency, relating to people under 15 years, although The Convention mentions the age of at least 16 years.<sup>21</sup> Poland should have increased this border on 23rd of November 2001, when The Convention of Crime in Cyberspace was ratified. Convention has entered into force on the 1st of July 2007 but still wasn't ratified because suggested age, in which children can be used in pornography, is 16 years. Introducing this change to Penal Code, relating to increasing age is not so easy because if the border was increased from 15 to 16 years it would appear that production of porn with participation of minors for own use, though its lower social harm, would be punished more severely than porn production in order to spreading it.

The Minister said that after signing The Convention by Poland, legislation works have caused that Polish law is compatible with the Convention in its major parts and some minor edits prevent from ratification. He also assured that in 2012 the project of changing legislation will be prepared, whereby Poland will be ready to ratify The Convention.<sup>22</sup>

Apart from changes relating to age border, before ratification Polish Penal Code has to be prepared in the prosecution of crimes committed against children. Already in 20120 the project of a law changing Penal Code has been prepared, in which Polish law adapts to The Convention requirements, however this law has not been forced into life yet.

According to this project would be a change in crimes prosecution mode, relating to illegal sexual intercourses or submission to any other sexual act or performing such acts.

According to a different project, which has currently been directed to the Special Commission to Codification Changes, assumes a complete repeal of an article 205 Both propositions of amendments would cause that all sexual crimes, committed on minors harm would be prosecuted ex officio and Polish Penal Code would be compatible with article 32 of The Convention, which requires all crimes committed, causing minors harm to be prosecuted ex officio.<sup>23</sup> In contrast to currently entitled law, which statutes that prosecuting those crimes occur at the request of a victim.

Afterwards a project from 2010 assumed changes connected with children pornography. Amendments should be dividing article 202 § 3 into parts and changing a border of punishment. However it has to be taken under consideration whether dividing this § makes any sense because that would lead to very little change according to current law which would mean just specifying punishments for those crimes, enumerated article 202 § 3. Polish Penal Code had to be free of casuistry, and this change finally leads to fragmentation of Penal Code

To sum up, Polish national law is on its track to comply with the requirements of The Convention, as though it could be ratified. It is visible that Polish legislator tries to fulfill all requirements as quickly as it is possible. The only disturbing fact is that people who are dealing with legislation relating to The Convention in The Sejm are not willing to share information about the state of striving to ratification. While preparing this report, despite numerous attempts to receive such information, they were not given.

iv. After ratifying The Convention it will be considered as Ratified International Agreement, after earlier agreement, mentioned in the statute. In case of conflict of laws expressed in the Convention and the laws, laws from The Convention will be prior to the other ones.

1 GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE JURISDICTION

Poland, like many other countries in the East-Central Europe, went through transformation in 1989. Not only its' political system changed from communist to democratic, but along with it - the whole legal order.

I. Human rights in the Polish legal order

Legal act of the highest importance is the Constitution of the Republic of Poland of 2nd April, 1997. The Constitution contains laws on separation of powers, leading and central organs of the State and both people's and citizens' rights. In its Chapter II entitled "the freedoms, rights and obligations of persons and citizens" there is a division on personal, political and economic, social and cultural freedoms and rights.

- Primary personal rights and freedoms: life protection, ban on tortures, personal inviolability, the presumption of innocence, right to trial, privacy protection, freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of speech.
- Primary political rights and freedoms: freedom of gathering and association, passive and active electoral rights.
- Primary economic, social and cultural rights: right of ownership, the right to free choice of employment and the place of employment, the right to health care and social protection.

Article 72 talks about children's rights: "The Republic of Poland shall ensure protection of the rights of the child. Everyone shall have the right to demand of organs of public authority that they defend children against violence, cruelty, exploitation and actions which undermine their moral sense. A child deprived of parental care shall have the right to care and assistance provided by public authorities. Organs of public authority and persons responsible for children, in the course of establishing the rights of a child, shall consider and, insofar as possible, give priority to the views of the child".

The laws are developed through statutory law, such as the Family and Guardianship Code (it contains regulations on child's identity, parents' discretion, adoption, the parents' maintenance (to fulfil child's needs) duties, Polish Civil Code (C.C.) (capacity to make acts in the law), Act on Counteracting Domestic Violence (Article 12 allowing to take child away from family that causes harm on the child), the Commissioner for Citizens' Rights Act

II. People's and citizens' rights protection

a) National judiciary

Infringement of human rights is subject to national courts: district, regional, courts of appeals and the Supreme Court. Administrative courts: regional and the Supreme Administrative Court have their own structure. Jurisdiction in Poland is in two instances. Not legally binding rulings can be appealed using ordinary appellate measures: appellation (against judgements) and complaint (against resolutions). Legally binding rulings can be appealed using extraordinary measures: cassation to the Supreme Court, petition for instituting a trial de novo, complaint to invalidate the ruling).

If a Party is convinced that his/her rights, contained in the European Convention on Human Rights, were infringed, the Party can make a complaint to the European Court of Human Rights. To make this possible, a Party has to exploit national appellate measures and to make a complaint on time – the deadline expires in 6 months since the final ruling was held.

b) Constitutional Tribunal

The Constitution of 2nd April 1997 lists four areas of its interest. The most important one is making control of legal norms. The control means ruling whether a minor legal acts (legal norms) are in accordance with major legal acts (legal norms) or not and eliminating the former from the legal system if they are contradictory to the latter. There is an a posteriori (consequent) control (of legal acts that has been already passed, are in force or in the vacatio legis period – between the proclamation of the act and its coming into force) and a priori (preceding) control (it can be initiated only by the President of the Republic of Poland). A priori control can refer only to Acts of Parliament and international agreements enacted and presented to the President.

Article 188 of the Constitution establishes Constitutional Tribunal's control over three types of legal acts: Acts of Parliament, international agreements and legal acts enacted by central organs of the State.

Many subjects can initiate consequent control. There is an abstract and concrete control. The Constitutional Tribunal cannot make a ruling on its own initiative (ex officio).

Abstract control divides into common initiative and particular initiative.

Common (general) initiative is a right to challenge any legal act's accordance with Constitution. The act does not have to be linked with petitioner's activity. Common initiative can be used by leading organs mentioned in the Constitution (Article 191 s. 1 point 1).

Particular initiative means right to challenge only legal acts or norms connected with petitioner's activity. A motion is heard by one of the Constitutional Tribunal's judges. If a motion is unacceptable or surely groundless, the judge defeats the motion. Petitioner can lodge a complaint against the decision (the Constitutional Tribunal Act Article 36), which is examined by three judges of the Tribunal.

A petitioner can withdraw his/her motion. If a motion is withdrawn before the beginning of a trial, the Tribunal is bound by petitioner's will. Withdrawing a motion after the trial has begun is not binding for the Tribunal and the Tribunal can continue. Tribunal is bound by the scope of a motion (CTA Article 66).

Concrete control concerns so called legal questions. Such a question can be asked by any court, if settling a case in this court depends on legal act's accordance or incompatibility with the Constitution (Constitution of the Republic of Poland Article 190 s. 1). Tribunal's ruling is binding for all addressees (erga omnes) and cannot be appealed.

The result of a control of the legal norms is presented in the form of a ruling and is immediately published in the organ of the State in which the legal act was enacted (Constitution Article 190 s. 2).

In the Polish legal system legal act (norm) not in accordance with the Constitution, international agreement or Act of Parliament is not invalid ex tunc, but defective (revocable). Therefore it is necessary to designate the date when the act will be invalid. Normally it happens when the Tribunal's ruling is published in the official journal, but the Tribunal can designate the other date (Constitution Article 190 s. 3).

In Poland, there is no idea of legal norms' invalidity. Acts and rulings based on invalid act (norm) are not automatically invalid. Any petitioner (and, sometimes, prosecutor), can demand another hearing of final and binding case. Article 190 s 4 of the Constitution introduces a principle that Tribunal's ruling on incompatibility with the Constitution, international agreements or legal act (regulation) enacted on the ground of an Act of Parliament can lead to instituting a trial de novo, overruling of a decision or other resolution, in accordance with rules and procedure specified in proper regulations.

Another form of checking whether legal acts are in accordance with the Constitution is constitutional complaint. Article 79 of the Constitution allows “anybody” to file a complaint, if only his/her “constitutional freedoms or rights” were infringed. Thus a right to complaint have all persons that can be subject to constitutional freedoms or rights. It is obvious that a right to complaint have natural persons, both citizens and foreigners. The Tribunal’s judicature states that the right have also artificial persons, but only within the scope of their freedoms and rights.

To make the constitutional complaint possible to be filed:

- 1) infringement of complainant's rights must have occurred as a result of a court's or public administrative organ’s ruling, in complainant's individual case;
- 2) the ruling must be final and binding (Article 79 s. 1 of the Constitution), the complainant must not have any legal measures allowing to start a proceeding;
- 3) the only matter of a complaint can be legal act's incompatibility with the Constitution, which infringed complainant's rights or freedoms;
- 4) it is possible to file a complaint within three months since the final and binding ruling, decision or any other definitive resolution was delivered to the complainant (CTA Article 46). This period cannot be extended. The complaint must be drawn up by advocate or legal advisor.

c) Commissioner (Ombudsman) for Citizens’ Rights

Commissioner for Citizens' Rights is the organ guarding adherence to regulations on human rights. His/her main tasks are monitoring of infringements of human rights and intervening if the Commissioner finds out that human rights are infringed. Article 80 of the Constitution states: “In accordance with principles specified by statute, everyone shall have the right to apply to the Commissioner for Citizens' Rights for assistance in protection of his freedoms or rights infringed by organs of public authority”. The Commissioner acts from his/her initiative or on a motion filed by citizens, their organisation, local government or Children’s Commissioner. The Commissioner for Citizens' Rights can take up the case described in a motion, advise the initiator as to his/her future actions, hand over the case or decide not to take up the case. If the Commissioner takes up the case, he/she can conduct clarifying proceeding, ask relevant organs, in particular supervisory bodies, prosecutor's office, organs of state, professional or social control for examining the case or part of the case or can request the Parliament to give the Supreme Chamber of Control commission to examine the case or part of the case. After the Commissioner examines the case the Commissioner can:

- explain petitioner that the Commissioner did not confirm infringement of people's and citizens' freedoms and rights;
- address speech to organ, organisation or institution, in which activities the Commissioner found infringement of people's and citizens' freedoms and rights;
- file for the superior organ a motion for using measures permitted by law;
- demand initiation of proceedings in civil cases and take part in any trial in progress in the same way as prosecutor does;
- demand from entitled prosecutor initiation of preparatory proceedings, if a crime is publicly prosecuted;
- demand initiation of administrative proceedings, complain to administrative court and take part in proceedings like prosecutor;
- file a motion for punishment and for revoking final and binding decision in the case of an offence;
- file cassation to the Supreme Court or lodge an extraordinary appeal against the final and binding ruling.

Each year the Commissioner informs both Chambers of the Parliament about his/her actions and the standard of adherence to regulations on human and citizens' freedoms and rights.

You can file a motion to the Commissioner on the website. You can also make an appointment with the lawyers working in the Commissioner's Office or call Commissioner's info line. This way you can receive legal advice or gain information about your rights.

d) Children's Commissioner (Ombudsman)

Children's Commissioner is a special organ appointed to protect children's rights. The Commissioner's activities are to guarantee a child a full and harmonious development, with respect to its dignity and subjectivity. The Commissioner supports children's rights' protection, in particular the right to life and health protection, right to grow in a family, right to fair social conditions, right to education. The Commissioner protects children against violence, cruelty, exploitation, moral corruption, neglect and any other rough treatment bearing in mind especially disabled children. The Commissioner promotes children's rights and ways of its protection as well. The Commissioner acts on his/her own initiative, taking into account in particular information from citizens or their organisations, indicating infringement of children's rights or violation of the children's good. The Commissioner can:

- examine the incident in the place where it occurred;
- demand explanation or information from the state authorities, organisations or institutions, or make the records and documents available to the Commissioner;
- take part in proceedings before the Constitutional Tribunal initiated by the Commissioner for Citizens' Rights' or in the case of a constitutional complaint concerning children's rights;
- file a motion to the Supreme Court for settling a conflict about differences in interpretation of regulations on children's rights;
- file a cassation or lodge an extraordinary appeal against the final and binding ruling;
- demand initiation of civil proceedings and take part in proceedings in the same way as prosecutor does;
- take part in proceedings before a juvenile court like prosecutor;
- demand from entitled prosecutor initiation of preparatory proceedings in the case of crimes;
- demand initiation of administrative proceedings, complain to administrative court and take part in proceedings like prosecutor;
- file a motion for punishment in the case of an offence;
- commission to conduct research and compile opinions and analysis.

The Commissioner can also ask relevant organs, organisations or institutions for taking actions, within the scope of their competence, in the children's interest. When the Commissioner finds out infringement of child's rights or violation of its good, he/she can demand initiation of a disciplinary proceedings or disciplinary actions. The Commissioner presents to the relevant public authorities, organisations and institutions assessments and conclusions to aim at effective protection of rights and good of the child and to facilitate the procedure, due to which the cases are solved. The Commissioner can ask holders of the right of legislative initiative to propose a law to the parliament, to pronounce or change other legal acts.

Due to the article 12 of the Children's Commissioner Act: "Each year, but not later than March 31st the Commissioner informs Sejm and Senate<sup>24</sup> about his/her activity and comments on the state of adherence to regulations on children's rights. The Commissioner's information is given to the public". Motions to the Commissioner can be filed by yourself or through website, e-mail or info line.

III. Criminal responsibility

a) Regulations of the Penal Code

At the beginning it is advised to understand few terms necessary for analysing the Penal Code:

- criminal responsibility – responsible is only a person who commits a forbidden act under the risk of punishment by an Act of Parliament in force when the act was committed;
- forbidden act – act that is forbidden by an Act of Parliament (not only by Penal Code, but by other Acts as well);
- crime – in can be a grievous crime or misdeed; Not every forbidden act is a crime. If its social harmfulness is irrelevant, the act is not a crime. If a perpetrator cannot be assigned guilt whilst committing the act, there is also no crime;
- grievous crime – forbidden act punishable by 3 years imprisonment or more;
- misdeed – forbidden act punishable by a fine exceeding 30 daily rates, restricting freedom or more than 1 month imprisonment;
- offence – act forbidden by an Act of Parliament in force when the act was committed, punishable by arrest, restricting freedom, fine up to 5,000 PLN<sup>25</sup> or reprimand. There is no offence if there is no guilt;
- guilt – perpetrator's psychological attitude towards an act. There is no guilt if a perpetrator is a minor, mentally and emotionally immature, is insane or acted under misapprehension;

- intentional guilt – direct intention means a perpetrator wants to commit unlawful act, indirect intention denotes a perpetrator, conscious of possibility of committing unlawful act, agrees to this;
- unintentional guilt – no intention to commit unlawful act. Perpetrator, however, commits the act due to lack of carelessness required, although possibility of committing unlawful act he predicted (recklessness) or could have predicted (negligence).

The age of criminal responsibility in Poland is 17. In some cases a perpetrator can be liable if is 15, circumstances of the case, perpetrator's psychological maturity, characteristics and conditions opt for it or, particularly, when previously used educational measures or detention appeared to be ineffective. However, the penalty shall not exceed two thirds of the maximum punishment for the perpetrator's crime; the court can also commute punishment (sentence a punishment below the lowest limit predicted in the Act of Parliament for a punishment for a certain crime, e.g. 1 year imprisonment instead of 3 years or punish with a lighter kind of punishment, e.g. fine instead of imprisonment). Moreover, if a perpetrator committed a misdeed when he was 17, but not turned 18, the court instead of a punishment applies educational measures, health services or detention suitable for minors, if circumstances of the case and perpetrator's maturity, characteristics and conditions opt for it.

b) Regulations of the Children (Criminal Proceedings) Act

Due to article 1 of the CA it is applied in:

- preventing and eradicating moral corruption among persons that not turned 18;
- criminal proceedings, if a perpetrator is over the age of 13, but under the age of 17;
- performing educational measures or detention towards a person as long as the person has not turned 21.

Cases are conducted by a family court. The parties are: minor, his parents or guardian and prosecutor. Towards a minor, educational measures and a detention (lodging at a young offenders' home<sup>26</sup>) are to be applied; a punishment can be sentenced only when it is allowed by law, when other measures cannot assure minor's rehabilitation. Towards a minor a family court can:

- give reproof;
- oblige a minor to do something, especially to repair a damage, to do certain works or benefit for aggrieved or local community, to apologize to aggrieved, to take up education or job, to take part in proper educational, therapeutic or training course, to restrain from contact with certain communities or places or to stop drinking alcohol or using other substances;
- establish parental or guardian's supervision;
- establish youth organisation's supervision or supervision of a grass root organisation, work place or a reliable person vouching for minor;
- establish probation;
- refer a minor to a juvenile probation home or, by mutual agreement, to a grass root organisation or educational, therapeutic or training institution working with minors;
- ban from driving;
- confiscate things obtained from an unlawful act;
- refer a minor to a juvenile educational home or to a professional foster family that have completed a course in taking care of a minor;
- lodge a minor at a young offenders' home.

This can be suspended if perpetrator's characteristics, conditions and his environment together with circumstances of the case and a nature of minor's act prove that educational goals will be achieved without lodging. Suspension is temporary and lasts 1-3 years, during the suspension period a court uses educational measures. If during the suspension period minor's behaviour indicates further moral corruption or a minor dodges his duties or supervision, family court can cancel suspension and lodge a minor at young offenders' home. If during the suspension period and further 3 months the cancellation did not take place, sentence lodging a minor at a young offenders' home is considered to have never existed.

If an unlawful act is committed by a person under the age of 13, it is considered to be a manifestation of a moral decay. This justifies institution of protective and educational proceedings. A measure used in such situation is, for example, probation.

2.1 Sexual Abuse

i. Penal Code broadly defines the term "sexual activity" by dividing it into four categories - "sexual intercourse", "other sexual activity", "behavior leading to sexual activity", "forcing sexual activity".<sup>27</sup>

Penal Code distinguishes two age limits established to protect the child: "minor" and "minor under 15 years of age." Depending on the regulation, the Penal Code protects: all without exception, only minors, or minors under 15 years of age.

The legislator expands the definition of different categories. The "sexual intercourse" is defined as "pre-vaginal intercourse, anal intercourse, oral sex, as well as all other forms that can be recognized as a substitute for sexual activity - one without contact of reproductive organs - even if there is no ejaculation. It includes exclusively activities that involve direct contact of the reproductive organs of one of the participants with any body parts of the other participant, even if the latter ones are not normally considered sex organs, but the perpetrator treats them as such. In other words, sex organs of one of the participants (usually the perpetrator, but the possibility of role reversal should not be excluded) are entered into the body in a way generally considered to be normal."<sup>28</sup>

The other category is "other sexual activity". This term raises a lot of controversies in jurisprudence - especially on the issue of distinction between "sexual intercourse" and "other sexual activity". The answer can be found in resolution of the Supreme Court I KZP 17/99 which states, that term applies to behavior that is related to broadly defined human sexuality, involving bodily contact of the victim with the perpetrator, or at least of a bodily and sexual involvement of the victim (in accordance to 200 § 1 Penal Code and in accordance with article 197 § 2 Penal Code and article 198 and 199 Penal Code)

In aforementioned resolution of the Supreme Court, we can find the more in-depth explanation of definition "behavior leading to sexual activity". It occurs when the perpetrator, aiming to stimulate or satisfy his sexual arousal, touches genitals of the victim

(through underwear or clothing) or takes any other action involving body of a victim (eg. fondling, kissing).

As an example of "forced sexual activity" the Supreme Court specifies following actions of a victim: stripping, self-masturbation, masturbation of other participant, touching the perpetrators' genitals, or performing other acts of sexual manipulation.

ii. Forcing a child to participate in sexual intercourse or other sexual act is an action always considered to be done willfully. It is generally agreed, that the act may be done with both direct and eventual intent. The latter applies especially when the offender is not sure of the age of the victim. If somebody starts sexual intercourse or forces someone to participate in sexual activity, while not sure about the age of the other party involved, he or she shall be treated as if they possessed the knowledge.<sup>29</sup>

In order to strengthen the protection of minors from sexual abuse, the legislator has introduced a severe criminal sanction (2 to 12 years of imprisonment), which is further "supported" by the other provisions in the form of:

1. Prohibiting the convict from pursuing activities associated with treatment, education or care of minors,
2. An obligation to refrain from staying in certain environments or places, prohibiting contact with certain people, prohibiting the freedom to leave a specific place of residence without the permission of the court.<sup>30</sup>

iii. In Poland, the legal age of consent for sexual activity is 15 years of age. It is not regulated directly in any act, but it can be concluded on the basis of article 200 Penal Code, which regulates the offense of participating in sexual activity with a minor. The victim of the offence can only be a person under the age of 15. It is not permitted for people under this age limit to participate in sexual activities with each other, but such acts are not punishable on the basis of the Penal Code. The minors can only be held liable for such actions on the basis of the Statue on Juvenile Justice, which regulates the possible use of educational and corrective measures.

Article 197 and 198 Penal Code, regulate respectively rape and sexual activity forced due to disability of the victim. In addition, under article 199 § 3 Penal Code, all minors are protected from sexual abuse that occurs as a result of the promise of financial benefit or a breach of trust. The same article also protects them from abused caused by their unfavorable position or actual legal dependency. The sexuality of minors under the age of 15 is further protected in a case of rape. The perpetrators convicted on the basis of article 197 § 3 point. 2 Penal Code can be more severely sentenced.

v. Incest is forbidden on the grounds of article 201 Penal Code This regulation is considered justified not because of eugenic reasons, but because this act is considered amoral. This act can only be performed on ascendant, descendant, adopted, adopting, adoptive brother or sister. Being held liable under this provision shall not prevent the concurrent punishment under other provisions if their conditions are met.

vi. In the case of person that has convicted offense against sexual freedom or decency to the detriment of the minor, the court may decide to not only sentence jail-time, but also introduce further punitive measures: prohibiting the convict from pursuing activities associated with treatment, education or care of minors, an obligation to refrain from staying in certain environments or places connected with minors, issue a restraining order for some people (children), and in case of possible abuse by one parent, the court may decide to limit or even revoke parental rights.

2.2 Child Prostitution

vii. Poland has ratified The European's Council convention, treating about taking action against human trafficking. The ratification has taken place on the 17th of November 2008, although it came into force in case of Poland on 1st of March 2009.

viii. Polish penal law doesn't define the term „prostitution”, leaving its introduction to the doctrine. Most current and valued definition is one saying, that prostitution “is the provision of sexual services, in any form, depending on customers preferences, permanent or casual, in exchange for material benefits (money, gifts), where material benefits dominate over sexual motivations.”<sup>31</sup> Important element, mentioned in the doctrine in the context of defining prostitution is lack of emotional involvement both on prostitutes and customers behalf.

Definition from article 19 (2) of The Convention consists of two parts- using child for sexual activities and performance of such activities by a child, due to expected, or actual material benefit for a child or third person. Polish definition concerns prostitution of adults; however scope of occurrence includes those mentioned in the Conventions definition. Although Penal Code does not define prostitution, it mentions borders of acceptable fornication in article 199. Article 199 § 3 states that Any admission of a sexual act in relation to a minor, which was caused not only because the material benefit was promised but also personal benefits were. Punishment in such case is even broader, than in the Convention. Regulation article 199 § 3 meets some critic from the doctrines because it finds it possible to cause some specific sexual prohibition according to people who turned 16 which seems to be to excessive interference in one’s sexual liberty sphere<sup>32</sup>.

A very wide scope of article 199 § 3 from Penal Code Has been limited to situations in which minor over 15 years accepted to enter sexual activity just to fulfill this rules premisses. If motivations of financial or personal benefits or malpracticing were not integral parts of decision about undertaking sexual activities or did not have dominating meaning, the rule does not come into force<sup>33</sup>.

Both: mentioned law and the definition do not consider expressis verbis of conceivable financial benefit on third person behalf. This is being fulfilled by legislation, article 204 of Penal Code, punishing in § 1 procuration and pimping<sup>34</sup>, caused in the aim of receiving financial benefits and in § 2 pandering, when the benefit is actually received. If any of those activities are being undertaken on minors loss, penalty is exacerbated by § 3, and is between one and ten years of imprisonment. If in case of § 2, there was no financial benefit, a perpetrator may be punished on attention to cause this act which means that Polish

ix. Person organizing children prostitution ought to be punished, under the provision of aforementioned article 204 of Penal Code, which means as mentioned earlier article 199 § 2 or § 3 of Penal Code, while a prostituting child did not turn 15, it will be a situation from article 200 §1 and §2 of Penal Code, according to crime of sexual intercourse with a child. Any form of furthering children prostitution is being penalized, in addition to article 19 (2) of the Convention.

2.3 Child Pornography

x. Poland has signed the convention on the cybercrime on the 23 of November 2001, however, has not ratified it yet.

xi. There is lack of pornography definition in material law, introducing of this has been left to the doctrine. Between many considered definitions, the most respected is one by Professor M. Filar, defining pornography as:

„Performance of sexual activities, in a way which concentrates only on its technical aspects, in isolation from intellectual or personal aspects. Showing genitals, while they are operating, resolving to dehumanized sex technology.”<sup>35</sup>

This definition is not free from defects<sup>36</sup>, or in different words, it does not include all types of content, usually considered as pornography. Essential in this case is judge’s role, who may interpret the term broadly, adapting it to different cases.

The Convention requires considering the image of naked person as pornography, not necessarily taking part in sexual activity. Using alternatively systemic interpretation and comparing laws article 202 in relation to article 191 § 1 of Penal Code, it has to be concluded that just an image of naked person may also be considered as pornography within the meaning of Penal Code. Earlier definitions by professor Filar, which state that pornography presents behaviors which are against those commonly accepted or tolerated and do not comply with minimal aesthetic standards, are helping to interpret when does an image of naked person become pornography<sup>37</sup>. Again, role of the judges is visible, because they decide which content shall be considered as presenting pornographic, artistic or educational values. Aforementioned analysis leads to the conclusion what in particular cases might or must not be considered as pornography, even though it does not allow deriving a general definition. Child pornography is nothing more than content mentioned above, treating about children.

Definition from article 20 (2) of The Convention states that pornography is showing a child during the sexual activity, which refers to first definition, or that pornography is performance of genitals in sexual approaches, which complies with definitions mentioned further. Finally, Polish law allows applying (for court proceedings) actual definition introduced in The Convention and after ratification it will become part of national legal order. This means that The Conventions requirements are fulfilled.

xii. Penal responsibility for acts mentioned in Penal Code may be incurred by individuals, over 17 years. On special conditions, also juveniles over 15 years might be taken under responsibility, however it is limited to heaviest torts, does not contain prohibited acts, connected with child pornography (also in chapter referring to punishments).

Legal entities and other collective entities have to take responsibility, according to the rules in law on liability of legal entities<sup>38</sup>. It's article 3 states that legal entities have to take responsibility for acts undertaken on their behalf or benefit, either when a person authorized to act on others behalf crosses those limits or does not fulfill duties or when a third party acts while the other person knowing what she is doing. Collective entities have to take responsibility for wide variety of delicts, also according to article 16 item 1 pt 7 of the law, for crimes from article 202 § 3-4b of Penal Code, which means that responsibility for crimes connected with child pornography has to be taken by everyone, apart from minors below 17 years, which fulfills The Conventions requirements.

xiii. At present there is Lack of specified mechanism of pornographic content control. In Polish penal law shall be that adults may use pornography, which makes punishing possession for personal use pedophile pornography excessive, although it is not right because in the process of its formation at least touching child is necessary, which is harmful and is a penal act. Only when someone is forced to watch any type of pornography (article 202 § 1 Penal Code<sup>39</sup>), or when it is being presented to the minor (article 202 § 2<sup>40</sup>), penal law is applicable. In such case, commitment of punishable act has to be notified to the Police. As though act is being prosecuted ex officio, notification may be provided by anyone, not only a victim. Apart from notifications, cells of Bureau of Criminal Investigation Police Headquarters<sup>41</sup> are searching for pedophile content on the internet, mostly with external organizations' help<sup>42</sup>. Failure of preventive censorship comes from The Constitution, certainly from Press independence, coming from article 54 of Penal Code, basic for democratic state, and before 1989 commonly broken in Poland<sup>43</sup>. Exception of this rule was introduced to Penal Code within the article 200b, according to which public preaching of pedophilia is being punished. It is an interesting regulation, because Penal Code has punished only preaching of genocide or commencing aggressive war or similar crimes before. It is hard to imagine a situation in which one will commit crime from article 200b of Penal Code.<sup>44</sup>, because pedophiles usually conceal their preferences, aware that they are against the law and regular people will never agree to commit sexual acts against children, because of pedophilia promotion. This is why regulation seems useful as shaping legal awareness however, as punishment basis it is not reasonable

Individuals enjoying the artistic freedom (manufacturing pieces involving children) or educational freedom (generating documentation containing for ex ample images of nude minors) have to consider that penalizing proceedings might be commenced against them, although it may occur only when their behavior may intentionally seem as a delict from article 202, and article 191a<sup>45</sup> of Penal Code. However it would be impossible to control any piece of pornography entering the circulation. And what is more important it also limits its number.

Penal Code punishes in article 202 § 4b an act, based on production, distribution, presentation, storage, possession, generation of pornography in which an object is generated or converted image of a minor, taking part in sexual act, which means that there is no exclusion mentioned in article 20 (3) of The Convention.

Penal Code does not punish the act mentioned in article 20 (3) sentence 3 of The Convention, which means when individuals presented will become mature enough to incur penal responsibility, they shall not possess any more pornographic content, showing minors, even if there were exceptions aforementioned law. Although such act is punished, its social harm, in the meaning of Penal Code may be little or even there might be no social harm in it, it means that according article 1 § 2 of Penal Code such act is not a crime at all. However this must be considered by the Court, which allows boosting flexible attitude towards so delicate content, without exclusion of punishment in particular cases. If an individual is in possession of pornographic content, showing him or her own, then an offender and a victim are one person, so there is Lack of punishment because there is no social harm. It is also important that penal law cannot interfere into people's life in an exaggerated way- which would happen in aforementioned case.

Lack of stipulation from article 20 (3) makes Polish legal system more flexible, fulfilling The Conventions requirements at the same moment.

xiv. There is Lack of regulations, directly penalizing children involvement in pornographic performances, according article 21 of the Convention. Enough although not direct protection is provided by other laws. Every single pornographic performance will be mentioned at least in article 198, 199, 200 or 200 § 2 of Penal Code and people not involved in the process directly, though helping in performance organization, may be sentenced for help to commit a crime or attempting to commit it. So punishment includes all individuals connected with pornographic performance but it does not general one, general law, while it lets to vary the responsibility, according to part which one has taken in committing an act and what was ones action based on.

Attempt to commit any crime is being punished on Penal Code basis as strictly as its actual commitment. (article 13 § 1 relating to article 14 § 1 Penal Code).

In case of leading children to taking part in pornographic performances, punishment is sometimes, according to article 200a of Penal Code moped to preparation process. If perpetrator wants to some crimes from article 200 and 197 § 3 pt. 2 of Penal Code or capturing pornographic content (which corresponds with described above parts of pornographic performance) and according to this he or she commences contact via telecommunication or teleinformation system with the minor commits the same crime which is an act sui generis. As later processed punishment against offenders acting in situations in which child is unable to discover or identify them is set to protect children, when it is harder to get adults help and in which it is much easier to manipulate kids, so mainly when perpetrator uses the Internet. In other situations, for example personal contact in the street, perpetrator will be punished for eventual attempt to undertake action, (for example article 200 of Penal Code), but only when it will directly lead to committing a crime. If perpetrator according article 200a § 1 just to commit an act, misleads minor or uses minors mistake or inability to interpret situation in a relevant way or uses illegal threats, is punished far more strictly than when there is Lack of such evidence according to § 2 minor relevantly interprets situation and is not forced to anything.

Existing laws fulfill requirements from article 21 of The Convention in sufficient, although not direct way, both in the meaning of action, recruitment and attempt.

2.4 Corruption of Children

xv. Article 200 § 2 Penal Code penalizes the act of presenting sexual activities to a minor under 15 years of age. To meet the conditions of the action, it is not necessary for a child to be directly involved. The force of this legal protection is severely weakened by the requirement for the offender's act to be aimed to reach sexual satisfaction. This means, that if this particular intention is not proven (it cannot be presumed), or if they intent (even if condemnable) was different (for example perpetrators acted to cause damage to the psyche of a minor), criminal liability shall be excluded. The doctrine has presented many critical remarks regarding this regulation, but because of the absolute prohibition of using analogy in criminal law, it is not possible to fill this loophole without changing the wording of the regulation. Regardless of the critical evaluation, the provision meets the requirements of article 22 of the Convention.

2.5 Solicitation of Children for Sexual Purposes

xvi. Article 23 of the Convention obliges Member States to create solutions that would allow punishing the persons who undertook the contacts with a juvenile to commit a transgression against him/her. Article 200a of the Penal Code penalizes the acts of troubling the minor under the age of 15 years (thus, the one who still has not entered the age licensing him/her to take a decision on the beginning of the sexual life) to have a sexual intercourse, to record pornography or to perform the 'other sexual activity'. Tougher criminality is bound to situations, in which the action of the offender is based on taking advantage of a child's insufficient understanding or abusing a child's confidence. Polish regulation is a literal repetition of the Convention's provisions; as it is for the moment of accomplishment of the act, which in fact is not meeting, but even coming in contact with the victim.

xvii. Intentional help or persuasion to commit any of the acts described in pts. a-e is punishable with the constructions from the article 13, 16 and 18 of the Penal Code, i.e. attempt, aid and abetment. In this respect, the requirements from article 24 of the Convention are completely fulfilled.

2.6 Corporate Liability

xviii. This situation is regulated in article 3 of the Act of on the Liability of Collective Entities for Acts Prohibited Under the Threat of Punishment, 28 October 2002, Journal of Law from 2012 No. 768. The regulation determines the actions of an individual, for which corporate entity can be held liable. The aforementioned actions are:

1. acting on behalf of, or in the interest of the collective entity, within authorized right or duty to represent it, making decisions on behalf of the entity, exercise internal competences, or exceeding one's powers or failing to fulfill one's duty,
2. the person has been licensed to work as a result of exceeding of power or a failing to perform a duty by a person to whom such authorization has been given,
3. acting on behalf of, or in the interest of collective entity, with the consent or knowledge of the person, mentioned in point 1,
4. being an entrepreneur that directly interacts with a collective entity in order to realize a legally acceptable target,
5. if the behavior is brought or could bring to the collective entity a benefit, even a non-material one.

The possible liability of collective entity is addressed directly to the collective entity, not to its directors or employees. Individual criminal liability of these people is the same, although in the case of management it is easier to assign specific features of acts, such as the abuse of actual legal dependence. This not sanctioned by law.

xix. The Act on the Liability of Collective Entities for Acts Prohibited Under the Threat of Punishment, 28 October 2002, Journal of Law from 2012 No. 768 provides the penalties of: fine of no more than 3% of the income calculated from the financial year's balance in which the offense was committed, the forfeiture of financial benefits or items, gained from prohibited act or intended to be used while committing a prohibited act. There is an exhausted catalogue of prohibitions that the court can rule against the collective entity, such as the prohibition of promoting or advertising, the prohibition of the use of grants, public announcement of the ruling.

The penalties provided in the Act, do not preclude the possibility of further civil or administrative proceedings, or perpetrator's individual liability xx. The individual perpetrator is also liable for his or her actions.

2.7 Aggravating Circumstances

xxi. Does the state accept any aggravating circumstances for the crimes that have been described above? (E.g. when the offence damaged physical health of the child) Please, write down these circumstances and explain, try to specify the different crimes if there are different aggravating rules applying.

The offences against the minors are constructed as qualified grades to the basic, standard types, or as distinctive crimes. In the grades, they appear for example in the article 197, 202, and 204 of the Penal Code. Solely in the case of the article 197 of the Penal Code, making the criminality tougher is possible. It is also attainable when the crime is committed with particular cruelty, which is however an aggravating circumstance for adult victims as well. Usage of a notion of the particular cruelty is justified, when the cruelty level exceeds is higher than the cruelty requisite to commit a crime in its basic form. The affliction may have physical or psychological character.

Article 202 of the Penal Code provides that the production of the child pornography with the participation of a minor under the age of 15 is punished tougher than the child pornography produced with minors in general. Also, the distribution or the production succumbs under a stricter punishment than a common possession. This regulation should be assessed advantageously, because the delinquent possessing the pornography does not harm the child directly, while the production is immanently connected to the child's damage. On the other hand, the distribution may appear for a minor harmful hereafter, and allows the other persons to commit the crimes coming under the article 202 of the Penal Code.

Beyond those provisions, the aggravation of the criminality follows the judicial assessment of a punishment, therein the eventual (discussed farther on) special aggravation of the criminality. The transgressions, which may be committed only in relation to a minor, are described in the article 200 and the article 200a of the Penal Code. The article 200a § 1 provides for the tougher punishment, when the minor is not undertaking the relation completely at ease. The provision enumerates misleading the minor, exploitation, taking advantage of the lack of discernment of a minor and, finally, the threat; it is considered as an expression of a dose (little one) of the recognition of will and understanding of a minor.

2.8 Sanctions and Measures

xxii. The main punishment for aforementioned crimes is imprisonment. Crime, according to the article 53 of the Penal Code (Penal Code), is inflicted by the Criminal Court. The court analyses the perpetrator's guilt, crime's social harmfulness together with educational and preventive aim of the punishment and the need for educating society. Punishments allowed by the Penal Code are presented in the table below:

In Polish criminal law it is possible to change the punishment allowed by the Penal Code by commuting the punishment or restricting it.

Extraordinary restricting in case of crimes against minors can take place especially when a perpetrator on the ground of the Article 64 § 1 of the Penal Code is a recidivist: within 5 years since the punishment was ended commits a similar crime (against the same good protected by the law, e.g. minor's) sexuality. The maximum limit for a punishment in such situation is 50% higher<sup>46</sup>. If a perpetrator commits rape again or uses violence, the punishment, due to § 2, has to be higher than the minimum punishment allowed by the Penal Code.

The maximum limit can be also raised when a perpetrator committed many similar crimes in a short period of time (article 91 of the Penal Code).

Sentencing less than a minimum punishment is allowed when the accused only tried to commit a crime and the unlawful act did not occur due to the accused ineptitude, the accused tried to counteract the crime, the accused was only an assistant or a perpetrator was insane. It can be also applied when a perpetrator is a minor. In some situations sentencing any punishment would be wrong. This can happen when the gravity of the offence is not serious, and both its social harmfulness and a minor's injury are slight. Sentencing less than a minimum punishment describes Article 60 § 6 of the Penal Code.

The court can also apply additional measures. The most important is allowed by the Article 69 of the Penal Code suspension of a punishment no higher than 2 years of imprisonment. The suspension period lasts from 2 to 5 years. If a punishment is not reinstated in six months since the suspension period has ended, the punishment is considered to have never existed. In the case of crimes mentioned in the Article 197 § 3 and 4 of the Penal Code suspension cannot be used. It can be applied to all other crimes with some exceptions. Due to Article 58 of the Penal Code the imprisonment shall be used only when punitive measures or a suspended detention do not carry out their tasks. The lawgiver wants to use this punishment only when circumstances of the case allow doing this.

The court, when suspends a punishment, can fine a condemned person, establish supervision over a person or put a person to the test (impose some duties on the person). The most important duties are not to contact with injured and the obligation to leave a flat if a minor lives with a condemned person<sup>47</sup>.

Suspension of a punishment is very important in case of acts against sexuality and morality because if a person is sentenced imprisonment the fact cannot be effaced from a criminal record, which means a condemned person will always be convicted of a crime. It is very harsh punishment, because “sentencing 25 years imprisonment for most grievous crimes is effaced from a criminal record”<sup>48</sup>. According to Article 107 § 1 of the Penal Code it takes place 10 years after the punishment was executed or waived.

If a crime's weight is little<sup>49</sup>, and its circumstances arise no doubts, according to the Article 66 of the Criminal the court can conditionally dismiss criminal trial. It can happen when a maximum punishment for a crime is no higher than 3 years, but if the accused person reconciles with the injured or repairs the loss, the maximum punishment can be up to 5 years imprisonment. If a case is dismissed, the court places the blame on the accused and can impose additional duties on him, just like it happens in a suspension of a punishment.

The court can also cancel execution of a punishment due to Article 61 of the Penal Code.

Besides every sanction imposed for the crime committed against children, court according to article 39 pt. 2a Penal Code has the authority to impose a rule of “forbidding conducting businesses involving taking care, curing, and tutoring of minors”. This measure might be imposed for a period of time from 1 to 10 years, however if the perpetrator re-commits the crime of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse of children, that period will be extended to the life-annuity. Special regulations apply to a situation where the perpetrator of a criminal act is a minor. The Penal Code is applicable to persons who are at least 17 years old, while those between the age of 17 and 18 years shall be punishable under specific conditions.

When deciding whether or not particular minor should be penalized, judges take into the account, minors current “properties” (in particular, the level of their development). In some cases Penal Code allows to apply only the corrective and educational means, law treats those individuals as juveniles. It is unacceptable to judge against them the penalty of life imprisonment, however the court may in accordance with article 60 § 1 in conjunction with Article of article 54 § 1 , extraordinarily mitigate other penalties, motivated by educational reasons.

Exceptionally, when it comes to a criminal act of article 197 § 3 and 4 of the Penal Code, person who has completed the age of 15 can be held liable, provided that it can be attributed to the sufficient understanding of that person. The rules described above are applicable for juveniles. The penalty imposed shall not exceed 2/3 upper limit of the sanctions. If such person has committed any other act, then that person does not comply with article 10 § 2 of the Penal Code, or a person has not completed the age of 15, the sentence is judged on the basis of the Penal Code, but on the basis of the Act on juvenile justice.

This Act governs the liability of people between 13 to 17 years for offenses under penalty, and the proceedings in the event of their demoralization. The competent courts on the basis of this Act are the family courts, and instead of punishments and measures of the Penal Code, the measures provided in Article. 6 of the Act apply, in particular educational measures listed there, and the only corrective measure, which is placing such a person in a reformatory. The main directives, which have to be followed by the court, are the welfare of the minor, and the need for raising him/her. Pursuant to article 13 of the Act, the court may exceptionally mitigate the punishment rule (of the Penal Code), if a minor at the time of adjudication is under the age of 18, and there would be a reason to put him in a reformatory. This possibility also exists when a minor is sentenced to be held in the correctional facility, but by the time sentence is implemented, minor has completed the age of 18.

In accordance with article 55 of the Constitution, the extradition of a Polish citizen abroad is generally inadmissible. Exceptions are determined in the §. 2 and 3, it becomes acceptable to extradict Polish citizens in cases provided by ratified by Poland international agreement, especially if the illegal act was committed abroad and the act is penalized by the Polish penal law. There are no exceptions to this rule provided in the Constitution. In accordance with Article 55 passage 5 of the Constitution, the court determines the admissibility of the extradition. Conventional requirement for the admissibility of the extradition of the perpetrators is realized.

xxiii. In assessing the proportionality of the sanctions, we should compare them with the other sanctions contained in the Penal Code, not forgetting about the public perception of the facts and legal traditions.

Proportionality assessment should be done by comparing the sanctions for offenses against minors with the other crimes against sexuality and morality. Next they should all be put in the context of the size.<sup>50</sup>

article Penal Code	148 § 1	157 § 1	189 § 1	191a § 1	197 § 1	207 § 1
act	murder	slight body injury	deprivation of liberty	preserving the image of a naked person, while sexual intercourse, without peron's consent	rape	cruelty to the closest ones lower level of sanction	8 years	3 months	3 month.	3 months	2 years	3 months higher level of sanction	life sentence	5 years	5 years	5 years	12 years	5 years

A comparison of threatening sanctions for major crimes against persons and threatening sanctions for acts of a pedophile, first of all puts sexuality and morality at a very high place among the goods protected by law (but taking into account the public perception of action, strikes low minimum sanction for the offense of rape<sup>51</sup>). Second, acts against minors up to

The lower limit of the statutory penalty allows for conditional suspension of punishment for almost all torts described in Penal Code. Only punishment for murder can not be suspended, and when it comes to pedophile offenses, the suspension does not apply to the rape of a minor under the age of 15, but this does not compensate for the fact that the crime is pursued at the request, not from the office. The formation of the upper limits of sanctions for acts of article 197 and 200 K.K. is righteous, it takes into account the size of typical violations in committing these acts, and corresponds to the penalties for other offenses, and finally it is in accordance with the condemnation of these acts in the society. Similarly, in the case of an act of article 203 there are no doubts about the validity of high-risk, because forced prostitution leads to considerable and often irreversible damage to the psyche of a young person.

Society welcomes leaving judges much freedom in the evaluation of the act, which is expressed in terms of sanctions. However what offends the society is the upper limit sanctions sentenced for acts related to child pornography in particular. Courts do not mete out punishments even close to the upper limit of threat<sup>53</sup>, they also mete out very low statutory sanctions in the case of rape crimes.

The total number of convictions for sexual offenses in the years 2006 - 2011 is about 2000 per year, of which 40 to 50% are committed against minors under the age of 15. From the total number of penalties for acts against sexuality and morality half are meted on probation.

In the case of offenses against minors, the penalties for the offenses specified in Article 202 § 2-4b are almost always are subjected conditional suspension, from article 200 and 204 are subjected to it in about 50% of cases, and for the acts from article 197 § 3 are suspended only in exceptional <sup>54</sup> circumstances. This well illustrates the seriousness of the offenses,

Particularly bright is disproportion of the sanction for an act with article 202 § 4 of the PENAL Code, punishable by 1 to 10 years in prison (with twelve sentence imposed in 2011, all were suspended), with the fatal beating with article 158 § 3 in conjunction. with § 1 of the Penal Code, punishable to the same extent, in which case that same year with 122 adjudicated custodial sentences only 3 were suspended <sup>55</sup>. Judicial practice shows clearly that the sanctions were framed incorrectly, and the Penal Code in this regard is highly fragmented and it can impose sanctions, which would be disproportionate to the seriousness of the act, taking into account the whole penal repression. The jurisprudence clearly shows the unjustification for such an amount of possible punishment.

Changes made in the Polish penal law in the years 2004 - 2009 for pedophile offenses have focused on increasing penalties provided for them, and on the introduction of new, precise regulations, including the implementation of provisions of the Convention of Lanzarote. The amendments have not changed the number of acts, or the structure of sentences. This is illustrated in the table below:

Legend: a.s. – all sentences, d.l. – deprivation of liberty, s.s.– sentences suspended

The analysis of the above table shows that the number of convictions has not changed drastically, despite the amendment. Noticeable is the increase in the number of convictions under Article 202, which is the result of a significant build up of the provision, and the decline in convictions under § 3, due to the creation of the special rule in article § 4b, which penalizes possession of child pornography.

In summary, having in mind that the increase of penalization has not reduced the number of criminal offenses, and courts continue to mete out punishments in the lower limits of threats, one might ask about the need to change the existing sanctions. Frequently used term of imprisonment in suspension, combined with the preventive measure of article 39 pkt. 2a Penal Code is effectively punishable, only in relation to offenders with no disorder who have committed an offense under the influence of an error (for example, thinking that the person you have sex with is an adult), and for people diagnosed with pedophilia, as well as those that do not have respect for the legal system (those people often commit sexual crimes<sup>56</sup>), such a judgment does have not at all penalty qualities. Even sentencing pedophile for a life and sentencing lifelong mentioned above the penal measure may not be sufficient. Existing facilities in Poland treating pedophiles have many vacancies, but only a few patients<sup>57</sup>. The existing possibility of forced chemical castration of pedophiles is used very rarely<sup>58</sup>, and the voluntary submission to it can bring the conditional early release from serving the penalty. Overallly speaking, the courts have a range of options in punishing pedophiles, and a lot of flexibility on the level of the sanctions. But despite that, they don't use it, sentencing penalty with a similar amount, and rarely use the power to rule further punitive measures. Nevertheless, the sanctions should be regarded as both deterrent and effective and generally proportionate, when it comes to legislation, there might be some doubts concerning the practical usage.

xxiv. The Penal Code provides sanctions only applicable to individuals (physical person). It is prohibited the existence of organizations with the aim of committing crimes – punished, only their members are punished (on the basis of Article 258 of the Penal Code), and the organization itself is illegal. Article Regulations 44 and 45 of the Penal Code makes it clear, that if an organization is legitimate, and if by the offender (member) actions organization will receive any benefits, those benefit will be forfeited.

The liability of collective entities regulated by the separate Act<sup>59</sup>, it provides a range of penalties that can be applied to these entities. In accordance with Article § 16 1 pkt. 7 of the Act, entities are responsible for the offenses specified in Article. 199-200, Article 202 § 3 and Article 4b. 203-204 of the Penal Code and the fundamental penalty is a fine in the amount specified by the article 7 of the Act, an exception to this rule: person isn't liable if he/she didn't receive any benefits while committing the offense. In accordance with Article 9 of the Act there is also the possibility of a judgment for a period of one to 5 years, the prohibition of promotion or advertising, the prohibition on the use of grants, subsidies, and other forms of support, the prohibition of the use of the assistance of international organizations, prohibited from competing for public contracts. In addition the judge may rule the judgment to be given to the public.

xxv. Penal law provides the confiscation of objects used to commit a crime, and objects and other benefits derived from the offense. As a general rule, the good faith is protected of persons owning things, but who committed no crime. If those things were used to commit it, they recover it, unless the rule states otherwise. Article 204 § 5 of the Penal Code provides that if the object was used to perform an act of article 204 of the Penal Code, the court may order the forfeiture even if it was not owned by the perpetrator. If there is a high probability that the offender transferred the benefit of the crime to another person, then that person must prove that they obtained it legally, otherwise it will be forfeited. This does not apply to eg child pornography, the possession of which is illegal and punishable by law, and _ profits from its sale. Objects to be forfeited in accordance with the Article 44 § 6 of the Penal Code become the property of the State Treasury and shall be destroyed. In accordance with Article.49 Penal Code the court has the ability to sentence exemplary ruling for Fundusz Pomocy Pokrzywdzonym and post-penitentiary aid.

However exemplary rule is permitted in accordance with article 59 Penal Code, only in case of the withdrawal of punishment, sentencing self-contained penal measure, and in accordance with Articles 67 § 3 of the conditional discontinuance of the proceedings. Exemplary does not exceed 60 000 PLN.

xxvi. In the case of committing one of discussed acts within the family or close environment of the victim, there may be coincidence of acts of article 201 and 207 of the Penal Code, penalizing incest and abuse in the family. In general, the apparent coincidence (the Act) of the article 11 of the Penal Code will be included, which carries a punishment on the basis of stringent regulation and allows the application of punitive measures from all concurrent provisions, the multiplicity of actions (article 85 Penal Code)

A criminal court may also take additional measures, protecting the victim. For the duration of the proceedings, may order the defendant to leave the premises jointly occupied with the victim, and if in his/her opinion, further protection for the child by his/her guardian, guardian would be detrimental to the child, in accordance with Article. 51 Penal Code, judge notifies then the competent family court. Family and Guardianship Code allow taking away the children from a parent, especially when he has carried the offense on a child. If it is dangerous for a child to be with his/her guardians, the child is taken away promptly from those guardians and next the child is placed in an emergency shelter or facility involved in the taking care of children.

If the act was committed in close proximity to the child, but not in the family, the offender may be prohibited contact with the victim, approaching her, or prohibit residence in a certain place or a certain environment. The victim is then isolated from the family, as previously described, unless the family is not able to provide the security, when the act was a result of improper care (or even lack thereof) of a minor, and there is no prospect of improvement situation.

If the act was committed in close proximity to the child, but not in the family, the offender may be prohibited to contact with the victim, to approach the victim, to stay in a certain place or a certain environment.

The victim is then not isolated from the family, as previously described, unless the family is not able to provide the security (if the act was a result of improper care or lack of it, and there are no prospects for the improvement of the situation).

3 CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

3.1 Investigation

1. Introduction

Criminal procedure provides for a number of exceptions in Poland on the participation of the minor both at the stage of pre-trial investigation, as well as judicial. To start any debate on this issue some technical remarks should be made on the terminology in the Polish legal system, being used for civil law and criminal law which presents some definitions relating to people who do not yet have full legal capacity, which in a sense, limits their rights.

1.1. Minor

Penal Code, like the code of criminal procedure, use the term "minors", which we can find in the article, for example: 51,207, 208 Penal Code and in article 23 code of criminal procedure. Despite the use of the word its definition cannot be found. Therefore, you should look to the Code Civil. This term is derived from article 10 § 1 Code Civil, which provides that "the legal age is, who completed eighteen years". In view of the above, we can conclude that "minor" means a person who is not completed 18 years. With the statutory context, it appears that the term "minors" may include both offender criminal, as the victim, and in addition, such a minor who committed a crime or was found in the circumstances, which may be indicative of his demoralization or of demoralizing impact on him.

1.2 Juvenile and adolescents

The Penal Code and other laws, such as law of "Proceedings in the cases of minors" dated 26 October 1982 or the Code of Offences, use such terms as "juvenile" and "adolescent". According to the article 10 § 1 and 2 Penal Code, juvenile offender "is guilty of offence before reaching the age of 17". While adolescent is the perpetrator, who at the time of the offence is not completed 21 years of age and in the time of having jurisdiction at first instance – is not completed 24 years (article 115 § 10 Penal Code).

2. Notice of the crime.

Information about the crime can come from different sources. Most often it is provided in the notice of the crime. In most cases the preparatory proceedings is the result of the Police response to the notice of certain events, which can be considered, in the evaluation of the notifiers, for crimes, and not the actions of the Police itself targeted directly on citizens' behavior that violates the standards of disclosure of criminal law. The comparison of data, which are collected in the police crime statistics<sup>60</sup>, 1990 and 2005 shows that in 2005 the proceedings were initiated more rarely by the notice of the crime submitted by citizens (1990 - 79,1% of cases, while in 2005 - 72.1%) by institutions (1990 - 79,1%, 2005 - 5.5% - we see here a sharp decline in the number of notifications, which is the result of changes in the rules), but definitely more often as a result of the offender being caught red-handed or in the immediate pursuit (1990 - 3%, 2005 - 15.1% - grew rapidly only after 2000 - in 2000 - 2.5% while already in 2001 - 10.8%).<sup>61</sup>

2.1. The social obligation of notification of an offence

Polish criminal procedure in article 304 code of criminal procedure states that anyone who knows about the crime prosecuted ex officio (e.g., sexual intercourse with a minor under the age of 15), is obliged to notify the Police or the public prosecutor's office.

Used in this provision, the term "social obligation" means that each citizen has the permission to deposit the notification of an offence prosecuted ex officio. This obligation is not supported by any sanction of criminal liability, only ethical and social. We can indicate that the essence of the obligation that was indicated in the Act and its failure does not cause any legal response, possibly in the case of public officials which can result in disciplinary liability (subject to other provisions). It is explained that people want to be protected from crime; therefore, every citizen should help law enforcement authorities in the detection of offences, in particular in the case of criminal offences to the detriment of a minor. At the basis of this regulation is the attention of the legislature for the welfare of the public, as well as increasing the possibility of the detection of offences committed particularly to minors and prevention before demoralization. The note should be that this obligation is subject to restrictions as indicated above this only covers offences prosecuted ex officio. In this connection, the disabled are indictable offences and on request (e.g. crime suspicion - article 197 Penal Code).

To submit a notice of an offence is entitled any person who has such information regardless of age or nationality. If the person notifying about the crime is not Polish, the Protocol shall be drawn up with the translator. However, if the notice of the crime is submitted by a deaf person, this Act will be drawn up with the participation of the expert of the Court with the relevant specialties. The offender may also notify about the crime that he committed, however, considering the type of criminal acts covered by this report, it is hard to imagine such a situation.

2.2 The obligation to deposit the notification of the crime to the detriment of a minor

In article 304 § 2 code of criminal procedure contrary to section 1 of this article we are already required to submit notification of the crime, which also applies to offences committed to the detriment of a minor. In the case of non-preserving the disciplinary sanction threatens.

Article 304 § 2: "State institutions and local government, which in connection with his activities became aware of the crime prosecuted ex officio, shall immediately inform the public prosecutor or the police and is obliged to take the necessary steps to the time of arrival of the law enforcement authorities to avoid blurring the traces and evidence of a crime ".

The legal obligation of notification of the crime was imposed on State institutions and local government, which in connection with their activity (legal or statutory) became aware of the crime prosecuted ex officio. This obligation rests upon the person who is the manager or who, according to internal rules, is obliged to inform the law enforcement authorities of the crime<sup>62</sup>. In the present case, on the background of the article 304 § 2 code of criminal procedure, notification of the crime of rests mainly upon people acting in the management functions (e.g., directors of the school or kindergarten) or bearing special responsibility. The wording of the 304 § 2 can lead to a conclusion that only managers are obliged to notify about the crime, but such interpretation would significantly narrow the catalogue of the possibilities of its application, and it would lower the detection of crimes to the detriment of minors. Therefore, the employees of individual institutions subordinated to the manager/director are also obliged to notify the manager/director about the crime.

Unexecuted obligations indicated in the article 304 § 2 code of criminal procedure result in the liability of the public official (article 231 Penal Code). This provision penalizes behavior of the public official to the detriment of the public or private interest due to non-compliance with the obligation imposed on him (in the form of the total omission or its implementation in non-conformity with the content).

2.3. Notification of an offence submitted by the non-governmental organizations

The code of criminal procedure of 6 June 1997 released the non-governmental organizations from the obligation to notify about the crime (e.g. associations). This change is important for the legal protection of the victims, since reduced circle of entities is obliged to notice about the crime. This state of things potentially can adversely affect the degree of detection of crimes committed in particular those to the detriment of the minor. However, we should not be so sceptical about the actions of the legislature because it is perceived to allow victims of the crime to return to legal entities that do not have a statutory obligation to notify law enforcement authorities. Often the police is the last step that victims want to do. It may seem that the first they will seek professional help, and then take action to punish the perpetrators of the crimes.

2.4 Submission of the notification of an offence by a minor

Person who does not have full legal capacity (a minor or an incapacitated person) also may file a notice of the crime prosecuted ex officio. The rules for submitting a notice of offence are the same in respect of minors, as well as of persons with full legal capacity. Each notice of offence equally obliges law enforcement authorities to take the appropriate measures provided by law. Law enforcement authorities have a duty to verify the accuracy of the information given in the notice of the crime, and then check the circumstances of the offence, collect evidence incriminating the suspect (the accused in the course of the process).

2.5. Notice of the further course

Person or institution (Government or municipality), which filed a notice of the crime you should be notified of its initiation, the refusal to initiate or about the redemption of the inquiry or investigation. If the notifier of the crime will not receive this information within 6 weeks, he may lodge a complaint to the supervising prosecutor (article 306 § 4 and § 6 code of criminal procedure).

3. The presence of a minor in a criminal trial

3.1. The right to exercise rights conferred to the victim

The principle is that the victim, a natural person having legal capacity, occurs in a criminal trial. However, there is an exception from this principle, in article 51 § 2 code of criminal procedure, which lists entities who can exercise the powers given to the victim, whose age or total or partial legal incapacitation limits deprives them of their legal capacity.

Article 51 § 2 code of criminal procedure provides that "If the victim is a minor or totally or partially incapacitated, his legal representative performs (legal or actual guardian) or a person under whose constant keeping the victim remains".

Representatives of the rights of the child are his parents, what is stated in the family code (article 98 section 1). If the child remains under parental responsibility of both parents, each of them is its legal representative. In the case of the differences between legal representatives the Court decides.

3.1.1. A crime to the detriment of a minor committed by a parent

This situation complicates in the case of the offence committed by the parents of the child, if he remains under their parental responsibility. Sometimes there are cases when a person residing in the nearest, common household with a minor commits a sexual offence on her injury. At the stage of criminal proceedings the competent authorities (the public prosecutor or the Court) can apply to the suspect (or accused) the preventive measures, which are designed to secure the correct line of the process. Those precautionary measures can be applied at any given time. Mostly police supervision and provisional arrest shall apply. Provisional arrest is designed to secure the correct line of the process, but also to isolate the offender from a minor person. There is no difference in relation to criminal proceedings where the accused is a person from outside the ranks of the minor's family -court may also declare a preventive measure in the form of provisional arrest. In practice, the law enforcement authorities often use a preventive measure in the form of provisional arrest in such cases. It is also possible to declare an order to leave the premises jointly occupied. Therefore the argument de lege ferenda is in this case to provide specialist help for example of a psychologist, therapist or psychiatrist, for example at the hearing of the minor (article 185a code of criminal procedure). However, at the second hearing, the prior opinion of the mental state of the child is not necessary.

3.1.2. The prohibition of personal contact in civil procedure

You should also have regard in the context of offences committed to the detriment of the minor by the next family members, that in the case of the notification of the crime to the detriment of the minor, which does not involve the effect of provisional arrest, it would return to the family court for a protective proceedings in order to declare a prohibition of personal contact with the victim for the duration of the criminal proceedings. However, we must remember, that the conduct of civil proceedings in this area entails costs. The decision of the prohibition would result in "physical" ban on contact, which in practice means that the offender, in order to implement the ban issued by the Court, would have to leave jointly occupied premises regardless of the title, which he has to this place. In addition, the continuing considerations on the parental authority and a minor in criminal proceedings, it should lead to a conclusion that in this case, the guardian shall be established to carry out the rights of the victim. (Article 99 of the Family Code).

It should be noted that in accordance with the resolution of the Supreme Court of 30 September 2010 (and PRC 10/2010) a parent of the minor may, acting as legal representative of the minor victim's rights, cannot exercise victims' rights in the criminal proceedings, if the accused is the other parent." In this situation, at the beginning of the proceedings it is requested to establish for the child's guardian to represent the interests of the child in the proceedings. This request is made to the appropriate family court by the criminal court, the prosecutor or the parent<sup>63</sup>. If the offence is committed by any of the parents in the detriment of several children, the court establishes as many guardians how many children are to be represented. The authority hearing the case is obliged to check whether the guardian actually performs and whether it is careful.

3.2 Hearing of a minor

When hearing of the minor there should be a regard to the interests of such a witness, which due to the age should be provided with special care, taking into account the protection of the child's psyche before traumatic experience. Such protection is undoubtedly provided by the psychologist, who may be present at the hearing. Polish legal system assumes that the Court upholds the principles of fair trial and equality of the parties. Consequently, it is prohibited to vary the parties even if on one side there is a minor. This means that we cannot put the suspect (in the process - the accused) in a worse situation than a victim, who, as has been indicated, may be a minor.

It should also be noted that the act of hearing of the victims, witnesses and the accused (suspect) has been dealt with in the Polish criminal procedure uniformly by article 171 code of criminal procedure. Only in 2003 under the amending law was introduced as a separate article 185a code of criminal procedure, hearing of a minor became different procedure. It should be noted here that the Supreme Court in its resolution of 30 November 2004, states that article 185a code of criminal procedure (which will be referred to later in the report) refers to both the investigation and the proceedings, because the use of the word "accused", and not "suspect" when you specify the exceptions contained in this article provides, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, the absence of obstacles to carry out the hearing referred to in article 185a code of criminal procedure in proceedings from legal process<sup>64</sup>.

3.2.1. A minor as a personal source of evidence

There is no doubt that the minor is a special witness for several reasons. It is worth to point out that the ability of the perception and the memorization of the minor witness, and then reconstruction of the factors, which influences the proportion of observations, shall design the degree of child development. Clearly disputed evidence is the testimony of minors. For example, J. Bossowski argued that the testimony of children before the age of 7 years old cannot be treated seriously due to naivety in understanding life phenomena, the risk of suggestions and narrow range of words and concepts<sup>65</sup>. Opponents of this view in the wake of the survey contend that the child may be as valuable witness as an adult. Cases in which the testimonies of minors have nothing to do with the case or reality are only the result of this that the interrogators did not appreciate the specific features of the minor associated with age. There are 3 periods of growth, which have an impact on the assessment of the reliability of the information: a period of pre-school (3-7 years), the period of the younger school age (7-12 years) and adolescence (12-18 years). For example, children in the pre-school age are characterized by "activity of the mind and instability", which contribute to the involuntary distortion of the information. The resulting gaps in memory are filled with any content - the so-called confabulations.<sup>66</sup>

The child is a special witness, so it is important to take into account its growth period<sup>67</sup>. Polish code of criminal procedure does not prohibit the admission of the evidence obtained from the minor but states that the use of this kind of evidence requires prudence and far-reaching precautions. The legislature made the exception to the rule of repeated hearing of a minor (that is less than 15 years) in the article 185a code of criminal procedure. There is no doubt that the hearing of the minor of the victim as a witness is difficult, requiring specific qualifications and, in particular, extensive knowledge of psychology. The hearing of a minor in case of sexual offences is not conducted by the prosecutor, because he may not have the appropriate knowledge and life experience. In consequence, the hearings of minors are conducted by members of the Committee for the Protection of Children's Rights, consultative and diagnostic centers, family workers and by psychologists, who are constantly present. It seems that the hearing of the minor in the case of crimes of a sexual nature should be made by the psychologist with sexological specialization because he possesses the needed knowledge of psychology and sexology and may lead the hearing so as to minimize the traumatic experiences of a minor. The decision depends on whether the prosecutor will hear the minor himself or will do it in the form of law enforcement police officer. This decision is affected by various factors: the form of accumulated evidence, whether the minor is the only witness to the crime, the nature of the case, the public reaction to this action and many others.

3.2. The hearing of the minor according to article 185a code of criminal procedure.

If the minor is below 15 years and is the victim of a crime, his hearing will be held under the conditions referred to in article 185a code of criminal procedure.

The principle set out in article 185a § 1 code of criminal procedure – there is only one hearing (which is highlighted by the use of the word "only"). From this principle, however, two exceptions are provided for:

- disclosure of the circumstances, the explanation must be heard (the truth),
- the request for a hearing by the accused, who did not have the defender at the time of the first hearing of the victim (the principle of the right to defense).

If one of these conditions is met, it will be possible to hear a minor again. In view of the fact that the legal regulation contained in this article, should be applied both to the pre-trial investigation and to legal proceedings, it must be therefore accepted that the authority entitled to the hearing referred to in article 185a code of criminal procedure is the Court which makes it both for the first time, and again, and also regardless of whether this occurs in the preparatory proceedings or in legal proceedings. A.M. Wesółowska considers that prior to the hearing of the minor the judge should already have evidence that allows for full hearing of a minor<sup>68</sup>. The court hearing shall be made in accordance with article 30 § 1 code of criminal procedure – by one person. In the light of the article 185a code of criminal procedure the participation of an expert psychologist is obligatory. In addition, persons entitled to participate in the activity were listed exhaustively.

By determining the jurisdiction of the Court the general provisions should apply, from which it appears that the hearing in the course of the investigation, the competent court is called to resolve the matter in the first instance (article 330 § 1 code of criminal procedure). It is the District Court, since all the crimes against sexual freedom and morals are the in the competence of this Court (article 25 § 1 code of criminal procedure). When the Act sets a different competence, specifically so notes (e.g. article 250 § 2 code of criminal procedure). The District Court could hear the victim in accordance with article 185a code of criminal procedure only then, if it became competent according to article 25 § 2 or § code of criminal procedure or 33 2 code of criminal procedure<sup>69</sup>.

3.3. Technical aspects of conducting hearings

Statistics of the Ministry of Justice - containing data about the interrogation of minors in accordance with article 185a and 185b code of criminal procedure in Poland in the years 2003 – 2010, show that the participation of children in legal procedures is becoming more and more common. For example: the number of hearings of minors in accordance with article 185a code of criminal procedure in the period from July 2003 to July 2004 was 1.161 in relation to total number of 1.443, and throughout 2009, amounted to 4.969 4.769. In turn, the number of hearings of minors in accordance with article 185b code of criminal procedure in the period from August 2005 to August 2006 was 542 in relation to the total number of 572, and throughout 2009 was 746 compared to 773<sup>70</sup>.

3.3.1. The hearing of a minor witness at the stage of pre-trial investigation

For considerations on technical aspects of the conduct of the hearing of the minor we should start from article 147 § 2 § 2 code of criminal procedure. This provision provides that if technical considerations do not prevent the hearing of a witness, victim, and referred to in article 185a code of criminal procedure perpetuates using recording equipment. It is a guarantee of the rule of a single hearing, therefore, it is recommended to use this type of equipment commonly. Article 147 § 3 gives the Court the opportunity to choose the form of the Protocol, however, it is advisable to base on the summary of the hearing of a minor to avoid distortion.

3.3.2. The hearing of the minor witness at the stage of judicial proceedings

The hearing, in accordance with article 185a and 185b Code of Criminal Procedure, takes place only once and would not be repeated (at the stage of pre-trial investigation). On trial the evidence contained in the Protocol of the hearing is evidence. The Protocol is read at the hearing (article 185a § 3 Code of Criminal Procedure). You should assume that this applies both to the preparatory and judicial proceedings. It would be incomprehensible to diversify between the proceedings. Article 185a code of criminal procedure contains no such differentiation. This provision does not provide for a solution along the lines of article 396 § 2 code of criminal procedure that the Court may order the hearing of a witness, who has not appeared because of the obstacles too difficult to remove, the judge designated for its composition, and also allows you to order the hearing of such a witness to the Court to the requested party. In this last variant the witness does not come into contact with the court. However, it should be noted that in the case of sexual crimes, there is the possibility of application of the aforesaid article. (396 § 2 code of criminal procedure)

An important feature which distinct the minor victim's hearing from the adult is also included in the article 189 point 1 code of criminal procedure which states from people who have not completed 17 years, the pledge is not taken. This is justified by the lack of awareness on the importance of the pledge made in the process. Therefore, you should not receive a pledge from a person, for who it has no meaning.

Without a doubt before the hearing, the child must be informed of this, and of the consequences of making the statements inconsistent with the truth, in the most appropriate way for him (taking into account his age, mental development and character traits). In addition, according to the article 190 code of Code of Criminal Procedure of criminal procedure, a minor witness should be warned before the start of the hearing of perjury for testimony being false or concealment. In doctrine there appear opinions that it should not be treated as the general principles of criminal liability. Children of a certain age are not subject to criminal liability under the Penal Code and the code of civil procedure. Article 10 provides that on the basis of Penal Code the code corresponds to the one who committed the offence after 17 years of age. In connection with the provision of article 189 code of criminal procedure, it should be noted that in the opinion of the legislature, minors below the 17 years old are not able to comprehend fully the nature and importance of the pledge. In addition, since minors who have not completed 17 years of age shall not be liable criminally, they cannot therefore be liable for perjury<sup>71</sup>.

Non-governmental organization, Nobody's Children Foundation in 2004 came out with the initiative to the Polish courts of the blue rooms or audition rooms. These are the rooms equipped for auditions of minors. They are situated outside the buildings of the Court or the public prosecutor's office. This location is to make the child feel safe, and in friendly conditions. In the room are the toys that the child may feel more comfortable. The necessary pieces of equipment should be the Venetian mirror room and the audiovisual equipment to record sound and image. Such rooms are located in the premises of the Nobody's Children Foundation or the Committee of the Protection of the Rights of the Child. The hearing of the child is in the form of a conversation with the judge, in which participates the psychologist. In the room next to it, the Prosecutor or the accused stands, the defender and the technicians who take care of the quality of the recordings. Hearing is recorded mostly on DVD, VHS tape and attached to the evidence of the case. Evidence obtained at the hearing in the blue (friendly) room have the same legal force as the testimony obtained during a hearing in the judicial review hearing room<sup>72</sup>.

3.4. The right of a minor to refuse to testify

An important issue is also the right to refuse to testify of a minor victim in to repeal the answers to questions (article 182 Article 183 § Code of Criminal Procedure). The legislature gave the primacy of the good of family before interest of Justice, leaving the witness the will testify against the nearest person.<sup>73</sup> Thus, only the witness is entitled to exercise the right to refuse to testify. It might seem that if the witness is a minor, the decision to refuse the submission by him of evidence, in accordance with article is made by his legal representative. Legal representative of a minor cannot force him to testify, as well as to the refuse. In connection with this argument comes the conclusion that minors themselves may make use of the opportunities contained in the article 182 section 1 code of criminal procedure. This view is supported by the Supreme Court, which provides that each witness, also a minor, has the right to refuse to testify.<sup>74</sup>

Opinion of the Court on article 182 section 1 Code of Criminal Procedure does not contain any provisions that would justify different treatment of the minor.

3.5. The hearing of a minor as a witness

Article 185a code of criminal procedure treats about a hearing of the victim. Similar regulation is in the article 185b code of criminal procedure and it concerns the hearing of the minor witness, who at the time of the interview has not completed 15 years. This provision provides that such witness can be heard in the conditions referred to in article 185a code of criminal procedure in matters concerning violent offences or unlawful threat or crimes against sexual freedom and morals, if the testimony of the witness may be important for the settlement of the case.

The consolidation guarantees the ability to return to full and undistorted version of the testimony or opinion in any moment of the procedure, in which the need occurs.

In the case of the above grounds in the preparatory proceedings, the prosecutor shall make a reasoned request to the competent court to conduct a hearing in the mode specified in the article 185a code of criminal procedure. If the need appears only at the stage of judicial proceedings, the Court should issue the appropriate order in this matter.

In view of the above considerations the hearing of the minor shall remain valid. It should be noted that this provision does not apply to the witness who collaborated in the commitment of the offence - article 185b § 2 code of criminal procedure.

3.6. The participation of third parties in the hearing of a minor as a witness

Code of criminal procedure provides the matter of participation in the hearing of the minor issue of the third witness.

Article 171 § 3 code of criminal procedure allows the possibility of "hearing the person who has not completed 15 years in the presence of a legal representative or guardian, unless the good of the process is not endangered.” The principle is to hear such a person in the presence of such third parties, and only exceptionally can be waived from it and it is only because of the good of the ongoing proceedings. It should be noted here, that this provision does not order to hear the minor witness in the presence of a third party, but only allows such a possibility. The presence of parents in the hearing stems from the article 171 section 3 Code of Criminal Procedure and a moral right to care, as well as the regulations contained in the article. 95 section 1 of the family code (it states the principle that the child remains under the keeping of parents). This means that while calling a minor for being heard as a witness, his parents or guardians, under whose keeping the child remains, should be called too.

The participation of the legal representative or the actual guardian is limited to the presence at the hearing; his role is passive. However, there are no obstacles for the authority that conducts the hearing to approve asking questions, as this could help to explain the circumstances of the case. He can be present for the entire hearing, as well as in parts of it. The last situation may take place when in the course of the hearing, it appears that the presence of a legal representative or guardian actually affects the course of the hearing or when in its ongoing run without the presence of that person proves that her presence is desirable<sup>75</sup>.

4. The principle of the good of the child

In accordance with the opinion of the Supreme Court concluded in its judgment of 1 February 2008<sup>76</sup> it should be considered that the principle of the good of the child is on the ground of procedural law, can suffer limitations in the event of circumstances covered by the disposition of the article. 185a § 1 code of criminal procedure states that the re-hearing of the child is not dependent on the opinion of a psychologist as to the possibility of obtaining certain information from the child and the impact on his psyche. The primacy of the good of the child is provided by the directive of article 185a § 1 Code of Criminal Procedure by the introduction of a single hearing rules, as well as by the same way its conduct.

The most important legal regulations relating to the implementation of the principle of the good of the child are included in the following article:

- article 171 § 3 Code of Criminal Procedure - hearing the minor, who has not completed 15 years old as a witness in the presence of a legal representative,
- article 185a Code of Criminal Procedure, which introduced an exception for minor victims to be heard once
- article 185b Code of Criminal Procedure which introduced the possibility to hear minor witness on the principles referred to in article 185a code of criminal procedure.

It is worth to note at this point, that the police in order to increase the effectiveness of their activities and exchange valuable ways of carrying out various activities created The Bank of Good Practice, which consists of the rules of good practice, to which the officers have access. In the Bank you can also find information and tips on criminal proceedings involving a minor.

An NGO, the Nobody's Children Foundation has developed a so called "Standards for the interrogation of minor witnesses according to article 185a and 185b code of criminal procedure". The document was a recommendation from the Ministry of Justice, which promotes and distributes these standards.

5. An adhesive action (adhaeret causae criminali)

Following legal remedies can be used to investigate civil claims: adhesive action and application for judgment action to repair the damage on the basis of the article 46 of the Penal Code. The victim has the permission of the investigation of damages from the offender in the situation, when he suffered the injury as a result of an offence. In the case of crimes of a sexual nature this institution is not used often, however, because of its legal importance it will be briefly described in this chapter.

5.1. Notification of the action

A civil action may be notified in the preparatory proceedings. This notification shall be attached to the files of the case, but ultimately the act of its acceptance or rejection is done by the court when it obtains the indictment together with the acts of the pre-trial investigation. Provision on the acceptance of the request is done by the Court after receiving the indictment, but the day of notifying the action is believed to be the day of the submission of the action. Civil action in the criminal process may be notified not later than at the beginning of the trial - article 62 Code of Criminal Procedure. The term cannot be restored. Non-notification of the civil action in this particular period loses this permission at a later stage of the proceedings. The notification shall be effected by the deposit of the petition action.

5.2. Legitimation to sue

Adhesive action can be submitted not only by the victim, but also, in specific situations can be submitted by the closest person to the victim, the social insurance company in so far as the damage was repaired, the State control authorities or the Prosecutor acting on behalf of the victim. The legal representative of a minor can also submit an adhesive action on behalf of a minor.

5.3. The civil action left without consideration

There are cases when the court hearing the criminal case, although the lawsuit meets the formal requirements, refuses to accept a civil action. This occurs when: the action is unacceptable because of particular regulations, the claim has no direct connection with the charges of the indictment and does not result directly from the committed offence, an action was brought by an unauthorized person, the same claim is the subject of another investigation or the claim has been legally ordered, the state, municipal or social institute participated in the offence or with a person who is not accused, or the application to repair the damage was submitted.

If the application complies with the formalities and any of the circumstances mentioned above does not occur, the Court shall order the adoption of a civil action. However, if any of the circumstances reveals in the later stage of the proceedings, the Court has a duty to leave the action without consideration.

5.4. Transfer of the lawsuit to the competent civil court

In case of leaving the action without consideration, a person who has filed it may within 30 days from the date of refusal or of leaving the civil action without consideration, may claim to the court competent to request the transfer of civil recognition, for the day of the claim is considered the day of the submission of the lawsuit in the criminal proceedings. After the transfer of the claim to the court hearing civil cases, the plaintiff must pay the cost. In addition, in the event of a failure to indict because of pre-trial relief or its suspension, the injured party, within 30 days from the date of service of the mandatory time provisions may require the transfer of the case to the court competent to hear civil cases. If the victim does not request within this period, a lawsuit submitted before does not have legal effects and to enforce their claims in civil proceedings a separate legal action must be lodged.

5.5. The content of the claim

Only claims arising directly from the crime can be claimed in the adhesive action process – compensation for the injury and reparation for the moral harm. It is allowed to claim actual losses (damnum emergens) and lost benefits (lucrum cessans), since the Act does not make restrictions in this respect. But it is not possible to claim personal. You cannot claim protection of personal goods – article 24 of the c.c.

5.6. A decision issued by the Court after the investigation

It should be stressed that a necessary condition to settle the suit by the Court, is the conviction. Given the above, the Court may: take the action into account, take action into account in part and dismiss the rest, take the action into account in part and leave the rest without consideration or dismiss the action in its entirety.

The Court will take into account the civil action in the criminal judgment in whole or in part, if it will make sense in the light of the collected evidence and established the basics facts. Otherwise it will be dismissed. If the circumstances of the adhesive action do not allow the court to judge the claim or results in prolixity of the criminal proceedings - the Criminal Court leaves an action without consideration. If the person awarded against a civil action or imposed the obligation to repair the damage in the parts do not cover the entire damage, the entitled person can assert additional claims in civil proceedings.

In the case of the dismissal of the civil action by the criminal court also in parts, it results in res judicata and it is not possible to assert claims again before the Court<sup>77</sup>.

3.2 Complaint Procedure

Remedy at law is defined as legal remedy predicted by the law of criminal proceedings, which provides an opportunity to adduce procedural decision decision by submitting this decision to control of procedural authority, illeglize the decision or demanding the control diverse from the authority's procedural document. There are two types of remedies of law:

ordinary and extraordinary remedies. The most popular legal remedies are: środki odwoławcze (legal remedies) such as apelacje (appeals) and zażalenia (appeals).

We are given the opportunity to lodge an appeal against the sentence of the appellate court, which serves as the control. Parties in criminal proceedings such as: defendant, public prosecutor, auxiliary prosecutor, private prosecutor, civil plaintiff have the authorisation to lodge the appeal. The party which appeals against the sentence may demand its control in terms of law and actual state of affairs. The basis of appealing can be the following:

- contempt of substantive law
- contempt of legal proceedings, whether the impact on the essence in a sentence is possible
- mistakes in establishing the actual state of affairs, which became the basis of the sentence, whether they could have an influence on the sentence
- considerable disparity of penalty

Moreover, the apelacja (appeal) may contain of the whole range of accusations, which cannot be included in the zażalenie (appeal).

The court of appeal adjudicate in terms of remedies, which means that the court has to allow the direction of the appeal (in advantage or disadvantage of the accused) and its scope (challenging the whole sentence or a particular excerpt of the sentence). The court of appeal can uphold, repeal the challenged sentence (than the case is directed to a judicial review or the proceedings are discontinued) or if only the collected evidence is sufficient, the court can even change the verdict, but it will be never powerful enough to sentence the accused, who has been acquitted by the Court of First Instance. In case of re-examination, the Court of First Instance has to allow the instructions and legal opinions of the Appellate Court. The Court does not collect evidence unless the procedure should be accelerated.

It should be considered that an appeal must be prepared and written by an advocate. A term during which the appeal should be lodged is 14 days long dating from servicing a verdict and justification.

Another remedy is zażalenie (appeal), which is used to appeal against orders and decisions.

According to the rules of criminal proceedings we have a legal right to lodge an appeal against the decisions of a court which terminate legal proceedings, protecting measures and any other legal decisions. Hereinabove is entitled to the parties of proceedings and persons.

The appeal could relate to a stay of proceedings, treatment in a psychiatric hospital or extending the period of treatment, decision of keeping witness' personal data in strict confidence. We can lodge the appeal against the decisions prepared by the prosecutor, advocate or attorney at law terminating the procedure. The appeal does not suspend the implementation of the decision. The court which issued the decision or has been appointed to consider it has the power to retain the implementation of the decision. However, cancelling hereinafter does not require justification. The decision against which the appeal has been lodged may be considered by the court composed of the same judges who issued that. In any other case the president of the court forwards the appeal, case files and its duplicates immediately to the court in charge of considering the appeal. Whether the appeal refers to a remand or security on property it should be forwarded in 48 hours.

Parties, advocates and agents have the legal right to attend the session of the appellate court considering the appeal against the decision concluding the procedure and against arrest. They have also the hereinabove right, if they could attend the session of the court of first instance. In any other situation the appellate court can give permission to parties, advocate or agent to attend the session

From the date of the decision we are given 7 days for lodging appeal.

Cassation is an exceptional sort of remedies. It is regulated precisely by the Criminal Proceedings Code. That is why it can be used only in situations which meet legal conditions.

Cassation (appeal) can be also lodged against the sentence of the court of second instance finishing the whole procedure. It is lodged to the Supreme Court of Poland through the agency of the appellate court. The reason for lodging the appeal may be a striking breach of the law, if this could have a negative impact on the content of the sentence. Other reasons may be the following flaws:

- Unauthorised, incapable or excluded person took part in a decision process,
- The court was staffed in an inappropriate way or there was an absence of a judge during the proceedings.
- One of the common courts adjudicated a case which was due for a particular court and whether a particular court adjudicated a case due for a common court.
- The court adjudicated a penalty, a penal measure or protective measures which was unknown by the law

- The decision was ruled with the violation of the majority rule or was not signed by any of the ruling judges,
- There is a logical contradiction in the decision
- The decision was ruled despite the fact that criminal proceedings concerned the same person were legally finished
- the accused died
- The case was barred by limitation
- The perpetrator is not a subject to the Polish jurisdiction
- There was not an action brought by the prosecutor against the decision
- The permit for investigation or motion for prosecuting was not issued by entitled person unless the act provides otherwise.
- Other circumstances occurred that disable investigation
- The accused did not have an advocate or the advocate was not attending mandatory sessions
- The decision was issued under the absence of the accused while his attendance was mandatory.

It needs to be said that the basis of the appeal (cassation) cannot be disproportion of penalty. The appeal has to clarify the flaw. The appeal could be lodged by The Public Prosecutor General, The Chief Military Prosecutor, The Polish Ombudsman and The Children's Ombudsman. It should satisfy requirements of legal acts and must be prepared or written by the agent who needs to be an attorney at law or a solicitor.

The term for lodging an appeal is 30 days starting from the date of servicing decision and the explanation.

Representation of children's interest

Code of Criminal Procedure provides the situation in which the interest of a child are represented by a legal agent and a person who is in charge of caring for the child constantly. The essence of the agency is undertaking actions with the result for the represented person.

A statutory representative is a person who represents a child not only because of his/her willingness to help but also by virtue of law. According to The Family and Guardianship Code, child's parents have the role of his/her legal agents. While the child is under the authority of the parents it can be represented by both of them.

While the agents' actions are conflicting child's interests the decision is issued by the guardianship court that issues the decisions in favor of the child's good.

While one of the parents has committed crime on a child under his legal authority or is expected by the court not to meet the agent's obligations referring to the child, the court designates a curator who has legal right to represent the child's interests. The Supreme Court emphasizes that the number of curators should be close to the number of children that need legal representation.

A person who constantly takes care for the child may become his/her legal agent. The legal premise considers only a constant and indivisible custody. The custody during certain periods of time is viewed as insufficient for gaining the position of legal agent. All premises must be examined before establishing the guardianship.

According to the research done by the „Dzieci niczyje” Foundation the guardianship in criminal proceedings should be seen from more critical perspective. The majority of the children was represented by one of the parents not having mentioned the situations in which the parent was expected to be guilty for the crime committed on his child. In almost half of the situations a parent has lived with the injured child.

According to the survey the law institution of a curator hereinabove cases is used rarely by the proceedings authorities. Lack of using legal tools may affect the criminal proceedings and the child as well.

Passiveness of the agents during the criminal proceedings can raise doubts. The agents do not protect their charges effectively. The reason for this situation may be an insufficient legal knowledge. According to the research relating to the professional agents the injustice seems to be obvious. The number of actions conducted by legal agents in the accused cases in proportion to the children representation is 3:1.

It should be emphasized that despite the fact children have their constitutional rights, in many situations they are not respected by the state and children do not have a sufficient legal representation, because the institution of legal curator is used very rarely and children are not protected against the domestic violence in an effective way.

Taking hereinabove situations into consideration we should think over providing more comfortable access to cost free guardianship guaranteed by the state or organizing encounters with the lawyers during parent-teachers nights. It may have the influence on extending parents' and legal guardians' consciousness of breeding a child and the implementation of children's rights. Moreover, there should be special lessons about children's rights and guardianship. The education might prevent children from becoming injured.

4 COMPLEMENTARY MEASURES

i. Under the term of preventive measure we should understand all the legal instruments available in (criminal, civil and administrative) proceedings, aiming at making the accused or the suspected manipulating the direction of proceeding, means escape, hiding from the court or organs of prosecution impossible. In case of heavy crimes related to sexual abuse, the preventive measures may be used to prevent committing a crime again by the suspected. In the matter of crimes of sexual abuse of juveniles, the main aim of preventive measures is to prevent the suspected from further abuses or negative influence of the fact that the accused remains at large, as well as any kind of pressure on the victim and his surrounding, what would have an impact on the way of their cooperation with the organs of administration of justice. The Penal Code introduces division of preventive measures into two categories: isolating measures and unisolating measures.

1. Isolating measures

The provisional arrest is the most common isolating measure, which consists in placing the accused or the suspected of committing a crime of sexual abuse in the certain place and isolating him from the outside world. About the provisional arrest decides the court on the motion of prosecutor. The provisional arrest prevents from intimidation, which often leads to resignation from fight of punishing the propagator.

Article 258 of the Code of Criminal Proceeding defines the prerequisites for provisional arresting, underlining the term “huge probability”, that the perpetrator has committed a crime of sexual abuse against children, stated on the basis of the already collected proves in the case concerned. The adverb “huge” can be interpreted as “probability verging on confidence of fault and cause”. Provisional arrest does not refer to the situation, if use of any other measure is in certain case enough.<sup>78</sup>

2. Unisolative measures

Material surety (regulated in article 266 – 270 of the Code of Criminal proceeding) consists of folding of money, securities, deposits or mortgage as some kind of surety in case of escape, hiding or disturbing in criminal proceeding in another way by the accused. In case of escape or hiding, property law are the subject of forfeiture or raise, nevertheless, disturbing in criminal proceeding results with adjudication of forfeiture or raising of these rights.

Social surety is a kind of obligation of an object that the accused will appear on every calling and will not disturb at the proceeding in illegal way. The position of the surety must come from the party that takes it on, it can be e.g. defendant's employer or head of the school the defendant attends etc. The party which takes the social surety on lodges a motion with abstract of report including a resolution on taking on the surety and pointing the person and the duties, the defendant has to fulfill. In Polish legal system there is also a possibility of individual surety from the person which enjoys respect. The conditions are in this case similar to the conditions of social surety.<sup>79</sup>.

Another of preventive measures, applied in case of sexual abuse against children is surveillance, which consists of putting the defender under the surveillance of police and obliging him to fulfill the duty of decision of court of prosecutor (article 275 KPK). The defender under the police surveillance must not leave the place of stay concerned, must appear at the organ of surveillance in certain moments, informing the organ about planned leaving and time of coming back, must not contact with the victim or other people concerned.<sup>80</sup>.

b) The warrant of leaving the living space

The warrant of leaving by the defender the living space (article 275a KPK) is applied in case of crimes committed with use of force against a person living together with the perpetrator in a living space if there is huge probability that the crime might be committed against a juvenile. In preparatory proceeding the measure is used for the period of time no longer than 3 months.<sup>81</sup>.

c) Suspension in job activities or occupying a position or prohibition of doing certain business

In case of sexual abuse against juveniles, the measure is related to teachers and other workers of education system, people having in their work contact with children, workers of public healthcare services. The measure isolates the perpetrator from the victim and other children and protects from committing the crime once again. It serves also building the trust to the professionals working with children. The measure isolates the people, who committed the crime of sexual abuse from working with them by not allowing them to have contact with juveniles, because they lost the confidence in the matter of jobs ethics. The Code does not define the timeframes of the measure and the ways of prolonging it. Due to its severity, the time of it is always defined in advance, what can be done by the court or the prosecutor.<sup>82</sup>.

d) Prohibition of leaving state

The greatest aim of prohibition of leaving the state (article 277 KPK) as a preventive measure is precluding the perpetrator from escaping from the state. It is often connected with invalidating the passport or another document entitling to crossing the boarder or prohibition of issuing such document. The organ conducting the proceeding can from the moment of issuing the decision about the subject of the matter detain the document, but no longer than 7 days.

Invalidation of a passport or an another document entitling to leaving the state is done by the passport office on the basis of article 39 passage 1 and article 38 passage 1 of the act on passports and documents related on motion of the court that conducts the proceeding against the accused. In the matter of time limits, the rules of article 35 § 3 is applicable.

iv. The Polish rules of Penal Code separates two basic kinds of protective measures. For predicating protective measures it is not necessary to prove the guilt and bigger social noxiousness. The relevant feature is in this case the danger for the legal order, which the perpetrator caused with his act. Generally speaking, the aim of the measure is to secure the society and the juvenile victim from the perpetrator.

1. Protective measures of healing

The first group of protective measures regulated by the Polish PENAL CODE are measures healing, regulated in 94 § 1 KK, 95 § 1 KK, 95a and 96 § 1 KK.

- placing the perpetrator of a crime committed in the insanity in psychiatric hospital
- placing the perpetrator of a crime committed in the limited insanity in a penitentiary, where the special healing and re-medial measures are used
- placing the perpetrator in isolated penitentiary or referring him to ambulatory treatment in case of imprisonment with no stay of the carrying out of a sentence for a crime against sexual freedom, committed as a result of disorders of sexual preferences

The additional condition of using protective measures with healing character, consisting of placing the perpetrator in a close penitentiary and referring him to the ambulatory treatment is the fact, that the use of the measure is necessary to prevent the perpetrator from committing the crime related to the disorders of sexual preferences. The used in article 93 KK term „only when” underlines, that the close imprisonment has special character, and obliges the adjudicating court to act with special caution. Article 93 KK makes the decision of placing the perpetrator in close imprisonment dependent on the obligatory hearing of psychologist's and (at least two) psychiatrists.

The Penal Code determinates in article 94 § 1 the legal basis of obligatory placing the perpetrator of a crime related to the sexual abuse against juvenile in the rights mental hospital, which in this case is appreciable social noxiousness of an act and high probability, that the perpetrator will commit the crime once again. The act does not regulate the time of stay in a mental hospital, nevertheless article 94 § 2 obliges the courts to release perpetrator if the longer time of stay in a mental hospital is not necessary anymore.

The court should take into account the probability if the perpetrator can commit the crime again. The lack of duty of defining the length of stay in mental hospital in advance is the reason for permanent and systematic control of the progress in treatment. The courts, basing on the reports on the psychiatric health of perpetrator made once on 6 months by the head of the close penitentiary (article 206 KKW), are obliged to decide about the further stay in close penitentiary (article 204 KKW). The decision releasing the perpetrator is made by the court on the basis of psychiatrists' and psychologists' opinion after the head's notification of lack of reasons for further stay in the imprisonment.

There is also possibility of facultative placing of the perpetrator of a crime of sexual abuse against juveniles in the situation, when the crime has been committed in insanity or the perpetrator has already been sentenced to imprisonment with no stay of the carrying out of a sentence (article 95 § 1 KK). The perpetrator in that case serves the sentence and is put on a treatment.

Placing the perpetrator in the close penitentiary or referring he to ambulatory treatment was introduced into the Polish Penal Code in 2005. The measure is adjudicated facultatively in case of sentence on imprisonment with no stay of the carrying out of a sentence or committing a crime related to disorders of sexual preferences. There is also possibility of obligatory adjudication of the measure.

The treatment comprises pharmacological or psychiatric therapy aiming at elimination of disorders and preventing from committing the crime again. The condition for treatment based on pharmacological measures is the lack of contraindications for using it. The time of treatment depends on the progress in healing.

2. Preventive administrative measures

In case of administrative measures, the Penal Code defined them in art 99 and 100. The measures are used in case of committing crimes in insanity, small social noxiousness, discontinuance of criminal proceedings or if there are some additional reasons excluding punishing of the perpetrator. In case of the crimes of sexual abuses against juveniles, there are used following measures:

- prohibition of occupying certain posts, doing certain job and conducting a certain kind of business;
- prohibition of conducting a business related to educating, healing, teaching of juveniles and taking care of them;
- obligation of refraining from staying in certain places, prohibition of contacting with certain people or prohibition of leaving the place of stay without permission of a court;
- forfeiture

In case of prohibition of doing a certain job or conducting a certain business related to education, healing and teaching of juveniles or taking care of them, the obligation of refraining from staying in certain places, contacting with certain people or prohibition of leaving the place of stay without court's permission, the court can adjudicate the measure if the perpetrator commits the crime in insanity consisting of disability of varying the meaning of the committed crime or controlling his behaviour due to mental disease, handicap of other disorder of psychological activity, and the use of a measure is necessary because of the protection of the legal order.

The forfeiture is adjudicated when the perpetrator committed a crime in insanity and could not have control his behaviour due to mental disease, handicap or other disorder of psychological activity, the social noxiousness is small, there is conditional stay of the carrying out of a proceeding and there are circumstances excluding punishing the perpetrator. The adjudication of forfeiture as a preventive measure aims at protecting the society from another violation of the public order by the perpetrator and strengthening the feeling of social justice<sup>83</sup>.

III Assistance to victims

At the moment there are many associations in Poland providing the victims of the sexual abuses some psychological support and therapy helping them to deal with the affects of traumas lived in the times of their childhood. One of the best – known initiatives is association Koniec Milczeni (The End of Silence) which consists of therapists, lawyers and other people offering help to the victims of sexual abuse and supporting them in re-building the feeling of their self – confidence and dignity.

1. Legal position of victim of sexual abuse

In Polish legal system there is a document called the Charter of the Victim's Rights, comprising also the regulation of the victims of sexual abuse. Its supreme aim is protection of the victim's good, with special attention on the juvenile victims. The Charter is result of many documents guaranting the entity the respect for his rights and duties. Article 12 of the Charter regulates the issue of sexual abuse in detailed way: „The victims of sexual abuse shall be heard by the police officers of the same gender, and if the victim is a child, the hearing shall take place with presence of psychologist or a person the child trusts”, what aims at strengthening the position of a child as a victim of witness, whose already hurt psycho should not be ballasted with stressing experiences related to the hearing. The Charter is on the basis for some claims on the person conducting the proceeding and not – proceeding activities in the situation, when his duties against heard child and not being fulfilled.<sup>84</sup>

The Charter of the Rights of a Child as the Withness of a Crime is unbinding document elaborated by the experts of the foundation Dzieci Niczyje (Nobody's Children), which comprises detailed directives for the way of conducting the hearing and underlines the parts of proceeding, where the good of a child should be protected in a special way. The patronage over the document takes the Minister of Justice. The Charter is addressed to the organs of justice and the helping institution and highlights the importance of the highest value which is the good of a child during the proceeding<sup>85</sup>.

The Charter is the effect of national initiative of the Foundation Nobody's Children in frames of the programm „A Child – the Withness of the Special Care” for the respect of children's rights in the proceeding of hearings and unifying the practice of treating the children harmed or being the victims of the sexual abuse. In the programm there are organized several seminars for the workers of organs of justice, lobbying actions for creating legal regulation concerning the children – friendly ideas of friendly hearing and establishing of Coalition for Children – Friendly Hearing of Children.<sup>86</sup>

2. Adhesion claim as special institution of criminal proceedings

The adhesion claim is a special legal measure for civil claims in criminal proceeding. Art, 62 KPK states, that the harmed person can till the moment of beginning of the legal proceeding in the main trial bring a civil action of against the accused to assert a claim answing from property rights which result directly from committing of a crime. The current regulation enable vindication of claims relates to the material damages (property damages and lost benefits) and compensation of moral injury. In both of situation the claims must stay in a close relation with already committed crime. The claim must be brought by the person entitled, so in case of juveniles – parents or commitee. The adhesion claim can be brought only and exclusively against the acussed person or people.

Article 69a KPK states, that the criminal court deciding about the criminal liability in the crime concerned has also the jurisdiction in cases for property claims referring to the crime. This principle is also applicable in case of prosecutor in preparatory proceeding at securing the civil claim.<sup>87</sup>

3. Telephone Line of Trust for Children and Teenagers

Another step for help the victims is national Line of Trust for Children and Teenagers as a free of charge and anonymous line ensuring the highest level of discretion of talks seven days a week under the phone number 116 111. The line has been established as a part of European initiative of the European Commission and should be activated in every Member State of the EU. In Poland it was introduced in 2008 by the Ministry of Internal Matters and Administration and the President of the Office of Digital Communication.<sup>88</sup> At the moment it is led by the Foundation Dzieci Niczyje (Nobody's Children) as an element of realisation of the national policy of protection of children's rights.

Currently the line is a part of a program named „116 111”, addresses to children and teenagers as well as to adults and aims at helping young people in difficult situations, also the ones related to sexual abuses. The program comprises education of juveniles and their surroundings in the area of their own rights and the ways of exercising them.

3. The institution of Ombudsman for Children's Rights

The institution playing crucial role in the area of protection of rights of children as victims or witnesses of the crimes of sexual abuse is the Ombudsman for Children's Rights, who is the one-person constitutional institution, whose main task is to undertake all the necessary steps towards ensuring every child balanced conditions of upbringing in respect with its dignity and subjectivity (see: art 3, act on the Ombudsman for Children's Rights) and protection of a child from any forms of violence, cruelty, abuse, as well as demoralisation and inattention.

The aim of creating this apolitical and independent organ was improving of the system of the protection of children's rights in Poland, According to the act on the Ombudsman for Children's Rights the actions related to the protection of children's good can be undertaken only on his own initiative basing on the information about certain problem, which prove the violation of the children's right. He can also, using available legal possibilities, deal with individual cases.

The activity of the RPD concentrates on addressing to the organs of public administration, institutions and organisations to give explanation and necessary information on the particular subject and making the files and documents accessible for him. RPD can also ask the organisations, organs and institutions (including Ombudsman) to undertake the rights activities for the protection of children's right, intensifying the works aiming at adapting Polish law to the international standards. According to article 72 passage 4 of the Constitution the right to ask to RPD has every citizen of Poland, legal person and organisational entity without legal personality if according to these principles it can be subject of rights and duties or organisation of citizens or organ of city/ town government, The addressees of RPD's actions are all the organs of public administration (e.g. Sejm, Senat, President of Poland, Government, courts), city/ town governments, government's institutions and NGOs<sup>89</sup>.

III NATIONAL POLICY REGARDING CHILDREN

i. The problem of sexual abuse of children is the most shocking one regarding public opinion; tolerance against such abuse is marginal. For example in Polish prisons adults who had sexually abused children have the lowest position. For that reason prison authorities are forced to assign them separate cells and supply restricted contact with other prisoners. If not, the prison society can endanger children abusers with humiliating and inhumane treatment. Discussions on the internet fora show the difference of opinions concerning that subject. Some of the people think that punishments imposed on such criminals are way too little and the persecution which they experience during the stay in prison is completely deserved. Others bring up humane values and claim that the abusers are treated in Polish prison as dehumanized creatures.<sup>90</sup>

As for the public debate about children's sexual exploitation – that topic used to be extremely popular in the mass media in the beginning of the previous decade. Data contained in dr Monika Sajkowska's study 'Messages in the mass media concerning children's sexual exploitation' (FDN) demonstrate an interesting phenomenon concerning rapid rise of the average number of article related to this subject in Polish press throughout 2000 – 2004. Till year 2003 this number had been staying on quite low level but with a tendency to slow growth (beginning from 49 article in 2000 to 138 article in 2003). But the most rapid growth taken place in 2004. From January till September 2004, 711 articles were published in press. We have to pay attention to the fact that press has been interested in the most shocking cases of children's sexual exploitation: by catholic priests, for commercial use and child pornography in the internet.

Undoubtedly there is a good aspect of the growth of such topics in press, namely: the disclosure of such social problem by the media. Unfortunately, so called 'media facts' started to become a weapon in political intrigues; for example – numerous references to the children's sexual abuse by priests is a serious attack of left-wing parties on the Polish right-wing political parties for whom Catholic Church is an authority. Of course, among these reports there are unfortunately reliable facts based entirely on the truth. However, dominant part of these reports is not focused on diagnosing the problem and solving it with the means of law, but on the creation of false image of certain people or groups of people (more in chapter IV).

Manipulation of sexual abuse topic in political games caused marginalisation of it as so called 'media facts' domain. Monica Sajkowska (FDN) has summarised it marvellously: Image of the problem that is presented by the press takes into consideration mostly the most invasive forms of children's sexual exploitation simultaneously marginalising including children in such sexual activities of adults as touching, persuading to watch pornography, exhibitionism. Ipso facto media messages favour narrow definition of sexual exploitation and can in some degree preserve social disorientation considering occurrence, harmfulness and classification of less drastic forms of sexual contacts with children.<sup>91</sup>

Serious political debate has started in Poland back in May 2012. It was connected with MPs' project of Penal Code novelization that was being prepared after Agata Baraniecka-Klos's case exposure.<sup>92</sup> After 30 years of silence she had submitted in public prosecutor's office notification of being perpetrated with a criminal offence – sexual harassment. That project is suggesting a change that is abolishment of prescription children's sexual exploitation and incest crimes. It is a brave suggestion taking into consideration the fact that for now the only crime that is not affected by prescription in Polish criminal law is genocide. Currently binding article 101 § 4 determines that prescription of the crimes defined in article 199 § 2 and 3, article 200, article 202 § 2 and 4 and furthermore article 204 § 3 as well as crimes defined in article 197, article 201, article 202 § 3, article 203 and article 204 § 4 when disadvantaged is juvenile cannot occur during 5 years from achieving of the juvenile the age of 18.<sup>93</sup> It is quite a sensible solution. Firstly, to 'make the first step' and submit notification of a perpetration of a criminal offence, the victim of sexual exploitation as a child needs some time to become independent – financially, emotionally – from his/her persecutor. It is a frequent situation that the oppressor is someone from the family. 75% of the victims know the perpetrator. Most of such crimes take place at home – almost 3000 cases – when other places like: school, street, meadow, orphanage, forest – never reach number higher than 330 cases. On the other hand, the longer is the period of preparatory proceedings commence after the crime commitment, the more difficult is to find evidences. Therefore extension of the prescription period or even its abolishment won't cause detection of the criminal in all cases submitted. Other issue, also problematic, is penalization's expiration. One can assume that legislator will consider with difficulties abolishment of incest and paedophilia's prescription. It seems justifiable to extend this period to 20 or 30 years as to provide the victim with actual possibility of commencing the proceedings. On the other hand there are heard some proposals about shortening of prescription period to 5-10 years but counted from victim's coming of age.

On the other hand, longer period of preparatory proceedings starting from the moment of committing a crime – the bigger difficulties to prove one's statements. Prolonging of limitation or getting rid of it, does not mean that in all cases the perpetrator will be detected. Another matter, also problematic is the time of the punishment, which is also subject to the statute of limitations.

We can suppose that the legislator will have huge difficulties with eliminating expiration of pedophilia and incest, but prolonging of period of expiration to 20 or even 30 years in order to enable the victim the real possibility of starting the proceeding is justifiable. On the other hand, there is a proposal of shortening the time of expiration to 5 – 10 years, but starting with the moment of reaching the age of 18 by the victim.

The project, supported by the party Ruch Palikota, was consulted in social forum, and it is supposed that it will be let to the first reading in Sejm before 2012. The members of parliament of various parties say, that Polish law does not guarantee sufficient protection of victims of sexual violence.<sup>94</sup>

Another controversial problem was raised before, during the debate regarding idea of novelization of the Penal Code, to be more precise – of introducing in 2005 article 106a which regulates in some cases lack of possibility of the cover up of conviction (erasure from Register of Convictions) for the crime against sexual freedom if the victim was juvenile under the age of 15. According to prof. Monika Platek, the novelization is justified with the need for better protection of juveniles from pedophilia.<sup>95</sup> The solution is controversial: there is a variance with principle of humanitarianism, because even the people sentenced for work imprisonment sentence have the chance for erasure of conviction – 10 years after recognizing it as executed.<sup>96</sup>

To sum up, we can say that the political discussion on the subject of protection of children and victims of sexual crimes exists when it is initiated by the society. Maybe more intensive strategic litigation, focused on juvenile victims of sexual abuse would attract the attention of more important number of people.

ii. The official website of Ministry of Justice (www.ms.gov.pl) offers a lot of helpful information regarding sexual abuse of children and the society can find some tips, where to find certain activities of the state. In 2009 in the network of Department of Human Rights has been created the Department of Group for Combating Violence in Family. This is special governmental unit dealing with children – victims of crimes. We can say that Ministry of Justice together with the above mentioned Department is a public partner of the discourse on the subject of human rights in Poland.

Except that, Ministry of Justice established a special internet portal www.pokrzywdzeni.gov.pl, where people can find some information about rights of the people affected by crime, Homes of Help for People Affected by Crime, „Information for Victim” and data base of institutions and non-governmental organizations offering victims of crimes psychological support and legal information. The addressees of the website are society and professionals.

The structure of partnership of NGO is more complicated; the best – known subjects of the 3rd sector dealing with the criminality among children are: Foundation „Dzieci Niczyje” (Nobody’s Children), Helsinki Foundation for Human Rights, Committee for Protection of Children Rights. At the beginning of 2011 over 20 subjects dealing with raising awareness on the matter of violence against children united to establish National Partnership for Protecting Children from Violence. In June the organization appealed for improving children's protection from violence.

A) Social campaigns– raising awareness of the society

The campaign was led by Foundation Dzieci Niczyje and Ombudsman for Children's Rights. It was addressed to parents and teachers, aiming at making the society aware, that the problem of sexual abuse appears in every social group, not only dregs of society. The idea has its reflection in the motto of the campaign „The hurt children want to be invisible” which shows the level of social awareness of children problems, which should have, regardless of the social status. The campaign has its own website and various educational materials, sketches of the seminars, leaflets.

2. Child in the Net The next program is released by the Foundation Dzieci Niczyje. There are two target groups:

a) Children

Some time ago all Poland knew the characteristic dialogue, taken originally from internet chat: „Hi, I am Anna, I am 12 years old. I want to make friends. - Hi, I am Wojtek, I am 12 too. You never know, who is on the other side.” The message of the slogan is to make children aware of anonymity of the internet users and make them less trustful towards the new mates from chat rooms.

b) “Every movement in the internet leaves a trace. Exploitation of children in internet is a crime punished with imprisonment”. The slogan of campaign aims at raising adults' awareness, who could eventually commit a crime of sexual abuse against children in internet, of legal consequences of making internet – friends. The detection of such crimes rises constantly.

3. Campaign „Nie przegraj! (Don't lose!) is a campaign promoted during Euro 2012 against commercial abuse of children, organized by Ministry of Computerization, Ministry of National Education, the Police, the Main Office of Police, The Voivod of Mazowsze. The campaign comprises materials for teachers: 3 scripts of lessons, films with other children's stories, poster „You are priceless”.

Before the campaign, in summer 2011 there was a research which resulted with a raport, available on the website of Foundation Dzieci Niczyje in Polish and Ukrainian language. The results of the research are not ravishing: although 48% of Polish juveniles consider prostitution or sponsoring as a real problem, the Poles are not aware of legal regulation of the problem. To conclude, although the attitude to the problem is rights, without legal knowledge we get rid of possibility of combating the crimes, which are committed in our society.<sup>97</sup>

4. The helpline „Niebieska Linia” („Blue Line”)

This is national helpline for the victims of violence in families, established as initiative of the National Agency for Solving the Alcoholism Problems (PARPA – Państwowa Agencja Rozwiązywania Problemów Alkoholowych) and the Main Police Office in Poland. The addressees are victims, perpetrators and witnesses of home violence and works since 3rd July 1995. „Niebieska Linia” offers psychological support to the calling people, psychological and legal advisory on combating violence in family, education about the phenomenon of violence and alcoholism, motivating to taking an action aiming at stopping violence in family, whose addressees are every places which have contact with violence in families and intervention in certain institutions. The workers of the helpline must have a higher degree in Pedagogics and Psychology and, additionally, they are educated on criminal, civil and family law.

B) Raising awareness among professionals working with sexually abused children

1. National Conference on Helping Children – Victims of Crimes; *Ogólnopolska Konferencja Pomocy Dzieciom – Ofiarom Przestępstw

The Conference has taken place every year in October for 9 years by now, there are usually 55 participants. The organizers are: Ministry of Justice, Foundation Dzieci Niczyje and the City Council of Warsaw. The main subject is usually protection of children from violence, and protection of the rights of children who are, for various reasons, participants of criminal proceedings. During the conference the results of the latest empirical and theoretical research and projects and initiatives of practical support for family experiencing home violence (especially children) are presented.

2. Certified rooms for hearings and campaign, „Child – a special care witness”

Campaign refers to especially difficult issue of hearing children, witnesses of sexual crimes, or home violence; its' aim is sharing knowledge about juvenile witnesses' rights, making various groups of professionals and justice administration aware of specific situation of a child in criminal proceeding.

The campaign is the result of activity of Coalition for Friendly Hearing of Children which was established on 22nd February 2007 during the Days of Victims of Crimes and was inspired by Foundation Dzieci Niczyje. Today the Coalition has 260 members.

The Coalition, apart from campaign, initiated good practice in Polish proceeding – rooms of hearing of children and proceeding of certifying such rooms. The standards of equipment and using of these rooms were elaborated in 2007; they consist of two neighboring rooms: room of hearing of a child – where a child is heard with presence of psychologist and judge and technical room – for other adults, participating in the proceeding (prosecutor, attorney). In technical room there are audio – video equipment, microphone and phones. The rooms can be divided with looking-glass. Nevertheless, if there is another possibility of observation from technical room (e.g. through the screen), the looking-glass is not needed. The main purpose concerning hearing room is making it cozy – but not too childish (because there are also older children heard), colorful – but in calm colors, rather bright, not too much furniture and toys (it is important to hide and take out a toy only in necessity and only some of them must be in the reach of children's sight; it is also relevant to make place not only for the youngest, but for the older children as well, e.g. two kinds of tables, two kinds of chairs.<sup>9899</sup>

iii. The statistics are made; regularly updated and published on the official website of Polish Police. The data received between 2007 – 2011 show, that the number of people affected by sexual abuse, including juveniles – is decreasing. In 2007 the number of affected was 11 597 people, 10 036 of them were the juveniles and 8 151 were victims of sexual exploitation by an adult person. In 2011 the statistics were 9 475 in general, 8 106 juveniles and 5 086 affected victims of sexual exploitation by adult person.<sup>100</sup>

The Police elaborated also statistical portrait of pedophile, basing on data from 2008<sup>101</sup> In most of cases it is liable man (in 2008 only 111 of suspected people were women and only 31 people were declared insane); 3 for 4 victims of these crimes know the perpetrator (in case of pedophilia the percentage is higher and it is 80%). While committing the crime they use dependence the victim on the perpetrator. The suspected of rape threaten their victim with a gun or other weapon, 21 times with a other dangerous tool, Most of suspected are unemployed or not-working and not-looking-for-a-job – 919 people, but there were also 651 pupils, 204 retired, 51 farmers, 42 students. 7% of suspects were previously punished for similar crimes. After detention and informing of the charges the court decided about temporary arrest in case of 1.038 suspected, of which in 203 cases the arrest was waived. These crimes are committed most often in a house or a flat – 2.727 crimes, but also in places like street – 327, primary and secondary school - 135, forest - 150.

According to the statistics published on the official website of Police, the number of detected crimes and initiated proceedings under article 202 § 1 – 3 of PENAL CODE is constantly decreasing. The data show that only in the period of 2007 – 2009 almost 25.000 juveniles were affected by sexual crimes, of whom:

- article 200 of the Penal Code (sexual abuse): about 6.000 to 8.000 juveniles
- article 197 of the Penal Code (rape): about 350 juveniles
- article 202 of the Penal Code (children pornography) : about 1000 juveniles

All in all, 2.800 suspected were finally charged with the legal consequences of their behaviors.<sup>102</sup>

Moreover, the data received in proceeding of the Blue Card, the freshest - from 2009, shows that the number of victims under the age of 13 is 27.000 people and number of victims in the age of 13 – 18: 14.000 people.<sup>103</sup>

iv. 1) Foundation Dzieci Niczyje (Nobody's Children)

On 17th January 2011 Foundation Dzieci Niczyje took a stand in public discussion initiated by Piotr Waglowski and Foundation Panoptykon on article 21 of the project of Directive of EU Council on combating exploitation of children for sexual purposes, sexual abuse and children pornography, published one year later by the European Commission. The Foundation is for obligatory character of the obligation of blocking internet websites including materials related to children pornography and formulated its statement in 5 points of report. Argumentation of Foundation is based mainly in claim of incorrect interpretation of freedom of speech and conviction of necessity of complex fight, which has been undertaken by Great Britain, Italy and Scandinavian states. The final voice of directive states the possibility, not the obligation of blocking such websites.<sup>104 105</sup>

2) Ombudsman for the Rights of a Child

In the same year 2012 there were several general performances of Mr. Marek Michalak, Ombudsman for the Rights of a Child, including 3 regarding violence against children.

On the 6th September 2012 he asked in a letter the Minister of Justice for the matter of releasing teacher Mariusz T. sentenced for imprisonment for killing children and pedophilia. The sentenced was bisexual and had tendency to pedophilia and deep psychopathology<sup>106</sup>. The Ombudsman thinks that resocialization of the sentenced, despite its length, can appear to be not enough and appeals to further consideration on the topic of some preventive and penitentiary actions. The Minister of Justice Jarosław Gowin has not answered to the letter yet.

On 27th July 2012 there was public hearing of Ombudsman for Children's Rights concerning the Blue Cards; proceeding elaborated by the the Main Police Office, Police Office for Warsaw, accompanied by National Agency for Solving the Alcoholism Problems for families affected with violence at home. The Ombudsman asked the authorities of doctors' council, appealing for activation of workers of health care in area of detecting and prevention from violence in families.<sup>107</sup>

He pointed out the legal instrument, novelisation of the act on combating violence in family, which states that the people who due to doing their job duties suspect committing a crime of use of violence pursued by the court, must immediately inform about it the prosecutor of police. The Blue Card, which police officers use during the intervention in case of violence at home, consists of two parts :

- Card A, which is a document of reported situation and place, as well as the action undertaken.
- Card B describing the most important crimes related to violence at home and contact data of institutions and non-governmental organization, the victim can ask for help.

The Card A is fulfilled by intervening officers (from police, public health services, commission for solving problems of alcohol). It is a document of medical intervention, related to violence and can be used as a proof in proceeding in the situation of pursuit. The Ombudsman appealed to doctors, life guards and nurses who, as people who can notice the signs of home violence as first, can give a prove by putting special note in Card A.

The proceeding of the Blue Cards has existed in Police for 12 years by now. During this periods – year by year – police officer protect from the violence 100 to 150 thousands of people. The most often they are women, but also children, even the youngest, who are also affected by violence.<sup>108</sup>

A month before, on 28th June 2012, the Foundation Dzieci Niczyje asked the Minstry of Labour and Social Policy to publish the information, if the nurses in nursery schools are obliged to complete the Cards A. It seems that the performance of the Ombudsman confirms the existence of the duty.

The President of Supreme Doctor's Council, Mr. Maciej Hamankiewicz has answered on the letter of the Ombudsman, confirming the necessity of the proceeding of the Blue Card and pointed out some lacking regulations, which should describe the duties of public health care in this area and underlined the need for organizing work time and system of salaries of doctors doing forensic examination of abused children. The regulation does not breach the rules of keeping doctors' secrecy, included in the act on profession of doctor from 1996. In principle, the doctor's secrecy has an absolute character; nevertheless it can be limited ex lege, ex voluntas (under the permission of a patient) or ex officio (under the consent of organ of public administration or another subject entitled). It can have in blanco character and must be revokable in every moment, because the patient is its exclusive manager of the information of doctor's secrecy. On the other hand, if the act allows doing so, the administrator of such information can be also the doctor, what is stated in article 40 of the above mentioned act, which points out that the doctor can be released from this duty of keeping secrecy can be harmful for patient's life or health.<sup>109</sup>

Another interesting performance of Ombudsman was the letter to Minister of Justice from 2nd April 2012 about novelization of article 205 of Penal Code in order to make the crimes against sexuality of juveniles (over 15 years old) possible to pursue in proceeding of public sue. The Ombudsman in his argumentation underlined the problem of financial or psychological dependence between the perpetrators and his victims. Unfortunately, the Minister has not answered on the letter yet.<sup>110</sup>

3) The National Partnership for Protection of Children against Violence

- Krajowe Partnerstwo na Rzecz Ochrony Dzieci przed Przemocą

On 31st May 2011 the association of more than 20 Polish organisations dealing with combating violence against children appealed to Minister of Justice, Krzysztof Kwiatkowski, to prepare complex reform of Polish law, due to ratification of Lanzarote Convention. The project from 1st December 2010, which included, inter alia, raising the age of protection of juveniles from 15 to 18 in case of crimes related to recording and storing pornographic materials, which executes the statements of the Convention partially.<sup>111</sup>

The non – governmental organizations and citizens in Poland have opportunity to speak up in legislator proceeding thank to the institution of public hearing, in which they can take part after filling the form available at the official website of Sejm (www.sejm.gov.pl).

On the official website of Sejm there is available a list of professionals in lobbying in Polish parliament. However, in general, there is a lack of children rights' lobbyists on Poland.

IV OTHER

I. Protection of adolescent against sexual abuse

Protection of adolescent from sexual abuse is not only the matter of a Penal Code, but it should be guaranteed by other branches of law as well, beginning with the Constitution, and ending with specialist medical law regulations. Aforementioned constitutional provisions seem to be restricted in many ways by detailed Acts, not always working to minors' benefit.

The first important matter is limitation contained in The Family and Guardianship Code as to the minor's possibility to decide about private and sexual life. The limitation is to protect all persons under the age of 18<sup>112</sup> with complete parental control. The only exception is when persons under the age of 17 become perpetrators of sex crimes and the State is obliged to initiate and conduct proceedings against them. The accused can be older than the injured party (Article 200 of the Penal Code) or younger (Article 199 § 3 of the Penal Code), which can be controversial.

The adult/minor threshold of 18 years of age comes from the C.C., where it means the end of being a minor. The term 'minor' is used frequently in the Penal Code in relation with sex crimes despite the fact the term is not precise. C.C. allows shortening the period, when a 16-year-old girl files a motion to the guardianship court to give her agreement for early marriage. If the court agrees and a girl enters into marriage, she is no longer a minor.

Lack of definition of 'minority' in the Penal Code may lead to situation in which such a woman will not be protected against sexual abuse, because she had entered into marriage.

The consequence of the Family and Guardianship Code is the Act of the Medical Doctor Profession and the Dentist, which limits the children's possibility to seek professional assistance and to protect their sex life, which protection is to be controlled by parents. The Act's provisions limit the possibility to gain information about physical health until turning 16 and impose a duty on a doctor to have parental agreement if he gives treatment to a person under the age of 18. It leads to situation in which constitutional privacy protection is far restricted and until turning 18 there is no free access to sexual counselling or medical remedies linked with sexual health. As the practice shows, victims' unawareness and their limited non-penal protection act in favour of perpetrators of sex crimes.

The aforementioned threshold of age implies also no possibility of filing a motion to prosecute on the basis of some Penal Code regulations, for instance if a victim of rape is a person under the age of 15. All the limitations arise due to conviction that children are asexual and chaste. The conviction is deeply rooted in Polish tradition and culture.

II. Access to sex education

The foundation for protection should be solid, comprehensive and corresponding to the age sex education, which task is to provide indispensable information not only as to sex and reproductive rights, but also as to basis of protection and possibility to counteract injury. However, Polish lawgiver decided to restrict youth's access to this knowledge by introducing a possibility of parental opposition as to child's participation in the class, recommending outdated books on medicine and sexology and by not controlling teachers conducting classes.

Making sex education optional significantly reduces minors' access to specialist and professional knowledge and advice, exposing them to potential injury arising from lack of skill at running own life well and from ignorance of all forms of protection provided by the State.

From what the PONTON sex educators in Poland report, it turns out that standard of teaching on classes on a subject 'Education to live in a family' and parental home sex education's standard are equally low<sup>113</sup>. Thus the main source of information for young people is the Internet and other contemporary media, presenting from time to time deformed view of reality. Lack of solid, special knowledge as a counterbalance may lead to acceptance of the view as just and universal. In this context such phenomena like children's prostitution in the form of sponsorship, early sex contacts with mature people or acceptance of sex relations based on violence have a different meaning, calling rather for educative measures than bringing to justice.

III. Challenges for the law from common access to the Internet

Rapid and dynamic development of telecommunication is now an increasing threat for normal sex development of youth. Access to pornography, unlimited possibilities of making friends, gaining information and the phenomenon of transferring one's identity from the real world to the virtual one, which are accompanied by deep feeling of anonymity, create new forms of delinquency more and more often mirrored in introduced regulations. But because of exceptional child's situation, both as a perpetrator and a victim of unwanted behaviour, it may turn out that penal act on telecommunication might cause more loss than benefit. However, raising problems like stalking, cyber bullying, sponsorship or sexting which join legal issues of the Penal Code, The Children (Criminal Proceedings) Act, but also family law, educational law and even medical law allows broader consideration of minor's interests in a criminal trial.

However, giving protection against sexual abuse is problematic when access to pornography (which often presents untrue vision of sexual relations) is so easy today. It is difficult to interpret a pop-up message saying about the necessity for being over the age of 18 as a sufficient barrier against minors. In this context it is only a guarantee against administrator's criminal responsibility (Article 202 of the Penal Code) based on a fiction that users are truthful. Lack of right education, solid information and knowledge of the possibility of protecting sexuality is a real and urgent problem in Poland, which should be solved in a non-penal way as well.

V CONCLUSION

On the basis of presented studies it can be said with sure that Polish criminal justice system, despite introducing many positive changes aiming to protect children against sexual violence, will have to be transformed in following years because of foreign pressure, such as EU regulations or international treaties, but also the growth of social consciousness and the need for protection of youngest citizens against challenges of the future. These elements result not only in adjusting legislation to meet children's needs, but also consistently broaden the scope of penalization, arising many questions concerning rightness of such deep interference in private lives.

Having the consciousness that taking into consideration other factors than penal is a must, when minors are involved in sexual behaviour under the risk of punishment by Polish Penal Code, attention to several problems should be drawn. Adjusting criminal law in these areas to reality of youth social life and to other bodies of law would be another form of protecting their sex life, privacy, health or normal development.

The main problems are:

1. Lack of definition of minor in Penal Code, resulting in difficulties in interpretation in case of minor married women, which may restrict protection for them.
2. Using two thresholds of age in case of sex crimes, which victims are 'minors' and 'minors under the age of 15' (Article 202 of the Penal Code). This may cause difficulties in interpretation for the victims.
3. Applying criminal responsibility to juveniles (over the age of 17, but under the age of 18) and minors (over the age of 13, but under the age of 17) on the ground of the Children (Criminal Proceedings) Act may lead to minor perpetrator's injury during the proceedings. In Polish Penal Code there is no close-in-age exception (Article 200 of the Penal Code) and liability cannot be excluded.
4. Prosecuting on the basis of a victim's motion in the case of a rape on a minor under the age of 15 significantly reduced chances of apprehending and convicting a perpetrator. It is also contrary to international obligations imposed on Poland.
5. Penalization of children's prostitution on the ground of the Penal Code at present form arises serious legal, social and cultural objections.
6. Amending Penal Code in the case of sex crimes against minors hardly ever takes into account social context of youth sex behaviour. It may lead to secondary injury in victims and perpetrators' original victimisation.
7. Restricting minors' sexual rights influences on the level of protection, which can worsen injury. Limiting parental discretion in favour of extending youth access to medical care, specialist information or giving them possibility to decide about themselves would reduce the risk of injury caused by sex crimes.

8. It is necessary to conduct solid, comprehensive and real sex education including child's protection against sexual abuse.

9. Taking into consideration both threats and benefits coming from wider access to the Internet must be intrinsic to criminal policy as to minors' protection against sex crimes.

10. Crucial problem is to increase lawgiver's consciousness as to how regulate sex crimes perpetrators' criminal responsibility. It turns out that raising penalties or creating new crimes falls short of expectations as to increased minors' protection and sometimes can worsen their injury.

11. It is necessary to take into consideration cultural conditionings, tradition, customs and social conditions, which are supplement to proper criminal policy in the field of protecting children against sex crimes.

State actions to counteract children's injury caused by sex crimes should be interdisciplinary. Only then will criminal act's principles be just, effective and, as a consequence, leading to real minors' protection.

I INTRODUCTION

1 GENERAL

i. The principle of equality (art. 13º) proclaimed in the Portuguese Constitution (CRP) refers that "all citizens possess the same social dignity and are equal before the law". This principle states on the number 2 that "no form of discrimination based on ancestry, sex, race, language, territory of origin, religion, political or ideological beliefs, education, economic situation, social circumstances or sexual orientation is accepted".

The same principle is expressed in the Article 36º as far as family is concerned. It reports to equal rights and duties within family circle. It states that "everyone has the right to form a family and to marry under conditions of full equality" (nr.1). It also stresses that "spouses have equal rights and duties in relation to their civil and political capacity and to the maintenance and education of their children" (nr.2). The same provision puts an end to unfavourable legal status of children born out of wedlock, stating in art. 36º (nr. 4) that they "may not be the object of any discrimination for that reason, and neither the law, nor official departments or services may employ discriminatory terms in relation to filiations".

Historically, Portugal had an authoritarian regime till 25th April 1974. The revision of Portuguese Constitution of 1976 was sensitive to the rights to the family, by considering a special "protection to them by the society and the state", as is expressed in arts. 67º, nr. 1) and to the children, protection from all forms of abandonment, discrimination and oppression and from the abusive exercise of authority in the family or any other institution".

ii. The notion of Family as "the natural and fundamental group unit of the society"<sup>1</sup> have accompanying important changes in society values with profound implications on political and legislative sensitivity to family rights. Particularly changes related with the women's fight for gender equality rights<sup>2</sup> and an increased sensitivity of international community and governments for the promotion of children rights and protection of risk situations. Family issues are a matter of legal protection by different branches of law (civil, penal, social security and labour) which adapts to the fluidity dynamics and changes in the structure of family demands. The principles of equality and dignity of human person permeate the children rights. However any of political and legal measures directed to the protection of children by the family, the society and the State, should attend to the specificities of their level of formation and always giving a paramount consideration to the "superior interest of the children". The promotion of conditions to an integral development of children and youth, as well as the identification of risk situations that may impair this development, such as experience of violence or other harmful treatment inside or outside the family context, are aspects contemplated in the family and children law.

In the particular case of family violence, by involving different targets (the couple or the children) and motives (societal, familiar and individual), and presenting a specific nature, as it occurs "behind closed doors"<sup>3</sup> turning it difficult to social control and to estimate. Moreover, children tend to omit the criminal offenses by fear of retaliation by the offender, to deny it or to feel guilty, as a result of blaming the victim beliefs. Consequently, many children suffer in silence, and the complaints to the police or formal agencies happen late to occur or never happen, which results on a bias in estimates of real occurrences.

Despite the underreporting bias associated with the family and children violence, there are also different prevalence estimates according with sources and methodologies. Retrospective studies<sup>4</sup> measured by self-report questionnaires with community-based samples of parents and college students differ from other reports collected with professionals (health, education, social service) that treat with children regarding different types of child maltreatment<sup>5</sup>, and even official estimates of formal agencies such as the Commission of Protection of Children and Youth at risk (CPCJR)<sup>6</sup> or the Legal Medicine Institute<sup>7</sup> reports.

According with the report of the CPCJR for the year 2011 the estimates of "danger situations for children and youth" resulted in 30574 measures of protection or promotion, as a consequence of different situations of risk observed, being the neglect (27.9%, N=7771), domestic violence exposition (21.1%, N=5873), risk of failure on educational rights (15%; N=4166), psychological maltreatment (8.6% N=2385), other risk situations (7.3%, N=2023), behaviours that affect the well-being (7%, N=1958) and physical maltreatment (6.2%, N=1738), practice of facts considered as crime (2.4%, N=681), sexual abuse (N=628, 2.3%), abandoned child or left to him/her own care (1.8%, N=509).

The pervasive effects of violence, physical, psychological and sexual, have deep consequences on health and well-being of the victims and a significant disturbance in accomplishment of major life tasks across development<sup>8</sup>, such as the direct physical or sexual injuries resulting from the abuse, anxiety, depression and post-traumatic stress reactions are commonly found among victims of child abuse and neglect, and more expressively among sexual abuse victims. Moreover, the effects of trauma related with the abusive experiences correlate with abuse characteristics – poly victimization, types of abuse, as also children variables like the age and context of the abuse, such as low social support networks or other family risk factors (e.g., alcoholism of parents, poverty). The consequences of the abuse are susceptible to affect emotional regulation, cognition and memory, and also interpersonal and social functioning of children. Therefore, impairing the normal development tasks and personality formation by disruption of the establishment of healthy interpersonal relationships based on trust and love. Abusive experiences during childhood and adolescence may become noxious pervasive agents resulting in serious mental and physical health consequences.

All-encompassing preventive efforts are essential to stop any type of violence against children and youth in order, to break the "silence" and "powerlessness" observed in many of the child victims of crime, inside or outside de family<sup>9</sup>. The importance of sensitization and educative campaigns for children, acknowledge them from the different shapes of abuse ways, and effective ways to stop it, or protect from abusive situations. All contexts where the children belong should be addressed as a way to reduce the exposure to risks, always attending to the interface between psychological characteristics of children and social-economic and cultural contexts. The interface with parental supervision and new technologies risks (internet), and implementation of measures to control the access of the children to contact with strangers.

Regarding the offenders, penal law sanctions are effective but they are not always sufficient ways to stop child abuse<sup>10</sup> and particularly sexual abuse. A multidisciplinary oriented treatment for offenders should also be considered and other withdrawal measures from children since the moment of the suspect, and limited access to contexts involving children (the victim and others).

However as a result of the increased public awareness for child abuse and neglect, and the particular increased risk associated with new technologies and the occurrences of child sexual abuse, result in noteworthy concerns about the protection of the more vulnerable persons of the society - the children.

Portuguese internal juridical order in agreement with international law predicts some measures to protect children against sexual exploitation and sexual abuse and the application of Lanzarote Convention in Portuguese juridical order.

In Portuguese juridical system, there is no family definition. However, there are so many legal references to the family depending on the legal issue, with family considered as an object of Portuguese Constitution (CRP), civil law, penal law and social security and labour law.

Portuguese Constitution in its part I, dedicated to the provisions about "fundamental rights and duties" and in its title I - and in title III refers to family.

<sup>10</sup> Child abuse including the types of psychological, physical and sexual abusive acts, as also neglect in its multiple dimensions (educational, emotional, physical), see for definitions: A. Nunes de Almeida, I. Margarida André e H. Nunes de Almeida (opcit); C. Paiva (opcit).

In the title I, addressing the "personal rights, freedoms and guarantees", it considers the prevision of "family, marriage and filiations" expressed in the article 36°, the nr. 1 states that "everyone shall possess the right to found a family and to marry on terms of full equality", as an expression of the principle of equality (art. 13°) of spouses on admissibility to the divorce (nr. 2) and to the maintenance and education of their children (nr.3), as also the equality of status among children born inside or outside wedlock (nr. 4). In title III devoted to the "economic, social and cultural rights and duties" (chapter II - social rights and duties) recognizes in the article 67°, the family as a fundamental element of the society "protected by the society and the State". In number 2 of the last article, it is enunciated the duty to effective implementation by the State of all the conditions needed to enable family members to achieve personal development, like the promotion of social and economic independence of family units; access to national crèches, or elderly centres; children education, family planning; assisted conception, taxes and benefits, implement global and family policies and reconciliation of professional and family life. Even predicting that bringing up the children is a responsibility of parents (art. 68°, nr. 1; art. 36°, nr. 5), the State has a duty to cooperate with parents in upbringing their children (art. 67°. nr. 2, (c) and art. 68, nr. 1), and in art. 36° (nr. 6) enunciates that children shall not be separated from their parents unless when the latter do not fulfil their fundamental duties, only through judicial order (art. 36°, nr. 5 and nr. 6).

The Civil Code has a special part focusing specifically on the family rights, however not presenting any juridical definition of family, but we can conclude from art. 1576° the "sources of juridical familiar relationships, marriage, kinship, affinity and adoption". The article 1577° defines the marriage as "a contract celebrated which want to constitute a family, with a total communion of life" (vide Law 9/2010 of 31 May). In the chapter II of the Civil Code are enunciated the effects of filiations and the duties of parents and children (articles 1874°, 1877°, 1879°) as also the conditions through which the parental responsibility can be inhibited (article 1915°).

Other legal predictions of the family, directed to the protection of maternity and paternity are also considered in the social security law and the labour law (subsection IV- protection of maternity and paternity). The right to the maternal license (Decree Law, nr.503/80 of 20 October), the protection of maternity and paternity (Law 4/84 of 5 April; DL 136/85, 3 May and DL 154/88 of 29 April) attending also to the equality of gender in paternitymaternity license (Law 142/99 of 31 August, republished by DL 70/2000 of 4 May and DL 105/2008 of 25 June).

The penal law consider also the family in diverse types of crime, such as the articles 247° to 250° of the Penal Code (bigamy, falsification of civil status, subtracting minor, and breach of the requirement of food), and includes the crime of "domestic violence" expressed in article 152° "to inflict psychic and physical abuse, including corporal punishment, deprivation of liberty and sexual offenses" also encompasses the family members (nr.1) (the spouses or former spouses, those analogous to spouses, the progenitor of common descendent, and defenceless person) and in the redaction of nr. 2 attend to the specific condition of the minors. The degree of kinship is considered as a aggravating condition (article 177° nr. 1), in the cases of the crimes considered in chapter V of the Penal Code - crimes against sexual freedom (arts. 167 to 176°) and sexual self-determination (arts. 163 to 165°).

The evolution of legal instruments accompanies the changes in family structure and dynamics in consequence of the changes in social, economic and political conditions<sup>11</sup>. The report of the Observatory of Families and Politics of Family (OFPF)<sup>12</sup>, for the last two years (2010/11), permits to characterize the status of family and marriage in Portugal, adding together with the result of the Census for the year 2011 (compared with the previous of 2001). Considering the number of celebrated marriages in last decade, there is a reduction of the marriages (39.993) in 2010, which represent a rate of 3.8 marriages per 1000 inhabitants compared with the rate of 5.7‰ in 2001. The number of non-first marriage is 26% of the total marriage rate. The average age of the first marriage is later, for men 34 years old and for women 32 years old in 2010 (men married average age 28 years old and women at 26 years old in 2001).

According with the last year report of OFPF there is an increase of 10.8% in the number of families in Portuguese society in the last decade. The couple is the predominant type of structure of organization of family, representing 60% of the Portuguese families that in average have 2.6 persons living together. The number of couples without children increased as a result of the decrease of fecundity rate among Portuguese women. Few families have more than 5 persons (6.5%) in their aggregate<sup>13</sup>. Other structures of family living are also observed, as an increase in single-parent households (9%) and persons living alone (21%). It is significant the increase of the rate of the cohabitation and de facto union (44% on 2011 and 24% on 2001 Census), matching with an increased rate of divorce, with a rate of 2.6 per million inhabitants in 2011 (compared with 1.8‰ in 2001), a result above the mean in EU<sup>14</sup>. Re-structured families with common previous children have doubled, representing 13.5% in 2011 and 5.2% in 2001. These results seem to be indicative that Portuguese after divorce reorganize their family trajectory organization, by cohabitation or a second marriage<sup>15</sup>. The raise of women in labour market have also an impact on the family system organization with remarkable gender differences regarding paid- non paid work (domestic and child care) in men and women. Women are more occupied with domestic tasks than men, more 10h per week, and more involved in parental care, more 7h than men. The nativity rate has been decreasing and according with National Statistical Institute (INE) in year 2010, 101381 children were born in Portugal (41% are wedlock babies), with mean motherhood age, 29 years old<sup>16</sup>.

The economic crisis that Portugal is living nowadays and the sensitivity of different politics regarding this issue, has affected markedly the organization of family structure. Responding to the increased rate of unemployment and correspondent risk of poverty in the Portuguese families, and particularly the more vulnerable, such as the children, elderly and persons with disabilities, the actual government through tutelage of Ministry of Solidarity and Social Security have implemented the "Social Emergency Plan"- SEP<sup>17</sup>.

The SEP consists in "mitigating the social impact of the crisis in order to create a "social cushion" which permits to buffer for many persons the difficulties they are passing", supported by the notion that "at present juncture it is not possible to choose paths that reduce further the global levels of social protection of disadvantaged persons, or that involve additional financial effort that the country cannot support". The program strengthens that "many of the families live difficult moments nowadays, enmeshed in the webs of unemployment, financial collapse, of over-indebtedness, social disintegration, exclusion and poverty (...) the reduction of social inequalities must begin by combating early school leaving, the adoption of measures to support the family, the fairer distribution of income and sacrifices, and, moreover, at fair recognition each person's merit and effort, based on a personal and collective promotion and training dimensions". Additionally, underlines that "the social crisis, associated to the social disruption, have hardest effects on children. The Government together with the Commissions for Protection of Children and Young People at risk (CPCJR) will focus at the level of primary and secondary prevention, by increasing the signalling of risk cases and not jeopardizing the principle of subsidiary". The Social Emergency Plan contemplates also various implementation measures directed to the a) poverty situations and disadvantaged families and children (al. a), elderly (al. b), and persons with disabilities (al. c), by reinforcing and encouraging the volunteering (al. d) and also in the articulation and formal cooperation with municipalities, aid non-governmental agencies and solidarity institutions which are already working in site (al. e)<sup>10</sup>. iii. Portuguese Constitution considers the value of children's rights, however without a clear definition about the concept of childhood (art. 69º) and youth (art. 70º).

The right to the personality development of the minor, as an expression of the Principle of Human Dignity (art.1º) is present in the redaction of the article 69º, nr.1, "the children have the right to the protection of society and State in order to their integral personality development, especially against any forms of abandonment, discrimination and oppression and against the abusive exercise of authority in the family or any other institution". This article express the right of children to be protected and also that this protection of children, while a duty of the State and society, should be performed in an equality plan. Nevertheless, according with the doctrine, there are situations that deserve a positive discriminative action in the sense of treat equally what is equal and differently what is different, and in order to affirm the respect from the development of an integral, free, autonomous and self-determined personality of the minor, two main assumptions that should be observed: the guarantee and respect for the dignity of the human person as well as to consider the fact that a minor is a person in formation<sup>19</sup>. The decisions take in relation to the children - by parents or by administrative and judicial authorities - must consider these specificities to give paramount consideration to the "superior interest of the child".

Contrasting with the authoritarian model of State that defines unilaterally the "superior interest of the children", in last decades in Portugal there is a progressive change in juridical awareness regarding children rights, mirrored in legislative acts and policies focusing on the rights of the children and young people, and strengthening their participative role as active agents on their own rights and decisions in educational and civil matters<sup>20</sup>

Portuguese family law, following the reform of Civil Code in 1977 have emphasizing the concept of family as unified within parents and children having a duty to respect, aid and assist each other (art. 1874º, nr.1), and since then, states that children have a duty to obey their parents (art.1877º, nr.2) and depending on the maturity of the children, the parents have to take into account the opinions of children and youth in important family matters and allow their autonomy in running their life. A practical effect of this assumption is, under the Civil Code, that young people over 16 years old are entitled to administer the property acquired as fruit of their labour (art. 1888,nr. 1, (d)), to decide on their religious education (art. 1886, nr.47), to recognize a child born out of wedlock (art- 1850, nr. 1 and nr. 2), and young people over 14 years old have to consent on their adoption (art. 1981nr. 1, (a)). Minors are entitled also to seek protection in court against any form of abuse of authority, in family or institutions, and to be heard "whenever it is possible" in matters of their own, when they are at risk, socially maladjusted or involved in criminal offenses. The value of children and the protection of children and adolescents at risk or victims of ill treatment are present also in two other documents in national juridical order (Law 147/1999 and DL 142/1999 of 1 September).

The concerns of the legislator in the protection of children rights, aiming to promote a more intense tutelage of children and youth, extended also to penal matters. In the last Penal Code revision at 2007, the age of justifying agreement is changed from 14 to 16 years old, according with the victims' agreement by orientation of EU regarding the crimes against freedom and sexual self-determination of minors. It was introduced a new crime against the self-determination sexual of minors, traduced in the payment or other benefit for the practice of sexual acts, which is based in the encouragement of children and youth prostitution. The amplification of incriminators types for the pimping and pornography and reported to all minors and not only to those under 14 or 16 years old. Moreover, a systematic distinction was performed also regarding the aggravation for victims under 14 years old, among 14 and 16 years old, and between 16 and 18 years old, and all the crimes against the freedom and self-determination sexual against minors, except the crime sexual acts with adolescents, are public crimes. As a way to prevent and protect the children, to the condemned agents of these crimes, the Penal Code also predicts an accessory penalty of prohibition of professional exercise, function or activity that involves the existence minors at their responsibility, education, treatment or vigilance.

In conclusion, the significant changes on Portuguese socio-economic conditions in the last quarter of century XX and more recently in century XXI, have an impact on family dynamics and structure, as well as definition of political and legal instruments that protect children and family rights.

If the family is the "safe haven" to protect from the harms of strangers, the development of new technologies, paired with some familiar disruption and situations of poverty can expose the children to higher number of risk factors, susceptible to impair their integral and healthy development. The reinforcing of measures that strength the family ties, namely through political measures supporting the family life and reinforce of supportive and caring relationships in the "cell of society", and community can be a way to begin the combat of crimes against children, many of them perpetrated at home or by those considered as trusting persons (neighbours, acquaintances). The empowerment of children to recognize the danger situations by educative campaigns could also prevent new incident cases. Furthermore, in matter of children's rights protection, the increasing the social awareness and politic agenda for the promotion and guarantee of children rights and particularly on the reduction of risk factors present in the diverse socio-educative and familiar contexts where

iv. The relevant legislation regarding the implementation of international treaties in Portugal is Article 8(2) of the Portuguese Constitution, which states that “the rules set out in duly ratified or passed international agreements shall come into force in Portuguese internal law once they have been officially published”.

In the interplay between national and international law it is consensually agreed upon by legal scholars and recognized by the Constitutional Court that Portugal adopts a monist approach, assimilating international agreements into the national legal framework, placing them under the Constitution but above all domestic law, according to Article 8(2) of the Portuguese Constitution.

The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child was ratified by Presidential Decree nr. 49/90, September 12th, and the instrument of ratification was deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations on the 21st of September 1990. According to Article 49(2) of the Convention, it came into force in Portugal on the 21st of October 1990 (the thirtieth day after the deposit of the instrument of ratification). The Resolution of the Assembly of the Republic<sup>21</sup> nr. 20/90 and Presidential Decree nr. 49/90 was published in Portugal’s Official Journal nr. 211/90 (Series I, Supplement)<sup>22</sup>, and notice of the deposit of the ratification of the Convention with the UN Secretary General was published in Portugal’s Official Journal nr. 248/90 (Series I)<sup>23</sup>.

The Portuguese State made no reservations to the Convention neither upon its ratification nor afterwards. Moreover, Portugal has consistently made objections to reservations expressed by other Member States<sup>24</sup>, which read as follows:

“The Government of Portugal considers that reservations by which a State limits its responsibilities under the Convention by invoking general principles of National Law may create doubts on the commitments of the reserving State to the object and purpose of the Convention and, moreover, contribute to undermining the basis of International Law. It is in the common interest of States that treaties to which they have chosen to become parties also are respected, as to object and purpose, by all parties. The Government of Portugal therefore objects to the reservations.<sup>25</sup>”

Portugal also accepted the amendment to article 43 (2) of the Convention on the Rights of the Child<sup>26</sup> and ratified, without reservations, both Optional Protocols to the Convention, the first regarding the Involvement of Children in Armed Conflict<sup>27</sup>, and the second relating to the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography<sup>28</sup>. A third Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child, regarding a communications procedure, was adopted on the 19th of December 2011. It has been signed by Portugal, on the 28th of February 2012 but it has yet to be ratified. At the present moment no reservations have been made by the Portuguese State regarding the new Optional Protocol.

v. Directive 2011/92/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 December 2011 on combating the sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children and child pornography sets forth as a deadline for its transposition the 18th of December 2013, according to its article 27(1).

Presently, as regards to Portugal, no national implementation measures have been taken so far. Nonetheless, Portugal’s Minister of Justice has publicly reiterated<sup>29</sup> the Government’s intention to transpose the Directive until the end of 2012 and is preparing several draft proposals for Parliamentary approval to that effect.

One of the proposed measures openly disclosed by the Ministry of Justice is the creation of a national registry of persons convicted of offences referred to in the Directive, in accordance with recital 43 of the preamble of Directive nr. 2011/92/EU.

2 THE LANZAROTE CONVENTION

i. The European Convention on Human Rights was ratified by Presidential Decree nr 1.º 65/78 on the 13th October and it came into force in Portugal on the 9th of November 1978. Portugal made reservations to the Convention, contained in the letter from the Permanent Representative of Portugal, dated 8 November 1978, handed to the Secretary General at the time of deposit of the instrument of ratification, on 9 November 1978 stating that the Article 5 of the Convention would be applied subject to Articles 27 and 28 of the Military Discipline Regulations, which provide for the placing under arrest of members of the armed forces. Articles 27 and 28 of the Military Discipline Regulations read as follows:

“Article 27: 1. Arrests consist of the detention of the offender in a building intended for the purpose, in an appropriate place, barracks or military establishment, in suitable quarters on board ship or, failing these, in a place determined by the competent authority. 2. Between the reveille and sundown, during the period of detention, the members of the armed forces can perform the duties assigned to them.

Article 28: Close arrest consists of the detention of the offender in a building intended for the purpose.”

Another reservation was contained in the letter from the Permanent Representative of Portugal, dated 8 November 1978, handed to the Secretary General at the time of deposit of the instrument of ratification, on 9 November 1978. Article 7 of the Convention would be applied subject to Article 309 of the Constitution of the Portuguese Republic (revoked at the present time), which provided for the indictment and trial of officers and personnel of the State Police Force (PIDE-DGS).

ii. Regarding the Lanzarote Convention, the Portuguese State is a party to the convention given its statue of Member State of the Council of Europe and considering that the convention was signed by the Representative of Portugal on the 25th of November 2007 and it was ratified by Presidential Decree nr 90/2012 on the 28th of May 2012 and approved by the Resolution of the Assembly of the Republic nr 75/2012. The Portuguese State made no reservations to the Convention neither upon its ratification nor afterwards. The Convention will come into force in Portugal on the 1st of December 2012.

iii. Under Portuguese legal order, international conventions like the Lanzarote Convention are ranked under the Portuguese Republic Constitution and above Law Decrees from the Assembly of the Republic and Prime Minister Cabinet. This means that under the Portuguese legal order, the Lanzarote Convention is above what we might call the non-reinforced legislation, which means that any kind of law that is hierarchically under the Convention that contradicts it, it is suitable to be dismissed for not complying with the hierarchically superior legislation. Under the number 2 from the article 8 from the Portuguese Republic Constitution, the precepts in an international convention, fairly rectified or approved, apply in the internal legal order after its official publication and while internationally binding on the Portuguese state. There is no legislation regarding specifically its implementation.

iv .The implementation of the Lanzarote Convention has been made by the ratifying Presidential Decree that transposed the convention, by fully transposing the text of the convention (both the Portuguese language version and the English language version). So in the Presidential Decree nr 90/2012 we can find the complete text of the convention, meaning that all the provisions of the Convention are now legally binding in the whole Portuguese territory while internationally binding on the Portuguese state. In terms of new legislation regarding the issues of the Lanzarote Convention, it will be more a question of mandatorily adapting the present law to the words of the Convention due to the hierarchy of the sources of law mentioned above. So in a practical manner, the work from now on will be carried by finding “old” legislation that might now contradict the Lanzarote Convention and adapt it in order to comply with the Convention. This might work on a legislative way, buy approving decrees updating the “old” laws, or by Court decisions, dismissing Laws that may not yet comply with the text of the Convention.

v. The Portuguese State made no reservations to the Convention neither upon its ratification nor afterwards.

1 GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE JURISDICTION

i. In order to understand the differences between a Federal State and a Central Government, it is necessary to do a short introduction to the Portuguese Modern History. It is usually considered that the 1820 Liberal Revolution was an important stage in our History. In fact, the first Portuguese Constitution was published in 1822 as an effect on the legal and political system of this Revolution.

Baumlim said: “The Constitutions’ History reflects the history of the mankind”. Looking through the Constitutions we can discover in which time they were written and the changes that have been implemented. The Portuguese Constitutions were not an exception and each one reflects their time.

After the 1822 Constitution there were published 5 other Constitutions: 1826, 1838, 1910, 1933 and 1976 however the most important for the ELSA for Children and One in Five Campaign is the last one: the 1976 Constitution. This one had great influences from the Carnation Revolution from 1974.

Indeed, it is said that both Revolutions – the Liberal and the Carnation – are remarkable marks in the Portuguese History. The first one broke the ‘Ancien Régime’ – the Royal Absolutism - and established the liberal classes - the bourgeois system.

Undoubtedly, the second one introduced the Democratic Principle in our Jurisdiction.

Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa – University Professor of Constitutional Law - said ‘what really matters between Federal State and Central Government is the way the State itself models its power towards other similar powers in the same country and between the same people’.

A Federal State is an association or union between several states which gave birth to a new state with different powers inside. It is very important to stress that there are a duality or a superposition between several powers. Similarly, The West Encyclopaedia of American Law defines Federalism as “A principle of government that defines the relationship between the central government at the national level and its constituent units at the regional, state, or local levels.

Under this principle of government, power and authority is allocated between the national and local governmental units, such that each unit is delegated a sphere of power and authority only it can exercise, while other powers must be shared” As a result of this duality of powers, at the same time there are two different sovereignties: one from the Federal State and the other from federate states.

Differently, a Central Government as a characteristic of the Unitary States exercises its functions through an organized government in all the territory. The Central Government has all the powers.

The Portuguese Constitution shows in its article 3rd that in Portugal we have a Central Government - ‘Sovereignty shall be single and indivisible and shall lie with the people, who shall exercise it in the forms provided for in this Constitution’. Again, in the same article, it is stressed that ‘The validity of laws and other acts of the state, the autonomous regions, local government and any other public bodies shall be dependent on their conformity with this Constitution.’

However, it is important to point that there is a special regime for the Autonomous Regions such as Azores and Madeira Islands. They have its own Political and Administrative powers (article 227th) and its own Government (article 231st) that are elected by universal election. Nevertheless, according to article 225th (3) ‘Regional political and administrative autonomy shall not affect the integrity of the sovereignty of the state and shall be exercised within the overall framework of this Constitution’

ii. The most recent Constitution was created in 1976 after the 1974 Carnation Revolution. After two years of intense public discussion the Constitution was voted and finally came into force in 2nd April 1976. Several Principles were introduced such as the Democratic Principle, the Legality Principle, the Democratic State based on the Rule of Law and last but not the least the Fundamental Rights (can be find at the 1st Part of the Constitution).

First, the concepts of “Human Rights” and “Fundamental Rights” must be distinguished. The Human Rights belong to all the international community and not only to a specific country. The United Nations Human Rights defines it as ‘rights inherent to all human beings, whatever our nationality, place of residence, sex, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, language, or any other status. We are all equally entitled to our human rights without discrimination. These rights are all interrelated, interdependent and indivisible’. However, it is also common to point out some problems regarding difficulty of defining concretely what the human rights are and their lack of legal sanction.

On the other hand, Fundamental Rights can be defined using the classification of one of the most important Portuguese Constitutional Professor Jorge Miranda: “Fundamental Rights are the rights or active legal positions of people – as individuals or institutions – that can be found in the Constitution”. There are no real Fundamental Rights without an organized State and where people have their own judicial space. In totalitarianism, since there is no permission to individual freedom and everything is subordinate to the authority of the government, cannot be found Fundamental Rights. However, since the implementation of Democratic principles in the 1976 Portuguese Constitution it could be said that Portugal has real Fundamental Rights: the Rights, Liberties and Guarantees and the Socioeconomics Rights.

Sometimes Human Rights and Fundamental Rights are similar; nevertheless, the last ones - since they belong to a specific jurisdiction - are enforceable in courts.

We have an open clause at the article no. 8th where sometimes the Human Rights can automatically be part of the Portuguese jurisdiction - ‘The rules and principles of general or common international law shall form an integral part of Portuguese law’.

In Portugal, there is a special connection between Human Rights and Fundamental Rights because ‘The provisions of this Constitution and of laws concerning fundamental rights shall be interpreted and construed in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights’.

In several provisions it is possible to find the Fundamental Rights (from article 12nd to article 79th of the 1976 Portuguese Constitution: e.g.: Principle of Universality; Principle of Equality) and sometimes in another parts of the Fundamental Law (such as article 268th: Citizens’ Rights and Guarantees when they are dealing with Public Administration).

To conclude, it is possible to state that the most recent Portuguese Constitution gives a special status to the Human Rights. All Fundamental Rights are interpreted in accordance to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which gives a special force to some Human Rights in Portugal.

Looking through the Portuguese Constitution we can find some provisions regarding Children Rights. The article 69th is dedicated to the Childhood Protection: ‘With a view to their integral development, children shall possess the right to protection by society and the state, especially from all forms of abandonment, discrimination and oppression and from the abusive exercise of authority in the family or any other institution.’ Also at the article 67th Family should be protected as a way of family members to achieve personal fulfilment. Moreover ‘young people shall receive special protection in order to ensure the effective enjoyment of their economic, social and cultural rights (...)’ – (article no. 70th). Even a special focus is given to emigrant children: “Ensuring that emigrants’ children are taught the Portuguese language and enjoy access to Portuguese culture” (article 74th)

Some other indirect provisions can be found – article 26th: As a Personal Right ‘everyone shall possess the right to a personal identity, to the development of their personality, to civil capacity, to citizenship, to a good name and reputation, to their likeness, to speak out, to protect the privacy of their personal and family life, and to legal protection against any form of discrimination’. As a Right of having a Family (article 36th) – ‘Everyone shall possess the right to found a family and to marry on terms of full equality’

It is also important to mention some special legislation regarding Children in need such as Law nr 147/1999 of 1st September and Decree-Law nr 11/2008 of 17th January. The first one has the principles to protect children's and young adults' rights - especially from those who are in need - as a way to prevent and give them a safe place to grow. The second one has measures that should be used to help the families of those children in need and ways to help young adults to promote their rights.

Furthermore, we cannot forget the "The Convention on the Rights of the Child". Since it was ratified by Portugal and published, in accordance to the article 8 'shall come directly into force in Portuguese internal law'.

iii. There are several models to describe the Constitutional Justice. In Portugal, we adopted the American System by having a Judicial Review instead of having a Political Control (as used in France). The American System settles that courts are the competent jurisdiction to supervise the Constitution and the laws in general. According to the article no. 202nd from the Portuguese Constitution '(2) In administering justice the courts shall ensure the defence of those citizens' rights and interests that are protected by law, repress breaches of the democratic rule of law and rule on conflicts between interests, public and private.'

Since according to article 8th / 2- 'The rules set out in duly ratified or passed international agreements shall come into force in Portuguese internal law once they have been officially published, and shall remain so for as long as they are internationally binding on the Portuguese state.' – Conventions and Treaties like Universal Declaration of Human Rights, International Pact on Civil and Political Rights and European Convention on Human Rights are part of the internal Portuguese law. From that moment on, Portuguese courts can monitor the compliance of international human rights treaties of which Portugal is part.

However it is important to note the limitations of this system, once there are only two types of control: The Incidental/Casual and the Main/Principal Control.

For the first one it is necessary to have a lawsuit. At least one part needs to bring the case to court. There, the parties can raise the constitutional question and if this question is really important for the main law suit it will be taken into consideration by the judge. On the second there is an autonomous lawsuit for evaluating the violation of the Constitution or International Law. However, only a few citizens can submit this type of lawsuit: according to article 281st only The President of the Portuguese Republic, The President of the Assembly of the Republic, The Prime Minister, The Ombudsman, The Attorney General or one tenth of the Members of the Assembly of the Republic can ask for an Abstract review of constitutionality and legality. This review is done even if there is no dispute resolution to be discuss in court. These people can ask to the Constitutional Court to review the unconstitutionality of any rule. Differently, when a party decides to raise one constitutional question it is necessary to submit one specific conflict to the court decision. This Specific Review of Constitutionality and Legality follow the American Judicial Review where every court needs to evaluate if the rules are in accordance with the Constitution. In the end, there is the possibility to appeal to the Constitutional Court when: the Court 'refuse(s) the application of any rule on the grounds of its unconstitutionality' or if the Court decides to 'apply any rule, the unconstitutionality of which has been raised during the proceedings in question.' (article 280th).

According to the article 18th from the Portuguese Constitution all the 'Constitution's provisions with regard to rights, freedoms and guarantees shall be directly applicable to and binding on public and private persons and bodies'. Since all the Constitutional rules have direct effect on our jurisdiction this means that at the same time individuals can claim their constitutional rights directly in every Portuguese court and public entities are obliged to apply the Law.

We follow a Judicial Review that allows every court to analyse and control the application of the Constitution Rules. Individuals do not need to wait for a final decision and appeal for the Constitutional Court. The 1st Instance Court can, at the same time, decide the dispute resolution and control if a concrete rule is violating or not the Constitution.

Despite having Constitutions since 1820, the first Constitutional Court was only created in 1983 (Constitutional Law 1/82 of 30th September).

Until 1974 Portugal followed the French system by having a Political Control of its Constitution. Instead of the Constitutional Court it was the National Assembly or the Government the bodies responsible for the control of the Constitution (article no. 123rd from the 1933 Constitution). The main role of the courts was to solve the conflict between the parties, always in accordance to the Constitution and the general Laws. When a part raised a constitutional question the National Assembly or the Government were the bodies able to answer.

After the Carnation Revolution, Portugal had some years of political uncertainty. Indeed, during one year there were a provisional civil government that ruled the country in order to establish a plan as a way to have elections and to form a democratic government.

In 1975 it was created the Council of the Revolution as an instrument to allow the participation of Armed Forces Movement to be part of the Portuguese political scenario after the 1976 Revolution. The composition of the Council of Revolution was the President of the Portuguese Republic, Chief and Vice-Chief of the Defence Staff, Chief of the Army Force, the Navy Force and the Air Force, the COPCON (Continent Operational) Commander, the Commission for the Coordination of the Movement of the Armed Forces (MFA) and other 8 elements that should be selected by the MFA. The Prime-Minister could also be part of the Council but only if part of the military system.

To the military system was given a huge political power due to their role in Carnation Revolution and as a way to keep the spirit brought with that important democratic Revolution. The Council of Revolution attributions were the creation of the Constitutional Assembly and the vigilance for the correct execution of the MFA Programme and the Constitutional Laws.

In the original version of the 1976 Constitutional, the Council of Revolution was part of the Entities that exercised Sovereignty – article 113th of the original version of the 1976 Constitution – alongside with the President of the Republic, the Assembly of the Republic, the Government and the Courts. According to the original Constitutional version, the Council of Revolution was also the Council of the President of the Portuguese Republic –as an adviser and to give some authorizations together with the President of the Portuguese Republic. It was also responsible for the observance and execution of the Constitution by pronouncing on the constitutionality of the laws before their promulgation and by having legislative veto powers. The Council of Revolution could also analysed the constitutionality of every diplomas submitted and had the competence to consider them unconstitutionality.

After the transition period (1976 – 1982) it was conducted the 1st Revision of the Portuguese Constitution that withdraw the Council of Revolution from the section regarding the entities that exercised Sovereignty. It was decided that the Council of Revolution was no longer needed in Portugal and was abolished by the Constitutional Law 1/82 of 30th September (1st Revision of the 1976 Portuguese Constitution).

At the same time, it was published the Law which allowed the creation of the Constitutional Court. This Court is totally independent from the Political System (article no. 203rd from the Constitution) and it is responsible for the Constitutionality and Legality Review of the Portuguese Constitution. The definition could be found in the recent Constitution (with the 7th revision in 2005): “The Constitutional Court is the court with the specific competence to administer justice in matters of a constitutional-law nature.” (article 221st).

The Law nr 28/82 of 15th September regulates the organization and the process inside the Constitutional Court.

Yes, it is possible to apply individually in Portugal. Since we follow the American Review every Court is the competent jurisdiction to supervise the Constitution and the laws in general. If one individual citizen finds that one of its constitutional rights was violated he/she needs to start a lawsuit and raise the constitutional question. Every Court is competent to control and pronounce if in that concrete case there was a Constitutional violation.

Moreover, it is also important to highlight an Urgent Administrative Process present at Administrative Courts Procedure Code (Código do Processo nos Tribunais Administrativo - CPTA) where individuals can claim individual and directly a concrete violation of constitutional rights. This lawsuit only can be presented at the Administrative Jurisdiction.

First of all it is important to present the general organization of the Portuguese Courts: in addition to the Constitutional Court there is the Supreme Court of Justice (and the Courts of Law of First and Second Instance) the Supreme Administrative Court (and the remaining administrative and tax courts) and the Audit Court. These 4 types of Courts are the Categories of Courts in the Portuguese Jurisdiction.

It is important to state that, since they belong to different categories, they are not at the same hierarchy system. An administrative lawsuit can only be decided for the Administrative Jurisdiction. The same for the civil cases that need to be presented at the Court of First Instance and then the appeals are decided by the Court of Second Instance. The Supreme Court of Justice does not analyse evidences but only how the law was applied.

Differently for the Constitutional Jurisdiction, since Portugal adopted the Judicial Review every court is allowed to control the application of the Constitution and to evaluate if any rule is against the Portuguese Constitution. The Constitutional Court only appears as appeal court, after a final decision and when a constitutional question is raised during the law suit - the Court ‘refuse(s) the application of any rule on the grounds of its unconstitutionality’ or if the Court decides to ‘apply any rule, the unconstitutionality of which has been raised during the proceedings in question.’ (article 280°).

iv. In Portugal there is no specific Supreme Criminal Court. Nevertheless we have a general Supreme Court of Justice that usually work as an Appeal Court and it is the higher court in the Portuguese Jurisdiction. Working as an Appeal Court the Supreme Court has the main task of reviewing the decisions or trials made by the lower courts when the parties claim that had occurred a legal error. Normally the Supreme Court of Justice cannot answer to questions of facts: the trials are strictly to the discussion of questions of law. The Supreme Courts does not analyse evidences but only how the law was applied. However, sometimes the Supreme Court has the competence to answer to both questions – article 11th CPP number 2 – Regarding criminal cases, the President of the Supreme Court of Justice is responsible for: a) the resolution of conflicts between the Supreme Court of Justice sections; b) give authorization to record and transcript the conversations of the President of Portuguese Republic, the Prime-Minister and the President of the Portuguese Assembly and also to order the destruction of that recorded material (...)

Regarding criminal cases, the Supreme Court of Justice is also responsible for the President of the Portuguese Republic, President of the Portuguese Assembly and the Prime-Minister trials for the crimes they committed and were related to that political positions (article 11th number 3. a). The same applies for the Supreme Court of Justice Judges, Public Prosecutor Office and Judges of Second Instance Court : the Supreme Court of Justice is responsible for the trials of crimes committed and related to these positions.

In all these cases, since the Supreme Court of Justice is working as a First Instance Court, it can answer to questions of facts and questions of law.

Even for certain types of Appeals – the extraordinary Revision Appeal (article 449th – 466th CPP) the Appeal Court can answer to question of facts when new facts are the motivation of the Appeal and these new facts can create reasonable doubt about the former conviction.

Regarding the Supreme Court administrative organization there are different sections: some are specialized in Criminal Actions, others only work with civil cases and other with labour cases. – (article 34th from Law 52/2008 – Judicial Courts Organization Law)

Concerning the rules of court or procedure rules we should follow the Code of Criminal Procedure, published in 1987, to know which Court is suitable for each lawsuit. However, we cannot forget that the Supreme Court does not work as a court of first instance only as a last instance court. First it is mandatory to bring the action to an initial trial court – ‘Tribunais de 1<sup>a</sup> Instância ou de Comarca’. Therefore, only after a final judgment, which usually completes the case, the parties can decide to appeal to a higher court.

There is a specific section on the Code of Criminal Procedure that rules the Appeals in general (articles 399º - 466º Código Processo Penal).

Furthermore, it is also necessary to distinguish the regular appeals from the extraordinary ones. According to the Code of Criminal Procedure, it is possible to appeal during 20 days after the final decision. This is a regular appeal and it's always possible (except in certain circumstances where there is not an exact legal and final decision).

The part should base to get a successful appeal. After that the judge will evaluate the appeal and confirm the last decision or change it.

v. Early it was settled that a change on Criminal area should be done due to 25th April 1974 – The Carnation Revolution. After intensive working groups it was published the Decree-Law no. 400/82 of 23rd September which contains the Portuguese Criminal Code.

According to this new Criminal Code the age to be criminally punished is 16 years. There is a huge controversial public discussion in Portugal regarding this age, however, the article 19º established that the under age 16 thus not have criminal responsibility and cannot be sentenced as an adult.

It is also important to stress that there is special legislation regarding Juvenile Delinquent according to article 9º Criminal Code and Decree-Law nr 401/82 of 23rd September for those who are between 16 to 21 years old.

2 SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW

2.1 Sexual Abuse

i. The Portuguese legislation applies the fairly undetermined expression “relevant sexual act” in the pertinent legal articles<sup>30</sup>, whose definition cannot be found in the Portuguese Criminal Code. Nevertheless, doctrine<sup>31</sup> has defined it as any behaviour which nature, content or meaning severely contends with the freedom or sexual determination of those who practice or suffer it. It has been comprehended that two elements should always be analyzed – the objectively sexual nature of the act, and its subjective component, both the impact caused to the minor as the sexual intention of the accused. This way, the concrete circumstances of the situation shall always be considered. Nonetheless the fact that the criminal theoretical tend to an over restrictive interpretation, leaving child victims of sexual abuse with no physical evidences unprotected, the national jurisprudence has applied the term somewhat broadly. A distinction is made between relevant sexual acts and copulation, anal or oral intercours, vaginal or anal objects or body parts introduction, being that the latter are aggravated forms of sexual abuse.

ii. As a general principle of the criminal law it is stated that only intentional acts shall be punished, as well as, when legally previewed, negligence. The concept of intent consists in two key elements, both pondered at the time of the fact. The first, referred to as the intellectual or cognitive element, is characterized by the knowledge of the illicitness of the offender's conduct. The volitional or dispositional element represents the decision issued to such conduct, and its' execution. This last element allows us to distinguish between three categories regarding intention. The first degree contains two elements: the representation of the circumstances that fulfil the "actus reus", and the intent to act so. The "actus reus" is the direct and immediate goal of the defendant. The second degree is applied when the accused acknowledges the criminal fact as a necessary consequence of his/her conduct. He foresees the "actus reus", as a certain or almost certain effect, although it is not the direct end of his/her action. In the third degree, the perpetrator recognises the "actus reus" as a virtual cause of his behaviour, not intending the fact per se, but accepting the possibility of its performance.

Note that this conception of intent is highly influenced by the German's understanding. The national legislation establishes no criminal liability of a crime of sexual abuse committed by negligence or by omission, but only of an intentional nature.

iii. 14 is the determinant age concerning sexual activity. The Portuguese law establishes the minority as less than 18 years old, and sets at 16 years old the capacity to consent. However, in the matter of sexual abuse, the Criminal Code has the age of 14 as the key one. No sexuality is recognised to children less than 14 years old. In fact, there is what we can consider a legally imposed abstinence. It is irrelevant if the child has given its consent or not, as it is understood that sexual activities prior to this age will always jeopardize the child's sexual development and self-determination<sup>32</sup>.

Bearing in mind the irrelevance of the minor's consent, it is possible to contemplate an offense of sexual abuse between minors. The Portuguese jurisprudence has acknowledged such possibility<sup>33</sup>, considering that the gap of ages between the minors is relevant, and attending to the concrete circumstances of the case.

iv. The Portuguese Criminal Code distinguishes between crimes against sexual freedom and crimes against sexual self-determination. The later refer to consensual sexual interactions, which are criminalized taking into consideration the young age of at least one of the perpetrators who practice or suffer the sexual act. Consent is irrelevant in such cases, for it is understood that any sexual act at that age will jeopardize one's development and self-determination, since there is not enough maturity to understand such acts or their meaning.

Crimes against sexual freedom embrace instances where no consent has been given. Here are punished 'sexual coercion' and 'rape'. These legal types have in common the requirement that the defendant has made use of violence or serious threat, or for that purpose put the victim in a state of unconsciousness, being that 'rape' is applied in the case of copulation, anal or oral intercourses, vaginal or anal objects or body parts' introduction<sup>34</sup>. These crimes' victims can either be an adult or a child, being that minority operates as an aggravation. If the victim is less than 16 years old, penalty shall be aggravated to a third, to the minimum and maximum limits. Where the victim is less than 14, penalty shall be aggravated by half.

v. National legislation previews no crime of incest, as the criminal law is based on the leading principle that any private consensual sexual activity, regardless of its nature, between adults, isn't to be regarded. However, despite the fact that the crime of incest has no independent preview, such relationship isn't completely ignored by the law, as it functions as an aggravation of the crime of sexual abuse – sibling sexual abuse is a type of aggravated child abuse.

vi. Taking advantage of the authority resulting from a family relationship, guardianship, trusteeship, hierarchical obedience, economical or work dependence, allows the perpetrator to be punished for the crimes of ‘sexual coercion’ and ‘rape’, even in cases where no violence or serious threat has taken place. Such circumstances regarding the relationship between the accused and the victim can also function as an aggravation. Liability of these crimes is justified by the thought that the victim’s freedom is tempered by the existence of a dominance relationship.

Special circumstances where the victim is incapable of resistance or institutionalised are taken into deliberation in autonomous articles. Once more, it is considered that due to that condition, one’s liberty is severely diminished.

Article no 165 contemplates the criminal liability of a relevant sexual act engaged with an unconscious or, for a different reason, incapable of resistance person. The perpetrator takes advantage of such state or incapacity.

In addition, article no 166 previews circumstances where the victim is institutionalized, whether it is due to need of care or assistance, judicial sentence or education. The defendant will then take advantage of his/hers position or occupation in such facility, as of the victim’s condition. This particular crime gained considerably more awareness due to the case law referring to Casa Pia de Lisboa. Casa Pia is a public institution that offers education services and temporary accommodation for minors in risk of social exclusion or without parental support. The case, turned public in 2002, revealed several offenses of child abuse committed within this institution, by employees that availed their status and trust gained among children, through money offers.

2.2 Child Prostitution

vii. Portugal is a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Human Trafficking, being the signature dates to 16/05/2005, and having ratified it at 27/02/2008. The Convention’s entry into force dates to 1/06/2008.

viii. National legislation defines “child prostitution” in Criminal Code’s article 174, as the active behaviour of engaging in a relevant sexual act with a minor between the ages of 14 and 16 years old, in exchange for payment or any other form of recompense. Copulation, anal or oral intercourses, vaginal or anal objects or body parts introduction are aggravated forms of this offense. This crime’s perpetrator is necessarily an adult, never minding its gender, and the recompense can include any material advantaged, not only monetary payment. Such definition is compatible with the article 19/2 of the Lanzarote Convention, both regarding the conduct to be perpetrated and the broad interpretation of the remuneration needed, even though the Convention does not mention the majority of the defendant. The promotion, favouring and facilitation of such practice also represent an important offense regarding child prostitution.

ix. Criminal liability of the user, thus being the person who pays to conduct sexual activities with children, is affirmed in article 174, under the title ‘use of minors’ prostitution’. As for the recruiter, his liability can be found in article 175, ‘minor’s favouring prostitution’, the recruiter being the person that coordinates the business of child prostitution. As article 174 finds correspondence in Convention’s article 19/1.c, Conventions’ 19/1.a and b are previewed by article 175.

2.3 Child Pornography

x. The Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime was signed by Portugal on the 23rd of November 2001. It was approved by Resolution nr. 88/2009 of the Portuguese Parliament and ratified by Presidential Decree nr. 91/2009 on the 29th of August 2009, as published in Portugal’s Official Journal nr. 179/2009 on the 15th of September 2009. On the 24th of March 2010 the ratification of the Convention was deposited with the Secretary General of the Council of Europe, date in which it is considered to be officially ratified by the Portuguese Government. Pursuant to article 36(4) of the Convention, it entered into force in Portugal on the 1st of July 2010.

Upon ratification, Portugal issued the following reservation:

“In accordance with Article 24, paragraph 5, of the Convention, the Portuguese Republic declares that it shall not grant extradition of persons who: a) are to be trialled by an exceptional court or who are to serve a sentence passed by such a court; b) it has been proved will be subject to a trial which affords no legal guarantees of criminal proceedings complying with the conditions internationally recognised as essential to the protection of human rights, or will serve their sentences in inhuman conditions; c) are being demanded in connection with an offence punishable with a lifetime sentence or a lifetime detention order. The Portuguese Republic shall grant extradition only for crimes punishable with penalty of deprivation of liberty superior to one year. The Portuguese Republic shall not grant extradition of Portuguese nationals. Portugal shall not grant extradition for offences punishable with the death penalty under the law of the requesting State. Portugal shall authorise transit through its national territory only in respect of persons whose circumstances are such that their extradition may be granted.<sup>35</sup>”

In order to harmonize national legislation with the Convention on Cybercrime, Law nr. 109/2009, September 15th, was passed.

xi. The most relevant piece of national legislation regarding child pornography (rectius, underage<sup>36</sup> pornography) is article 176 of the Portuguese Penal Code, where no clear-cut definition of “child pornography” analogous to that of Article 20(2) of the Lanzarote Convention can be found in order to assess the compatibility of both.

In Portugal, in order to ascertain a definition of “child pornography”, one must therefore turn to international agreements or European acts to which the State is bound, such as article 2(c) of the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography; article 1(b) of the Council Framework Decision nr. 2004/68/JHA of 22 December 2003 on combating the sexual exploitation of children and child pornography; or Directive nr. 2011/92/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 December 2011 on combating the sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children and child pornography, which will replace the Council Framework Decision 2004/68/JHA.

xii. According to Article 176 of the Portuguese Penal Code, the State attributes criminal liability to any male or female of at least 16 years of age<sup>37</sup> who attempts or succeeds in one of the following four actions<sup>38</sup>:

1. Using or inciting an underage person to participate in a show, photo, film or digital recording of a pornographic nature;
2. Producing, distributing, importing, exporting, broadcasting, exhibiting or transferring pornographic material, for any reason and by any means;

3. Acquiring or possessing pornographic material with the intent to distribute, import, export, broadcast, exhibit or transfer it;
4. Acquiring or possessing pornographic material even without such intent.

It should be noted that we presently make reference only to the so-called real child pornography (i.e. featuring real children). Below we will address other forms of child pornography, such as virtual or realistic child pornography and seeming child pornography.

Still, the legislation is fundamentally compatible with article 20(1) of the Convention to the extent it criminalises most of the conducts listed down in the latter, perhaps with exception made to paragraph 1.f. This paragraph is intended to proscribe the conduct of those who knowingly and intentionally enter websites where child pornography is available and proceed to watch it by means other than downloading<sup>39</sup> (e.g., streaming videos or observing images online), therefore never de facto “acquiring” or “possessing” any of the pornographic material. In fact, the Portuguese provision does not cover such conduct, which could therefore take place without incurring criminal liability. However, seeing as article 20(4) of the Convention expressly provides each State with the right not to apply paragraph 1.f., the Portuguese legislation could still be deemed compatible with article 20(1) of the Lanzarote Convention.

xiii. In regards to the reservation rights provided to all states party to the Convention, article 20(4) could be in play insofar as the Portuguese legislation does not apply article 20(1.f). Further reference to this issue can be found above (question iii).

Concerning the first part of article 20(3), Portugal does not criminalize the production and possession of pornographic material consisting exclusively of simulated representations of realistic images of a non-existing child.

As we have seen in the previous section (iii), Portugal criminalises four typical conducts relating to real child pornography. The conduct covered in article 20(3) of the Convention would be tantamount to wholly virtual or realistic child pornography (the virtual representation of a non-existing child), which the State does not criminalise in any way, shape or form; in contrast to partially virtual or realistic child pornography (the virtual representation of an existing child, with the assistance of graphic technology) which is criminalized if associated to production, distribution, import, export, broadcast, exhibition or transferral activities (parallel to action nr. 2, on question iii above) or to acquisition and possession with the intent to carry on any of the previous activities (parallel to action nr. 3). Finally, it is disputed whether the so-called seeming child pornography (featuring real people of age that resemble children) is criminalized, seeing as some scholars also include this final category in the concept of virtual or realistic child pornography, reasoning that the determining factor is the pornography viewer's impression that he is indeed watching a child<sup>40</sup>, while others hold that configuring pornography made by people of age as child pornography runs afoul of the principle of legality<sup>41</sup>.

Concerning the final part of article 20(3), there is no such exclusion from criminal liability under the current Portuguese legal provision.

In regards to control mechanisms, the Portuguese legislation does not require Internet Service Providers (ISPs) to report suspected child pornography to law enforcement or any other mandated agency. There is however a combined project entitled Internet Segura<sup>42</sup> ("Safe Internet"), co-founded by the European Commission with the participation and support of the Ministry of Education, the Foundation for National Scientific Computing, Microsoft Portugal, the National Agency for Knowledge Society and the Foundation for the Dissemination of Information Technology.

The mission of Internet Segura is to block illegal content on the Internet including (but not restricted to) child abuse and child pornography, and prosecute their disseminators in an effective way in conjunction with Portuguese law enforcement agencies and both national and international Internet Service Providers. It also strives to provide minors with information, guidelines, alerts regarding safe Internet usage, and even a help line and an e-mail address which children are encouraged to reach out to if they feel troubled or confused by anything they come across with on the internet.

xiv. The State does indeed criminalize the intentional conduct of making a child participate in pornographic performances.

It should however be noted that such participation may encompass several behaviours, ranging from the mere physical presence of the child as a passive bystander amidst the other interveners in the performance, perhaps with some contact of sexual nature or exhibitionism, to the practice of relevant sexual acts. Where actual relevant sexual acts take place, involving children under the age of 14, the case will be for “sexual abuse of children” rather than mere “participation of children in pornographic performances”.

As such, please refer to the section immediately below for a more detailed analysis of the legal nuances regarding the participation of children in pornographic performances.

2.4 Corruption of Children

xv. Yes, the State criminalizes the intention of causing a child to witness any kind of sexual activity. This crime is punished differently or falls under different statutes according to the offender’s participation in the act.

If the perpetrator does not interact with the child’s body in anyway, his/her acts will fall under article 171, nr. 3, a) or b), if the victim is under the age of 14.

Of course in order for a conversation, written word, pornographic show or object to fall under the scope of nr. 3, b), it has to be suitable to sexually arouse the child. Basically it’s not needed that the act is erotic or pornographic; it’s sufficient if it’s adequate to sexually arouse the minor. Our law does not distinguish between sensual or pornographic objects, therefore criminalized just the same.

- Pornographic conversation: It aims to include any kind of pornographic or sensual word exchange or oral communication (colloquial) by the perpetrator with a child or another third person in the presence of a child<sup>43</sup>, whatever its material support may be. E.g.: telephone, mobile phone or any other kind of technology. Since the statute explicitly contains the word “conversation”, some authors show their concern whether or not this also includes the exposure of minors to pornographic songs.<sup>44</sup>

- Pornographic writing: It includes every written/drafted text suitable or adequate to sexually arouse a child<sup>45</sup>, therefore any kind of exposition translated into alphabetic characters<sup>46</sup> falls under the scope of this provision (drawings, photos or discs are not included).

- Pornographic show: It's a meeting of several people who aim to watch or intervene in an act suitable to sexually arouse a child. The show does not have to be public or paid, it's sufficient that it's open to spectators, or rather, third people who only want to watch the show. The show can be either visual or audio (hot lines).<sup>47</sup>

- Pornographic object: It can be any object suitable to sexually arouse the victim. It can either be a drawing, photograph, a movie, or any other object in a solid state.<sup>48</sup>

- It's possible that the perpetrator might use his own body to corrupt the minor. Thus, article 173 nr 3, a), which refers to article 170, a), criminalizes "sexual importunity" when committed in the presence of a minor. It punishes anyone who commits exhibitionism (showing parts of the body with the intent of offending others' sexual freedom, but only when it is predictable that from such an action another sexual offence can result<sup>49</sup>) and "constraining others to sexual nature contacts", "which represents a normative phrase of difficult concretization and unparalleled in other legal systems"<sup>50</sup>.

The State defines "causing" as when the offender "acts upon" a minor under the age of 14 using one of the means or objects stated above. For that, it's not needed that the offender interacts with the victim's body in any way. It's sufficient that the minor participates in the act even if he/she takes an extremely passive role or just observes the pornographic object.<sup>51</sup>

As a general rule and according to our law, when the victim's age is between 14 and 16, the offender cannot be prosecuted for this crime, since there is not any statute which criminalizes this conduct<sup>52</sup>. However, when the victim and perpetrator are in a relationship of trust, even if the minor is over the age of 14 (and up to the age of 18), the act of corruption of minors is punished, because it is considered that the freedom and sexual self-determination of the minor entrusted to someone for education and assistance is in need of particular protection<sup>53</sup>, especially when the offender uses that condition to commit the sexual act, abusing the child's trust. To characterize this relationship our law resorts to the expression "under care for education or assistance", which aims to cover every relation of trust even if it has its origin in the law, contract, court decision or a de facto decision, or if the child is entrusted to a third person or family or a temporary, intermittent, permanent situation.<sup>54</sup> Thus the defendant, according to this provision may be parents, tutors, family members, professors, educators, doctors, social servants and any other person involved with his/her social or medical education<sup>55</sup>.

The articles which cover non-consensual acts do not explicitly criminalize the offense of forced corruption to minors. But that does not mean in this case it would remain unpunished. The perpetrator would be convicted for committing the offense of coercion or threat according to article 153 and 154 of the Criminal Code and the crime of sexual abuse under nr. 3, and subject to a concurrent sentence.

Moreover, if the perpetrator resorts to inducement or promises the victim a reward; he/she would still be punished, because his/her conduct is still an "actus reus" covered by nr. 3, since "there is a kind of "legal presumption" that certain acts, even though consensual, when perpetrated with a minor, are noxious to her/his personality's development"<sup>56</sup>.

2.5 Solicitation of Children for Sexual Purposes

xvi. In the Portuguese legal system, there's no specific statute which criminalizes an adult who uses information and communication technologies for sexual gratification with a minor. Instead, it covers any kind of "sexual contact" made or not through technological means. We show concern not to exceedingly criminalize every contact; the law only intervenes in some exceptional situations, in conformation with the "minimum intervention principle"<sup>57</sup>. In the context of solicitation of children, our law maker translated that to when "relevant sexual acts” or “oral and anal sex is practiced”. The rationale behind each provision aims at compassing sexual acts harmful to the child and which may jeopardize the development of his/her physical and psychological wellbeing and safeguard the child’s sexual self-determination. This means that when the perpetrator uses the internet for his/her sexual gratification, the law only criminalizes the conduct on the very moment it becomes relevant. Therefore, when the offender resorts to grooming, he/she will only be condemned if he/she practices any acts which fall under the several statutes mentioned up until now.

Today, the Portuguese courts have yet to deal with a crime of grooming perpetrated through the internet. But, if such a case should appear it would be solved using the relevant criminal law provisions from the Criminal Code, or else it would violate the nullum crimen, nulla poena sine praevia lege principle.

Grooming of a child can be achieved in several ways, but every method serves “to gradually desensitize the child to the culminating act of sexual abuse, which is his goal”<sup>58</sup>. This is often conducted in a set period of time where through ways of conversation, the offender exposes the minor to sexual material or induces him/her to produce child pornography. The purpose of grooming is to build a trusting relationship with the minor and slowly, step-by-step, educate the child to the sexual abuse that the offender wants to perpetrate.

The law does not prohibit innocent interaction in anyway. So even though some child molesters befriend the victim by talking about subjects that interest the minor, up to a point where the child fully trusts the perpetrator, at this stage, the law will not intervene. This stage could only be described as “preparatory acts”, which are not criminalized in the Portuguese system (article 21 of the Criminal Code).

The offender’s conduct will only become relevant when he/she exposes the child to sexual material. When the seemingly normal conversation between the criminal and the minor switches to a sexual topic, the actus reus is punishable under nr. 3, b) since it will be considered “pornographic conversation”<sup>59</sup>, or if the culprit resort’s to offline instant messaging that's also covered by the same provision but under the "pornographic writing"<sup>60</sup>. Although usually, in the most common cases, the minor does not know the offender's true identity or age, if by some chance he/she does and the perpetrator practices any lewd act in front of a webcam with a child on the other end, this act is covered by nr. 3, a), article 171.

Since the criminal's goal is in fact the sexual abuse of a child, the other question that needs to be answered is at which stage the agent may be accused for committing such a crime. The considerations made above about the sexual abuse of children are fully applicable here: in order for someone to be convicted for the sexual abuse of a child he/she has to practice any act established in nr. 1 and 2, article 171. So the proposition of a meeting is not enough to accuse the perpetrator of sexual abuse, but under certain circumstances, there could be grounds for attempt of committing the offense of children's sexual abuse.

In any case, if the child actually met the offender and he/she sexually abused the minor, then if the perpetrator used the acts depicted in nr. 3, a) or b) as a means to bring about the acts established in nr. 1 or 2, our courts would consider the former as a part of the latter and he/she would only be convicted according to the penance specified in nr. 1 or 2.<sup>61</sup> On the other hand, if by any chance, the offender forcefully imposed himself on the minor to achieve his/her goal (i.e. the sexual abuse), by resorting to "violence", "serious threat", or causing the victim to "become unconscious or in a state impossible to resist", is punished according to the penance established in article 177 nr. 5, and 6 and 171 nr. 3, a) or b), in a cumulative sentence, since it was the use of force the means to bring about the result. If later it was found that the perpetrator sexually abused more than one child, he/she would be punished for the two or more accounts and sentenced for successive terms for each crime committed.<sup>62</sup>

xvii. Under Portuguese law someone is considered an accomplice when, intentionally and in anyway, offers substantial or moral help to the commission of someone else's intentional crime (article 27 of the Criminal Code). Through this provision, the act of aiding or abetting is condemned and treated the same way. The same thing should be said when the secondary party helped the principal offender by offering material assistance or moral support or encouragement. For a secondary party to incur in criminal responsibility according to article 27 of the Criminal Code, his/her assistance and the principal offender's act must be intentional, there must be a causal link between the support provided and the actus reus brought about, and, finally, liability is dependent on the commission of the offence even if it doesn't go past the stage of attempt. In order to distinguish between an offender and his/her accomplice, we apply the now dominant theory among us, and heavily influenced by foreign authors such as Claus Roxin, called "dominion of the fact theory". In its essence, an accomplice does not have dominion of the principal fact or offense, over the act that is considered the actus reus, they limit themselves to facilitate it through the support offered, aggravating the injury caused to the legal interest committed by the offender<sup>63</sup>, even without his/her help, the offender would commit the crime just the same. In contrast, the offender is the one in control of the main fact, he/she is the one who has dominion over it, who brings the result to come about with his/her own body, it's up to him/her the "if" and the "how" of the offense. The crime wouldn't occur if the perpetrator didn't commit it. In addition, the perpetrator may have control over the result, without physically intervening in it, for instance when he/she has dominion over the executor's will (e.g. through err or coercion).<sup>64</sup> Moreover, it should be noted that this theory is not applied in crimes of omission and negligent.

A. For the crime of sexual abuse of children or teenagers

Anyone can be held accountable for the assistance provided to the commission of a crime of sexual abuse of children or teenagers, whether force was used or if it was of a consensual nature (article. 27 in connection with article 163, 164, 171, 172, 173 of the Criminal Code). As it was mentioned above, a secondary party is liable if he/she intentionally supported the perpetrator who intentionally sexually abused the child.

B. Child Prostitution

The same considerations stated above can be made here. But when the secondary party supports the child prostitution professionally or with an intention to make profit, he/she shall be considered the principal offender of a crime of “prostitution favouring” (article 175 of the Criminal Code).

C. Child Pornography and D. Corruption of Minors

Anyone can be criminally liable for any assistance provided to the commission of the crime of child pornography or corruption of minors.

E. Grooming

It's not an autonomous crime according to Portuguese criminal legislation; nevertheless, it's possible for someone to be criminally responsible as a secondary participant through assistance according to other relevant statutes.

Attempt

As article 22 from our Criminal Code explains, there is an attempt when the offender practices “execution acts” of the crime he decided to commit, but without reaching its full offense. The Law considers “execution acts”: conduct which is a key element of a determined crime (a)), or those suitable to bring about the result stated in a specific provision (b)), or according to common experience, and without disregarding unpredictable circumstances, it's possible to assume that the perpetrator would in fact commit the crime or would act in a suitable way to do it (c)). The mens rea for attempt has to be intentional, since it was the perpetrator's desire to bring about the full offence, not part of it.

Under Portuguese Criminal Law, not every attempt to commit a crime is punishable. As a general rule, an offender can only be convicted for the attempt of a specific crime if the sentence for the full offense is superior to 3 years in prison, unless the statute explicitly says otherwise (article 23 of the Criminal Code).

a. Sexual abuse of children

If the attempt is made against minors under the age of 14, or over the age of 14 up to 18 and under the perpetrator's care for education or assistance, the attempt is always punishable, because the prison sentence may exceed the three year limit. But if the victim is a teenager between the age of 14 and 16, the attempt isn't punishable, because the prison sentence may ascend up to two or three years.

b. Child Prostitution

Although the prison sentence for the commission's attempt of child prostitution may only go up to two or three years, the statute explicitly says the attempt is punishable.

c. Child Pornography

The statute's criminal punishment does not exceed the three year limit, nevertheless, under nr. 5 of article 176, one can be liable simply for the attempt.

d. Corruption of Minors

According to article 23's general rules, the attempt isn't criminalized.

e. Grooming

As stated earlier, the attempt for the crime of grooming will have to be interpreted in harmony with the other relevant crimes. It is difficult to judge when the offender can be accountable for the attempt of Grooming. Nevertheless, the answer lies in when one can consider that the offender committed any "execution acts" of the offense of sexual abuse of children, in this context. If in earlier conversations with a child the offender expressed his/her desire to have sexual intercourse with the child or showed arousal or sexual interest for the minor's body and to touch him/her in real life, is the proposal of a meeting enough to form a conviction of attempt? Or is the fact that the child showed up at the meeting place relevant? Since there is not any specific provision criminalizing this offense, several considerations have to be made, and we'll try to be brief.

Although the sexual interest might be important, we'll have to consider if setting the meeting is an execution act according to article 22, c). For the offender to be liable, his/her conduct must be considered, according to common experience, and without disregarding unpredictable circumstances, possible to assume that the perpetrator would in fact commit the crime or would act in a suitable way to do it. This provision's aim is to cover all acts which indicate that the legal interest protected by the law was, in fact, in danger. As such we have to believe that when the offender proposed a meeting, the child's sexual freedom and/or self-determination was in danger. We can consider that due to the nature and sexual intensity of the conversations, it's possible to assume that the agent would in fact sexually abuse the minor or would act in a suitable way to do it. On the other hand, it should be noted that the proposal of a meeting does not mean that it would inevitably occur, that all the relevant parties would appear at the agreed time and place, after all the perpetrator might at some point forfeit the commission, or the child, for several reasons, might not even show up. Which means it's difficult to say that at this point, the child's sexual freedom and self-determination was in danger. However, this solution might be defensible if the time period between the proposal and the actual meeting is considerably small (a few minutes? Hours?), because even though the distance between the offender and the legal interest was still far, the danger would be proximate<sup>65</sup>.

A somewhat different situation is when the offender just invites the child to his/her household. Here the perpetrator already committed all the acts considered necessary to bring about the result discussed online, which means it might be enough to form a conviction<sup>66</sup>.

Notwithstanding the considerations made thus far, some authors showed their concern that some perpetrators may use the lack of punishment of the attempt of the crime of corruption of minors to justify the invitation of a child to the offender's house, saying it was their intention to only show pornographic photos or videos, and not sexually abuse the child, therefore escaping conviction.<sup>67</sup>

In the end, we consider that in order for someone to be convicted for the crime of grooming, in its attempt form it is needed; 1) that the offender proposes a meeting; 2) the child has to appear at the meeting place; 3) the offender must have shown sexual interest for the child, before or during the meeting; 4) the time period between the proposal and the actual meeting is relevant in certain circumstances.

2.6 Corporate Liability

xviii. The liability of legal entities such as civil companies and associations is prescribed in Portuguese Law, with the exception of the State or legal bodies whose actions corresponds to the exercise of public power as well as international public organisations. In fact, in Portugal, the Law excludes criminal liability of administrative authorities, entities that grant public services and public companies.

Also, there are a couple of European legal frameworks that also state the exclusion of liability of "the State or any other public bodies acting in the exercise of their sovereignty rights and for public international organisations", particularly as far as criminal liability is concerned. For example, The Criminal Convention against Corruption - that was adopted by Portugal in 1.9.2002.

Portuguese legislation adopts the criminal liability of legal entities since 1982, regarding it as exceptional. However such rule did not know any practical applicability because the Criminal Code was very poor as far as the regulation of this topic was concerned. Two years later, the introduction of the Decree Law nr 28/84, January 20th determined criminal liability of collective beings considering economy and public health. So, we can conclude that the acceptance of such liability has been uprooted in an ascending revolution.

In 2007, considering the Law nr 59/2007 of September 4th, a general principle of non-criminal liability of collective beings was enhanced because it was very difficult to prove that people who held leading positions were liable for their practices.

Differently, as far as civil liability is concerned, there is no difference in the treatment aimed at companies and entities in general. However, when it comes to criminal liability, for a long time, such liability was not recognized until the introduction of a new article in the Portuguese Penal Code: article 11, which has thwarted that tendency.

Concerning to civil liability, the Portuguese Civil Code consecrates this principle very clear in its article 165<sup>o</sup> stating that collective entities are liable for the consequences caused by actions or omissions performed by their employees, representatives or mandatory, as far as some conditions are fulfilled. These conditions will be referred when describing civil liability in a further question. Nevertheless, taking into account the above mentioned, it is important to be aware of some situations and how they are regulated.

For example, considering civil liability of the State and other collective entities, the rules established in the Portuguese civil code will be put in practice if such entities have performed practices or omissions on the same ground as particulars. Nevertheless, if such actions / omissions are inherent to administrative functions, they have to submit to another legislation: Law nr 67/2001. So, Portuguese legislation establishes a difference between private and public field.

The situations regarding groups of companies and their criminal liability are not entirely regulated, which has paved the way to a couple of possibilities. The article 4<sup>o</sup> of the Penal Code states that Portuguese law regulates the facts that take place in Portuguese territory, regardless of the perpetrator's nationality. The article 5<sup>o</sup> predicts that the same law has also applicability considering facts that have not occurred in the Portuguese territory but which have been committed by or against other collective person, whose head office is in Portugal.

Moreover, being more thorough, we can consider the following situation: if an employee of a certain company or association is using its office and his position to undertake illegal actions as well as sexual abuse, the collective being can also be considered liable for it.

Portuguese legal framework introduces some differences between the actions / omissions directly performed by the leading person and those that are only indirectly influenced by them.

First of all, considering the definition of “perpetrator / defendant”, we need to know if the law refers to the leader itself or to any other agent. In order to determine corporate liability, the crime has to be committed by a person in charge of an authority and a leadership position, regardless of his individual liability.

Regarding corporate liability due to crimes committed by regular employees being held by their leaders, there is corporate liability if that leader has violated his supervision and control obligations. There is a general principle of liability of the Administration of the collective being – the administrative body of professionals has to organize their tasks and jobs so that their employees do not commit crimes aimed at collective goals.

When the offense has been committed by someone in position of authority on behalf of the collective interest, we can define such practice as direct commission aimed at a criminal purpose, regardless of a malicious or negligent practice. What is important to the existence of corporate liability on this topic is the identification of a physical, natural person who has adopted a special behaviour for the benefit of the legal person.

The designated indirect commission of the leading person occurs when the “fact” takes place as a consequence of the violation of supervision and control duties. However, the only facts on which the collective being can be liable for are the facts put in practice by regular employees, being held by diligent and prudent leaders, who should have avoided such consequences if they had performed his tasks.

When it comes to “leading person”, we must clarify that definition. According to the Portuguese legislation – article 11º/4 of the Criminal Code, “leading person” is the name used to designate a person in position of authority; control, supervision and decision-making process on behalf of the legal person. Such definition has already been presented by Portuguese jurisprudence (Case Law nr 395/2003 from the Constitutional Court). For example, considering a delegation or a branch office, criminal liability may be a consequence of the behaviour led by its director or manager.

The legal relevance depends on the fact that such leading person has committed the crime himself, on the grounds of immediate authorship; mediate authorship or co-authorship (Article 26° of the Criminal Code).

In addition to that, other answers need to be searched for interpreting the fact that the crime is undertaken by employees under authority and subordination of someone who has to comply with vigilance and control duties. There are some situations that impel to a precise and clear regulation: for example, when some orders or instructions have been barely communicated; if the leader has clearly omitted his orders when confronted with illegal actions by his employees.

On this topic, another concept needs to be pointed out: “fault in vigilando”. This expression designates the imputation criteria of the punishable fact to the leader and to the collective person. It is not a necessary condition that the leader has to be superior to the regular employee; it is enough that the first one has a position of authority and has not complied with his own obligations, which has impelled to his employees to commit infractions legally relevant.

So, the penalty attributed to the collective person also depends on the fact that the regular employee has committed the crime. However, if the conditions to its execution had been created by the leader, if the regular employee is under justification or exculpation causes or if he has committed a crime accidentally, having his conscience wrongly guided (error on legal interpretation of the offense), no penalty is stipulated for the entity itself.

Until now, we have referred to criminal liability although it shares common points of contact with civil liability. As far as the last is concerned, it is important to mention both leading persons and regular employees have to assume the legal consequences that result from their actions or omissions as long as they have acted guiltily.

xix. There are three different kinds of liability that national legislation imposes that are important to take into account on this topic. Starting with civil liability, it can be divided into contractual liability and extra contractual one. According to the Portuguese legal framework, as far as the contractual liability is concerned, article 800° states that the company ( or the debtor) is responsible for actions or omissions of its legal representatives or other people whom the company might resort to for complying with its obligations. If their behaviour deviates from the behaviour owed (in obligation) and cause damages to the creditor or certain involved third parties, the responsibility is imputed to the company as if it was this last one who had action or omission.

On the other hand, articles 483º and 500º from the same Code consecrate “extra contractual liability”. As a rule stated in article there is no liability but for guilty (intentionally or neglectfully) practised actions or omissions. On the grounds of the article 483º, legal consequences occur when the perpetrator has wrongfully violated someone rights, acting with guilt or negligence. As a consequence, he/ she is obliged to indemnify such third party if some damages are caused.

However the major doctrine has been unanimous and accepting that “extra contractual liability” also designates liability for the effects of legal actions and for the consequences of casual facts that happen “at risk” – “Ubi Commoda, Ibi incommoda”, when some strict conditions are met.

Considering this kind of liability, national legislation admits the name above mentioned for designating the responsibility of commercial companies and associations when some practices, which are considered legally relevant, are performed by its employees: “Ubi Commoda ibi incommoda” (Strict or Absolute Liability – it does not include guilt). The last statement means that if the so-called company takes advantage or benefits from the performance of its employees, it is also natural that the same company has to suffer or endure the consequences, even when negative, which are inherent to its work.

For example, if a person, following superior orders, ends up damaging a third party, taking into account that such action only took place because it was strictly connected with the tasks for which the agent had been designated for, the company has to suffer the consequences. On this topic is important to mention the article 500º which states the explained Absolute Liability (regardless of the guilt). Considering liability of legal entities, its extra contractual liability is referred in article 165 of the Civil Code which reproduces the all content of the article 500º.

Sometimes, but not necessarily, extra contractual liability on the grounds of article 500º derives from the fact the crime has been committed by someone who is the company’s legal representative. At the same time, the crimes need to be connected with the professional duties / obligations of which the perpetrator was responsible for.

Such behaviour may be designated as direct commission when the illegal action / omission has been intentional or neglectfully practised by the entity 's leader and for its benefit. On the other hand, the indirect commission refers to the violation of vigilance and control duties.

When it comes to the terms “whom is its legal representative”, it is important to clarify the “performers” behind “the scene”. The article refers to: managers; directors; members of the General Council and Supervision (for anonyms companies); liquidators when it comes to dissolution of corporations and even its mandatory or “ad hoc” attorneys.

However, corporate liability on this stage only happens if the obligation of indemnify has to be also supported by the agent, which means that five conditions need to be taken into consideration in the light of article 483° of the Civil Code: actions or omissions -: wrongfulness of the action or omission; fault (dolus or negligence); damage and causality between the behaviour and its consequence. At the same time, it is also necessary to verify if such practice or omission have taken place when the agent was complying with his professional obligation or because of the tasks the regular employee was in charge of. The practices he might have been performed or omitted “at random” or without professional connection are not relevant.

In addition to that, the Portuguese Code of Commercial Companies (Commercial Law) states, in its article 6/5°, that the company has to support the negative outcomes or consequences from the performance adopted by its employees.

As far as criminal liability is concerned, for a long time national legislation was submitted to a general principle designed as “societas delinquere non potest”, which can be translated into “non liability of commercial companies or associations” as they would not be able to commit crimes once they do not have physical and natural expressions such as “will” or “fault”, which are inherent to human beings. However, this is not entirely correct.

A commercial company might perform a couple of crimes in order to strive itself for a profitable purpose. The entity itself corresponds to a body of people who perform individual and specific tasks aimed at a collective goal, expressing a collective will. For example, regarding public health and economy, we can mention the Decree Law nr 28/84, January 20th). In fact, the introduction of corporate liability follows the European legal frame. More precisely: the Recommendation nr° 11, 19.05.2000 about human trafficking for sexual exploitation. We can also mention the Recommendation nr 16, 31.10.2001 about child exploitation. Both recommendations are from the Committee of the Ministers of the Council of Europe.

The Portuguese criminal code holds criminal liability of collecting beings – article 11/2º. However, the article itself impels to the evaluation of the circumstances before coming up with the certainty that there is corporate liability.

First of all, practices under current discussion need to be performed directly by a leading person or by someone on his behalf (who is part of a particular sector in which the first one is responsible for). Secondly, the practice has to be performed on behalf of the collective interest. That is the main set of criteria according to European Law and Council of Europe. In fact, based on the regulation published in The Official Journal of the European Communities, in March 31st 1999, “Liability of a legal person...exists if at least two complementary criteria are met: 1. the offense has been committed for the benefit of the legal person; 2. the offense has been committed by a natural person who has a certain leading positions within the legal person”. Therefore, broadly speaking, the wrongdoing is attributed to the leading person of the corporative being so that it can be considered liable for. The leading person needs to be functionally identified according to his/ her duties within the sector where the practice took place. The true intentions that contributed to it (if a person was motivated by malice or was “victim” of negligence) are not relevant.

Frequently, most of the crimes are imputed to the collective beings as “improper omissions”. Its representatives and leaders have a duty: guarantee that the illegal result is not put into practice.

The imputation criteria established for the Portuguese criminal system follows what has been stated in other European frameworks. For example, we can quote some Decisions: 9º, 2000/383/JHA; Article nr 4º/4 2002/629/JHA and the Second Protocol added to the European Convention on Corruption, 27.1.1999.

When it comes to criminal offenses’ limitation, there is a considerable number of crimes that might be imputed to legal entities such as: attempt; malicious or negligent criminal offenses; actions or omissions; authorship; instigation and complicity.

As far as children ‘rights are concerned, those corporate bodies can be criminally liable for: people trafficking (article 160º); sexual constraint (article 163º); sexual abuse (article 164º); sexual abuse on people who cannot be assisted (article 165º); sexual abuse on people under medical care internee (article 166º), specially when the victim is a minor (it also includes internees e inmates), as well as sexual abuse on children (art article 171º); sexual abuse on under age children who are held by someone in case of education, assistance (article 172º); the performance of sexual acts with adolescents (article 173); using prostitution (article 174); favouring minor's prostitution (article 175ª) and minor's Pornography (article 176º).

Moreover, taking criminal liability into consideration, Portuguese Law, more precisely the Law nº 59/2007, September 4th established the principle of subsidiary civil liability of leading people of the collective being through fines and indemnities attributed to the last one. Although it explains joint liability, this one can exclude if such leading people proof they have taken all the adequate measures to prevent their employees to commit the infraction. Also, if fine has been replaced by punishment by confinement, joint liability is also excluded because there is no more pecuniary obligation.

As far as administrative liability is concerned, we can add that Portuguese system recognizes another legal institute considering liability: liability for infractions. These infractions constitute a kind of violations that do not hold such legal relevance, which do not result in an ethically censored behaviour and do not require a serious prevention; therefore they are designated as administrative infractions. For example, if someone is driving his / her car, but his/her level of alcohol is not superior to a certain percentage, he/she will be punished with a fine, which means that his/her infraction does not hold social relevance so that it can be considered a serious law violation with criminal dignity.

In Portugal, there are both criminal liability and liability for the kind of infractions above mentioned that we can be integrated into administrative liability. If the fact itself simultaneously constitutes administrative infraction and a crime, the author will be punished because for crime, although accessories penalties already predicted for social infractions might also be applicable.

How does the connection of two similar liabilities work? The penal process takes place within a judicial entity. However, supposing that the Public Prosecutor files the process but agrees with the existence of administrative liability, it will re-send the case to the competent administrative body. We can conclude for a certain level of hierarchy regarding these two entities. The Public Prosecutor decision, considering if a certain fact can or cannot be designed as crime, will be binding to the administrative authorities that cannot thwart such decision because of the principle “ne bis in idem” – nobody can be judged for the same fact more than once.

Also, supposing that the accused is submitted to a fine or any other punishment pronounced by the administrative authority. Later on, she is condemned for the same fact but in the criminal process. The first decision (the administrative) will have to be considered firstly instead of the second one.

Therefore, in Portugal, we can say that the criminal political frame is based on hetero-liability and the imputation criteria for establishing liability derives from the criminal behaviour of the legal natural and physic person.

Recently, another kind of corporate liability has been emancipated: social liability. Broadly speaking, it refers to a wide range of duties, rights, ethical and social behaviour 'patterns which should be followed by professionals. This different and new kind of liability tends to incorporate social and environmental concerns into companies ' "daily routine" and interactions.

The penalties attributed to the collective beings do not differ too much from the ones imposed on legal people. There are penalties which are determined by the judge when he pronounces the sentence, regardless of any other. They are stated in the article nr 90-A of the penal code referring to fines and dissolution. Also, there are other penalties which can only be pronounced with the "main penalty", stated in Article 90-A/2. On this topic, it is important to clarify that a "main penalty" is a penalty already prescribed in law, designed for a certain legal fact /crime pronounced by the judge. On the other hand, subsidiary penalties referred to penalties whose its applicability depends on the existence of a main penalty which means that the first ones do not have individual autonomy.

We can quote some of them: dissolution of corporation; authorisations 'refusals for necessary administrative licenses or closure of commercial unities. In fact, the practice itself needs to enhance an insupportable social "damage", which imposed the immediate need to punish the corporate entities themselves.

At last, there are other penalties which have a replacement "function". They might be executed in order to replace the main penalties such as guaranty and judiciary supervision. These penalties are put in practice instead of a "main penalty" in order to avoid the applicability of the last one. They are regarded as penalties which are not inherent to the specific legal crime / fact but can replace concrete and already determined penalties.

xx. As far as corporate and individual liability are concerned, it is important to “recover” part of the content of the previous answer. Both situations (exclusion and non-exclusion are predicted).

In fact, the European Directive 2011/11/92 December 13th states that companies are liable for the acts or omissions performed by members who have representative powers; authority to make decisions on behalf of the collective being and for those who are responsible for supervision or control.

In addition to that, our Criminal Code states on its article nr 11°/7 that corporate liability does not depend on individual liability or that even excludes the last one. The Portuguese system accepts both liabilities also allowing the exclusion of one or other according to the situations. For example in the case of exculpation causes. This article also states that it is possible to conclude about corporate liability without punishing the practitioner itself.

So, we can conclude that this article designates a cumulative liability: the perpetrators and the company, if this is the case. In fact, it is possible to establish corporate liability, even if it is not possible to identify the perpetrator of the crime. If it is impossible to attribute the crime to the collective being’s organ or to the person in charge of control duties, there is no criterion for establishing a nexus of casualty imputation.

There are situations in which the Court can prove that the crime has been committed by authorities, but it can’t individualise the author himself, among others. For example, the perpetration of the crime was led by two people among eight. These eight people might have cooperated in the crime, concealing some evidences for example, but have not perpetrated it itself. Regarding such situation, the court cannot determine who the real perpetrator was; it is only aware of the participation and involvement of the group. Following this example, corporate liability is not excluded if the court concludes that the crime could only be committed by the company’s professionals. They ended up expressing the company’s will.

Similar to the Article 11°/7° of the Penal Code, we can point out Article 3 of the Decree-Law 28/84 January 20th, designating individual liability. Once again, the last can be accepted regardless of the corporate one, as well as the opposite. For example, if in the presence of a plural organ, one of its members has behaved without guilt strictly opposing to the violation of the law.

Taking into account the answer given on the previous question, on exemplifying the two necessary conditions for the existence of criminal corporate liability, the article 11<sup>o</sup>/6 from the Portuguese Criminal Code states that if the crime has been committed aimed at a collective interest, corporate liability will only be excluded if the author has rebelled against orders or instructions emanated by leaders. But such instructions need to be imperative.

First of all, when it comes to law violations committed by the collective being's members or representatives, it is important to clarify some definitions. There are singular or collective professional bodies, and there are independent and dependent organs. The first ones can act on behalf of the company. The organ itself can rebel against the expression of the decision made by the majority of professionals; the representative can rebel against the collective will and the dependent organ can opt for not adopting the instructions from the professional whom it depends. These cases highlight the fact that the individual behaviour is susceptible of differing from the collective goal.

If the crime has been committed by a natural and physical person who did not have the authority required for a leader, on behalf of the collective interest, corporate liability is excluded too. And what if the person has overcome the circle of his professional duties? Corporate liability is excluded too. So, there are striking differences between functional performance and personal one. The first designates the illegal facts, which have taken place during the exercise of the professional duties and because of them. On the contrary, personal behaviour corresponds to the exercise of functions that do not respect such professional obligations.

On the other hand, if he/she has taken all the necessary measures to prevent the crime, he is not considered responsible for it. Article 11/6<sup>o</sup> cannot be interpreted as a fault's presumption from the collective being. For example, there are situations in which some employees perform their ordered tasks by mistake, without having the ability to understand their wrongdoing. This situation is regarded as error on wrongfulness stated in article 17<sup>o</sup> of the Criminal Code differing from error on legal prohibitions stated in article 16.1<sup>o</sup> of the same code.

Another exception occurs when the criminal procedure against the leading person has already prescribed. That does not prevent collective being's persecution.

What is relevant for reaching the conclusion that there is corporate liability is the fact that the so-called "crime" or "wrongdoing" has been committed for the benefit of the legal person”, regardless of having achieved or not such goal. However, the major Portuguese doctrine tends to agree that it is not relevant if the “representative” of the collective being has guided his/her behaviour regardless his/her circle of duties and social aims of the company itself.

In Portugal, there are certain situations in which corporate liability is excluded. Firstly, if the regular employee has not complied with serious instructions emanated by leaders. Secondly, in the presence of a administrative or executive body, if the leading person has rebelled against the will of the most of the members of that professional body. Moreover, if the leader has been wrongly influenced or guided, or if he/she is under justification or exculpation fault causes. Also, considering an executive or administrative body, if the behaviour adopted by most of its professionals is under mistake and justification or exculpation causes. At last, if the regular employee has “has been wrongly influenced or guided, or if he/she is under justification or exculpation fault causes” and such situation has not been created by the leading person.

Another question needs to be pointed out: once the collective person is extinguished, it does not influence the extinguishment of its liability. In fact, according to the article 127/2º of the Penal Code, it is its capital that serves to pay out fines and indemnifies in which the entity has been condemned to. The same can be said about “merger”: it does not extinguish the criminal procedure put in practice because of a crime previously committed. According to article 11/8 º of the Penal Code, the responsibility can be imposed on the collective person or similar entities that resulted from the merger. However, regardless of their cumulative liability, the penalty is graduated accordingly to the reality in which the corporation is rooted in.

Also, corporate liability is not excluded in case of death of the person who has committed such punishable action.

If the leader has expressively opposed to wrongdoing, he is not criminally liable for it. If such person is part of a collegial body, liability is also excluded if he/she votes against the organization’s deliberation.

Law nº 59/2007 September 4th designates the principle of subsidiary and joint civil liability of people who hold a position of authority in case of them being condemned to fines or indemnifies. It determines that unless those who have a leading position have not taken all the necessary measures to prevent the offense, they are submitted to joint liability – article 3º/3 and 2/3º of the Decree-Law nr 28/84 January 20th , 20/1; article 3/4º of the Law nr 109/91; articles 17.8º and 134/4º of the Decree-Law 34/2003 February 25th , 25.02; article 497/1 of the Civil Code and article 79/1 of the Commercial Code. All the leaders who have been part of the offense's perpetration have assumed an opposite position regarding it are not liable for the offense – article 164/2º of the Civil Code and 72/3/4º of Commercial Code.

In Portugal, the rules which are inherent to joint liability depend on that fact that the fine has not been extinguished. The article 11/9 of the Portuguese Penal Code states that if the fines are not wiped out by the collective person or any other legally similar entity, the payment of the debt can be demanded from the subsidiary responsible for it, whether global or individually.

Article 9º of the Penal Code states that those who are in charge of a leading position are subsidiary liable for the payment of fines and indemnities for which the legal entities is condemned.

This articles enhances civil liability resulted from the crime. All the perpetrators are considered liable, regardless of their position. The doctrine tends to consider the last as an excessive rule because the person not only has to support the consequent fines and indemnities but has also to support the consequences from the collective person 's punishment. It is the civil law that determines who is responsible for the damages caused. Its articles nº 483 and 490º state that the responsible are the author, the instigator and the accomplice. Corporate liability highlights its own liability combined with the agent or the leader.

Also, there is the possibility of fine's suspension, although it only works in case of small and medium gravity; when the simple fine's threat is enough to comply with punishment goals.

It is important, once again, to mention the content of the Directive 2011/11/92 from EU, December 13th , which, in its article nr 12º states that regardless of corporate liability, judicial action can be brought against the individual authors, accomplice and instigator of the following crimes: sexual abuse (article 3º); sexual exploitation (article 4º); child pornography (article 5º); solicitation of children for sexual purposes (article nr art 6º) and instigation, complicity, assistance and attempt (article 7º). Please, note that the articles previously mentioned result from the Directive.

At last it is important to mention that even when there is corporate liability, it does not mean that the company has to support all the consequences. As far as it is concerned, corporate liability does not exclude individual liability (from the authors themselves or leaders, when confronting with a third party seriously damaged). Portuguese rules stipulate a direct liability of members of social bodies of administration and financial and do not exclude the right of reversion on the author(s) for the amount of money the company had to pay out for recovery the of damages ´ purposes. That is stated in articles 79º and 81º of the Commercial Code and artº 500/3 of the Civil Code.

2.7 Aggravating Circumstances

xxi. Directive 2011/11/92/UE from the European Parliament and European Council states that each Member State should predict in its respective legal framework aggravating circumstances for the crimes above mentioned according to rules directly applicable in its territory. Although there is no such obligation of putting such aggravating circumstances into practice, the Court has to take them into consideration when pronouncing a judgement.

According to this Directive, there are many peculiarities that are considered legally relevant for adjusting the due penalty. Among others: when the victim (the child) is under vulnerable circumstances due to mental or physical disability or mental state; when the crime has been committed by someone who shares an intimate relationship with the victim, for being member of the family, living in the same house or abusing of an authoritarian position; when the crime has been committed by a group of people or by a criminal organisation; if the author has been condemned by similar crimes or if such practices result in serious damages to the victims.

The national legal framework, on this topic, does not differ too much from the European one.

The aggravation of the limits of penalties depends on the presence of three cumulative requirements: the intentional performance of the crime; the result and the causality established between the author´s behaviour and the consequence (its direct consequence).

Considering article 177º from the Portuguese Criminal Code, one of the reasons behind aggravating rules and, as a consequence, graver sentences, is the sharing of a familiar relationship between the author and the victim. The content of such concept (“familiar relationship”) includes: affinity; parentage; kindred, but also hierarchical relationships based on economics, work and guardianship. It is this special relationship between the author and the victim that intensifies the gravity of the illegal fact and serves the purpose of the aggravating penalty. That one is also aggravated if the author took advantage of such relationship, not being enough the mere existence of the relationship itself. Which means that the Criminal Law is confronted with an element of the offense's description, whose the final conclusion depends on the proved certainty that the fact was highly influenced by the existence of a dependent relationship.

Taking into account such circumstances, the penalties attributed to the following crimes are aggravated a third on its minimum and maximum limits: Sexual Constraint (article 163º); Sexual Abuse (article 164º) Sexual Abuse on people who cannot be assisted (165º); sexual fraud ( article 167º); Pimping; Non-assisted artificial procreation (article 168º); Child Sexual Abuse (article 171º); sexual abuse on under age children whom are subordinate to someone in case of education, assistance... (article 172º) ; the performance of sexual acts with young people (article 173º); Under age – people 's prostitution (article 174); Pimping (article 175ª) and Child Pornography (article 176º).

However, different from what is stipulated in European legislation (the Directive, in particular), the limits of the penalties imposed on crimes such as Sexual Constraint (article 163º); Sexual Abuse (article 164º) Sexual Abuse on people who cannot be assisted (article 165º); sexual fraud (article 167º); Abuse on people who cannot be assisted (article 165º); sexual fraud (article 167º); Pimping; Non-assisted artificial procreation (article 168º); Child Sexual Abuse (article 171º); sexual abuse on under age children whom are subordinate to someone in case of education or assistance (article 172º) ; the performance of sexual acts with young people (article 173º); Under age – people 's prostitution (article 174) are aggravated if the author carries a STD – sexually transmitted. Recently, the Portuguese major doctrine and jurisprudence has enhanced that the aggravation also depends on the fact that the author was aware of his own health condition, despite the fact that our criminal legislation does not require such demanding. In fact, the kind of knowledge previously mentioned is not necessary considering that for the crime's performance and punishment what is relevant is the deceitfulness (malice).

On the other hand, another cause for aggravating the sentence pronounced by the court refers to the consequences of the perpetration of the practices above mentioned. If the sexual abuse results in pregnancy, suicide, death of the victim or transmission of a pathologic gene, all the penalties are aggravated in a half, accordingly to article 177/3º. On this topic, it is important to mention the article 18º which refers to aggravated offenses by the event. Then, we need to consider that the aggravation is always influenced by the possibility of attributing that result to the author, even if negligently.

However, if the intentional crimes lead to serious criminal offense such as physical integrity violation or death of the victims, the author is submitted to a different punishment: cumulating offenses - the homicide and the serious offense to physical integrity.

Following the Leitmotiv of the European framework, penalty's aggravation also derives from the fact that the victim is underage, which means – less than 16 years old. However, different measures can be taken on calculating the quantum of the penalty imposed if the victim is less than 14 years old.

All these circumstances are stated in article 177 of the Portuguese Penal Code.

2.8 Sanctions and Measures

xxii. The state sanctions the above mentioned crimes resorting to the penalties already prescribed in law. In fact, Portuguese legal system obeys to the principle of legality – article 29º.1.4 of the Portuguese Constitution: the judge can only pronounce the penalty if it is stated in Law.

Sexual Constraint (article 163º) is sanctioned with imprisonment (1-8 years). Considering sexual abuse (article 164º) the main sanction is also imprisonment (3-10 years). For sexual abuse on people who cannot be assisted (article 165º), we have two penalties: when the practice corresponds to a relevant sexual practice, taking advantage of his/her mental and physical state and incapacity, the penalty is since 6 months to 8 years. When the practice is more serious (oral coitus) the limits are between 2 and 10 years. Sexual Fraud (article 167º), for instance, involves the same penalty's dimension: the first reality corresponds to a penalty whose the maximum is 1 year and the second corresponds to the maximum is 2 years.

As far as child sexual abuse is concerned the practice itself involves a penalty of imprisonment (1 – 8 years). However if the perpetrator intends to exhibit such practices or use the minor for pornography, for example, the penalty involves a maximum of 3 years. If the agent is moved by profitable purposes, he is punished with a penalty of imprisonment (6 months until 5 years) – article 171º.

On the other hand, under age – people's prostitution is also sanctioned with penalty of imprisonment although it also allows the possibility of fine's payment until 240 days – article 174º - penal code. Moreover, child pornography stated in article 176º involves a different penalty considering the actions performed. For example, if the perpetrator has used violence or serious threat or has performed the crime aimed at a profitable intention, as well as taking advantage of the victim's mental incapacity (a minor – not more than 14 years old), the punishment is inherent to 2 – 10 years of imprisonment. However, if the agent only favours the prostitution, he is punished with a sanction of imprisonment since 6 months to 5 years.

To sum up, we can conclude that there is a penalty including deprivation of liberty.

As far as extradition is concerned, Law nr 144/99 (December, 31st) has approved international judiciary cooperation to regulate such subject. Starting with extradition goals, it can take place in order to guarantee the penalty's effectiveness and to regulate the criminal procedure. In fact, article 31º of the same law states that the admission of extradition depends on the fact that the crime for which someone is convicted (even in case of attempt) is punishable for Portuguese law and for the law of the state of the perpetrator with a penalty not superior to 1 year.

Article 32º, on the other hand, regulates the situations in which extradition is excluded. This article refers to article 6º, 7º and 8º that also do not admit such reality. For example, article 6º establishes the refusal of the extradition's request if the process itself does not respect European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedom (4th of November, 1950) or any other international tools that Portugal has ratified. In addition to that, if the cooperation is required so that the perpetrator can be chased due its genre, religion and nationality, which might aggravate his/her procedural position, such solicitation is not recognizable too.

The request can be denied if the fact for which the agent is convicted has a political nature or share political connections. On this topic, we should refer that genocide, war crimes and other crimes stated in United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, Degrading Treatment or Punishment ( 17th of December , 1984) and other international laws are not regarded as political crimes – article 7º.

Considering the following situations: Portugal shares with another state the same process, based on the same crime; the perpetrator has already served the sentence and the process is extinguished, criminal procedure is also extinguished – article 8º.

Article 32º of the Law nr 144/99 as well states that apart from the situations above mentioned, extradition may also be excluded if the person has Portuguese nationality. However, if national extradition is regulated in treaties or conventions which Portugal has signed, if the facts are inherent to terrorism or organized criminality and the other state provides the agent with a fair and an equitable process, extradition is acceptable. Nevertheless, it is in the original State, in the national State that the penalty takes place.

xxiii. The sanctions are effective, proportionate and dissuasive. In fact, Portuguese legal system holds two kinds of sanctions: the ones that prevent freedom (imprisonment) and the ones that allow its effectiveness in public. Due to the principles of necessity and proportionality, the main goal of the penalty's execution is positive and socializing, which means that the goal is the reintegration of the perpetrator in society, which motivates the judge to consider the applicability of penalties which hold a replacement function (already explained) – Article 18°.2.3 of the Portuguese Constitutional Law. In addition to that, in Portugal, we can find penalties and security measures (which are aimed at “treating” and controlling the dangerous state in which the perpetrator can be found, not being considered when the agent has been influenced or moved by guilt).

The penalty itself is limited by the person's guilt, which imposes some limits that cannot be overcome – article 40° and 70° of the Penal Code. Also, article 24° of the Constitution does not allow cruel penalties, stating the so called principle of humanity – the prohibition of death penalty. It is important to mention that penalties are not automatically prescribed for a certain crime regardless its existence in law. In fact, the judge's decision has to be based on facts and judicial conclusions - articles 30°.3.4 and 27°.2 of the Constitution and 65°.1 of the Penal Code.

xxiv. Portuguese legal system established two kinds of criminal sanctions: penalties and security measures. The consideration of penalties depends on the perpetrator's fault. The main penalties are the ones which are already prescribed in law and are pronounced by the judge when he/she makes his/her decision. They include imprisonment and fines. Regarding legal entities, these penalties involve its dissolution and fines as well – articles 90°-A, 90°-B and 90°-F of the Penal Code.

Considering the dissolution of the legal entity, it only occurs when concluding that the last one was only created in order to perpetrate the crimes above mentioned or it is exclusively used by someone who holds a leading position to achieve the same outcome – article 90°F. On the other hand, fines imposed on the legal persons are limited. The minimum is ten days; if the entity does not comply with the obligation of payment, its heritage is susceptible of being executed. The Court established the fine according to the economic and financial state of the entity – article 90°-B and article 71° and 40° of the Penal Code.

The same code states accessory penalties which can take place at the same time that the main penalty as well as replacing it. We have the prohibition of establishing certain kinds of contracts with other entities – article 90°H; judiciary injunction article 90°G; the interdiction of a public activity's exercise article 90°J; closure of establishment article 90°L and publishing of the judicial decision article 90°M, to quote some.

xxv. For example, we can refer child pornography considering the materials used for that. The agent can be seriously punished if he/she distributes, promotes, obtains and exhibits pornographic materials (photographs, recording videos) – article 176° contemplates a penalty of imprisonment (1 -5 years). If someone has voluntarily obtained such materials, he/she can be also sanctioned with imprisonment (until 1 year) or with a fine. We could not find more information regarding this question.

xxvi. The answer of such question implies the consideration of the specificity of some crimes. Starting with sexual constraint (article 163°), when the action is a consequence of abuse of authority by a familiar member, the sanction corresponds to imprisonment (until 2 years). The same situation is sanctioned when it comes to sexual abuse (article 164°), although the limit is now until 3 years.

Article 179° of the Penal Code states the inhibition of parental responsibility within a period between 2 and 15 years if the crimes regulated in articles 163° until 176° have been committed by someone in charge of such responsibility.

3.1 Investigation

Looking at criminal proceedings where children are the victims of crimes against freedom or sexual self-determination<sup>68</sup>, the “best interest of the child” is a sensitive issue and the cause for heated discussion, but it should be brought to the spotlight.

The “best interests of the child”, as mentioned by article 3 of the Convention on the Rights of Children, is a primordial criterion that must be considered in every decision involving a child, even when they are made by a public entity. So, we can conclude that the “best interest of the child” appears as a core legislative principle when it comes to laws that involve children, regardless of the particular issue they focus<sup>69</sup>.

We can affirm that the Portuguese Criminal Procedure Law contains a set of principles that must guide the other public bodies, namely the Public Prosecution and the judges<sup>70</sup>. But, when facing a sexual crime against a child, we can say that the “best interest of the child” is also considered a procedural principle that must be taken into account by those bodies<sup>71</sup>.

This means that the “best interest of the child” may work as a negative delimitation to certain procedural norms in force. The law establishes some procedural instruments and intervention measures to protect the minor, still taking into account that all the others subjects’ procedural guarantees are assured. To give a few examples: the exceptional rules for a minor’s deposition, the restrictive pre-trial rules that may be imposed on the accused, the possibility of a process’ provisory suspension<sup>72</sup> when the interests of the minor call for it<sup>73</sup>.

When the Portuguese legislator gave the crimes against a minor’s sexual freedom and self-determination a public nature, he imposed a duty upon the Public Prosecution to promote the criminal process every time they become aware a crime has been committed, without the need of a formal complaint by the victim. Consequently, the thesis that the best interest of the child is to promote the penal process was adopted. It should be noted that until 2007 the proceedings for this type of crimes was dependent of a complaint by the child’s legal

<sup>70</sup> The Portuguese Criminal Procedural Law has a civil law structure. Our criminal procedure has been characterized as an accusatorial structure’s model, which means that there are two different entities, one is the investigator and the accuser - the Public Prosecutor -, and the other is the judging entity. However, the accusatorial structure is integrated by a principle of judicial investigation that allows the judges to investigate autonomously the facts necessary for the discovery of the truth, as stipulated by article 340, nr. 1, of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

<sup>72</sup> The process’ provisory suspension is an institute provided in the articles 281 and 307 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. This institute allows that, verified certain requirements of the article 281 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Public Prosecutor, with the agreement of the investigating judge, during the inquiry, or the investigating judge, with the agreement of the Public Prosecutor, during the “instruction” phase, to suspend the criminal procedure by imposing on the accused some injunctions and rules of conduct. It is an exception to the principle of legality and its application is guided by criteria of discretionary and consensus.

guardian and, in their absence, the Public Prosecution could promote it, but they had to observe the criterion “if the victim’s interest calls for it”<sup>74</sup>.

However, having in mind the child’s interest, article 178, nr. 3, of the Criminal Code allows the process’ provisory suspension by the Public Prosecution, in crimes against a minor’s sexual freedom and self-determination not aggravated by the result<sup>75</sup>, in concordance with the judge and the accused, and as long as no similar measure had been applied concerning a crime with the same nature. This instrument is an expression of the “best interest of the child” principle which, in some situations, may not be to carry on with the penal process<sup>76</sup>.

During the investigation of a sexual crime against a child, when the legal requisites are verified, certain measures of promotion and protection of the child by competent entities must be undertaken. Some of these measures can be found in Law nr. 147/99, September 1st<sup>77</sup>, known as “law concerning the protection of endangered children and youngsters”. According to article 3, nr. 2, a), of this law, a child is in danger, as it is easily understood, when he/she is the victim of sexual abuses. The legitimacy for the application of promotion and protection measures results from the fact that the child’s legal guardians where the ones that were putting him/her in danger, or from the fact that these legal guardians did not develop any effort to cease the danger a third party was creating (see article 3, nr. 1, of the Law nr. 147/99).

Due to the circumstance that often the aggressor is someone close to the child, he/she can be temporary moved from the family or closed social group he/she is included in. Therefore, during any penal process stage, namely during “inquiry” following a request by the Public Prosecution, the judge may determine the child’s temporary removal – see article 31, nr. 2, of the Law nr. 93/99, July 14th<sup>78</sup>, and article 38 of the law concerning the

<sup>75</sup> See article 18 of the Criminal Code. A crime aggravated by the result is the one that the result exceeds the intention of the agent, so, the result is charged by way of negligence. For example, the aggressor intended to perpetrate a sexual abuse, but, because of this abuse, he killed the minor.

<sup>76</sup> For example, it can be applied to the accused some injunctions or rules of conduct as: exclusion from contact with certain people or places; reside or not reside in certain place; attend certain programs or activities. In the case of crimes against freedom or self-determination of minors, the duration of the suspension, and the compliance of the injunctions, may be up to five years.

protection of endangered children and youngsters. When all the legal requisites are complied with, a temporary measure can be applied: the child may be taken in by a qualified family or a private or public institution (see articles 46 to 54 of the law concerning the protection of endangered children and youngsters)<sup>79</sup>.

The judicial authority must also promote for the nomination of a social service worker to accompany the child and, if necessary, provide him/her psychological care, as established by article 27, nr. 1, of the Law nr. 93/99.

When it comes to the Portuguese criminal procedure law, the investigation of any crime takes place during a specific procedural phase designated “inquiry” (pre-trial stage). As soon as there is news that a crime has been committed, an inquiry is opened and it will comprise “the set of diligences that aim to the investigation of the existence of a crime, determine its perpetrators and their responsibilities, as well as discovering and gathering evidences, in order to decide about the criminal accusation” (see article 262, nr. 1, of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

The inquiry falls within the competence of the Public Prosecutor’s Office, assisted by the criminal police authorities (see article 263, nr. 1, of the Code of Criminal Procedure). The Public Prosecutor’s Office is the entity which represents the State and “puts into practice the criminal proceedings oriented by the principle of legality” (see article 1 of the Law nr. 47/86, October 15th, which adopted the Statute of the Public Prosecutor’s Office).

In our legal system, accordingly to the Law nr. 49/2008, August 27th, known as the law of the criminal investigation organization, the competent police for the investigation of the offenses against minor’s freedom or sexual self-determination is the “Judiciary Police” (Polícia Judiciária – see article 7, nr. 3, a) of the above mentioned law).

The competence for the investigation of such crimes is reserved to “Judiciary Police” following the principles of specialization and rationalization of the available sources for the criminal investigation (see article 4, nr. 1, of the Law nr. 49/2008), which means that the other police authorities, as the “National Republican Guard” (Guarda Nacional Republicana) and the “Public Security Police” (Polícia de Segurança Pública)<sup>80</sup>, must abstain from the investigation of these types of crimes (see article 4, nr. 2, of the Law nr. 49/2008).

However, exceptionally, in accordance with article 8, nr. 1, of the Law nr. 49/2008, the Republic’s General Prosecutor may, during the inquiry, grant the investigation of a specific crime against the minor’s freedom or sexual self-determination to another police, other than the “Judiciary Police”, as long as it seems, in that case, more adequate to the good progress of the investigation and, namely, if there are simple and evident proofs, or the investigation does not involve exceptional performance mobility or means of highly technical specialization.

With regard to the organizational units of the “Judiciary Police”, there is no specialized national unit for the investigation of crimes of exploitation or sexual abuse of minors, differently from what happens with other types of crimes like, for instance, drug trafficking (see article 22, nr. 2, of the Law nr. 37/2008, August 6th, which approved the Organizational Law of “Judiciary Police”, and Decree-law nr. 42/2009, February 12th, which establishes the competences of Judiciary Police units). Thus, the investigation of the crimes we are analyzing fall within the competence of the territorial, regional and local units of “Judiciary Police”. These units have their competence geographically bound and must prevent, detect and investigate all offenses that are not attributed to the national units, amongst which the crimes of exploitation and sexual abuse of minors.

During the inquiry, the “Judiciary Police” may perform searches, telephone tapping, as long as they have been authorized by the competent judge - the judge in charge of the preliminary enquiries-, seize objects used to commit a crime, as well as those objects that are the result of a crime.

Looking at the publicity of the inquiry, until 2007, the rule was the secrecy; this means that it was under judicial secrecy, because it was believed that this was the way to ensure the success of the investigations<sup>81</sup>.

<sup>80</sup> The “National Republican Guard” has a military nature and resembles the French Gendarmerie or the Italian Carabinieri, and acts, essentially, in rural areas. The “Public Security Police” has a civil nature and acts in urban areas. However, both authorities exercise powers of prevention, suppression, and investigation of crimes.

Though, since 2007<sup>82</sup>, the legal framework changed. Our legislation distinguishes two situations: the external publicity, when the process may be revealed to third parties that are not involved in it, and the internal publicity, when the content of the process is shown to those involved<sup>83</sup>. It should be said that during the inquiry, the rule is for the publicity of the process, external and internal, unless there is a decision by the competent judge that rules otherwise.

Regarding the external publicity, article 86, nr. 1, of the Code of Criminal Procedure, states that the rule is for the process to be public, even during the inquiry. Nevertheless, the judge may, upon request of the defendant, the victim or the assistente (“assistant”)<sup>84</sup>, come to the conclusion that the publicity may collide with the rights of the persons involved in the process and order judicial secrecy, under the terms of article 86, nr. 1, of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The Public Prosecutor, with regard to the same statute, can feel that the interest of the investigation is compromised and determine that the process must stay under judicial secrecy. Still, this decision is always valuated by the judge within a seventy two hour period.

Concerning the intern publicity, article 89, nr. 1, of the Code of Criminal Procedure, prescribes that, during the inquiry, the persons, namely the accused, the victim (that may assume a different role in the process, when it becomes a part which may carry proofs to the process as an assistente), and the “civil parties”<sup>85</sup>, may consult, on request, the process, unless it is under judicial secrecy and the Public Prosecution opposes to this because he/she considers that it may be prejudicial to the investigation or the victims’ rights.

This legislative innovation, which determined the publicity as a rule during the inquiry, has been widely challenged by several authors; they believe that the internal and external publicity rule violates the Constitution since it goes against the accusatorial structure of the process, guaranteed by the Portuguese Constitution in its article 32, nr. 5, which presupposes the investigation to be secret, a non-adversarial phase, and a public judgment, an adversarial phase. It is sustained that publicity rule violates articles 2, 20, nr. 1 and 3, and article 219, nr. 1, of the Portuguese Constitution <sup>86</sup>.

For some types of crimes, the victim must file a complaint. If this complaint is not filed, the Public Prosecution does not have legitimacy to promote the process, due to the semi-public or particular nature of the offenses. When it comes to the semi-public crimes, the only element necessary is the complaint for the Public Prosecutor to promote the process, whereas for the particular crimes, the victim must become a part in the process, designated assistente (“assistant”; see articles 49 e 50 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). The semi-public or public nature of the crime is established by the Penal Code. All the crimes not configured by the law as semi-public or particular are public crimes and no complaint by the victim is necessary for the Public prosecution to promote the process.

The crimes against sexual freedom and sexual self-determination, where the crimes against minors are included, can be found in the fifth chapter of the Penal Code (articles 163 to 179). Namely, article 178, nr. 1 and 2 of the Criminal Code, as defined by Law nr. 59/2007, September 4th, lists the crimes that depend on complaint. Although some crimes need a complaint from the victim, like sexual coercion and sexual assault crimes, the penal law previews an exception for the crimes committed against children (see article 178, nr. 1, of the Criminal Code). This means that if, for instance, there is news of a child’s sexual abuse or child pornography, the victim or his/her legal guardian does not need to file a complaint for the investigation to be promoted. The only exception can be found in article 178, nr. 2, of the Criminal Code which institutes that a complaint must be filed when the crime is a sexual one involving teenagers (minors between 14 and 16 years old).

If the Public prosecution promotes a process to conclude whether a crime has been committed against a minor, when to complaint was necessary, the opposition of the victim, even if he/she is 16 years old does not imply the end of the criminal proceedings.

Even when a complaint has been made by a child's legal guardian and later they decide to drop it, the criminal proceedings do not end there since the legitimacy of the Public Prosecution does not depend on a complaint. It is understood that the Public Prosecution may begin, as well as proceed, a penal process because these actions are no longer in the pendency of the victim or its legal guardians<sup>87</sup>.

The recording and storing of convicted offenders data is regulated by Law nr. 57/98, August 18th, modified by Rectification nr. 16/98, September 30th, Decree-Law nr. 323/2001, December 17th, Law nr. 113/2009, September 17th, Law nr. 114/2009, September 22nd, and Law nr. 115/2009, October 12th.

Its article 3, nr. 1, states that the entity responsible for the criminal identification database is the General Director for the Justice Administration. This singular entity runs the General Directory for Justice Administration, a central service of the Portuguese State direct administration, associated with the Ministry of Justice, whose attributions also enclose the "assurance of criminal identification and the registration of those judged in their absence", as prescribed by article 2, nr. 2, c) of the Decree-Law nr. 165/2012, July 31st, which approved its organizational law.

The convicted offenders' data is stored at a central informatics file. They contain the offenders identification, parts of criminal decisions and communications of facts that relate to these subjects and must be registered (see article 4, nr. 2, of the Law nr. 57/98). Regarding the parts of criminal decisions and communications of facts that involve them, this information includes the court that made the decision and the process number, the offenders' identification, the offenders' civil identification, the decisions' date and form, its content and the articles applied (see article 4, nr. 3, of the Law nr. 57/98). When the decision convicts the accused, its extract must contain, in addition, the name and date of the committed crime, indicating the articles violated and the specific sentencing (see article 4, nr. 4, of the Law nr. 57/98).

When it comes to the data inscribed on the criminal record, the General Director for Justice Administration is, according to article 3, nr. 1, of the Law nr. 57/98, obliged to respect Law nr. 67/98, October 26th. This law, concerning the protection of singular individuals when their personal data is being stored and their free circulation, transposing Directive 95/46/EC, from the European Parliament and the Council, dated October 24th 1995, which imposes the transparent treatment of personal data in strict compliancy with the respect for personal life, as well as fundamental rights, freedoms and guarantees (see article 2 of the Law nr. 67/98). If the norms related to the criminal identification database are violated, Law nr. 67/98, in its sixth chapter, third section, establishes the criminal offenses and the sanctions the perpetrators may incur.

The data transmission to a third party is restricted in some situations. Article 7º, g) of the Law nr. 57/98 prescribes that “foreign authorities or diplomatic and consular entities, following permission from the Ministry of Justice and in the same condition from the corresponding national authorities, for the promotion of criminal proceedings”. Within the European Union, the same article 7, h), mentions that “the official entities of the European Union State-members, in the same conditions of the corresponding national entities, following authorization from the Ministry of Justice, for the purposes of article 27º, number 3 of the Directive 2004/38/EC, from the European parliament and Council, dated April 29th, as well as the entities from another State, within the terms established at an international convention or agreement, as long as there is a reciprocal treatment assured to national entities”.

Finally, we should add that Law nr. 113/2009, September 17th, altered the drafting of article 7º, a) of the Law nr. 57/98. This change was made to accommodate the exigencies of article 5 of the Lanzarote Convention, allowing access to criminal identification data by the judges and public prosecutors when the decisions involve adoption, guardianship, and curatorship, foster care, civil custody of minors or regulation of the exercise of parental rights.

3.2 Complaint Procedure

As previously explained, the criminal proceedings, since these are public crimes, are not dependent on a complaint by the victim or its legal guardians. Therefore, as soon as there is news that a crime has been committed (notitia criminis), the Public Prosecution must open an inquiry and start the investigation to find out what happened, with the help of the police.

The Public Prosecution may become aware that an offence has been committed by its own means, through the police or due to a complaint (see article 241 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). In addition, anyone who knows or suspects that a crime has taken place may make a denunciation to the Public prosecution, or to any other judicial authority or criminal police body. When the news of the crime is reported to these last two entities, they must transmit it to the Public Prosecution (see articles 244 and 245 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). In our legal system, as a general rule, the denunciation is not mandatory, except in the cases that the law stipulates that it is; for example, it is mandatory to all the police authorities for all the crimes that they know, or to the civil servants for all the crimes that they know in the exercise of their functions.

This denunciation it is not subjected to any specific formalities, and can be written or oral, but in this last situation it must be written down and signed by the entity that received it and by the complainant.

The only exception to this rule can be found in article 137 of the Code of Criminal Procedure which criminalizes the sexual acts committed against a minor between 14 and 16 years old, because, due to article 178, nr. 2, of the Criminal Code, the criminal proceedings are dependent on a complaint. In this case, the complaint must be reported by the minor's legal guardians (see article 113, nr. 4, of the Criminal Code). Yet, the Public Prosecution may begin with the criminal proceedings, even though it depends on a complaint, whenever he/she considers that this action is in the minor's best interest and as long as the victim is under 16 years old (see article 114, nr. 5, of the Criminal Code).

Since we are in the presence of a public crime, the criminal proceedings end when the crime has prescribed. To stop the prescription of several crimes committed against children, since often they remain secret during a large period of years, the Penal Code, since 2007, stipulates, in its article 118, nr. 5, that “in crimes against a minor's sexual freedom and self-determination, the criminal proceedings do not end, through the effects of prescription, until the victim is 23 years old”<sup>88</sup>.

In conclusion, we can say that the minor of 16 years, by himself/herself, cannot file a complaint when the crimes in question are semi-public or particular; the complaint must be made by their legal guardians or, in their absence, by their predecessor, by their adopter, or by their sibling and theirs descendants (see article 114, nr. 2 and 4, of the Criminal Code); the Public Prosecution can, also, due to the minor's interests and because he/she is a minor, promote the criminal proceedings, even without the necessary complaint (see article 114, nr. 5, of the Criminal Code).

The minor's legal representation is, normally, made by the parents. They are in charge of the exercise of the rights the minor cannot exercise by himself/herself, including the penal process. For instance, the minor of 16 years old cannot become assistente, but his/her legal guardian is able to do it (see article 68, nr. 1, a) and d), of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

But, sometimes, the legal guardians do not act, do not want to act, or are themselves the offense's perpetrators. In this situation, the task of representing the interests of the minor belongs to the Public Prosecution, resolving, hence, the problem of the lack of the child's legitimacy<sup>89</sup>.

When the crimes relate to a minor's sexual freedom and self-determination, contrarily to the general rule established by the Portuguese criminal procedure law, to avoid any damages to the minor's dignity and for his/her protection, the trial hearings, generally, are not public (see articles 87, nr. 3, and 321 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). The identity of the child victim of any crime of this type cannot be made public, by any means, by the media. If they do so, they may face criminal proceedings for simple disobedience, as established by article 88, nr. 2, c), of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

If a child victim of any crime is to testify during any phase of the process, even during the trial, certain measures are established for their protection, because they are a particularly vulnerable witness due to their age and because, in the majority of the situations, they are going to testify against their family or other people they depend on (see article 1, nr. 1 and 3, and article 26, nr. 1, of the Law nr. 93/99, July 14th).

According to article 26, nr. 1, of the Law nr. 93/99, the competent judicial authority has the duty to guarantee that the child's testimony is given in the best possible conditions so as to "ensure the spontaneity and the honesty of the answers" (during the trial, that authority is the judge).

For the child's protection, the judge may adjust the order by which procedural acts are to be performed to make sure that the child does not have to face certain persons, namely the accused (see article 29, a), of the Law nr. 93/99). The child's examination may be performed only by the judge, but other intervenient, like the defendant's lawyer, can ask the judge to make specific questions (see article 29, c), of the Law nr. 93/99).

Furthermore, in order as a child not to be recognized while testifying, means of image concealment or voice distortion, or both, can be used, as prescribed by article 30, b) and article 4 of the Law nr. 93/99, July 14th. The child can also be heard trough teleconference, and, likewise, means of image concealment or voice distortion, or both can be used. When the testimony is given trough this means, it should be made at judicial or police facilities article 30, b) and articles 5 to 15 of the Law nr. 93/99).

To conclude with, one should add that every time a minor is the victim of a crime against his/her sexual freedom or self-determination, they must give their testimony so that later it can be used during the trial; they must make statements ad perpetuam rei memoriam (see article 271, nr. 2, of the Code of Criminal Procedure). Therefore, when these statements were made, the minor may not have to give a new deposition during the trial, hence avoiding the psychological damages that such tense situation may bring. However, when it is possible for the minor to testify without any damage to its health, it should give a new deposition during the trial (see article 271, nr. 8, of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

4 COMPLEMENTARY MEASURES

i. The information is not available. The researcher has established contact with some institutions able to convey a general idea about educational guarantees although any answer has been received.

ii. Within the psychological literature, one can find, at least since the late nineteenth century clinical reports of cases of abuse. However these testimonies were, by the end of the 70's, early 80's, relatively unknown, attributed to childhood fantasy, or overlooked due to the alleged children inability to testify. It is, therefore, only in the early 80's that abuse constitutes object of social concern.

The prevention of violence requires a fundamental change in social silence, which has been tolerating this problem, a change that can begin in schools. The school curriculum could include elements related to the teaching of skills, values education and family life, as well as direct teaching about relationships and violence.

Thereby, the Law nr 60/2009, of 6th of August, establishes the regime of application of sexual education in schools and the Ordinance nr 196-A/2010, of 9th of April, which regulates this Law, establishes the functional organization of sexual education in schools. Thus, these are the Portuguese diplomas of reference on this matter.

The Ordinance nr 196-A/2010, of 9th of April, establishes, in its Appendix Table, minimum goals for sexual education:

- l) In the 1st cycle, teaching the protection of the body and concepts of boundaries and how to say no to abusive approaches; in 3rd and 4th grades, the teacher can develop themes that make students understand the need to protect their own bodies, and of defending themselves of possible abusive approaches;
- m) In the 2nd and 3rd cycles and in high school, teaching how to prevent mistreatment and abusive approaches.

The Law nr 60/2009, of 6th of August states, in its Article 2, paragraph e), as one of the goals of sexual education, the capacity of protection against all forms of sexual exploitation and abuse.

The Article 6 – School Educative Project – states that sexual education is object of compulsory inclusion in educative projects and that the students associations, parents associations and teachers must be heard.

In Article 11 – School Community Participation – is reaffirmed the participation of parents or guardians: parents, guardians, students and their respective structures of representation must take an active role in the prosecution and achievement of the purposes of this Law.

iii. In the whole process of child protection, prevention of maltreatment constitutes a key priority. Classically, 3 types of prevention are considered:

- n) Primary - providing services to the general population in order to avoid the appearance of cases of mistreatment;
- o) Secondary - providing services to specific risk groups in order to treat or prevent new cases;
- p) Tertiary - providing services to victims of abuse, to lessen the severity of the consequences and prevent relapse.

To implement these programs is necessary to raise awareness and stimulate public opinion on the need for prevention; include this matter in the national schools programs, in some college programs and in government programs, listen to the community; coordinate efforts at a regional level; seek support of groups with local power (municipalities, victims associations, schools, social authorities, voluntary organizations, etc.); mobilize, creatively, all members of the community; the participation of health services (registration of cases and participation in the prevention program), the existence of specific programs for groups at higher risk or more vulnerable; a long term program.

Prevention programs should be planned at a level of: specific training to professionals working with children and youth, family support (parental education programs, home visits and support programs from anonymous family groups), health service (improvement of health and life conditions of the population), community intervention (organization of campaigns and educational programs of information and public awareness about the extent, severity and the consequences of the phenomenon), social strategies and the creation of effective services in victims support, legal and judicial system and, finally, the responses of political structures that must be assumed as social partners in prevention activities relating to mistreatment.

By the way, a concrete measure that was applied in Portugal is The III National Plan Against Domestic Violence (2007-2010), adopted by the Resolution of the Council of Ministers nr 83/2007, 22nd of June which was structured in accordance with a model that defines five Areas of Intervention: 1 - Raise Awareness and Educate; 2 – Protect the victims and Prevent Revictimisation; 3 – Capacitate and Reintegrate the victims of Domestic Violence; 4 – Qualify Professionals; 5 – Deepen the knowledge on the domestic violence phenomenon.

A) Family support centre and parental advice: social response, developed through a service dedicated to the study and prevention of social risk situations and to the support of children and youth at risk and their families, materialized in their community through multidisciplinary teams. Goals: promote the study and the assessment of families in psychosocial risk; prevent dangerous situations; avoid disruptions that may lead to institutionalization; ensure the satisfaction of physical, cognitive, emotional and social needs of children and youth; improve the skills of those involved in the family system of children and youth through an integrated approach of community resources; promote mediation between the family and the services involved to facilitate communication, foster contacts and promote the solution of any difficulties; and contribute to the empowerment of families. Addressed to children and youth at risk and their families.

B) Street team of support of children and youth: social response through a service destined to support children and youth in danger that are detached from their families and that subsist by the route of deviant behaviours. Goals: promote their reintegration into their families, schools and communities; recover children and youth from the streets, encouraging the construction of a healthy lifestyle project; make primary prevention on drug abuse and deviant behaviours and routing the children and youth to existing structures to promote their social inclusion; outwit risk situations in young consumers and raise awareness for a change of behaviours and for the abandon of drug abuse; make STD's prevention and meet basic food, hygiene, health and clothing needs; and promote contact with families and the enrolment of the community. Addressed to children and youth in family and social disruption and at risk, without any context of institutional or family support.

C) Hosting Family for children and youth<sup>9192</sup>: social response through a service consisting in the attribution of the trust of the child or young person to a family or to a singular person, towards their integration in a family environment. Goals: guarantee the integration in a suitable family environment that ensures to the child or young person the needs and the attention that its biological family couldn't provide; ensure accommodation to the child or young person; guarantee appropriate care; ensure the necessary means to the individual development, education and professional formation; promote, when possible, the integration in the family of origin. Addressed to children and youth whose promotion and protection measure so determines.

- q) Temporary hosting centre<sup>9394</sup>: urgent and temporary measure, lasting less than six months, addressed to children and youth up to 18 years old.
- r) Home for children and youth<sup>9596</sup>: measure that is aimed to last more than six months, addressed to children and youth up to 18 years old.

To close this part, emphasis must be made to Abrigo<sup>97</sup> (Portuguese Association of support to children) and to Instituto de Apoio à Criança<sup>98</sup> (Child Support Institute), centres of documentation and support of children and youth.

v. In Portugal, help lines as 144 and 800202148 are emergency lines to which victims can call to get support and, once contacted, they assure them that the information they receive is treated with confidentiality.

vi. The Portuguese State began to worry about the issues of unprotected minors by formalizing, in 1911, the Law for Children and Youth. This concern has continued with the Organization Guardianship of Minors, in 1962, text that was revised in 1978 (Decree-Law nr 314/78 of 27th of October) and which remained in force until the end of 2000.

For maltreatment, and at international level, it is to refer the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Children (New York Convention of 20th of November of 1989), signed by Portugal on 8th of June of 1990 and ratified by the Resolution of the Portuguese Parliament nr 20/90, which states in Article 19:

“States Parties shall take all appropriate legislative, administrative, social and educational measures to protect the child from all forms of physical or mental violence, injury or abuse, neglect or negligent treatment, maltreatment or exploitation, including sexual abuse, while in the care of parent(s), legal guardian(s) or any other person who has the care of the child.

Such protective measures should, as appropriate, include effective procedures for the establishment of social programs to provide necessary support for the child and for those who have the care of the child, as well as for other forms of prevention and for identification, reporting, referral, investigation, treatment, and follow-up of instances of child maltreatment described heretofore, and, as appropriate, for judicial involvement.”

From 1st of January of 2001, it came into force the new Law on Protection of Children and Youth in Danger (Law nr 147/99 of 1st of September). This law took the ten years of experience of the committees of protection of minors at risk (Decree-Law nr 189/91 of 23rd of November) and restructured these committees with new powers and a new statute, leaving the court as a subsidiary of the new committees of protection of children and youth at risk.

According to Article 4 of this Law, the intervention for the promotion of the rights and protection of children and young people in danger obeys the following principles: a) best interests of children and youth (the interest of the child or young person is an interest that outweighs the interest of the social group "family", since the overall interest of the family group may be different from the interests of the child and, in a collision, always will prevail the interest in achieve full physical and intellectual maturity of the child or young person, even if the interest of keeping it in the family may be delayed), b) privacy (rights promotion and protection of children and youth must be done with respect for privacy, image rights and private life), c) early intervention (once the danger is known), d) minimal intervention (the intervention must be exercised exclusively by the entities and institutions whose work is essential to the effective promotion and protection of the rights of children and youth at risk), e) timeliness and proportionality (the intervention should be necessary and appropriate to the danger in which children or youth are at the moment when the decision is made and can only interfere with their life and their family as far as that is strictly necessary for this purpose), f) parental responsibility, g) family prevalence (prevalence should be given to measures that include children or youth in their family or that promote their adoption), h) mandatory information (children and youth, parents, legal guardians or the person having the custody of fact are entitled to be informed of their rights, of the reason for the intervention and how it is processed), i) mandatory hearing and participation (children and youth, separately or with their parents or the person chosen by them, as well as parents, legal guardian or person having the custody of fact, are entitled to be heard and to participate in the acts and in the definition of the measure of rights promotion and protection) and, finally, j) subsidiary (the intervention must be carried out successively by the entities with competence for childhood and youth, by the commissions for protection of children and youth and, ultimately, by the court).

The Article 6 of the Law mentioned above states that the promotion and protection of the rights of children and youth in danger lies in the entities with competence in childhood and youth matters, in the commissions of protection of children and youth and in the courts.

Entities with competence in childhood and youth matters:

From the Article 69 of the Constitution of the Portuguese Republic results, in its number 1, that children are entitled to protection by society and the State, with a view to their integral development. The Draft Law nr 265/VI, which approved the Law on Protection of Children and Youth in Danger, aimed at regulating the social intervention of the State and society in situations where the child or young person is at risk and, as such, in lack of protection. It is a state subsidiary intervention in relation to the intervention of the community, taking into account, first, the entities with competence in childhood and youth.

As examples of such entities with competence in children and youth matters, can be referenced schools and private institutions of social solidarity (mercies, parents' associations, associations or private organizations that develop sporting, cultural or recreational activities, the infant emergency, the Institute of Child Support<sup>99</sup>, homes and shelters).

In addition to the above mentioned private entities, other "entities" that deal closely with issues related to children and youth, such as schools, hospitals, day-care centres, local councils, the parish councils, the Institute of Solidarity and Social Security<sup>100</sup>, also have an important role, especially in the detection of risk situations and its referral to entities that can ensure the rights and the protection of the child or young person, as it will be explained below.

Commissions of protection of children and youth:

The commissions of protection of minors were created by Decree-Law nr 189/91 of 17th of May and are now called Committees for the Protection of Children and Youth, being regulated in Law nr 147/99 of 1st of September, in articles 12 to 33, working in extended and restricted mode (Article 16).

The Article 8 of the Law under consideration states that the intervention of children and youth protection committees takes place when it is not possible to the first entities to act appropriately and sufficiently to remove the danger in which children find themselves.

Intervening the committees of protection, its knowledge of the danger to the child or young person should take them to inform other entities of the situations that transcend their area of competence. Thus, it is imperative that the commissions of protection give information to the social security bodies of the situations referred to in Article 1978 of the Portuguese Civil Code (trust with a view to future adoption), when it is in question children or youth parents that are unknown or deceased, of the situation in which the biological parents gave consent for children or youth to be adopted, when the parents have abandoned them and other situations therein (Article 67).

In the same way, the committees, in accordance with Articles 68 and 69 of this Law, shall give notice to the prosecutor of the situations referred to in these articles.

Particularly relevant is the duty of the committees to make the prosecutor and the police authorities know that the cases in which the danger the child or young person is found were determined by facts that constitute a crime (Article 70).

Courts:

Courts appear as a "last resort" in promoting human rights and in the protection of the child or young person in danger.

The Article 11 of the Law on study states that judicial intervention takes place when: a) there is not an installed commission of protection of children and youth with competence in the county or parish in their area of residence, or the commission has no competence, under the law, to apply the measure of adequate promotion and protection; b) the consent required to the intervention of the commission is not provided or is withdrawn or when the deal on rights promotion and protection is repeatedly not fulfilled; c) child or young person opposes to the intervention of the commission of protection, under Article 10; d) the committee of protection does not get availability of the means necessary to enforce or execute the measure it deems appropriate, especially by opposition of a service or entity; e) six months after awareness of the situation by the committee, it has not been no decision; f) the prosecutor finds that the decision of the commission is illegal or improper to the promotion of the rights or the protection of the child or young person; and finally, g) the court decides the joinder of the proceedings of the committee to the judicial process, in accordance with paragraph 2 of Article 81.

Framework for Intervention:

The initial phase of the abuse discovery, i.e., the time of suspicion or detection, is crucial for ascertaining the truth, in view of the best interest of the victim and ensuring not only their protection but also the promotion of justice.

The abuse cases can be detected at home, in institutions (e.g. emergency departments, hospital consultations, in health centres, schools or nurseries), or in other spaces. However, many cases are not detected and others fail to be marked, thus, preventing the possibility of realization of the right of the child or young person and their family to be supported.

The professional who first contacts with a possible abuse situation may take cognizance of it, or be led to suspect it, through the report made by the victim or a third party (in writing, by phone - especially anonymously - or personally) or, yet, through observation of symptoms or suggestive signs of abuse associated with identification of possible risk factors.

Health services have, at this stage of the process, a key role, especially in cases involving children up to six years, since these are not covered by compulsory schooling.

If the communication of the case is made through a third party and not directly by the child or young person to a health service technician, social assistance technician, to an operator of justice services, or any other professional who has the duty to direct this type of cases, so this person should make a collection of initial information that will allow realizing the dimension of this suspicion and its degree of consistency. This preliminary approach of the case aims to situate it in relation to the type of abuse, the date when it occurs, to its context, to the alleged abuser and to the possibility that there had been destruction of evidences.

Based on the information gathered, the professional shall, in cases when such makes sense (e.g. suspicion of recently sexual abuse) indicate the following procedures for the preservation of biological traces (e.g. do not eat or drink, do not wash mouth or teeth, not bathing or washing the genitals, do not change clothes, or, if already done, to preserve it in paper bags, not washing hands, not clean or cut the nails, not combing, not clean or tidy the place where the abuse happened), until the victim is subjected to medical and legal expertise (urgent in these cases).

Thereafter, the professional shall signal the occurrence to the competent authority, according to the case in question, sending it the information collected, with detail and rigor, for this to be properly investigated. The choice of which entity should be contacted may depend on the urgency that this first contact suggests in terms of clinical or medical and legal intervention.

The question of diagnosis is very complex because of the difficulty in establishing differential diagnoses, particularly with social and cultural situations of instability, and especially when you want to consider, in due time, the most effective response in each case.

In emergency situations or while proceeding the diagnosis of the situation of the child and the definition of its subsequent routing, provisional measures may be applied (Law nr 147/99, of 1st of September, article 37).

Only the situation of actual or imminent danger to life or physical integrity of the child or young person and the fact that there is opposition from the holders of parental responsibility or who has custody of fact, justify the use of emergency procedures (Law nr 147/99, of 1st of September, Article 91 et seq.).

The number 1 of Article 62 (Law nr 147/99, of 1st of September) states that the measure applied is compulsorily revised at the end of the deadline in the agreement or the court order and, in any case, at the end of a six-month period.

When considering the impact on victims, it must be emphasized that abuse is an experience and not a disorder (Becker and Bonner, 1998). Thus, there is no specific clinical syndrome of abused children and they can have a variety of symptoms or even none. A review of studies conducted in 1993 by Kendall-Tacket, Williams and Finkelhor (cit. In Becker and Bonner, 1998) showed that about one third of abused children does not exhibit any symptoms. More recently, a review of studies conducted by Saywitz and colleagues (2000) places this number between 21% to 49% of the children analyzed.

Finkelhor proposes different effects for the different dynamics involved in the abuse: traumatic sexualisation that results from premature and atypical initiation of the child in sexual activities, treason generated by the violation of a previous trusting relationship, the stigmatization produced by the feeling of indifference, guilt and shame and powerlessness fostered by use of force, threat or deception and by the invasive nature of sexual activity. The dynamics present in a particular case are associated with specific consequences for the victim. Thus, distrust and hostility are related to the feeling of betrayal, which can be generalized to other stimuli (eg: men in general); symptoms of anxiety, depression, sleep disorders and learning difficulties could be attributed to the feeling of powerlessness and low self-esteem due to stigmatization and this could also promote inadaptive conducts as the use of drugs or the involvement in prostitution. As for problematic sexual behaviour, this would result from traumatic initiation, leading to avoidance behaviours, or, on the contrary, to the association of sex with obtaining material or emotional rewards.

The notion of trauma has been, however, to be associated with the attempt on the part of the child, to find meaning and achieve control over a situation that is difficult to accept and that was experienced with intense helplessness. In boys, sexual and aggressive acting out may even be a way to restore the sense of masculinity (culturally associated with power and control), affected by the experience of abuse.

Carla Machado and Rui Abrunhosa Gonçalves point out that not always it seems legitimate to them to interpret the sexual behaviour of victims as a sign of psychological disturbance, because the change strategies that victims often need are not available except through behaviours that society labels as deviant (e.g. running away from home, aggression and prostitution).

In addition to the symptoms mentioned above, several authors argue further that victims may suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD): intense physiological activation, re-experiencing the trauma in the form of flashbacks, nightmares or intrusive memory, avoidance of behaviours, places or thoughts associated with the abuse (Lutzker et al. 1999; Birt and Wolfe, 1997).

In general, the studies seem to indicate a trend towards a decrease in symptoms over time, however, even in adulthood, several studies suggest an association of the experiences with several adjustment problems, namely sexual and interpersonal difficulties, depression, anxiety, dissociation, harmful behaviours to itself (e.g. self-mutilation, drugs or alcohol abuse, suicide attempts) and aggressiveness.

In one hand, the intervention of the entities with competence on children and youth matters and of the commissions of protection of children and youth depends on the acceptance of the child or young person with 12 years old or more, being that the opposition of the child aged less than 12 years old is considered relevant according to its capacity to understand the intervention – Article 10 of Law nr 147/99, of 1st of September.

In the other hand, the intervention of the commissions of protection of children and youth depends of the expressed consent of their parents, legal guardians or the person who has the custody of fact – Article 9 of Law nr 147/99, of 1st of September (see also Articles 94 and 95).

III NATIONAL POLICY REGARDING CHILDREN

i. One current discussion in Portugal is focused on legal investigation and the effectiveness of protective measures. As far as the first is concerned, the fact that there is no specific syndrome to detect sexual abuse and the interpretation of law depends on casuistic analysis might lead to contradictory opinions and decisions. For example, we can mention the discussion between two concepts: virginity and experience. In fact, due to sexual crimes in which the victim does not adopt a typical reaction (violent reaction in order to escape from the perpetrator) because of the shock (the victims remains quiet in silence), such consideration might lead to determine that the victim was an experience person and the conduct is not considered sexual abuse.

Also, protective measures need to be strengthened in order to be constant and regular, adapted to the different atmospheres in which the child is involved in.

ii. Social awareness regarding these issues has known a considerable progress. Portuguese NGOs have led dynamic campaigns through different sources of information. We can mention television; reviews; internet, among others, which raise people attention. In particular, a different branch of psychology has been emancipated and investigated: criminal psychology. Most of the Portuguese NGOs seek people's involvement for collaboration too.

iii. In the last 5 years, reports regarding the sexual exploitation of children reveal some reasons to be concerned and optimist. The Portuguese Directorate-General for Justice Policy (PDGJP), through the organs of criminal police registered the occurrence of several sexual crimes committed to children.

When sexual abuse of children under 14 years of age, or between 14 and 16 by abusing their inexperience, or between 14 and 18 years of age but in a dependent relationship with the offender, is concerned, the number of reports between 2007 and 2010 revealed an alarming growth within the number of sexual crimes. In 2007, 123 crimes of sexual abuse were reported, in 2008 the number increased to 593, in 2009, again, up to 668, in 2010 reached the 778 reports, and finally, in 2011 the numbers continued to grow but started to stabilize until the 784 formal charges<sup>101102</sup>.

From 2007 until 2010, the law enforcement agencies registered an increase of 665 (+84%) crimes of sexual abuse of children. The growth within the number of this specific crime is explained by the “changes in the practices of government departments (e.g. police and justice agencies)”<sup>103</sup>. Among others, some changes were: improved professional training; implementation of measures aimed at reducing the social stigma associated with these crimes and facilitate reporting. Another reason for the growth within the numbers can also be found in the “Casa Pia”<sup>104</sup> lawsuit and its media coverage which amplified public attention to the issue of sexual abuse of children. On the other hand, the increasing number of formal charges is associated with the decrease of the dark figures, i.e., crimes committed but not reported to the authorities.

In the period between 2010 and 2011, the amplification has stabilized, and were registered 6 more crimes (0,8 %) than the former year. Social behavioural changes which continue to reduce the stigmatization of the victim contributed to this result<sup>105</sup>.

Regarding the crimes of child pornography and child prostitution favouring, unlike the crime of sexual abuse, the difference within the numbers result from the operations conducted by the organs of the criminal police<sup>106</sup>, it doesn't necessarily indicate an amplification or decrease of these crimes. In between 2007 and 2009 the number of crimes registered increased from 6 to 209, revealing a growth of 97% , but then, in 2010 the numbers decreased to 66 (68%), solely to increase again in 2011 by 36,9%.

Although there exists more data about crimes against freedom and sexual self-determination, especially the crime of rape, it's not possible to determine specific statistics for when the victim is a minor. Nonetheless, for a general note, the reporting of these crimes has been steadily decreasing. Between 2010 and 2011 the crime of rape number has reduced by 11,8% while all other crime against freedom and sexual self-determination by 0,5%.

Analysis of several cases of crimes of sexual nature committed to children revealed that most of the victims are of the female gender (78,4 %), average age of 9.8, students (69,2 %), abused by a male offender (99,5 %), a person that the victim knew (85,4 %), and 50,3 % of the times belonged to the family<sup>107</sup>.

We can refer to the investigation and reports in which a couple of NGOs and centre of studies have been working on in order to publish the results. For example, Committees for the Protection of Children and Youth which have to lead a serious investigation in order to give information to the social security bodies that will implement social protection programs; the Institute of Child Support; Legal Medicine Institute and The Commission of protection of Children and Youth at risk.

iv. The Institute of Child Support and other associations in collaboration with the first one have led a serious and dynamic campaign through videos; reports; lectures... In addition to that, the project ELSA for Children is also intended to be regarded as promotional campaign regarding these issues.

v. As far as children's rights are concerned, the Portuguese law making process is aimed at preserving the best interest of the child without compromising his/her normal growth. The legislator takes into account the extension of damages which can be caused to the child due to his/her involvement in legal situations such as the ones above mentioned, particularly, when the child is the victim or has testified a crime. The main goal is provide the child with parental or institutional care, physiological support inside and outside the process.

vi. The main national Non-Governmental Organisations working on the topic of children's rights are: The Institute of Child Support; Portuguese Association of support to children and The Commission of protection of Children and Youth at risk. The State participates in the development of some projects coordinated by such NGOs when providing them with materials (international reports).

V CONCLUSION

The development of this project contributed to broaden our horizons and motivate the awareness of social and legal issues. The deep investigation of such controversial topics and its discussion helped us to strengthen social responsibility.

A brief presentation of some guidelines of Social Emergency Plan<sup>1</sup> translated is presented below (see the complete version of the Plan of Social Emergency, <sup>1</sup>available at <http://www.portugal.gov.pt/pt/os-ministerios/ministerio-da-solidariedade-e-seguranca-social/documentos-oficiais/20110805-programa-emergencia-social.aspx>)

The Social Emergency Plan <sup>1</sup> consists in "mitigating the social impact of the crisis in order to create a "social cushion" which permits to buffer for many persons the difficulties they are passing", supported by the notion that "at present juncture it is not possible to choose paths that reduce further the global levels of social protection of disadvantaged persons, or that involve additional financial effort that the country cannot support", the program assumes "a social innovation model that can respond to needs and help to the flagella of severe social deprivation situations" which is enacted by "a national solidarity network focused on proximity and experience" - through the "local authorities as the focal point" and "institutions that permanently guarantee a social response: the particular social solidarity institutions (IPSS), the mercies and mutual's. These are the entities which can better contribute to help to the social emergency situations that do not stop growing".

The program strengthens that "many of the families live difficult moments nowadays, enmeshed in the webs of unemployment, financial collapse, of over-indebtedness, social disintegration, exclusion and poverty (...) the reduction of social inequalities must begin by combating early school leaving, the adoption of measures to support the family, the fairer distribution of income and sacrifices, and, moreover, at fair recognition each person's merit and effort, based on a personal and collective promotion and training dimensions".

a) "a program that can respond to families confronted with new phenomena of poverty as a result of the unemployment, over-debt, social and familiar disruption and very especially the children". The enacted measures to accomplish these aims are: the increase of the unemployment benefits by 10% for couples with children - both unemployed; the implementation of a national program of micro-credit; promotion of active and solidarity work in order to remain in the labour market functions and performance of socially useful functions specially among those persons who receive the social insertion income (rendimento social de inserção - RSI); to ensure the distribution of meals to the poorest and combat waste in the case of products with limited date of consumption; lower housing rental prices lower; "indebtedness of households, together with unemployment, are two of the causes that contribute most for new phenomena of exclusion" - sensitization actions for savings, value for money, responsible credit; to meet the needs of education in problematic neighborhoods, as well as scholarships for undergraduate students, reduced social tariffs for transport, gas and electricity; "the new social emergency telephone line, looking to adapt it to the new contingency of poverty, the new phenomena of exclusion, ensuring a faster response that may help to identify social responses on the contexts"; children at risk "the social crisis, associated social to the social disruption, have hardest effects on children - the Government together with the Commissions for Protection of Children and Young People will focus at the level of primary and secondary prevention, by increasing the signaling of risk cases and not jeopardizing the principle of subsidiary"<sup>1</sup>.

b). "A program which can respond to the elderly, with yields very degraded and very high intakes of health", specifically through: the maintenance of purchasing power for minimum (247euros), rural (227 euros) and social (189 euros) pensions; donation of drugs by pharmaceutical industry six months before the expiration date; agreement with solidarity pharmacy by distributing medicines within an stipulated plafond for the more needy persons; return to solidarity neighbourhood networks in order to reduce the institutionalization and home support not only for the elderly as also for the families with dependents or analogous situations, as in permanent sickness or family rupture; combat to loneliness and urgency situations through social support lines (tele-alarm line) and solidarity line; night centers for seniors who are not subject to institutionalization, at night they can stay at the center and passing the day in their homes, to improve the access to health care networks and continuing or palliative care<sup>1</sup>.

c) "The inclusion of the persons with disability is a transversal task". However, in the framework of the Social Emergency Plan, besides the insertion on professional programs and supports to the creation of self-employment, " is important to highlight some other aspects, such as the employability of people with disability, the maintenance of teachers in IPSS, the "ramp" program as well as "caregiver respite" measure for caregivers and families with people with disability and other dependents or patients in need of 24h support<sup>1</sup>.

d). "At a time of emergency is necessary to recognize, encourage and promote volunteering"; to create incentives for volunteering in social area, to put volunteer hours into school certificates, and "studying the possibility of devoting a "bank of social hours " where workers of public functions are allowed to perform the volunteering tasks<sup>1</sup>.

e) The government believes and contracts with the social institutions. "The social institutions exist to help others and it is time for the Government humbly ask them for help. Not for itself, but for those who suffer, those who have little or nothing, those who were confronted with the exclusion of unemployment. It doesn't makes sense that the State build own structures, in places where there are already social responses; but it makes sense that the State use the most of the structures that are already on the places and simplify its rules of operation; simpler legislation for the children's daycare institutions, attending to their safety, operation and installation conditions; simplify legislation of elderly households increasing the number of vacancies in conditions of quality and safety among the existing structures, and to find strategies for their sustainability; review of the legislation for the licensing of social equipments, simplify rules of food and hygiene safety of kitchens in social institutions, and the increase and co-participation of QREN in further 10% in convergence areas; to promote formation of social institutions directors, a line of credit to institutions of social economy, entrepreneurship and social innovation for the third sector; revise legislation to fund the social aid by passing to act as an emergency social fund, the solidarity card and law of basis of social economy; transfer of equipment from the State to the social institutions, allowing the response to situations of social deprivation, which can permit lower costs and faster responses<sup>1</sup>.

I INTRODUCTION

i. Considering the progress report from the European Commission for Macedonia for 2011 and 2012, there has been some progress in the anti-discrimination policy. In 2011 the Commission for Protection from Discrimination started to work. The Commission became a member observer of the European network of equality bodies. Overall capacity of the commission remains weak, and its levels of visibility and accessibility to the public is low. Public awareness of the need for non-discrimination is very limited. Anti-discrimination law leaves out discrimination based on sexual orientation. Community of gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender persons is still subject to discrimination and stigmatization.

As far as women's rights and gender equality, discriminatory customs, traditions and stereotypes are distributed especially in rural areas and violate the fundamental rights of women. Active participation of women in politics is still low, especially at the local level. Women are also underrepresented in the labour market.

In terms of minorities the Ohrid Framework Agreement provided an important opportunity to strengthen dialogue between the communities. Overall representation of public workers from minority communities is satisfactory and remains 29 percent. Some progress has been made with the rights of the Roma. Strategy was adopted for the social inclusion of Roma 2012-2014 along with an action plan. Despite the budgetary constraints of the financial support for Roma programs was maintained at the level of 2009 and 2010. Macedonia is among the few countries in the region where minorities' rights are respected.

There has been progress in terms of property rights. The process of returning property confiscated during the Socialist Yugoslavia resulting in a solution of 30 744 cases in the period of May 2000 to December 2007.

“It is prohibited any direct or indirect discrimination, reference and encouraging discrimination and helping in discriminatory treatment on the basis of sex, race, colour, gender, belonging to a marginalized group, ethnic origin, language, nationality, social origin, religion or religious beliefs, other beliefs, education, political affiliation, personal or social status, mental or physical disability, age, family or marital status, property status, health status or any other basis which is regulated by law or ratified international agreement

(hereinafter: discriminatory basis)” – Article 3 Prevention And Protection Of Discrimination Law 08.04.2010 Official Gazette of RM no. 50 from 13.04.2010

As it can be seen from the article, the Prevention and Protection of Discrimination Law covers most of the discrimination problems issue. The main of the few deficiencies in the law is its exhaustive enumeration of the grounds of discrimination that is contrary to the idea of protection from all possible grounds for discrimination and does not go in the direction of compliance with Protocol 12 of the European Convention on Human Rights. In article 1 the Protocol specifies general prohibition of discrimination, which determines the general prohibition of discrimination on any ground such as discriminatory treatment on the basis of sex, race, colour, gender, belonging to a marginalized group, ethnic origin, language, nationality, social origin, religion or religious beliefs, other beliefs, education, political affiliation, personal or social status, mental or physical disability, age, family or marital status, property status, health status or any other basis which is regulated by law or ratified international agreement. The words "Such as" leaves a non-exhaustive list of grounds for discrimination.

Unlike, the law did not foresee this formulation from the protocol and thus requires strictly interpreting the provisions of the law to the detriment of potential victims of discrimination.” As a model for the wrong interpretation of the law can be taken publicly exploited example of homosexuals. This group of people, although sensitive and marginalized is not envisaged in the law as basis for discrimination” writes the Foundation Institute Open Society – Macedonia in their comments of the law.

ii. “Family is a community of parents and children and other relatives living in the common household. Occurs with the birth of children and family by adoption” Article 2 Family law Official Gazette of RM no 80/1992 from 22.12.1992.

By the statistical review of population and social statistics in July 2012, created by State statistical office of the Republic Macedonia in the table above are shown marriages by the age of the bride and the groom. The average marital age of the male population (5 580) is between 25-29. The average marital age of the female population (5 384) is between 20-24.

iii. By a research form the First Children’s Embassy in the World “Megjasi” about the status of children from representative sample of 2344 children in seven cities in Macedonia 70% of children do not know any of the child's right and what most worries a lot is that if the child does not recognize the right that has been violated, they cannot even report it. Most of those 30% who know the rights of the child learned from school, but nobody advised school pedagogue or psychologist to complain if a law has been breached.

On the occasion of the presentation of alternative reports of non-governmental organizations to the state reports on the status of children in Macedonia, it must be pointed out that the rights of children in Macedonia are threatened and are not always respected and to express concerns about inefficiency and failure of the mechanisms of the state in terms of:

- Child protection and the prevention of their abuse
- Violence against children and between children
- Lack of commitment to the state of children in institutions, their needs and problems

- Discrimination of Roma children in every way, especially in the education system
- In Macedonia, the rights of children are violated in all areas: social work, education, health, justice, family, media, and communications.

iv. The relevant legislation regarding the implementation of international treaties is the signing, ratification and implementation of international agreements Law "Fig. Gazette of the Republic of Macedonia "no. 5/98 dated 30.01.1998.

In Macedonia, international law does not need to be translated into national law. The act of ratifying an international treaty immediately incorporates the law into national law, the conclusion is that Macedonia have accepted the monalistic approach.

By the UN Treaty collections Macedonia have ratified the United Nations Convention on Rights of the Child on the 2 Dec 1993 by succession from former Yugoslavia. Former Yugoslavia made a reservation to the Convention and because of the succession Macedonia have also indirectly made a reservation:
http://treaties.un.org/Pages/ViewDetails.aspx?src=TREATY&mtdsg\_no=IV-15&chapter=4&lang=en

Reservation:

"The competent authorities (ward authorities) of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia may, under article 9, paragraph 1 of the Convention, make decisions to deprive parents of their right to raise their children and give them an upbringing without prior judicial determination in accordance with the internal legislation of the SFR of Yugoslavia."

Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) by the United Nations (UN) is one of the first international documents ratified by the Republic of Macedonia (1993). By the report of implementation of the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights in Macedonia the ratification is not followed by appropriate review of all laws and regulations, and despite efforts does not lead to significant changes in the child's reality.

vii. In the Republic of Macedonia, according to the cited Article 118 of the Constitution, all international acts ratified in accordance with the Constitution have direct effect in the national legal framework. This constitutional provision is under direct influence by the continental tradition, which provides en block incorporation of the international instruments in the internal legal framework only by their ratification in the national assemblies. On the implementation of the Lanzarote Convention works the Ministry of Justice, as stated in the Law on Ratification of the Council of Europe Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse<sup>7</sup>.

1 GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE JURISDICTION

i. Republic of Macedonia is, as stated in Article 1 of the Constitution of the Republic of Macedonia<sup>8</sup>, sovereign, independent, democratic state, with a sovereignty which derives from the citizens and is indivisible, inalienable and non-transferable. Republic of Macedonia declared its independence after the huge success of the Referendum for independence, held on 8 September 1991. On the Referendum voted 75, 7% of the citizens with the right to vote, from who 96, 4% voted “for”<sup>9</sup> on the referendum question: "Would you support independent Macedonia with the right to enter future union of sovereign states of Yugoslavia?" Nonetheless, the complete international recognition, under the (привремена) reference ‘former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia’ gained on 8 April 1993 with an acclamation of the General Assembly of the United Nations Organization. In the years to come, Republic of Macedonia, as its fundamental interests proclaimed the membership in the European Union and NATO, goals on which the country works today and will continue to work in the days to come. By its political constellation, Republic of Macedonia represents parliamentary democracy with three-part structure: one-seated parliament (the Assembly of the Republic of Macedonia) which acts as a law-enacting institution; the executive is divided between the President of the Republic of Macedonia (acting PHD Gjorge Ivanov) – with basically ceremonial function, except in the field of defence, where he is commander in chief and President of the Security Council. Additionally he has influence in the foreign policy and in the promulgation of the enacted laws with an act called Ukaz; and the Government of the Republic of Macedonia (institution created by a political coalition by the winning Macedonian and Albanian political party in the Assembly) which is the main institution of the executive, collective body compelled by 15 ministries and a Prime minister (acting Nikola Gruevski, Master of science in Economics); third is the judicial system formed by primary courts (Primary courts - Osnoven sud), secondary courts (Appellate courts – Apelacionen sud) and tertiary courts (Supreme court of the Republic of Macedonia). Special, independent subject in the Macedonian political and legal structure is the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Macedonia, which members are elected by the Assembly of the Republic of Macedonia, with a mandate of 9 years.

ii. In the Constitution of the Republic of Macedonia, enacted on 22 November 1991 and in its 31 Amendment (enacted in 1992, 1998, 2001, 2003, 2005 and 2009), human rights and their protection are important and, so to say, crucial part. The protection of human rights is declared at first in the Preamble<sup>10</sup>, and then, as fundamental values of the constitutional system, among the others, are settled the basic freedoms and rights of the individual and citizen, recognized in international law and set down in the Constitution and the free expression of national identity<sup>11</sup>. In Chapter 2 of the Constitution, human rights are divided into several parts, such as: Civil and political freedoms and rights (Article 9-29), Economic, social and cultural rights (Article 30-49), Guarantees of basic freedoms and rights (Article

In the next few Articles, the Constitution regulates the right of freedom (Article 12), the presumption of innocence (Article 13), the rule nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege (Article 14), the right of appeal (Article 15), the freedom of conviction, conscience, thought and public expression of thought (Article 16), the freedom and confidentiality of correspondence (Article 17), guarantees on security and confidentiality of personal information (Article 18), the freedom of religious confession is guaranteed and separation of the country and all the religious organizations (Article 19), freedom of association to exercise and protect their political, economic, social, cultural and other rights and convictions (Article 20), to assemble peacefully and to express public protest without prior announcement (Article 21), the right to vote on the age of 18 (Article 22), right to take part in the performance of public office (Article 23), petition state and other public bodies, as well as to receive an answer (Article 24), respect and protection of the privacy of personal and family life and of dignity and repute (Article 25), the right to the inviolability of the home (Article 26), the right of free movement on the territory of the Republic and freely to chose the place of residence (Article 27), the defence of the Republic of Macedonia as right and duty (Article 28) and the guarantees for foreigners who enjoy freedoms and rights guaranteed by the Constitution in the Republic of Macedonia, under conditions regulated by law and international agreements (Article 29). The part of economic, social and cultural rights includes the ownership of property and the right of inheritance, the right to work, to free choice of employment, protection at work and material assistance, obligation for tax payment, right to social security and social insurance, protection and social security of citizens, social security rights to veterans of the Anti-Fascist War and of all Macedonian national liberation wars, to war invalids, to those expelled and imprisoned for the ideas of the separate identity of the Macedonian people and of Macedonian statehood, the right to establish trade unions, the right to strike, the right to health care, care and protection for the family, right freely to decide on the procreation of children, persons under 15 years of age cannot be employed, minors and mothers have the right to particular protection at work, minors may not be employed in work which is detrimental to their health or morality, right to a healthy environment, right to education, right to establish private at schools at all levels of education, with the exception of primary education, guarantees on the autonomy of universities, the freedom of scholarly, artistic and other forms of creative work, free expression, fostering and development of identity and national attributes of the national minorities, care for the status and rights of those persons belonging to the Macedonian people in neighbouring countries. Moreover, the segment for guarantees of basic freedoms and rights includes the right to invoke the protection of freedoms and rights determined by the Constitution before the regular courts, as well as before the Constitutional Court, based upon the principles of priority and urgency in the urgency, judicial protection of the legality of individual acts of state administration and the right to be informed on human rights and basic freedoms as well as actively to contribute, individually or jointly with others, to their promotion and protection in Article 50, the accordance of laws with the Constitution, and all other regulations with the Constitution and law and the obligation to respect the Constitution and the laws is in Article 51, publication of laws and other regulations before they come into force (Article 52), attorneyship is promulgated as an autonomous and independent public service (Article 53) and the guarantee that the freedoms and rights of the individual and citizen can be restricted only in cases determined by the Constitution in Article 54. The rights of children are guaranteed as a part of the general citizen's and individual's right with the specification in Article 42, where the Republic is „obliged of special care for minors and children, the ban children to be employed under the age of 15, and minors to be employed in work which is detrimental to their health or morality“<sup>12</sup>.

iii. On the issue of monitoring the implementation of international and national human rights instruments, the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Macedonia has a role on several human rights clearly stated in the Constitution as rights that are applicable for control and activity. According to the Constitution in Article 110, Paragraph 3, the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Macedonia is entitled to protect the freedoms and the rights of the individual and citizen relating to the freedom of conviction, conscience, thought and public expression of thought, political association and activity as well as to the prohibition of discrimination among citizens on the ground of sex, race, religion or national, social or political affiliation made by an act or an action. The Constitutional Court uses its methods and instruments that include enacting a Decision for protection of freedoms and rights<sup>13</sup>. In this Decision the Court defines whether there is an infringement and if the decision is positive, the Court annuls the individual act, prohibits the action causing the infringement or refuses the request. On the other hand, by the Constitution „Courts judge on the basis of the Constitution and laws and international agreements ratified in accordance with the Constitution“<sup>14</sup>. According to this Article, individuals can claim their constitutional rights directly before the courts, together with their rights guaranteed by international instruments ratified in accordance with the Constitution similar as rights guaranteed by law. As stated before, in the Republic of Macedonia functions the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Macedonia. This Court is primarily legally based on the Articles 108 – 113 of the Constitution of the Republic of Macedonia and secondly, on the Rules of Procedure issued by the Court itself on the basis of the Article 113 of the Constitution. Before the Constitutional Court „any citizen of the Republic can address individually if he considers that an act or action has infringed his/her freedom“<sup>15</sup>. The validity of the request of protection is determined by two aspects – temporal and functional. The temporal aspect is that the request should be addressed within 2 months from the day of delivery of the final individual act or the date on which the person became aware of the activity undertaken, but not later than 5 years from the day of the undertaking, as stated in Article 51 of the Rules of Procedure of the Court. The functional aspect means that citizens can only address the Court for protection of freedom and rights of the Article 110, Paragraph 3 of the Constitution of the Republic of Macedonia. This derives from the Article itself, because it is clearly stated that the Court is entitled to:

„protect the freedoms and rights of the individual and citizen relating to the freedom of conviction, conscience, thought and public expression of thought, political association and activity as well as to the prohibition of discrimination among citizens on the ground of sex, race, religion or national, social or political affiliation.“<sup>16</sup>

From this Article it is clear that the Court is entitled to resolve the requests of protection of human rights only in the framework given by the Constitution, and for all other violations the citizens are obliged to address the regular courts. As stated, individuals can address the Constitutional Court directly only on the matter of protection of several strictly stated human rights. On other cases, the Constitutional Court is not competent, and citizens can address the regular courts. In the regular judiciary system there is a strict hierarchy of addressing, and that hierarchy citizens are obliged to follow by law. The application process for violation of human right starts with a lawsuit before the Primary Court. The individual can appeal on the decision of the Court at an Appellate Court which decision is binding and final. Only in exceptional cases, special appeal can be made – extraordinary remedy before the Supreme Court of the Republic of Macedonia, as a third and highest degree in the judiciary system.

iv. In the Republic of Macedonia, Criminal Supreme Court as such, does not exist. Criminal divisions exist in the judiciary system, but together with other divisions they are a part of a three-part judiciary structure – Primary, Appellate and Supreme Court. The criminal procedure in the Macedonian system is regulated by the Law on Criminal Procedure, enacted on 18 November 2010 and it entered into force on 26 November 2010. The procedure starts by enacting an order to start an investigation procedure, or by the first investigation action, or by determination of main hearing of indictment or private lawsuit, or by a proposal to enact criminal warrant, or by a proposal for issuing a security measure<sup>17</sup>. The criminal procedure in the Republic of Macedonia is divided into 5 stadiums: Preliminary (investigation procedure); Accusation; Main hearing; Procedure on legal remedies; Execution of the verdict. The procedure can be regular (if a person is accused of criminal action for which can be issued a penalty over 3 years of imprisonment), shortened (up to 3 years of imprisonment) or a criminal procedure for minors. Only the regular procedure is consisted of all of the 5 stadiums. The preliminary procedure is consisted of all the actions which state organs take to reveal the existence of a criminal act and to find the actor, to secure the evidence and to start the formal procedure. Organs that act in this stadium are the Ministry of Interior, public prosecutor and the investigation judge. The accusation procedure starts with securing the person who is supposed actor in the criminal act. If such person cannot be found, there could not be a procedure. On the basis of the evidences and their quality, the Primary Court decides if there should be a criminal trial or not. According to that, an investigation can be performed only against a person for whom there is a reasonable doubt that acted in a crime, and the aim is to find facts that support the prosecution. Reasonable doubt is the one based only on evidence. The accusation means filing an indictment against someone. The accusation can be made only by an authorized prosecutor. That means that crimes that can be sentenced with an over 3-years-prison penalty are prosecuted ex officio and can be started only by the police, public prosecutor or investigation judge, according to the seriousness of the crime. If the crime is penalized with minor penalty, the impaired should start the procedure. The main hearing is the most important stadium in the criminal procedure because all collected facts and evidence are presented. This part is oral, public, contradictory and immediate, and finishes by rendering and announcing a verdict. The right to appeal to an Appellate Court and the right of an extraordinary remedy before the Supreme Court of the Republic of Macedonia is the stadium of legal remedies. This institute allows the primary-court-decision to be controlled and revised by a higher-ranked court in order to suppress eventual errors or bias. The last stadium is the execution of the verdict, and happens only if the verdict is final (the court has announced the verdict) and enforceable (all the legal remedies have been used). The execution is performed by the Directorate for Execution of Sanctions under the Ministry of Justice.

v. In the Republic of Macedonia, according to the Law on Juvenile Justice, the age of criminal liability is 14 years, that means that under the age of 14 a sanction cannot be issued, and only special measures can be provided:

„A sanction anticipated in this Law cannot be pronounced to a juvenile who at the time of performing the activity determined by law to be a crime or misdemeanor has not reached the age of 14 – a child at risk.”<sup>18</sup>

Moreover, according to the Criminal Code of the Republic of Macedonia, the Code cannot be applied against juveniles who at the time of committing the crime have not turned the age of fourteen<sup>19</sup>. In the Republic of Macedonia minors can be sentenced to juvenile prison in special parts of the prison for adults, or can be imprisoned in educational-correctional institutions for minors. The statistics in the Annual Report for 2011 issued by the

On the other hand, in the Educational-correctional institution for minors located in Tetovo, 42 minors served their penalty on the 31 December 2011<sup>21</sup>. Of this number, statistically 4 persons are on the age 14 - 16, 16 on the age 16 – 18 and 22 on the age 18 – 23.

2 SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW

2.1 Sexual Abuse

i. The National legislation<sup>22</sup> incorporates a part which refers to the meaning of the terms mentioned in the Criminal Code of the RM (further CC of the RM). In fact includes 39 definitions.<sup>23</sup> Unfortunately, there isn't a definition of the term 'sexual activities'. Some of the given definitions, for example the definition of family violence do include 'sexual or other physical and psychological violence which causes a feeling of insecurity...', yet it is not an appropriate definition for the term 'sexual activities'. Further on, while explaining diverse crimes against sexual freedom and sexual morality, the legislator only uses the term 'sexual acts' and the term 'other sexual acts' as well. Their meaning is not determined in a more detailed matter. According to the Macedonian legal theory<sup>24</sup>, the meaning of the general term of "sexual activities" may be well understood and explained by an extensive or restrictive exegesis of the crimes separately.<sup>25</sup>

ii. The CC of the RM incorporates an article, explaining two cases of committing a premeditated crime. The article is named as 'Intent'. As further follows: "A crime was committed with intent when the offender was aware about his act and he wanted it to be committed OR when he was aware that a damaging consequence may occur because of his act or omission, but agreed for it to happen anyway.”<sup>26</sup> In the legal theory<sup>27</sup>, this article is not considered to give us a general definition of the intent, but instead only an explanation of the content of two types of intent: direct and oblique. Actually, the first part of the definition provided refers to the direct intent and the second part to the oblique intent. Apparently, they’re different, but they both consist of two common elements: awareness for committing the crime and the willingness to do it. Although the legal theory makes difference between these two types of intent, the legislation does not draw this kind of distinction. Thereby, every offender will be punished in a same way, when a crime is committed intentionally; the Court will not make any difference during the criminal procedure whether the offender just agreed for the damaging consequence to happen or strongly wanted it to happen. Only one thing will be declared in the Court decision: the crime was premeditated (committed intentionally). Moreover, the legislation imposes more severe sanctions when a crime is committed intentionally in comparison to a crime committed by negligence. It’s because of the higher level of culpability of the offender.

- What is the criminal liability of an intentionally committed crime of sexual abuse?

Regardless of the committed crime, criminally liable is the mentally competent perpetrator who committed the crime intentionally. Moreover was aware, needed to be aware or could have been aware that the act has been prohibited by the law.<sup>28</sup>

Consequently, every punishment which is provided by the CC of RM for the given crime will be applied properly. That means the punishment will be measured within the limits prescribed by the law for that crime, having in mind the criminal responsibility of the offender, the weight of the crime and the aims of the punishment, all the circumstances that have influence upon decreasing or increasing the punishment (extenuating or aggravating circumstances), and especially: the level of criminal responsibility, the motives for the perpetrated crime, the extent of endangerment or damage to the protected goods, the circumstances under which the crime was committed, the contribution of the victim in the perpetration of the crime, the previous life of the offender, his personal circumstances and his behaviour after the perpetrated crime, as well as other circumstances that concern the personality of the offender.<sup>29</sup>

In case of a rape, the main sentence is from three to ten years of an imprisonment, under aggravating circumstances at least four.<sup>30</sup>

In case of a sexual attack upon a minor under the age of fourteen, the main sentence is at least eight years of an imprisonment, at least ten years under aggravating circumstances and in case when a damage consequence was caused, at least ten years of an imprisonment or a life sentence.<sup>31</sup>

In case of a rape by misuse of position upon a minor older than fourteen years, at least ten years of an imprisonment.<sup>32</sup>

iii. The legal age (age of consent) for engaging in sexual activities is not regulated by the National legislation as well as the consensual sexual activities between minors. As usual, the law provides legal age only for contractual marriage.<sup>33</sup> In regard to the legal age for engaging in sexual activities, the state even provides a special National strategy (2010-2020)<sup>34</sup> in which it establishes different interventions for improving the access to services and quality of the care for sexual and reproductive health of adolescents and young people which are tailored to their needs, as for an example:

Creating a network of counselling services for sexual and reproductive health in the health care system, offer of free and confidential services, especially free contraceptive counselling services and free contraceptives, providing free condoms and oral contraceptives, counselling, medical and psychosocial support for girls with an unplanned pregnancy, developing standards and protocols for youth friendly services and sexual and reproductive health and etc.

iv. The use of force, taking advantage of disability or threat may be contemplated in regards to a few different crimes determined by the CC like crimes against sexual freedom and sexual morality which refers to sexual offences against children.

At first, the term 'child' is defined in many diverse national laws, like The Constitution of Republic of Macedonia, the Law on Children Protection, the Law on Juvenile Justice, the Law on Family etc. And all these definitions are compatible.<sup>35</sup> They all define the term 'child' in accordance with many of the ratified international conventions like The Convention on Children rights. The CC of the RM also defines the term 'child as a victim of a crime' for a minor who has not reached the age of eighteen yet.

Looking through the articles inside, the CC criminalizes the sexual offence, but only upon a minor under the age of fourteen. Nothing is said about cases when a minor who has reached the age of 14, but not yet eighteen, appears to be a victim of a sexual crime. Thereby, those cases are always determined by the Court like an ordinary sexual crime of 'A rape', although reading the article itself, it does not precise the victim's age. It may be literally anybody.

Thus, we will discuss the use of the force etc. in regards to a rape at first. Usually, the use of force, taking advantage of disability and threat are the basis for more severe punishments. In regards to a rape, the use of force and threat are crucial part of the crime's essence, thus the punishment is not determined heavier as it is when other sexual crime against a child is committed. As follows:

(1) A person who by the use of force or threat to directly attack upon the life or body of another or upon the life or body of someone close to that person, forces him to intercourse, shall be punished with an imprisonment from three to ten years.

(2) If because of the crime from item 1 a severe body injury, death or other severe consequences were caused, or the crime was perpetrated by several persons or in an especially cruel and degrading manner, the offender shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least four years.

(3) A person that forces another to intercourse with a serious threat that he shall disclose something about this person or about another close to this person, that would harm his honour and reputation, or which would cause some other big evil, shall be punished with an imprisonment from six months to five years.<sup>36</sup>

All this suggests that taking advantage of disability in context of this crime is not regulated.

In regards to the sexual attack upon a minor under the age of fourteen, the situation is opposite. Taking advantage of disability is regulated, yet not the use of force or threat:

(1) A person who commits a statutory rape or some other sexual act upon a minor below the age of fourteen shall be punished with imprisonment of at least eight years.

(2) If the crime from the item 1 is committed by a blood kin in a straight line or brother respectively sister, a teacher, educator, adoptive parent, tutor, stepfather, stepmother, a doctor or another person by misusing his position or while performing sexual violence, shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least ten years.

(3) The punishment from item 2 shall be also applied to a person who commits the crime from item 1 upon a minor below the age of fourteen by misusing his mental illness, mental disorder, helplessness, retarded mental development or some other state, because of which the child is incapable of resistance.

(4) If because of the crimes from items 1 and 2 a severe body injury, death or some other severe consequences were caused, or the crime was perpetrated by several persons, or in an especially cruel and degrading manner, the offender shall be punished with imprisonment of at least ten years or with a life imprisonment.

(5) The perpetrator of the crime given in item 2 of this article will be given a sentence by the court – banning the performance of professional job, activity or duty under the conditions from Article 38-b of this Code.<sup>37</sup>

The CC of RM also establishes the trafficking in minors as a crime against humanity and international law.

Reading carefully the following article, we'll conclude that the use of force, taking advantage of disability, threat, in regards to sexual offences against children are regulated in the matter of the trafficking with human beings as well.

Items 1, 2, 5 and 7 are very important to be mentioned here:

(1) A person that recruits, transports, transfers, buys, sells, tucks away or accepts a minor due to exploitation by means of prostitution or any other form of sexual exploitation, pornography, forced labour or servicing, slavery, forced marriages, forced fertilization, unlawful adoption, or a similar relationship or illicit transplantation of human body parts, shall be punished with imprisonment of at least eight years.

(2) A person that will commit the crime from the item 1 by force, serious threat, misinformation or some other form of force, rape, deception, abuse of position or state of pregnancy, infirmity or physical or mental inability of another, or by giving and taking money or other benefit in order to get approval of a person controlling another person, shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least ten years.

(5) If the crime from items (1),(2),(3) or (4) is committed by an official due to proffesion, shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least ten years.

(7) If the crime from this article is committed by a juridicial person, he shall be punished with a fine.<sup>38</sup>

In this context, for a better understanding of the meaning of the term ‘force’, the Criminal Code provides a definition:

“A force shall also mean the use of hypnosis and stunning instruments in order to bring a person in a state of unconsciousness against his/her will or to incapacitate him/her and prevent resistance.”

v. The CC of RM determines the incest as a crime against sexual freedom and sexual morality (Chapter XIX), Article 194 and 194-a.

It can be committed upon a blood kin in a straight line (without respect to the degree of kinship) or upon a brother or sister - which means between blood kins from second degree in side-line.

The Code provides only an imprisonment like a punishment. The perpetrator shall be punished with an imprisonment from five to ten years.

<sup>38</sup> Criminal Code of the Republic of Macedonia, Section XXXIV – Crimes against humanity and international law, Article 418-g

If the crime is committed upon a minor below the age of fourteen, the perpetrator shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least ten years.

Article 194-a provides an opportunity for the Public Prosecutor to make a claim to the Court, whenever an incest was committed upon a minor below the age of fourteen, to publish the effective Court decision or a brief from it, via mass media, with a certain victim's personal data protection.

vi. First of all, the abuse of school and educational settings, care, justice institutions, work places and abuse of any other kind of position is generally regulated in the Section XII of the CC of RM which refers to a criminal offence against official duty, more precisely in the Article 353 named as: "Abuse of an official duty or authority".

Namely, an official who by abusing his/her official position or authority, by exceeding his/her official authority or by non-performance of the official duty will procure for him/her self or for another person some benefits or will cause damage to another, shall be punished with an imprisonment from six months to three years.

This article refers more to a causing of property damage or procuring a property benefit or other form of benefits.

In regards to a children right's protection together with the abuse of the official duty and authority and their connection when a criminal offence is committed, article 189 of the Section XI of the Criminal Code regulates the statutory rape by abuse of position.

Namely, a person who by abusing his/her position will induce to a statutory rape or other sexual act another person who is in a state of inferiority or dependence after him/her or maltreats, intimidates that person or acts in a way of human dignity and human personality's humiliation, shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least five years.

Unfortunately, we cannot consider the first part of the Article as fully compatible with the question asked above.

As follows below, the same Article regulates cases when there is an abuse of position and duty, but only in regards to minors older than fourteen years. Nothing is mentioned about cases when a minor under the age of fourteen was sexually abused by a person misusing his/her position:

'A teacher, educator, adoptive parent, guardian, stepfather, doctor or some other person who by misusing his position commits statutory rape or some other sexual act upon a minor older than fourteen years, who was entrusted to him for study, education, custody or care, shall be punished with imprisonment of at least ten years.’

This legal inanity may be upgraded by paying attention to the Article 188 of the same section, regulating sexual offences against minors under the age of fourteen. As item 2 of the Article indicates itself, the crime may be committed also by a person qualified in the same way as in the article mentioned above:

“If the crime is committed by a blood kin in a straight line or brother respectively sister, a teacher, educator, adoptive parent, tutor, stepfather, stepmother, a doctor or another person by misusing his position or while performing sexual violence, shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least ten years.”

There is one specific provision applied to these offenders by the Court. Namely, every perpetrator of these crimes will be sentenced with a ban for performing it’s profession, activity or duty in accordance with the Article 33, item 6 and Article 38-b.<sup>39</sup>

According to the Article 33, item 6, this penalty is considered to be a secondary penalty, which means that it cannot be given by the Court like a main sentence, but ONLY in addition to the imprisonment sentence or a probation sentence which determines an imprisonment sentence at the same time.

In the form of specific provision, it can be applied whether a crime of an official duty and authority’s abuse was committed and if based on the nature of the committed crime and circumstances under which the crime was committed, it may be expected that the perpetrator will abuse the activity again in order to repeat committing the crime.<sup>40</sup>

The duration of the penalty is determined always by the Court. It shall not be shorter than one and not longer than ten years, counting from the day of the legal effectiveness of the judgment. Moreover, the time spent in imprisonment does not count towards the duration of the ban.<sup>41</sup>

vii. The Republic of Macedonia is a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Action against trafficking in Human Beings. The state signed the Convention on 17 November 2005 and ratified it on 27 May 2009. The Convention was enforced on 1 September 2009.

viii. The Criminal Code of the Republic of Macedonia does not contain definition of the child prostitution. It only criminalizes the mediation in conducting prostitution like a crime against sexual freedom and sexual morality (section XIX, article 191) and trafficking in minors (section XXXIV, article 418-g) where the exploitation in meaning of prostitution is incorporated.

Nonetheless, there is an answer to this question on the strength of the International public law and principles.

The Republic of Macedonia ratified the UNICEF Convention on the rights of children in 1993.

The Republic of Macedonia also ratified the two optional Protocols on the UNICEF Convention on the rights of the children:

- the Optional Protocol on the involvement of children in armed conflicts
- the Optional Protocol on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography

According to the Article 118 of the Constitution of the Republic of Macedonia, every international act that is ratified under the conditions of the Constitution becomes a part of the internal law system and cannot be changed by any written law. In other words, the UNICEF Convention on rights of the children and the two optional protocols are considered to be a national legislation. In this context, the Second Optional Protocol on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography which was enforced on 11.07.2003, does provide definition for the offence of the 'child prostitution'.

Although the National Courts during criminal procedures do not make references very often to the international documents which are already ratified, we can make a reference now to the Second Optional Protocol thereto considering it like a part of the National legislation and answer the question properly. As given in the Article 1, item b of the Optional Protocol on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, 'child prostitution' means the use of a child in sexual activities for remuneration or any other form of consideration.

The Criminal Code of the Republic of Macedonia in accordance with Article 4(3) of the Optional Protocol on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography took the necessary legislative measures to criminalize the conduct explained above, but it does not provides one and general definition of child prostitution on the basis of definition provided in this already ratified international document.

Thereby, we can only explain the compatibility of the definition provided in the Optional Protocol on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography with the one provided by the Lanzarote Convention.

COMPATIBILITY:

Lanzarote Convention definition provided:

“For the purpose of the present article, the term “child prostitution” shall mean the fact of using a child for sexual activities where money or any other form of remuneration or consideration is given or promised as payment, regardless if this payment, promise or consideration is made to a child or to a third person.”<sup>42</sup>

Optional Protocol on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography definition provided:

“Child Prostitution means the use of a child in sexual activities for remuneration or any other form of consideration.”<sup>43</sup>

In general, these two definitions provided are compatible. They both stress that child prostitution means the use of / fact of using a child for / in sexual activities.

As we can see, these are kind of linguistic differences which do not differ a lot. Apparently they do not change the definition’s entity, the sense of it.

In regards to the second part of definitions, they both explain the use of a child in sexual activities for remuneration or any other form of consideration.

The difference comes to a concrete definition provided in the Lanzarote Convention – it underlines the money like form of remuneration whereas for comparison the one in the protocol says ‘for remuneration’ without explicitly stressing money like a remuneration form.

Furthermore, the Lanzarote Convention explicitly declares that the remuneration or consideration may not be only given, but promised as well. The definition of the Protocol does not specify whether the money (the remuneration or any other form of consideration) should be given, promised, or both in order to know if there was a child prostitution or not.

In similar way, Lanzarote’s definition emphasizes the role not only of the child, but of a third person as well. The Protocol does not specify anything: neither the forms in which the remuneration or consideration may be given or promised, neither if they should be given, only promised or given and promised at the same time, nor if they are given/promised to a child or a third person.

At the end, we cannot conclude more than this. Whether we consider a definition should be more general (so that many different cases may be subsumed under it) or if we consider it should be concrete, explicit and concise, these are those few differences which may mean more or less.

ix. The national legislation does criminalize both the recruiter and the user. As given in the section XXXIV, Article 418-g of the Criminal Code of the Republic of Macedonia regarding to trafficking in minors, both the recruiter and the user shall be punished if committing the crime.

In regards to the recruiter:

A person that recruits, transports, transfers, buys, sells, tucks away or accepts a minor due to exploitation by means of prostitution or any other form of sexual exploitation, pornography, forced labour or servicing, slavery, forced marriages, forced fertilization, unlawful adoption, or a similar relationship or illicit transplantation of human body parts, shall be punished with imprisonment of at least eight years.<sup>44</sup>

A person that will commit the crime from the item 1 by force, serious threat, misinformation or some other form of force, rape, deception, abuse of position or state of pregnancy, infirmity or physical or mental inability of another, or by giving and taking

money or other benefit in order to get approval of a person controlling another person, shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least ten years.<sup>45</sup>

In regards to the user:

A person who uses or procures the sexual services or any other form of exploitation of a minor of whom he knew or ought to know that is a victim of trafficking in human beings, shall be punished with imprisonment of at least eight years.<sup>46</sup>

There is one more crime regulated in the CC of RM like a crime against sexual freedom and sexual morality, but it refers only to the mediation in conducting prostitution. This does not refer specifically to the child prostitution.

2.3 Child Pornography

Child Pornography in General:

x. The Republic of Macedonia signed the Convention on Cybercrime on 23/11/2001 and ratified it on 15/09/2004. The Convention was enforced on 1/1/2005.

xi. Definition of child pornography is provided by the CC of RM. There is a special part of the Code, Section XIII, article 122 respectively, which gives an explanation of many different concepts used in the Code. Apparently, one of them is the child pornography. The term ‘child pornography’ is defined as follows:

Definition provided in the Lanzarote Convention:

“For the purpose of the present article, the term “child pornography” shall mean any material that visually depicts a child engaged in real or simulated sexually explicit conduct or any depiction of a child’s sexual organs for primarily sexual purposes.”<sup>48</sup>

These two definitions are generally compatible in the first part that refers to the explanation of the material. It is a material that visually depicts a child engaged in sexually explicit conduct/shows explicit sexual activities with a minor.

Firstly, we see that the CC of the RM does not use the term ‘child’ but the term ‘minor’. We consider these terms to be synonyms yet there is a terminological difference.

A child in terms of the Lanzarote Convention is any person under the age of 18 years. Similarly, a child like victim of a crime in terms of the CC, shall mean a minor up to 18 years. It is the same with every other national law which provides a definition of a child.

Unfortunately, The CC of RM as well as the other laws is not concrete and explicit. There is not terminological compatibility. Namely, looking through national legislation, we notice the use of a few terms a: child, minor, juvenile, person who is not full of age, person up to 18 years, younger juvenile, an older juvenile respectively - younger major.<sup>49</sup>

Secondly, the CC does not specify whether the sexual activities in which a child is a part of, should be real or simulated, although it mentions afterwards ‘real pictures which shows sexual activities with a minor.’ Similarly, I am wondering what does the term ‘real pictures’ mean.

Furthermore, it also includes the term ‘a person who looks like a minor’, without explicitly explaining the meaning of that term.

At the end, nothing is said about depiction of a child’s sexual organs for sexual purposes.

xii. Yes, it is compatible. As it is required in the Article 20(1a) to (1f) of the Lanzarote Convention, the Republic of Macedonia did take the necessary legislative measures to ensure that every intentional conduct in regard to child pornography is criminalized in the Criminal Code of the Republic of Macedonia.

As follows, the article 193-a ‘production and distribution of child pornography’ of the CC of the RM:

(1) A person who produces child pornography in order to distribute it, or he/she transports it or offers it or it makes the child pornography available otherwise, shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least five years.

(2) A person who obtains child pornography for him/herself or for another, or possesses child pornography, shall be punished with an imprisonment from five to eight years.

(3) If the crime from items (1) and (2) of this Article is committed using computer system or by any other means of mass communication, shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least eight years.

(4) If the crime from this Article is committed by juridical person, it shall be punished with a fine.

With regard to their compatibility, this Article criminalizes every conduct that is mentioned in the Lanzarote Convention.

xiii. The State has implemented a lot of measures for children protection. The First World Children Embassy Megjashi; UNICEF; the Commission of Children rights protection and the Children Parliament of the Republic of Macedonia, provide continuous children protection through their work. Moreover, the Ministry of labour and social justice has established a special register for people foredoomed for minor's sexual abuse and paedophilia by an effective juridical decision.

In regards to pornographic materials, the first control measures are noticeable in the last few years. Namely, this year a special consulting body on children protection from illegal contents, threatening and activities on internet, established within the Government of the Republic of Macedonia held a meeting for the first time. The project will seek to reduce the dangers and harmful effects on children and youth. In the upcoming period an opening of helpline is planned, which will help to increase the knowledge of parents and children for self-protection, as well as to guide every person who is willing to report child pornography on the Internet. Parents should use free software tools to protect children online, which can be purchased in any IT shop or downloaded from the Internet. They will be able to set parameters when using Internet by their children, time can be used as measure, as well as pages and the content which can be seen.

There are some key areas of concern covered by the project, including any illegal content, child pornography, online courting, hate speech and the protection of children. One of the tasks included in the project is formation of a Centre for Raising Awareness among the local population. They will be responsible for creating national strategies to raise awareness among children, youth, parents and teachers. Its work will be coordinated by the National Internet Hotline Provider.

Furthermore, the national Commission for children rights of the RM did a special national program on children rights protection in RM (2005-2015). The sixth strategic aim of the Ministry of Justice and Ministry of Internal Affairs includes disabling media presentation of violence, pornography and inconvenient behaviour, respectively a development of appropriate guidelines for a child protection from information and material which are disadvantageous and destructive.

The State is a party to the Lanzarote Convention, but it did not use the reservation right that has been given to the parties in the Lanzarote Convention.<sup>50</sup>

xiv. Yes, it does. In Section XIX, article 193 (3) to (6) of the Criminal Code of the Republic of Macedonia, the State does criminalize both the intentional abuse of a minor and compelling of a minor to participate in pornographic performances.

At first, a person who will abuse a minor for making of audiovisual pictures or other items with pornographic content or for participating in a pornographic performance, as well as the one who participates in the performance, they both shall be punished with an imprisonment from three to five years.

Secondly, a person who will compel a minor for making and recording pictures or other items with pornographic content or for participating in a pornographic performance, shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least eight years.

Thirdly, if this crime is committed upon a minor below the age of fourteen, the perpetrator shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least four years.

Moreover, if the crime is committed by a juridical person, it shall be punished with a fine. All the objects used for committing the crime shall be taken away as well.

The Criminal Code does not specify the difference between recruitment and coercion, although it criminalizes the abuse of a minor for making of audiovisual pictures or other items with pornographic content or for participating in a pornographic performance and the compel of a minor for making and recording pictures and other items with pornographic content, as well as for participating in pornographic performance. The abuse and compel are part of the crime named as: 'showing pornographic materials to a minor'.<sup>51</sup>

The term 'abuse' is not explained or defined. Additionally, the term 'compel', which refers to the term 'coercion', may be explained only in regards to compel like specific crime. Namely, the crime of compel belongs to the section of crimes against human rights and freedoms, not to the section of crimes against sexual freedom and sexual morality.

As a result of this, we can only use the definition provided in that Article and apply it afterwards for better understanding of what a coercion of a child for participating in pornographic performances would mean. Namely, a compel means compelling of a person by using force or serious threat, to do or not to do something, or to put up with something.

In this sense, compel of a child for participating in pornographic performance would be any compelling of a child for participating in pornographic performance by using force<sup>53</sup> or serious threat.

The State's approach to the attendance of pornographic performances involving the participation of children includes taking different measures for prevention and intervention in cases of child pornography, through implementation of national strategies, plans, projects and trainings.

This year the Government will launch a project for protection of children and youth from illegal and harmful internet content which poses a threat to their proper development. The project will encompass measures and establishment of bodies involving representatives from the whole society, coordinated by the Ministry of Information Society and Administration.

The project will develop in four directions: establishment of a national centre for safer internet; development of a national programme and an action plan for prevention and protection of children and youth from internet abuse; enhancement of control and

xv. Yes, it does. Looking through the CC of RM, we find two different crimes belonging to the same section of crimes against sexual freedom and sexual morality, but both criminalizing the intentional causing of a child to witness sexual abuse or sexual activities, without necessarily having to participate. The first article refers to sexual satisfaction in advance of another. Actually, the second part (item 2) of the article refers to question asked. As follows:

(2) A person who performs a sexual act in front of a child, or who induces a child to perform such an act in front of him or in front of another, shall be punished with an imprisonment from three to five years.<sup>57</sup>

The second article refers to showing of pornographic materials to minor. By careful reading of its first item, we find that part which refers to intentional causing of a child to witness sexual activity:

(1) A person who sells, shows or by public presentation or in some other way makes available pictures, audio-visual or other objects with a pornographic content to a minor under the age of fourteen, or shows him a pornographic performance, shall be punished with an imprisonment from six months to three years.<sup>58</sup>

A pornographic performance is a sexual act. If you demonstrate pornographic performance to a child, by kind of analogy - that means you are causing of that child to witness such sexual activity.

We can relate the term “causing” to the term “abet” used in the CC of RM to describe the situation of intentionally causing of somebody to make a decision or strengthen the already made one for committing a crime. According to the article 23 of CC of RM, a person who

abets another intentionally to commit a crime, will be punished as if he had committed the crime himself.<sup>59</sup>

The abet or making a somebody's decision for committing a crime may be effectuated in different ways: by threat, force, bilk, seeming distraction from committing the crime etc. In short, any form of psychological influence may be used. The eventual person's vacillation may be also suspended by encouragement, promise prize, assistance while committing the crime, promise of crime's suppression, promise of preventing the disclose of the crime etc.<sup>60</sup>

The term "abet" is not defined in the CC of RM, but its meaning is being interpreted and explained and by the Macedonian legal theory.

2.5 Solicitation of Children for Sexual Purposes

xvi. The State criminalizes the "Allurement of a child under the age of fourteen to sexual intercourse or other sexual act." <sup>61</sup>

The age of the perpetrator is not specified. In other words, this crime may be committed by any perpetrator who may appear playing that role.

A general clause is used to describe the subject who's committing the crime. As already mentioned, these are called general crimes in criminal theory.<sup>62</sup>

Namely, a person who bamboozles a minor under the age of fourteen into statutory rape or other sexual act or child pornography production by using a computer networks communication devices or in other manner (and is scheduling a meeting as well) and a meeting with the minor is realized with such an intent, he/she shall be punished with an imprisonment from one to five years.

The CC of RM states the intent of the perpetrator to hold meeting with a minor at first and secondly, most importantly as well- it stresses at the end that the meeting must be held. Apparently if a meeting is not proposed and realized consequently, we cannot consider the crime as committed and to accuse the perpetrator afterwards.

Nothing is said about allurement of a minor older than fourteen years.

xvii. The State has determined and regulated both the aid and abetment, as well as the attempt, but if considered generally. Namely, the CC of RM is divided into two sections: a general part and a special part. The special part is dedicated to specified crimes and sanctions provided for every different crime, the first part (the general one) is dedicated to criminal liability, sanctions and measures in general, rehabilitation, application of the criminal code, definitions part etc.<sup>63</sup> Therefore, the aid, abetment and the attempt to a crime are explained in the general part of the CC, so they may be applied to any of the crimes mentioned afterwards in the special part. Apparently to the activities mentioned in the subsections as well.

Thus if we apply those articles to the crimes mentioned in subsections a, b, c, d and e, we can conclude:

The aide: (in regard to every crime mentioned and explained above):

Like a person who assists<sup>64</sup> in the perpetration of a crime intentionally, an aide shall be punished as if he had committed the crime by himself or more mildly.<sup>65</sup>

Attempt: A person that intentionally starts the perpetration of a crime, but who does not complete it, shall be punished as for an attempted crime for which an imprisonment of five years or more severe punishment may be pronounced according to the law. For the attempt of every other crime, the perpetrator shall be punished only when the law explicitly prescribes the punishment of an attempt. The perpetrator shall be punished for an attempt within the limits of the punishment prescribed for the crime, and he may be punished more mildly.<sup>66</sup>

In other words, because an imprisonment of five years or more severe punishment is provided by the CC almost for every activity mentioned above, we can say that the attempt is always punishable in regards to these activities, with a few exceptions in cases of:

<sup>64</sup> For the meaning of the term “assistance” / “aid”: like an assistance of the crime will be considered especially: giving advice or instructions for committing the crime; making means available to the offender for committing the crime; removal of hindrances for perpetrating the crime; as well as giving promise for suppression of the crime, the offender, the means used for commitment of the crime, the traces or the items obtained by the crime, Criminal Code of the Republic of Macedonia, general part, Section II, article 24 (2)

- Performing a sexual act in front of a child, or inducing a child to perform such an act in front of him or in front of other;
- Enabling sexual services for profit;
- Mediation in prostitution by a legal entity;
- Procuring and enabling a minor to sexual acts by a legal entity;
- Showing a pornographic material or performance to a minor under the age of fourteen whether it was done through mass media or not;
- compelling a minor under the age of fourteen for making and recording pictures or other items with pornographic content or for participating in a pornographic performance, whether this crime was committed by an individual or by a legal entity;
- Producing and distribution of child pornography by a legal entity;
- Allurement of a child under the age of fourteen to sexual intercourse or other sexual act;
- Trafficking in minors by legal entity;

Abetting:

A person that intentionally abets another to commit a crime shall be punished as if he had perpetrated the crime by himself. If the person intentionally abets another to commit a crime, for which an imprisonment sentence of five years or a more severe sentence may be pronounced, and there is not even an attempt to commit a crime, shall be punished as for an attempted crime<sup>67</sup>.

According to this, abetting to any of the sexual activities mentioned in subsections above is punishable, but only in relation to the second part of the Article (item 2). Consequently, the perpetrator shall be punished always as for an attempted crime no matter if there was not even an attempt to commit the crime. This conclusion comes from the fact that all those crimes explained above are punishable with an imprisonment of five or more years.

The exceptions given above (Performing a sexual act in front of a child, or inducing a child to perform such an act in front of him or in front of another, Enabling sexual services for profit, Mediation in prostitution by a legal entity, Procuring and enabling a minor to sexual acts by a legal entity, Showing a pornographic material or performance to a minor under the age of fourteen whether it was done through mass media or not, Compelling a minor under the age of fourteen for making and recording pictures or other items with pornographic content or for participating in a pornographic performance, whether this crime was committed by an individual or by a legal entity, Producing and distribution of child pornography by a legal entity, Allurement of a child under the age of fourteen to sexual intercourse or other sexual act and Trafficking in minors by legal entity) are actually crimes of whose commitment the abettor will be punished as if he had committed the crime by himself.

This comes out from the fact the sanctions provided by the law for committing those crimes are less than an imprisonment of five years, thus they cannot and do not relate to the second part of the article, where the perpetrator shall be punished as for an attempted crime.

2.6 Corporate Liability

xviii. Yes, it does. Item 5 from the Second chapter of the CC of RM regulates the legal entities criminal liability. According to the CC of RM, legal entities are hold criminally liable when a crime is committed by a leading person, an employee or a representative.

- The criminal liability of the legal entity must be provided by the law
- The crime shall be committed by a leading person
- The crime shall be committed whether on behalf of the legal entity ( cases when the perpetrator appears like its interest representative ); in the expense of the legal entity ( the legal entity entails the consequences – legal and material ) and in its favour ( whenever the legal entity has gained immediate benefits from the activity of the leading person ).<sup>68</sup>

There are differences between the leading person liability and liability of the employers in regards to the conditions under which they are considered to be liable.

A legal entity is held criminally liable in cases that are stipulated in laws for crimes committed by a leading person, on behalf of, in the expense of or in favour of the legal entity.<sup>69</sup>

These are conditions under which the legal entity is considered to be liable when a crime by leading person<sup>70</sup> has been committed. They're cumulative:

Conditions in regards to an employee or a representative are different. Namely, the first two are both cumulative with any of those given after them, started with 'if'. As follows:

- The crime shall be committed by an employee or a representative
- A significant propertied benefice shall be gained or significant propertied damage shall be caused
- And if:

The implementation of a conclusion, order or other decision or an approval given by the management body, governance body or supervisory body means commitment of a crime.

The crime is committed because of omission of an obligatory supervision by the management body, governance body or supervisory body.

The management body, governance body or supervisory body did not prevent the crime or concealed it or did not report the crime before instigating the criminal procedure against the perpetrator.<sup>71</sup>

Under these conditions provided by the criminal law, all the legal entities<sup>72</sup> are held criminally liable, with the exception of the State.

<sup>70</sup> About the term "leading person", the Criminal Code of the Republic of Macedonia, general part, section XIII, article 122 (7): "a person within the legal entity, who considering his/her function or based on special authorization in the legal entity, is entrusted with a certain circle of matters which concern the execution of legal regulations, or regulations that are enacted on the basis on a law or a general act of the legal entity, in the management, use and disposition of property, the management of the production or some other economic process, or the supervision over them. An official person is also considered to be a responsible person, when this concerns crimes where a responsible person is found to be perpetrator, and which crimes are not foreseen in the chapter on crimes against official duty, i.e. crimes by an official person foreseen in some other chapter of this Code. When this code specifically stipulates, a responsible person shall also be considered the person who performs a special function or an authorization or is entrusted to independently perform certain operations within the foreign legal entity, as well as the person which is a representative of the foreign legal entity within the Republic of Macedonia."

<sup>72</sup> About the term "legal entity", Criminal Code of the Republic of Macedonia, section XIII, article 122 (6): "A legal entity shall mean: the Republic of Macedonia, units of local self-government, political parties, public enterprises, companies, institutions and other associations, funds, financial organizations, and other organizations specified by law, which are registered as legal entities, and other communities and organizations to which have been recognized as having the property of a legal entity. A foreign legal entity shall mean: a public enterprise, institution, fund, bank, company or any other form of organization in accordance with the laws of a foreign country pertaining to the performance of economic, financial, banking, trade, service or other activities, and which has a headquarters in another country or a branch office in the Republic of Macedonia or has been founded as an international association, fund, bank or institution."

xix. Administrative liability of legal entities is anticipated in cases of committing administrative torts. Civil liability cannot be applied to legal entities, but only on individuals.

CC of RM provides criminal liability of legal entities. Actually, they are liable for committed torts. On the basis of their liability for committed torts they become liable for committed offences as well. At the end they become criminally liable. Their criminal liability is provided in the Novel from 2004, when a special system of punishments was established by the State.<sup>73</sup>

xx. No, it does not. The CC of RM provides parallel liability, which means that the corporate liability does not exclude the individual liability in any case. <sup>74</sup> Additionally, the legal entity is hold liable for committing a crime even if there are obstacles as a fact of matter or legal obstacles for determination of the perpetrator's criminal liability.<sup>75</sup>

xxi. Yes, it does. Generally, the aggravating circumstances may be found whenever an aggravating consequence was caused. The difference is, they must be found while committing the crime not afterwards like consequences which are caused. In this sense, causing of an aggravating consequence is regulated in the second chapter of the CC of RM which refers to the crime and criminal responsibility. Namely, when a severe consequence emanated from the committed crime and for which the law provides heavier punishment, the punishment may be pronounced only if the offender acted negligently in relation to this consequence.<sup>76</sup> They are diverse and always depend on the committed crime.

In case of crimes against sexual freedom and morality, in regards to children's rights, these aggravating circumstances can be found:

- Blood kinship in a straight line, brother or sister
- Perpetrator with capacity of: teacher, educator, adoptive parent, tutor, stepfather, stepmother, doctor or any other person by misusing his/her position

- Crime committed by using force, serious threat, misinformation or some other form of force, by rape, deception, abuse of position or state of pregnancy, infirmity or physical or mental inability of another, or by giving and taking money or other benefit in order to get approval of a person controlling another person

There are differences regarding crimes where different aggravating circumstances may be applied, impact on the determination of the perpetrator's liability and sanctions provided by the law, which maintain different although heavier than usual. As follows:

- In case of a rape, with regards to a minors older than fourteen years, under the following aggravating circumstances, the perpetrator will not be punished with an imprisonment from three to ten years, but instead:

If a severe body injury, death or other severe consequences were caused, or the crime was perpetrated by several persons or in an especially cruel and degrading manner, the offender shall be punished with imprisonment of at least four years.<sup>77</sup>

- In case of sexual attack upon a minor under the age of fourteen committed under some aggravating circumstances, the perpetrator won't be usually given an imprisonment of at least eight years, but instead:

The same punishment shall be also applied to a person who commits this crime by misusing his mental illness, mental disorder, helplessness, retarded mental development or some other state, because of which the child is incapable of resistance.<sup>79</sup>

If because of a severe body injury, death or some other severe consequences were caused, or the crime was perpetrated by several persons, or in an especially cruel and degrading manner, the offender shall be punished with imprisonment of at least ten years or with a life imprisonment.<sup>80</sup>

The perpetrator shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least ten years ( instead of at least five), plus he will be sentenced by the Court with a ban to perform further professional job, activity or duty.<sup>81</sup>

- In case of satisfying sexual passions in front of another (involvement of a child):

- In case of incest ( the age of the victim):

If the crime is committed upon a minor under the age of fourteen, the perpetrator shall be punished with an imprisonment of at least ten years, instead of with an imprisonment from five to ten years.<sup>85</sup>

- In case of trafficking in minors:

The same punishment shall be applied whenever the crime is committed by an official during his/her professional job performance. <sup>86</sup> includes deprivation of liberty is always pronounced like main sentence.<sup>87</sup> In general, the CC of RM for the above mentioned crimes, provides an imprisonment from six months up to life imprisonment. Its duration differs and always depends on the committed crime.

Namely, an imprisonment may not be shorter than thirty days, or longer than 15 years.<sup>88</sup> Nonetheless, there are crimes for which a life imprisonment sentence is prescribed. In those cases, the life imprisonment sentence may not be prescribed as the only main punishment and it cannot be pronounced for an offender who doesn't attain the age of twenty one at the time when the crime was committed. There is also an alternative for these crimes: an imprisonment of 20 years may be pronounced instead of a life imprisonment.<sup>89</sup>

The second sanction provided by the CC of RM is the fine, which appears to be pronounced every time one of the above mentioned crimes was committed by a legal entity.

According to the CC of RM, a fine may be applied either like a main or a secondary sentence. In the second case, it is pronounced together with an imprisonment sentence or together with a suspended sentence which establishes an imprisonment punishment.<sup>90</sup>

In regard to the crimes mentioned above, we can conclude that the fine is always provided like a main sentence.

So when pronounced like a main sentence, the fine is always pronounced in daily fines, where the number cannot be less than five and not more than 360 daily fines.<sup>91</sup>

The third and last sanction is a ban for performing profession, activity and duty. Namely, it can be pronounced only like a secondary sentence in addition to an imprisonment sentence or to a suspended sentence which establishes an imprisonment punishment.<sup>92</sup>

The court shall determine the duration of the ban. Anyway, it cannot be less than one or more than ten years from the day of the legal effectiveness of the judgment. Moreover, the time spent in imprisonment is not considered within the duration of the ban.<sup>93</sup>

The extradition is regulated with the Law on International Cooperation in criminal matters (Official Gazette of the RM n. 07-3754/1 from 14/08/2010), section IV.

Extradition on the basis of an arrest warrant is allowed only for crimes for which the national legislation provides an imprisonment sentence of at least one year and it is permitted only for implementing of an effective imprisonment sentence pronounced, providing that the person has at least four months to accomplish the whole penalty. An extradition cannot occur for conducts which are not criminalized by the CC of the RM and are not for a crime committed before the extradition, which is not actually an object of the extradition request.<sup>94</sup> This stays as a rule except in two cases. The first one is when an approval is given by an authorized authority. The authorized authority also submits the necessary documents, together with a statement of the extradited person given on a minute book. The second case is when the extradited person did not left the country where he was extradited although he had a chance for that within 45 days after his/her release or has already left the country, but went back there again.<sup>95</sup>

The assumptions for an extradition's approval when the extradition is required from RM, conditions under which the extradition may be conducted and ways it is performed, are precisely stated and explained in the Law. This section incorporates part dedicated to cases when the extradition is required from the RM and one more separated part dedicated to cases of an extradition request to RM from a foreign country.

Demand for an extradition from RM cannot be submitted after 40 days from the day when the person was put in custody for the purposes of the extradition.<sup>96</sup> The decision over extradition is made by the Minister for Justice of the RM.<sup>97</sup>

An extradition is not allowed for political crimes or crimes in relation to those crimes. An internationally committed crime, crime of terrorism as well as an attempt on the president's life and the life of his family, are not considered as political crimes in this sense.<sup>98</sup>

This Law may not be applied in cases when an extradition is requested because of a military duties violation.<sup>99</sup>

An extradition for a crime of which a capital punishment is provided by the Law of a foreign country will not be performed if the country doesn't guarantee that the capital punishment will not occur.<sup>100</sup>

All in all, there are differences between cases when the extradition is requested by the RM or by a foreign country and those cases apparently are regulated more concretely in the Law mentioned above.

xxiii. Generally, yes. A lot of modifications in the CC of RM were made. Sanctions and measures are definitely determined more severe in comparison with those previously provided by the law. As a result of the approach of the State to make them compatible with all the Conventions and International documents it has ratified, they serve at the same time as kind of guarantee that human rights, particularly the rights of the children will get their protection on a higher level. Taking into consideration the fact that capital punishment is not permitted, the life sentence serves as a good substitute.

The only thing which I doubt for, are the sanctions provided for legal entities as well as for cases when heavier sanction for causing a damaging consequence may be pronounced. For an instance, what is the logic in pronouncement a fine like main sentence when a crime of production and distribution of child pornography was committed by a legal entity? That is not an effective sanction, more less a proportionate one with the accordance of the heaviness of the crime.

Furthermore, it is illogical to pronounce a heavier sanction for causing a damaging consequence only when the crime was committed by negligence. On the contrary, the perpetrator should be punished more rigorously, especially in cases for causing damaging consequences intentionally.

xxiv. The law provides fine like a main sentence when a crime by a legal entity has been committed. Its amount may not be less than 100.000 MKD and not more than 30.000.000 MKD.<sup>101</sup>

There are also eight more sanctions which may be also pronounced, but only like secondary. Those are: a ban for getting allowance, license, concession, authorization or other right provided by a special law; a ban for participation in public invocation procedure, assignment of a public provision contracts and contracts for public-private partnership; a ban for establishing new legal entities; a ban for the use of subventions and other advantageous credits; deprivation of an allowance, license, concession, authorization or other right provided by a special law; temporary ban for performing a specified activity; permanent ban for performing a specified activity or termination of its existence.<sup>102</sup>

Conditions under which a fine like a secondary sanction may be pronounced are precisely regulated in the CC of RM.<sup>103</sup>

Furthermore, the main sentence, as well as the secondary ones, is written in the electronic register of sanctions for committed crimes by the legal entities of the RM. The pronounced sentence have to be deleted from the register ex officio, provided that the main sentence has to be deleted three years after the accomplishment day of the punishment or three years after the obsolete punishment.<sup>104</sup>

While determining the punishment, the Court takes into consideration the balance sheet, profit and loss account of the legal entity, type of the activity and the crime's heaviness.<sup>105</sup>

There is a possibility of a milder punishment pronouncement in cases provided by the law, including: explicit determination by the Court, cases when an absolution was possible, but not effectuated and under some concessive circumstances when the aim of the punishment may be achieved with a milder sanction.<sup>106</sup>

At the end, the boundaries of the milder sanction pronouncement, absolution, determination of the fine, fine accomplishment, fine deferment, the confiscation and seizure, xxv. Yes, the State legislates seizure and confiscation of materials. Confiscation and seizure are regulated in the CC of RM. According to the text provided by the law, every property gain acquired by committing the crime in a direct or indirect way shall be confiscated with a Court decision. This is done in the same usual criminal procedure in which the criminal liability of the perpetrator is fortified.<sup>108</sup>

If there are some factual obstacles (e.g. the perpetrator is on the run or died) or some legal obstacles (e.g. the perpetrator is known, but he/she is a minor under the age of fourteen or enjoys immunity) because of which the usual criminal procedure may not be conducted properly, the Court makes a confiscation decision in a different procedure than usual one.<sup>109</sup>

In regard to the confiscation, the meaning of direct and indirect property gain is specified and explained further on in the CC's articles. These property gains will be also confiscated from third parties if those gains are acquired especially for them by committing the crime.<sup>110</sup> The term "third parties" used in this article refers to bona fide third parties. Consequently, if the third person did know or could know that the property is gained by committing a crime, that person is not treated like "a third person" by the law, but instead like a perpetrator of the crime "Concealment".<sup>111</sup>

In regards to seizure of the objects, there is an obligatory seizure and a facultative one. The first one refers to seizure of an object which appears like a result of the committed crime. Those cannot be kept or appropriated neither from the perpetrator nor from any third party. The objects intended for committing the crime or already used for it, no matter whose property they are (of the perpetrator or of a third party) must be seized, if the seizure serves the public safety interests or the interests of people's health or moral.<sup>112</sup>

The facultative seizure also refers to the objects intended for or used for committing the crime. The difference is that those objects may be taken away only if there is any possibility or danger that they will be used again in such way.<sup>113</sup>

Protection of the third parties is provided by the CC of RM, which states that the objects that are in property of bona fide third parties will not be confiscated.<sup>114</sup> The term bona fide as used in the CC of RM, involves cases when the third party did not, could not know and was not required to know that those objects were actually intended or used for committing the crime.

According to the CC of RM, the property which is confiscated shall be given back to the person who has suffered damage. If there is no any person who suffered the damage, it becomes a property of the Republic of Macedonia.<sup>115</sup>

The funds for children protection are allocated by the Budget of the RM. With those funds the following shall be financed: the rights to the protection of children, the activity of public institutions for children established by the Government, construction, maintenance and equipping the facilities of those public institutions, program activities in certain forms of promotion and development of the activity and more.<sup>116</sup>

Moreover in the original text of the Law on Juvenile Justice there was a stipulation to set up a compensation fund in the amount of 2% of assets in the Budget of the Republic of Macedonia from fines imposed by the courts for crimes or offenses, and collected in the previous year. The purpose was an indemnification of a minor who is a victim or is corrupted by crimes of violence and other acts of individual or group violence. This legal decision was widely accepted and assessed as very positive benefit for the care and rehabilitation of the child victims. But with changes made in 2010) this fund was abolished. For this purpose, a different solution is provided. Namely, an allocation of funds within the budget of the Ministry of Justice (herein after will be mentioned as “Ministry”). The Ministry will adopt a program that will serve as a certain plan by previously acquired opinion of the State Council for Prevention of Juvenile Delinquency. However, these legal provisions are xvi. The CC of RM provides the imprisonment like main sentence when a crime of sexual abuse against a child was committed. According to the form it appears its duration differs.

We can bring these rules by the CC of RM closely by giving a practical example from the criminal practice. Namely, a parent who abused his daughter sexually, permanently inflicting her grave bodily injures and threatened her with an attack over her life or body if she tells anybody about it, was sentenced to thirteen years of an imprisonment by the Criminal Court of the Republic of Macedonia, with an obligation to cover all the procedure's costs as well as to give a reparation for survived fear and pain to his daughter.<sup>118</sup>

The other punishment determined like secondary following the main one is the ban for performing profession, activity or duty.

The Law on children protection explicitly bans all the forms of children abuse and exploitation including the sexual one (child pornography, child prostitution), children sail, trafficking in children, physical or psychological violence upon children etc.<sup>119</sup> In fact, the legislator prescribes a penalty from 500 to 1500 euro for every infringer in sense of a children institution, agency or an individual who provides activities connected with children's upbringing and education.<sup>120</sup>

Additionally, there is a possibility provided by the Law on family for deprivation of performing the parental right. Namely, when the parent exploits or harshly leaves over his/her parental duties by means of sexual exploitation, physical or emotional violence upon the child, the Court with previously procured opinion by the Centre for Social Work, will make a decision as explained above in civil procedure.<sup>121</sup>

There are different measures included in the national policy of the Government like health protection, obligatory accommodation of the victims, psycho-social intervention and treatment, appropriate consulting body, continuous education, law protection and defence,

Furthermore, there are also some projects like the one represented recently by the Government of the Republic of Macedonia, named as “Recognize the violence”, segregated for nursery school teachers in order to create a great perception of different symptoms and reactions of the child denoting that the child is a victim of any form of family violence, including the sexual abuse.

At the end, there is a form of traditional (non institutional) children protection like a part of the social protection system of the RM which is used like a measure for more than thirty years. Shortly explained, it gives the opportunity for children to get their proper care in a “foster family” whenever their growth and personal security are endangered within their real family. Placing children in foster families is used as a tool and resource in the policy and the process of de-institutionalization and the development of non institutional forms in the local community.

The role of foster families can contact all families who meet the legally prescribed conditions. Individuals or families who want to foster a child can address the Centre for Social Work which operates on the territory of their permanent residence.

Those families get remuneration in monthly amount of 5000 MKD from the Ministry of Labour and Social Work.

3.1 Investigation

i. Macedonian legislation following the example of the European legislation, takes a step forward in finding suitable solutions and better course during the procedure when the victim of sexual abuse and human trafficking is a child-juvenile, which has not yet reached 18 years of age. The new Law on Criminal Procedure from 2010, offers a different approach and a whole range of measures taken in cases of this kind.

<sup>122</sup> Minister on labour and social justice of the Republic of Macedonia, Rulebook on the enforcement and monitoring the execution of pronounced measures to protect the family and the victims of domestic violence undertaken by the Centre for Social Work and the manner of monitoring the measures imposed by the court, part I, article 6 – article 25

Primarily because the child sexual abuse criminal offence is a crime for which the Criminal Code provides for imprisonment of one to ten years<sup>123</sup> and a minimum sentence of eight years for trafficking of a juvenile, it is necessary to offer the victim, as a non-obligatory opportunity, an adviser on the expense of the state budget, before giving testimony or statement, or submitting property and legal claim, if there are severe psychological and physical damages or serious consequences of the crime,<sup>124</sup> as well as compensation for pecuniary and non-pecuniary damages from the state fund under the conditions and manner prescribed by special law, if the compensation of the damage cannot be provided by the convicted.<sup>125</sup> Furthermore, before the stage of investigation, i.e. the hearing of the victim, LCP provides the right for the victim to talk to a free adviser or attorney before the hearing, if it participates in the procedure as injured party,<sup>126</sup> given that juveniles are often economically dependent on their parents, this is an opportunity yet to fully exercise their rights at the expense of the state budget. When it comes to children as victims of sexual abuse or human trafficking, it is important for them to be examined by persons of the same sex in the police and in public prosecution,<sup>127</sup> in order to feel the closeness and establish a friendly relationship with the investigator, and thus to extract the greatest possible benefit from the examination itself. The child has the right not to answer questions regarding his personal life, questions that do not concern the criminal offence,<sup>128</sup> and has the right to require the examination to be conducted by audio-visual resources, that will later be used as evidence in the proceedings.<sup>129</sup> Last of the series of measures provided by the CC is the possibility to require exclusion of the public from the main hearing,<sup>130</sup> on the ground that the victim is a child-juvenile, upon which the opinions and reactions of the public could have a vast negative impact. The court, the public prosecutor and the police are obliged to announce all of the rights that the victim (juvenile) of the sexual assault criminal offence has, at least before the first examination, followed by compiling an official note or minutes.<sup>131</sup>

Given the fact that the children are categorized as vulnerable victims, CC provides special procedural protection measures in the second stage of the procedure, i.e. when giving the statement, and at all stages of further proceedings, in order to avoid possible adverse effects on the child's personality and development, and to work towards achieving the best interests of the child. What the Law on Juvenile Justice provides is that when the proceeding where the victim is juvenile is urgent,<sup>132</sup> which indicates that the procedure should be completed as soon as possible, in order to avoid any additional trauma to the child and fast recovery, and finally to be able to continue to function in the society as well as all its other peers. Furthermore, the juvenile victim can be heard as a witness only, if it does not adversely affect his physical and mental development and be heard not more than twice as a witness and, as an exception, a third time if that is required by the special circumstances of the case,<sup>133</sup> once again confirming the assumption that any unnecessary further questioning, causes repeated trauma and is a reminder of something that has a negative impact on the child's development and psychophysical condition. During the hearings the court is obliged to take account of the personal traits and characteristics of the juvenile, for the protection of his interests and for its proper development.<sup>134</sup> What is of particular importance is the presence of a psychologist, pedagogue or other expert<sup>135</sup> during the hearing, as to avoid any adverse consequences of the hearing itself, because the presence of these experts affect the safety of the victim and allows maintaining good mental condition, where the victim would give a true statement, without fear, knowing that there is someone who understands his/her position and is aware of what he/she is going through.

The whole range of special procedural protection measures is provided by CC and LJJ, in order to allow a correct and desirable course of the proceedings, where the victim /injured party will not face external influences while giving his/her statement, will feel secure and safe, and will be spared from judgment by the public (because the public is excluded from the process), where after the end of the trial the victim will be able to continue the normal course of life, just like any other citizen.

ii. As for the investigation and the investigative measures being taken in order to detect the sexual abuse of children criminal offence, in the Republic of Macedonia there are no established, nor provided certain special units that independently take action, but those are undertaken by the police, often in covert operations, through continuous monitoring of suspected persons, as well as supervision over the victims themselves. Often, when operations are in the final stage, when most of the necessary information and evidence are collected, agents-provocateurs are being used in order to successfully complete the operations and capture the perpetrators of the act. However, it should be clear that the actions of the police, although usually successful, though are not sufficient, so the establishment of special units that would be specialized to detect specific offenses of this type is necessary, whose task would be faster and better detecting and preventing criminal offences, without major consequences.

iii. Investigation can begin in two ways. The first provides the beginning of the investigation with reporting the criminal offence to the police by the victim or the injured party, but often there are cases when the Public Prosecutor's Office has reasonable doubt, or when there are serious threats to the victim's life and personality, so the investigation is initiated at the request of the Public Prosecutor's Office, without the need of reporting by the victim.

Depending on whether there is other material evidence present, or only the statement of the victim can be found as material evidence, it can be determined whether the proceedings will continue even if injured parties withdraw their statements, or whether there are other relevant evidence sufficient for the process to continue. For example, if there's been pre-investigative measures conducted, and there is a photo documentation or audio-visual evidence, then the statement of the victims is not of great importance, even if the procedure is being withdrawn, the case will continue further, because PPPO has other material evidence which is quite sufficient for the further proceedings.

iv. When it comes to child sexual abuse criminal offence, where the victim is a child, as mentioned above, CC provides for imprisonment of the perpetrator of one to ten years,<sup>136</sup> and depending on how long the perpetrator of this criminal offence is convicted, there are different terms of obsolescence. If the conviction states more than one year of imprisonment, the term of obsolescence is three years from the commission of the criminal offense,<sup>137</sup> and if the conviction states over three years of imprisonment, the term of obsolescence is five years from the commission of the criminal offence,<sup>138</sup> and if the sentence is more than five years of imprisonment, then the term of obsolescence is ten years from the commission of the criminal offence.<sup>139</sup> In case if no criminal proceedings are being instituted, the obsolescence of the criminal prosecution begins from the date when the criminal offence was committed,<sup>140</sup> and the obsolescence of the criminal prosecution starts when twice as much time is passed as the law requires for the obsolescence of the criminal prosecution.<sup>141</sup> Obsolescence of the criminal prosecution may be terminated in the following cases: obsolescence stops with every procedural action taken for prosecution of the perpetrator for a criminal offence,<sup>142</sup> obsolescence can also be terminated if the perpetrator at the time during the expiration period of obsolescence will commit serious criminal offence.<sup>143</sup> After each termination of the criminal prosecution, the obsolescence starts to run again.<sup>144</sup>

v. There are cases when the child's age cannot be precisely determined, usually because the child does not carry any identification documents or it is not registered in the police database. In this situation the authorities cannot be sure whether the person is a child-juvenile or an adult person. In this case, the authorities are obliged to take all necessary actions provided in cases where the victim is a child-juvenile, and these measures are used until the exact age of the victim is determined. In this way, the law prevents in case of lack of information by the authorities, and allows full protection of the victim / injured party.

vi. The Ministry of Interior Affairs of the Republic of Macedonia is authorized to collect and store data on the defendants. The Ministry is authorized to share, send and receive other information about defendants with competent institutions of other countries, with the border authorities, immigration authorities, for easier and faster mutual disclosure of the identity of the defendants and appropriate preparation of criminal charges. In whole process of storing, sending and receiving data on defendants, the Ministry is obliged to take account

vii. In the Macedonian legislation, the participants in the criminal proceedings are provided with a secondary protection (complaint procedure) which is initiated by the Court of First Instance, the Court which rendered the first instance verdict, to higher (Court of Appeal). The role of the Court of First Instance in the event of a complaint procedure is to determine whether the complaint is prompt, permitted and in sufficient number of copies. Prompt complaint shall be a complaint which is submitted within 15 days after receipt of a copy of the verdict for each of the participants in the proceedings. Unpermitted complaint shall be a complaint submitted by a person who is not authorized for submitting a complaint or a person who renounced their complaint, or if it is determined cancelation of complaint, or if after the cancelation a complaint is once again submitted or if under the law a complaint is not permitted.<sup>145</sup> If the Council President of the Court of First Instance determines that the complaint is unprompted and unpermitted, it will be rejected with a decision.<sup>146</sup>

All parties have the right to complaint procedure, i.e. the parties, the counsel, the legal representative of the defendant and the injured party.<sup>147</sup> The injured party has the right to submit a complaint, i.e. to refute the verdict merely because the court's decision regarding the costs of the criminal proceedings.

LCP provides four grounds upon which the first instance verdict may be refuted. The first ground upon which the verdict may be refuted is due to essential violation of the provisions of the criminal procedure,<sup>148</sup> the second is due to a violation of the Criminal Code,<sup>149</sup> the third is due to an incorrect or incomplete establishment of the factual situation,<sup>150</sup> and the last is due to a decision on criminal sanctions, deprivation of property, costs of criminal viii. Children-victims have the right of protection and health care, psychosocial care, legal protection, as well as adequate social care and education.

When the accused of child sexual abuse criminal offence is the child's parent, the key role here is played by the Social Care Centre's properly trained professionals that will take care of the child.

4 COMPLEMENTARY MEASURES

i. The Republic of Macedonia makes efforts to protect children-victims of sexual abuse, protection that covers all important elements such as the legal framework, assessment of the situation, undertaking preventive measures, care for rehabilitation and reintegration into society, and protection of the best interests of children. Therefore, RM prepared an Action Plan for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings and Illegal Migration, a document that fully reflects the efforts of the Republic of Macedonia in the fight against children trafficking, which are responsibility of the country as a member of the United Nations and as a signatory of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the Optional Protocol on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography, which are international human rights documents of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the UN Convention against Transnational Organized Crime and its Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons Especially Women and Children and the World Plan of Action. The Action Plan for prevention of trafficking of children aims to: promote the policy of the Republic of Macedonia in the combat against children trafficking and exploitation; legal solutions and policy to combat children trafficking to be created on the basis of relevant data from research; take preventive measures for reducing the causes and risks that lead to emergence and increase in the trafficking and exploitation of children; establish a set of minimum standard services that will provide assistance, protection, rehabilitation and reintegration of children-victims of trafficking with human beings.<sup>152</sup>

ii. Governmental organizations, in cooperation with the NGO sector are undertaking various activities in this area in terms of children's education, public awareness raising, training of special staff to deal with this problem, training of members of the media and their introduction to this problem and appropriate presentation of specific cases through the media, organizing preventive seminars in primary and secondary schools intended to inform children about this phenomenon, to promote and support SOS - telephone line and informative counselling centres. Often public debates take place, where despite the children as participants, their parents are included too, in order to be familiarized with this problem and to contribute towards better informing of their children through the process of education. There are many partners in the combat to prevent this comprehensive problem, among which the MLSP, MIA, MD, municipalities, NGOs and international organizations.

NGOs have a role in the procedures for human trafficking and these organizations undertake various activities in the area, such as preparation of flyers, brochures and posters that inform children about the potential risks. The main task of NGOs is to lobby and follow the implementation of the international human rights standards, as well as capacity building and support of the national NGO network against trafficking in human beings in the Republic of Macedonia.

iv. In the Republic of Macedonia an overall system has been established for rehabilitation and reintegration of children-victims of sexual abuse. This system gives a complete psychosocial support to the victims, by establishing rehabilitation centres and development, and implementation of appropriate programs for the reintegration of children-victims in the society. Physical, social and psychological consequences that the victims are facing and are caused by abuse and exploitation during the human trafficking process, impose a need for building programs for their protection and support. At the moment, in the Republic of Macedonia there are two shelters that provide care for victims of human trafficking. One of them is placed under the authority of the Ministry of Interior Affairs, while the other is being managed by the NGO "Open Gate - La Strada". Also, there is a shelter intended for foreign victims of human trafficking and illegal migrants (Reception Centre for Foreigners) under state authority.

v. As one of the most effective prevention methods of human trafficking and sexual abuse of children in the RM, there is a SOS-phone line, which began its work in 2002 as a project of a non-governmental organization, which is actually the only phone service that offers information, counselling and assistance to citizens, trafficked persons and their families. This phone line is free, and can be used every day from 08:00 to 20:00. The purpose of this SOS line is to reduce the risk of human trafficking and sexual exploitation, by raising public awareness and providing information and assistance for the SOS customers.

Services and information obtained from the SOS-line are strictly personal, all data is protected and not to be passed to anyone, which strengthens the confidence of victims in this mechanism as a way of help.

III NATIONAL POLICY REGARDING CHILDREN

i. In the past 5-6 years there is a significant increase in political discussion and activities regarding child abuse issues in Macedonia. 2004-2009 the Institute for Sociological, Political and Juridical Research, Ss Cyril and Methodius – Skopje, prepared a children sexual abuse study for R. Macedonia. In Macedonia since 1991 exists the First Children's Embassy in the World "Megjasi" which is very active. In 2008 they amended the Criminal Law and increased the penalty for paedophilia and incest. Now they are proposing and promoting a measure like chemical castration and "electronic bracelets" as a preventive measures against child abuse, which in the words of the Minister for Social Policy Spiro Ristovski, quoted by Balkan Insight " the method's are worthy of consideration" In 2008 the government prepared Action plan for prevention and handling of sexual abuse of children and paedophilia 2009-2012. The government also recently published the new protocol for handling cases of sexual abuse of children and paedophilia.. In 2012 report was written on the situation of children's rights in the Republic of Macedonia prepared by the National NGO Coalition on the Rights of the Child.

ii. Since 2008, there is significant increasing of the number of cases of sexual abuse reported in media. The general perception is that it is not result of the increased number of committed criminal works, but more due to the termination of the cycle of shame, fear of stigmatization and traditional beliefs that it is a personal thing which remain to be held secretly in within the family. Most of the media now regularly follow and report such cases. Continuous media coverage of cases of sexual abuse of children contributes to recognition of this phenomenon. Nongovernmental organizations are increasingly involved in launching public awareness, create programs and funds to support victims and their families. The NGO's usually write reports and make project's like the report that was written on the situation of children's rights in the Republic of Macedonia prepared by the National NGO Coalition on the Rights of the Child and children sexual abuse study for R. Macedonia by the Institute for Sociological, Political and Juridical Research, Ss Cyril and Methodius – Skopje. The first children's embassy in the World "Megjasi" had an interesting media campaign raising awareness of the responsibility of parents like: "Did you hug your child today?"; "Did you tell your child today how much you love them?" and "Did you talk to your children today?". The government recently announced special register of convicted paedophiles that was publicly released.

iii. In Macedonia, there are no official estimates of government or other reliable data on the total number of children who are victims of sexual abuse or any other forms of violence. Therefore, these crimes remain largely a hidden phenomenon. Lately, several studies were conducted on various aspects of Children sexual abuse, initiated by professionals who work with child victims. There are data collected by the Ombudsman, (NGO - Association for the Protection of the Rights of the Child; NGO -Megjasi, mostly NGO practice of protecting child victims), and clinical qualitative research conducted by psychiatrists who treat victims of sexual abuse (Raleva M. Boskovski M.). However, recent data indicate that nearly 70% of children aged 2-14 were exposed to at least one form of psychological or physical punishment by their parents or other family members.

Only in the ongoing year, January until August 2012, followed up by the Centre for Social Work. There were recorded 28 charges of paedophilia, while last year (2011) they recorded 13 charges is the report from the Ministry of Labour and Social Policy Spiro Ristovski given for the "mkdenes" web portal.

Data collection in the table included analysis content of 231 court rulings convict made by the courts for criminal offenses, defined as child sexual abuse committed between January 2004 and June 2009.

Totally from 2004 until 2012 excluding 2010 since we don't have any official data about that year, there are 272 reports of child abuse or attempted sexual abuse. I have underline that this is only the number of reported cases in the authorities. An important aspect that must be taken into consideration when reviewing this research, which is pre-placed in this report, is that there are certain number of cases of sexual abuse of Children who are not registered - "Dark figure".

iv. Most of the campaign's that the government covers are attached in the Action plan for prevention and handling of sexual abuse of children and paedophilia 2009-2012. The most noticeable are: Sensitize and raise public awareness of the problem of child abuse and paedophilia, project which includes media campaigns to inform the general public, advertising material like plaques, leaflets, manuals, DVD and other visual material and informational and educational workshops to the general population; Encouraging the reporting of cases of child sexual abuse by opening an e-mail address for reporting child abuse and paedophilia and national SOS line for reporting cases of sexual abuse of children and paedophilia and establish a system for recording and reporting on cases of sexual abuse of children and paedophilia. The government recently promoted the protocol for handling cases of sexual abuse of children aims to provide an effective and successful cooperation of the competent authorities in raising the level of protection and assistance of children victims of sexual abuse and paedophilia, as well as help offenders in terms of behaviour change. This year a total of 150 schools across the country were conducting a training on the prevention of sexual abuse, while the website register of convicted paedophiles was visited by 150,000 citizens As part of the activities in the fight against the worst forms of child labour and combat sexual abuse of children, the First Children's Embassy in the World, celebrates November 19 as International Day for the protection of children from abuse and November 20 as the International Day of Children. The first children's embassy in the World "Megjasi" in association with the government had an interesting media campaign in video clips with significant results like "Did you hug your child today?" ; "Did you tell your child today how much you love them?" and "Did you talk to your children today?".

v. Since Macedonia is a conservative and traditional country, children's perspective in the past was little involved in the law making process. Back in 1990 not much was argued about child issues even though the issues were real and they existed. In the past years with the hard work of the NGO's mostly, children's perspective is considered in the law making process. First Children's Embassy in 2008 raised the level of intolerance toward child abusers, boosted the public opinion about the consequences that children suffer and seek increased penalties (minimum 8-10 years in prison) for the perpetrators of this serious crime including a sentence of life in prison. That same year the Assembly of the Republic of Macedonia adopted a new Criminal Code which under article 188 is provided and the sentence of life in prison. Unfortunately, in the Republic of Macedonia, despite numerous attempts to improve the rights of children and numerous legislative amendments, the rights of children are still not fully protected. In some cases it is because of legislative omissions, but in some cases where there is a good legal framework omission is made in the implementation of the Act and in the words of the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights children's perspective is still very low represented and there is still much to be done.

vi. With the initiative of the First Children's Embassy in the World, in November 13, 2007 the Macedonian national coalition of civil society organizations for the protection of the rights of the child was established (informal coalition). The coalition was formed in order to better protect children and their rights, as well as best meet the requirements of the Committee on the Rights of the Child by the United Nations. The coalition is composed of 15 NGOs and NGO coalitions from Macedonia:

- Association for Health Education and Research "Hera" - Skopje;
- Women Civic Initiative "Antico" - Kicevo;
- Coalition "All for Fair Trials" - Skopje (a coalition of 17 NGOs);
- "Life Start" - Bitola;
- Youth Educational Forum - Skopje;
- Open Gate "La Strada" - Skopje;
- "Open the windows" - Skopje;
- First Children's Embassy in the World "Megjasi" - Skopje;
- Council for Prevention of Juvenile Delinquency - Kavadarci;
- HOPS "Healthy Options" - Skopje;
- Humanitarian Association "Mother" - Kumanovo;
- Humanitarian and Charitable Association of Roma in Macedonia "Moon" – Gostivar
- Center for Civic Initiative - Prilep;
- Center for Human Rights and Conflict Resolution - Skopje;
- Shelter Center – Skopje.

Committee on the Rights of the Child by the United Nations in its concluding observations regarding legislation advises the State to continue to complete the harmonization of national legislation with the provisions of the Convention in consultation with all relevant partners and with broad participation of civil society. And while the Committee recommended to consult civil society, several important laws were implemented without wide consultation process involving all stakeholders, including civil society organizations. During the procedure, the adoption of certain laws of the members of the coalition was not consulted from the outset of the process.

IV OTHER

We believe that all relevant data concerning the issue of protection of children against sexual; harassment and sexual abuse has already been stated and elaborated in detail.

V CONCLUSION

By conducting such a vast and tiresome research about a rather delicate and sensitive matter, one gets to the conclusion that the general state is a positive one. Republic of Macedonia, although being a young country and a young democracy, really dedicates itself and works hard to improve and protect children's rights, and more specifically, the protection of children from sexual harassment.

A strong indicator of the country's dedication is the ratification of the Lanzarote Convention, which undoubtedly points to a developed conscious and willingness to improve the child's protection even further. It is important to stress that Republic of Macedonia is a signer of all relevant, mentioned, conventions from the Council of Europe and the United Nations. Having in mind that the Convention has just been put into power in RM, it remains to be seen whether the conventions statements will be enforced in real life situations, and whether the ratification will serve as a beacon to new changes towards improving the legislative.

Republic of Macedonia is working hard and makes great efforts to increase the effectiveness of the criminal law system, as well. When it comes to the protection of children and their rights, as already stated, RM has ratified nearly every international document and convention, and in accordance to these ratifications, a number of changes and additions to the criminal law system have been made. As a result, what it is noticeable is the increase of the sentences for crimes against sexual freedom and gender moral. The highest sentence is life imprisonment.

However, insufficient precision and clarity of some of criminal legal norms is where the criminal law system is lacking. As an example, in the case of rape/gender assault of a minor over the age of 14, the Criminal Code imposes the criminal act "gender assault against a minor who is not the age of 14". By this definition, the already mentioned situation cannot be applied. That is why under the court practices, the case will be filed under the general institute rape, that is, the offender will be charged for the criminal conduct "Rape" where it is not specified that the victim is a minor. Analogue to this the sentence is not more severe. It is the same regardless whether the victim is an adult or a minor.

When it comes to additional measures, Republic of Macedonia implements those via various legislative acts that do not have the force of law, like national strategies, action plans and rules of conduct. In order to improve child protection, the government conducts various projects like the opening of electronic registers and training of staff that work with the children that are victims of violence.

All that is left is to further improve the application of the formal legal acts. Without their full implementation, there won't be significant legal protection of children and their rights.

In the end, there are strong efforts currently under way in Republic of Macedonia that aims to protect children from sexual harassment not only via the existing legislative, but by also taking advantage of the NGO sector and their capabilities. They do that by trying to increase the level of awareness by conducting campaigns, programs and brochures and by establishing preventive measures and identification of potential risks. The NGO sector also needs to lobby hard towards implementation of the regulation from this legislative field, which would make for a more effective protection.

Equal Rights

i. Are there discrimination problems regarding sex, race, color, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth, sexual orientation, state of health, disability or other status of men and women? Please quote official reports from National or International Institutions, reports from the main NGOs that are active in the country and/or Journalistic inquiries.

The Discrimination of children in Romania

From the year 2000 Romania has a law <sup>1</sup> that sanctions the discrimination, The National Trustee for the Control of Discrimination functions from 2002 but the discriminating behaviors carry up and continue to be widely spread in the Romanian society the discrimination being such a common phenomenon that it is considered normal by a lot of Romanians. <sup>2</sup>

The analysis, “Perceptions and attitudes concerning the discrimination in Romania” unfolded between 27th of December and 11th of January 2012 by Opinion and Market Studying Center Romania (TNS CSOP Romania) for The national Trustee for the control of discrimination reveals that 49% of the Romanians think that the phenomenon of discrimination is very common in Romania. An even higher percentage of Romanians, 59%, believe that according to the opinions of the respondents they are represented by people of gipsy ethnicity, people with physical or mental disabilities, people infected with HIV/SIDA, homeless people, orphans and people addicted to drugs. Nevertheless, there are cases in which the discrimination is more difficult identified by the respondents. For example, only 27% of the

Romanians do not consider that the refusal of a student to attend the religion class because he belongs to another religious cult represents a case of discrimination.<sup>3</sup>

I. The Discrimination of Children of gypsy ethnicity<sup>4</sup>

The situation in which the gypsy children are today is regarded as a critical one because the majority live in a poor environment, especially the one at home. There are many of them who abandon their studies because their lack of money. However, there are some that decide to struggle and continue but, unfortunately, they are discriminated. It all begins with their placement in the back of the classroom, and it continues with verbal abuse from the colleagues and even from their teachers.

There have been several questionnaires applied to teachers, and the next lines were ascertained:

- The majority of the teachers believe and know that discrimination means violating a person's rights, but also, isolating them from the rest;
- Many of them confessed that they do not have acquaintances of gypsy ethnicity, and 39% who answered affirmatively say that their relationship with the target group is an open and relaxed one;
- After analyzing the answers, it seems that the main reasons for not going to school are their families and traditions;
- The majority of the teachers believe that the gypsy children are safe at school and are by no means discriminated in what concerns their grades;
- Many of the teachers declared that the only institutions that discriminate and also abuse the gypsy people are the police and the hospital; in their opinion the school and the city hall are the only institutions where the gypsy people are protected and treated equally;

- The majority of the teachers believe that it would be better for their safety to not be around gypsy people anymore.

After applying questionnaires to students of gypsy ethnicity, the next lines were ascertained:

- The majority of the students of gypsy ethnicity do not feel discriminated;
- There have been also affirmative answers and those students declare that the members from their family helped them to overcome the situation;
- Many of the students have a good relationship with their family which encourages them to continue with their studies, while they do not consider the ethnicity as being a problem;
- The relationship with their teachers and colleagues is good;
- The students do not feel discriminated in what concerns their grades;
- Many of them believe that they are not discriminated in the public health service, but they are discriminated in school or in the local communities;
- The majority of them answered affirmatively when asked whether they want to continue with their studies.

After applying questionnaires to students of Romanian ethnicity, the next lines were ascertained:

- 44% of the students answered that they have acquaintances of gypsy ethnicity and, 56% say that they have no knowledge about the above mentioned ethnicity;
- When asked about the main reason that keep the gypsy children from continuing with their studies, the Romanian children believe that the community is guilty for this situation in a 46% proportion;
- Moreover, the students believe that the discrimination level in school is of 39%;
- When asked if they would feel safer in Romania if the gypsy students were missing, 25% answered yes and the same percentage answered maybe."

According to the information provided by the organization “Save the Children”<sup>5</sup> (“Salvati Copiii Romania” is a nongovernmental organization, public and non-profit, actively militating for children’s rights and child protection in Romania since 1990), the next were ascertained:

“The children of gypsy ethnicity constitute a different risk category. Their nourishment is unbalanced, inadequate because of their low quality of life. Consequently, a large number of gypsy children are undernourished, anemic, or suffer from dystrophy. These diseases have a negative impact on their development as young students as their capacity of learning is seriously affected.

In what concerns their income, many families do not have members with a serious job, this leading to their starvation sometimes. Of course, in the majority of cases they cannot afford to pay for clothes, books, medicines, transport or any other things needed for the young students.”

I think one example is enough, “there was this family with two children that shared the same pair of shoes: the first one came in the morning and at noon he would go home and give the shoes to the other one in order to be able to come to school in the afternoon.” (reported by a teacher from Balta Arsa, Botosani, Romania)

A number of 145 questionnaires were applied to the same number of gypsy children, and the following conclusions were obtained:

- In what concerns their possibility of solving their homework, the majority of the children do not have the necessary conditions for learning. 105 children declared that they share a room with brothers, sisters, grandparents, or parents and 17 of them live in the same room with the rest of their family. Consequently, they solve their homework while sitting on the floor, or on a chair;
- The majority of them believe that they suffer from hunger at all times, although only 15 of them admit it, their nourishment is insufficient and undiversified;
- 79 of them admit they argued with other children because they were verbally abused and sometimes even physically and, 14 of them have been accused of robbery at school, only 4 admitting the accusation. However, only some of them admit that they have been called gypsies, or that they are accused only based on their ethnicity.

II. The Discrimination of physically or mentally disabled children

In March 2012, a number of 71.410 children with disabilities (medium, accentuated or severe) were registered in the records from the Complex Evaluation Services of General Office of Social Assistance and Child Care (DGASPC).<sup>6</sup> The following press sources have been analysed:

- According to the information received from the Organization “Save the Children”:

“The evaluation of the children with disabilities from an early age represents a major problem. The small numbers of programmes and centers needed for an early intervention, the lack of human and material resources affects the chances of healing or at least helping these children. In order to be able to offer help to the children with disabilities it is absolutely necessary to act from an early age; once it is too late the whole process might not conclude with positive results.”<sup>7</sup>

“Although an improvement has been made concerning the life from the specialized institutions, there is still a lack of well-prepared personnel. This is the main reason why the educational process ends up with poor results, and the children are not prepared for an independent life. There are very few institutions where one can find speech therapists, psychologists or any other specialists in rehabilitation. Due to these conditions the majority of the disabled children will remain their whole life in public institutions, without the possibility of living a normal life.

The children that live in institutions are rarely seen in the public space because the rest of the community is rather reticent in what concerns their integration. In these conditions the children with disabilities will never be able to participate to public life. There are also children, not only adults that share a negative opinion about the ones with disabilities. According to a research done by Save the Children Romania, only 37% of the children would accept a disabled colleague in their classroom.”<sup>8</sup>

“Autism now affects a child out of 110. However, the Romanian society does not seem prepared to fight in order to prevent or treat this disorder. Discrimination, the lack of tolerance, rejection, denial of healing chances are only some of the negative reactions that people have when they are asked about autism. The children that suffer from autism are usually stigmatized and rejected from kindergartens or schools, in this way being deprived of the most essential form of help.”<sup>9</sup>

- Online press article from deBANAT.ro, August 2012

“The children with disabilities have no right to play in the Children’s Park. This interdiction is well written in the instructions regarding the usage of the equipment from the park, which was recently rehabilitated for 2 million lei. However, this is not a new rule; it appears in many playgrounds since the last administration. The former administration and the present one will be reclaimed at the Council for Eliminating Discrimination because the parents of disabled children consider this rule as being one of the most outrageous forms of discrimination.”<sup>10</sup>

- Online press article from Vip.net, August 2012

„Being able to have access to the educational system is one of the most violated rights of the children that suffer from the Down syndrome. Because of the enormous psychological pressure that is being placed on the parents, due to the rejection they receive from every school and kindergarten, they prefer to keep their children home or to take them to special kindergartens, which are extremely rare.

If one goes to apply for a place in a classroom for his/ hers child, if he suffers from the Down syndrome, he will be immediately rejected. The usual reason for this rejection is the fact that the child will not be able to keep up with the rest of the class, even if he talks and he is able to learn how to read or write. Another reason that is used as an excuse is the reticent attitude of the other parents, or the lack of places in the classroom.”<sup>11</sup>

“A 7 years old boy and his mother from Hunedoara are being placed under terrible pressure in order to withdraw the boy from the school where he learns in the 1st grade, only because he suffers from the Down syndrome. The teachers and the principals are using every method possible in order to intimidate the mother and to force her to take her boy home. They usually send the boy home before the classes are over, they convince the other parents to reject him, and they use threats and do not integrate him in the daily activities in the classroom. More than this, the boy is used as a negative example no matter what he does.”<sup>12</sup>

III. The discrimination of children infected with the HIV virus

- Data collected according to information provided by the CIAO organization:

The Italian Committee of Associations and NGOs in Romania (CIAO) is an informal federation of associations and non-profit foundations. The committee has in its intern subordination a number of Italian-based associations and foundations which operate in Romania's social field. This committee has today a number of 18 members.

More than 7.200 children and young persons with ages between 15 and 19 are living with HIV. Less than 60% of the Romanian children with HIV are included in any educational system, despite of the fact that there are legal stipulations that ensure free and compulsory education until the 10th grade or until the age of 18. Those children that go to school are likely to suffer from isolation, abuse or rejection if the rest of their colleagues find out that they are infected with HIV.

The non-governmental organizations and the children that participated in this study have described many incidents of harassment from their classmates, threats from their parents and abuses from their teachers. In some cases the harassment was dangerous for the children's health, especially in cases when a teacher forced a student to spend hours outside during winter, or when a student fainted and no one helped him for a half an hour. Those who manage to finish the 8th grade are then exposed to a new set of difficulties when they sign up for professional schools that deal with cosmetics, tourism or babysitting because these are all domains in which the law asks for HIV tests.

In Romania there are very few programs that could offer help for their mental health. The psychiatry hospitals sometimes refuse to treat children or young people with HIV, even if they suffer from severe symptoms. More than this, the life conditions in these hospitals are very low and the patients' health would be in a greater risk.

In what concerns discrimination due to the HIV infection: 52.2% of the persons consider that they have been discriminated, 28, 7% believe that they have not been discriminated and 19.1% do not know if they found themselves in such a situation.

According to the studies, 7.5% of the persons declared that their confidentiality was infringed by their teachers, 7.5% by their neighbors, 5% by their relatives and 20% by different categories.<sup>13</sup>

- Project April – May 2011 “AIDS –What do we know and how do we use what we know?”

The representatives of the Local Public Health institution from the city of Iasi declare that there are 216 persons infested with the HIV virus, and 85 of them are children until the age of 15. A survey applied on 1000 students from Iasi shows that half of them would not mind if one of their classmates was infected with HIV. However, 60% of the students declare that they would not accept to sit next to an infected person.

54% of the students infected with HIV/AIDS believe that they were not discriminated. However, 84% of them say that they did not form a complaint when they were discriminated. This indicates that these students really believe that it is normal to be treated differently from those not infected with HIV.

40% of the students, who admit that they were discriminated, declare that the discrimination took place in a medical institution. 56% of the students declare that they have no knowledge

IV. The discrimination of homeless children

- According to a press article from Russia Today, September 2009<sup>15</sup>

The journalists admit that the number of homeless children has been decreasing due to the work of the charity organizations. However, the number of these children is still very large. Only in Bucharest, over 1000 children live on the streets.

In the following lines, a concrete situation of discrimination has been briefly analyzed:

Sandu is 14 years old and he is one of those children. He lives in a canal in Bucharest. “I lived here for 8 years. My father died and my mother remarried. I sleep here and during the day I wash cars in order to gain around 10 Euros.” Sandu does not make any plans for his future because he knows it is useless. “My sister died here recently, from an infection or something like that. Children are born and die in here. We are all going to be on the streets sometime. Does anyone care?” said Sandu.

The foreigners who founded foster care centers are complaining because of the indifference from the authorities. “There are no social care services, not even a system that could help these people with houses or financial support. The procedures are excessively bureaucratic and difficult to conclude” declares Ian Tilling, representative of a foster care centre.

The children that live on the streets, also known as homeless children, are deprived of their rights, and unfortunately also of their innocence. Many of them have health problems, including skin diseases, burns, or tuberculosis and hepatitis; not to mention the fact that all of them are malnourished. If this is not enough, a part of them are exposed to sexual abuse, usually starting with their own family and then on the streets. In addition, they suffer from physical abuse; 50% of the children that live on the streets of Bucharest admit that they have been injured by others at least once. Many of these abandoned children begin to use drugs, solvents or even glue and paint.<sup>16</sup>

In 2012 „the installment of children that give up school is of 87%, while 25% of the children over 10 years old are illiterate because they never attended any educational institution.”<sup>17</sup>

V. The discrimination of orphan children

Romanian mothers are on the first place in Europe for easily abandoning their children. At every six hours a new born baby is left in a Romanian hospital. Some of them manage to grow up and have a good life, but many of them do not. After they reach 18 years they have to leave the foster care centre and usually end up on the streets. Because they were not prepared to survive in a society, they cannot find a job and usually sleep in night shelters.<sup>18</sup>

In order to reveal the core of the problem, the following campaigns and press sources have been cited:

- Anti-discrimination campaign for the children who live in foster care centers, 2011:

“Today is the beginning of a new week. With tears in my eyes, I wake up and go to school hoping that today will be a better day. I am very nervous because my classmates are always bullying me. They make jokes but the school teacher always defends me and punishes them. She is the one to whom I go when I need some advice. During the breaks they all call me “the orphan” so this is why I don’t want to play or talk to anyone. The bigger colleagues make fun of my clothes but they don’t know that these are the ones I receive from the centre. I finished my classes and I’m heading downtown. I see many children here, but I feel so alone. Oh, how I miss a family!”

“The national statistics show that many of the cases involving child abuse do not receive a court sentence. Only 10% of the abuses are actually reported. The victims are usually very scared, sometimes they are manipulated, blackmailed, especially the girls who feel embarrassed and ashamed. The children that live in foster care centers are seen as stigmatized and they wear that sign all their life. Many of them fear the day when they will be 18 years old because they will have to leave the centre and to face the hard reality where no one will offer them a job, thus being forced to become homeless”<sup>19</sup> (excerpt from a child’s diary).

Beginning with 1999, Charles Nelson and his co-workers kept track of 136 children and their behavior, after they were abandoned from birth and raised in a foster care centre from Bucharest. The name of the institution is not mentioned, but the next excerpt is a part of the description, published by Science News:

Press article – Romania TV, March 2012

According to the statistics the abandoning phenomenon is growing every year. For example, in 2011 the number of abandoned children grew with 180 since 2010. Many of the mothers choose to leave the baby where they gave birth to it. In 2012, 742 new born babies were left in the hospital, and in 2012 their number grew to 942. 445 of them were taken back from their parents.<sup>21</sup>

- According to Save the Children:

Migration had a very important impact. If it were to follow the official statistics from The National Authority for the Family Protection and the Children’s Rights (ANPFDC, in Romanian), at the end of 2008, 92.328 children were left at home, while their parents worked in another country. 53.125 of them had only one parent gone and 39.203 had both parents overseas. (The number includes also those 10.408 children from single-parent families who were left alone). According to these dates (valid for September 2009), 3398 children with parents who left abroad, ended up in the child protection service (670 living in residential centers and 544 in foster care).<sup>22</sup>

Several campaigns and press releases were found as relevant to this issue:

- Say No to Drugs Campaign, 2009

The Romanian adolescents are more and more attracted into the world of drugs. It is a statement made by the doctors who cure heroin or cocaine addicts. Half of those who end up here have ages between 14 and 15 and are brought in by their parents.<sup>23</sup>

- Online press article, North West Gazette

The homeless children are usually drug addicts. In 2011, the Star Association monitored 120 children and adolescents, out of which 62% are drug addicts – especially alcohol and solvents, and their main job is prostitution (72%) or begging (8%).<sup>24</sup>

- Online press article, Obiectiv de Vaslui, May 2010

The number of children that use solvents as drugs is rapidly increasing. In Barlad, the central areas are full of adolescents that use this kind of drug in order to forget about food, cold, or home abuse. Their scattered and tormented life can be seen on their face, and their foggy eyes hide sad stories. The majority of them have parents, but their families are either separated or starving. These children are usually abused by their fathers and exploited by their mothers. In many cases they are not violent; they only hide their identity in order to beg for some money.

“If you buy me a pretzel I’ll tell you my name” – this is what a child told us while he was keeping a bag of solvent in his hand. I promised the pretzel if he would throw away that drug. It took a few minutes until I could see his green eyes, the eyes of a child that was ashamed of himself. “My name is Bogdan and I’m 17 years old” he told us, without any persuasion. His height betrayed his age, although his face features looked as if he had over 12. When I asked him why he takes drugs, he shook his shoulders and he could not give us an explanation. However, he firmly said that one day he will quit them. He continued by

ii. What is the definition given to the term “family” in your national legislation or Constitution? What is the status of marriage? What is the average marital age of the population? Please quote official reports/ statistics from National or International Institutions or official statistics from Private Institutions or NGOs.

At present, there is no Romanian legal instrument to comprise a somewhat official definition of the term “family”. However, there are a series of fundamental principals prevalent in this matter, from which the premises of such a definition could be inferred. These instruments are the Romanian Constitution<sup>27</sup> and the Romanian Civil Code.

The Romanian Constitution, within a Chapter devoted to the fundamental rights of the person, pledges “to respect and protect the intimate life, the family and the private life”.

In 1954, the Family Code came into force, and it comprised a body of norms regulating the family law matter. This nowadays altered with the 2011 adoption of the New Civil Code<sup>28</sup>, which presently comprises this matter and, as a consequence, abrogated the Family Code.

Comparatively, the two instruments differ rather insignificantly at the level of general principles.

Thus, art. 258 alin. 1 of the New Civil Code states that “Family is based on freely consented marriage between spouses, on their equality, and also on their right and duty to ensure the upbringing and education of their children”, while art. 258 alin. 4 clarifies beyond any doubt that, by the term of spouses, we understand the man and the woman united through marriage.

Therefore, family, in view of the Romanian law, means a both natural and legal bond uniting the legally married male and female, along with their children, all of which have mutual and interdependent rights and obligations in consideration of this de facto and de jure reality, which is also awarded the protection of the State.

On the other hand, by means of a per a contrario interpretation, this definition some limitations also triggers to any idea of family:

First and foremost, no family can be created in the sense of Romanian law without lawful marriage between the two spouses. The marital status is a key feature of a person’s civil status, which can only be acquired at the end of a procedure expressly prescribed by the law. Per a contrario, no family in the legal sense can come into question when a man and a woman cohabit and act as a family, without being married. No matter how long they have dwelled in this manner, civil status cannot be achieved by means of acquisitive prescription.

Secondly, the two spouses are necessarily a man and a woman, therefore persons of opposite sex. In other words, a homosexual union is incompatible with the idea of family upheld by the Romanian law, which is also the most frequent position in other law systems as well. <sup>30</sup>

Thirdly, a union between man and woman also means a union between only one man and only one woman. The prohibition of bigamy is, again, a traditional view common the cvasi-totality developed States of the world.<sup>31</sup>

STASKY P., Family Law: The essentials, Second Edition, Thomson Press, 2003, p.3.

With a view to compensate the void of an official definition, multiple attempts at defining the concept can now be attributed to doctrine. These are two examples:

“Family is a complex social phenomenon, which most probably emerged as an optimum survival and development strategy amongst human groups; through ubiquity and respectability, it achieved the status of linking point between the individual and the society.”<sup>32</sup>

“Family is a biological reality – through the union realized between man and woman, and also through procreation; also, it is a social reality, because it represents the background of the life community and sum of interests of the members comprising it, united through the moral essence of marriage and through descendance from a unique model of human solidarity; it is also a juridical reality, being legally protected.”<sup>33</sup>

To draw a conclusion from the above-mentioned, there is an inextricable link between the two notions: marriage and family. That is, marriage is a prerequisite, a sine qua non condition towards the formation of a family in the sense of the Romanian law. This is the family duly benefitting from the utmost protection of the State, as a fundamental Constitutional provision upholds.

It shall be noted that a child benefits the same protection and rights whether he or she was born within a married couple or not. The old traditional point-of-view divided into, on one hand, a child from a legal marriage, and on the other hand, a child from outside a marriage, was abolished. Both children will benefit the same protection and rights, and in both cases the parental obligations are the same. Nevertheless, the notion of family is traditionally regarded to be forged by the marital status.

Presently, the minimum age for marriage in Romania is 18 years for both men and women. Though, this general rule is susceptible of an exception: in some extraordinary cases (e.g.: pregnancy) the two may be allowed to marry provided they are already at least 16 years of age. This allowance is subject to prior procurement of a series of authorizations, especially a medical authorization, and the consent of their parents or, if applicable, their legal representatives (tutors).<sup>34</sup>

This is the product of a legislative intervention dating back from 2007.<sup>35</sup> Prior to that moment, there was the same marital age, but with a slight supplement: the woman aged at least 16 could marry provided she had beforehand obtained a dispensation from her parents, while the woman aged 15 could marry with a dispensation from Autoritatea Tutelară (The Tutelary Authority – an institution subordinated to the local public authorities, which has a sum of attributions regarding the protection of the minor.<sup>36</sup>

However, while this is the minimum age at which marriage is legally allowed, the things differ significantly when it comes to the present-day average marital age in Romania. A recent survey<sup>37</sup> carried out by the National Institute of Statistics shows that, in the interim 2008-2009, the average marital age has been 26,6 for women in the urban environment, compared to 24,5 in the rural environment; when it comes to men, the average age was 29,3, respectively 28,7. A major difference can be undoubtedly observed since three decades ago. In 1985, the average marital age was 22 for women and 25, 7 for men.<sup>38</sup>

This decreasing trend does not maintain though when it comes to the rate of marriages per year. Fortunately enough, this rate has seen an unexpected revival since 2001, when it achieved its historical minimum of 5, 85% (per 1000 inhabitants). In 2007, it registered a spectacular growth of 8,78% (the same approximate value from 1990), by these means placing Romania in the first position of the European Community countries. Starting from the following year, the numbers started to diminish slightly once again.<sup>39</sup>

In other words, the data provided by the above-mentioned surveys is unfortunate, yet is in line with present-day realities in Europe and in the developing world as a whole.

The status of children in Romania's cultural and historical background has known a rich and convoluted evolution. A century ago, the traditional Romanian family was represented by the rural family with plenty of children, more or less of all ages. Children were envisaged somewhat as a means of production, because they played a great contribution to agricultural chores starting from an early age. In one way, children were regarded as a wealth of one's homestead, because they basically entailed free extra labour force. On the other hand, the contrary way of seeing things was to perceive families with many children as rather poor and helpless, because of the hardship of giving each of them a decent dowry, and thus the correlating duty of arranging a good marriage for each.

The role of children in household chores was greater than that of performing supporting tasks, they did not only give a helping hand to their parents, they had duties and responsibilities of their own; these duties and responsibilities were tailored for each category of age – or so were they supposed, because in present day, we regard the vast majority of them as overwhelming for a child. Children less than 5 years of age were only given some rather supporting chores around the household, and usually not compelled to leave the household area without their parent, but once they have turned 5 or 6, they were already entrusted a herd of small animals, to get them to pasture in the nearby; by the time they were about 7, they were already given a flock of goats, sheep or even cows to get them to pasture in the meadows at the outskirts of the village – this was already a serious chore, because it entailed a large distance to be walked in bare foot, a great responsibility over the whole flock, and often it meant staying over the night alone in the meadows with the animals. This practice that would seem rather abominable in present-day society was a perfectly natural one in the 20-30's. As the children advanced in age, their role in the core agricultural chores grew significantly. By the time they were 10, they were already entrusted important agricultural tasks, such as harvesting, cropping, hay storage and even planting. At approximately 15 years of age – the girls, the boys a year or two later – they already started leaving the “family nest” for marriage. Despite their great labour-related responsibilities, their voice did not carry any weight when it came to family decision-making. Children and adults were no equals, children were not allowed to question the decisions of the pater familias, and were not allowed to debate upon the tasks they were entrusted with <sup>40</sup>. Practically, any option other than to obey was non-existent.

Along with the process of industrialization and urbanisation, this attitude slightly altered. The children were allowed to go to school, but not without difficulty: they were still a great deal exploited in production. In other words, they could only go to school if they were able to do both of them – mingle school and work, and basically it was twice as hard for them as for adults.

Along with the modernisation of society, the status of the child has known an indubitable evolution. A lot of instruments for the protection of the rights of the child emerged; the most important being the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989) <sup>41</sup>, and Romania had to stay in line with the shifting perspectives. The school became compulsory, minor labour was prohibited and any form of violence against the children – even as a means of correction – was prohibited and accordingly punished by the Criminal Code. The present-day tendency is for children to be encouraged to take their own decisions regarding their education and their future profession, and to be treated as equals by their parents and teachers. Voices of dissent also exist – the representatives of the older generation raise the issue that this sort of privileged treatment encourages children to disrespect their siblings and professors, to have a spoiled attitude and to the inevitable tendency to take everything for granted. It is a universally acknowledged fact that, in line with the tendencies in the rest or the European Community, the number of children per family has sharply diminished. But the good part is the tendency to greater value the new-born and better provide for its future. Having fewer children, or even a single child, the parent's attention is better employed the attention towards the needs, emotions and future development of the child. Enlarging one's family for the sake of obtaining free labour force is an obsolete, unacceptable view in the contemporary society.

The general approach to children rights issues in Romania has known a significant alteration for the better in the last decades. Historically speaking, this shift in the general attitude has been triggered firstly, because of the breakdown of a long-standing and dire period of communism, in which concerns such as child protection would have appeared as ridiculous at most, and secondly, because of the adoption of legal instruments of protection, in line with those promoted by the developed countries.

The first step was made precisely in 1990, when Romania signed the International Convention on Children's Rights, and in the following years, additional supporting social policy and child welfare provisions have emerged. A very important step forward was represented by the attention devoted to children with disabilities: new provisions regarding education and social services catered for their needs have thus been established. Another very important legislative intervention was to prolong the maternity leave (from a ridiculously short interim of four months to the period of two years still applicable in present day).<sup>42</sup>

In addition, more NGOs have emerged and devoted their attention to providing effective programmes, with special focus to foster children, and, fortunately, the great majority of them had great success – foster families were trained, State foster homes were modernised, and this way child welfare systems have gradually raised to the level prescribed by the international instruments in the area <sup>43</sup> : The UN Convention on Children's rights, approved by the Romanian Parliament in 1991 (Law 26/1991) <sup>44</sup>; The Hague Convention on Child Kidnapping (Law 100/1992) <sup>45</sup>; The European Convention on the Legal Status of Children Born outside of a Marriage (Law 101/1992); The European Convention on Adoptions (Law

However, worryingly enough, during the next 8 years since the overthrow of the communist regime, the children have represented the mostly affected by poverty social category (even more than elderly). A Report carried out by the Institute for Quality of Life in 1997, entitled „For a society centred on the child”, showed that an astonishing number of 50% of the total number of children live in the poorest families of the country, which represent 30% of the total number of families. At the same time, 30% of the wealthiest families have only 15% of the total number of children. Abortion in 1990, only one year after the Communism, Romania with the scope of reducing the number of abandoned children. However, even though the number of new-born children has diminished by 38% between 1996 and 1989, the number of abandoned children increased.<sup>48</sup>

Despite the advancements made in the matter of institutionalised children and the improvement of Foster Homes legislation, the big problem of the following years consisted in the impressive number of children older than 18, previously reared in children’s homes, to whom no housing and employment arrangements were made. These so-called “graduates of Foster Homes”, who were compelled to leave Foster Homes upon turning 18, had no real future ahead of them and the consequences did not fail to emerge: unwanted pregnancies out of which premature and underweight children were born, due to the malnutrition and dire life condition of their mothers; moreover, the emotional neglect and the many abuses still going on in residential care, lead these children to deviant behaviour and petty crimes.

In the next years’ legislation, a series of measures have been set forward with an aim to address in some way or another these problems: the coordination of the Government’s strategy for implementing all matters that concern the protection of children’s rights; evaluation and monitoring of the activities concerning children’s rights; identification and protection of children in difficult situations (abused or neglected children); the general underlying principle of the best interest of the child; development of adequate support services for natural families (in order to prevent child abandonment, to train foster families and to evaluate the needs of children); functional financial support mechanisms; cooperation with NGOs, provision and periodic evaluation of children's rights officers.

In other words, these measures have made a feasible reality out of the principle of the best interest of the child. However, these are big words and in order to see the change in the society time is needed and the difficulty of this task should never be undermined.

However, there is still a very long way ahead, because there is still a great deal of worrying facts that have caught the eye of the media in the recent years. An iconic case of the 90's was that of a five year old girl abused by her father <sup>49</sup>. Her grandma noticed the atrocity and a psychologist examined the girl immediately (in November 1996); she notified the local Tutelary Authority and the Police for child physical abuse and sexual molestation. Her mother, an emotionally imbalanced person, refused to understand the necessity of investigation, and the local authorities did not take action without the formal complaint of the mother, despite the fact that legally, anyone could make a complaint and the Police had the obligation to look into it. In March, her mother finally made the complaint that the girl had been raped by her father, which was later corroborated through medical investigation. A trial began, but the father was never compelled to live the homestead. A social worker from the service of the Direction of Children's Rights took over the case, but the girl and her younger sister were left with their abusive parent. In June, the girl was once again raped. Then, her mother and the social worker decided to act and because no relatives or foster families were found, the girls were taken in the Foster Home. In this period, the mother benefited from psychological counselling. While in the children's home, the father was allowed to visit his two daughters, and took advantage of the opportunity to repeatedly tell his daughter that she was the only one responsible for him being investigated into by the police. A divorce was pronounced between the parents and the mother was awarded custody. The abusive father was legally expelled from home and then shortly after sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

Since that had been his first offence, he was set free on parole and returned home with his former wife and two daughters. Shortly after, the younger child presented severe signs of post-traumatic stress disorder and the psychologist presumed that she had also been abused by her father. This case underlined the fact that the legislation protecting children from abuse still has significant loopholes and the consequences can be dramatic.

More than a decade after this case, things did not greatly improve – the most ubiquitous cases of child abuse still occur within the homestead. One of the prevalent concerns is that of the child mothers, who become pregnant at astonishingly young ages (10, 11 years) out of incestuous non-consented sexual relations. Children thus born are prone to abandonment, maltreatment, and often genetic disease.

The most recent case that has drawn a great deal of attention from the media these days was that of a thirteen year old girl infested with HIV, which was forced to prostitute in a seaside resort by a human trafficking band. She was caught by the police the same day and confessed to have had intercourse with two men who paid her for her services, of course without knowledge of her being infected with HIV <sup>50</sup>. The problematic issue is that the Police had to find a way to contact those two men and inform them about the danger they have exposed themselves to, in order to avoid the possibility of them further expanding the virus. Still, one of the great issues in such a situation is finding a fine-tuned balance between the right of one's person to remain unknown in such cases and the right of the authorities to provide public information (photos for example) about the cases in order to safeguard public sanity and the public interest.

To draw a conclusion, the two decades after the 89' Revolution have represented a period of powerful reform endeavours in the matter of social policy and child welfare, but there is still room for improvement and stringent problems need to be addressed; but the better way to find a solution is by also resorting to the aid of international and European instruments in this field.

iv. What is the relevant legislation regarding the implementation of international treaties? What is the relationship between State law and international treaties (dualistic or monalistic approach)? What is the date of ratification of United Nations Convention on Rights of the Child? Did the State make any reservations to the Convention? What is the general status of implementation?

The relevant legislation regarding the implementation of international treaties is the Romanian Constitution and according to article 11 from it, the treaties ratified by the Parliament are part of the national law. That means that Romania has opted for the dualistic approach. Paragraph 3 from article 11 states that if such a treaty is in contrary with the constitutional text his ratification will be made after the review of the Constitution, consequence of the supremacy of the Constitution principle." Our state, by the competent public authorities, is bound to meet in good faith its obligations under these treaties, which through ratification by the Parliament, are part of the national law".<sup>51</sup>

Romania has ratified the United Nations Convention on Rights of the Child by Law 18 from 27th September 1990 <sup>52</sup>. The state did not make any reservations to the Convention.

"In 1993, the Romanian Government created an inter-ministerial body, The National Committee for Child Protection (CNPC), charged with responsibility of co-ordinating activities in the interest of children and designing the Government strategy for child welfare, in particular the National Plan of Action. The Committee was also one of the key members of a multi-ministerial team responsible for monitoring of the implementation of the UN Convention of the Rights of the Child in Romania." <sup>53</sup> Also the Ministry of Family, Labour and Social protection runs a project, "Strengthening the capacity of the Ministry of Family, Labour and Social Protection to coordinate the implementation of the UN Convention for the rights of the child in Romania" with the purpose of implementing the Convention.<sup>54</sup>

"In June 2004, the Parliament has adopted the legislative package on the protection of children's rights based on the principles of the European Convention on Human Rights and the UN Convention on children's rights, package which came into force on 1st January 2005 and which includes: Law 272 / 2004 regarding the protection and promotion of children's rights, Law 273 / 2004 regarding the legal status of adoption, Law 274 / 2004 regarding the establishment, organization and functioning of the Romanian Office for Adoptions and Law 275 / 2004 regarding the establishment of the National Authority for Children's Rights Protection." <sup>55</sup>

1.5. European Obligations

v. If the State is a EU Member, what is the general implementation process of the Directive 2011/92/EU of the European Parliament and the European Council of 13 December 2011? Please cite the internal legal instruments of the implementation.

As stated in the Treaty establishing the European Community, “a directive shall be binding, as to the result to be achieved, upon each Member State to which it is addressed, but shall leave to the national authorities the choice of form and methods”.<sup>56</sup> A directive is usually implemented through a law ratified by the Parliament or through other legal norms that under Romanian law have the same judicial power as a law<sup>57</sup>.

At the present time, according to the Ministry of Justice, which coordinates the implementation of the above-mentioned Directive, “part of it is transposed into present national legislation. There are still things that remain to be done, such as identifying the measures that impose the compliance with the rest of the aspects which have not been yet transposed”.<sup>58</sup> The deadline for the implementation of the Directive is 18th December 2013.

Romania became part of Lanzarote Convention on the 25th October 2007, signed at the same date. However, it was enforced by its publishing in the OJR on the 14th of December 2010. Romania made no reservation to the Convention.

v. What is the rank of the Lanzarote Convention under your national legal order? Is there a legislation regarding its implementation? If so, indicate the source and if available, an English translation.

Romania has a dualistic approach towards the international law and thus, any treaty or convention must be filtered and implemented by the Parliament through a law <sup>60</sup>. The Lanzarote Convention was adopted via a “ordinary law”, No. 252, from 14th December 2010 <sup>61</sup>, and thus, it is of second rank, after the constitutional laws. As implementation, Romania did it without any draft legislation or legislation regarding implementation. It is ratified without any reservation and it became an internal part of Romania’s legislation.

vi. Does the legislation address all the issues within the Lanzarote Convention?

To answer this question, the issues posed by the Lanzarote Convention must be first clarified, followed by a brief account of national implementation laws in order to tackle the problem.

The Convention deals with the sexual abuse of children and sexual exploitation of children, both of them being particularly serious forms of crime. Childhood sexual abuse is a traumatic event which can change a person forever, disrupting the physical, emotional, spiritual, intellectual and sexual development, influencing skills of cooperation and social interest, and its persistence undermines the core values of modern society and confidence in state institutions. The children often become victims of sexual abuse, due to their vulnerability, the result of various factors. Insufficient response of the mechanism for implementing the law contributes to the spread of these phenomena, and difficulties are exacerbated because of certain types of crimes that transcend national boundaries. Developments in information technology have also led to aggravation of these problems, facilitating production and distribution of child sexual abuse images and also offering offenders anonymity and spreading responsibility across jurisdictions.

Data from the Ministry of Labor, Family and Social Protection shows that in the first three months of 2011, almost 2,900 children were abused, neglected or exploited, 700 of them being subjected to physical, emotional and even sexual abuses. Physically abused children come from rural areas whereas emotional abused children live in cities. The same statistics also show that children aged between 10 and 13 years are most often abused and most abuses occur in the family. Psychologists say that most abused children at an early age, become abusers themselves in adulthood.<sup>62</sup>

That being the case, some changes and additions to the national legislation are imperative, in fields such as education, health, social protection and forces of order fields, also in criminal law and criminal procedure, as well as special legislation which incriminates facts that enter into the scope of the Convention such as: legislation on preventing and combating human trafficking, legislation on combating cyber-crime, legislation on preventing and fighting pornography.

In terms of international cooperation, Romania is to designate certain institutions to discharge certain obligations established under the Convention. In this matter, the following should be underlined:

-in accordance with art. 10 (2)(a) of the Lanzarote Convention, the designation of an independent national or local institution is required. These organisms should promote and fight for the children's rights. Therefore, it was decided that the Ombudsman should be designated as the national institution responsible for implementation of the same article on children's rights activities and the National Authority for Child Protection and Family to be designated as a national institution responsible for the implementation as regards activities designated to promote children's rights.

in accordance with art. 10 (2)(b) of the Lanzarote Convention, the designation of mechanisms for collecting and evaluating data in order to observe the phenomenon of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse on children, while protecting their personal data, is needed . In applying these statutory stipulations the National Authority for Child Protection and Family has been appointed as the institution responsible for data collection at national level for observing and evaluating the phenomenon of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse committed against children, in compliance with personal data protection rules. This authority shall be active until will be set up an independent national institution shall be set up.<sup>63</sup> in accordance with art. 37 (2) of the Lanzarote Convention, the designation of a single national authority for the collection and storage of data regarding the identity and genetic profile of the convicted persons for offenses specified in accordance with the Convention is required. In applying these forecasts the General Police Inspectorate within the Ministry of Administration and Interior has been appointed as responsible.

The Convention focuses on aspects of prevention and protection in the fight against all forms of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse against children and the establishment of certain special monitoring mechanism.

Precautions refer to the encouragement, protection and raising awareness about child rights among people who work regularly with children, among children and among the general public. It institutes the right offered to offenders which could commit an offence under the Convention, to benefit from effective measures so as to prevent the risk of committing other offences. Protection measures on the one hand refers to providing support for victims, their relatives and anyone else who deals with their care, and on the other hand to encourage anyone who knows or has suspicions about sexual exploitation or sexual abuse of a child to report them to the authorities.

Criminal law measures refer to criminalizing as offences the following: sexual abuse, child prostitution, child pornography, participation of children in pornographic performances, corruption and soliciting children for sexual purposes. These are also punishable when committed intentionally, aiding or abetting and attempt. Moreover, in criminal law procedure, rules establishing competence in relation to any delinquency specified in the Convention and rules regarding the investigation, prosecution and procedural law, are to be mentioned.

For implementation of the Convention, certain amendments to legislative acts that regulate the access to practicing professions involving regular contact with children are necessary.

These include amendments to the following internal acts: the law 466/2004<sup>64</sup> on the status of social workers, law 213/2004<sup>65</sup> on the practice of psychology with the right to free practice setting, organization and functioning of psychologists in Romania, law 360/2004<sup>66</sup> on the status of police, law 128/1997<sup>67</sup> on the status of teachers-in the sense that the practice of these professions should be prohibited not only the people who are not registered in the database of criminal records but and those who have previously committed a delinquency under the Convention but rehabilitation has occurred under the Criminal Code, law 217/2003<sup>68</sup> for preventing and combating domestic violence, by giving procedural details so as to ease removal of the assumed delinquent of an offence under the Convention (when he is the father of the victim), establishing conditions in which child-victim should be removed from the family environment and conditions under which the abuser should be removed from this environment.

Implementation of Chapter VI " Material Criminal Law" and the Chapter VII " Investigation, Prosecution and Procedural Law " attract some changes to the special legislation (law 678/2001 on preventing and combating human trafficking, law 161/2003<sup>69</sup> on measures to ensure transparency in the exercise of public dignities, public functions and in business, preventing and sanctioning corruption, law 196/2003<sup>70</sup> on preventing and fighting pornography and the criminal code and criminal procedure code). These changes will focus on adapting, according with the stipulations of the Convention, the methods of criminalization of some crimes (prostitution and child pornography) and the criminalization of new offences (use of child prostitution, possession of child pornography, access to child pornography through information and communications technology, crimes related to participation of children in pornographic performances, mooring children for sexual purposes and others.

1 GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE JURISDICTION

i. Please give us a brief history of the respective State and the governmental regime (Federal State/Central government?)

Democracy has been the political regime of Romania since the 1989 Revolution that marked the fall of the Iron Curtain and the end of the totalitarian Communist Regime, that had been established since 1948. Romania became a member of the Council of Europe in 1993 and a member of the European Union in 2007. The current Constitution was adopted by referendum on December 8, 1991 <sup>71</sup> and revised in 2003 <sup>72</sup>, in the context of Romania's integration in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the European Union.

According to the first paragraph of the first Article of the Constitution, Romania is a “sovereign, unitary and indivisible national state”. These characteristics define Romania as a constitutional democracy and represent the fundamentals on which the form of government and the rule of law are built <sup>73</sup>. Consequently, the democracy is based on the principle of constitutional supremacy, meaning that the Constitution is placed at the top of the hierarchy of legal norms, and should be respected by every subsequent legally-binding act. Likewise, the compliance with the whole body of legal norms, including the Constitution, is mandatory <sup>74</sup>.

In addition, Romania pledges to safeguard human dignity, the citizens' rights and freedoms, the free development of human personality, justice and political pluralism <sup>75</sup>, which are considered supreme values, in the spirit of the democratic traditions of the Romanian people and the ideals of the Revolution of December 1989 <sup>76</sup>. The Constitution <sup>77</sup> provides that Romania is the common and indivisible homeland of all its citizens, without any discrimination on account of race, nationality, ethnic origin, language, religion, sex, opinion,

As a further safeguard for constitutional democracy, the Supreme Law expressly enshrines the principle of the separation and balance of the legislative, executive and judicial powers. Apart from the three “classical” powers of the state, there are also public bodies that do not pertain to a certain branch, but ensure the effective collaboration between them: the Romanian Ombudsman, the Constitutional Court or the Court of Audit.

Romania is a Semi-Presidential Republic, run by a Central Government. Its territory is divided into 41 counties which are not autonomous, but run by local councils. The counties are further divided into cities and communes which have a local administration. The counties, cities and communes, have the power to enact legal norms of their own, through their own elected bodies, but are all subject to the obedience of the same laws enacted by the Parliament, legal norms enacted by the Government or, other central bodies, which prevail over the local ones.

So, to conclude, although there is a certain administrative decentralization, Romania remains, as provided by the Constitution, a sovereign, unitary and indivisible national state.

ii. About the general approach of the National legislation to Human Rights, how does the State legislate Human Rights? Is there a “Bill of Rights” within the respective country or are human rights mentioned in the Constitution as fundamental principles? When was this Constitution/Bill of Rights created? Are there any specific provisions regarding Children Rights?

The Constitution of Romania, adopted in 1991 and revised in 2003, safeguards Human Rights by two means: it provides a list of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms and it makes reference to International Treatises on Human Rights.

Firstly, Chapter II of the Constitution, entitled “Fundamental Rights and Freedoms” contains 21 articles safeguarding rights and freedoms that are also “traditionally” part of International Human Rights Documents. Such rights are: Right to life, to physical and mental integrity, Personal and Family Privacy, Secrecy of Correspondence, Freedom of Expression, Right to Information, Right to Education, etc. .

Secondly, Article 20 of the constitution stipulates that:

“(1) Constitutional provisions concerning the citizens' rights and liberties shall be interpreted and enforced in conformity with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with the covenants and other treaties Romania is a party to. (2) Where any inconsistencies exist between the covenants and treaties on the fundamental human rights Romania is a party to, and the national laws, the international regulations shall take precedence, unless the Constitution or national laws comprise more favorable provisions.”

Consequently, the International Treatises regarding Human rights ratified by Romania represent a „block of constitutionality” together with the Romanian Constitution. Fundamental Rights and Freedoms provided by the Constitution are interpreted in conformity with the Human Rights Treatises. Where there are inconsistencies between those and the national law, the most favorable provisions shall take precedence.

It is also worth mentioning that Constitutional Article no. 11 provides rules regarding the relationship between national and international law. Any treaty ratified by the Parliament becomes part of the national law <sup>78</sup>, and, in order for this procedure to take place, the treatise must not contain provisions that are contrary the Romanian Constitution. Otherwise, the Constitution needs to be revised:

“(1) The Romanian State pledges to fulfill as such and in good faith its obligations as deriving from the treaties it is a party to. (2) Treaties ratified by Parliament, according to the law, are part of national law. (3) If a treaty Romania is to become a party to comprise provisions contrary to the Constitution, its ratification shall only take place after the revision of the Constitution.”

Romania is part of a series of International Human Rights Treatises which have become, by ratification, a part of national law. Such treatises include:

- The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union<sup>79</sup>;
- The Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ratified by Romania on June 20, 1994)<sup>80</sup>;
- The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ratified by Romania on October 31, 1974) <sup>81</sup>;

---

- The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ratified by Romania on October 31, 1974) <sup>82</sup>;

The protection of children's rights is directly mentioned in the Constitution in Article 49 entitled "Protection of Children and Young People":

"(1) Children and young people shall enjoy special protection and assistance in the pursuit of their rights. (2) The State shall grant allowances for children and benefits for the care of ill or disabled children. Other forms of social protection for children and young people shall be established by law. (3) The exploitation of minors, their employment in activities that might be harmful to their health, or morals, or might endanger their life and normal development are prohibited. (4) Minors under the age of fifteen may not be employed for any paid labor. (5) The public authorities are bound to contribute to secure the conditions for the free participation of young people in the political, social, economic, cultural and sporting life of the country."

At the same time, there are articles in the Romanian Fundamental Law that indirectly safeguard children's rights. These provisions are part of Chapter II, entitled "Fundamental Rights and Freedoms" and refer to aspect such as: protection of personal and family privacy, freedom of expression, right to education, right to protection of health etc.

In order to apply these principles established in the Constitution, the State has adopted a series of laws, regulating different aspects of children's life. These legally binding documents aim at elaborating on the Constitutional texts and creating legal mechanisms that ensure the effective protection and promotion of children's rights. The most important Romanian Laws that govern children's rights are:

- Law No. 1 / 2011 on National Education <sup>83</sup>;
- Law No. 217 / 2003 on Preventing and Combating Domestic Violence <sup>84</sup>;
- Law No. 273 / 2004 on the Legal Regime of Adoption <sup>85</sup>;
- Law no. 678 / 2001 on Preventing and Combating Human Trafficking <sup>86</sup>;

As to jurisprudence, it is worth mentioning that in the Romanian justice system, court decisions are not viewed as sources of law. They are legally binding only for the parties involved in that particular court suite, and cannot apply to other situations, even if they are similar. Consequently, court decisions issued by judges in a certain case are not legally binding on other judges facing similar cases.

However, there are two exceptions to this rule:

- 1) The decisions of the Constitutional Court of Romania<sup>88</sup> (further referred to as the CCR). According to the law 47 / 1992, the decisions of the Constitutional Court are “generally binding and have effect only for the future.” These decisions target the domestic compliance of the laws with the Constitution.
- 2) The recourses in the interest of the law issued by the High Court of Cassation and Justice<sup>89</sup> (further referred to as the HCCJR). These types of court rulings are as well generally binding, but for the domestic courts. These decisions have the role of uniting a uneven jurisprudence regarding similar cases, which have been previously resolved in different manners, by Romanian courts.

To sum up, there are three main types of legally binding documents that safeguard and promote Human Rights and consequently Children’s Rights: International Treatises on Human Rights, The Romanian Constitution and National Laws. The Treatises signed by the State are ratified by Parliament – if they comply with the Constitution – and become part of domestic legislation. On the other hand, principles stated by the Constitution are further developed any applied by National Laws.

Moreover, both the codes enact that, “the ruling in the case of this type of recourse is legally binding upon every other court of law in Romania.” (Art. 414<sup>5</sup> parag. 4 of the Criminal Procedure Code and art. 330<sup>7</sup> of the Civil Procedure Code).

directly (e.g. direct effect)? Is there a Constitutional Court? Is it possible to apply individually? If not, how can the individuals claim their constitutional rights in case of violation? Is there a system of hierarchy or other jurisdictions to ask before being able to go before Constitutional/Supreme Court? Please, briefly describe the application process.

As described above, International Treatises on Human Rights are ratified by Parliament and thus become part of the national legislation. Consequently any human rights provision, stemming from an international document or national norm can be directly invoked before the domestic courts. As an exception, European Union Regulations have direct effect and confer rights that can be invoked before domestic court, without Parliament ratification.

For the protection of rights established by the national legal framework, the Constitution provides that Justice shall be administered by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, and the other courts of law set up by law<sup>90</sup>. Consequently, the High Court of Cassation and Justice is the sole supreme court of Romania, responsible with the correct and unitary application of the law. Justice is also accomplished through the other lower courts, established by the Law on Judicial Organization<sup>91</sup>: Courts of Appeal, Tribunals, Military Courts and First Instance Courts.

Against the decision of a court, the parties can exercise ways of appeal. The Supreme Law does not enshrine a principle of double jurisdiction. Nevertheless, such a principle is provided by Protocol no. 7 to the European Convention of Human Rights and refers only to criminal cases<sup>92</sup>.

The Romanian legal framework does not provide for a specific judicial body that monitors the implementation of international or national human rights instruments. However, there is a series of public institutions which, given their attributions, safeguard human rights.

The Constitutional Court of Romania is the sole authority of constitutional jurisdiction in Romania, guarantying the supremacy of the Constitution<sup>93</sup>. With relation to human rights provisions, the CCR has a series of powers, enshrined in the art. 146 of the Constitution, such as:

“ a) to adjudicate on the constitutionality of laws, before the promulgation thereof upon notification by the President of Romania, one of the presidents of the two Chambers, the Government, the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the Advocate of the People, a number of at least 50 deputies or at least 25 senators, as well as ex officio, on initiatives to revise the Constitution; b) to adjudicate on the constitutionality of treaties or other international agreements, upon notification by one of the presidents of the two Chambers, a number of at least 50 deputies or at least 25 senators; (...) d) to decide on objections as to the unconstitutionality of laws and ordinances, brought up before courts of law or commercial arbitration; the objection as to the unconstitutionality may also be brought up directly by the Advocate of the People; “

As a result, there are two main forms of constitutional review of national laws:

1. A prior review (before the promulgation of laws) and
2. A subsequent review (after the law's entry into force by means of unconstitutionality objections). When a national law does not comply with the Constitution, an individual can claim his/her constitutional rights using a procedure called “unconstitutionality objection”, if a series of conditions are met.

Firstly, the individual can raise the objection only if the alleged unconstitutional law applies directly to his/her specific situation during a trial before domestic courts. The objection can also be raised ex officio by the courts or by the Ombudsman. However, the CCR is not appealed directly by the individual, but through the decision of the Court where the initial trial is pending. This initial court decides if the objection is admissible and, if so, refers it to the CCR who further issues a decision on the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the legal provisions brought before it. The CCR's decision is generally binding and has effect both upon the initial trial and for the future.

Another public body that safeguards fundamental rights in Romania is the Ombudsman, who is responsible with registering, investigating and addressing complaints filed by individuals against other public institutions <sup>94</sup>. Similarly, the National Council for Combating Discrimination <sup>95</sup> is another independent body that investigates and sanctions acts of discrimination.

iv. Is there a Criminal Supreme Court? Please, briefly describe the criminal procedure.

The Equivalent of a “Supreme Court” in Romania is the HCCJR <sup>96</sup> which is organized in a series of sections, including the Criminal Section. According to Art. 29 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the Criminal Section tries in first instance crimes committed by state officials such as Senators, Deputies, members of Government, etc. <sup>97</sup>, as well as other cases appointed by law.

At the same time, the HCCJR tries, as a recourse court <sup>98</sup>, recourses recourses against the criminal decisions passed, at first instance, by the courts of appeal and by the Military Court of Appeal, recourses against the criminal decisions passed, as appeal courts, by the courts of appeal and by the Military Court of Appeal and recourses against the criminal decisions passed, at first instance, by the criminal section of the Supreme Court of Justice, as well as in other case provided by the law.

Among its other attributions <sup>99</sup>, the HCCJR tries recourses in the interest of the law (ensuring the correct and unitary application of the law), action of cancellation and resolves competence conflicts in cases when the HCCJR is the common superior court, cases in which the course of justice is interrupted, removal requests and other cases specially provided by the law.

v. What is the age of criminal liability? Are there any statistics available regarding children prisoners?

According to Article 99 of the Romanian Criminal Code <sup>100</sup>, minors are not criminally liable under the age of 14. Minors between 14 and 16 years of age, they “shall be criminally responsible, only if it is proven that he/she committed the act in discernment.” And the minor aged over 16 is criminally liable. Even if a person is criminally liable before 18 years, there are different rules applying to a minor, in opposition to a major person <sup>101</sup>.

The National Administration of Penitentiaries published a table <sup>102</sup> containing data on prison population in August 7, 2012. There are 471 minor detainees who are executing different penalty regimes, as follows: a. 82 are included in maximum security, closed, semi-open, open and preventiv arrest sections; b. 226 are included in Penitentiaries for minors and young offenders; c. 8 are included in Hospital Penitentiaries; d. 155 are included in Re-education Centers;

2 SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW

2.1 Sexual Abuse

i. How does the national legislation define the term “sexual activities”? Is it to be applied broadly or narrowly?

Unfortunately, the national law never defined the term sexual activity. Our Criminal Code speaks of the terms “sexual act of any kind” when referring to the offences of sexual abuse or rape, and “acts of sexual perversion” when referring to the offences of sexual perversion but no further definition is given.

Thus, because it became clear that a separation had to be made in order to comply with the lex certa requirement, within the art. 7 of the European Convention of Human Rights <sup>103</sup>, the HCCJR had to judge a Recourse in the interest of law, submitted by the General Prosecutor of Romania.

It stated that:

<sup>101</sup> For example, the sanction of imprisonment is halved. It is worth mentioning that the New Criminal Code (NCC – Law No. 286 / 2009, published in the OJR, No. 510, on 24th July 2009), finished and adopted but postponed as to entry into force, has abolished the classical imprisonment for minors. The whole system is redesigned in order to protect, adequately rehabilitate and teach the minors. There are two major types of punishment: non-custodial and custodial educative measures. The custodial educative measure is not synonym with the classical imprisonment and it is designed only for minors. For more information, see, The New Criminal Code, The New Criminal Procedure code, Hamangiu Press, Bucuresti 2011, p.40-46, or. TNCC – art. 113 – 134, as it is not the case for further discussions.

Cantoni (Application no. 17862/91) – www.echr.coe.int, last viewed on the 25th October 2012.

The term “sexual act of any kind, as referred into art. 197 of the Criminal Code, means, any way of getting a sexual satisfaction, by using the sexual organ or by acting on it”.

The term “sexual perversion, as referred into art. 201 of the Criminal Code, means any way of obtaining a sexual satisfaction, aside the one obtained by a sexual act, of any kind. ”<sup>104</sup>

Thus, the term sexual perversion is to be interpreted broadly, or lato sensu, as it presents more possible hypotheses then the sexual act of any kind, which requires a penetration (of any kind, meaning, oral, normal or anal) of the victim.<sup>105</sup>

The sex of the victim is irrelevant, as both heterosexual and homosexual acts can be considered to be rape.

ii. Does the law define and interpret the word “intentionally”? What is the criminal liability of an internationally committed crime of sexual abuse?

Under the art. 19 of the Criminal Code „Guilt is the socially dangerous act that is committed intentionally or negligently.“ So, a criminal offence can be committed intentionally or by fault<sup>106</sup>.

The Offence is committed when the offender intentionally:

1. With what is known to be the “direct intention” – when the perpetrator foresees the outcome / result of his action, desires that particular result by committing the offence;
2. With what is known to be the “indirect intention” – when the perpetrator foresees the outcome / result of his action, and although it is not desired is knowingly accepted

<sup>106</sup> There is a third way of committing a criminal offence, by a intentional action over which a faulty misconduct and thus, a criminal consequence arises (for example: X is hitting somebody with the intention of causing only bruises. The victim, Y, because of the punch, falls on the street, hits his/her head and because of that, dies (or loses an eye)). The subsequent criminal misconduct (the death or the loss of the eye) is unintentional but must be punished if it represents a crime. For more about the topic, see, STRETEANU Florin, Drept penal. Partea generala, Rosetti Press, Bucuresti, 2003, p. 394 – 400.

So, if the direct intention presumes that the offender wishes the desired result, the indirect intention exists only when the offender can understand the result of his actions and he accepts the possibility of it to happen, even if he doesn't desire the result of the offence.

In what regards the criminal liability of an internationally committed crime of sexual abuse, the Criminal Code regulates that the penalty is imprisonment between 3 and 10 years and the interdiction of certain rights <sup>107</sup>.

iii. What is the legal age for engaging in sexual activities? How are consensual sexual activities between minors regulated?

In the Criminal Code in force, having consensual sexual intercourse with a minor under the age of 15 years represents the criminal offence under the art. 198 – Sexual intercourse with a minor.

Having consensual sexual intercourse with a minor between 15 – 18 years, is punishable only if the perpetrator is a guardian or trustee, a supervisor, career, teacher, educator, medical staff or has a certain authority or trust over the minor.

The Criminal Code in force does not state anything regarding the punishment for minors who have sexual intercourse with other minors, under the above mentioned legal ages (15, respectively 15-18). In theory, if the perpetrator is still a minor, the legal text would apply to him, and the punishment would have to halved, according to art. 109 of the Criminal Code. The doctrine generally regards this to be forced, and stated that, de lex ferenda, this provision had to change to be in tone with the french adopted model. This punishes the offence only if the perpetrator is a person above 18 years. <sup>108</sup>

It shall be duly noted that it remains for the judge to consider whether the sexual intercourse with a minor under 15 years of age represents a sexual abuse – art. 197, or a sexual intercourse with a minor – art. 198. It is considered that if the minor is de facto, unable to foresee the result of the sexual intercourse, than we have a problem of rape or sexual abuse. Per a contrario, the problem rests on the sexual intercourse criminal offence <sup>109</sup>.

iv. How is the use of force, taking advantage of disability or threat regulated in regards to sexual offences against children?

The use of force, taking advantage of disability or threat in regards to sexual offences against children is regulated differentiated regarding the age of the minor:

If the minor is under 15 years of age, the punishment can go up to 25 years (10-25) of imprisonment, and the interdiction of some rights.

If the minor is between 15 – 18 years of age, the punishment can go up to 10 years (3-10) of imprisonment, and the interdiction of some rights.

v. How is the crime of “incest” regulated?

The crime of „incest” is regulated in the article 203 of the Criminal Code which says that „Intercourse between relatives in direct line or between brothers and sisters is punished with imprisonment from 2 to 7 years.”

Thus, the crime of „incest” implies the existence of a certain person and a complex legal object. More specifically it regards not only the relations of sexual morality, but also the family relationships concerning moral and biological health of the family.

Incest means having consensual sexual intercourse between relatives in direct line or between brothers and sisters. Per a contrario, the lack of consent gives the intercourse at the same time two criminal charges: incest and rape, or sexual abuse <sup>110</sup>.

vi. Are there any specific provisions regulating offenders who take advantage of school and educational settings, care and justice institutions, the work-place and the community?

The crime committed by offenders who take advantage of school and educational settings, care and justice institutions, the work-place and the community is punishment by imprisonment from 5 to 18 years and interdiction of certain rights.

In conclusion these facts are seen as an aggravating circumstance and are punished more severely. Furthermore, there is no complaint required; the investigation can be started ex officio.

2.2 Child Prostitution

vii. Is the State a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Human Trafficking? If yes, what is the date of ratification and signature? If not, is the State planning to ratify the Convention?

Romania is a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Human Trafficking since 16 May 2005 when the treaty was signed. It was ratified on 21 August 2006 and it entered into 1st February 2008.

Still, before these dates, Romania adopted the Law No. 678 / 2001 on preventing and combating human trafficking <sup>111</sup>, which has almost the same definition regarding the human trafficking issue.

This is so, because the Romanian law was inspired by the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime and the Protocol against the Smuggling of Migrants by Land, air and Sea, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, adopted in New York on November 15, 2000 <sup>112</sup>, which represents roughly, in our view, the foundation of all subsequent acts taken against human trafficking.

viii. How does national legislation define “child prostitution”? Is it compatible with the definition in Article 19(2) of the Lanzarote Convention? Please comment.

The term “child prostitution” means the fact of using a child for sexual activities where money or any other form of remuneration or consideration is given or promised as payment, regardless if this payment, promise or consideration is made to the child or to a third person.

ix. Does national legislation criminalize both the recruiter (the person that coordinates the business of child prostitution) and the user (the person that pays to conduct sexual activities with children)?

According to the Romanian law, the recruiter is punishable for its acts for:

- i. Human trafficking, or
- ii. Pimping, depending the actual facts.

Regarding the user, there are two problems to discuss:

- iii. Criminal liability for using a trafficked minor.

If the user knows that he is benefitting from the services of a trafficked human being, he/she is punishable under the law 678 / 2001, with a criminal fine or imprisonment up to 3 years. Per a contrario, the user is not criminally punishable.<sup>113</sup>

- iv. Criminal liability for offences regarding the sexual life of the minor

If the perpetrator knowingly commits any of the sex crimes punished by the law, he/she must be held responsible and therefore, punished. In other words, if the user pays a human trafficking recruiter to have a minor do his house chores, then he is punishable under art. 14 of the law 678/2001. If the user pays the recruiter for the minor's sexual services, and he/she, is under 15 years of age, the user will be punished for engaging in a sexual act with a minor (art. 198 Criminal Code), aside using the services of a trafficked minor. If the act is not consented, then the user has to be punished for rape, or sexual abuse...etc.

c.1. Child Pornography in General:

x. Is the State party to the Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime? If yes, what is the date of ratification and signature? If not, is the State planning to ratify?

Romania is party to the Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime since 23rd November 2001. The treaty was ratified on 12th May 2004 and entered into force on 9th September 2004.

xi. How does the national legislation define "child pornography"? Is it compatible with the definition in Article 20(2) of the Lanzarote Convention? Please comment.

The Romanian legislation defines "child pornography" as any object, film, photograph, slide, logo or other visual material that display sexual conduct or posture with a pornographic character that show or involve persons under the age of 18, while the Lanzarote Convention defines child pornography as “any material that visually depicts a child engaged in real or simulated sexually explicit conduct or any depiction of a child’s sexual organs for primarily sexual purposes.”

“ They are compatible in a large extent, but a difference between these two definition is that Lanzarote Convention expands on types of sexually explicit conducts while Romanian criminal law doesn’t specify this. Another difference between these articles is about stating the phrase “child sexual organs“. The Lanzarote Convention is more accurate than Romanian legislation.

xii. To whom does the State attribute the criminal liability to? Is it compatible with the Article 20(1.a) to (1.f)?

The criminal liability is attributed to the perpetrator, which can be a person who produces child pornography for distributing, who offers or makes available child pornography, who distributes or transmits child pornography, who procures child pornography for oneself or for another person, who possess child pornography, who hold pornographic materials with minors in a media system or information data storage system, without right . Romanian legislation assumed most of the rules set by Lanzarote Convention.

xiii. What is the control mechanism for pornographic materials? If the state is a party to the Lanzarote Convention, did the state use the reservation right that has been given to them in the Lanzarote Convention Article 20(3) and 20(4)?

In Romania, the control mechanism for pornographic materials is National Authority for Communication. As mentioned in the beginning of this paper, Romania has made no reservations regarding the implementation of the Lanzarote Convention.

c.2. Participation of a Child in Pornographic Performances:

xiv. Does the State criminalize intentional conduct of making a child participate in pornographic performances? What is the State’s approach to the attendance of pornographic performances involving the participation of children? If the State is a party to the Lanzarote Convention, did the state use the reservation right stated in Article 21(2)?

In Romanian legislation, the difference between recruitment and coercion is highlighted but not differentiated. Both are punished with prison from 2 to 7 years and the prohibition of some rights. It is certain that a criminal offence committed by coercion will be punished more severe by a judge when individualizing the punishment. Yet again, Romania made no reservations upon implementation the Lanzarote Convention.

2.4 Corruption of Children

xv. Does the State criminalize the intentional causing of a child to witness sexual abuse or sexual activities, without necessarily having to participate? How does the state define "causing"? Does it involve forcing, inducement, and promise?

The current legal text does not criminalize the intentional causing of a child to witness sexual abuse or sexual activities, without necessarily having to participate. Under the offence of sexual corruption, the article 202 from the Criminal Code in force criminalizes only the obscene acts committed on a minor or in the presence of a minor. In the New Criminal Code <sup>114</sup> (named NCC from now on), which has not yet come into force, we can find the adjustment of the offence. In the article 221, under the title "sexual corruption of the minor", the intentional causing of a minor to support or to perform a sexual act is also criminalized. The text refers to a minor that is under the age of 13. The state does not define "causing".

Paragraph 1 of article 221 states in that "the commission of a sexual act, other than the one mentioned in article 220, against a minor who has not reached the age of 13 years, and also the determination of the minor to endure or to perform such an act, is punished with imprisonment of one to five years." In paragraph 3 the same text mentions "the sexual act of any kind, committed by an adult in the presence of a minor which has not reached the age of 13 years, is punished with imprisonment from 6 months to 2 years or with a fine". Also, in the next paragraph the article punishes with imprisonment from 3 months to 1 year or with a fine the determination of a minor, under the age of 13 years, by a major to assist at the committing of some acts with an exhibitionist character or to shows or performances in which sexual acts of any kind are committed, and also the giving of pornographic materials. The text adds that the acts mentioned in paragraph 1 are not penalized if the age difference between the offender and the minor, who has not reached the age of 13 years old, does not exceed 3 years.

In the article 201 of the in force Criminal Code, we can find the offence of sexual perversion, which, if committed publicly, or produces a public scandal, can be punished with imprisonment from one to five years. Paragraph 2 of this article incriminates the sexual perversion acts committed with a minor, under 15 years of age <sup>115</sup>. The notion of acts of sexual perversion means any method of gaining a sexual satisfaction, other than those through a sexual act of any kind <sup>116</sup>. The text incriminates two different situations:

a. The act was committed with a minor who has not reached the age of 15.

b. The act was committed by the victim's tutor, trustee, supervisor, carer, physician, professor or teacher, by taking advantage of his position or of his influence and authority on the victim, or by abusing the victim's trust, situations which the victim can only be a minor between 15 and 18 years old. In this case the active subject is circumstantial (or special).

2.5 Solicitation of Children for Sexual Purposes

xvi. How does the State criminalize intentional sexual gratification through information and communication technologies by an adult? Does it specify that the perpetrator should also propose a meeting with the potential child victim and come to the meeting place in order to be accused of committing this kind of crime (a.k.a. grooming)?

The state does not criminalize in the current criminal law the intentional sexual gratification through information and communication technologies by an adult. It can be found in the article 222 of the NCC, which has not yet entered into force. In the new legal text the perpetrator should propose a meeting under a special purpose, which is to commit one of the sexual acts mentioned in articles 220 (sexual act with a minor) and 221 (sexual corruption of a minor): an intercourse, an oral or anal sex and any other act of anal or vaginal penetration, any other sexual act and also the determination of a minor to endure or to perform such an act. The article refers to a minor, which has not reached the age of 13.

<sup>115</sup> As the text incriminates the action of committing the perversions with a minor and not in the presence of him/her, we consider the text to be uninspired as this offence should sanction direct perversions that come to the knowledge of the minor, because of the perpetrator's action.

<sup>116</sup> HCCJR, the decision No. III/2005, published in the OJR No. 867, on 27th September 2005.

Yes, the state criminalizes aiding or abetting and attempting to the activities of sexual abuse, child prostitution, child pornography, corruption of children. Though, regarding the crime of child pornography, attempting is criminalized only through information technology.

2.6 Corporate Liability

xviii. Does the State hold legal/moral persons (entities) such as commercial companies and associations liable when an action has been performed on their behalf by a person in a position at their entity? Is there a difference between leading persons (persons in position of authority) and regular employees being held liable? If yes, please describe the differences.

Yes, the national legislation includes corporate liability. Basically, criminal liability may arise to any legal entity. Nevertheless there are some exceptions. Article 19<sup>1</sup> from the Criminal Code states under the title “the conditions of criminal liability of legal persons” that “legal persons with the exception of the state, the public authorities and the public institutions which are performing an activity that may not be the object of the private domain are held liable for the offences committed in achieving their object of activity or interest on behalf of the legal person, if the offence was committed with the form of guilt provided by the penal law”.

No, there is no difference between leading persons and regular employees. " The criminal liability of a moral persons can be engaged by any individual person of the legal entity administration, by any official in charge of the legal person, by any person under the authority of the legal person and even by any person having a fact relation or law relation with the legal entity and acting in achieving the activity object, or in the interest of the legal person and with the consent of it."<sup>117</sup>

xix. What kind of liability does national legislation impose? Criminal, civil or administrative? Please explain.

The national legislation imposes criminal and administrative liability. In chapter IV of Criminal Code we can find the following penalties applicable to legal entities: 1. the main sanction, the fine, and 2. the additional (complementary) sanctions. We will further insist on this topic, by complying with the structure of this paper, and thus, by answering question no. xxiv of Chapter II, Point 2.

If the actual actions committed, do not pose a serious and real social danger in order to become criminal offences, an administrative liability can be applied. Article 91 from the Criminal Code enumerates three sanctions, one of which is a pecuniary penalty: censure, censure and a warning, and, a fine between 10 and 1000 lei. These sanctions are distinct in nature. They are neither criminal offences nor contraventions (or non-criminal offences).

In addition, civil liability can be imposed, but not as a sanction, but rather for the moral and pecuniary prejudices suffered by the victim. It is a normal way of repairing the damages committed by the perpetrator.

xx. Does national legislation exclude individual liability when there is a corporate liability?

The national legislation does not exclude individual liability when there is a corporate liability. In the article 19<sup>1</sup> of the Criminal Code second paragraph it is mentioned, "the criminal liability of the moral person does not exclude the criminal liability of the individual who contributed, in any way, at committing the same crime".

2.7 Aggravating Circumstances

xxii. Does the state accept any aggravating circumstances for the crimes that have been described above? (e.g. when the offence damaged physical health of the child) Please, write down these circumstances and explain, try to specify the different crimes if there are different aggravating rules applying.

I. A. The Criminal Code includes some general legal aggravating circumstances, stipulated in article 75 from the Criminal Code (the "general/common part" of the code, meaning that they can apply to virtually, any criminal offence existing under the positive law of Romania), when the offence:

- is committed by three or more persons acting together; "This aggravating circumstance is realized whether all three persons are present or not at the scene, regardless of their contribution to the offence and unconcerned if they all are held liable or not." <sup>118</sup>

- was committed with cruelty, when is accompanied by acts of violence against family members or committed by means or methods of public danger: “Committing the offence with cruelty requires a ferocity of the offender, a wilderness in committing the offence, following the provocation of a great suffering to the victim” <sup>119</sup>. By family member, the Criminal Code refers to “the husband or a close relative, which lives or homesteads together with the perpetrator”. <sup>120</sup> “The methods and means of public danger are the ones which endanger the lives of many people. Using such methods and means shows a heightened danger of the offender.” <sup>121</sup>

- was committed by a major with a minor: Article 28 from the Criminal Code states that the “circumstances related to a participant do not reflect on others” and that “factual circumstances are reflected upon participants, only to the extent that they have known or foreseen them”. “For this circumstance to be retained the major should be aware of the fact that he is cooperating with a minor; the error concerning the age of the minor, thinking that he is a major, removes the circumstance” <sup>122</sup>.

- was committed on the grounds of race, nationality, ethnicity, language, religion, gender, sexual orientation, political opinion, belief, wealth, social origin, disability, non-contagious chronic disease or HIV/SIDA:

- was committed for trivial/mean reasons: “In the criminal doctrine “trivial reasons” are considered those inner impulses contrary to morality as: revenge, thirst for illicit enrichment etc. This circumstance is personal and does not abridge on the participants”. <sup>123</sup>

- was committed in a state of drunkenness namely caused in order to commit the crime:

- was committed by a person who took advantage of a natural calamity; <sup>124</sup>

B. It is worth mentioning that the criminal law states that “other concrete circumstances that imprint the actions a serious and grave nature, can be retained by the judge, as general, judicial, aggravating circumstances” <sup>125</sup>

<sup>124</sup> “Calamity means a disaster affecting a community; such a situation can occur as a result of events such as: earthquakes, floods, landslides, fires. For more details, see: CIOCLEI Valerian, Drept penal. Partea speciala, Infractiuni contra patrimoniului, C. H. Beck Press, Bucharest, 2011, p. 45.

<sup>125</sup> Art. 75, parag. 2 of the Criminal Code. These are not defined by the law, leaving the judge with the important task of appreciating these facts. A discussion about a legal analogy against the perpetrator could arise, but it is not the place for such an elaborate discussion.

II. A. The Criminal Code includes some special, legal, aggravating circumstances (meaning that they can be found in the “special part” of the Criminal Code, and thus, apply only to the specific criminal offence, not in general. They are named aggravated variants in Romanian law) regarding the offence of sexual abuse there are 5 different aggravating rules applying:

- the offence was committed by two or more people acting together; The article 144 from the Criminal Code states that by “committing an offence” the law means, committing a consumed offence <sup>126</sup> or a punishable attempt, regardless of the participation as an author, accomplice or instigator.

- the victim of the offence was in the care, education, protection or treatment of the offender;

- the victim of the offence is a family member; A decision of the HCCJR states that “the act of maintaining intercourse with a person of the opposite sex, family member and relative in direct line, or brother or sister, committed by coercion or by taking advantage of her inability to defend, or of her inability to express its will, represents sexual abuse and also the offence of incest, in concurrent crimes.” <sup>127</sup>

- the offence seriously caused grievous bodily harm or an injury health to the victim; The circumstantial element is represented by an injury that required medical care of more than 60 days or if one of the following consequences have been produced: the loss of a sense or an organ, their cease operation, a permanent physical or mental disability, disfigurement, abortion and endangering a person’s life.

- the offence caused the death or suicide of the victim; This offence is committed with the intention of committing the act of sexual abuse, but, without intending to cause the death or suicide of the victim. “A first way to commit this aggravation refers to the hypothesis where the victim's death is due to the violence to which it is subjected, in order to achieve her sexual coercion. In this way, the perpetrator applies violence in order to achieve intercourse, but he does not intend to murder the victim, her death being the result of the perpetrator's negligence. Another way to commit the crime refers to the hypothesis when the victim commits suicide, in order to avoid the intercourse or after the intercourse, because of the intercourse”<sup>128</sup>

B. The state accepts these aggravating circumstances also for the crime of sexual perversion when the offence was committed:

- by the guardian, curator, supervisor, caregiver, physician, professor or teacher of the victim;

In order for this circumstance to be applied it should be proved that the perpetrator took advantage of his relationship with the victim or he used the victim's trust, or his authority or influence he has on the victim, to commit the offence. This circumstance is applied only for the victims who are 15 - 18 years old.

- by giving or offering money or other benefits to the minor victim;

- with the purpose of producing pornographic materials and when coercion is used;

- when the victim is unable to defend herself or to express her will, or by using coercion;

- resulted in serious bodily injury or health, death or suicide of the victim;

C. And as for the offence of sexual intercourse with a minor the state applies the same circumstances mentioned above for sexual perversion.

If there are several aggravating circumstances that apply together, the following solutions have to arise :

- a. If there are, general and special aggravating circumstances both applying at the same time, only the special one will be applied, if both circumstances are identical in nature. This derives from applying two major principles :

- i. Non bis in idem<sup>129</sup>;

- ii. Lex specialis derogat legi generali<sup>130</sup>;

- b. If there are, general and special aggravating circumstances both applying at the same time, but different in nature, then both will apply in the matter. <sup>131</sup>

III. The New Criminal Code contains some other general legal aggravating circumstances, like:

- the offence is committed by obviously taking advantage of the vulnerability status of the victim, due to the age, health, mental disability or other causes;

- when the offence was committed by a person who took advantage of the vulnerable condition of the injured person due to her age, health, disability or other causes;

As well as some special, legal aggravating circumstances, regarding the corruption of children:

- when the offence was committed in the family: In this case, although there is no consensus in the doctrine, regarding this matter, some saying that the circumstance refers to the classic definition of a family member, defined by art. 1491 of our Criminal Code <sup>132</sup>, we consider, amongst other authors <sup>133</sup>, that it refers to the family lato sensu. Per a contrario, the real protection intended would be theoretically and, the text would have mentioned the term "by a family member" and not "in the family". The notions of family member and close relative are different from the meaning of the terms used by the text "in the family".

- when the offence was committed with the purpose of producing pornographic materials;

"The meaning of the expression "pornographic materials" can be perceived through interpreting the dispositions of the Law 196 concerning the prevention and fight against pornography <sup>134</sup>. According to article 2, pornography refers to the obscene acts and to the materials that reproduce and spread such acts. The obscene materials are: objects, prints, photographs, holograms, drawings, writings, printed logos, publications, movies, audio and video recordings, commercials, programs and applications information, music, and any other forms of expression that shows or suggests an explicit sexual activity.

Therefore, pornographic materials can be identified with what the law defines as obscene acts. Theoretically, in order for the circumstance to be retained, it should be proved only the existence of the purpose, not its achievement. Practically, however, in order to prove the purpose it is necessary for the sexual act to be fixed on some medium or to have existed, at least, the technical conditions required for such fixation, in time of sexual intercourse with a minor."<sup>135</sup>

- when the minor is in the care, shelter, education, protection or treatment of the perpetrator;

2.8 Sanctions and Measures

xxiii. How does the state sanction the above mentioned crimes? Is there a penalty including deprivation of liberty? How does the state legislate extradition?

The crimes mentioned above are sanctioned exclusively with the penalty of deprivation of liberty and in the majority of cases there are mandatory complementary punishments such as prohibition of certain rights<sup>136</sup>. Given that all of the above-mentioned offences are punished with imprisonment exceeding one year, extradition is admissible. Furthermore, given that the sexual exploitation of children and child pornography are sanctioned with imprisonment exceeding three years, regarding the European Arrest Warrant, they will not be subject to the condition of dual incrimination verification.

xxiv. Do you consider the sanctions effective, proportionate and dissuasive? Please comment.

In my opinion I do consider the sanctions effective, proportionate and dissuasive. The limits of the punishments are determined enough and the judge has the possibility within the judicial individualization process to choose a punishment proportionate to the degree of seriousness of the offender and the committed offence.

xxv. How does the state sanction the legal persons/moral entities? What kind of measures does it include?

As said before, legal persons/moral entities, except the State, public authorities and public institutions performing an activity that may not be the object of exercitation in the private sector, are criminally liable for offences committed in achieving the object of activity or in the interest or the name of the legal person/moral entity. Criminal liability of legal persons does not exclude criminal liability of individuals who contributed in any way to commit the same crimes.

Legal persons/moral entities who are responsible of committing crimes are punishable as follows <sup>137</sup>:

1. the main sanction is represented by the criminal fine;
2. the additional (complementary) sanctions are represented by:
  - a. dissolution of the legal person;
  - b. suspension of activities of the legal entity for a period of 3 months to one year or suspend any activity related to the legal person who committed the offence for a period for 3 months to 3 years;
  - c. closure of a number of working points of the legal person for a period of 3 months to 3 years;
  - d. prohibition to participate in public acquisitions procedures for a period of one to 3 years;
  - e. displaying or disseminating the conviction decision.

xxvi. Does the state legislate seizure and confiscation of materials, instruments... etc. used for committing the crime? Does the state protect bona fide third parties? Is there allocation of a special fund for financing prevention or intervention programmes in which these properties confiscated allocated?

The State does in fact legislate seizure and confiscation of materials, instruments and other objects that were used for committing the crime <sup>138</sup>. Third parties that did not know the origin of the goods resulted from committing the crimes or they did not know that the goods they borrowed will be used in committing the crimes, are protected, which means that the State will not seizure or confiscate those goods, but instead there will be confiscated the monetary equivalent of those goods from the perpetrator.

I do not know of any special fund. There is a high probability that there is no such thing.

xxvii. When the crime has been committed within the family or within the close environment of the child, how does the state react?

In case that the competent authorities (such as the General Directorate of Social Assistance and Child Protection) are notified regarding the possibility of a child abuse and they establish that there are reasonable grounds for that complaint, the director of the General Directorate of Social Assistance and Child Protection, with consent of the parents or legal representatives, may place the child in a special placement centre. If the parents or legal representatives of the child do not give their agreement, the General Directorate of Social Assistance and Child Protection can notice the court requesting issuance of a presidential ordinance <sup>139</sup> to place the child in a family, a foster parent or a residential service, licensed under the law.

In the proceedings regarding the issuance of a presidential ordinance may be given, ex officio, as evidence a written statement of the child allegedly abused. Child's statement may be registered under the law, through audio-video technology. Recordings are made mandatory with the assistance of a psychologist. The child's agreement is required for the recording of his statement. If the court deems necessary, may call the child in for a hearing that takes place in the council chamber in the presence of a psychologist and only after an initial preparation of the child in this regard.

3.1 Investigation

i. How is the principle of the "best interests of the child" applied during investigation of a crime as mentioned above? Is there a protective approach to the victims? What kind of measures has been taken? Is the victim offered protection during the court proceedings? (such as appointing special representatives) If so, please indicate what kind of protective measures have been taken.

During the investigation of a crime as mentioned above, the principle of the “best interests of the child” is applied with priority. Art. 2 paragraph 3 of Law no. 272 of 2004 <sup>140</sup> states that, the principle of the best interests of the child shall prevail in all actions and decisions concerning children. People or institutions that are bound to this principle: the child’s parents or his legal guardians, any person whom he has been placed legally, public authorities and private bodies, and also it shall prevail in cases solved by the courts.

The necessity to establish for child victims in cases of sexual abuse of special hearing conditions to reduce the number of hearings and traumatic effects on victims and increase the credibility of their statements while respecting their dignity results from the Recommendation Rec (2001) 16 on protecting children from sexual exploitation adopted by the Committee of Ministers on October 31, 2001, at the 771st meeting of the Ministers <sup>141</sup>.

“In our internal law, criminal procedural rules contain provisions relating to child victim only in adjacent” <sup>142</sup>. There is an obligation established by law, according to which the child’s parents or legal representatives must be cited to assist him.

If needed, psychological counseling to victims can be ensured by Protective Services of Victims and Social Reintegration of Offenders which operates besides every tribunal <sup>143</sup>. These psychological counseling are provided free of charge, on request, for victims of offences stated by the law <sup>144</sup>, especially in case of rape, sexual intercourse with a minor, sexual perversion and sexual corruption, offences of child maltreatment or in cases provided by Law no. 678 of 2001 on preventing and combating human trafficking.

The free psychological counseling services are provided for a period not exceeding three months and if the victims have not attained the age of 18 years, for a period of 6 months <sup>145</sup>. The request for granting free counseling service shall be filed with the Protection of Victims and Social Reintegration of Offenders and only after notifying the prosecution offices or the court on the offence.

Also, in cases of offences regarding human trafficking and domestic violence, the victims of these offences benefit in addition of special measures provided by our laws on preventing and combating human trafficking <sup>146</sup> and domestic violence <sup>147</sup>. Such examples are: temporary evacuation of the aggressor from the family home, whether it is the owner of the property, reintegration of victims and, where appropriate, children in the family home etc.

In case of conflict of interests between the child victim and his parents, the court can appoint special representatives in order to represent the child's interests during the proceedings <sup>148</sup>.

The victims have access, as from their first contact with the competent authorities, to information on relevant judicial and administrative proceedings. Judges, prosecutors, police officers and agents must inform the victims of their crimes on: services and organizations that provide counseling or other forms of assistance, to victims, according to its needs, criminal investigation body to whom they can make a complaint, right to counsel and the institution where they can go to exercise this right, the conditions and procedure providing free legal assistance, rights of the injured party, the injured party and the civil party, the conditions and procedure for the benefit of the provisions regarding special protective measures of victims and witnesses, the conditions and procedure for granting financial compensation by the state.

During the ordinary criminal trial, a child is allowed in the courtroom only if he is at least 16 years. If necessary, he is called in to give a statement and after that he is removed from the courtroom.

ii. Are there any special units for investigating the crimes mentioned above within the legal force? Are they authorised to carry out covert operations? Do they investigate and analyse child pornography materials?

In general, within the criminal prosecution bodies, there isn't any special unit for investigating the crimes mentioned above. But, as in any prosecution office, there are prosecutors who deal with a specific group of crimes, such as those above. However, there is a special unit which investigates and analyses child pornography materials, but specifically only if they are related to a computer system. Basically, the special unit investigates crimes regarding manufacturing in order to spread, providing or making available, distribution or transmission, purchase for himself or for another, child pornography through computer systems, or possession, without rights, of child pornography in a computer system or computer data storage means. This special unit is called Service to prevent and combat cyber-crime and operates within the Directorate for Investigating Organized Crime and Terrorism <sup>149</sup>, which is a criminal investigative service.

Any prosecution office is authorised to carry out covert operations, by using officers of the judicial police <sup>150</sup>. The authorisation is given by the prosecutor. However, provided by our Criminal Proceedings Code, undercover investigators are used only regarding specific crimes and only as an exception. These crimes do not refer to those mentioned above, but only to human trafficking offences, which are part of these crimes which allow the usage of undercover investigators.

However, as provided by art. 224<sup>1</sup> of our Criminal Proceedings Code, undercover investigators can also be used in another serious crime that cannot be discovered or whose perpetrators cannot be identified by other means. The terms “serious crime” can also refer to any other offence for which the law prescribes imprisonment and a special minimum of at least 5 years. But the majority of the crimes mentioned above consist of a special minimum beneath 5 years.

iii. Is it required that the crime is reported in order to be investigated? Do the proceedings go on even in case of withdrawal from the statements?

The victims of some offences such as sexual intercourse with a minor, sexual perversion and sexual corruption, offences of child maltreatment or those provided by Law No. 678 of 2001 <sup>151</sup> on preventing and combating human trafficking, who have not attained the age of 18 and those under interdiction <sup>152</sup> are not required to report the crime in order to be investigated. Therefore, the offences can be investigated ex officio.

The legal representative of the minor or person under interdiction may notify law enforcement officials on the offence <sup>153</sup>. The proceedings go on even in case of withdrawal from the statements. It is necessary to bring to the attention of relevant bodies of law on the offence so it can be investigated. However, it does not require a special referral form as a condition of accountability. Ex officio investigations can also take place.

A notable exception is represented by the offence of rape, or sexual abuse. It shall be noted that this offence is investigated ex officio, only if the minor is under the age of 15. If the victim is a minor over 15 years or a major person, this offence will be investigated only if the victim submits a prior complaint <sup>154</sup>. Without this complaint, the investigation cannot start, or if it has started ex officio, it cannot go on, as it is, by law, terminated on the ground of not being acquired by the victim <sup>155</sup>. If the victim does indeed submit the above mentioned complaint, then the investigations can proceed.

It seems strange that such a serious offence has seemingly a loophole or at least a strange approach by our legislator so, the question arises: was this a legal omission, or an intentional enactment?

This probably represents an intentional enactment after all, because this offence is indeed extremely traumatic and the scars left by the perpetrator could with ease deepen, by taken this case to court, without the prior consent of the victim. Whether this measure was carefully thought out after all, and, weather it serves it' s final purpose – of protecting the victim – could be subject to a debate.

It shall be noted that the New Criminal Code has the same approach with the only difference that the age of 15 is replaced by the age of 16 <sup>156</sup>.

iv. How long is the statute of limitation? When does it start? Can it be suspended?

The period of the statute of limitations varies on each offence and depends according to the limits established by the law regarding the punishment.

in case of sexual abuse as provided by art. 18 paragraph 1. a of the Convention, the statute of limitation is 8 years;

in case of engaging in sexual activities with a child where abuse is made of a recognised position of trust, authority or influence over the child, including within the family; or abuse is made of a particularly vulnerable situation of the child, notably because of a mental or physical disability or a situation of dependence the statute of limitation is same as above, 8 years;

in case of engaging in sexual activities with a child where use is made of coercion, force or threats as in rape the statute of limitation is up to 15 years depending on the aggravating circumstances.

in case of recruiting a child into prostitution or causing a child to participate in prostitution the statute of limitation is 10 years.

in case of coercing a child into prostitution or profiting from or otherwise exploiting a child for such purposes the statute of limitation is up to 15 years.

in case of recruiting a child into participating in pornographic performances or causing a child to participate in such performances the statute of limitation is 10 years.

in case of coercing a child into participating in pornographic performances or profiting from or otherwise exploiting a child for such purposes the statute of limitation is 15 years.

The statute of limitation starts from the moment the offence is committed. There are crimes that take longer for them to be consumed, as in to be considered as committed, such as in case of continued offences <sup>157</sup>. In these cases, the statute of limitations starts from the moment they are „exhausted“ <sup>158</sup>. It can be suspended or interrupted provided that the conditions are fulfilled <sup>159</sup>.

v. How does the national legislation proceed when the age of the victim is not certain?

The uncertainty to the actual age of the victim does not prevent the initiation of criminal investigations. In cases of human trafficking, when the age of the victim is uncertain and there are reasons to believe that the victim is a child, he or she shall be presumed to be a child and shall be accorded special protection measures pending verification of his or her age <sup>160</sup>.

vi. Who is responsible for recording and storing data for convicted offenders? Who do they relate to? Can and do these authorities transmit their data to other competent authorities in other states? Do the authorities respect protection of personal data rules?

The General Inspectorate of Romanian Police of the Department of Internal Affairs is responsible for recording and storing data for convicted offenders <sup>161</sup>.

Specific data related to criminal offenders can be transmitted to other competent authorities in other states. The General Inspectorate of Romanian Police does in fact respect the personal data rules, as provided by Law no. 238 of 2009 <sup>162</sup> regulating personal data processing by structures / units of the Department of Internal Affairs in activities regarding prevention, investigation and combating crime and maintaining public order.

3.2 Complaint Procedure

vii. How does the complaint procedure work in case of violations of Substantive Criminal Law? Are children allowed to present their individual complaint? What are the criteria for Communication to be accepted for examinations (e.g. written/oral)?

Children, victims of exploitation, violence, abuse, neglect or improper treatment, themselves or any other person may present their individual complaints to the police. The crime can be reported to the police or prosecutor in writing or orally. Also, another authorised (in writing) person can be appointed to report the crime.

In case of oral complaint, children must present themselves in person to the police station. The police officer will transpose the complaint in writing, record it and ask the victims to sign it. Likewise, the complaints made in writing must be signed.

Standard documents for drafting the complaints can be found at the police. They must be submitted in the Romanian language. If the victim does not speak the language, an interpreter will be provided, free of charge, for assistance.

viii. What are the rules about legal representation of children, especially in the case of complaints against their parents? What are the rules of participation of minors in trials? (Protection of their names, prohibition of media etc.)

If the child is requested to appear before the investigative bodies, he or she must be accompanied by a parent or guardian as a representative of the Probation Service.

In cases of rape, sexual intercourse with a minor, sexual perversion and sexual corruption, offences of child maltreatment or in cases provided by Law no. 678 of 2001 on preventing and combating human trafficking, the victims are provided, upon request, free legal assistance <sup>164</sup>.

The court may declare the hearing secret, if the trial in public hearing could harm the morality, dignity or private life of a person, such as in our case, the child.

In case of a complaint of a child against his parents, the judicial body has the authority to select a special representative, such as a guardian, in order to assist the child <sup>165</sup>.

If it is considered that the victim's life is endangered, as well as in other conditions provided by law, the prosecutor or the court may agree that the child to be heard by technical means without being physically present at the place where the body is under criminal investigation or the place where the court hearing is conducted. In addition, the prosecutor or the court may order the police to monitor the home or residence of the victim or to provide

Preventive Measures

i. What kind of educational guarantees are given in relation to professionals working with children in the area of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse? What does the State do in order to assure these people are aware of these situations?

In Romania, subjects such as civic education are taught in schools, through which teachers educate children about the types of perversions that they may be subjected to, if they do not follow strictly the advice of parents and teachers. Nationwide, various measures in the various ministries are also taken, through which education of the population is trying to fight against the existence of sexual abuse. These measures are widespread through the media tool, which informs the parents about how they can protect their children and about how they can fight against spreading of this type of crime. There are certain campaigns on TV and on the internet whose purpose is to prevent spreading of this kind of abuse of minors.

ii. Does the State educate children regarding these issues? Does the State involve parents into this educative process?

There are lots of social programmes established by the national government or by non-governmental associations, which provide support for victims, such as Save the Children Romania, a NGO, which offers free counseling for children and their parents. The Save the Children centers are located in the cities of Bucharest, Timisoara, Iasi, Suceava, Targu Mures, and also guarantee free help lines, which are aware of the confidentiality principles.<sup>167</sup>

iii. Has the State created preventive intervention programmes for people who fear that they may commit the crime?

Some prevention tools have been created in the online environment. Blocking certain websites might be seen as a precaution, but this measure is unable to help people who fear they might themselves commit crimes. Suppression of pages is ineffective, because the possible offenders can bring abusive online content to other servers located in jurisdictions where it is nearly impossible to interfere.

Protective Measures and Assistance to Victims

iv. Are there any social programmes to provide support for victims? How exactly do these programmes work?

The Emotional, Behavioral and Educational Center for Children is a subsidiary of Save the Children and provides services such as: clinical, psychiatric and psychological assessment services, for children and adolescents, counseling and individual psychotherapy for children and adolescents, counseling and group psychotherapy for adolescents, individual counseling for parents, educational programs for parents, development programs of social and emotional skills for preschoolers and young school children, support groups for children and parent, social services. All services are free, offered in a friendly, accessible environment.

Other social programs are also put into practice, amongst which:

- training programs for professionals in health systems, education and social protection - psychiatrists, family doctors, nurses and clinical psychologists, school psychologists, family physicians and pediatricians, social workers, speech therapists are developed;
- materials for professionals who provide professional counseling and psychological intervention for children, adolescents and their families are being spread;
- informing activities, education and intervention in schools, for children, teachers and parents, designed to reduce the incidence of sexual behaviors are being carried out.

Within the therapeutic treatment, the members of the team will meet in the center with the child and his parents as well as outside the center - in school or kindergarten, with the child's teacher-, in class / group when for solving the problems of child's health is necessary and an intervention in the educational environment.

When the children's difficulties are maintained by their relevant socio-emotional absence and the lack of parenting skills, both children and parents can benefit from educational programs and / or therapeutic group programs.

v. Are there any help lines in service of the victims? Are these help lines aware of the confidentiality principles?

The helpline called Children's Telephone has been the best example of this kind, showing that between November 21, 2001 and October 31, 2012<sup>168</sup>, there were 39.291 telephone requests that demanded the intervention of public authorities. Out of these, 9.919 persons called about cases of abuse on children and 395 were cases of domestic violence.

vi. How does the State assist victims when it comes to recovery? Are the intervention programmes (if there are any) aware of the possibility that these child victims could have sexual behaviour problems in the future? Does the State make sure to get the consent of the persons or inform them thoroughly about the intervention programmes?

Romania has adopted, since 2004, a national plan- implemented by an Inter-Ministerial Working Group, with the purpose being that of combating sexual abuse and assisting the recovery of victims.<sup>169</sup>

The aim of the plan is to ensure the protection of every child, respecting its interests by reducing the risk he became victim of these types of abuse, such as involving children / youth in prostitution, pornography, prostitution. Implementing legislative act will be achieved through the participation of all relevant stakeholders in the field of child protection and related fields, creating the general framework of action to gradually reduce / stop the sexual exploitation of children for commercial purposes and to prevent it.

The plan has the following objectives:

- Development policies, national strategies and a legal framework to protect children / youth sexual abuse and their involvement in cases of sexual abuse and sexual exploitation for commercial purposes. Thus, secondary legislation will be approved for Child Protection that includes issues of child sexual abuse, exploitation for commercial purposes (including the sale / their internal and cross-border trafficking). It is also in the review, adjustment and completion of internal legal procedures so as to ensure real protection of the child, according to interest or higher, in accordance with international standards.

- Building partnerships and collaboration between those responsible for child protection and family in order to sustain and develop a coherent, nationwide, to prevent and combat child sexual abuse, sexual exploitation, sale and trafficking of children and young. The National Authority for Child Protection and Adoption will coordinate a working group on this field, consisting of representatives of all institutions, nongovernmental organizations and of other relevant international bodies. The plan also provides for meeting this objective the organization of training courses and technical seminars, training of specialists for the purpose of reference of public services for child protection, education, health, police, justice, customs, prosecutors, tourism, mass-media.
- Romania's active involvement in regional and international policy to prevent sexual abuse against prostitution and child pornography, prostitution, child exploitation, sale and trafficking of their domestic and international commercial interests. This will be supported by regional and international actions to protect children / young people by providing informational support needed and will be introduced extraterritorial jurisdiction rules and sanctions across the national territory, citizens who have committed crimes of sexual exploitation of children and adolescents.
- Developing programs and projects to prevent sexual abuse of any form and in any medium, the involvement of children in prostitution, pornography and prostitution, as well as domestic and international sales and traffic for commercial sexual exploitation. For this purpose, will be created specialized resource centers will be developed programs to promote child rights in family education and support for families, special intervention to prevent domestic violence.
- Developing a coherent, unified, functional national / local services for the rehabilitation and social reintegration of children / teenagers abused and / or sexually exploited, system to ensure social and psychological services for children and family services counseling and psychotherapy, counseling services and immediate intervention oriented institutions, by establishing national telephone hotline with permanent program.
- Developing a system of evaluation and monitoring of cases of sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children.

Another project, called "Developing the capacity to prevent and investigate cases of child pornography on the Internet in Romania" was set up by the Romanian police. Currently used by 36 countries, the ICSE database (Internet Child Sexual Exploitation database) is using an imaging program identification, through which are compared details of the place where the offence occurred, so that connections can be made between series of images of the same offences or between images produced in the same place, which has more victims.

In this way you can get relevant information about the place where they made some images of child pornography on the Internet, which increases the chances of identifying victims and hold the perpetrators of these crimes.

"By implementing the project, 100 policemen were trained on methods to combat and prevent cases of child pornography on the internet, and a specialist in the Directorate for Combating Organized Crime conducted a training session at the headquarters of Interpol," said Florentine Robescu, Deputy General Inspector of Romanian Police.<sup>170</sup>

According to a survey to assess the campaign "You who accept you?", Conducted by the Office of Research at the Institute for Research and Prevention of Crime from 7 to 15 November 2011, on a sample of 904 middle school students, surfing the Internet (for 84.5% of them) is one of the main activities they engage in their spare time.

Conducted over a period of three years by the Romanian Police, in partnership with the National Police of Norway, the project "Capacity Development for preventing and investigating cases of child pornography on the Internet in Romania", worth 578,295 euros, was funded through the Financial Mechanism European Economic Area.<sup>171</sup>

i. Is there a serious political discussion regarding the children in the respective country?

At the State level, under the supervision of the Ministry of Labor, Family and Social Protection, the Directorate General for the Protection of the Child is the public authority that promotes and safeguards children's rights. The Directorate offers statistics on the general issue of abuse against children, and the specific case of sexual abuse<sup>172</sup>. Between January 1 and June 30, 2012, there were a total of 5.665 cases of abuse neglect and exploitation, out of which 292 were cases of sexual abuse and 24 of sexual exploitation. 182 cases of sexual abuse took place within the family.

A second example of a state authority that conducts activities in the area of sexual violence is the National Agency against Human Trafficking (ANITP in Romanian), which coordinates, evaluates and monitors the implementation of public policies regarding human trafficking. The Agency, falling under the Supervision of the Ministry of Administration and Interior, also functions as a mediator between victims of trafficking and the competent judicial authorities or the victims and the competent NGOs.

ii. How has the awareness within the society regarding children's sexual abuse and exploitation been raised by committed NGOs and/or the State (use of official sources, documents, statistics...)?

The Directorate General offers statistics on child abuse only for the past last 3 years:

- 2012: 292 cases of sexual abuse, 24 cases of sexual exploitation;
- 2011: 512 cases of sexual abuse, 48 cases of sexual exploitation;
- 2010: 623 cases of sexual abuse, 59 cases of sexual exploitation;

As a total, since 2010, there have been 1427 cases of sexual abuse and 131 cases of sexual exploitation.

iii. If the statistics are available, how many reporting have been done regarding children's sexual exploitation in last the 5 years (e.g. police records, court records etc.)?

The statistics of the previous years have been detailed below:

- The official statistic for 2010 <sup>173</sup>: the trafficking of minors increased from the previous year (22,5% of the victims in 2009, to 27%); out of 482 victims of sexual exploitation, 226 were minors.
- The official statistic for 2009 <sup>174</sup>: out of 320 identified victims of sexual exploitation, 127 were minors.
- The official statistic for 2008 <sup>175</sup>: out of the 186 minors identified as victims of human trafficking, 74% were trafficked for sexual exploitation.

- The official statistic for 2007 <sup>176</sup>: out of the 292 minors identified as victims of human trafficking, 75% were trafficked for sexual exploitation.

iv. Are there any promotional campaigns in the State so far regarding these issues?

To combat the phenomenon on human trafficking, the ANITP carries out public campaigns and provides a free of charge help telephone line where the Agency can be notified about cases of trafficking. An active campaign at the present moment is entitled “Me?! It can’t happen to me!” and it is aimed at raising awareness about human trafficking in Bucharest and the surrounding areas. “Your friend could be a Loverboy!” is another similar campaign where the Agency informs educational institutions and students about recruiting methods used by so-called “lover boys” <sup>177</sup>.

v. How has the children’s perspective represented in the law making process?

Lobbying for children’s rights in Romania is difficult especially because, firstly, the lobby activity has no legal ground in Romania and secondly, because of the lack of an established dialog structure between public authorities and NGOs. Another obstacle in the way of NGO involvement is represented by frequent changes of management in public bodies, which means that negotiations carried out with one stakeholder will need to be reopened with the newly appointed one.

Since 2001, SCR has been promoting the initiative establishing a “Children’s Advocate”, an independent public body that should promote and safeguard the interests of the child. In 2011, a Member of Parliament initiated an amendment to the Law governing the organization and functioning of the Ombudsman <sup>178</sup>, in order to create a special assistant of the Ombudsman which would promote children’s rights. However, this initiative was rejected by the Chamber of Senate in 2012. SCR was also actively involved in the revision <sup>179</sup> of Law. No. 272 / 2004<sup>180</sup> on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child, suggesting amendments which represent the children's perspective. Such suggestions regarded the right to identity, protection of children whose parents are working abroad, mandatory school enrollment. Another area of the SCR activity is related to the development of three draft National Strategies on Early Education, Parental Education and Mental Health of the Child and Adolescent.

vi. Who are the main national Non-Governmental Organisations working on the topic of children's rights? Does the State regulate (or not) their involvement in law making process?

As for the non-governmental sector, one of the most active NGOs in promoting children's rights is Save the Children Romania (further referred to as SCR), developing programs in 39 cities all over Romania. The organization has been involved in both campaigns and legislative initiatives, which will be described as follows<sup>181</sup>.

The latest campaign initiated by SCR on the issue of children's abuse is called "Listen to their soul" (2011). The campaign promotes methods of raising and educating children, eliminating violence, abuse and neglect. Another popular campaign was carried out in 2005, "Beating is NOT sent from Heaven"<sup>182</sup>, promoting legal norms that forbid physical punishments on children.

Another NGO whose activities promote the rights and interests of the child is the Children's Telephone<sup>183</sup>. The organization implemented a telephone number (116 111) for the assistance of children. The services granted by the NGO refer to information and counseling on the respect of the rights of children or information on institutions that protect children's rights.

politicians, who always skip the problematic area of children's rights when presenting their political programs.

V CONCLUSION

The aim of this report was to raise awareness towards the problem of sexual abuse against children and help the future prevention of this kind of offences.

Our research team has tried to portray the problem with regards to changes which took place on a legislative, social and educational level. During our research, we concluded the following:

- The Romanian state has ratified the Lanzarote Convention and has adopted it into its national legislation, making no further reservations to its text;
- The interest of the legislative power in Romania in creating a legal frame for the problem of sexual abuse of children has had a strong echo during the past years, with laws concerning trafficking, child pornography or child prostitution having been passed, this being the start of a preventive process. Furthermore, the upcoming entry into force of the New Criminal Code, which deals with many of sex-related offences against children will ease the process of bringing such cases to court;
- Although the legal frame is sufficient, its effectiveness is blocked by fundamental problems identified at a social level, such as the issues of discrimination, improper education, vulnerability of children and a high rate of human trafficking;
- The activity of NGOs in this field has been booming in the past years, leaving behind a growing social impact and contributing highly to educating the population, preventing crimes and helping the reintegration of the victims through special programs.

I INTRODUCTION

i. Article 19 of the Russian Federation Constitution is devoted to the principle of equality and reveals its specific values. Part 1 of Article defines equality as equality before the law and the courts. Law as an act, taken in the form of the Constitution or the law is objectively necessary mean of formulating rights and freedoms. Therefore, it is important to promote equality in front of the law, as a general rule for all (equal scale), which defines individual freedom. Extremely essential to provide equality of everyone in front of the court, as the court is the most effective way to protect and restore human rights and freedoms in the case of a dispute or violation. It should be noted that the position of Part 1 of the equality of all in front of the law means that this principle applies to the citizens of the Russian Federation, foreign citizens and persons without citizenship.

Part 2 of the mentioned Article defines equality as the equality of man and citizen in possession of rights and freedoms. Here the duties of the state to guarantee this equality as a matter of the natural properties of the person, and his social traits. Among the natural properties of the person listed as gender, race, and nationality. Public signs include human language, origin, property and official status, place of residence, religious creed, beliefs, and participation in voluntary associations. These personality traits identified and protected in the Article, as the specifics of the Russian Federation are the multi-ethnic composition of the population, the existence of different races, the diversity of languages, religious confessions.

Meaning of Paragraph 2 of the Article also is in the fact that it takes into account a variety of properties of man. Thus human dignity receives legal protection from discrimination in accordance with Article 2 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Article 2 of the International Covenants on Human Rights and Article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Lists the properties of the individual, in respect of which discrimination is prohibited, is not exhaustive. In Part 2 of the Article of the possibility of taking into account "other circumstances" that might occur in real life. The constitutional principle is protected in the Article 136 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federation, according to which willfully violating the equal rights of citizens on account of race, nationality, religion, shall be punished by imprisonment or a fine.

Part 3 of the Article 19 of the Constitution states that men and women have equal rights and freedoms, which correspond to the Article 3 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Part 3 of the Article 19 also points to the equal opportunities for men and women of their rights. This directive should be interpreted literally. Social significance of maternity and the role of women in procreation are universally recognized, so that a woman needs additional safeguards in this area. According to Article 1 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women of 18 December 1979, the term "discrimination against women" means any distinction, exclusion or restriction made on the basis of gender, which is aimed at weakening or nullifying the recognition, enjoyment or exercise by women, irrespective of their marital status, on a basis of equality of men and women, of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the political, economic, social, cultural, civil or any other field. Historically, the principle of equality between men and women is well established in our public consciousness. However, during the formation of the new society, women are particularly vulnerable position. International benchmarks in the Convention defines the special danger of limiting women's access to health care, education, training and growth opportunities for employment standards, food, etc. In the current circumstances, the state is obliged by legislation, administrative action and the court to prevent possible cases of discrimination against women. As adopted on 8 January 1996 Government of the Russian Federation, improving the status of women in the Russian Federation is recognized that at the present time a number of violation of women's rights, the evidence of discrimination in Russia. Therefore formulated to overcome the problem of violations of the labor market, where there is a reduction in the professional status of women. Deterioration in nutrition and health is recognized. Separately was determined the problem of combating various forms of violence against women (in the family, manufacturing, and other areas of life), and sexual exploitation. Feature of the Article 19 is that its action is due to the action of all articles of the Constitution, which establishes specific freedom or human and civil right.

Some reports of discrimination in Russia.

Reports of racist attacks and killings of foreigners and ethnic minorities appear in Russia with shocking regularity, and the concern is that, as it seems, this is happening more and more often. Among the victims, who became known to "Amnesty International", are: students, asylum seekers and refugees from Africa and Asia, as well as people from the South Caucasus, South Asia, South-East and Central Asia, the Middle East and Latin America. However, residents of the Russian Federation are also in a group of risk of physical violence. At risk at all, who do not have typical Russian appearance, for example, persons belonging to ethnic groups from the North Caucasus, in particular, the Chechens, as well as representatives of the Jewish community, Gypsies and children of mixed marriages. Even persons of Russian nationality, regarded as sympathetic foreigners or members of ethnic minorities, such as fans of music styles "rap" or "reggae", representatives of other youth subcultures and fighters against racism, also suffered persecution because they are considered "non-patriots" and "traitors". Reported attacks in towns and cities throughout the Russian Federation. At present, Russian and foreign media have reported racist attacks almost daily. However, these attacks have taken place over the years.

Organizations and individuals in Russia, engaged in research and campaigning against racism, discrimination and other forms of xenophobia, also abused. "Amnesty International" has received numerous reports of threats, physical attacks and, in some cases, murder individuals involved in anti-racist activities, the authorities, aware of the threat hanging over them, took no action to protect them.

According to official statistics, there are about 150 "extremist groups" with over 5,000 members, while non-governmental organizations (NGOs) have suggested that the number of persons participating in more or less organized racist groups is much higher and can reach 50 thousand people.

The reaction of the Russian authorities to the problem of racist violence is grossly inadequate. In particular, police and prosecutors refused to recognize the racist nature of the attacks and killings, despite the presence of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federation article providing for criminal penalties for crimes committed on racial grounds. Inability of the state to act with due diligence to prevent, investigate and punish crimes motivated by racial hatred and attacks against fighters with racism and experts, it seems, only strengthens the extreme xenophobia and neo-fascism in Russia. Although at present the authorities, including the various law enforcement agencies are increasingly aware of the existence of the problem of racist attacks on minorities, it seems that there is a comprehensive plan of action to combat racism and discrimination, including on the part of official representatives of the State.

Specified violent attacks should be considered as one of the most visible manifestations of intolerance and xenophobia, are deeply rooted in many areas of Russian society. As in all societies, government officials reflect the values of their society.

The research "Amnesty International" shows that in Russia, law enforcement officials and other government officials continue to use discriminatory practices. In particular, together with the fact that everyone, including the ethnic Russian, can be a victim of human rights violations at the hands of police officers, members of ethnic minorities, particularly people from the North Caucasus and Central Asia, as well as migrant workers are particularly vulnerable in the face of violations such as extortion, arbitrary arrests, torture and ill-treatment. This not only leads to a direct violation of human rights by the state, but also affects the ability of the state with due diligence to protect minorities and foreign citizens from abuse by racist groups. In particular, many of the victims of violent attacks do not report these crimes to the police, knowing the experience of other people who are treated with similar complaints, and then allegedly were charged by police in the fact that they themselves have provoked the attack. Other victims simply do not believe that the police will take any action to investigate the attacks. In Russia, discrimination in the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights is also a reality for ethnic minorities such as, for example, Gypsies.

In this atmosphere of violence and racist ideas spread more. While in 2004 the racist attacks were reported in 26 regions in 2005, such attacks have been observed in 36 regions. In this case, the perpetrators of such crimes, does not hide his racist motives. Racism is an attack on the very idea of universal human rights. It systematically denies certain people their full realization of human rights because of color, race, ethnicity, or nationality and origin. In accordance with the international law of human rights, Governments are obliged to fight discrimination in all its forms. Also they have an obligation to ensure that laws and public institutions address the root causes and effects of discrimination and provide effective remedies to those who have been a violation of his fundamental right to an equivalent treatment.

"Amnesty International" calls on the Russian authorities to take immediate steps towards a comprehensive solution to the problems of racism, and offers a number of recommendations that produce specific actions to be taken. Among other things, it is necessary: the government to adopt a comprehensive plan of action to combat racism and discrimination in all spheres of Russian society to act - openly and often passionately and at all levels of government - against racism, to ensure that crimes reasonably considered racially motivated, qualified as such, and that the practice of the treatment crimes motivated by racial hatred as "hooliganism", to address deficiencies in the investigation and prosecution of racist attacks, including through the development of clear guidelines for law enforcement agencies, stopping the practice of discriminatory treatment in all its aspects in relation different ethnic groups of the state; effective measures be taken to protect the fighters against racism and witnesses in criminal proceedings who face threats to their security from non-state actors, and to ensure the full integration of the principles enshrined in the UN Declaration on Human Rights Defenders, in national law and human rights protection mechanisms, as well as to ensure their full implementation.

ii. Part 1 of Article 38 of the Russian Federation Constitution states: "Motherhood and childhood and the family are protected by the state." This is confirmed by expression in Russian law Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, Declaration of the Rights of the Child in 1959, the Convention on the Rights of the Child in 1989, adopted by the UN General Assembly. They state the need for special protection and assistance for motherhood, the legal protection of the family, create social conditions for its normal functioning, the harmonious development of every child in view of its physiological characteristics. In Article 38 states that the care, parenting - the equal right and duty of parents, as well as "able-bodied children over 18 years, to take care of their disabled parents."

The article stresses the guarantee of social security for the education of children, establishing pensions, encouraging forms of social welfare and charity (medical care, children without parental care in children's homes, boarding schools, the benefits to large families, foster families, etc.). The main legal acts governing family relationships are: Family Code (entered into force on March 1, 1996, the rules of international law and international treaties of the Russian Federation in the field of family law are the part of family law of the Russian Federation), the Civil Code of the Russian Federation and other regulatory acts.

The concept of family in international law

International legal instruments, using the term "family"; however it does not contain definitions, referring to national legislation. Thus, in the International Labor Organization Convention N 156 on equal treatment and equal opportunities for men and women workers: workers with family responsibilities (Geneva, 3 June 1981) stated that the term "child dependent" and "the other next of kin member of the family, which is really in need of care or support" mean persons defined in each country in any manner consistent with national practice.

Approach to the definition of family in the Russian legislation

The concept of family has a social rather than legal in nature. In this regard, the concept of legal documents related to the establishment of the family circle of people that form its membership. Establishment of a circle of family members, in turn, depends on what content can be embedded in the concept of "family member". Circle of family members related to the rights and obligations defined in different ways depending on the purpose of regulation in various areas of law - family, civil, labor, etc. It is different in different legal institutions of one branch of the law (for example, housing and property rights). In the housing rights of family members means spouse employer, his children and parents. Other relatives, disabled dependents are recognized as members of the family, an employer if they are infused by, as members of his family with him and lead the overall economy. In exceptional cases, other persons may be deemed members of the family of the living space in the courts (Article 69 Labor Code of the Russian Federation). In the other way the range of family members determined in the pension legislation. Cohabitation with the deceased for a pension for survivor and co-farming significance is not. The main point here: who should have been aliment by the victim during its life by law in the succession law as their circle of family members?

The concept of family in the Family Code of the Russian Federation

In the Family Code of the Russian Federation is no common definition of family for the reason given above. Because of a different definition of the family in different areas of legislation inclusion of a definition of "family" in the Family Code and the establishment of an exhaustive list of family members could lead to a violation of their rights, or to increase the number of unnecessary family members. However, the terms "family", "family member" is frequently used in the Family Code.

Understanding of these terms in the Family Code is set based on assumptions of the theory of family law. Family (in the legal sense) is defined as the constituency concerned moral and economic rights and obligations arising from the marriage, kinship, adoption or other forms of acceptance of children with a family. This definition does not take into account the fact of living together and maintaining a common household.

In accordance with Family Code specified rights and obligations arise between the following family members: spouses, parents, children, grandparents (grandmother) and grandchildren, sisters and brothers, stepfather (stepmother) and stepchildren (stepdaughter), as well as between those who accepted the education of children (adoptive parents, guardians, foster parents, actual teachers) and adopted children to their families. In this case, the respective rights and obligations arise in these cases in the Family Code and under the conditions set by them. As a rule, their occurrence is independent of the joint residence or location of any of the family members dependent on the other.

Family Code, in particular, a comprehensive list of individuals who have an obligation to provide funds for the needy members of the family:

1. Parents of minors and incapacitated adults and children in need;
2. Adult children against the disabled and needy parents;
3. Spouses (in the cases - and former spouses) in relation to each other;
4. Under certain conditions - brothers and sisters, grandparents and grandchildren against grandchildren against grandparents, foster child against the factual fosterers, stepchildren against the stepfather and stepmother.

Grandparents who have the necessary resources are required to maintain their minor grandchildren and disabled adult grandchildren who need help if they are not able to receive child support from their parents, and adult disabled children and also their spouses (former spouses). Grandchildren, in turn, are required to if they have the necessary funds to support their disabled need help grandparents (Art. 94-95 Family Code of the Russian Federation). Brothers and sisters are obliged to support their need help minors and disabled adults in need of brothers and sisters. This obligation does not arise if the brothers and sisters do not have sufficient resources to provide such assistance (see Art. 93, Family Code). Since the duties of family members against each other are established by law - must be taken into account for tax purposes.

Family Code also uses the term "close relatives", meaning (Article 14 Family Code), parents and children, grandparents and grandchildren, full and half brothers and sisters. Further, the half brothers and sisters mean children having general or father or mother.

The concept of marriage in Family law

In recent decades, marriage in the sociological sense discussed in Russia mainly as a "union between men and women, by which regulates relations between genders and determines the position of the child in society," or as a "historically determined, authorized and regulated by society a form of relations between men and women, establishing their relationship to each other and to the children". In contemporary encyclopedic literature marriage describes, as a rule, as the family union of a man and a woman (matrimonial state) generating their rights and obligations in relations to one another and to their children.

However, in the Family Code there is no specific definition of marriage as a legal faction and one of the main institutions of Family law, which is quite natural, since the negative approach to regulatory consolidation of marriage was typical for a long time and for a previously effective family law in Russia, including three previous marriage and family code after Revolutionary period (1918, 1926 and 1969). As emphasized in contemporary legal literature, the lack of law-established definition of the marriage due to the fact that marriage is a difficult and complex social phenomenon, that is being under the influence of not only legal but also ethical, moral norms, and economic laws that be called into question the completeness of the definition of marriage only to the legal position, the more that "spiritual and physical elements of marriage, of course, cannot be subject to the law".

Logical way is further consideration of the individual characteristics of marriage in relation to the current legislation of different countries on the specific factual examples.

1) Marriage - a free, equal union of men and women of marriageable age who are not already married, contracted under the conditions and procedures established by law, and having to build a family.

2) Voluntary marriage - a principle established by international law, and all the domestic legal order. The essence of this principle is based on the independence and unfettered will of the persons entering into marriage (no emotional or physical violence), and is the full and free consent of the spouses of the parties. Unfortunately, not always outwardly express consent to the marriage of one of the spouses meets his real intentions (in some countries, young men and women are still parents choose their candidate husband or wife). Also, given the fact that the right of any State shall determine the conditions necessary for the marriage, and the circumstances affecting the marriage, the spirit of volunteerism is not always fully realized. For example, the legislation of different countries there are no uniform regulations for marriage mentally ill or suffering from dementia that are not able to adequately assess their actions and their legal consequences. In addition, the laws of some foreign countries provide for marriage by proxy, that does contradict the requirement of personal appearance spouses in marriage and public expression of consent to marriage, necessary for the implementation of the principle of voluntariness. For example, Islamic law recognizes marriage, not only personally, but on behalf of, and in Spain and Italy, the legislation provides for the possibility of marriage by proxy in an emergency but not in the Russian Federation.<sup>2</sup>

3) Equality between spouses in a marriage means itself the equal rights and obligations of both husband and wife. In marriage is the equality of citizens, regardless of their nationality, race and religion. From a legal point of view, in most modern states this sign legislated. The essence of equality is that couples are raising children together, have equal rights to own, use and dispose of jointly acquired property during the marriage, both spouses are free to choose their occupation or profession, by mutual agreement settle all questions of family life.

4) One of the common characteristics of marriage is its purpose - a family. At the same time, in the modern world, the cases of detention “fake marriage”. Fake marriage is a sham marriage registration without the intention of either both parties or one of them to start a family. Sham marriage can be for various reasons: the prospect of living space, permanent registration, and devolution of property on death of an elderly spouse, a pension, and implementation of other selfish and other purposes. If the absence of intent to start a family will be proved – it is the grounds for annulment of the marriage in Russia.

5) Another sign is the appearance of marriage, the couple mutual personal and property rights and obligations. This feature is implemented in full measure only to marriage, duly registered in accordance with the law. Unregistered or the actual marriage (in Russian law - cohabitation), defined as the relationship between partners, "spouse", not designed in accordance with the law in most countries is the emergence of mutual rights and obligations. However, there are certain exceptions. Thus, certain civil causes and consequences of legalized cohabitation with the conduct of the general economy. In most states a simple cohabitation after a certain period of living together allows the court to set a precedent of the presumption of legal marriage. According to the current Family Code, unregistered cohabitation men and women does not create rights and obligations of marriage. The rights of children born in legal marriage do not differ from the rights of children born out of marriage.

The rights and responsibilities of spouses arise from the date of state registration of marriage in the Civil Registry Office, where facts of birth, change of name - name - middle name, the death are also should be register.

The law sets out the legal terms and conditions of the marriage: the marriage required the personal presence of both parties to the marriage, the bride and groom should make mutual voluntary consent to enter into matrimony, and that is very important - they must be of marriageable age, which is set to 18 years. If there are valid reasons for local government may allow married persons aged 16 years, at their request. Reducing the age of consent as an exception to the specific circumstances of less than 16 years is included in the legislative competence of the Russian Federation. Marriage is registered, usually within a month after applying for the bride and groom, this period may be extended by the registry office for a month, or shortened to one day, as if you have special circumstances (pregnancy, childbirth, or other) Marriage shall be entered into on the day of application. Marriage is valid only if legal capacity of persons entering into a marriage. That is why the mentally ill, recognized as such by the court, have no the right to marry.

Child Protection

iii. May 31st, 2011 in Moscow All-Russian Public Opinion Research Center presents the data on which the problems of childhood Russians seem most important and how respondents rate the extent to which children's rights in various fields.

Russians believe that the best currently underway children's right to education: relevant index is 66 points. Also interviewed are satisfied with how respected the rights of children to freedom of expression and an opinion (54 points).

Several worse is the realization of the right to receive medical care (49 points), kindergarten (42 points). Most poorly implemented children's right today is the right to protection from violence and abuse (37 points) and the protection of information that is harmful to their health and moral development (30 points).

In the problems of childhood that Russians do not think is particularly acute, the degree of realization of the rights is generally high. Thus, the problem of children's education in kindergartens and schools concerned 14% of respondents, while the extent rate of the right to receive school respondents is the highest in comparison with the rest (66 points). At the same time, the index on visits to kindergartens is somewhat lower (42 points). Slightly below the level of implementation and the right to rest and leisure, and protection from violence in the family (42 and 37 points, respectively), and the corresponding problems are also not the most serious of these (they give a value of 14 and 13%, respectively).

The problems related to the legal right of children, are not among the most pressing issues of childhood. Thus, the child's right to schooling observed in the opinion of the respondents fairly complete (66 points), and, therefore, the problem of teaching children in schools is particularly acute for the Russians (she worries 14%). The same is the situation with the child's right to leisure: it is implemented adequately (42 points), and, therefore, the issue of children's leisure concern 14%. At the same time, the low level of implementation of the right of children to protection from violence (37 points) does not attract the appropriate public attention to this problem (which concerned only 13% of respondents).

UNICEF Regional Advisor on Child Protection in Central and Eastern Europe and the CIS Jean-Claude Legrand brought in his speech statistics: 500 million to half a billion children in the world suffer from different forms of abuse, and in Europe one in five children in our day is by sexual abuse. Despite the fact that revealed themselves only 10-15 percent of the total number of crimes against child.<sup>3</sup>

Statistics on executed in Russia in juvenile crime is depressing. So, in 2002 launched more than 40,000 crimes against children. In 2006, at the hands of criminals already suffered 80,000 minors, and in 2008 - 100 thousand and 1.7 thousand were killed. More than 100,000 Russian children in 2009 were victims of crime, of which nearly two thousand were killed, said the Presidential Commissioner for Children's Rights Pavel Astakhov. For the last 2010 registered 384 the rape of children under the age of 14, 1766 facts seduction and corruption of children. 1519 infants remained unfound, 513 children of which are missing.

"In 2009, 108,000 children were victims of crimes, nearly 2,000 were killed. In 2009, child welfare authorities of the Russian Federation received 37,000 reports of children in conditions that threaten their lives and health, more than 6000 children have been taken from parents due to these reports, "- said Astakhov at the Russian-French conference "Protection of children from violence".

According to the head of the Investigative Committee of the Russian Federation, the number of rapes of minors in recent years has grown significantly. Thus, the number of crimes under Article 134 of the Criminal Code ("Sexual intercourse and other sexual acts with a person under sixteen years of age") increased 30.8 times, according to Article 135 ("Sexual Abuse") - 3.6 times on the Article 242.1 ("Manufacturing and distribution of materials or objects with pornographic images of minors") - 10 times.

The judiciary has succeeded in breeding more pedophiles. Only two (!) of 36,000 offenders during this period received the maximum sentence. For maximum period of sentence and those who rape children. Have sexual intercourse with children without signs of abuse conditionally sentenced to 55 to 70 percent of all perverts. For the wickedness of children suspended sentence in the period up to 40 percent of child molesters. Only one of the two thousand prisoners in 2004-2009 molesters received the maximum term - three years in prison.

Investigative Committee and the Public Chamber have repeatedly raised the issue of the need to abolish parole for persons who have committed serious crimes against children. How many words are spoken of the need to create a single database for those who are likely to commit sexual offenses against children? But until now, talk remains talk. In the U.S.A., the police and the FBI account is worth more than 600,000 pedophiles; in Germany - about 200 thousand; in Russia, only 2.5 thousand, raising serious concerns about the intention of the authorities to deal with this dangerous phenomenon.

iv. Legislation on implementation of International Treaties.

Along with the international treaties of the Russian Federation Constitution incorporated into the legal system of the country generally recognized principles and norms of international law, but it has not defined their relationship to the other rules of the system. The Constitution of the Russian Federation 1993 consists following: "The generally recognized principles and norms of international law and the international treaties of the Russian Federation are a component part of its legal system. If an international treaty of the Russian Federation include other rules than those that stated by the State law, the rules of the international treaty are applicable" (Part 4 of Article 15). Thus, international treaties and generally accepted principles and norms of international law are declared as part of the "legal system" but not the "system of law" of the Russian Federation.

There is no common understanding of the constitutional formula; the representatives of the theory of "transformation" argue that paragraph 4 of Article 15 of the Constitution of the Russian Federation is a "transformational rule of general nature" (S.V. Chernichenko) or acting as "an example of the general transformation in the Russian law" (V.A. Kalanda). Sometimes this constitutional provision is considered as an act of state legal limit of sovereignty.

In the literature, there are different views on the relations validity of customary international law and domestic law. G.M. Danilenko, referring to the practice of the Constitutional Court, concludes that "the generally recognized rules of international law have priority over domestic acts"<sup>4</sup>. Meanwhile, the position of the Constitutional Court, as expressed in the opinion of this Court Judge O. Tiunova, is somewhat different: "The Court considers that the generally recognized principles and norms of international law and international agreements, Russia has an advantage over national law in case of conflict of international law and legislation"<sup>5</sup>.

Paragraph 3 of Article 5 of the Federal Law "On International Treaties of the Russian Federation" by July 15, 1995, which provides that "the provisions of the officially published international treaties of the Russian Federation, which do not require the publication of internal regulations to operate in the Russian Federation itself. For the implementation of other provisions of the international treaties of the Russian Federation is taking the necessary legal acts. "Such a regulatory requirement contained in paragraph 2 of Art. 7 of the Civil Code of Russia in 1994, which establishes that international treaties of the Russian Federation shall apply to relations regulated by the Code, "directly, except in cases where an international treaty that its application requires the publication of a national act." In all these examples, the national law of Russia "permit" application of international agreements in the sphere of the state sovereignty of the Russian Federation, not "transform" them into the domestic law of the State.

<sup>5</sup> Tiunov O.I. On the application of International Law by the Constitutional Court of the Russian Federation // the first scientific-practical conference on the issues of application of International Law of law enforcement authorities, 1996. p. 36.

According to Article 6 of the Federal Law "On International Treaties" agreement of the Russian Federation to be bound by an International Treaty may be expressed by:

- signing of the contract;
- exchange of instruments constituting a treaty;
- ratification of the treaty;
- approval of the contract;
- acceptance of the contract;
- accession to the treaty;
- use any other method of consent, which the contracting parties have agreed.

Solutions of consent to be bound by international treaties of the Russian Federation adopted by state authorities of the Russian Federation or the authorized organizations in accordance with their competence established by the Constitution of the Russian Federation, this Federal Law and other legislative acts of the Russian Federation

The law established a number of international treaties, which make quite dramatic changes in the law and subject to ratification:

- a) the performance of which requires a change in the existing or the adoption of new federal laws, as well as establishing rules other than those provided for by law;
- b) which are subject to the fundamental rights and freedoms of man and citizen;
- c) the territorial division of the Russian Federation and other countries, including agreements on the state border of the Russian Federation, as well as on the delimitation of the exclusive economic zone and continental shelf of the Russian Federation;
- d) on the basis of interstate relations on matters involving the defense of the Russian Federation, on disarmament and international arms control, on issues of international peace and security as well as peace treaties and agreements on collective security;
- e) the participation of the Russian Federation in international alliances, international organizations and other international associations, if such contracts provide for the transfer of a portion of his powers of the Russian Federation or a set of legally binding decisions of the Russian Federation.

Similarly, subject to ratification by the international treaties of the Russian Federation, at the conclusion of which the parties have agreed to ratification.

The relationship between national law and international treaties (dualistic or monistic approach).

In the first half of the twentieth century, in the legal doctrine there are three main points of view on the relationship between international and domestic law: two dualistic and monistic. The founders of the dualistic concept (G. Tripel, D. Anzilotti) considered international and domestic law as two different legal and equitable legal systems, the sources of which cannot compete with each other. "The relationship that the internal law, wrote G. Tripel unsuitable subject for international regulation and vice versa ... International and national law is not only different areas of law, but also the various law enforcement. These are two of the circle, which are closely linked, but never meet"<sup>6</sup>.

Supporters of monistic conception, by contrast, argued that international and national law are not differ significantly and should be considered as a manifestation of a single concept of law. According to them, the right covers the entire world and includes more specific separate systems located in a hierarchy. When one group of monists (A. Zorn, A. Lasson) upheld the view of the priority of domestic over international law, and the second (H. Kelsen, John Kuntz) justifies the idea that international law is the supreme law and order prevailing in world, and that its effect, therefore, "cannot be restricted in any way"<sup>7</sup>.

However, subsequent development of international relations shows the failure of monistic and dualistic conceptions in their original form.

On the other hand, it is clear that the theory of a single order, in which international law has precedence over national legal provisions, also not true. As noted by Charles Hyde, the essence of the theory of moderate dualism is to ensure that "the international and domestic law - a different legal system, but they are closely related: they can regulate the rules are the same items that complement each other and collide with each other".<sup>8</sup>

In the second half of the twentieth century, most scientists have come to a common understanding of the relationship between international and domestic law as two different order, but work closely and in some way correlated with each other legal structures. A similar view was widespread in modern Russian international legal doctrine.

The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child - an international legal instrument defining the rights of children in the participating States. The Convention on the Rights of the Child is the first and main international legal instrument binding on a wide range of children's rights. Code of administrative violations introduces new elements of offense - "Creating the conditions for a legal person trafficking or exploitation of children" and "Making a legal entity of materials or objects with pornographic images of minors and trafficking." In this case, as measures of administrative punishment for legal entities provides a fine in the amount of 800 thousand to 1 million rubles; to create the conditions for the sale of children, from 200 thousand to 500 thousand rubles; to create the conditions for the exploitation of children, from 50 thousand to 300 thousand rubles; for the manufacture of materials with pornographic images of minors or administrative suspension of activity for up to 90 days.

The Convention is the first international instrument to establish different forms of sexual exploitation of children as a crime, including the operation of the family home and the use of force, threats and coercion. Preventive measures established by the Convention, including recruitment, training and awareness raising of persons working with children (Article 5), education of children, including the provision included in the primary and secondary school information for children about the dangers of sexual exploitation and sexual violence, as well as information about how to protect themselves, adapted to their evolving capacities (Article 6) as well as programs that provide individuals who fear that they might commit offenses established in accordance with this Convention, to take advantage, where possible, effective intervention programs or measures designed to evaluate and prevent the risk of committing a crime.

It also provides for the need for measures aimed at providing short-and long-term assistance to victims in their physical recovery and psychosocial rehabilitation, and takes the necessary legislative or other measures to encourage any person who owns or has in good faith suspicion of sexual exploitation or sexual violence against children and to report them to the competent authorities.

Each Party shall take the necessary legislative or other measures to ensure the criminalization of the following acts committed intentionally:

Each Party shall take the necessary legislative or other measures, with due regard to the rules governing the independence of the legal profession to ensure that all persons involved in the proceedings, including judges, prosecutors and lawyers, could receive training in child protection, as well as against sexual exploitation and sexual abuse of children.

With special impact on the rights and interests of children in the first place, the Convention covers the following aspects:

Criminal procedure – a legal activity of initiating, investigating, considering and resolving criminal cases.

The Russian criminal proceedings have two main stages – pre-trial procedure and court procedure.

Each of these comprises several steps:

1. Pre-trial procedure

- Initiating a criminal case
- Preliminary investigation

2. Court procedure

- Preparing the criminal case materials for a court session (is held either as a general procedure, or as a preliminary hearing)

- Proceedings in a court of general trial jurisdiction
- Proceedings in a court of appeal
- Execution of a sentence and other legal judgments
- Proceedings in a court of cassation
- Review proceedings
- Reopening the criminal case in view of new or newly discovered facts.

The three last steps are considered exclusive (extraordinary) as they are destined to review judgments that are final. The other steps are regular.

v. The minimum age of holding a person criminally liable in the Russian Federation is 16.

In part 2, Article 20 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federation crime components are enlisted which lower the age of being criminally liable to 14. Thus, persons who have reached the age of 14 by the time of committing a crime can be held criminally liable for murder (Article 105), intended infliction of serious bodily injury (Article 111), intended infliction of average bodily injury (Article 112), kidnapping (Article 126), raping (article 131), sexual battery (Article 132), theft (Article 158), robbery (Article 161), assault with intent to rob (Article 162), extortion (Article 163), misappropriation of a car or any other vehicle with no intent of theft (Article 166), intended destruction or damage to property with aggravation (part 2 Article 167), act of terror (Article 205), hostage taking (Article 206), deliberately misleading account of an act of terror (Article 207), hooliganism under aggravated circumstances (Article 214), theft or extortion of arms, ammunition, explosive substances and items (Article 226), theft or extortion of narcotic drugs or psychotropic substances (Article 229), disablement of transport vehicles or lines of communications (Article 267).

This list is exhaustive. Persons who are under 16 can't be held criminally liable for acts beyond this list.

In accordance with article 15 of the federal law "On the system of preventing juvenile neglect and delinquency" minors over 11 can be placed in specialized closed fostering institutions on the decree of judge, if they can't be held criminally liable due to the fact that by the moment of committing a socially dangerous act they haven't reached the age that permits to hold them criminally liable.

This measure isn't one of criminal responsibility. The purpose of being held in the above mentioned institution is to provide psychological, medical and social rehabilitation to a minor, adjust their conduct and adapt them to a life in society.

According the Russia's Ministry of Interior report, in January-August 2012 each 20th investigated crime (4,9%) was committed by a minor or a minor has been an accessory to the crime.

As of the data for the end of 2010, there were 4400 people held in 62 fostering colonies for minors.

<sup>9</sup> Criminal Law/Special Part / under reduction of I. V. Shishko. Moscow: "Prospect", 2012, p. 118 — 752

There is not enough information to answer on the question if definition wide or narrow applicable.

ii. The Russian Criminal Law has a definition of the word “intentionally”. However, there is no special article about the criminal liability of an internationally committed crime of sexual abuse. Thus, legislator considers all crimes of sexual abuse as internationally committed.

iii. To provide legal guarantees to protect minors from sexual abuse and sexual abuse by adults legislator has been established the Article 134 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federation that criminalizes sexual intercourse, sodomy or lesbianism, committed by a person eighteen years of age with a person known to be under the age of sixteen years old. This Article is designed to protect the child from all forms of sexual abuse, to protect the sexual integrity of persons under a certain age, and due to the lack of physiological and social development of the non-sexual freedom.

Article 134 "Sexual intercourse and other sexual acts with a person under sixteen years of age" is distributed as follows:

1. Sexual intercourse with a person under sixteen years of age and sexual maturity, a person who has attained the age of eighteen years;
2. Sodomy or lesbianism with a person under sixteen years of age and sexual maturity, committed by a person eighteen years of age;
3. Acts stipulated in the first or second paragraph of this Article, committed with a person who has reached the age of twelve, but fewer than fourteen years old.

Note: A person who has committed an offense under the first paragraph shall be exempt from punishment by the court if it is established that the person and the offense ceased to be socially dangerous due to marriage with the victim (victims). If the age difference between the victim (victim) and the defendant (the defendant) is less than four years, the last sentence does not apply to imprisonment for committing an offense pursuant to the first paragraph or the first part of Article 135 of this Code.<sup>10</sup>

iv. Use of force, taking advantage of disability or threat regulated in regards to sexual offences against children - set in the Article 132: “Sexual battery”:

“Sodomy, lesbianism or other sexual acts involving violence or threat of violence to the victim (victim) or other persons, or by using the helpless state of the victim”. And specially paragraph a), part 3 of Article 132: “Acts stipulated in the first or second paragraph of this Article, if they: a) committed against a minor (minor)”.

v. The case of “incest” included in the articles on sexual abuse in case if the person who committee sexual crime use dependent status of the minor. Thought, there is not enough information to answer properly on that question.

Liability of the parents: Parent infringing on the sexual integrity of their child, may be deprived of parental rights (Article 69 of the Family Code).

A parent does not fulfil the obligation to protect the rights of the child on sexual inviolability and sexual freedom, subject to administrative liability. The offense is considered by the Commission on Minors and the protection of their rights, and in case of fault of parents, they may be given a warning or they may be subject to an administrative fine of from 100 to 500 rubles (Article 5.35, Article 23.2 of the Code of Administrative Offences of the Russian Federation).

vi. There are no specific provisions regulating offenders who take advantage of school and educational settings, care and justice institutions, the work-place and the community. However mentioned cases are included in the general Article133 of the Criminal Code "Coercion to perform sexual acts":

"Forcing a person to sexual intercourse, sodomy, lesbianism or other acts of a sexual nature by means of blackmail, threats of destruction, damage or remove property or using material or other dependence of the victim"<sup>11</sup>.

2.2 Child Prostitution

vii. The Russian Federation is among the countries that have not signed or ratified the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Human Trafficking.

Supporters of ratification, agreeing that the Russian law and practice are not ready to apply the Convention on action against trafficking in persons at the national level, expressed the position that sign and ratify the need to create the conditions and incentives for legal regulation in the relevant areas of law. By ratifying the Convention, the Russian Federation will be obliged to increase the capacity of the state in the fight against human trafficking and slavery, in particular, will prosecute entities involved in the trade (agencies recruitment, matrimonial agencies, etc.). This will have to change the law. And also increase the responsibility of the state in this area, since the countries became the party of Convention, it requires to report annually to the Parliamentary Assembly and the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe of the measures by countries to combat human trafficking.

Opponents maintain the position of the primacy of the political, economic, legal, and practical preparation of the standards set forth by the Convention, and only then start the procedure of signing and ratification. In their view ratification now will not change anything, because Russia is not ready to comply with international obligations under the Convention. Report to the Parliamentary Assembly and the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe cannot be an effective means of combating trafficking in human beings, as any liability in case of unsatisfactory report is not provided.

In addition, according to the opponents of ratification, Russia has set up an adequate mechanism for combating trafficking. In particular, the Federal Law by December 8th, 2003 № 162-FZ to the Criminal Code introduced new offenses: trafficking (Article 127-1) and the use of slave labor (Article 127-2). In this case, the definition of „trafficking in persons“, given in Russian criminal law, is identical to the definition in the Convention.

viii. There is a special article about “child prostitution” in the Criminal Code of the Russian Federation. Part 3 of the Article 240 “Involvement in prostitution”: “Engaging in prostitution or forced to continue to engage in prostitution - an organized group or against a minor”<sup>12</sup>.

ix. In conjunction with the answer on a question above, national legislation criminalize both the recruiter and the user of child prostitution. However deferent article and different liability will be applied to recruiter and the user: activities of recruiter falls under the Article 133 “Coercion to perform sexual acts”; and user – under the Articles 131 132, 134, 135 of the Criminal Code<sup>13</sup>.

III NATIONAL POLICY REGARDING CHILDREN

i. Yes. In this regard, it has been approved the Commissioner for Children's Rights in 2009.

Especially growing concern among Russian politicians and lawyers increased number of cases of ill-treatment of adopted Russian children and the growing number of cases of confiscation of children from Russians in Finland.

For a discussion of these issues, from 1st to 3rd October 2012, Kazan hosted the VI All-Russian Congress of the Children's Rights in the Russian Federation. In the framework of the Congress will discuss the prospect of "Russia without orphans".

According to the Minister of Internal Affairs of Russia, Russia "is experiencing a third wave of unaccompanied minors after the Civil War and the Great Patriotic War." The rough data of the Ministry of the Interior, in 2005 in Russia, more than 700 thousand orphans, 2 million teenagers are illiterate; more than 6 million minors are socially disadvantaged. For every homeless have 2-3 neglected children. As a result, in 2004, Russia was noted more than 154 thousands of crimes committed by juveniles, as well as 60-70 thousand crimes committed by children under the age of criminal responsibility. For violations of the rule of law to the police delivered over one million minors. By early 2005, registered in the juvenile divisions of the Ministry of Internal Affairs of Russia consisted of more than 655,000 children and adolescents. These numbers are constantly growing.

Street children, destitute, can be commercially and criminal exploitation. Homeless children are involved in criminal areas (street work in hazardous conditions, prostitution, pornography business, trade of tobacco, alcoholic beverages, etc.) associated with the risk for health, psychological and social development.

From 1994 to 2002 1,9 -fold increase in the number of children of alcoholics; 3,3 times - substance abuse; 17,5 times - drug addiction.

The most important issue of childhood, from the point of view of 47% of Russians, is alcohol and drug abuse among children and adolescents. These data are presented in the study of the All-Russian Public Opinion Research Center.

In second place - children and juvenile delinquency (31%). The third most important problem - the low life expectancy of Russian families with children (27%).

Russians seem less acute issues such as street children (18%), the problem of child leisure (14%), education of children in kindergartens and schools (14%), violence against children (13%), poor living conditions of orphans in institutions (9%).

Completing the rating of children's issues selfishness of modern society's reluctance to have children and raise them (6%), the issue of adoption - both Russian and foreign citizens (4%).

The poll also showed that 20% of respondents with minor children, the most likely point to the urgency of the problem of raising children in kindergartens and schools. Those who have and juveniles, and adult children often express concern about the low standard of living of households with children (36%).

Russians believe that the best currently underway children's right to education: an appropriate index of child rights is 66 points. Also interviewed are satisfied with how respected the rights of children to freedom of expression and an opinion (54 points). Several worse is the realization of the right to receive medical care (49 points), kindergarten (42 points). Most poorly implemented today children's rights is the right to protection from violence and abuse (37 points) and the protection of information that is harmful to their health and moral development (30 points).

Index of child rights shows how well realized the rights of children enshrined by the Convention on the Rights of the Child. The higher the index value, the better the children's rights are realized in a specific area. The index is a number from 0 to 100 points.

Ombudsman for Children in its report for 2010 notes positive trends:

- Number of children each year join the army of orphans shrunk at 26, 2 % (compared with 2007). Over the past year, 101,017 people added the "new" (in 2007 - 136 790). However, this may be a consequence of a general demographic crisis.
- At 53, 1 % less children live in a directed orphan boarding.
- Increase in the number of children with learning disabilities. Developing inclusive education - a child with disabilities attending regular kindergarten school.

- Prepared a complete package of documents for the establishment of the National Center for Missing and injured children, the purpose of which - the professional rehabilitation of minor victims of violence.

Negative trends:

- Housing is a pressing issue for the orphans. In the queue for housing stand more than 100 thousand people.
- Continue the steady growth of sexual crimes, whose victims - children and adolescents. There were more than 9500, and for some compositions the number of crimes per year has almost doubled.
- There are still bad things with the device in a family of orphaned children with disabilities. Last year, 148-patient facilities of social services for children with disabilities contained 21,823 children.
- It remains alarming situation with child and adolescent suicide. According to the Ministry of Health in the year 985 people commit suicide, according to the Ombudsman for Children's Rights - 1800.<sup>14</sup>

In July 2011 managed to sign a bilateral agreement on cooperation in the field of adoption between Russia and the U.S.A. Also was signed an agreement on cooperation in the field of child adoption between Russia and France.

The Constitutional Court of the Russian Federation, on the basis, in particular, the conclusion of the Commissioner of the President of the Russian Federation for Children's Rights, recognized the fundamental law of the respective country's law requiring airlines to install on all flights 50 % discount from the set tariff for the transportation of children.

The Constitutional Court, based on the conclusion of Ombudsman of the Russian Federation for Child Rights ruled that the Constitution of the Labor Code, be dismissed by the employer of his father, the sole breadwinner in a family who is raising young children, including - children under three years.

The Constitutional Court, based on the conclusion of Ombudsman of the Russian Federation for Child Rights ruled that certain articles of the Constitution of the Housing and Civil Code, as a result of which many families with minor children were deprived of housing and registration in the Russian Federation.

Problems of the children's rights protection are focused on the whole of Russia, and therefore the position of the Ombudsman for Children introduced in all its regions. Today the number of Children's Rights in the Russian Federation, more than the number of authorized children throughout the united Europe.

ii. "Sexual exploitation of children in the Russian Federation is a more serious problem than the sale of children, and both governmental and non-governmental agencies agree that in Russian society, prostitution became an acceptable way of life. According to reports, prostitution is widespread in business "- an excerpt from the Report of the Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, Ms. Ofelia Calcetas-Santos, 2001.

The problem of sexual exploitation of children, the Russian began to pay attention not so long ago. In late September 2012 Russia signed a convention on the protection of children from sexual exploitation. Alexander Alexeyev, Russian Permanent Representative at the Council of Europe, did it in accordance with the order of Vladimir Putin - Russian President.

The ministry stressed that "the signing of this treaty Russia shows that she has a strong political will to respect the rights of the child in this country to deal with such unacceptable phenomena of pedophilia and sexual exploitation of children. This initiative can be called a continuation of the line of the Russian authorities aimed at the welfare of children, adolescents and young people, and to create the necessary conditions for their normal development and a sense of security".

Most recently, in Saint Petersburg metro appeared Social Advertisement: "If the child will be met on time from school, he did not meet with disaster." In a broad sense it can be seen as directed against children falling into the hands of the exploiters.

Under the Russian law "On Advertising/Commercial", advertisement distributors are obliged to placing social advertising within 5% of broadcasting time (printed area) per year.

iii. Unfortunately, in Russia there are still exist transit, import and export of illegal exploitation of children.

- From 2000 to 2011, the number of crimes related to child pornography, sexual exploitation of children has increased in 10 times.
- According to official statistics, the victims of sexual abuse were more than 9,000 children.
- Higher risk in girls 14-16 years
- Those most at risk are vulnerable children and young people: orphans, street children, children from dysfunctional families.<sup>15</sup>

We present some well-known results:

- in 2004 in Russia victims of criminal offenses and accidents were 113 thousand minors;
- in the total mass of minors, victims of crime, victims of sexual abuse are 30%;
- in the 1980s in Russia every twentieth prostitute was a minor, in 2000 - one in eight, and in Moscow and St. Petersburg - one in five;
- the number of "street" children in Moscow from 30 to 50 thousand, 50-60% of them are children under the age of 13 years, the proportion engaged in prostitution, shooting porn among them is between 20% to 30%.<sup>16</sup>

iv. The Russian Federation has not developed social advertising. Also in Russia there is not enough attention to the problem of sexual exploitation of children. Only notable campaign was to transfer the petition to support the campaign "Stop the sexual exploitation of children and adolescents" in the Human Rights Council of the UN.

I INTRODUCTION

i.

1. Constitution of the Slovak Republic

The Slovak Republic, as declared in the Constitution of the Slovak Republic (hereinafter referred to as „the Constitution”) in Art. 1, subsection 1, is a democratic state respecting the rule of law. In this sense the Constitution ensures many fundamental rights and freedoms, which are „guaranteed in the Slovak Republic to everyone regardless of sex, race, skin colour, language, beliefs and religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, nationality or ethnic group, property, birth or other status. No one shall be damnified, derive an advantage or suffer disadvantage for these reasons.”<sup>1</sup>

The people are granted freedom and equality in dignity and rights.

2. Anti-discrimination Act

Act no. 365/2004 Coll. on Equal Treatment in Certain Areas and Protection against Discrimination, and on amending and supplementing certain other laws (hereinafter referred to as „Anti-Discrimination Act”) represents a part of the current Slovak legislation. According to the Anti-Discrimination Act the term discrimination includes direct and indirect discrimination, harassment, unjustified disciplinary action, as well as instruction to discriminate and incitement to it. Direct discrimination in this sense means „any act or omission by which a person is treated less favourably than another person in a comparable situation is treated, would be treated or could be treated.”<sup>2</sup> In contrast, indirect discrimination is characterized by external neutrality of discriminatory behaviour. Such behaviour is not obvious, often accepted by a society, but still puts a person at disadvantage compared to another person. Another aspect included in discrimination is harassment, bothersome and inappropriate or offensive behaviour which may result in violation of human dignity, intimidation or humiliation. As for instruction to discriminate the relationship of superiority of one person over another is monitored and incitement is „persuading, affirming or instigating a person to discriminate against a third person.”<sup>3</sup> Under this Act, the burden of proof rests with the person accused of discriminatory behaviour. However, different treatment of individuals does not always have to mean discrimination.<sup>4</sup>

3. Action Plan

Action plans are designed to coordinate policy with respect to a certain group and define the measures and activities that shall ensure progress in specific areas. The latest include:

- National Action Plan of the Slovak Republic Regarding the Decade of Roma Inclusion 2005-2015
- Action Plan Preventing All Forms of Discrimination, Racism, Xenophobia, Anti-Semitism and Other Manifestations of Intolerance 2009-2011
- National Action Plan for Prevention and Elimination of Violence against Women for years 2009-2012
- National Action Plan for Children for years 2009-2012
- National Action Plan for Gender Equality for years 2012-2013

4. News and Reports

Several periodic reports on adhering to human rights in practice are issued. They are published by state authorities as well as non-governmental organisations (hereinafter referred to as „NGO”).

A. Discrimination based on gender, respectively gender inequality remains an issue in the Slovak society. According to the Summary Report on gender equality situation in Slovakia in 2011 (hereinafter referred to as „Summary Report”), the gender imbalance is caused by various factors such as low level of education in human rights, traditional functioning of family based on gender differences, but also by a lack of services that create balance between work and family life.<sup>5</sup> The unequal treatment can be felt especially in the employment of women, particularly in wage differences. Alleviation and suppression of the problem has been slowed down by the current financial crisis.<sup>6</sup> According to the Summary Report, at the beginning of 2011, the gender pay gap stood nearly at 21%, which means that the average wage of women is only around 80% of the average wage of men

<sup>4</sup> Ibid, Sec. 8, subsection 1: „Discrimination is not different treatment, which is objectively justified by the nature of activities executed in employment, or circumstances under which these activities are carried out, if the extent or manner of such different treatment is appropriate and necessary in respect of these activities or circumstances under which they are carried out.”

B. A serious problem of gender equality represents psychological and physical violence against women. Slovak National Centre for Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as „SNCHR”) in its Report on observance of human rights including observance of the principle of equal treatment in the Slovak Republic in 2011 (hereinafter referred to as „Report of SNCHR”) precisely identifies weaknesses in the system of solutions and prevention of domestic violence.<sup>7</sup>

C. The third sector plays a major role in the struggle for gender equality. Due to the different, yet still the same essence expressing, definition of the term „discrimination” that is available to the general public, Slovak citizens often do not understand what the real content of the term is. This was proved by results of qualitative research conducted by the Institute for Public Affairs in 2008.<sup>8</sup>

D. The Slovak Republic is not a state with strong multicultural representation of nationalities.<sup>9</sup> Despite small ethnic and cultural diversity, disturbance occurs - mostly in relation to the two largest minorities, i.e. Hungarian and Roma.. While Slovak-Hungarian problems are mostly of political nature (Amendment Act no. 270/1995 Coll. on the State Language of the Slovak Republic, Amendment Act no. 40/1993 Coll. on State Citizenship of the Slovak Republic, and others) and the members of both nationalities inhabiting common areas often deny mutual hostility themselves, Slovak-Roma problems are more tense, especially in interpersonal relationships. Irena Bihariová, president of the civic association People against Racism, one of the Slovak NGOs combating racism and discrimination, in the Shadow Report 2010-2011 for ENAR (European Network Against Racism) in view of the situation of the Roma in Slovakia states: „They are the principal target of society's aversion and even hatred and the most frequent victims of discriminatory practices. The so-called 'Roma issue' is frequently abused for scoring populist points virtually across the political spectrum and is a bottomless source of sensational news for the media.”<sup>10</sup> Her arguments are based on real situations, examples and problems, which were investigated also on the international level, such as in the case of sterilization of a Roma woman, in which the European Court of Human Rights ruled that it was done illegally. In early 2010, this civic association monitored 114 sites and groups on the social network Facebook, with the observation that „the most hateful attitudes in online discussions were based on insufficient knowledge of the legal aspects of racism and discrimination, lack of awareness of the problem and poor knowledge of meaning of the terms that were expressed in the discussions.”<sup>11</sup>

E. As a result of low religious diversity (almost all registered churches and religious societies are based on the universal Christian values), there are no significant problems in the coexistence of individual churches and religious communities in Slovakia.<sup>12</sup>

F. Despite the fact that public opinion is changing in favor of LGBT community, as proved by the results of a survey carried out by the Focus agency for organization Initiative Otherness<sup>13</sup>, manifestations of indirect discrimination and hate speech remain. People of the same sex are not allowed to register their partnership in Slovakia. Rainbow pride has been a public manifesto for improving the situation of LGBT rights since 2010. In 2012 the Government of the Slovak Republic (hereinafter referred to as „Government”) approved the establishment of Committee on the rights of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersexual people.

G. According to Amnesty International Annual Report 2012,<sup>14</sup> the major areas of discrimination against Roma are: education, housing, forced sterilization, torture and ill-treatment. In the area of LGBT rights, the amendment of Slovak Labour Code, which extends protection against discrimination by adding prohibition of discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation, is stressed.

1. Family

Reference to the family and marriage can be found in the Constitution, specifically in Art. 41 subsection 1, which states that these two phenomena of human society are protected by law. Part of Slovak legislation is therefore Act no. 36/2005 Coll. On Family and Amendment and Supplementation of Certain Acts (hereinafter referred to as „Family Act”), which above all focuses on relationships between subjects in marriage and family. The Constitution also guarantees right to protection against unlawful interference into family life in Art. 19. Moreover, Slovak Criminal law mentions crimes against the Family and Youth in the second section of the third chapter of Criminal Code no. 300/2005 Coll. as amended (hereinafter referred to as „Criminal Code”), such as abandonment of a child, abduction, corruption of youth, neglect of child support, torment of close or entrusted person and bigamy.

Interpretation of the term „family” is in Family Act derived from the term „marriage”, which is characterized by Slovak law as unique union between a man and a woman, created under certain conditions and circumstances, which do not exclude marriage, for the purpose of family foundation and proper upbringing of children. Family created by marriage like this is considered to be the basic cell of society and it is necessary to universally protect all of its forms.

2. Marriage

Bond of marriage in Slovakia can only exist between a man and a woman. In this union, man and woman are equal in both their rights and duties. The Slovak Republic did not enact any form of registered partnership between persons of the same gender by now. Research conducted by Agency Focus for Civic Association Initiative Otherness, ongoing throughout this year (2012), reflects significant change in the opinion of the Slovak population towards introduction of registered partnerships between persons of same gender, compared to similar research conducted in 2008.<sup>15</sup>

Pursuant to law of the Slovak Republic, the means of creation of marriage are facultative. Based on their voluntary and free decision, engaged couple may get married either by civil or ecclesiastical means, by consonant statement in front of self-regulatory body (Registry Office) or registered body of church or religious society accepted by the state. Other prerequisites are legal capacity, maturity (only on permission of the court it is possible to get married from the 16th year of life), unrelated relations, non-existent marital bond. Monogamy is indirectly enacted in Slovakia, since bigamy is according to Criminal Code punished by imprisonment, lasting up to 2 years. Marriage ends because of death or declared death of one of the spouses or, in reasonable cases, also because of divorce conducted by court on motion of one of the spouses. Court can declare marriage to be invalid or non-existent as well.

Average age of a man entering into marriage in Slovakia was 32,42 years in 2011 (average age of a man entering into his first marriage was 30,28 years). Average age of brides in the same year was 29,34 years, average age of women, who entered into marriage for the first time, was 27,67 years. Recently, trend of increasing average age of men and women entering into marriage is visible.<sup>16</sup>

The data of Statistical Office of the Slovak Republic suggests that divorce rate in Slovakia has been showing increasing tendency and the highest rate was achieved in 2010, when 100 marriages accounted for 49 divorces. Strange phenomenon can be observed in average length of divorced marriages in recent years. While in 1993 it was 10,6 years, in 2009 it increased to 14,4 years.<sup>17</sup> Spokesman of Statistical Office of the Slovak Republic stated gradual increase of average length of marriage.<sup>18</sup>

1. History

In the historical and cultural point of view, children have always been considered to be the most sensitive part of the society, the necessary part of families and under the influence of religion (mostly Christianity) the „gifts of God”. Subordination and obedience to father originated from the patriarchal organization of families. The first state owned orphanage in Slovakia (part of the Hungarian empire) was established by Maria Theresa in 1763, moreover, in 1774 she legislated a compulsory school attendance for children at the age of 6 – 12 regardless of their gender, origin and residence. Orphanages were superseded by children's homes and substitute family custodies. The compulsory school attendance retains, however, nowadays its length is 10 years. Roles of parents in families are becoming more equal and so is the relationship between parent and children themselves. Such examples can be understood as the vindication of continuity of the interest of the society in children.

2. Protection of Children Rights in the Present

The fundamental basis of the protection of children and their right is stipulated in the Art. 41<sup>20</sup> of the Constitution. The Slovak Republic is contracting party of the Convention on the Rights of Child (hereinafter referred to as „CRC”) that is the cornerstone of not only other international documents dealing with protection of rights of children but also Slovak legislation itself. Slovakia has ratified the First Optional Protocol to CRC on the involvement of children in armed conflict, the Second Optional Protocol to CRC on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography and signed the Third Optional Protocol to CRC on a Communications Procedure. As a contracting party, Slovakia submits to the United Nations reports on fulfilment of obligations and on the measures adopted which ensure realization, protection, prevention of breaches and development of rights recognized in CRC. These obligations as well as final recommendations to the last submitted report are included in the National Action Plan for 2009 – 2012, the main task of which is to secure the development of the protection of the rights of a child.

During last years, the Slovak Republic has systematically worked on legislative as well as non-legislative elements of supporting the rights of a child in the meaning of CRC resulting in an encompassment of the principle of the best interests of a child in various domestic legislative codes. For instance, the Criminal Code, Act no. 301/2005 Coll. (hereinafter referred to as „Code of Criminal Procedure”), Act no. 40/1964 Coll. (hereinafter referred to as „Civil Code”), Family Act, Act no. 245/2008 Coll. on Upbringing and Education (hereinafter referred to as „School Act”), Act no. 305/2005 Coll. on Social and Legal Protection of Children and on Social Legal Guardianship and other acts. According to domestic legislation the state provides financial support to families with children.

Non-legislative activities supporting the protection and observance of the rights of child are mostly held under the auspices of the Ministry of Education, Science, Research and Sport of the Slovak Republic (hereinafter referred to as „MESRS SR”) by providing financial grants and subventions.<sup>21</sup>

In an effort to fulfil the obligations arising from CRC, the Committee on Children and Youth was established in March 2011 as the specialized body of the Government's Council for Human Rights, National Minorities and Gender Equity. Its activities are supposed to be, according to the decree of the Government no. 158/2011, secured by the Ministry of Labour, Social Affairs and Family of the Slovak Republic (hereinafter referred to as „MLSAF SR”).

SNCHR established by Act no. 308/1993 Coll. on Establishing the Slovak National Centre for Human Rights observes adhering to human rights and freedoms. Each year it releases a report on the level of protection of human rights in the Slovak Republic, including a special part dealing with the rights of children. According to the last report from 2011, the first contact place for children seeking observance of their rights is the Local Office of Labour, Social Affairs and Family.<sup>22</sup>

The Public Defender of Rights, so-called Ombudsman, protects fundamental rights and freedoms regardless of the age of claimant, therefore children are also allowed to apply for help.

The Centre for International Protection of Children and Youth was established by the MLSAF SR as the state administration body. Its sphere of activity according to Act no. 305/2005 Coll. on Social and Legal Protection of Children and on Social Legal Guardianship refers to execution of international conventions and legal acts of the European Union.

Part of society in relation to children agrees with the opinion that prohibits artificial interruption of pregnancy, presenting the argument that Art. 15 of the Constitution states: „Everyone has the right to life. Human life is worth protection even before birth.”<sup>23</sup> Abortion was legalized by Act no. 73/1986 Coll. on Artificial Interruption of Pregnancy, according to which the abortion can be done up to the 12th week of pregnancy.

The Slovak legislation allows since 2004, when „rescue nests” firstly emerged, to abandon unwanted child at the age of maximum 6 weeks. After placing of the child in the „rescue nest”, a signal to the 24 hour medical emergency office rings out and the employees take care of the child. The aim of „rescue nest” is to eliminate deaths of unwanted new-borns.

Despite all abovementioned activities of national bodies, institutions and organizations in the area of protection of the rights of a child, violations are still arising. One of the last examples is death of a 5 year old girl, whose body was found in an apartment occupied by her mother and step-father. For three years, no state authorities noticed the missing child,

Legal action was brought against the school by the Advisory Centre for Human Rights to the District Court in Prešov. The judge held against the defendant, what caused media and social uproar, because these kinds of problems occur also in other parts of Slovakia. According to the judge's verdict, the activity of the school violates the Anti-Discrimination Act and the school is obliged to eliminate the unlawful situation until the next school year. The school appealed to the Regional Court, however, it upheld the District court's verdict on 30/10/2012.<sup>25</sup>

1. International Treaties

The relationship of the Slovak Republic (hereinafter referred to as „SR”) and international treaties is expressed in the Constitution in Art. 7, subsection 4 and 5 and Art. 154c. According to Art. 7 the validity of international treaties<sup>26</sup> requires approval of the National Council of the Slovak Republic (hereinafter referred to as „NCSR”) before ratification. Taxatively listed types of international treaties<sup>27</sup> shall have precedence over the Slovak law. In approving the international treaty, the consent of the absolute majority of all Members of Parliament<sup>28</sup> shall be required. The Constitutional Court of the Slovak Republic (hereinafter referred to as „the Constitutional Court”) shall decide on conformity of international treaty with the Constitution and constitutional laws on a proposal of the President of the Slovak Republic or the Government. The proposal shall be submitted to the Constitutional Court „International treaties on human rights and fundamental freedoms which the Slovak Republic has ratified and were promulgated in the manner laid down by law before taking effect of this constitutional act, shall be a part of its legal order and shall have precedence over laws if they provide a greater scope of constitutional rights and freedoms.”

The Constitution amended by constitutional act no. 90/2001 Coll., was changed in favour of monist approach.<sup>30</sup> This approach prevails in theory and in practice, yet there are still dualist elements.

2. The Convention on the Rights of the Child

The Convention entered into force on 1/1/1993 since the Slovak Republic has been a sovereign state, however the state became a contracting party without reservations on 28/5/1993. Before 1993, the Convention was valid in the former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic (including the territory of the SR) since February 1991 (signed 30/9/1990, ratified on 7/1/1991).<sup>31 32</sup>

The Convention is one of the fundamental documents on the protection of children's rights in Slovakia, which significantly affects the level of national legislation and children's rights. Since Slovakia is a contracting party, it is bound by the obligations arising from the Convention. The reports<sup>33</sup> of achieving the realization of the obligations are submitted to the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child.

However, so far the proposal, which shall amend the said code, has only been commented on in interdepartmental process.

2 THE LANZAROTE CONVENTION

i. The Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms was signed by the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic on 21/2/1991. The Czech and Slovak Federal Republic are also signatories of the additional protocols: The Convention was ratified by The Federal Assembly of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic on 19/3/1992. In December 1992, before the dissolution of the Federal Republic, NCSR declared that the Slovak Republic would be considered a contracting party of the Convention, including former reservations and declarations made by the Federal Republic, since 1/1/1993, i.e. since the dissolution date.

ii. – v. – vi. – vii. – vii. The Government by its Decree no. 427 on 10/6/2009 agreed on signing of Council of Europe Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse from 25/10/2007 (hereinafter referred to as „Lanzarote Convention”) subject to ratification. The Slovak Republic signed Lanzarote Convention on 9/9/2009 at Council of Europe Conference of Ministers of Justice.

The Government, by its Decree no. 427 concerning the Lanzarote Convention, authorised the Vice President of the Government, the Minister of Justice in cooperation with Minister of Internal Affairs and General Prosecutor to carry out legal analysis of the convention and, if necessary, to submit a proposal for Government meeting regarding amendments necessary for its timely execution, till the second half of 2010 at latest.

After carrying out legal analysis and making necessary legislative arrangements ensuring the execution of Lanzarote Convention, proposal for its ratification was to be submitted to the Government meeting in the second half of 2011. Current Government listed ratification of Lanzarote Convention as one of its aims in National Action Plan for Children for years 2009-2012. Ratification was planned in October 2012. At present

„the Ministry of Justice of the Slovak Republic on the grounds of legal analysis provided by relevant government departments prepares complete legal analysis of the Lanzarote Convention and will submit in October 2012 to the Government meeting a proposal of amendments of the Criminal Code in force to fulfil implementation of relevant provisions of the Lanzarote Convention.”<sup>36</sup>

In the course of the interdepartmental comment procedure on a proposal to sign Lanzarote convention, General Prosecution of the Slovak Republic (hereinafter referred to as „General Prosecution”) had several comments to the „legal prerequisites of the Slovak Republic to precise application of the concerned Convention.”<sup>37</sup>

Objections to compatibility of Criminal Code concerned the following:

- The definition of the term child<sup>38</sup> - according to the Criminal Code a child is not a person younger than 18 years of age if she/he acquired full age by contracting marriage with the consent of the court of justice at the age of 16 years;
- Necessity to amend merits of the crime of corrupting morals<sup>39</sup> in relation to recruiting a child into passive participation in pornographic performances<sup>40</sup> or to witness sexual abuse or sexual activities, even without having to participate<sup>41</sup>;
- Adopting legal regulation concerning the so-called grooming – it is necessary to broaden merits of crimes of sexual abuse<sup>42</sup> and of the criminal offence of manufacturing child pornography;<sup>43</sup>
- Adopting a more strict sanction (in a form of aggravating circumstance) if the crime of sexual exploitation or sexual abuse is committed by a person close to the child.<sup>44</sup>

Objections to compatibility of the Code of Criminal Procedure concerned the following:

- Ensuring criminal proceedings are treated as priority and carried out without undue delay also in cases of protection of children against sexual exploitation and sexual abuse<sup>45</sup>;
- Ensuring that contact of the victims with perpetrators is avoided in the premises of the court or law enforcement agencies<sup>46</sup>;
- Production of videotapes from all interviews with a child made during criminal proceedings concerning sexual criminal offences including sexual exploitation.<sup>47</sup>

Due to aforementioned reasons General Prosecution considered signing of Lanzarote Convention as untimely. General Prosecution proposed discussion of potential amendments of the Criminal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure with legal professionals from relevant branches of law to ensure that changes required by the Lanzarote Convention are compatible with Slovak Criminal law.<sup>48</sup> Additional legal analysis and proposals for amendment of relevant legislation are currently available only on pages of academic volumes.<sup>49</sup>

According to the proposal report of the Lanzarote Convention, it is an international presidential treaty consistent with Art. 7, subsection 4 of the Constitution, so in accordance with Art. 86, paragraph d) of the Constitution, Lanzarote Convention, is before its ratification subject to affirmation by NCSR. Ratification of Lanzarote Convention will follow only after taking necessary legislative measures ensuring its execution.<sup>50</sup>

i. In 1948 there was a communist coup and Communist Party gained dominant position in the country. In 1969 the Constitutional law on Czechoslovak Federation established the Slovak Socialist Republic which, along with Czech Socialist Republic, formed Czechoslovak Socialist Republic (CSSR). In 1989 there was a historically significant coup, the so-called Velvet Revolution which resulted in the democratization of situation in Czechoslovakia and the overthrow of the Communist regime. A period of political, business, economic and ownership changes typical for the transition from a socialist regime to a capitalist one followed. Society focused its attention to the principles of democracy and development of plurality of views that were previously suppressed. Views on the protection of fundamental human rights started to develop also differently. Dissolution of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, and since 1/1/1993 existence of separate states – the Slovak Republic and the Czech Republic, was reflection of growing voices calling for independence of Slovakia.

The Slovak Republic is a republic with democratic constitutional law organization and with parliamentary political system. Unicameral parliament is the supreme legislative body of the state. It has 150 members - deputies elected in democratic elections which are held (apart from the case of early elections) every 4 years. The electoral system for elections to the National Council of Slovak Republic is relative.

President is, along with Prime Minister and the Speaker of the Parliament, supreme constitutional authority in the state. The office of the President is rather formal, the second component of the executive - the government - is dominant. Classical structure of three-way division of power in the state is completed by the system of general courts and the Constitutional Court.

ii. The primary source of regulation of human rights in Slovakia is the Constitution. It was adopted in 1992 as a result of formation of SR and changes made in political and economic system of the state. In the hierarchy of legal regulations it is presented as the fundamental law of the supreme legal force whose basis are the principles of democracy and rule of law. The Constitution, apart from fundamental rights and freedoms stated in the second chapter of the Act, guarantees also political rights, rights of national minorities and ethnic groups, a group of economic, social and cultural rights, the right to protection of the environment and cultural heritage and, last but not least, the right to judicial and other legal protection. The issue of the protection of children's rights is most significant in section five of the Constitution, which specifically in Art. 41 guarantees the right to legal protection of marriage, parenthood and family, the right to special protection of children and minors, equality of children born in and out of wedlock and child care and parental upbringing of children (which is the right of children and their parents). The following Art. 42 guarantees the right to education which is one of the few constitutional rights associated with the obligation of completion of school attendance, which has period determined by special law. The essence and purpose of the right to protection of family life, which can be in broad sense understood as a set overarching several of children's rights enforced in relation to their natural environment, is the protection from unauthorized interference in family life by a public body. Measures directed to active promotion of marriage represent a part of such protection.<sup>51</sup>

Charter of Fundamental Rights and Basic Freedoms is an important document enshrining fundamental rights and freedoms<sup>52</sup>. Despite criticized duplication of domestic law regulating the institute of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms, it remains in force and is an integral part of law and order of SR: „Text of constitutional regulation of fundamental rights and freedoms contained in the Charter is comparable, but not identical with the text of the constitutional regulation of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms that is contained in Chapter II of the Constitution of the Slovak Republic.”<sup>53</sup> Solution for potential problems in the application practice offers Art. 152, subsection 4 of the Constitution which states legal dominance of the Constitution in the interpretative level and thus prevents formation of complications in connection with dual regulation.

Charter of Fundamental Rights and Basic Freedoms also enshrines protection of parenthood and family and children's right to parental upbringing and care by identically expressed wording of the text compared to the Constitution.<sup>54</sup> It can therefore be stated, that the Constitution contains a catalogue of human rights with higher legal force that binds all bodies of the public authority and may be directly applied by courts, while equipped with the Constitutional Court. It can, within its authority, derogate legal regulations and individual decisions of bodies of the public authority and therefore ensures the real application of mentioned catalogue contained in the Constitution.<sup>55</sup>

In relation to legal regulation of fundamental rights and freedoms of international treaties that have been ratified and promulgated in a manner laid down by a law before the Constitution came into effect, SR by its position expressed in the Constitution<sup>56</sup> respects them and gives them precedence over the law provided they guarantee greater scope of constitutional rights and freedoms.

The Constitution and the Charter of Fundamental Rights and Basic Freedoms both state the issue of protection of children's rights only generally, while more concrete description can be found in the legal regulations of lower legal force. International documents enjoy irreplaceable significance in relation to the issue of protection of children's rights. Since 1993, SR is one of the signatory countries of the CRC. Considering the wording of the constitutional text regarding international treaties on human rights and fundamental freedoms, which the legislator grants precedence over the law, provided they have been ratified and promulgated in the manner laid down by law,<sup>57</sup> we can state the leading position of the CRC in legal order of Slovak Republic.

iii.

A. Judiciary. Based on Art. 46 of the Constitution it can be concluded that protection of human rights in Slovakia is either judicial or extra-judicial. „Everyone may claim his or her right by procedures laid down by the law before an independent and impartial court or, in cases provided by a law, before other public authority of the Slovak Republic.”<sup>58</sup> If a citizen believes, that he or she has been deprived of his or her fundamental right or freedom by a decision of a public administrative body, he or she may (in cases provided by law) turn to the court to have the lawfulness of such decision reviewed. Decisions of district courts may be reviewed by courts of higher instance (appeal courts) - regional courts. The Supreme Court of the Slovak Republic is the court of final review. The Constitutional Court which operates as an independent judicial body protecting constitutionality plays a specific role in the field of human rights protection.<sup>59</sup>

The Constitutional Court convenes and decides, pursuant to Art. 127, subsection 1 of the Constitution of the Slovak Republic, upon motions submitted by natural or artificial persons, if complaining against breach of fundamental rights or freedoms, or human rights and fundamental freedoms accruing from international treaty ratified and promulgated in a manner laid down by law, unless the protection of these rights and freedoms does not come under discretion of another court.<sup>60</sup> Natural or artificial person is actively legitimated in filing a motion - that is they have the right to ask the Constitutional Court, within limits of specific constitutional protection, to procure within the complaint procedure the protection of fundamental rights and freedoms derived from the Constitution, or from human rights and fundamental freedoms ensured by international conventions on human rights.

Accordingly, a motion can not be submitted by a natural or artificial person, who complain against violation of fundamental rights and freedoms of another person, and not against the violation of their own rights and freedoms (except for a legal representative or a legal guardian appointed by court, who submits the motion in the name of the ward), and by not having previously fulfilled the condition of filing all possible appeals first. In case of a claimant who is a minor the motion is submitted by his or her legal representative. Representation of a natural person by attorney at law is within this procedure obligatory. If the claimant asks for a court appointed attorney and the conditions for condoning the court fee are met, the Constitutional Court will send the claimant to the Centre of Legal Aid.

The motion has to be submitted in writing and has to contain appropriate requisites as defined by law, list of infringed rights and a specified prayer. In this context it is needed to point out, that the Constitutional Court does not hold, in relation to general courts, higher instance position, so its task is not to examine purely the correctness or legitimacy of appealed verdicts. Its exclusive task is to examine the protection of constitutionally guaranteed rights and freedoms.<sup>61</sup> However, the submission of a motion is not classified as a

Consequently, it examines the violation of fundamental rights that were complained by the claimant, and in case of a positive verdict, it grants the complaint, and according to the circumstances of the case, it may decide on legal solution of protection of the complained rights.<sup>63</sup> There is no possibility of lodging an appeal against a decision of the Constitutional Court.<sup>64</sup>

CRC binds, according to the Article 44, contracting parties to regularly submit reports on the situation of the rights of the child to the United Nations Committee on Rights of the Child to have the report evaluated by its expert. On the basis of regularly submitted reports by Slovak delegation, the Committee on Rights of the Child addresses Slovakia a list of recommendations, that are supposed to implement the CRC more precisely, which also secures higher standard in children care.<sup>65</sup> One of the main points in the 2000 and 2007 final evaluation reports was the establishment of an independent institution for monitoring and securing the rights of the child, however, such an institution has still not been established in Slovakia.

When submitting the application it is necessary for the claimant to fill in all necessary information and to hand over all relevant and related materials. One of the most important competences of SNCHR during proceedings concerning breach of the principle of equal treatment is the legal representation based on the right to an attorney. SNCHR may request information on adherence to human rights obligations from non-governmental organizations that work in the field of human rights and fundamental freedoms as well as the rights of a child, and may manage the process and the extent of the pertinent information provision.

C. The Public Defender of Rights. The Public Defender of Rights has significant competences concerning protection of the rights of children.<sup>67</sup> The institute of Ombudsman<sup>68</sup> was incorporated into the constitutional system of the Slovak Republic by constitutional act<sup>69</sup> coming into effect on 1/1/2002, with its status directly reflected in the Constitution of the Slovak Republic, as „an independent body of the Slovak Republic which, within the scope and as laid down by law, protects basic rights and freedoms of natural and artificial persons in proceedings before public administration bodies and other bodies of public authority, if their conduct, decision-making, or lack of action, is in conflict with the legal order. In cases laid down by law, the Public Defender of Rights may participate in holding the persons working in the public administration bodies accountable, if those persons violated a basic human right or freedom of natural or artificial persons.”<sup>70</sup>

By enacting the constitutional act<sup>71</sup> in 2006 its scope was broadened by the right to submit a motion for commencement of proceeding to the Constitutional Court. In order to submit

Anybody who believes that his fundamental rights and freedoms were infringed contrary to the legal order or principles of a democratic state and the rule of law in relation to the action, decision-making or lack of action of a public administration body can turn to the Public Defender of Rights. Participation of the NCSR in case of wider infringement of rights can be evaluated as a positive aspect.

„If the Public Defender of Rights finds facts indicating that an infringement of the fundamental right and freedom is significant or relates to higher number of persons, he can submit a special report to the National Council. This special report can also contain a proposal for the report to be discussed on the next plenary session of the National Council.”<sup>73</sup>

Its task is to ensure direct execution of international conventions and legal acts of the European Union that define its main tasks in three fundamental areas: enforcement of child support from abroad, wrongful removal or retention of a child, as well as assuring the right of a parent to access his child, and international adoption.<sup>75</sup>

E. *Non-governmental organizations. Another important role in the protection of rights of children is performed by non-governmental organizations that work in fields where due to variety of reasons the state does not operate. One of these organizations is the Children's Fund of the Slovak Republic<sup>76</sup>, established as an independent, apolitical, and volunteer association of citizens.

„The aim of the association is to protect the rights of the child, helping to build ideological, conceptual, and material conditions for health, social, educational and psychological care for children and youth in Slovakia. At the same time it carries out public-beneficial projects, but does not supplement the state's care for children and youth.”<sup>77</sup>

Through projects it draws attention mainly to the protection of rights of problematic, disadvantaged groups of children.

iv. Criminal cases are decided by general courts - district courts and regional courts. The Supreme Court of the Slovak Republic decides appeals against the decisions of these courts. The Specialized Criminal Court is a part of the hierarchy of courts in the Slovak Republic with its local jurisdiction for the entire territory of the Slovak Republic. It acts as a court of first instance and has a status of a regional court. The purpose of its establishment is better specialization and at the same time protection during proceedings concerning corruption offences, since it is breaking local ties that may affect the detection, investigation and possibly the entire proceeding process itself. The creation of the Specialized Criminal Court is bound to the ruling of the Constitutional Court<sup>78</sup> which states that previously existing Special Court was unconstitutional. The Specialized Criminal Court is established as a permanent court that continues in the work of the Special Court. It acts on the matters that fell within the jurisdiction of the Special Court and that have not been lawfully completed to the date of the Special Court's termination. Within its broad material scope falls crime of the first degree murder, deceitful practices in public procurement and public auction, forgery, fraudulent alteration and illicit manufacturing of money and securities as well as some other forms of corruption.

Procedural steps in the procedure against juveniles are regulated by the Code of Criminal Procedure and it is distinguished from the standard procedure by certain specifics that should increase positive educational impact on the juvenile. Since indictment, the law states mandatory defence for juvenile, which lasts until the final outcome of the criminal prosecution is made and the juvenile can not give up this right. If the juvenile has not reached the age of 19 at the time of the main hearing or public meeting, the documents are being delivered not only to a juvenile and his counsel, but also to the state authority for youth care, juvenile's legal guardian, person with whom the juvenile lives in the same household, or appointed guardian. Juvenile's benefit is taken into consideration because it allows the use of the exemption from local jurisdiction. Competent court may delegate the case to the court, in which district the juvenile resides or to the court where the criminal proceedings concerning the juvenile's interests would be most effective.<sup>79</sup> The presence of the juvenile's defence attorney is necessary in the judicial proceeding and the main hearing or public meeting on the plea bargaining can not be held in the absence of the juvenile. The presence of the prosecutor is mandatory at the public meeting as well. The court excludes the public from the main hearing if it protects juvenile's interests. The presiding judge may also order the juvenile to leave the courtroom, if some part of the procedure could have a negative effect on juvenile's moral development. It is characteristic for the of the conclusion of the hearing, that the copy of the verdict is obligatory delivered to the state authority for youth care and to juvenile's legal guardian with whom the juvenile lives in the same household.

The legislator strengthens the juvenile's right to counsel by extending the circle of people who are entitled to make an appeal. The state authority of youth care, the prosecutor, the defence attorney and the legal guardian are all entitled to make an appeal for the juvenile's benefit, even against juvenile's will. The relatives of juvenile in direct line are also entitled to file a complaint against the court ruling for juvenile's benefit. Throughout the entire criminal proceeding, the educational purpose of the process is being monitored. To ensure that this primary purpose will be accomplished, people who are responsible for the investigation, the summary investigation and the decision making process should have life experiences with upbringing of the youth.<sup>80</sup> In accordance with subsection 2, this provision of Sec.347 will not be applied:

a) in the criminal proceedings for offences that were committed by the accused before the age of 18, or for offences that were committed by the accused after the age of 18, if the law for the offence committed after the age of 18 provides the same or more severe punishment, or

b) if there is an indictment until after the age of 18 of the accused.

v. Criminal prosecution against juveniles is regulated by the Criminal Code. Age limit of criminal liability was reduced to 14 years of age. Shift in the age limit of criminal liability is reflection of the current state of juvenile's criminality. Juvenile is any person, who commits a crime after 14th year of age but is not older than 18 years.<sup>81</sup> The exception to this is crime of sexual abuse, where the age limit of criminal liability is set at 15 years of age.<sup>82</sup> To draw criminal liability the law imposes an obligation to thoroughly ascertain the level of intellectual and moral development of the juvenile. Moral development is compulsory checked on juveniles younger than 15 years, whereas concerning juveniles exceeding the age of 15 years only in case there are doubts about mental maturity of the juvenile. Thorough clarification of the level of moral development, control and cognitive abilities of an individual is not only important to choose appropriate measures to remedy the juvenile, but also to determine whether the offence committed is of small relevance, which would result in juvenile not being criminally liable.

During punishments of juveniles emphasis is primarily put on educational nature of the sentence, and therefore possibilities of taking a juvenile into custody are limited and applied only when necessary. „Even if there are grounds for detention, accused juvenile may be taken into custody only if the purpose of custody cannot be reached otherwise.”<sup>83</sup> The purpose of custody can be reached by measures that substitute custody, for example by assuming responsibility for correction of accused juvenile by an association of citizens or trustworthy person, alternatively by imposing proportionate obligations and restrictions, warranty, cash guarantee, by promise of the accused or supervision of probation or mediation officer, which in practice seems as the most effective. Educational purpose of juvenile's punishment is emphasized through obligation of law enforcement agencies or courts to examine in every stage of criminal proceeding, whether the purpose of custody cannot be replaced by one of abovementioned measures.<sup>84</sup> Court is to some extent limited when choosing the type of punishment for juvenile, and may impose punishment of community service work, pecuniary penalty, forfeiture of a thing, prohibition to undertake certain activities, expulsion and imprisonment.

Brief overview of statistics:<sup>85</sup>

In 2011, number of convicted juveniles was 1711, the number of acts committed was 2413. Unconditional sentence of imprisonment was imposed in 148 cases, conditional imprisonment in 1029 cases, pecuniary penalty in 17 cases and in 236 cases other type of punishment was inflicted. <sup>86</sup>The percentage of juveniles in 2011 to the proportion of the total number of lawfully convicted persons was 5, 68 %. This is an increase of 0, 07 % compared to 2010 when it was 5, 61%.

From deflections in criminal proceedings in 2011 were used: conditional suspension of criminal proceedings (523x), discontinuance of prosecution (219x) and suspension of criminal proceedings (207x). Prosecutors concluded settlement with 139 juveniles accused and courts approved 756 plea bargainings of juveniles.

2 SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW

2.1 Sexual Abuse

i. The Criminal Code, in general part or in particular part, neither specifies nor gives interpretation of the term „sexual activities“. The law uses the term „coitus”<sup>87</sup> and also operates with terms oral sex, anal sex, other sexual acts and other sexual abuse. Interpretation of the abovementioned terms is reserved by legislator for court jurisdiction. Individual activities fulfil the merits of different crimes.

<sup>87</sup> R 6/1984: „Coitus must be considered the conjugation of genitals of man and woman, while by conjugation the coitus is accomplished. According to judicial practice, even if male penis is only partially inserted into the female genital tract, the act is considered to be accomplished. The hymen does not have to be breached.”

In practice, rape will be considered to be coitus and will be criminalized as sexual abuse - coitus with person under the age of 15 years. Under „other type of sexual abuse only more intensive interventions into sexual sphere are considered, e.g. palpation of genitals, breasts, osculation of genitals. One-time momentary touches through clothes do not apparently fulfil the material element of the crime.”<sup>88</sup>

Any act aimed at reaching sexual satisfaction or at least achieving excitement of the offender is considered as sexual abuse. The act is committed also if the offender does not reach the satisfaction. „Other type of sexual abuse” can be committed also by a person of the same gender, while „coitus” can be committed only on the person of different sex. The law does not distinguish the way by which the crime of sexual abuse is committed. „Coitus” is put on the same level as well as „other type of sexual abuse”.

ii. The term „intention/intentional” is defined in Sec.15 of the Criminal Code: „Crime is committed intentionally if the offender a) wanted to breach or to jeopardize the interest protected by this Act in a manner stated in this Act, or b) knew, that his/her act can cause such breach or jeopardy, and in the event that he/she causes it, was familiar with it.”

There is a lack of express requirement of intention in merits of sexual abuse. However, in compliance with Sec.17 of the Criminal Code: „If this Act does not expressly stipulate that negligent culpability is sufficient, intentional culpability is necessary for criminal liability of an act committed by natural person.”<sup>89</sup> Therefore, for committing the crime of sexual abuse culpability in the form of intention will be necessary.

Anyone, who fulfils the merits of the crime and is criminally liable, is also liable for committing the crime of sexual abuse. Liable is a sane person, who has reached the respective age for criminal liability. General age for criminal liability in Slovak Republic is 14 years. The legislator shifted the age limit for criminal liability in case of crime of sexual abuse to 15 years.

iii. There is a lack of regulation relating to sexual activities between persons under the age of 18 in the Criminal Code. Under Sec. 211 it is only possible to affect persons enabling them this conduct. In compliance with this provision, criminally liable is any person who, even negligently, exposes a person under the age of 18 years to the risk of debauchery by enticing such person to leading lewd or immoral life or enables such person to lead lewd or immoral life.

iv. Acts, during which minors are sexually abused by use of violence, by exploiting their disabilities or by threat of violence can be sanctioned in accordance with „terms of specific qualification” (Sec. 138-143 of the Criminal Code) and related merits of such crime. Where particular qualification criteria are fulfilled, the law allows to utilise a stricter penalty compared to the one imposed for fulfilling basic merits of a crime. For instance, the law allows to punish a perpetrator who commits the crime of sexual abuse by imprisonment of 7 to 12 years (Sec. 201, subsection 2), if this act is committed in a more serious manner, on a protected person, or because of specific motive (e.g. for hire, act of revenge, sexually motivated criminal offence). Violence or the threat of violence is considered to be „more serious manner of action” according to the law (Sec. 138, par. d). Section „Interpretation of terms” of the Criminal Code describes when is the crime committed by use of violence, or the threat of violence, as following:

„Crime is committed by violence if the offender uses physical violence against physical integrity of another person, or if it is committed against a person whom the offender induced into a state of helplessness by deception, or if the offender used violence against a thing of another.”<sup>90</sup> Furthermore „it is not a requirement that the person injured resists, e.g. when he/she is aware of physical prevalence of the perpetrator and due to the fear of more violence rather does not resist and fully subjects to the will of the perpetrator.”<sup>91</sup>

According to the Criminal Code, a sick person likewise falls into the category of protected persons. A sick person is defined by Sec. 127, subsection 6 as following:

„For the purposes of this Act, a sick person shall mean a person who suffers from a physical or a mental illness, even if temporary, at the time of the commission of the offence, regardless of whether such a person is temporary unfit for work, his fitness for work has been altered, is disabled or heavily disabled, while an intensity of such sickness or handicap corresponds to grievous bodily harm.”

v. The Criminal Code criminalises acts, where sexual intercourse occurs between relatives in the direct line or between siblings. Merits of crime of sexual intercourse between relatives can be found under Sec. 203 of the Criminal Code. This „provision protects moral principles of the society, which does not permit sexual intercourse between the closest relatives due to the scientifically proved knowledge about the biological threat to the offspring in the form of degeneration.”<sup>92</sup> Nevertheless, this provision only criminalises the „sexual intercourse” and does not deal with „other sexual acts” or „other methods of sexual abuse”. This, however, does not exclude the supportive use of Sec. 201 (assuming that the person is less than 15 years old). Having regard to the foregoing, it shall be understood, that in order to use these provision of the Criminal Code in a correct and legal manner, relatives are to be understood as persons in the direct relative line only, thus relations between the ancestors and the offspring, as well as relations between siblings (brother - sister). Such relation is not established in adoption cases.

vi. Exploitation of another’s dependency is considered, according to Sec. 138 of the Criminal Code, to be an act of a more serious manner. A dependent person is, in accordance with Sec. 127, a person who depends on the perpetrator for his/her nutrition, education, material or other care or keeping. If the crime is committed against a protected person, including dependent person, custodial penalty increases. Persons under 18 years of age, who are entrusted to the perpetrator’s care, supervision, or if they are dependent persons, are explicitly protected by Sec. 202 of the Act.

E.g. protection of children in institutes for execution of protective upbringing and institutional care is secured by district and regional prosecutors, who, within their competence, carry out periodic reviews in such institutes. Among other things, complaints and suggestions of children are reviewed, as they may use boxes for anonymous queries for the prosecutor. The prosecutors also can lead interviews with them without the presence of a third person.<sup>93</sup>

vii. The Slovak Republic is a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings. The Slovak Republic became a signatory on 19/5/2006, ratified the convention on 27/3/2007 and on 1/2/2008 it entered into force. One of the measures, which were adopted along with this convention to fight trafficking in human beings was a program called Berlin Proceedings and the National Program on the Fight Against Human Trafficking for the years 2011-2014.

viii. The term „child prostitution” is not defined in the Criminal Code. Prostitution is a sexual intercourse with another person or persons for remuneration. A sexual intercourse is to be understood as any manner of satisfaction of a sexual instinct on another person’s body, whether of the same or the opposite sex. It is, thus, a wider expression than coitus. Therefore, it includes a direct interconnection of genitals (coitus), but also oral sex, anal sex, various types of the so-called erotic massages practiced on genitals, use of vibrators or other apparatus used for satisfaction of sexual instinct etc. Such act leads to sexual satisfaction of another person, but it does not necessarily matter, whether such satisfaction is in that particular case reached.<sup>94</sup> Within the framework of national legislation, it is possible to find the definition of child prostitution under Article 2 of the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, which was adopted and opened for adoption followed by ratification by a resolution of the General Assembly on 25/5/2000 and which entered into force on 18/1/2002. Article 2 of this Convention reads as follows: „Child prostitution means the use of a child in sexual activities for remuneration or any other form of consideration.”<sup>95</sup>

ix. Criminal regulation penalizes both of these subjects. According to Sec. 201 of the Criminal Code everyone, who commits coitus with a person younger than age of 15 years, or who that person sexually abuses any other way, will be punished with sanction of imprisonment of 3 years to 10 years (user). For the purpose of punishing the recruiter, Sec. 367 will be used, which regulates the crime of procuring:

(1) Any person who hires, solicits, seduces, exploits, elicits or offers another to engage in prostitution, or who profits from the proceeds of someone else’s prostitution, or enables prostitution to be practised, shall be liable to a term of imprisonment of up to 3 years.

2.3 Child pornography

x. Slovak Republic acceded to this Convention and signed it on 4/2/2005. It has been ratified on 8/1/2008.<sup>96</sup>

xi. According to the Sec. 132, subsection 3 of the Criminal Code the definition of child pornography reads as: For the purposes of this Act, child pornography shall mean pornographic material that visually depicts coitus, different act of sexual intercourse, or other conduct similar to sexual intercourse with a child, or naked parts of the child's body, and that it is designed to gratify sexual desire of another. The definition given in the Criminal Code does not exactly copy the definition of child pornography mentioned in Lanzarote Convention, but it is compatible to such extent that objective side of this crime is specified enough and thus taxatively defines actions, whose basic characteristic is abuse of a child. In Slovak legal system only pornography, which depicts a real child is penalized. Computer-generated child or for example modified pictures of children from animated fairy-tales are not penalized.

The Criminal Code differentiates between gaining of child to participate in pornographic performances and coercing a child into participation in pornographic performances. In basic merits mentioned in Sec. 368, subsection 1, the Criminal Code enables to impose sentence to the offender, who exploits, elicits, offers or otherwise abuses a child for manufacturing child pornography, or enables such abuse of a child, or otherwise participates in such manufacturing a term of imprisonment of 4 to 10 years. But in qualified merits mentioned in Sec. 368, subsection 2, the Criminal Code enables to impose sanction to the offender if he commits the offence referred to in Sec. 368, subsection 1 by more serious manner a term of imprisonment of 7 to 12 years. Acting in more serious manner is specified in Sec. 138 as follows:

Acting in a more serious manner shall mean that a criminal offence was committed

- a) with the use of a weapon, except for the criminal offences of the first degree murder pursuant to Sec. 144, the second degree murder pursuant to Sec. 145, killing pursuant to Sec. 147 and Sec. 148, homicide pursuant to Sec. 149, bodily harm pursuant to Sec. 155, Sec. 156 and Sec. 157,
- b) for a longer period of time,
- c) in a brutal and agonising manner,
- d) with the use of violence, the threat of imminent violence or the threat of other grievous harm,
- e) by housebreaking,
- f) by deception,
- g) taking advantage of another person's helplessness, inexperience, dependency or subordination,
- h) by breaching an important duty prescribed by law and connected with his employment, position or function,
- i) by an organised group, or
- j) against several persons.

xii. According to the Article 20 of the Lanzarote Convention concerning child pornography:

Each Party shall take necessary legislative or other measures to ensure that the following intentional conduct, when committed without right, is criminalised:

- a. producing child pornography;
- b. offering or making child pornography available;

- c. distributing or transmitting child pornography;
- d. procuring child pornography for oneself or for another person;
- e. possessing of child pornography;
- f. knowingly obtaining access, through information and communication technologies, to child pornography.<sup>97</sup>

The Criminal Code prosecutes:

Sec. 368 - Manufacturing of Child Pornography:

- (1) Any person who exploits, elicits, offers or otherwise abuses a child for manufacturing child pornography, or enables such abuse of a child, or otherwise participates in such manufacturing, shall be liable to a term of imprisonment of 4 to 10 years.
- (2) The offender shall be liable to a term of imprisonment of 7 to 12 years if he commits the offence referred to in subsection 1
  - a) against a child under 12 years of age,
  - b) acting in a more serious manner, or
  - c) in public.

Sec. 369 - Dissemination of Child Pornography

- (1) Any person who disseminates, transports, procures, makes accessible or otherwise puts into distribution child pornography shall be liable to a term of imprisonment of 1 to 5 years.

Sec. 370 - Possession of Child Pornography

Any person who has child pornography in his possession shall be liable to a term of imprisonment of up to 2 years.

Slovak legislation is fully in accordance with the Article 20 (1,a-e) of the Lanzarote Convention. The only insufficiency that can be found is in the paragraph f, that aims to avoid for children to become victims of child pornography distributed through information or communication technologies, for example on the Internet. One way to prevent distribution of child pornography on the Internet is to block websites with unlawful content, in our case with child pornography. However, we find that neither in Slovakia, nor in the EU, there is no direct legislation that would specifically define duties of operators in this regard.

xiii. Many experts believe that Slovakia is missing an effective control mechanism, by which it would be more effective to fight against child pornography, that is to increase the protection of children against sexual and other abuse. It is therefore said, that ratification of the Lanzarote Convention at our territory, could help to improve this situation, because it offers in its provisions a platform for better and more effective control.

Regarding the exception according to the Article 20(4), in our legislation there is no particular provision that would penalize access to the child pornography through the means of communication technologies, such as the Internet. Operators regulate the situation mainly through their self-regulatory initiatives. In 2009, the three biggest Slovak operators agreed upon blocking of unlawful websites containing child pornography in pursuance of a black list provided by the Internet Watch Foundation – renowned international organization monitoring the spreading of internet paedophilia. The company O2 Telefónica also established a nonstop helpline with phone number 0800 500 500, or consultations by sending an e-mail to potrebujem@pomoc.sk. Orange also gives its clients an opportunity to warn about a website with content inappropriate for children and youth through an online form on the website www.orange.sk or costumer line 905.<sup>98</sup> Other protective measures include for example Stopline: „National centre for reporting unlawful content or activity on the Internet that could endanger children and youth. Suggestions in the centre are analysed by specialists, who send suspicious websites from Slovakia for verification to the Police Force.”<sup>99</sup>

The conditions of distribution of audiovisual works are governed by the Act no. 343/2007 Coll. on the Conditions of Registration, Public Distribution and Preservation of Audiovisual Works, Multimedia Works and Phonograms of Artistic Performances including Amendments and Supplements to certain other acts (Audiovisual Act) as amended. It also regulates protection of minors against distribution of works with pornographic character that is ensured by uniform labelling system of works by age suitability, in respect of its inaccessibility or inadequacy for minors. According to Sec. 20 of the Act no. 308/2000 Coll. on Broadcasting and Retransmission and on Amendments of the Act no. 195/2000 Coll. on Telecommunications, the provider of audiovisual media services is on request obliged to ensure, that this service and all of its elements, which can impair the physical, mental or moral development of minors, especially those that contain pornography or coarse unjustified violence, were available only in such way, that minors can not under normal circumstances hear or see this service on request and all of its elements. The broadcaster of a television programme service and the provider of audiovisual media service are on request obliged to establish and exercise an uniform labelling system stated by a special act – that is the Act no. 343/2007 Coll. The Criminal Code in Sec. 372 persecutes a person who exhibits or otherwise makes pornography accessible to persons under 18 years of age in a place accessible to such persons. It must be expressly stated on the website, that its content is not intended for persons younger than 18 years.

2.4 Corruption of Children

xv. State criminalizes an intentional act that exposes a child to pornography. Such conduct is defined by the Criminal Code as corrupting morals and it is regulated in Sec. 371 (so-called hard pornography) and in Sec. 372 (so-called simple - any - pornography). Corrupting the morals of the youth (Sec. 211) may also be used. In Sec. 372 it is stated:

(1) Any person who

- a) offers, surrenders or makes pornography accessible to a person under 18 years of age, or
- b) exhibits or otherwise makes pornography accessible to persons under 18 years of age in a place accessible to such persons shall be liable to a term of imprisonment of up to 2 years.

Cases of acts covered by Sec. 372, subsection 1, that involve the use of fraudulent promises, incentives and coercion, can be found in the Criminal Code as a qualified merits of the crime of corrupting morals, referred to in Sec. 372, subsection 2. Consequence of such conduct will be increased custodial penalty, which will vary from 1 to 5 years.

2.5 Solicitation of Children for Sexual Purposes

xvi. The term „solicitation of children for sexual purposes” as defined in the Lanzarote Convention, can not be found in the current Slovak Criminal Code. It is not defined as a separate crime. Offender of „grooming” or „cyber grooming” can commit following offences by his conduct:<sup>100</sup>

- (1) Trafficking in Human Beings (Sec. 179 of the Criminal Code) – in subsection 2 imprisonment from 4 to 10 years.
- (2) Restriction of personal freedom (Sec. 183 of the Criminal Code) – in subsection 1 imprisonment from 6 months to 3 years.
- (3) Extortion (Sec. 189 of The Criminal Code) – in subsection 1 imprisonment from 2 to 6 years.
- (4) Sexual Abuse (Sec. 201 of the Criminal Code) – in subsection 1 imprisonment from 3 to 10 years.
- (5) Manufacturing of Child Pornography (Sec. 368 of the Criminal Code) – in subsection 1 imprisonment from 4 to 10 years.
- (6) Serious Threats (Sec. 360 of the Criminal Code) – in subsection 1 imprisonment up to 1 year.
- (7) Dangerous Pursuit (Sec. 360a of the Criminal Code) – in subsection 1 imprisonment of up to 1 year.
- (8) Corrupting Morals of Youth (Sec. 211 of the Criminal Code) – in subsection 1 imprisonment of up to 2 years.
- (9) Corrupting Morals (Sec. 371 of the Criminal Code) – in subsection 1 imprisonment of up to 2 years.

Due to the lack of legal regulation of „grooming” in the Slovak Republic, one of the most effective means in combat against this expanding type of criminality is effective prevention.

xvii. Aiding and abetting (resp. help) are both subsumed, according to the Criminal Code, under participation in a crime. A person may be a participant in a completed crime, but for criminal liability preparation of a crime is also sufficient. Abettor is a person who instigated another person to commit a criminal offence.<sup>102</sup> The person, who assisted another person in committing a crime, particularly by procuring the means, removing the obstacles, providing an advice, strengthening the determination, making a promise of post crime assistance, is considered to be an aider.<sup>103</sup> Participation in any kind of intentional crime in the form of abetting however requires that the offender commits the crime, or at least tries to commit it under the influence of instruction.<sup>104</sup> Unless the Criminal Code states otherwise, the criminal liability of a participant (abettor, aider) shall be governed by the same provisions as the criminal liability of an offender.<sup>105</sup>

An attempt (to commit a crime) is a general form of crime and the offender has criminal liability for it even though he/she has not fulfilled all the elements of merits of certain crime.<sup>106</sup> Under valid Criminal Code attempted crime is punished by the same custodial penalty as the completed crime.<sup>107</sup>

xviii. In the Slovak Republic the main instrument for punishing artificial persons<sup>108</sup> (hereinafter referred to as „AP”) for unlawful acting is administrative law<sup>109</sup>. Within the administrative law we distinguish specific merits of administrative offences which can be committed only by artificial person<sup>110</sup> and not by its employees, members and so on. Their breach of legal obligation is attributed to AP. Culpability is not an aspect of administrative offence of AP. It is sufficient that the AP has failed to make every effort to prevent the breach of legal obligation, which may be required of it and enforced. Administrative offences of AP are based on objective, absolute liability. The most common sanction for these offences is high financial fine. Some acts also provide other kinds of sanctions, such as forfeiture of a thing<sup>111</sup> or submission for suspension or dissolution of trading certificate<sup>112</sup>. Administrative offences are judged in administrative proceedings by administrative authorities (unless other acts state otherwise), while the principle of officiality applies concerning the initiation of the proceedings. AP can lead disciplinary proceedings against subordinate individuals.<sup>113</sup>

Under Sec. 6 of the Act no. 372/1990 Coll. on Offences AP can not commit an offence, since it states that „for breach of a legal obligation imposed on a artificial person under this Act is liable a person who acts for the artificial person or should have acted, and in case of acting on a order, a person who gave the order.”

xix. Attempts to introduction of criminal liability of AP go back to 2004, when the recodification of criminal law was prepared. The Government's bill regulating liability of AP, which should have established a possibility to impose punishments and protective measures as well, was not successful even after submission in 2005. Recodified Criminal Code entered into force without legal regulation of criminal liability of AP and enforcement of this regulation failed also during drafted amendments in 2006. Bill drafted by Ministry of Justice of the Slovak Republic in 2008 contained concept of „false” liability of AP, but the Government did not approved this material. In 2010 NCSR agreed with imposing quasi-criminal sanctions on AP and thus false liability of AP was brought into Slovak legal order.

What is the reason of reluctance of Slovak law to accept criminal liability of AP? Frequent objection is that AP do not have their own will and without the will guilt can not exist, and without the guilt there is no criminal liability. It was further pointed out that the concept of punishment is incompatible, which in addition of the purpose of protection also contains an element of retribution. Punishment of AP sanctions also innocent members (e.g. employees) of the AP. Violation of the principle ne bis in idem was also criticized, since, in accordance with administrative law, the imposition of fine does not effect criminal liability of AP or its employees. Furthermore, there are concerns that criminal liability of AP will be abused to discredit competitive AP.<sup>115</sup> Therefore, the legal regulation of criminal liability of AP was result of implementation of recommendations of international community or groupings of states (the European Union, OECD, the Council of Europe), rather than result of natural development of domestic law, which recognizes the principle societas deliquere non potest. There was particular requirement to recognize judgements of criminal nature of foreign authorities in matters of monetary penalties and forfeiture of property of AP by the authorities of the Slovak Republic. By not imposing criminal liability of AP an unreasonable disproportion would arise, resulting in the fact that execution of sanctions of criminal nature against AP could only take place if it was imposed by foreign authority. This justified the need to introduce execution of sanctions of criminal nature against AP not only by foreign, but also by Slovak authorities.

The Act no. 224/2010 Coll. introduces false criminal liability of AP. As of 1/9/2010, when an amendment of the Criminal Code entered into force, it is possible to sanction AP by instruments of criminal law, but not by direct punishments, only by protective measures. Particular natural person can be prosecuted as an individual person, e. g. employee of AP, if culpability is proved. Even though the liability of AP is applicable, during criminal proceedings the culpability of natural person is also investigated.

Despite the fact that the Slovak Republic is bound by several international regulations which establish wider scale of sanctions against AP (such as injunction of judicial supervision, judicial order to liquidation), the Criminal Code provides only two protective measures - seizure of monetary sum (Sec. 83a) and seizure of property (Sec. 83). Explanatory report does not exclude introduction of other protective measures depending on practice and further development of the legislation.

A. *Seizure of Monetary Sum. Seizure of monetary sum is facultative protective measure. The court can impose it on AP, if the crime was committed in accordance with:

- exercising the right to represent this AP;
- exercising the right to adopt decisions on behalf of this AP;
- exercising the right to exercise control within this AP or
- with neglect of oversight or due care in this AP.

The Act does not distinguish between exercising of the right (or more precisely between neglect of oversight) by persons with authority to act and common employees. However, the explanatory report conditions prosecutor's motion to impose protective measure upon finding, that: „the supervision and control authorities neglected the supervision and control and consequently crime was committed by persons subordinated to artificial person or the authorities (fulfilling representing, decision and control tasks) committed the crime.“

An attempt to commit a crime or participation in a crime is sufficient for imposition of protective measure. Artificial persons with bankruptcy immunity are excluded from the seizure of monetary sum and also cases, in which by the execution of protective measure the property of state or the European Union, foreign state's body or international organisation of public law would be affected. Furthermore, it is not possible to impose it in the event of expiration of criminality of offence by statute of limitations or as a result of effective regret.

The amount of seized monetary sum can range from 800 Euro to 1 660 000 Euro. To determine the amount, the court takes into account the severity of committed crime, the scope of the crime, obtained profit, caused damage, circumstances of commitment of the crime and consequences for artificial person.

B. *Seizure of Property. The seizure of property is imposed by the court in connection with the same crimes as in the event of seizure of monetary sum. However, the condition is that AP acquired the property (or a part of it) by committing the crime or that AP gained income from criminal activity. Unlike the seizure of the monetary sum, which is imposed by the court facultatively, seizure of property is imposed obligatory. For imposition of seizure of property, attempt to commit a crime or participation in a crime, which is defined in Sec. 58, subsection 2, of the Criminal Code, is sufficient. This applies e.g. to the crime of manufacturing of child pornography, the crime of trafficking in children and other.

The same rules apply in the event of seizure of property as in the event of seizure of monetary sum, but the law extends the impossibility to impose the seizure of the property for liberation reasons. If it is possible to ensure the protection of the society without the seizure of AP's property, the court does not impose the seizure of the property, with respect to severity of committed crime, the scope of the crime, obtained profit, caused damage, circumstances of commitment of the crime, consequences for AP or other important public interest. In this case however, the court imposes a protective measure of seizure of monetary sum to AP. Important public interest as liberation reason is according to the explanatory report appropriate in cases when the imposition and execution of protective measure of seizure of property could cause the liquidation of substantial amount of jobs etc.

C. Imposition of Protective Measures on Artificial Persons. Prosecutor can file a motion for imposition of protective measure by seizure of monetary sum or by seizure of property within the indictment or separately<sup>116</sup>, because the liability of AP should not be connected with determination of liability of natural person<sup>117</sup>. The court is not bound by prosecutor's motion, concerning the type of protective measure and the amount of monetary sum. The Code of Criminal Procedure enables to impose the seizure of monetary sum and seizure of property also without the prosecutor's motion (Sec. 289, subsection 1 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

The seizure of monetary sum and seizure of the property can not be imposed simultaneously. Paid or recovered monetary sum or seized property fall to state, if the court does not decide otherwise, on the basis of announced international treaty, by which the Slovak Republic is bound.<sup>118</sup> In the event of merger, fusion or split of the AP, the court imposes the seizure of monetary sum or seizure of property to legal successor of AP that ceased to exist.

As the Slovak Republic chose the path of an indirect criminal liability, AP does not have the status of person charged with a crime, but it has „weaker” status of person involved<sup>119</sup>, however this shortcoming was compensated by extension of rights given to the involved person in criminal proceeding<sup>120</sup>.

Current regulation of indirect criminal liability of companies is met with sceptical views of most of the authors. It is considered to be a „half solution, which had to primarily satisfy the obligations of the Slovak Republic resulting from international conventions, while the result is in practice hardly applicable regulation.”<sup>121</sup>

xx. The Civil Code states, in its general liability clause, that everyone, including artificial persons, is liable for damage caused by breach of legal obligation. Culpable conduct of AP is culpable conduct of its statutory bodies, legal representatives, employees or members and other persons, who followed instructions of AP and were entitled to act on its behalf (e.g. based on authorization). These people may have caused the damage, but AP is liable. Liability of employee is, according to labour regulations, not affected, and the employer may apply employment sanction against him.<sup>122</sup> AP has the opportunity to prove lack of culpability on the part of its employees or members and thus exempt itself from liability for damages caused.

Prequisitions for AP's liability are:

- a) damage caused illegally by those used by AP in its activity, resp. chosen to carry out its activity (culpa in eligendo);
- b) the fact that the damage occurred in AP's activity. Within the framework of AP's activities is job performance, fulfilment of tasks relating to employment, operations directly related to it, as well as other activities with local, temporal and material relation to AP's activities.

The provision concerning general liability for damage caused may be used for accountability ex contractu as well as ex delicto, if particular case of damage caused is not covered by any other provision of the Civil Code on damages, which states specific conditions for liability for

xxi. When assessing aggravating circumstances according to the Criminal Code, it is necessary to differentiate between aggravating circumstances in Sec. 37 and qualified merits of individual crimes, for which there is higher custodial penalty.

Sec. 37 contains 13 circumstances, which are considered to be aggravating:

- a) the offender has committed the crime due to a particularly despicable reason,
- b) the offender has committed the crime as a retaliation against another person who, in dealing with the offender, fulfilled his obligations prescribed by law or another generally binding legal regulation, in particular against a pedagogic employee or technical employee,
- c) the offender has committed the crime to prevent or obstruct the exercise of another person's fundamental rights and freedoms, or to facilitate or cover up another crime,
- d) the offender has committed the crime during a natural disaster or another extreme event seriously endangering the life or health of people, other fundamental rights and freedoms, constitutional system, property, public order or morality,
- e) the offender has abused his employment, occupation, function or position to obtain unlawful or disproportionate advantage,
- f) the offender has committed the crime publicly,
- g) the offender has committed the crime in a place, which enjoys special protection under a generally binding legal regulation, in particular in the house or flat of another person,
- h) the offender has committed several crimes,
- i) the offender has used a person, who is not criminally liable to commit the crime,
- j) the offender has lured a juvenile to commit the crime,
- k) the offender has committed the crime as its organiser,
- l) the offender has committed the crime in association with foreign authority or foreign official, or

m) the offender was already convicted of a crime; the court, considering the nature of previous conviction, may decide not to consider it as an aggravating circumstance.

The significance of such legislation lies in the obligation „of the court to take into account, when determining the sentence, the rate and degree of severity of mitigating and aggravating circumstances.”<sup>123</sup> Therefore, these circumstances are assessed when the sentence is determined. In situations where aggravating circumstances outweigh the mitigating circumstances, minimum sentence increases by one-third, in cases when mitigating circumstances outweigh aggravating circumstances, maximum sentence is reduced by one-third.<sup>124</sup> In cases of individual crimes the situation is dealt with by qualified merits, where more serious manner of action or result of the crime is reflected and custodial penalty is appropriately increased.

A. Sexual Abuse. Merits of the crime of sexual abuse is defined in subsection 1 of Sec. 201 of Criminal Code as follows: „Any person who has coitus with a person under 15 years of age, or who subjects such person to other sexual abuse.” Following subsections define qualified merits for which higher custodial penalty is imposed.

First qualified merits in the case of sexual abuse are, when the crime was committed in a more serious manner; on a protected person or with a specific motive. Individual circumstances which may be regarded as acting in a more serious manner can be divided into 3 categories:

1. circumstances, which ease the perpetration of crime – e.g. use of weapon; housebreaking; or deception;
2. those that harm injured party in a greater degree – e.g. for a longer period of time or in an agonizing manner;
3. those that increase seriousness of the act – e.g. use of violence, threat of imminent violence or the threat of other grievous harm; taking advantage of distress, other persons inexperience, dependency or subordination or breaching of important duty prescribed by the law concerning offender's employment; position or function, or imposed on the offender by law, organised group, on several persons.<sup>125</sup>

Definition of the term protected persons is a sum of persons which are provided with increased protection with regard to their social status or increased vulnerability. According to Sec. 139 of Criminal Code, child is included. Specific motive of perpetrator is described in Sec. 140 of Criminal Code. It includes cases when crime was committed as a felony for hire; as a form of revenge; with the intention to facilitate or cover up another crime; with intention to commit the crime of terrorism; because of national, ethnic or racial hate; with intention to publicly incite violence or hatred against group of persons or an individual for their affiliation to race, nation, nationality, colour of skin, ethnic group, family origin or religion if it constitutes a pretext for threatening on the aforementioned grounds or of sexual motive. Within the sexual motive „the motion to commit the crime is in this case sexual satisfaction or sexual excitement.”<sup>126</sup> However, in the case of here listed crimes sexual motive is not viewed as a special sort of motive since it is implied in the definition of these crimes.

Second qualified merits are applied if by committing of a grievous bodily harm was caused, and the last case, for which custodial penalty of 15 to 20 years is imposed is, if death of a person was caused by sexual abuse or if this crime was committed during emergency situation.

Basic merits of Sec. 202 protect a person under 18 years of age, which was incited to extramarital coitus or otherwise sexually abused by the perpetrator for reward or, if such a person has been placed under his care or custody or has been dependent on him. Acting in a more serious manner is if the crime was committed against a person under 18 years of age who was forced to such, due to obedience, pressure or threat.

B. Child prostitution. It is based on Sec. 367 - procuring and soliciting prostitution. Grounds that form qualified merits, and constitute increase of custodial penalty, can be divided into the following:

- 1) first ground is based on acting in a more serious manner, whereby the same individual circumstances are applied as in the case of sexual abuse;
- 2) second ground is if the crime was committed against a protected person;

- 3) third ground, providing the perpetrator obtains substantial benefit for himself or another; or as a member of dangerous grouping; or against a person under 15 years of age;
- 4) fourth ground - in case grievous bodily harm or death was caused.

C. Child pornography. In the case of production of child pornography following grounds constitute increase of custodial penalty:<sup>127</sup>

- a) act was committed against a child under 12 years of age; acting in a serious manner; or in public;
- b) perpetrator causes grievous bodily harm or death; or obtains substantial benefit by his actions;
- c) perpetrator causes grievous bodily harm or death to several persons; obtains large-scale benefit; or acts as a member of dangerous grouping.

In case of distribution of child pornography legal regulation is similar:

- a) act is committed in more serious manner; or in public;
- b) perpetrator obtains substantial benefit;
- c) perpetrator obtains large-scale benefit.

In case of possession of child pornography only basic merits of crime are applied.

D. Sexual corruption. Slovak criminal law lacks definition of a separate crime that would punish efforts to either meet a child with the intention of sexual intercourse via the Internet (online sexual corruption) or the crime of creating emotional relationship with a child with intention to lessen his/her restraints and allure the child to sexual contact or other related crimes (sexual grooming). In this case Sec. 211 of Criminal Code, whose merits concern corruption of morals of youth, could be used. According to subsection 1, any person who entices a person younger than 18 years of age to leading a lewd or immoral life (paragraph a); enables such a person to lead a lewd or immoral life (paragraph b) and other, may be punished. Aggravating circumstance in this crime is if it was committed with specific motive or in a more serious manner.

2.8 Sanctions and Measures

xxii. - xxiii.

1. Sexual Abuse, Child Pornography, Child Prostitution and Sexual Corruption

A. Sexual Abuse. Within the framework of basic merits as amended in subsection 1, Sec. 201 of the Criminal Code, it is possible to impose penalty of imprisonment of 3 to 10 years. In case of the qualified merits which are applicable if the act is committed in more serious manner, with a specific motive or on a protected person, where, according to Sec. 139 of the Criminal Code children, dependent person (family) or close person belong, it is possible to impose imprisonment sentence of 7 to 12 years. Perpetrator is subject to the imprisonment of 12 to 15 years if he causes grievous bodily harm, and the highest possible custodial penalty is in the range of 15 to 20 years if the crime was committed in an emergency situation or death of the victim was caused.

According to the basic merits of Sec. 202, if a person under 18 years of age was incited to extramarital coitus for reward or by a person who supervises that person or takes care of her in other way, the imprisonment sentence of 1 to 5 years may be imposed. Within the framework of the qualified merits, that is, when the act was committed on a person younger than 18 years, who was forced to allow such acts out of obedience, pressure or due to the threat, the sentence of imprisonment is increased to 2 to 8 years.

B. Child Prostitution. Child prostitution is partially dealt with in Sec. 367 of the Criminal Code. Similarly, in case the crime is committed against a child, within the meaning of the Criminal Code on a protected person, the custodial penalty is increased to 3 to 10 years (originally 3 years) of imprisonment. In three specific cases the custodial penalty increases to 7 to 12 years, and that is if by the act a substantial benefit was obtained, if the act was committed by a member of a dangerous grouping or against a person younger than 15 years of age. If the act leads to the death of the victim, or grievous bodily harm, custodial penalty of 10 to 15 years is imposed.

C. Child Pornography. Concerning child pornography, the length of the imprisonment is related to individual stages, in which the perpetrator is involved. Specifically: manufacturing, dissemination, possession of child pornography and corrupting morals.

I. Manufacturing (Sec. 368):

- 4 - 10 years (basic merits);

- 7 to 12 years (committed on a child younger than 12 years, publicly or in a more serious manner);
- 10 to 15 years (if the perpetrator causes grievous bodily harm or death; gains substantial benefit);
- 12 to 20 years (if the perpetrator causes grievous bodily harm or death to more persons; gains a large-scale benefit; as a member of a dangerous grouping).

II. Dissemination (Sec. 369):

- 1 to 5 years (basic penalty, which applies if someone disseminates, transports, procures or enables access to child pornography);
- 3 to 8 years (if the crime is committed publicly or in a more serious manner);
- 4 to 10 years (if the perpetrator gains a substantial benefit);
- 7 to 12 years (if the perpetrator gains a large-scale benefit).

III. Possession (Sec. 370):

- up to 2 years.

IV. Corrupting Morals (Sec. 371):

- up to 2 years (basic merits);
- 1 to 5 years (in case of the crime committed publicly or in a more serious manner);
- 3 to 8 years (if the perpetrator gains a substantial benefit).

V. Endangering of morality (Sec. 372):

- up to 2 years (a person, who offers, leaves or sells to a person younger than 18 years or at a location available to such persons);
- 1 to 5 years (if the crime is committed publicly or in a more serious manner);
- 3 to 8 years (if the perpetrator gains a substantial benefit for himself or for another, or if the pornography displays disrespect to a human being and violence, or when sexual intercourse with animal or other sexual pathological practices are displayed).

D. Sexual Corruption. In contrast to other legal orders, the Slovak Criminal Code does not contain a crime that persecutes a sole attempt to contact a child with the aim to sexually abuse or to have sexual intercourse. In case of Sec. 211- corrupting morals of youth, the court can impose a penalty of imprisonment up to 2 years. Within the framework of qualified merits (a more serious manner of acting, specific motive), the length of the imprisonment can range from 6 months to 5 years.

In cases of the above mentioned crimes, the sanctions may be considered sufficient and fulfilling the purpose of sanctions as such. In the Directive 2011/93/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council on combating the sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children and child pornography, which replaces Council Framework Decision 2004/68/JHA, it is stated:

„In particular, the level of criminal penalties should be increased so that they are proportionate, effective and dissuasive. To determine the degree of seriousness and attach penalties proportionate to it, consideration is given to different factors which may intervene in very different sorts of offences, like the degree of harm to the victim, the level of culpability of the offender and the level of risk posed to society.”<sup>128</sup>

In Slovakia, sanctions are amended using the indicated method, having regard to all the factors increasing the severity of the act and the impact on the victims or the society, within the meaning of Sec. 34, subsection 4, of the Criminal Code:

„When determining the type and the degree of the penalty, the court shall consider in particular the manner in which the act was committed and its consequence, culpability, motive, aggravating circumstances, mitigating circumstances and the offender, his/her personal situation and rehabilitation potential.”

According to the opinion of several prosecutors who deal with the present topic, the criminal sanctions as established by the Criminal Code are sufficient, and in some cases even excessively severe. Sanctions gradually increase, depending on the severity of the act of the perpetrator, or depending on the impact of such act (death, health condition) and the court has enough space to impose sanctions that reflect the person and the act accordingly (e.g. in case of sexual abuse under the basic merits 3 to 10 years; under qualified merits 7 to 12 years; if the perpetrator caused death 15 to 20 years, etc.).

2. Extradition

The main source of law governing extradition is the Code of Criminal Procedure (Sec. 489 - Sec. 514). Extradition procedure can be divided into three main categories: requesting extradition of the person from abroad, extradition to abroad and simplified extradition proceedings.

A. The Ministry of Justice of the Slovak Republic may request extradition of an accused person from abroad in accordance with Sec. 489, subsection 1, at the request of the court that issued the warrant of arrest. The condition for commencement of this procedure is issuing of the warrant of arrest - the international warrant of arrest that may be issued for the purpose of criminal prosecution or execution of imprisonment.

The situations in which the court shall not issue an international warrant of arrest are: if it anticipates imposition of sentence other than unsuspended sentence of imprisonment, if it anticipates imposition of unsuspended sentence of imprisonment shorter than four months, if the prison sentence or its remainder to be enforced is shorter than four months, if by extradition the Slovak Republic would incur expenses or suffer consequences disproportionate to the public interest or if the extradition of the person concerned shall cause this person a detriment disproportionate to the significance of criminal proceeding or to the consequences of crime, mainly by taking into account the age, social status or family circumstances of the said person.<sup>129</sup>

If the matter is urgent, there is the possibility to request foreign authorities for provisional arrest of the accused. The actual physical takeover of the person is performed by the Department of Police that shall hand over the person to the court that issued the international warrant of arrest without postponement.<sup>130</sup> Judge is obliged to interrogate the accused within 48 hours of handover and in particularly serious cases within 72 hours and decide on custody.

B. The acceptance of requests from foreign authorities to extradite a person from the Slovak Republic appertains to the Ministry of Justice of the Slovak Republic. During extradition several principles are applied e.g. the principle of dual criminality under which the extradition is admissible if the act is also punishable under law of the Slovak Republic and the maximum sentence is at least 1 year (Sec. 499, subsection 1 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). In case of already imposed sentence or its remainder, this has to be longer than four months (Sec. 499, subsection 2 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

Cases in which the extradition is unacceptable are defined by Sec. 501 of the Code of Criminal Procedure as follows:

- if the person involved is the citizen of the Slovak Republic, unless the obligation to extradite own nationals is established by law, international treaty or a decision of an international organization, by which the Slovak Republic is bound (regarding e.g. extradition to the International Criminal Court or the specific provisions of the European warrant of arrest, which was implemented in the EU Member States),

- if the person involved requested asylum in the Slovak Republic, or if they were granted asylum or subsidiary protection within the scope of protection granted to such person by a special regulation or international treaty; this does not apply if the person involved has repeatedly requested asylum in the Slovak Republic and if such request has been lawfully decided upon,

- if the criminal prosecution or execution of imprisonment are, according to the Slovak legal order, barred,

- if the offence for which the extradition is requested is considered a crime only under the law of the requesting state and not under the law of the Slovak Republic,

- if the crime for which the extradition is requested has political or military nature,

- if the crime was committed in the territory of the Slovak Republic, unless, due to the specific circumstances of the commission of the offence, priority shall be given to the criminal prosecution in the requesting State, for reasons of establishment of the facts, the degree of punishment or the enforcement of the sentence,

- if the person has already been lawfully convicted or acquitted of the offence for which the extradition is requested by the Slovak court, or

- if the person requested to be extradited was not criminally liable for the offence at the time of its commission, or if there are other reasons excluding their criminal liability.

Extradition procedure itself is divided into three stages: preliminary investigation by the regional prosecutor, the decision of the Regional Court on the admissibility of the extradition and the decision of the Minister of Justice on granting permission for extradition.

In the event that the Minister of Justice refuses to grant permission for extradition, criminal prosecution continues under the law of the Slovak Republic.

B. The legal basis for the simplified extradition proceedings is Sec. 503 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The condition for its application is the consent of the requested person. The prosecutor shall take minutes of the consent and after the preliminary investigation proposal for taking the said person into custody for extradition shall be submitted to the court.<sup>131</sup>

The abovementioned information relate to the international warrant of arrest and international law as such. As the Slovak Republic is the member state of the European Union, legislation governing the European warrant of arrest cannot be ignored. The source of law here is the Act no. 154/2010 Coll. on the European Arrest Warrant. „In practical terms, the competent judicial authority in any member state of The European Union shall issue the European arrest warrant, and subsequently the executive departments of the police in said member states shall ensure actions aiming towards the detection of a person.”<sup>132</sup> After detection and seizure of a person the competent judicial authorities of the particular states decide whether the person shall or shall not be extradited for the criminal prosecution to the country that has issued the warrant. Statistics on the use of this tool are available on the website of the Ministry of Interior of the Slovak Republic.<sup>133</sup>

xxiv. The Criminal Code regulates indirect liability of artificial persons, the subject of which is the introduction of quasi-criminal sanctions - protective measures, seizure of monetary sum and seizure of property (Sec. 33 f, g), but no longer a collective criminal liability.

There is positive and negative determination of the possibility to impose seizure of a monetary sum in the Act. Positive determination lies in the possibility to impose this kind of protective measure if the participation in crime is in connection with the exercise of the right to represent the AP; to make decisions on its behalf; to carry out the control within the AP or in relation to negligence concerning supervision or due diligence within it. Negative definition lies in the inability to impose this type of protective measures on AP whose conditions cannot be arranged under the Act no. 7/2005 Coll. on Bankruptcy and Restructuring as amended. In comparison to the seizure of a property it is to be noted that in this case the court has an option to impose such a measure, it is not a duty, but in the case of seizure of property under Sec. 83b, there is an obligation to impose it in exhaustively illustrated crimes.

Positive determination of seizure of a property is defined similarly. Protective measures may be imposed, if there is participation in crime in connection with exercising of the right to represent AP; to make decisions on its behalf; to carry out the control within the AP or in relation to negligence concerning supervision or due diligence within it and also the crime committed, is established in Sec. 58, subsection 2 or 3; however, it is important to note, that this includes the crimes of procuring and soliciting prostitution according to Sec. 367subsection 3, the crime of manufacturing of child pornography under Sec. 368, dissemination of child pornography under Sec. 369, the crime of corrupting morals according to Sec. 372subsection 2 or 3. Unlike the previous case, seizure of property cannot be imposed on an AP whose situation cannot be arranged under the Act on Bankruptcy and Restructuring. Further, the court is not obliged to impose the measure of seizure of property in the case if the protection of society (with regard to the seriousness, extent of the offence, gained benefit, caused damage, circumstances) can be ensured even without imposing the measure. In such a case, the court shall impose the protective measure of seizure of monetary sum on the AP. The Slovak Republic shall become the owner of the seized monetary sum or property.

xxv. Seizure of an item is legal institute known to Slovak legal order, which empowers a member of Police Force of the Slovak Republic and Customs Officer of the Slovak Republic to seize an item. The procedure is regulated in particular legal acts, e.g. Sec. 21 of Act no. 171/1993 Coll. on the Police Force:

„Police officer is authorized to seize an item to carry out necessary actions if he suspects the item is related to the commission of a crime or minor offence and the seizure of item is necessary for investigation of facts of the case or in criminal proceedings for the decision of law enforcement agencies or for decision in proceedings concerning minor offence; or the item is in search for by police of a foreign state.”

After seizure of an item, police issues written acknowledgement with item description to the person from which the item was withheld without delay. Seizure may last maximum 90 days. If ascertained that the item may be related to a commissioned crime, member of Police Force is obliged to hand over the seized item without delay to competent law enforcement agency or to competent public authority to decide on the minor offence. Temporary safekeeping of the item is provided by competent policeman or prosecutor.<sup>134</sup>

When the item is no more required for the needs of criminal proceedings, it is returned pursuant to Sec. 97 and Sec. 98 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. According to Sec. 97, if the item „is not needed for additional proceedings and if it cannot be forfeited or confiscated, the item shall be returned to person who gave it or from whom it was taken or to person whom it was seized from pursuant to special act.” If another person claims a property right to the item, it is returned to its proper owner or to a person, which has undeniable property right to that item (lien by operation of law). If there are doubts about the right of this person, the said person is referred with their claim to civil judicial proceedings. If the item decays quickly, it can be sold and obtained sum will be subject of custody.

According to Sec. 98 of the Code of Criminal Procedure: „If the accused has given an item or had been deprived of an item that was or might have been obtained in crime, or was used to commit a crime, and it is not known to whom it belongs or whereabouts of the aggrieved party are unknown, the description of the item is publicly declared.” Basically, it deals with situations when seized, withdrawn items were obtained in crime and are owned by another person. The public notice shall be made in a way that ensures the most effective finding of the aggrieved party, who can apply within 6 months. Item is returned back to the person accused upon their request if it was not acquired in crime and if no claim was submitted pursuant to issued public notice. Item of insignificant value or without a value can be destroyed.

Pursuant to Sec. 60 of the Criminal Code there is a possibility to impose the sanction of forfeiture of assets. Penalty can be imposed in case of 4 events: item was used for commission of crime; was designated for commission of crime; was obtained by means of crime or as a reward for commission of a crime; or in case item was acquired in exchange for another item acquired by means of crime. If item cannot be identified or is inaccessible, the court may impose forfeiture of item of similar value. The term item includes proceeds of crime and this sanction may be imposed only on item owned by the perpetrator. The owner of the item is in most cases state, if international treaty does not provide otherwise.

Protection of bona fide third parties is not directly stipulated in Acts., however with regard to comprehensive legal regulation, e.g. in the case of return of an item or penalty of forfeiture of assets, rights of third parties in general are not breached since after the end of investigation the item is returned to its owner, and in case the person is not the owner, public authority tries to find its owner. In the event that person is aggrieved by obtaining an item from perpetrator, they can claim damages in civil judicial proceedings. Particular provisions regulating seizure of items (Sec. 83 of Criminal Code – protective measures) and penalty of forfeiture of item (Sec. 60 of the Criminal Code – as an imposed penalty) strictly define cases allowing for indefinite seizure of item:

A. Penalty of forfeiture of item affects perpetrator of crime (items obtained by means of theft cannot be subject to this penalty due to lack of ownership of perpetrator) in these events: item was used or designated to commission of a crime; item has been acquired through crime or as a reward for commission of a crime; or in the event the item concerned was obtained in exchange for items obtained in relation to crimes as listed above.

B. Seizure of item may be imposed in five cases (Sec. 83, subsection 1 of the Criminal code) if concerned property falls under category of property eligible for forfeiture (subsection 1 of Sec. 60 of the Criminal Code, in exact terms: „The Court shall impose seizure of item if penalty of forfeiture of item pursuant to subsection 1 of Sec. 60 has not been imposed.”):

1. if item belongs to a person who cannot be prosecuted or sentenced,
2. if item belongs to perpetrator whose punishment has been waived; or to perpetrator whose criminal prosecution has been stopped; or to the perpetrator whose prosecution was conditionally stopped, or the perpetrator whose prosecution was stopped due to the conclusion of a conciliation agreement,
3. it consists of goods that are not marked with control stamps or goods that were not subjected to other technical control measures required by generally binding legal acts for taxation purposes,
4. the circumstances of the case justify the presumption that the item could be used as a financial source for terrorism,
5. it is necessary with regard to the security of people or property or other similar general interests.

In cases 3 to 5, the item can be confiscated from whomever, not only from the perpetrator. The owner of the item is state, if international treaty does not provide otherwise.<sup>135</sup>

5. Crimes Committed within Family

In Sec. 203 of the Criminal Code, specific crime, which punishes sexual intercourse between relatives, is regulated. Commission of voluntary sexual intercourse is the only case falling under these merits.<sup>136</sup> In case of intercourse with a relative in direct line, the person may be punished by imprisonment up to 2 years. If the victim is a protected person, which includes a child, the sentence of imprisonment of 1 to 5 years may be imposed.

A. Sexual Abuse. In the case of sexual abuse of persons under 15 years, the State provides increased custodial penalty if the crime is committed within the family. The basic custodial penalty for the offence under Sec. 201 subsection 1 of the Criminal Code is 3 to 10 years. If it is an offence committed against a protected person, which also includes close person (e.g. a relative in direct line as well as adoptive parent), the custodial penalty shall increase to 7 to 12 years of imprisonment. It is similar in Sec. 202, which already protects persons under 18 years of age.

B. Child prostitution. Also in the case of the crime of child prostitution, the legislator increased custodial penalty if the crime was committed within family or among close persons. Pursuant to Sec. 367, which regulates the crime of procuring and soliciting prostitution, the basic custodial penalty is maximum up to 3 years. If the crime was committed against a protected person (child, dependent person, close person), the custodial penalty increases to 3 to 10 years. Regarding a person less than 15 years, according to subsection 4, the custodial penalty ranges from 7 to 12 years.

C. Child pornography. In the case of manufacturing of child pornography, the legislator does not distinguish whether a child is in a family relationship to the offender or not, but generally provides protection to children. The higher custodial penalty, of 7 to 12 years, is used if the offence was committed against a child who is under 12 years. Even in dissemination and possession of child pornography and corrupting morals, it is not distinguished in what relationship respective persons are.

3.1 Investigation

i. After a crime is reported, the evidence is collected to confirm or disprove the facts stated in the complaint. If there is a suspicion that the crime was committed, (for example if the child carries physical signs of violence), suspect's personal freedom may be restricted and the evidence is executed. It includes e.g. body examination, which is regulated by Sec. 155 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Everyone has to be subject to body examination, if it is necessary to find the traces or consequences of the crime. If the examination is not done by a doctor, it can only be done by a person of the same sex.

If the child carries physical signs of the violence, e.g. scratches or bruises, they are photographically documented. If there is evidence suggesting that a person has committed a crime, proposal to file motion for custody is submitted to District Prosecutor's Office. In case the accused person is not taken into custody, the judge can decide, for preliminary proceeding, on appropriate restrictions (e.g. prohibition to approach the victim) pursuant to Sec. 80 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.<sup>137</sup>

Protective measures include e.g. providing welfare officer and child psychologist who will provide assistance to the child and child's parents. If the parent is the abuser, the other parent is informed about possibility to apply to the court for preliminary measure to prohibit contact with the child.<sup>138</sup> The Police can prevent the contact of the suspect with the child, only by placing the suspect to preliminary detention, together with filing motion for their prosecution in custody, however the presumption of innocence must be implemented.<sup>139</sup>

If possible, in case of interrogation of a minor, the Police Force uses rooms specially adapted for it.<sup>140</sup>

In practice, NGOs are repeatedly confronted with situations, where, in order to solve cases as soon as possible, the opinions of children are considered marginal, or not considered at all. Statement of the child is not considered to be sufficiently credible, it is attributed as prone to exaggerate the facts and its testimony is disputed. Also, problems arise in cooperation of departments, e.g. one case is investigated by several of them, but they are not connected and all have different regulations and procedures.<sup>141</sup>

ii. There are no special units that investigate the crimes of sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children. In each District Directorate of Police Force there are investigators in the Department of the Criminal Police who, among other crimes, investigate crimes in this field. They are methodically managed by the Presidium of Police Force which at the same time gives them evidence received from abroad or criminal complaints. In each District Directorate of Police Force, two criminalists are in charge with searching for criminal activity in the area of child pornography. However, they also have other responsibilities, what may adversely affect their ability to submit the motions. Even at the Presidium of Police Force there is no specialized division focused on investigation of sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children.

According to Sec. 113 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, secret tracking of person or thing can be allowed during criminal proceeding on intentional crime, if it can be reasonably assumed, that such tracking will detect facts relevant to criminal proceeding. Details are regulated by following subsections of Sec. 113. The law also allows the use of an agent. According to Sec. 10, subsection 20 of the Code of Criminal Procedure this person contributes to the detection, identification and conviction of perpetrators. The law also regulates details on who can be an agent, agent's rights and obligations and conditions of use of an agent.

iii. The Code of Criminal Procedure is based on the principle of legality and officiality. Crime that is not reported may be detected for example by operational police action or by child helpline. Law enforcement agencies are required to take action immediately after commission of a crime is detected. Crimes of sexual abuse, child prostitution and crimes in the field of child pornography do not fall under Sec. 211 of the Code of Criminal iv. According to Sec. 87 of the Criminal Code, the culpability expires after certain period of time, which is determined by individual crime.<sup>143</sup> For sexual abuse of children, child prostitution and crimes concerning child pornography, it can be maximum of 20 years. For corrupting morals of persons under the age of 18 years, it can be maximum of 10 years. Specific statute of limitation depends e.g. on the age of the victim or the seriousness of the perpetrator's act. When prosecuting juveniles, statute of limitation can be maximum of 5 years.

Statute of limitation begins to run from the moment the crime was committed, if the effect of the crime is also required, statute of limitation shall start from the moment it occurred. For continuing and multiple crimes it shall start after the last attack, thus after completion of the crime. For attempt of committing a crime or planning a crime, it shall start after completion of the highest developmental stage, in case of participation it shall start after completion of a crime by the main perpetrator. For perpetual crimes, statute of limitation shall start from the moment of removal of illegal situation which constitutes merits of a crime.<sup>144</sup> According to Sec. 9 of the Code of Criminal Procedure the prosecution cannot begin, and if it has already begun, it cannot be continued and must be stopped, if it is barred.

Criminal Code (Sec. 87) also states periods of time that are not to be counted into the statute of limitation, e.g. time, during which the perpetrator stayed abroad with the intention of avoiding prosecution. Subsection 3 regulates the interruption of statute of limitation of criminal prosecution as follows:

- (a) by the beginning of an indictment for a crime, which is subject to the limitation, as well as by subsequent acts of law enforcement agencies, a judge in preliminary proceeding or a court leading to the criminal prosecution of the offender, or
- (b) if the offender commits an intentional crime during the limitation period.

Under subsection 4, the new limitation period starts by interruption of the limitation period. The Slovak Criminal Code does not recognize suspension of statute of limitation.

v. If the age of the victim is not certain, the child's appearance is examined. E.g. paediatrician or a sexologist is asked for expert opinion.<sup>145</sup>

vi. The Police Force keeps internal records on individual offenders. With the permission and password, the database can be also accessed by other members of the Police Force. Information from abroad is provided by the so-called liaison officers. People who have access to this data are screened in order to be acquainted with classified matters and facts. There is also a national SIRENE<sup>146</sup> bureau in Slovakia, which provides for the exchange of information and personal data in Schengen Information System. Based on membership in the European Union, Police Force makes information and personal data available to member state's authorities for the prevention and detection of crimes. It can also provide information to other international authority or third country if it is e.g. in the interests of the person concerned, or because of other important public interest. When processing data, Police Force must ensure the protection of the person's privacy.<sup>147</sup>

Registry of convictions of offenders is managed by the General Prosecution. It contains data on persons who have been legally convicted in criminal proceedings by the courts; persons in whose cases the criminal prosecution was conditionally stopped by court or prosecutor; persons in whose cases a conciliation agreement was approved and criminal prosecution was suspended by court or prosecutor; following decisions or measures, related to previous data and other facts relevant to criminal proceeding.

3.2 Complaint procedure

vii. Even a minor<sup>148</sup> has by law guaranteed right to turn to the law enforcement agencies, in case he believes his rights are violated or threatened. These agencies are obliged to ensure the presence of the said person's legal representative, legal guardian, pedagogic operative or an authority of legal protection of children and social legal guardianship during questioning.

<sup>148</sup> According to Sec. 9 of the Act no. 40/1964 Coll. as amended, Civil Code, the children have limited capacity for legal action. Capacity is restricted only to such legal actions that are by their nature appropriate to intellectual and mental maturity corresponding to the child's age.

If the criminal proceeding is initiated after child's criminal complaint, the victim is questioned under the same conditions as witness – aggrieved party.

According to the Code of Criminal Procedure, the rights of a person with limited capacity are carried out by their legal representative, who may also authorize to representation an organization that assists victims of crimes. Law enforcement agency is obliged to provide to the child, in writing and at the very first proceeding, information on their rights in a criminal proceeding and information on the organizations that assist aggrieved parties (including services that are provided by them).<sup>149</sup>

In case of underage witnesses, a personal questioning is acceptable, as well as use of technical equipment for audio and video transmission. A testimony may be replaced also with reading of the minutes of questioning.

viii. If the offender is the parent of the child, he cannot exercise the rights of the child as his legal representative. In this case, the judge shall appoint, on prosecutor's motion, a guardian for the child for the preliminary proceeding (it is often a public authority or an authorized representative of an organization that assists aggrieved parties).<sup>150</sup>

According to the Code of Criminal Procedure, the court holds the main trial essentially publicly. Pursuant to Sec. 249, subsection 3 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the public may be excluded from the main trial e.g. if it is required by important interest of the aggrieved party (in some cases of a witness, for the purposes of protection of morality or integrity of involved persons). The law enforcement agencies shall particularly ensure the protection of a personality and privacy of minors, juveniles and aggrieved parties, whose personal data are not disclosed.

According to Sec. 127 of the Code of Criminal Procedure every person has the duty to comply with summons to appear by law enforcement agencies and court, and testify as witness on anything that is known to him on the crime, as well as on the perpetrator or on the circumstances that are significant for the purposes of criminal proceedings. The Code of Criminal Procedure exhaustively states in Sec. 130 cases, in which it is possible to withhold testimony.<sup>151</sup> Questioning may be realized with technical equipment for audio and video transmission.<sup>152</sup> The Code of Criminal Procedure in Sec. 135, subsection 1 furthermore states:

“If the person examined as a witness is under 15 years of age and the examination concerns matters whose recollection could, given the witness's age, have a negative influence on his mental and moral development, the examination shall be conducted with utmost consideration, and care shall be taken not to have to repeat, if possible, the examination in the subsequent proceedings. An education specialist or a person with expertise in juvenile education who, taking into account the object of examination and the level of mental development of the interviewed person, shall contribute to the proper conduct of examination, may be taken up. If the presence of the legal guardian of the witness could contribute to a proper course of the examination, he shall be summoned to be present during the examination.”

The Code of Criminal Procedure also takes into account the age of the person questioned in further subsections of Sec. 135. It provides e.g. that in the subsequent proceedings, such person is to be examined only when it is strictly necessary, examination may be replaced by reading of minutes of examination or his examination shall be made with the help of technical equipment for audio and video transmission, by reading of minutes of examination or his examination shall be made with the help of technical equipment for audio and video transmission, as to make sure, that questioning in the subsequent proceedings is only exceptional. According to Sec. 261 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in case of questioning of a person younger than 15 years of age, the presiding judge may decide that the questioning of a witness will be carried out by himself.

The Code of Criminal Procedure also governs situations when it is not possible to take witness into the oath (in Sec. 267). It is a witness:

- (a) who has not attained his 14th year of age when questioned,
- (b) who, with regard of his mental and physical conditions, fails to understand the nature and importance of the oath properly.

i.

A. School. Part of the methodological guidelines for teachers concerning upbringing to marriage and parenting is also the issue of sexual abuse and sexual violence against children.<sup>153</sup> The teachers are instructed about forms, displays and procedures for detection of sexual abuse. The issue of sexual abuse prevention is thoroughly described, including description and instruction to various educational games with pupils, which serve as prevention against sexual abuse. In the methodological guidelines, there is also reference to other literature on the subject as well as contacts to Non-Governmental organizations, which children can turn to (their publication is recommended).

There are also Pedagogical Organizational Directions for the years 2012/2013 representing general recommendations for schools, school facilities, local and state administration authorities operating in education, involving also prevention, protection and safety, where in the part „Security and prevention”, specifically in point 1, an instruction is stated to:

„Accordingly to the Convention on the Rights of the Child continuously monitor behaviour of children and youth and its changes. In cases of grounded suspicion concerning violation or their healthy personal development, or abuse, to immediately ensure their active protection.”<sup>154</sup>

Within the framework of prevention, schools cooperate with the police and the prosecution service. Projects for children and youth (e.g. games and lectures) are organized with the help of members of the Police Force who teach them how not to become a victim of a crime, and prosecutors who read lectures for the pupils.

B. The police. Police investigators are trained to deal with cases in general (there is no specialization). In practice, however, one may show more extensive knowledge in certain area and he/she will be assigned more cases of similar nature. There are also professional improvement courses organized by Academy of Police Force in Bratislava.<sup>155</sup> However, topics change and they are not repeated every year.

C. Prosecution Service and the Judiciary. Education of the judges, prosecutors and court officials is provided by independent Judicial Academy, which was established by the Act no. 548/2003 Coll. on Judicial Academy. Trainings are voluntary and within educational activities workshops on protection of children are organized. Decree no. 6/2008 of the General Prosecutor of the Slovak Republic introduces specific prosecutors specialized in criminal activities of juveniles and crimes against children. These prosecutors are obliged to regularly attend various trainings<sup>156</sup> that are provided by the Judicial Academy as well as internally by the Office of the General Prosecutor of the Slovak Republic.

D. Other. Doctors, nurses, midwives and health care assistants receive training on children's rights in the basic study program and this knowledge is extended in special study programs. They are also instructed by the Ministry of Health of the Slovak Republic on how to proceed when reporting suspected sexual abuse of persons under the age of 18. The social workers who work with Roma children often don't receive any training concerning rights of children.<sup>157</sup>

ii. In the Slovak Republic the educational process in elementary and secondary schools involves also the concept of upbringing to marriage and parenting, main goal of which is to develop basic knowledge and responsible attitudes among pupils in the area of partnership and parenthood in accordance with scientific knowledge and ethical standards. The initial starting material for the creation of upbringing to marriage and parenthood was the Concept of the State Family Policy (Decree of the Government No. 389/1996), Complex Program of the HIV/AIDS Infection prevention (Decree No. 390/1996 and National Program of Health Support 659/1991). This concept implies also the issues of sexual upbringing instructed in the curriculum of primary and secondary schools for the year 1994 (No. 4028/94-212).<sup>158</sup>

The theme of upbringing to marriage and parenthood is instructed in several classes, however the key role is played by ethics and religion education classes. This education is also present in subjects as civics and biology, as well as in extracurricular educational activities which are organized between teachers and pupils. The school management, in cooperation with the teachers, governs, coordinates and controls realization of this concept, which includes sexual education in teaching process. The children are also given, in an appropriate form, information on sexual abuse, what it is and how to safeguard themselves against it. It is also recommended for schools to publish various contacts for helplines, which children could contact, as well as to watch over their updating.<sup>159</sup>

In addition also non-profit organizations operate in schools, which, with the help of the state, educate children on the prevention of sexual abuse. Civic association Labyrint, dedicated to prevention of sexual abuse of boys and girls, organizes preventive programmes for the 3rd and the 4th classes of elementary schools, aimed at girls and boys, teachers and parents of children. It also contains programmes for parents of children who already took part in a preventive programme and a programme for teachers and educators. Implementation of these activities into the educational process by the third sector represents a certain support of education of children in this area by the state.<sup>160</sup>

Within the framework of methodological guidelines for education and training to parenthood, specifically in the area of sexual abuse, the parents are not included into the educational process itself, which takes place within the teaching time in school. However, in the relation to the general prevention, parents are involved in non-educational activities, if the school organizes them, or they are informed about the issue at parental meetings, or there are special seminars organized for them with the help of NGOs.

iii. In the Slovak Republic there are currently no specialized programmes supported by the state for persons, who might be potential perpetrators of sexual abuse of children and of sexual violence against children. There is general prevention of criminality in Slovak Republic, which is carried out on different levels of administration and which follows to some extent territorial and administrative division of the Slovak Republic. It is the nation-wide (the Slovak Republic), regional (districts) and local level (cities, communes and their parts) prevention of criminality, while on all the above mentioned levels - state organs, organs of self-government and NGOs operate as well.<sup>161</sup>

Programmes and measures that evaluate and prevent the risks of crime commission against family and youth and other crimes, which constitute serious violations of children's rights, are included in the Strategy on prevention of criminality and other anti-social activities for the years 2012-2015. The strategy was approved by the Government's Decree No. 807 from 14/12/2011. It contains general as well as specific strategies and tasks, however, without any concrete programmes and concepts in the area of programmes for potential offenders of sexual abuse and/or violence.<sup>162</sup>

Act No. 583/2008 Coll. on Prevention of Criminality and Other Anti-social Activity as amended regulates organization and scope of public authorities (the Government, ministries and other central state authorities, district authorities and other local state authorities, etc.) in the area of criminal prevention, and also regulates granting of subsidies from the state budget to finance projects in this area.

iv. Victims can find help in the centres of pedagogical and psychological counselling and prevention (hereinafter referred to as „CPPCaP“). CPPCaP provides services of methodical, advisory and informative nature for children, their parents and pedagogic employees of schools. CPPCaP are legal entities covered by the Department of Education, providing free professional services. The basic framework of CPPCaP activities is governed by the School Act and the Decree of MESRS SR No. 325/2008 Coll. on School Facilities of Educational Counselling and Prevention. CPPCaP closely cooperates with other institutions and experts, mainly from the fields of education, health, social affairs and family, possibly other departments.<sup>163</sup> Parents with children, children themselves or those who have suspicion that their classmate or friend is a victim of sexual abuse, may all seek psychological help. Some centres provide information on sexual abuse directly aimed at children with phone number and contact e-mail on their websites.<sup>164</sup>

Important assistance to the victims is provided by the third sector. There are no special organizations focused exclusively on assistance to victims of sexual violence and sexual abuse, however, help is provided by many organizations that assist to victims of violence or those that generally focus on assistance to children at risk, e.g. People in need<sup>165</sup> or the centre Hope.<sup>166</sup> Majority of these organizations provide help for ill-treated, abused and neglected children through crisis accommodation, crisis intervention, by providing psychological, social and legal counselling, and various short-term and long-term therapies. Their crisis centres providing specialized intervention programs for children are established with substantial assistance of foreign foundations and the EU. They have to comply with conditions of MLSAF SR and pass accreditation process.<sup>167</sup>

There are also individuals that offer individual help within third level of undergraduate studies, to the victims of sexual abuse in childhood - therefore aimed at adults at the time of seeking help.<sup>168</sup> These people are given an opportunity to seek assistance, whether in the form of stay in a facility run by the Catholic Church or through conversations, in order to be relieved from the childhood trauma, or at least to reduce it, if they did not find help at the time or were rejected help.

v. There are several helplines in the Slovak Republic, where victims can turn to. Anonymity is guaranteed by all of them.

The Police helpline provides general counselling in the area of criminal activity and security (since sexual abuse is a crime, counsel is provided in this area as well). Line of child trust is a nation-wide free phone line. Organizationally, the line is a part of the Children's University Hospital in Košice, which cooperates with the civic association Society of Children's Friends – Li(e)nka during its activity. Although the helpline is not specifically focused on sexual abuse or violence, great part of the medical and social problems still comprises calls on violence. Many of them are of information and preventive nature, others are solved by crisis intervention. Within these calls, several groups of callers can be identified:

- clients, who need information,
- clients, who are in the situation of violence and seek concrete advice and help,
- clients, who experienced trauma from violence in the past,
- adults, who report child abuse.<sup>169</sup>

Centrum Slniečko (The centre Sunshine, non-profit organisation) runs Child rescue line. Free phone line is to assist to children and youth with various problems, e.g. problems with teenage years or school problems, as well as serious problems of distress, abuse, bullying and addiction. It operates free of charge from all phone networks in Slovakia (fixed and mobile) in the work days from 15:00-20:00.<sup>170</sup>

Line of youth trust operates non-stop and is focused on a wide scope of problems including sexual abuse. Furthermore, there is UNICEF Bratislava helpline and many other general helplines. It may be noted that specialized lines aimed at helping victims of sexual violence do not exist, however, generally the network of helplines is very good and phone help is available to all victims with access to a fixed phone line or mobile phone.

vi. Although the assistance and protection of sexual abuse victims is one of the priority areas of support in social services development and support of implementation of legal protection measures involving children and social legal guardianship for the year 2012, which were reported by MLSAF SR, there are no state programs to support victims of sexual abuse. The main coordinators of activities of NGOs in Slovakia focused on prevention of child abuse,

i.

A. National Action Plan. The Slovak Republic is devoted to protection of children against sexual abuse in a broader context, e.g. by creation and realization of various documents through its authorities. One of these publications is National Action Plan:

I. National Action Plan for Children for the years 2002 – 2004. MLSAF SR developed this plan and defined basic tasks related to the protection of children's rights. However, it poorly defined measurable indicators, therefore information about its implementation does not provide any relevant data on the results and impacts of the implemented tasks.

II. Period of the years 2005 – 2007. In these years, several important measures were approved and implemented, number of which significantly influenced the field of protection of children's rights. These changes relate to the areas of family law, criminal law, legal protection of children and social legal guardianship, anti-discrimination, tax law, the protection of children against violence in mass media, employment of juveniles, unaccompanied minors, health and nutrition of children and youth and in the field of education.

As an example Ministry of Culture of the Slovak Republic may be mentioned, which, in the area of protection against violence in mass media, increased surveillance over producers and distributors, who have an obligation to determine age appropriateness of the program. Slovak Trade Inspection oversees the fulfilling of access restriction for minors under the age of 18 to audiovisual works intended for adults. By 2009, several other departmental pilot projects were realized.

III. National Action Plan for Children for the years 2009 – 2012 (hereinafter referred to as „NAP”). This plan is based mainly on the CRC, National Action plan for Children for the years 2002 – 2005, but also from a brief review of progress in the years 2005 – 2007, from Concluding Observations of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child to Slovakia's first report on implementation of CRC in 2000 and also from Concluding Observations of UN Committee on the Rights of the Child to second periodical report of the Slovak Republic on implementation of the CRC in 2007.

In the development of the NAP the representatives of the following responsible departments took part: General Prosecutor's Office of the Slovak Republic, the Public Defender of Rights, representatives of SNCHR, Office of the Plenipotentiary for Roma Communities, self-governments and non-state subjects operating in the said area.

The primary objective of the NAP is: „to ensure through defined tasks and measures achieving of progress in the field of children's rights recognized by the Convention on the Rights of the Child and progress in their use.”

NAP was developed as an open document that contains basic tasks for the period 2009 – 2012. Initial review and update of its tasks was scheduled for 2010 for the previous year, with subsequent regular annual evaluation and updating. The proposed time period presumes its evaluation in 2013, so that it becomes the basis for the Concluding Observations of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child.

NAP anticipates participation of children in fulfilling its tasks and comprises the tasks leading to creation of space, where child's opinion is explored and relevant information is provided, so the children may in the future actively participate in and comment on policies that affect them.

NAP is ideologically divided into different areas, which are: Policy coordination and independent mechanisms for the protection of children's rights; Crucial and specific tasks and measures; Education, upbringing, leisure and cultural activities; Children and family, family environment and alternative care; Health, health care and nutrition of children; Social and other measures improving living standards of children and family; Special protective measures.

Part of the assignment is the date of execution and responsibility, if the nature of the task allows it, method of performance and securing of financial resources for its realization. Responsible and co-responsible departments are responsible for monitoring of the effectiveness of the assigned task and its evaluation, which includes specification of the achieved results.

NAP anticipated creation of Committee of Ministers for Children as a national authority for coordination of policies on the protection of children rights and also creation of independent institution for children rights protection: „Children's Ombudsman”<sup>172</sup>.

B. *National Programs, Strategies, Conceptions and Action Plans. There are several basic documents related to the children rights, which are listed for information purposes according to the basic areas:

- Education, upbringing, leisure and cultural activities – The concept of pedagogical-psychological counselling system and its implementation to practice;
- Anti-discrimination plans - Action Plan for the Prevention of All Forms of Discrimination, Racism, Xenophobia, Anti-Semitism and Other Expressions of Intolerance;
- Children and family, family environment and alternative care - National Action Plan for Prevention and Elimination of Violence against Women and in Families 2005 – 2008;
- Health, health care and nutrition of children – National Mental Health Programme;
- Social and other measures improving the standard of living of children and family – Migration Policy Concept;
- Special protective precautions – National Program for the Fight against the Drugs.

According to the Decree of the Government no. 479/2012, national strategy on protection of human rights shall be prepared until March 2013.

C. *Committee on Children and Youth. Predecessor of this institution was Committee of Ministers for Children, established in 2009. Committee on Children and Youth (hereinafter referred to as „the Committee”) is a specialized body of the Government's Council for Human Rights, National Minorities and Gender Equity in the sphere of children and youth. It was established by a Government decree in 2011. The Committee is governed mainly by the principle of the best interest of the child, non-discrimination and children participation. Members include representatives of non-governmental organisations and the committee can submit motion to the Government to e.g. take certain needed measures. The Committee meets as needed, especially before the meeting of the abovementioned Council of the Government of the Slovak Republic. Its meetings are public.

The scope of the Committee is to report suggestions to the Council of the Government of the Slovak Republic to increase the level of support, protection and adhering to the rights of the children and youth; processing of draft opinions and decrees to the proposed Acts, generally binding legal regulations, as well as government, departmental and other non-legislative measures; encourages research activities; cooperates with trade unions and institutions, ministries, NGOs, children organizations and other bodies; monitors the fulfilling of tasks given by NAP and submits the annual deduction to Council of the Government of the Slovak Republic along with proposal for its update.<sup>173</sup>

D. Children's Ombudsman. One of the tasks that the Slovak Republic had to ensure was establishment of separate, independent mechanism for receiving and reviewing complaints of children or those on their behalf, and also monitoring of the CRC implementation. Establishment of a new special institution of children's rights defender seemed to be counterproductive, so public defender of children's rights was to become a part of the Office of the Public Defender of Rights of the Slovak Republic, which was established in 2001.

However, there is a Child Ombudsman, a peer to peer project realized by the Office of the Public Defender of Rights of the Slovak Republic. Activities of the Public Defender of Rights include investigation of children's opinions and their problems, receiving of complaints of minors or their legal representatives, if they believe that children's rights were not respected and issuing statements on current issues in the field of children's rights. He has the right to publish and publicly point out to the illegality or other deficiencies he has encountered and cooperates with pupils' self-government. Child Ombudsman is a child, who is contact person for classmates and the spokesperson of children in society.

An example of the Public Defender of Rights activity is the creation of the website that is easily understandable for children, where children can learn about their rights and how to ask for help. There is a section „Our advice” that helps children to ask for advice or help properly. It is divided into four sub-sections addressing various fundamental areas. That includes „You and the family”, „You and the school”, „You, society and the state”, „You and other problems”. In individual parts, there are examples of common problems and their solutions. If the problem of the child is not presented, every child can seek help of the Ombudsman, who, if it is within his competence, tries to help to the child himself or asks for help responsible authority or organization.<sup>174</sup>

ii. In Slovakia, there has been no relevant research determining the cases of sexual abuse of children so far. According to available information, e.g. provided by MLSAF SR, it can be assumed that the number of detected cases of child torture, sexual abuse or sexual exploitation in 2010 did not exceed a few hundred,<sup>175</sup> although the number of children in Slovak Republic, under the age of 14, was in 2011, according to the Statistical Office of the Slovak Republic, over 825 000.<sup>176</sup>

Some information is provided also in annual report of the General Prosecution, according to which 235 persons were sentenced for sexual abuse of children under the age of 15; 73 persons were sentenced for sexual abuse of children under the age of 18; 1605 persons were sentenced for corrupting morals of the youth; 12 persons were sentenced for procuring and soliciting prostitution (regardless of the victim's age); 6 persons were sentenced for production of child pornography; 10 persons were sentenced for dissemination of child pornography; 8 persons were sentenced for possession of child pornography; 2 persons were sentenced for corrupting morals by the so-called hard pornography and one person was sentenced for corrupting morals by the so-called simple pornography.

A: Do you know what your child is doing? „Do you know what your child is doing?” is one of the communication campaigns, which is organized under the auspices of the Ministry of Interior of the Slovak Republic since the beginning of 2012. One way of implementing it is an exhibition of children's posters in public places. The best poster expressing current

B. Kisses are not on command. Kisses are not on command is a book, supplemented by a painting book with the same title. This book represents a special contribution to the prevention of child sexual abuse, which by visual examples demonstrates the situations, which are to be introduced to children in an appropriate way considering their age and experience.<sup>178</sup>

C. Touches are not on command. A book and a painting book with the same title helps children to realise where boundaries lie and this way contributes to prevention of sexual violence. The book deals with pleasant touches, suspicious touches and uncomfortable ones as well. Both books are also for adults to help them think about the boundaries of education towards obedience and respect for authorities.<sup>179</sup>

D. Zodpovedne.sk (Responsibly.sk). Slovak Awareness Centre teaches children how to use new online technologies responsibly and safely. It produces educational materials, initiates activities and social events, preventive trainings of teachers, parents and other people working with children. The Centre deals with intolerance, games and gambling, sexuality on the internet, cyberbullying etc.<sup>180</sup>

E. We are not for sale. „We are not for sale” is a guide for professional staff of helping professions on the issue of violence against children with special emphasis on the issue of commercial sexual exploitation of children, which was published as a result of cooperation of MESRS SR and Ministry of Health of the Slovak Republic within the framework of National Program for Children and Youth Care in Slovak Republic for the years 2008-2015. The aim of this publication is to inform the public about the issue of violence against children with special emphasis on commercial sexual exploitation of children and its social seriousness, and about services for children at risk with a particular focus on vulnerable groups of children.

This guide is divided into following chapters: 1. Children and violence, 2. Commercial sexual exploitation of children, 3. Specific psychological development features of children and youth, 4. Diagnostics of children in cases of commercial sexual exploitation, 5. Commercial sexual exploitation of children and school, 6. The importance of parenting – positive parenthood, 7. Specific features of preventive programmes realization, 8. Perspectives of integrated multidisciplinary, respectively interdepartmental, cooperation in prevention and interventive activities related to cases of sexual abuse of children.

The Ministry of Health of the Slovak Republic cooperated also with Research Institute for Child Psychology and Pathopsychology which, by processing the latest scientific information on the issue of protecting children against violence and neglect, with special emphasis on the issue of commercial sexual exploitation, created informational leaflets for children (6-11 years) and youth (12-18 years), posters and also cooperated in creating the abovementioned guide.<sup>181</sup>

F. Pilot research in the field of commercial sexual exploitation of children. National Society for the Prevention of Criminality, Criminal Law and Judiciary in 2007 carried out a pilot research in the field of commercial sexual exploitation of children, aimed to map the attitudes, ideas and personal experiences of children with behaviour defined as commercial sexual exploitation of children. This research was aimed at obtaining information on sex education, sexual violence, working with the PC and Internet and questions about prostitution and pornography. The research was carried out in primary schools in Žilina region, where it was attended by pupils of 9th class in the form of an anonymous questionnaire. The results of this research have been used in the creation of educational programmes, developing of prevention strategies, specific educational programmes and manuals focusing on the prevention of commercial sexual exploitation of children.<sup>182</sup>

The aim was to find out how the right of children to be heard is respected while getting feedback from the children.

In March of the same year also an online survey was conducted, which was attended by more than six thousand children from all over Slovakia, to find out what was the children's experience with participation in various areas and situations.

According to another survey from 2009, the children knew of human rights, but were dissatisfied with the extent and amount of information that is provided to them.<sup>183</sup>

v. Non-Governmental Organisations may participate in the legislative process e.g. by submitting public comments, by representing the public on so-called contradiction proceedings, by appearing in front of parliamentary committees, by commenting on the draft law, or even directly in the creation of articulated act.<sup>184</sup>

There are several organizations and associations dedicated to the children's rights protection in the Slovak Republic. However, many of them deal with the issue of child sexual abuse marginally only. NGO Centrum Slniečko (The centre Sunshine, non-profit organisation) is one of the few organizations whose primary activity is to protect children against sexual abuse. Civic Association Náruč – Pomoc det'om v kríze (Náruč - help to children in crisis) is special in its particular approach in the investigation of sexual abuse of children.

contributes to an effective and comprehensive solution of these problems. It provides its services in the following activities.

1. Child Crisis Centre Náruč, Žilina – Zádubnie. It provides comprehensive care to tortured, abused and neglected children (crisis intervention – immediate intervention in cases where there is a threat to life or health of the child; psychological, social and special pedagogical diagnosis; professional psychological, social and pedagogical care; nutrition, accommodation, clothing; providing education; providing health care; recreational and physical activities, sport activities; games and relaxation activities).
2. Counselling for abused women: Counselling and Training Centre Náruč Čadca.
3. Programmes for families threatened by domestic violence.
4. Counselling for foster families of former clients of the Children Crisis Centre Náruč.
5. Trainings, seminars and courses for frontline employees and other helping professions (teachers, paediatricians, social employees, psychologists, judges, police officers).
6. Prevention of child torture, abuse and neglect for pupils of primary and secondary schools.
7. Development of volunteering.
8. Raising public awareness about the problems of domestic violence (information campaigns, brochures, leaflets, contributions to the media).
9. Publication and translation of materials focused on problems of domestic violence, sexual abuse of children and commercial sexual exploitation.
10. Activities which lead to system changes aimed at improving the position of victims of domestic violence.

Into the Child Crisis Centre Náruč there are placed mainly children who had to be removed from their family environment due to an acute hazard. Age range for clients is from 3 to 18 years, but children aged 3 to 14 years are preferred. The age limit is irrelevant, in the case that children should be placed in a crisis centre with his mother. A child gets into a crisis centre on the basis of a preliminary court decision, upon an agreement with the parents or other legal representatives. OZ Náruč cooperates with departments of social protection at the Local Offices of Labour, Social Affairs and Family, doctors, teachers, courts, prosecution, police and other professionals working with children and their families.

In cases of torture and sexual abuse of children, and to facilitate its investigation, an investigation room was created in Child Crisis Centre Náruč, which is equipped to match the needs of children, to take into account their interests and respect their communication skills.

It allows gentle questioning of children with help of camera, one-way mirror and transfer of video and audio recording into an adjacent room. This room is also used for therapeutic work with children.

OZ Náruč organizes variety of day camps, residential summer camps, benefit concerts and other projects for children.<sup>186</sup>

IV OTHER

In October 2011, the NCSR voted on whether to approve expansion of the European Financial Stability Fund. This was controversial topic in Slovakia and disagreements were even between the coalition of parties in the Government, so the Prime minister at the time asked for vote of confidence. However, the motion has not passed. In the following days the fund was approved but new, snap elections were called in March 2012. The party Direction-Social Democracy gained absolute majority with only seven seats short to unilaterally amend the Constitution. This was the first time any party won an absolute majority in the independent Slovakia.

Prior to the election several scandals erupted – mainly Gorilla scandal, named after the Slovak Secret Service wiretap file, which is said to contain information about corruption at the highest level in the Government. Leaked Gorilla file lead to mass political protests at the beginning of 2012, when e.g. in January 2012 several thousand people marched in front of the Presidential Palace.

V CONCLUSION

Protection against discrimination in Slovakia is regulated in the Constitution as well as other Acts. National Action Plans and strategies aim to coordinate policies in specific areas and several of them concern human rights, Roma minority, prevention of discrimination and children rights. Considerable problems arise in Roma community, especially in marginalized settlements, where children often live in unsanitary conditions, as well as other parts of Slovakia, where rights to education of Roma children are violated. This and other factors may lead to situations, when Roma children are particularly vulnerable, because of education deficit and poverty, and may become victims of sexual abuse and sexual exploitation. Slovakia struggles with Roma situation on several levels (e.g. criminality).

Slovak Republic is a party to the Convention on the Rights of Child, the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and signatory of the Lanzarote Convention. As of 11/11/2012, the Lanzarote Convention has not been ratified. Several state bodies e.g. General Prosecution had comments and considered the signing untimely, mainly due to needed amendments of Criminal Code and Code of Criminal Procedure.

The protection of human rights is secured by courts, as well as other agencies, e.g. Slovak National Centre for Human Rights or the Public Defender of Rights. There is no Children's Ombudsman yet, however, the creation of one is planned.

Criminal liability of children is set on 14 years (15 years in case of sexual abuse). There are also several terms which are used in law in regard to children. In some cases, there are differences between children younger than 12 years, 14 years, 15 years and 18 years. For children between 14 -18 years the term „juvenile” is used, while in other cases „minor“ is any person under 18 years of age. The differences are e.g. higher custodial penalty if crime is committed against a child younger than 15 years. Also, a child according to the Criminal Code, is not a person younger than 18 years of age if she/he acquired full age by contracting marriage with the consent of the court at the age of 16 years.

Crimes of sexual abuse of children, child prostitution, manufacturing, dissemination or possession of child pornography, incest or corruption of children are all regulated by the Criminal Code. Concerning the crime of child prostitution both recruiter and user are penalized. The term „child prostitution” is not defined in the Criminal Code, however higher custodial penalty is imposed e.g. if the crime of procuring has been committed against a person under 15 years of age.

There is no crime of „solicitation of children for sexual purposes” as defined in the Lanzarote Convention. Grooming or cyber grooming can be punished pursuant to other sections of the Criminal Code. Also passive participation of children in pornographic performances or witnessing of sexual abuse or sexual activities without participating is not regulated. Pornographic material on the internet is governed by Audiovisual Act as well as by self-regulatory initiatives of Slovak operators.

Incest regulates voluntary sexual intercourse only with relative in direct line (not with an adoptive parent). If the crimes of sexual abuse and child prostitution are committed within the family, higher custodial penalty is imposed, regardless of blood ties. In cases of manufacturing, dissemination or possession of child pornography, the legislator does not distinguish whether a child is in a family relationship with the offender or not.

In case that there are aggravating circumstances, minimum sentence for the crime may be increased by one-third. There are also qualified merits of each individual crime, for which there is a higher custodial penalty, e.g. if the crime was committed in a more serious manner, on a protected person, in public, if grievous bodily harm or death was caused etc. (there are also stricter penalties for use of force, abuse of disability or abuse of perpetrator's position). Therefore, if qualified merits of crime are met and there are also aggravating circumstances, minimum sentence for said crime may be increased further. Statute of limitation varies in each individual crime.

Artificial persons are subjects of indirect criminal liability and protective measures can be imposed e.g. seizure of monetary sum or seizure of property. They are subjects of administrative liability, for which usually a high financial fine is imposed and civil liability. In this case artificial person may apply employment sanction against an employee.

Code of Criminal Procedure states how the children shall be protected during investigation of a crime and also during court proceedings, e.g. avoidance of unnecessary repetition of questioning, exclusion the public from the main hearing, etc. Also, the consent of victim is not required for further proceedings if a crime is reported. It may be done so by the child, police, child helpline etc.

There are no special units within the Police Force that investigate only the crimes of sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children. However, there are prosecutors specializing on criminal activity of juveniles and crimes against children.

Teachers are provided information on how to detect sexual abuse e.g. by methodological guidelines or pedagogical-organizational instructions. Schools also cooperate with police, prosecution or NGOs and organize games and lectures for children to teach them about sexual abuse. General information on sexual education is provided to pupils during classes (ethics or religion class) that also teach them about marriage and parenting. Medical staff is provided information e.g. in the form of instructions by the Ministry of Health of the Slovak Republic. The importance to educate professionals working with children is stressed also in analysis of civic association Náruč.

There are currently no specialized state programs for potential perpetrators of sexual abuse or sexual violence against children. However, there are programs for general prevention of criminality. Support to child victims is provided by Centres of pedagogical and psychological counselling and prevention, third sector and also individuals within third level of undergraduate studies.

Third sector and state bodies both run several free helplines, publish materials, distribute leaflets and organize information campaigns. NGOs also provide support to victims in the form of crisis centres, shelter safe houses, centres for counselling and advocacy, etc. Also, need for campaigns that will soften the society to the violence against children is voiced (there are e.g. cases when violence is not reported because it is usual in certain family, etc.).<sup>187</sup>

Committee on Children and Youth reports suggestions to the Government's Council for Human Rights, National Minorities and Gender Equity, which can be further submitted to the Government. The Committee on its special meeting e.g. suggested that a strategy on the protection of children against violence is created.

There is no relevant research determining the cases of sexual abuse of children. Some information is provided by General Prosecution in the form of statistics of persons sentenced for crimes against children or by number of cases detected by MLSAF SR.

I INTRODUCTION

Equal Rights

- i. Are there discrimination problems regarding sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth, sexual orientation, state of health, disability or other status of men and women?

National (and other) minorities, discrimination regarding national and social origin

There are two constitutionally recognised minorities in Slovenia: both autochthonous – Italian and Hungarian: for them, Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia (Ustava Republike Slovenije)<sup>1</sup> declares special rights (for preservation of their national identity, use of their own languages in official matters, the right to education and schooling in their own languages, the right to foster relations with their nations of origin and their respective countries) which they can exercise in geographical areas where they live.<sup>2</sup> Bilingual schooling (including majority and minority pupils) is considered as an example of good practice.<sup>3</sup> The Ombudsman is pleased with legislation and he reports that no complaints were detected.<sup>4</sup>

The Constitution recognises another minority community: Roma community – this community is not a typical national minority, but it is granted a special status. Concerning discrimination regarding national (and other – not constitutionally recognised) minorities, practically all of the petitions addressed to the Ombudsman were regarding the problematic of Roma and Sinti communities. The Constitution addresses their rights in Article 65 (Status and Special Rights of the Romany Community in Slovenia): "The status and special rights of the Romany community living in Slovenia shall be regulated by law."<sup>5</sup> Their status is also regulated by law – namely, the Roma Community Act (Zakon o romski skupnosti v Republiki Sloveniji)<sup>6</sup>. These problems are also an example of discrimination regarding social origin. We face multiple problems, mostly originated from residential, communal, environmental and social problems of members of the Roma community: many of its members are residing in illegally built villages, without access to drinking water and other communal services, in great poverty. These communities are experiencing high rates of unemployment, crime, children not attending schools regularly (raising suspicion of child neglect) and teenage pregnancies (which in cases of mothers under 15 years of age there is suspicion of sexual assault on minor – statutory rape). Ombudsman reports that there is some progress in the efforts made to improve the life and the possibilities for members of Roma community, that are facing many prejudices due to their specific way of life, which is different from the majority of the population. The main problem is that responsibilities are passed between local authorities – seeking solutions at the state level and vice versa – leaving problems unresolved. This issue, due to its complexity and high levels of prejudices amongst the majority of the population, will probably remain an endless process of improving social and living conditions for Roma. The problems related to this minority are addressed by the Annual Reports of the Ombudsman every year.<sup>7</sup>

Rights of disabled

Rights of disabled are protected by the Constitution (Article 52), granting them right to special protection, work-training, education and active life within community, all financed by public funds.<sup>8</sup> Ombudsman reports that disabled are facing problems when attempting to exercise their constitutional rights and he advises that suitable legislation should be passed in order to enable full enforcement<sup>9</sup> of the Convention of the Rights of Persons with Disabilities<sup>10</sup>, which was ratified by Slovenia in April in 2002.

"The erased"

The problematic of the so-called “erased” represents the gravest systemic act of discrimination in Slovenia, dating back to the dissolution of the SFRY and the consequent independence of Slovenia. After the declaration of independence (June 25th 1991) all citizens of Socialistic Republic of Slovenia were automatically granted citizenship of the new Republic of Slovenia, while citizens of other former SFRY republics, registered as permanent residents, had six months to request it. Those (25,671 people according to the report of MNZ from 2009<sup>11</sup> 21% of them were children<sup>12</sup>) who failed to acquire citizenship for whatever reason, were removed from the Register of Permanent Residents (Register stalnega prebivalstva) on February 26th 1992 by local authorities, acting on the bases of unpublished internal instructions of the Ministry of Interior (Ministerstvo za notranje zadeve, MNZ) – arbitrarily and illegally. The erased were denied any legal status, they became illegal residents unable to obtain documents, hold jobs, travel or exercise any social rights.<sup>13</sup> This problematic has been a hot political topic in Slovenia in past 20 years; though the Constitutional Court found the erasure unconstitutional,<sup>14</sup> populist rhetoric about enemies of state, traitors etc. was always present, blocking any serious attempts at repairing the unbearable situation. “/.../ several non-governmental organisations, including Amnesty International and Helsinki Monitor, and the Slovenian Human Rights Ombudsman issued reports drawing attention to the situation of the “erased”.”<sup>15</sup>

The Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights delivered a judgment on June 26th 2012. It is a pilot judgment granting damages to 6 plaintiffs, but it is also a general condemnation of this behaviour as a mass violation of the European Convention of Humans Rights (violations of Article 8 regarding private and family life, Article 13 regarding effective legal remedy and Article 14 regarding discrimination). Besides granting damages to the plaintiffs, the Court also ordered Slovenia to set up an ad hoc mechanism for recognition of compensations to the erased.<sup>16</sup>

NGOs and human rights activists welcomed the judgment.<sup>17</sup> The Government did not, as is to be expected. It is too early to draw any conclusions regarding the situation and its further development but such a complex issue is bound to take time and willingness of the authorities; personal agony of the erased itself is sadly beyond repair, even if the damages were to be astronomical.

Sexual orientation

LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transsexual) persons are another group constantly facing different forms of discrimination in different fields. They are, however, protected by the Constitution, which is granting equal human rights and fundamental freedoms to all, irrespective of their personal circumstance.<sup>18</sup> Though marriage is reserved for heterosexuals, same-sex partners can register their union: this area is regulated by Registration of Same-Sex Civil Partnership Act (Zakon o registraciji istospolne partnerske skupnosti – ZRIPS)<sup>19</sup> which is relevant in the matters of “procedure and conditions of the registration of same-sex civil partnership, legal consequences of such registration, the manner of termination of the registered civil partnership, the relationship between civil partners on termination of the registered same-sex civil partnership”<sup>20</sup>. According to ZRIPS, same-sex partnership is a relationship between two women or two men, who registered as civil partners.<sup>21</sup> Although the process of registration is different to that of marriage (it’s more bureaucratic and conducted by the administrative units), it creates a similar legal status as the one between partners of different sex: “By virtue of civil partnership registration civil partners have the right to subsistence and maintenance, the right to jointly owned property and regulation of property relations within civil partnership, the occupancy right, the right to inherit a part of jointly owned property from the deceased partner and the right to obtain information about the health condition of the sick partner and to visit him or her in the healthcare institutions.; Civil partners are bound to mutual respect, trust and assistance.”<sup>22</sup>

Concerning acts of discrimination, typical examples are education (firstly because this topic is considered a taboo and isn't included in learning process and secondly because of verbal and physical abuse of LGBT youth by their peers)<sup>23</sup>; the field of employment<sup>24</sup>; healthcare (cases of doctors who consider homosexuality a disease; mild, because is based solely on a questioner distributed among donors, but highly controversial prohibition of blood donation for gay man).<sup>25</sup> There is also a problem of violence – physical and verbal – based solely on sexual orientation, which often remains unreported.<sup>26</sup> Discrimination in the mentioned areas remains largely undetected due to the fact that LGBT people fear to report to authorities because of the high levels of prejudices in society.

These prejudices were manifested clearly during the referendum campaign<sup>27</sup> for new family law legislation (Family Code) which proposed a new, broader definition of family (basing it on the child instead on man-woman relationship). The referendum and the rejected bill are worth mentioning because they showed that the "average voter" prefers a conservative definition of family (that was one of the main points of the campaign against – to keep the family as god supposedly intended it to be, ignoring the social reality, on which the proposal was drafted). Since the referendum campaign was bound to focus on rejection of homosexual part of population (especially their aspirations for the possibility of forming a family) and all forms of non-traditional families, Slovenian Parliament (Državni Zbor Republike Slovenije) requested the Constitutional Court (Ustavno sodišče Republike Slovenije – US RS) to decide whether it would be constitutional to hold referendum on the issue (majority voting on the rights of minority). The Constitutional Court decided that the referendum was complying with Constitutional provisions.<sup>28</sup>

However, the overall situation for LGBT persons is less grim compared to other countries in the region (West Balkans – ex. SFRY). A Gay pride parade in capital Ljubljana is organised every year since 2001<sup>29</sup>, it is accepted as a traditional event and not troubled by violent outbursts.

Other discrimination detected by Ombudsman

In total, Ombudsman received 49 complaints regarding discrimination in 2011 – 24 regarding the rights of minorities (Roma community), 9 regarding discrimination in the field of employment (rights of disabled) and 5 regarding equal opportunities of sexes. Ombudsman is recommending adopting statutory solutions that would be in accordance with the EU's legal order and would guarantee independence and autonomy of the specialized authorities for protection against discrimination.<sup>30</sup>

Family Protection

- ii. What is the definition given to the term “family” in your national legislation or Constitution? What is the status of marriage? What is the average marital age of the population?

Definition of family

Basic policies regarding family (family protection) are included in the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia<sup>31</sup> starting from Article 53 (Marriage and the Family): "Marriage is based on the equality of spouses. Marriages shall be solemnised before an empowered state authority.; Marriage and the legal relations within it and the family, as well as those within an extramarital union, shall be regulated by law.; The state shall protect the family, motherhood, fatherhood, children, and young people and shall create the necessary conditions for such protection."<sup>32</sup>, continuing with Article 54 (Rights and Duties of Parents): "Parents have the right and duty to maintain, educate, and raise their children. This right and duty may be revoked or restricted only for such reasons as are provided by law in order to protect the child's interests.; Children born out of wedlock have the same rights as children born within it."<sup>33</sup>, Article 55 (Freedom of Choice in Childbearing)<sup>34</sup> and Article 56 (Rights of Children)<sup>35</sup>. Constitution is oriented towards defining general guidelines for further legislation, thus focused on proclaiming state's dedication to international standards of human rights.

Definitions themselves can be found in the legislation on this particular field, the Marriage and Family Relations Act (Zakon o zakonski zvezi in družinskih razmerjih – ZZZDR)<sup>36</sup>. In Article 2 the definition of family is the following: family is living union of the parents and the children, especially protected on the bases of child protection<sup>37</sup>.

Status of marriage

Marriage is defined in Article 3 ZZZDR as a legally regulated living union of husband and wife. This article also defines the meaning of marriage as a start-point of conceiving family.<sup>38</sup> Marriage is based on the equality of partners and their free will (both in case of marriage and its dissolution). Legal age for marriage is 18 years (legal capacity is also a condition; but there are certain cases when people under 18 – at least 15 years old can get married, but only with permission of social services), marriage is only possible between two people of different sexes, who aren't already married or directly related.<sup>39</sup> Consensual union of partners is also legally regulated: long lasting unions between two people who decided not to get married entails the same legal consequences as marriage (given that partners could legally marry).<sup>40</sup> Such a union is recognized by law as equivalent to marriage in every respect,<sup>41</sup> which means that all the rules regarding the relationship between partners, property, dissolution, etc. that are regulated by ZZZDR in the chapter “Marriage”<sup>42</sup> are applicable to durable living community of a man and a woman who have not concluded marriage.

The bill mentioned is regulating most aspects of family and child protection, relations, etc. It is quite conservative, partially due to its age (it was passed in 1976); for years Family Law specialists were preparing a new bill with a more modern and integral approach to the matter (Family Code): it included a new definition of family (which put the child at the centre as the constituent of the family itself) and many other changes. However these were rejected by the voters during the referendum in 2012<sup>43</sup> and the previous definitions were maintained.

Average marital age

Data for 2011 released by The Statistical Office of Republic of Slovenia (Statistični urad RS – SURS) shows that average marital age of women was 31.2 years (or 29.1 years for women getting married for the first time) and 34 (or 31.4 – first marriage) years for men.

For comparison<sup>44</sup>:

Table 1: Average marital age

YEAR	1980	1990	2000	2010	2011
men	27,5	28,7	31,4	33,7	34,0
women	24,1	25,4	28,4	30,8	31,2
Getting married for the first time:
Men	25,5	26,6	29,4	31,2	31,4
women	22,5	23,8	26,6	28,6	29,1

In 2011, 56.8% of all children born in Slovenia were born out of wedlock. For comparison:<sup>45</sup>

Tabele 2: Born out of wedlock

YEAR	1981	1991	2001	2010	2011
Born alive out of wedlock (%)	14,1	26,4	39,4	55,7	56,8

We can observe a trend of growing of the average marital age. More than half of the live-born children's parents weren't married – the percentage is also expected to grow. Legal marriage is obviously not any kind of condition for starting family in eyes of future parents.

Child Protection

- iii. What is the general status of children within the respective States' cultural and historical background? What is the general approach to children rights issues in the respective state? Is there a general concern regarding children/children rights? Were there/are there any violations that has been caught the eye of the media or the legislators?

General status of children within cultural and historical background

Cultural and historical background of this issue in Slovenia is not dramatically different from that of the region. Before the World Wars and industrialisation, population mainly depended on agriculture and children were considered farm-workforce. Education was secondary and only few lucky and talented had the opportunity to pursue the “respected” professions (such as lawyer or a priest). The influence of the Catholic Church was relevant: as elsewhere, it had sole authority on questions of family, morals, etc. As a consequence there were cases of illegitimate (“bastard”) children and their mothers were scrutinized and mocked.

In the modern society, the status of children changed exceedingly. Accordingly with opinions represented in sociological literature of some critical authors, we can say that today a child is a “little king or queen”, subject/object of great affection of the parents who would do anything to please their children. One could argue though, that children are still “little slaves”, no longer in the context of physical labour, but in the context of their parents’ expectations (such as success in school etc.). Parents see their children as an investment (both material and emotional) and, accordingly with general trend of a growing preoccupation in all fields of society, parents are hysterically afraid for their children lives and are demanding constant and strict supervision over them: which is evident to anyone, since fences and video-surveillance around kindergartens and schools are very common. The greatest of fears is, of course, the fear of paedophilia: always lurking in every parent’s nightmare – it is a stranger, a pervert, never one of “us”, but one of “them” – evil and soulless monster, deserving no less than death or at least castration. In this abyss of moral panic, targeting the outsider (perhaps a priest or a teacher: parents learnt fast not to trust outsiders who pretend to “be in”), the problem of abuse in the circle of nuclear family is known – but it is never “our” family and it remains more or less a taboo.<sup>46</sup>

General approach to children rights issues

The Constitution of RS proclaims a focus on the protection of children’s rights: “Children shall enjoy special protection and care. Children shall enjoy human rights and fundamental freedoms consistent with their age and maturity. Children shall be guaranteed special protection from economic, social, physical, mental, or other exploitation and abuse. Such protection shall be regulated by law; Children and minors who are not cared for by their parents, who have no parents or who are without proper family care shall enjoy the special protection of the state. Their position shall be regulated by law.”<sup>47</sup> Slovenia is also bound by the Convention on Rights of the Child<sup>48</sup> which was taken into account when the Constitution was drafted.

The detailed regulation on children rights is to be found in laws. Of great importance are laws regulating social aspects, granting children basic conditions for a healthy development. A quick overview of relevant legislation: Parental Protection and Family

Another important aspect is publicly organised education, which is also granted by the Constitution: "Freedom of education shall be guaranteed; Primary education is compulsory and shall be financed with public funds; The state shall create the opportunities for citizens to obtain a proper education."<sup>53</sup> Slovenia has a well-developed system of pre-school education, regulated by Nursery Schools Act (Zakon o vrtcih – ZVrt)<sup>54</sup>. It is based on equal possibilities of access to educational care services for pre-school children and a free choice of educational care programmes. Pre-school education takes place in public and private kindergartens. Primary education is provided by elementary schools, elementary schools with adapted curriculums (for children with special needs) and institutions for the education of children and young people with special needs and is regulated by the Elementary Schools Act (Zakon o osnovni šoli – ZOs)<sup>55</sup>. The proportion of pupils completing elementary school is around 98.5%.<sup>56</sup> Secondary education is also equally accessible to all children and the compulsory curriculum is free.

Welfare, healthcare, public education, etc., even when not directly linked only to children, enable development of society in which at least some (if not equal) opportunities are available to all. The situation in Slovenia is quite decent, but in light of austerity-mania, system is likely to progress backwards instead of forwards – since the process of disintegration of welfare state is just beginning, it is too early to comment, but widening gap between "the rich" and "the poor" it is bringing is to have its imprint on the rights of the children since they depend greatly on the social status of their parents.

Concern regarding children/children rights

There seem to be a general concern regarding children (and their rights), since most people react emotionally to this issue. The rights of the children are an important topic in civil society in general. There are also many NGOs and civil society groups advocating for children rights (from many different aspects). The basic aims of the Convention on the Rights of the Child are included in a broad spectrum of legislation, policy and programmes in the areas of social assistance and services, health, education and sport, family policy, employment, culture, internal affairs and justice, which enable the implementation of children's rights as defined by the Convention.<sup>57</sup>

Relevant legislation regarding the implementation of international treaties

The Constitution of Republic of Slovenia says at Article 8: "Laws and other regulations must comply with generally accepted principles of international law and with treaties that are binding on Slovenia. Ratified and published treaties shall be applied directly".<sup>58</sup> Furthermore, Constitution is regulating the hierarchy of legal norms, stating international law above laws of the state (Article 153/2): "Laws must be in conformity with generally accepted principles of international law and with valid treaties ratified by the National Assembly, whereas regulations and other general legal acts must also be in conformity with other ratified treaties".<sup>59</sup> For prevention of situation of collision between the Constitution and international treaties, the Constitutional Court issued an opinion on conformity (Article 160/2): "In the process of ratifying a treaty, the Constitutional Court, on the proposal of the President of the Republic, the Government, or a third of the deputies of the National Assembly, issues an opinion on the conformity of such treaty with the Constitution. The National Assembly is bound by the opinion of the Constitutional Court".<sup>60</sup>

More detailed provisions are to be found in Foreign Affairs Act (Zakon o zunanjih zadevah)<sup>61</sup>: it regulates all relevant issues regarding international treaties (definitions, procedures, ratification, etc). The process of negotiations etc. is conducted by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (Ministerstvo za zunanje zadeve - MZZ), ratification itself is conducted by the National Assembly, or in some cases, the Government.<sup>62</sup> It also regulates the situation of collision between international treaty and Slovenian law/other regulation: in this case, the Government is obliged to either change the law (most common solution) or withdraw the participation in the international treaty. Until this process is completed, international treaty remains in use.<sup>63</sup>

Regarding the relationship between State law and international treaties, Slovenia is leaning towards dualistic approach. Considering that in most countries, neither monistic or dualistic approach appears in pure form, we could describe Slovenian approach as a softer version of dualism<sup>64</sup>, more concretely as adoption<sup>65</sup> of international treaty, granting it direct legal consequence, since no special transformation of international norm is needed (National Assembly passes it as a bill, but without any changes to the original text). Once norm is adopted it is applied directly.<sup>66</sup>

Convention on Rights of the Child

The Convention was ratified by former SFRY<sup>67</sup> on December 14th 1990. Accordingly with the rules of succession<sup>68</sup>, Republic of Slovenia is the legal successor of the treaty, effective date being July 1st 1992<sup>69</sup>. Reservation was made upon succession: "The Republic of Slovenia reserves the right not to apply paragraph 1 of article 9 of the Convention since the internal legislation of the Republic of Slovenia provides for the right of competent authorities (centres for social work) to determine on separation of a child from his/her parents without a previous judicial review"<sup>70</sup>. Reservation was withdrawn in 1999.<sup>71</sup>

Slovenia also ratified Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Involvement of Children in Armed Conflict<sup>72</sup> and Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography<sup>73</sup>.

General status of implementation

In Slovenia the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child is applied directly.<sup>74</sup> It was also included in the Constitution in the chapter related to human rights and fundamental freedoms and children's rights.<sup>75</sup> General conditions for its realization are established by constitutionally granted rule of law, social state, democratic pluralism and a parliamentary democracy.<sup>76</sup> Human Rights Ombudsman is responsible for supervision of children's rights and also works on awareness and education of general public, children and youth on these issues.

The Committee on the Rights of the Child in its consideration of the Slovene periodical report<sup>77</sup> states that progress has been made in the area of protection of the rights of the child. It welcomes constructive approach to the matter and recognizes that some positive legislative changes had been made.<sup>78</sup> It does however suggest further improvements to various fields that would strengthen the protection of all aspects of rights of the child. In this it emphasizes that the gap exists between law and practice, and that legislative changes that otherwise mean significant improvement, need more effective measures for their implementation. It recommends to develop systematic and on-going training programs on human rights, including children's rights, for all persons working for and with children (e.g. judges, lawyers, law enforcement officials, civil servants, local government officials, teachers, health personnel and especially children themselves) and also encourages Slovenia to strengthen its cooperation with NGOs and involve NGOs and other sectors of civil society working with and for children more systematically throughout all stages of the implementation of the Convention and to improve the financing of NGOs while respecting their autonomy.<sup>79</sup> Slovenia has since adopted Guidelines for drafting reports on behalf of Republic Slovenia and

To address this problem a new selection of statistical indicators that will allow proper monitoring of progress in achieving the goals for the benefit of children, is in progress.<sup>86</sup>

xxiii. When did the State ratify the European Convention on Human Rights?

Slovenia ratified the European Convention on Human rights on 28 June 1994.

xxiv. Is the state a party to the Lanzarote Convention? Date of signature and ratification? Did the country make any reservations to the Convention/opt out of any parts?

The Lanzarote convention, the Council of Europe Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse entered into force on the 1st July 2010 with regard to the 5 member states which ratified it. Slovenia is also a party to the Lanzarote convention. The date of signature of this convention is 25 October 2007. We are still waiting for ratification of the Lanzarote convention.

If not ratified:

xxv. Does the State plan to ratify the convention? If so, what is the plan for the ratification and when can this ratification is being expected? If not, what are the obstacles hindering a ratification?

Slovenia is expecting the ratification and implementation of the Lanzarote convention as soon as possible. The main obstacle of ratification may be that we do not talk about this topic so often as we should and that is also one of the reasons that in 2012 our Legal research group decided to take part in One in Five campaign, the Council of Europe

Campaign to stop sexual violence against children. We hope that our research and also researches of other groups will make the ratification and implementation of the Lanzarote convention easier.

In 2012 Criminal law was already adapted to the Convention, namely, we adopted a new Article 173.a, "Grooming", saying that whoever person under the age of fifteen years, through information and communication technologies addresses a meeting in order to make sexual assault against him or by making images, audio, or other items of a pornographic or otherwise sexually explicit material, and this proposal has been followed by concrete actions to achieve the meeting, shall be punished with imprisonment up to one year.

Slovenia also participated in Regional conference in Croatia where the stop to sexual violence against children - ratifying and implementing the Council of Europe Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse – was discussed. This Regional Conference was in October 2011.<sup>90</sup>

xxvi. What would be the rank of the Lanzarote Convention under the State's national legal order when ratified?

According to our constitution, The Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, laws and regulations must comply with generally accepted principles of international law and with treaties that are binding on Slovenia. Ratified and published treaties shall be applied directly.<sup>91</sup>

The Republic of Slovenia lies at the heart of Europe is a small country in size (covering about 20.000 km<sup>2</sup>) and population (2 million inhabitants), located at a major crossroads in Central Europe, where Roman, German and Slavic culture meet. Slovenian territory was part of the Roman Empire and it was devastated by Barbarian incursions in late Antiquity and Early Middle Ages, since the main route from the Pannonian plain to Italy ran through present-day Slovenia. Alpine Slavs, ancestors of modern-day Slovenes settled the area in the late 6th Century A.D. The Holy Roman Empire controlled the land for nearly 1000 years, and between the mid 14th century and 1918 most of Slovenia was under Habsburg power. In 1918, Slovenes joined Yugoslavia, while the west of the country was annexed to Italy. Between 1945 and 1990, Slovenia was under Yugoslav Communist regime. The country gained its independence from Yugoslavia in June 1991, and is today a modern state and a member of the European Union and NATO. Slovenia became an EU member on 1 May 2004.

The Republic of Slovenia is a parliamentary representative democratic republic since 25 June 1991 with central government. Under the Constitution, Slovenia is a democratic republic and a social state governed by law. The state's authority is based on the principle of the separation of legislative, executive and judicial powers, with a parliamentary system of government. The highest legislative authority is the National Assembly (90 deputies), which has the right to enact laws. Elections to the National Assembly are held every four years.

- xii. About the general approach of the National legislation to Human Rights, how does the State legislate Human Rights? Is there a “Bill of Rights” within the respective country or are human rights mentioned in the Constitution as fundamental principles? When was this Constitution/Bill of Rights created? Are there any specific provisions regarding Children Rights?

As the Constitution states, “Slovenia is a state of all its citizens, and is founded on the permanent and inalienable right of the Slovenian nation to self-determination.” It rests on the foundations of the legal system, which is based on respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, on the principle of a legal and socially just state. This means that we do not have »Bill of rights« as we have human rights mentioned in the Constitution as fundamental freedoms.

The Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia is the fundamental law of Republic of Slovenia and it was adopted by the Slovenian National Assembly on December 23, 1991. Children rights are mentioned also in the Constitution in Article 56:

»Children shall enjoy special protection and care. Children shall enjoy human rights and fundamental freedoms consistent with their age and maturity. Children shall be guaranteed special protection from economic, social, physical, mental or other exploitation and abuse. Such protection shall be regulated by law. Children and minors who are not cared for by their parents, who have no parents or who are without proper family care shall enjoy the special protection of the state. Their position shall be regulated by law.«<sup>92</sup>

- xiii. Are there specific judicial bodies which monitor the implementation of international and national human rights instruments (for example Constitutional Courts etc.)? Can individuals claim their constitutional rights directly (e.g. direct effect)? Is there a Constitutional Court? Is it possible to apply individually? If not, how can the individuals claim their constitutional rights in case of violation? Is there a system of hierarchy or other jurisdictions to ask before being able to go before Constitutional/Supreme Court? Please, briefly describe the application process.

Under the Constitution, the Republic of Slovenia has an Ombudsman whose responsibility is the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms in relation to state authorities, local authorities, and persons in public office. The Ombudsman is proposed by the President of the Republic and elected by the National Assembly by a two-thirds majority vote for a period of six years, and the possibility of another term. A two-thirds majority vote gives the Ombudsman the necessary legitimacy imperative for his/her work. The Ombudsman reports to the National Assembly annually. The annual reports have become an important reflection of the situation regarding basic human rights and freedoms in Slovenia. The law allows the Ombudsman or anyone else to initiate proceedings against violations of human rights.

In Slovenia the Constitutional Court is the highest authority with regard to the protection of constitutionality, legality, human rights and basic freedoms. It may act as a negative legislature and abrogate an act or part of an act. Constitutional Judges are appointed by the National Assembly following nominations from the President of the Republic.

Proceedings before the Constitutional Court are regulated by law (Constitutional Court Act). The law determines who may require the initiation of proceedings before the Constitutional Court.

The request may be made by the National Assembly, at least one third of members of the National Assembly, the Council of State, the government, the court, the public prosecutor, the Bank of Slovenia, the Court of Auditors, if a question of the constitutionality and legality is in relation to proceedings conducted by them, the Ombudsman in connection with an individual case, representative bodies of local communities, if rights are threatened local communities, representative trade unions of the country, where workers' rights are threatened.

Anyone who demonstrates legal interest may request the initiation of proceedings before the Constitutional Court.

Interest in bringing the initiative is given, if a regulation or general act issued for the exercise of public powers, which review the petitioner, directly interferes with their rights, legal interests, or legal status.

The Constitutional Court decides by a majority vote of all its judges, unless otherwise provided for individual cases by the Constitution or law. The Constitutional Court may decide whether to initiate proceedings following a constitutional complaint with fewer judges as provided by law.<sup>93</sup>

xiv. Is there a Criminal Supreme Court? Please, briefly describe the criminal procedure.

We do not have a Supreme criminal court in Slovenia, but criminal department at Supreme Court. For the first instance local and district courts are competent. In the second stage, in the event of an appeal against a decision at first instance and in some other cases, higher courts are competent. On top of the pyramid there is a Supreme Court, the highest court in the country.

Slovenian criminal procedure consists of four phases: the pre-trial procedure, the filing of the charges (indictment), the trial and the judicial review procedures (appeal against judgments of the court of first instance and the so-called extraordinary remedies). Pre-trial procedure consists of two parts: preliminary proceedings (with the police as the dominus litis) and the investigation phase as the predominantly judicial phase, with the investigating judge in charge.

The criminal procedure usually starts with the filing of a report of an offence to the police or state prosecutor. After the police investigation (usually informal interviews with the suspect and witnesses, the investigation of the scene of the crime, the examination of the real evidence, search of the premises, etc.) the matter is transferred to the state prosecutor. The state prosecutor decides whether there is a well-grounded suspicion. If yes, a call for a formal investigation is issued (in cases of serious or complex criminal offences), or the so-called direct indictment is filed.

In case the investigating judge starts the investigation, the investigation is conducted with the purpose of gathering evidences for the prosecutor to decide whether to file an indictment or drop the case. The investigating judge, who is bound by the inquisitorial maxim, conducts the investigation at his or her own initiative. In the investigation phase, the investigating judge has most of the investigative powers, although he or she may transfer these to the police for the execution of certain investigative acts.

After the investigation phase is concluded, the file is submitted to the state prosecutor who may decide to file an indictment, consider the matter in an alternative way or to drop the case. After filing the indictment, the defendant or the trial judge may file an objection to the charging document if in his or her view there are no grounds to proceed. The objection is then decided by a panel of three judges. When the indictment becomes final the case is submitted to trial.

The trial is organized mostly in the accusatorial manner; however, the court is bound to seek the truth. The trial closes after the pronouncement of the judgment, which can be a finding of guilt, acquittal or rejection of the charge. If there is no appeal, the judgment becomes final in fifteen days after the judgment has been served on the accused in regular proceedings and after eight days after summary proceedings. The appeal may be filed by the accused, certain of his or her relatives, the state prosecutor and the injured party. The appeal is decided by the court of second instance. The final judgment may also be reviewed, usually by the Supreme Court, through extraordinary legal remedies.<sup>94</sup> xv. What is the age of criminal liability? Are there any statistics available regarding children prisoners?

Offenders can be divided into five categories:

- 1.) Children below the age of 14 may not be held criminally liable.
- 2.) Juveniles who at the time of the commission of an offence had reached the age of 14 but not yet 16 (minors) are criminally liable, but only educational measures may be applied. Safety measures (with the exception of a prohibition to engage in certain occupations) may also be ordered.
- 3.) Juveniles who at the time of the commission of an offence had reached the age of 16 but not yet 18 (so-called "older juveniles") are criminally liable. In general educational measures may be applied, but in exceptional cases the court may impose juvenile detention or a fine. In addition a driving license may be revoked and banishment from the country may be imposed as accessory sentences. Also all safety measures except for a prohibition to engage in certain occupations may be ordered.
- 4.) In case the offender is a so-called "young adult", i.e. he or she has committed an offence as an adult but has not yet reached the age of twenty-one by the end of the trial, the court may instead of imposing an imprisonment sentence, order that he or she be placed under the supervision of the social services or may impose any institutional measure (these two are educational measures primarily reserved for juveniles).

5.) Adult offenders.<sup>95</sup>

Slovene courts sentence only less than 2% of juvenile offenders to prison while approximately 6% are placed into institutions for residential treatment. The comparison with other European countries leads to the conclusion that Slovenia is one of the countries with the lowest share of juveniles in prison or pre-trial detention.

A juvenile prison sentence can only be imposed in the case of a serious offence (for which a sentence of five years or more is prescribed). When a prison sentence is imposed the judge needs to explain why an educational measure would not be appropriate. We can conclude that Slovenia has taken into account the recommendations as stipulated in international documents as regards the purpose of a prison sentence for juveniles: rehabilitation and not punishment.

Even though a prison sentence of up to ten years can be imposed in Slovenia, in the period between 2001 and 2007 this sentence was only imposed on a single juvenile offender, while 73% of the imprisoned juveniles received prison sentences of up to two years.

Only a low percentage of juvenile prisoners serve the entire sentence, most of them are released on probation before the full sentence runs out. Once the juvenile serves one third of his sentence a special Ministry of Justice committee makes the decision regarding probation release. Between 2001 and 2007, 43 juveniles were released from juvenile prison; only six of them served their entire sentences, 29 were released on probation on average six months before their full sentence.<sup>96</sup>

There is one (older) statistic, regarding juveniles prisoners:

2 SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW

2.1 Sexual Abuse

lviii. How does the national legislation define the term “sexual activities”? Is it to be applied broadly or narrowly?

Slovenian law does not directly define the term “sexual activities”. The only terms used in the Articles 170, 172, 173 and 174 of Slovenian Criminal Code are sexual intercourse, sexual behaviour and sexual act. In his Commentary of the Criminal Code Mitja Deisinger defines sexual intercourse as a natural merging of female and male genitals. The concept of sexual act by definition covers all actions where the sexual urges are being met using the body of the victim but are not sexual intercourse. “This includes all insertions of the male sexual organ (if the perpetrator is male) in the body of the sexual partner (male or female), that are similar to sexual intercourse, such as anal sexual intercourse, oral sexual intercourse, intercourse using the breasts, thighs, etc. and all other actions where the intent is to sexually satisfy the perpetrator (male or female), such as the touching of the genitals (without attempt of rape, masturbation of the victim, or forcing the victim into masturbation of the perpetrator, invasion of the victim’s genitals and similar behaviour.”<sup>97</sup>

This means all actions committed by the perpetrator where the intention is sexual arousal or satisfaction of the perpetrator’s sexual urges and which include physical touching of the bodies or body parts of the perpetrator and the victim.<sup>98</sup>

From this we can conclude that the term “sexual activities” has a broad definition and usage.

lix. Does the law define and interpret the word “intentionally”? What is the criminal liability of an intentionally committed crime of sexual abuse?

Slovenian Criminal Code defines the word “intent” in Article 25 as:

“A criminal offence shall be committed with intent if the perpetrator was aware of his act and wanted to perform it, or was aware that an unlawful consequence might result from his conduct but he nevertheless let such consequence to occur.”

Slovenian Criminal Code protects children from sexual behaviour and other various sexual contacts with numerous types of criminalization. These crimes are defined in Chapter 19, entitled Criminal Offences against Sexual Integrity, and in Chapter 21, entitled Criminal Offences against Marriage, Family, and Youth. In the general part of the Criminal Code the Slovenian criminal law defines the term child as any person under the age of fourteen.

Article 21 of Slovenian Criminal Code states the following: “Any person who committed a criminal offence when he was under the age of 14 years (a child), cannot be a perpetrator of a criminal offence.”

With this provision the age limit of criminal responsibility is set at the age of 14.

Slovenian criminal law protects all persons under the age of 15 from any sexual behaviour and other sexual contact, and protects all underage persons, that is persons under the age of 18 from Exploitation through Prostitution (Article 175) and Incest (Article 195). An important limitation exists in the event of Sexual Assault on a Person Below Fifteen Years of Age (Article 173) and crime of recruiting persons under the age of fifteen for sexual purposes (Article 173 a), since in the event of the act being committed with a person of appropriate age and mental capacity, illegality is not an issue.

lx. What is the legal age for engaging in sexual activities? How are consensual sexual activities between minors regulated?

The legal age for consensual participation in sexual behaviour is fifteen. Consensual sexual acts among persons under the age of fifteen or among underage persons are not specifically governed by law, but are also not illegal.

lxi. How is the use of force, taking advantage of disability or threat regulated in regards to sexual offences against children?

Use of force, taking advantage of a disabled person or threat in the case of sexual intercourse or any other sexual act towards a person under the age of fifteen is considered a major crime of rape or sexual violence.

The first paragraph of Article 173 of Slovenian Criminal Code states the following: “Whoever has sexual intercourse or performs any lewd act with a person of the same or opposite sex under the age of fifteen years shall be sentenced to imprisonment for not less than three and not more than eight years.”

The second paragraph of Article 173 defines the major crime of sexual assault on a person under the age of fifteen as: “Whoever commits the offence under the preceding paragraph against the defenceless person under the age of fifteen or by threatening him/her with imminent attack on life or limb shall be sentenced to imprisonment for not less than five and not more than fifteen years.”

Legal indicators of a criminal offence in the second paragraph of Article 173 are the same as legal indicators of the criminal offence of rape from paragraph one of Article 170 and the legal indicators of the criminal offence of sexual violence from paragraph one of Article 171, except that in the case of paragraph two of Article 173 the person in question is under the age of fifteen. Use of force in order to achieve sexual intercourse with a person aged fifteen or over is defined as general criminal offence of rape.

The perpetrator of such an offence can be either male or female, but the offence can only be committed intentionally. The perpetrator must be aware of the fact that the victim is under fifteen years of age.

lxii. How is the crime of “incest” regulated?

The crime of incest is defined in Slovenian Criminal Law in Article 195 of the Criminal Code, in Chapter 21 – Offences against Marriage, Family, and Youth. Article 195 states the following: “An adult who has sexual intercourse with an underage lineal relative or underage brother or sister shall be sentenced to imprisonment for not more than two years.”

Incest is punishable only if the male or female involved is the father, mother, grandfather or grandmother of the underage person, or their brother or sister.

In order for the criminal offence of incest to be committed, sexual intercourse must take place between a male and a female, and can only be done intentionally. The perpetrator must be aware of the fact that they are having sexual intercourse with an underage linear relative, or their own brother or sister. In the case of an actual mistake, such as in the case where the perpetrator is unaware of any family relationship, as in the case of half-siblings not knowing each other, or when a father has sexual intercourse with his daughter in the dark under the impression of having intercourse with a different female, or when a illegitimate father is unaware of his daughter etc., the criminal offence of incest is not an issue.

Linear relatives can, given the relationship in this Article (sexual intercourse of an adult perpetrator with an underage relative), only be the underage (under the age of eighteen) son, daughter, grandson, granddaughter, etc. of the perpetrator. Half-siblings are included in the terms brother or sister of the perpetrator. Whether or not the relationship is legitimate or illegitimate is of no importance.

Sexual intercourse between underage blood relatives is not punishable by law. Sexual intercourse between blood relatives of age is also not punishable by law.

The criminal offence of incest is defined as sexual intercourse between an adult perpetrator and an underage person, who are related to each other by blood. If force is used as a mean of achieving sexual intercourse and the victim is over the age of fifteen, the charge will be the crime of rape. If the victim is under the age of fifteen, the charge will be qualified as a criminal offence of sexual assault on a person under the age of fifteen.

lxiii. Are there any specific provisions regulating offenders who take advantage of school and educational settings, care and justice institutions, the workplace and the community?

The third paragraph of Article 173 of the Criminal Code states the following: “A teacher, educator, guardian, adoptive parent, parent, priest, doctor or any other person who through the abuse of his position has sexual intercourse or performs any lewd act with a person under the age of fifteen and whom he is entrusted to teach, educate, protect or care for shall be sentenced to imprisonment for not less than three and not more than ten years.”

This is considered a severe form of sexual assault on a person under the age of fifteen, considering the privileged position of the perpetrator. The perpetrator can be the child’s teacher, educator, guardian, adoptive parent, parent (mother or father), priest, doctor or any other person in the position of authority over the child. This is a person who abuses their privileged position of authority. The abuse is shown primarily through abuse of the position of authority through awarding or promising any material or other gains, or through threats of worsening the child’s position if the child should refuse the sexual intercourse.<sup>99</sup>

2.2 Child Prostitution

- lxiv. Is the State a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Human Trafficking? If yes, what is the date of ratification and signature? If not, is the State planning to ratify the Convention?

The Republic of Slovenia is party to the agreement of the Convention of the Council of Europe on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings. The convention was signed on April 3rd 2006 and ratified on September 3rd 2009. In Slovenia, the convention entered into force on January 1st 2010.

- lxv. How does national legislation define “child prostitution”? Is it compatible with the definition in Article 19(2) of the Lanzarote Convention? Please comment.

Slovenian Criminal Code does not directly define child prostitution. However it does criminalize exploitation through prostitution in Article 175, and states: “Whoever participates for exploitative purposes in the prostitution of another or instructs, obtains or encourages another to engage in prostitution with force, threats or deception shall be given a prison sentence of between three months and five years.”

In the second paragraph of the same Article it defines the qualified form as: “If an offence from the preceding paragraph is committed against a minor, against more than one person or as part of a criminal organisation, the perpetrator shall be given a prison sentence of between one and ten years.”

- lxvi. Does national legislation criminalize both the recruiter (the person that coordinates the business of child prostitution) and the user (the person that pays to conduct sexual activities with children)?

According to Slovenian criminal law, both the recruiter and the user of childhood prostitution shall be penalized for their offences, as is stated in the second paragraph of Article 175 of the Criminal Code.

2.3 Child Pornography

Child Pornography in General:

- lxvii. Is the State party to the Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime? If yes, what is the date of ratification and signature? If not, is the State planning to ratify?

The Republic of Slovenia is party to the agreement of the Convention of the Council of Europe on Cybercrime. The convention was signed on July 24th 2002 and ratified on September 8th 2004. In Slovenia, the convention entered into force on January 1st 2005.

- lxviii. How does the national legislation define “child pornography”? Is it compatible with the definition in Article 20(2) of the Lanzarote Convention? Please comment.

Slovenian Criminal Code does not directly define the term “child pornography” as the term is defined in the second paragraph of Article 20 of the Lanzarote Convention. Legal theory and case-law complement this concept.

- lxix. To whom does the State attribute the criminal liability to? Is it compatible with the Article 20(1.a) to (1.f)?

The Criminal Code criminalizes any public exhibition, production, possession or distribution of pornographic material and penalizes whoever sells, presents or publicly exhibits documents, pictures or audio-visual or other items of a pornographic nature to a person under fifteen years of age, enables them to gain access to these in any other way or shows them a pornographic or other sexual performance (first paragraph of Article 176). A prison sentence of between six months and five years shall be given to whoever abuses a minor in order to produce pictures or audio-visual or other items of a pornographic or other sexual nature, or uses them in a pornographic or other sexual performance or is knowingly present at such performance (second paragraph of Article 176). The third paragraph of the same Article sets the same punishment for anyone who for themselves or others produces, distributes, sells, imports, exports or otherwise supplies pornographic or other sexual material depicting minors or their realistic images, or possesses such material, or uses access to such material using information and communication technologies, or discloses the identity of a minor in such material. In Slovenia the most common term used for such material is material which includes sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children.

lxx. What is the control mechanism for pornographic materials? If the state is a party to the Lanzarote Convention, did the state use the reservation right that has been given to them in the Lanzarote Convention Article 20(3) and 20(4)?

The Republic of Slovenia is party to the Lanzarote Convention, but has not ratified it yet.

In Slovenia, we have a website called Spletno oko (Web Eye) which collects anonymous tips of child pornography (and hate speech) online and forwards them to the prosecuting authorities. Reporting persons can report allegedly illegal content by first filling in a short reporting form where they can state the address of the website where the content was found. After that qualified reviewers of the hotline Spletno oko go through the report, and if they judge that the site indeed has allegedly illegal content, they forward it to the prosecuting authorities. If the site in question is hosted on a Slovenian server, the problem is addressed by the police. At the same time the hotline informs the host provider of the existence of illegal content on the server, as instructed by the police. If the site in question is hosted on a foreign server, the report is sent to the Interpol via the Slovenian police, as well as the Inhop

(an umbrella organization for online hotlines dealing with illegal content on the internet.) hotline in the country where the host server featuring the illegal content is located.<sup>100</sup>

Children and other minors are additionally protected from pornographic exploitation with the Mass Media Act<sup>101</sup>. In Article 84 it is stated that it is illegal for television stations to broadcast pornography if such broadcast could seriously damage mental, moral or physical development of children or other minors. However, television stations can broadcast informative and educational programmes as well as artistic audio-visual works which include sexual scenes, if such scenes do not violate the basic aesthetic and moral criteria approved by the publisher. Televised scenes including sexuality can also be broadcast as part of other shows under the condition that the content does not violate the aesthetic or moral criteria. Programmes or works that include sexual scenes must be clearly designated by a visual symbol; prior to the presentation an audio and visual warning must be given that such programming is not suitable for persons under the age of fifteen.

In paragraph eight of Article 84, which concerns itself with pornographic content in printed publication, the Mass Media Act states that such publications may only be offered in a way that the children and minors cannot see and buy them. Access to pornographic contents in electronic publications must be limited, by means of appropriate technical protection, in such a way that children and minors cannot access them.

Participation of a Child in Pornographic Performances:

lxxi. Does the State criminalize intentional conduct of making a child participate in pornographic performances? Does the State highlight and differentiate between recruitment and coercion? What is the State's approach to the attendance of pornographic performances involving the participation of children? If the State is a party to the Lanzarote Convention, did the state use the reservation right stated in Article 21(2)?

Any action of recruiting or encouraging minors to participate in pornographic or other sexual presentations is determined as a criminal offence, as is stated in the second paragraph of Article 176 the Criminal Code of the Republic of Slovenia. The second paragraph of Article 176 states that whoever uses force, threat, fraud, transgression or abuse of power, recruitment, solicitation or for the purposes of exploitation recruits or encourages a minor to participate in the production of pictures, audio-visual or other pornographic material or other material with sexual content, or for participation in such pornographic or other presentation, or knowingly attending such a presentation shall be given a prison sentence of between six months to eight years.

2.4 Corruption of Children

- lxxii. Does the State criminalize the intentional causing of a child to witness sexual abuse or sexual activities, without necessarily having to participate? How does the state define “causing”? Does it involve forcing, inducement, and promise?

The Criminal Code criminalizes the presentation of pornographic or other sexual material to a person under the age of fifteen, as is stated in the first paragraph of Article 176. It is not necessary for the person under the age of fifteen to actively participate, nor is it required that the perpetrator use force, abetting or promise, for such an action to be considered a criminal offence. If the underage person or persons do participate in these offences, the perpetrator shall be punished according to the second paragraph of Article 176, which states a more severe punishment of a prison sentence of between six months to eight years.

2.5 Solicitation of Children for Sexual Purposes

- lxxiii. How does the State criminalize intentional sexual gratification through information and communication technologies by an adult? Does it specify that the perpetrator should also propose a meeting with the potential child victim and come to the meeting place in order to be accused of committing this kind of crime (a.k.a. grooming)?

In Article 173.a of the Slovenian Criminal Code any soliciting of persons under the age of fifteen for sexual purposes is criminalized. The first paragraph of this Article states that any person who exhorts a person under the age of fifteen using information or communication technologies to meet with the intent of having sexual intercourse or performing any other sexual act, or with the intent to participate in the production of pictures, audio visual or other pornographic or other sexual content, shall be sentenced to imprisonment of up to one year (paragraph one of Article 173.a). The exhortation must be followed by concrete actions taken to realize the purpose of the meeting, which means not only showing up for the meeting but also various other actions.

lxxiv. Does the State criminalize aiding or abetting and attempting to the activities that have been mentioned in the subsection a, b, c, d and e?

When it comes to aiding, abetting and attempting to the activities, all actions mentioned in the general provision of the Criminal Code are criminalized by the State.

In Slovenia, a person who began but did not accomplish an intentional criminal offence shall be penalized if the offence in question is punishable by law with a sentence of three or more years in prison. Other offences may be included in this if the law states that the attempt itself shall be punishable (paragraph one of Article 23 of the Criminal Code).

The perpetrator shall be penalized for the attempt within the limits of the penalties prescribed for the offence, which may also be reduced (paragraph two of Article 23 of the Criminal Code).

Any person who intentionally solicits another person to commit a criminal offence shall be punished as if he himself had committed it (paragraph one of Article 37 of the Criminal Code).

Any person who intentionally supports another person in the committing of a criminal offence shall be punished as if he himself had committed it, or his sentence shall be reduced, as the case may be (paragraph one of Article 38 of the Criminal Code).

Support in the committing of a criminal offence shall be deemed to be constituted, in the main, by the following: counselling or instructing the perpetrator on how to carry out the criminal offence; providing the perpetrator with instruments of criminal offence or removing the obstacles for the committing of criminal offence; a priori promises to conceal the perpetrator's criminal offence or any traces thereof; instruments of the criminal offence or objects gained through the committing of criminal offence (paragraph two of Article 38 of the Criminal Code).

A prison sentence of over three years is required for most offences against sexual integrity which are punishable by law, and therefore the attempt itself is also punishable, with the exception of the criminal offence of soliciting persons under the age of fifteen for sexual purposes, for which the perpetrator shall be given a prison sentence of up to one year (paragraph one of Article 173.a), and the criminal offence of presenting pornographic material to a person under the age of fifteen (paragraph one of Article 176).

2.6 Corporate Liability

- lxxv. Does the State hold legal/moral persons (entities) such as commercial companies and associations liable when an action has been performed on their behalf by a person in a position at their entity? Is there a difference between leading persons (persons in position of authority) and regular employees being held liable? If yes, please describe the differences.
- lxxvi. What kind of liability does national legislation impose? Criminal, civil or administrative? Please explain.
- lxxvii. Does national legislation exclude individual liability when there is a corporate liability?

In Slovenia legal persons are liable for actions performed on their behalf by a natural person. Liability of legal persons for criminal offences is regulated by Liability of Legal Persons for Criminal Offences Act (Zakon o odgovornosti pravnih oseb za kazniva dejanja - ZOPOKD-)<sup>102</sup>. It regulates criminal offences in accordance with Article 42 of Criminal Code (Kazenski zakonik - KZ-1)<sup>103</sup> which states that special law shall regulate liability of legal persons and list the criminal offences for which they can be held responsible, the conditions for liability and sanctions; Article 42 KZ-1 includes basic guidelines for this special legislation (ZOPOKD), thus defining criminal offence of legal person: "Criminal liability shall be imposed on a legal person for criminal offences, which the perpetrator commits in his name, on his behalf or in his favour, providing that the statute, which regulates liability of legal persons for criminal offences, determines that the legal person is liable for the criminal offence in question."<sup>104</sup> A closer look at ZOPOKD- shows the details of liability: that a "legal person shall also be liable for a criminal offence if the perpetrator is not criminally liable for the committed criminal offence"<sup>105</sup>; that in the case of negligence, legal person is only liable when "its management or supervisory bodies have omitted due supervision of the legality of the actions of employees subordinate to them"<sup>106</sup> and that in such cases legal person may be given a reduced sentence<sup>107</sup>; and, "if a legal person has no other body besides the perpetrator who could lead or supervise the perpetrator, the legal person shall be liable for the committed criminal offence within the limits of the perpetrator's guilt."<sup>108</sup>

There is a difference between leading persons (persons in position of authority) and regular employees being held liable, according to ZOPOKD as it is defining ground for legal person's liability: "If the committed criminal offence means carrying out an unlawful resolution, order or endorsement of its management or supervisory bodies; If its management or supervisory bodies influenced the perpetrator or enabled him to commit the criminal offence; If it has at its disposal unlawfully obtained property benefit or uses objects obtained through a criminal offence; If its management or supervisory bodies have omitted due supervision of the legality of the actions of employees subordinate to them."<sup>109</sup> Obviously only the leading persons are considered to be able to act in the name of, on behalf of or in favour of the legal person, while regular workers can only be abused by them to achieve unlawful goal. As far as regular workers go, legal person who employ them is liable for them, as is evident from civil legislation: Code of Obligations (Obligacijski zakonik – OZ)<sup>110</sup> as it is defining employer liability: "The legal or natural person with whom an employee was working at the time the damage was inflicted shall be liable for damage inflicted on a third person by an employee during work or in connection with work, unless it is shown that the employee acted as was necessary under the given circumstances."<sup>111</sup>, but if the worker acted intentionally, the injured party can sue him directly.<sup>112</sup> But this goes for civil damages; in case of criminal offences legal person is liable criminally only for actions of leading (natural) persons and only civilly for damages originating from acts of regular employees – but when they acted intentionally or out of gross negligence, legal person can reimburse the sum paid out from the employee.<sup>113</sup>

Regarding the kind of liability legislation imposes: that depends on the nature of offence: when it is criminal and can be summed under the rules of ZOPOKD, liability of legal person is criminal; when offence is civil – meaning breaking law of obligations, legal person responsible is liable civilly and can be sued in civil court. Generally, legal person is de iure a person – which means that liability follows in case "it" breaks the law (the law is broken on its behalf) – criminal offence means criminal liability and civil offence civil liability; but due to its elusive nature there are special rules to help determine its will, establish intent etc.

As it goes for individual liability, Slovene laws recognize the problem of natural person hiding behind the legal one. This problem is addressed in Companies Act (Zakon o gospodarskih družbah – ZGD-1)<sup>114</sup> in Article 8 (Disregard of the legal person), which states that though primarily liability lies with legal person, natural person may also be liable for its liabilities alongside it: "if they abused the company as a legal person in order to attain an aim which is forbidden to them as individuals; if they abused the company as a legal person thereby causing damage to their creditors; if in violation of the law they used the assets of the company as a legal person as their own personal assets; if for their own benefit or for the benefit of some other person they reduced the assets of the company even if they knew or should have known that the company would not be capable of meeting its liabilities to third persons."<sup>115</sup> This is the way that company law is addressing abuse of legal person.

As it goes for criminal liability both KZ-1 and ZOPOKD clearly state, that liability of legal person does not exclude the liability of natural person: "Criminal liability of legal persons shall not exclude liability of natural persons as perpetrators, instigators or aides in the same

lxxviii. Does the state accept any aggravating circumstances for the crimes that have been described above? (e.g. when the offence damaged physical health of the child) Please, write down these circumstances and explain, try to specify the different crimes if there are different aggravating rules applying.

Examples of aggravating circumstances can be found in the Slovenian Criminal Code. Article 170 states in paragraph two that if the criminal offence of rape has been committed in a cruel or extremely humiliating manner or successively by several perpetrators, the perpetrator(s) shall be sentenced to imprisonment for not less than three and not more than fifteen years. Without these aggravating circumstances, the punishment intended for this offence is imprisonment for one to ten years. Same provisions can be found in paragraph 171 concerning the criminal act of sexual violence. A more severe punishment can be ordered to a person in the case of the criminal offence of sexual assault on a defenceless person under the age of fifteen, or if the perpetrator used either force or threat of direct attack on the life or body of the victim. This type of offence shall be punished with imprisonment for no less than five and no more than fifteen years. In the case of criminal offence of exploitation through prostitution (Article 175), a more severe punishment shall be adjudicated if the offence is committed against a minor, against more than one person or as part of a criminal organisation. The perpetrator in this case shall be given a prison sentence of between one and ten years. Aggravating circumstances can also be found in the case of the criminal offence of any public exhibition, production, possession or distribution of pornographic material, where the perpetrator(s) shall be penalized more severely if the offence was committed as part of a criminal organisation concerning itself with such criminal behaviour.

The law stipulates a higher penalty in case of the following circumstances:

- If the criminal offence was committed multiple times;
- If the criminal offence was committed by more persons acting together;
- If the criminal offence was committed against a person who is defenceless due to special circumstances;
- If either force or threat of direct attack on the life or body of the victim was used;
- If the criminal offence was committed in a cruel or extremely humiliating manner.

The aforementioned provisions show that all criminal offences against sexual integrity include a provision that presumes a more severe punishment if one or more aggravating circumstances are present.

2.8 Sanctions and Measures

lxxix. How does the state sanction the above mentioned crimes? Is there a penalty including deprivation of liberty? How does the state legislate extradition?

Whoever has sexual intercourse or performs any lewd act with a person of the same or opposite sex under the age of fifteen years shall be sentenced to imprisonment for not less than three and not more than eight years.

Whoever commits the offence under the preceding paragraph against the defenceless person under the age of fifteen or by threatening him/her with imminent attack on life or limb shall be sentenced to imprisonment for not less than five and not more than fifteen years.

A teacher, educator, guardian, adoptive parent, parent, priest, doctor or any other person who through the abuse of his position has sexual intercourse or performs any lewd act with a person under the age of fifteen and whom he is entrusted to teach, educate, protect or care for shall be sentenced to imprisonment for not less than three and not more than ten years.

Whoever, under previous circumstances violates the sexual integrity of the person under the age of fifteen years shall be sentenced to imprisonment for not more than five years.

Whoever sells, presents or publicly exhibits documents, pictures or audiovisual or other items of a pornographic nature to a person under fifteen years of age, enables them to gain access to these in any other way or shows them a pornographic or other sexual performance shall be given a fine or a prison sentence of up to two years.

Whoever abuses a minor in order to produce pictures or audiovisual or other items of a pornographic or other sexual nature, or uses them in a pornographic or other sexual performance or is knowingly present at such performance, shall be given a prison sentence of between six months and five years.

Whoever produces, distributes, sells, imports or exports pornographic or other sexual material depicting minors or their realistic images, supplies it in any other way, or possesses such material, or discloses the identity of a minor in such material shall be subject to the same sentence.<sup>118</sup>

The preconditions for extradition in Slovenia are:

- 1.) that person whose extradition is requested is not a citizen of the Republic of Slovenia, except in instances defined by an international treaty binding on the Republic of Slovenia;
- 2.) that the act which prompted the request for extradition was not committed in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia against the Republic or a Slovenian citizen;
- 3.) that the act which prompted the request for extradition is a criminal offence within the meaning of domestic and foreign law alike;
- 4.) that under the domestic law criminal prosecution or the execution of punishment was not statute-barred before the alien was detained or interrogated as the accused;
- 5.) that the alien whose extradition is requested has not been convicted of the same offence by the domestic court or has not been acquitted under a final decision of the domestic court, or the charge against him has been rejected by a final decision, or that in the Republic of Slovenia criminal proceedings have not been instituted against the alien for the same offence

The legislation of seizure and confiscation is determined in Criminal Procedure Act<sup>121</sup>(Zakon o kazenskem postopku), to be more exact in the Article 220, that says that objects which must be seized under the Criminal Code, or which may prove to be evidence for criminal procedure, shall be seized and delivered to the court for safekeeping or secured in some other way. Custodians of such objects shall be bound to hand them over at the request of the court. A custodian who declines to deliver the objects may be fined and if after being fined he/she still refuses to deliver them, he/she may be arrested. The detention shall last until the objects have been delivered or until the end of criminal proceedings, but no longer than one month.

Objects used or intended to be used, or gained through the committing of a criminal offence may be confiscated if they belong to the perpetrator (Article 73 of Criminal Code).

Criminal Code in the fifth paragraph of Article 176 also states that pornographic or other sexual material shall be seized or its use appropriately disabled.

More exact rules handling of seized things are determined in State prosecutor regulations (Državnotožilski red - DTR)<sup>122</sup>.

When the police prepares a criminal charge on the basis of a criminal complaint hands it together with the seizure and confiscated items to the Prosecutor (148 (9) ZKP) or files a report if there were no grounds for criminal charges (148 (10) ZKP) the district prosecutor and the team lead in Kdp subscriber records of seized cash in local or foreign currency to a specification of the treasures such as gold and articles of gold and other precious metals and other valuable items, such as miscellaneous securities, tax and postage stamps, lottery tickets and the like and in the subscriber Cd (Corpus delicti) and any other items seized (139 DTR). The head of the register Cd and Kdp is obliged to keep items seized in the hand or in a well-protected area of Public Prosecutions (141DTR). There are no exceptions about bona fide third parties in ZKP. Article 220 applies to all.

Slovenia has no special fund for financing prevention or intervention programmes.

lxxxiii. When the crime has been committed within the family or within the close environment of the child, how does the state react?

Police is usually the first intervenient called to protect the victim of domestic violence against direct danger and aware of the possible forms of assistance. Police may prohibit causing a specific place or person.

A special duty of the state is to take care of children, when parents fail to do it. To this the state is bounded by many international documents and internal instruments. We perceive family violence as criminal offences and offences against public order and peace.

Everybody in society is obligated to help the weaker, beaten and suffering partners, even more to children, the victims of violence in family, if not professionally at least to moral duty. Although rare individual specialists and some nongovernmental organisations are warning that in spite of adoption of the new law on disabling family violence and changes of criminal code, the previous system still does not completely correspond to rescuing and disabling domestic violence.

Deficiencies are being shown especially in unrelated activities of institutions, that are solving the individual case lead procedures and they disregard the work and measures of others. Although the main concern in this problems is ascribed to police and they have the major part of responsibility, such system is sentenced to inefficiency or even to ruin.

Police and social work centre can interfere to powers that are allowing immediate removal of the victim from dangerous environment.

With that police prevents further threat and establishes safety and with that they make possible to other institutions access to the family. These institutions should help to establish dignified life to all members of the family and abolish harmful and violent behaviour. In preventing the family violence an appropriate approach is the one that is based on work and help to victims and producer of violence. To the latter, on the model of other European states offers such procedures and therapies, they will voluntarily decide and they will be active at correction of their violent behaviour.<sup>123</sup>

3.1 Investigation

- xvii. How is the principle of the “best interests of the child” applied during investigation of a crime as mentioned above? Is there a protective approach to the victims? What kind of measures has been taken? Is the victim offered protection during the court proceedings? (such as appointing special representatives) If so, please indicate what kind of protective measures have been taken.

The principle of «best interests of the child» is not specifically defined in the Slovenian criminal law. Which institutes are designed to serving this principle is also not determined. However, we can find several measures included in the Code for the purpose of legal protection of children and reducing secondary victimization in the course of criminal proceedings. The Criminal Procedure Act mentions several measures that can be applied in the cases of criminal offences against sexual integrity, criminal offence of neglect of minors and cruel treatment or the criminal offence of trafficking in human beings. One of the most important measures that serve the principle of «best interests of the child» is undoubtedly the institute of a representative of the underage victim in criminal proceedings concerning criminal offences. The underage victim of violence must have a representative during the entire criminal procedure. If the victim does not choose a representative, the court does so for them. The main role of the representative is to care for the underage victim's rights, protect their integrity during all court hearings and to take care of any legal and property claims. The representative plays an important role in the criminal procedure because he or she helps the victim understand the procedural acts, explains the legal position and warns the victim of their rights, which are also exercised during the procedure by the representative on behalf of the victim. In addition to the representative the victim is also entitled to a so-called person of trust who is present throughout the pre-trial and criminal proceedings. The person of trust is most commonly a parent or other close relative of the victim.

In addition to the institute of representation, another way to strengthen the principle of «best interests of the child» is a provision of the Criminal Procedure Act which states that the accused may not be present during the questioning of witnesses younger than 15 who are victims of a victim of criminal offences against sexual integrity, criminal offence of neglect of minors and cruel treatment or the criminal offence of trafficking in human beings, as is stated in paragraph 4 of Article 178 of the Criminal Procedure Act. This serves to prevent any negative effects on the victim during the hearing during the time of the criminal proceedings. The Criminal Procedure Act regulates another important provision relating to the questioning of a victim and protects the child from a hearing which could influence negatively the psychophysical integrity of a child or cause further victimization. This provision states that a person under the age of fifteen, who was a victim of the aforementioned criminal offences, may not be subject to a questioning during the main trial. A child is questioned by the investigating judge, and his statement is read at the main trial. The questionings are conducted in the presence of an expert and often take place in so-called “friendly rooms” which are specially equipped for the questionings of children and are located outside the main court building. This arrangement prevents repetitions or the questionings of the child and consequentially adding to the victimization of the child.

The prohibition of a questioning of a child in the presence of the perpetrator and the prohibition of a questioning of a child at the main trial are not the only provisions set by the Criminal Procedure Act which reinforce the best interests of the child. In 2003 the legislature changed the provision relating to trade secrets, which showed greatly that the protection of children’s interests is more important than the protection of trade secrets. Article 236 of the Criminal Procedure Act states that any council, doctor, social worker, psychologist or any other person who becomes privy to facts which should remain private, cannot invoke the protection of trade secrecy if the facts in question concern the criminal offence against sexual integrity, criminal offence of neglect of minors and cruel treatment or the criminal offence of trafficking in human beings.

Even though the aforementioned provisions contribute to the realization of the principle of «best interests of the child», they are themselves not sufficient when it comes to explosion to secondary victimization. That is why several changes are currently being prepared in this field, some of which are already being used experimentally. We are already familiar with cases of victim hearings which are being recorded audio-visually for the purpose of preventing repetitions of court hearings and reducing the number of questionings to one questioning. The hearing should be recorded in the presence of the investigative judge and the recording should be played at the main trial. Changes can also be expected in the field of the role of the representative. In addition to offering representation and legal assistance the representative should also act as a person of trust to the child, offering psychological assistance when dealing with trauma caused by either the criminal act itself or by the criminal procedure. Other legislative proposals of change include: introduction of a reduced or accelerated legal procedure, organization of a support network for the mothers of children who have been victims to criminal actions, changing certain rules of evidence and the introduction of an anatomical doll on which the child could point out what had happened.

So-called multidisciplinary teams made up of respected experts from the fields of prosecution, health care, social services and the police also contribute greatly to protection of children and their interests. Their main role is to protect the children and their rights, to provide professional assistance to the children and to immediately take the necessary measurements that could prevent further trauma and negative consequences for the child. These teams of experts are put together by Social Work Centres which function under the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Affairs and are publicly certified to implement child protection measures. Their goal is to exchange information between various public authorities and organizations, if more than one is trying to provide assistance to the victim by various scopes of action at the same time, as well as coordination of different activities of the people involved and the familiarization of the victim with all possible options and means of assistance available.<sup>124</sup> Due to incomplete instructions given by the Ministry and the ambiguity of the legislation such multidisciplinary teams are not a common occurrence in practice in the cases where the aforementioned criminal offences are concerned. Future changes to the legislation will definitely need to regulate the position and operation of such teams in a more precise and detailed manner.

<sup>124</sup> Article 6 of Rules on police cooperation with other agencies and organizations in the detection and prevention of domestic violence.

Social work centres play a primary role in the protection of the victim of crime. Their task is to provide first social aid and personal assistance to the victim of crime, as well as to the family of the victim. Social work centres take the following actions:

- They educate of expert therapists who treat families and children who have been victims of violence;
- Implement measures for removal of violent individuals from the family;
- Find a space for the victims to resort to (Safe Houses, Maternity Homes ...);
- Offer financial social assistance to the victims of violence;
- Take preventive measures and measures for early recognition and detection of violent behaviour.

Another important contribution to the various forms of assistance for victims of violence was made by non-governmental organisations such as Key Society, White Ring, Society against Sexual Abuse of Children, and many others.

Slovenian investigative authorities realize the importance of a wholesome approach to the protection and assistance of victims of the aforementioned criminal offences. Due to special vulnerability of children and their personal characteristics, a successful outcome of a criminal prosecution in the case of criminal offences against sexual integrity and domestic violence may be compromised when the victim is forced to testify under circumstances which cause further trauma when facing the accused. Slovenian Criminal Law pays special attention to witnesses – victims of crime, and therefore provides three institutes which comprehensively regulate the protection of and assistance to victims:<sup>125</sup>

- Basic police protection;

<sup>125</sup> G. Klemenčič: Zaščita prič v kazenskih postopkih v luči sodne prakse Evropskega sodišča za človekove pravice, (Witness Protection in Criminal Proceedings in Court Practice of the European Court of Human rights) v Odvetniška šola, Odvetniška zbornica Slovenije, Ljubljana 2007, p.105.

- Case-procedural safety measures (safety measures in criminal proceedings);
- Out-of-process (non-judicial) protection measures.

In our criminal legal system, characterized by a mixed type of procedure, the position of the witness (especially a child) is better than in the American system. This is because in Slovenia, a judge can take charge of the hearing of a child and thusly prevent any pressure from being put on the child. The principle of search for material truth makes the judge responsible for the investigation of the matter, which makes the child witness not a “hostile witness”, but merely a contributing witness used for clarification of matters.<sup>126</sup>

The area of witness protection is regulated in most detail by the Criminal Procedure Act. Individual provisions are in place to ensure protection and anonymity of witnesses (child witnesses are especially well taken care of). The aforementioned provisions (the prohibition of a questioning of a person under the age of fifteen in the presence of the perpetrator and the prohibition of a direct questioning of a person under the age of fifteen) have been put in place especially for the protection of children. The Criminal Procedure Act also states that the public may not be present during an examination of a person under the age of fourteen. The public may also be excluded from the trial or a part thereof if so required by the interests of protecting secrets, maintaining law and order, by moral considerations, the protection of the personal or family life of the defendant or the injured party, protection of the interests of minors, and if in the opinion of the panel a public trial would be prejudicial to the interests of justice (Article 295 of The Criminal Procedure Act).

The changes to the Criminal Procedure Act in 2004 contributed greatly to the area of witness protection. Article 240.a of the Act states that in the cases where disclosure of personal data or a complete identity of a certain witness could threaten the life and body of the witness, the life or body of their immediate family or of persons proposed by the witness, the court may order one or more measures to protect the witness or their immediate family. These shall be ordered in writing by the investigating judge at the request of the state prosecutor, the witness, the injured party, the defendant, his legal representatives and counsel, or ex officio.

The protective measures include the deletion of all or certain data from the criminal file, the marking of all or some of the data as an official secret, the assignment of a pseudonym to the witness, and the taking of testimony using technical devices (protective screen, devices for disguising the voice, transmission of sound from separate premises and other similar technical devices).

Even though the criminal legislation does not contain many provisions concerning witness protection and their rights, there are some provisions that do just that. These are primarily measures ensuring an uninterrupted and undisturbed criminal procedure, but which also provide protection for the witness. Examples of such measures are detention, a ban on a specific place or person, and eviction from common housing.

In Addition to the Criminal Procedure Act, the area of witness protection is also regulated by the Law on Witness Protection. It establishes the conditions and procedures for the protection of witnesses and other persons in need of protection involved in the criminal procedure. Protection of vulnerable persons is ensured in pre-trial proceedings, as well as during and after criminal proceedings. Protective measures include: relocation of a person, modified documents, concealment of identity for the purpose of legal proceedings, change of identity, use of video or telephone conference, and other measures.

In Slovenian legislation, the rights of the accused are still more protected than the rights of the victim. But some significant changes in the area of witness protection during criminal proceedings have happened in the past couple of years. By adopting the Law on Witness Protection in 2005, Slovenia has taken a great step towards improving witness protection regulations. With this, more effective criminal procedures and a lesser degree of secondary victimization of victims can be achieved.

xviii. Are there any special units for investigating the crimes mentioned above within the legal force? Are they authorised to carry out covert operations? Do they investigate and analyse child pornography materials?

Crime investigation is under police jurisdiction. Criminal legislation does not allow any authorities not part of the state administration to investigate crime or gather evidence, neither does it issue public permissions to carry out such acts. In the cases of crimes concerning children or other minors, the authority in charge of investigation and gathering evidence is the Juvenile Crime Section, which is part of the General Crime Division at the Criminal Police Directorate. In addition to dealing with crimes concerning children and other minors and the removal of minors, the Juvenile Crime Section also deals with child abuse and family violence.

xix. Is it required that the crime is reported in order to be investigated? Do the proceedings go on even in case of withdrawal from the statements?

In Slovenia the criminal proceedings are initiated at the request of the authorised prosecutor. In cases involving offences liable to prosecution ex officio, the public prosecutor shall be the authorised prosecutor. In cases involving offences liable to private prosecution a private prosecutor shall be the authorised prosecutor (Article 19 of the Criminal Procedure Act). The public prosecutor shall be bound to institute criminal prosecution if there is reasonable suspicion that a criminal offence liable to prosecution ex officio has been committed (Article 20 of the Criminal Procedure Act). The criminal offence against sexual integrity, criminal offence of neglect of minors and cruel treatment or the criminal offence of trafficking in human beings are all prosecuted ex officio. The victim may act as prosecutor in the cases where the public prosecutor thinks that the reasons for starting or continuing of criminal proceedings are insufficient. The Criminal Procedure Act states that all state agencies and organisations having public authority shall be bound to report criminal offences liable to public prosecution of which they have been informed or which were brought to their notice in some other way (Article 145 of the Criminal Procedure Act). All other persons who come into contact with such information are also bound to report it. When there is reason to suspect that a criminal offence which should be prosecuted ex officio has been committed, the police are bound to do everything necessary for a successful conduct of criminal proceedings. The proceedings can therefore start if a charge was given, or merely on the basis of suspicious information pointing to a criminal offence that should be prosecuted ex officio. A report to the police or the prosecution can be submitted by a) the victim of a crime, b) public authorities or organizations with public authority, c) any other person who becomes aware of information about a violent event, which is by law punishable by imprisonment of three or more years. As of 2008, this also goes for persons otherwise covered by the obligations of professional secrecy. Article 236 of the Criminal Procedure Act states that any counsel, doctor, social worker, psychologist or another person who has in the exercising of his profession become aware of facts that should otherwise remain secret, is not exempt from questioning in the cases of criminal offences mentioned above.

The police are therefore required to initiate the investigative actions even if the victim did not report the crime, or even if the victim did not want to start criminal proceedings. Additionally, the public prosecutor cannot stop proceedings if the victim's statement is revoked, since the proceedings begun under reasonable suspicion of a criminal offence must continue ex officio.

xx. How long is the statute of limitation? When does it start? Can it be suspended?

Provisions on limitations of criminal prosecution and the limitation period have seen significant changes and additions in 1999. Article 90 of the Slovenian Criminal Code states that the time limit for statute of limitations in criminal offences against sexual integrity and criminal offences against marriage, family or youth, committed against a minor, shall begin when the injured person becomes an adult (paragraph 3). The time limit itself depends on the prison sentence prescribed for the individual criminal offence. Criminal prosecution is barred from taking place:

- 1.) Fifty years from the committing of a criminal offence, for which a prison sentence of thirty years may be imposed under the statute unless non-applicability of statute of limitations applies to the offence;
- 2.) Thirty years from the committing of a criminal offence, for which a prison sentence of over ten years may be imposed under the statute;
- 3.) Twenty years from the committing of a criminal offence, for which a prison sentence of over five years may be imposed under the statute;
- 4.) Ten years from the committing of a criminal offence, for which a prison sentence of over one year may be imposed under the statute;
- 5.) Six years from the committing of a criminal offence, for which a prison sentence of up to one year or a fine may be imposed under the statute.

If more than one sentence is prescribed for a criminal offence, the time limit referring to the most severe sentence shall apply to the offence in question.

Slovenian criminal law also states that the statute of limitation shall be suspended for the time when the prosecution may not be initiated or continued, or when the perpetrator is unreachable for state authorities. The statute of limitation shall be interrupted if the perpetrator commits a further criminal offence of the same or greater seriousness before such a period has ended; after an interruption a new period of limitation shall start.

xxi. How does the national legislation proceed when the age of the victim is not certain?

Slovenian legislation does not specifically determine the rules for criminal proceedings in cases where the child's age is unknown or undetermined. Because criminal offences against sexual integrity, criminal offence of neglect of minors and cruel treatment or the criminal offence of trafficking in human beings are prosecuted ex officio, the age of the child is not relevant at the initiation of investigative action. Only the probability of the victim being a child matters. Investigative authorities collect information on the child's age in the pre-trial proceedings. Not knowing the child's age is more important when it comes to the enforcement of some measures for the protection of children which depend on the child's reaching age fourteen or fifteen. Examples of such measures are the prohibition of a questioning of a person under the age of fifteen in the presence of the perpetrator, the prohibition of a questioning of a person under the age of fifteen at the main trial, and the prohibition of the presence of the public at the questioning of a victim under the age of fourteen. The age of the child is an important legal qualification in the determination of illegality of a sexual act. The Article 173 of the Criminal Code states that having sexual intercourse or performing any lewd act with a person under the age of fifteen is a criminal offence, punishable by imprisonment for not less than three and not more than eight years.

xxii. Who is responsible for recording and storing data for convicted offenders? Who do they relate to? Can and do these authorities transmit their data to other competent authorities in other states? Do the authorities respect protection of personal data rules?

The data on judgements and convicted felons are kept in the criminal records and are not available to the public. The law lays down specific conditions on when the data from the criminal records can be accessed. Institutions and associations responsible for children, their wellbeing and education can access the data in the criminal records even for convictions of previously deleted criminal offences. The records, kept by the Ministry of Justice, consist of personal data on criminal offenders, data on convictions, security measures, conditional sentencing, judicial admonitions and convictions where the person on whom a criminal record is kept was pardoned, and their legal consequences, as well as any subsequent amendments to convictions of persons on whom a criminal record is kept, and data on executed sentences and erasures of unjustified conviction (article 3 of the Rules on Criminal Records). The following data is entered into the record, which is confidential and governed by an electronic data processing system:

1. Name and surname, maiden name for females, nickname and possible fake name, date of birth;
2. Registration number;
3. Administrative unit, municipality and place of birth of the convict, as well as country if the convict was born abroad;
4. Citizenship;
5. Place of permanent or temporary residence listing the address at the time of the conviction;a
6. Title and address of the court, as well as country for courts abroad, number and date of the decision of the court of the first instance, date of finalization or date of the decision of the higher court, if the decision of the court of the first instance was changed;
7. Lawful name of the criminal offence with an indication of the paragraph and article of the law used;
8. Type of punishment or corrective or protective measures which is entered into the record, indicating the duration of the sentence imposed;
9. Any changes concerning the data entered indicating the authority responsible for the decision and the data on the decision.

The police run a similar database. Police records for criminal offences keep two types of records for the field of crime:

- Record of offenses
- Records of persons involved in crimes

The records are interconnected and contain data on the criminal offenses, suspects and other information about criminality. In addition to the aforementioned records the police are also in charge of other databases that could help them do their job. The information is collected, processed, stored, forwarded and used in accordance with the Personal Data Protection Act.

Another organization within the General Police Department concerning itself with personal data protection is the Data Protection centre.

The police may, if this is necessary in order to carry out legally determined police tasks, communicate collected personal and other data to foreign authorities or international organisations at their request or upon their own initiative, provided that the principle of reciprocity exists. Before personal data are communicated to the authorities from the preceding paragraph, the police must be assured that the country to which the data are being sent has a regulated personal data protection system and that the body of a foreign country or international organisation will use personal data only for statutory purposes (article 54 of the Police Act).

Communication of data to foreign authorities is under the jurisdiction of the Criminal Police Directorate, which represents the National Central Bureau of Interpol and Europol for Slovenia. The sharing of data is under the jurisdiction of the International Operations Division within the Department of International Police Cooperation at the General Police Department.

3.2 Complaint Procedure

- xxiii. How does the complaint procedure work in case of violations of Substantive Criminal Law? Are children allowed to present their individual complaint? What are the criteria for Communication to be accepted for examinations (e.g. written/oral)?

Substantive criminal law violations may occur:

1. If the action, which is the subject of criminal proceedings, is criminal
2. If circumstances excluding criminal liability exist
3. If circumstances excluding criminal prosecution exist
  - Criminal prosecution is barred
  - Criminal prosecution is terminated due to amnesty or pardon
  - The subject is already res judicata
4. If a law, which should not be used, was used in the case of the criminal offence, subject to prosecution
5. If the decision of the sentence exceeded the court's rights according to the law
6. If provisions on detention and release from prison have been violated.

The appeal shall be filed with the court which rendered the judgment in first instance. If the appeal fulfils all the conditions (is allowed, filed on time by the eligible person and includes all legal components), it is submitted to the second instance court. If the court finds that, although the material facts were properly determined in the judgement of the court of first instance, a different judgement should have been passed, it can modify the existing judgement (Article 394 of the Criminal Procedure Act). Our legal system therefore allows the Second Instance Court to correct errors in the application of substantive law and amend the judgment of the Court of First Instance.<sup>127</sup>

The right to appeal is widely set in the Slovenian legislation. It is ensured by the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, which states that everyone shall be guaranteed the right to appeal or to any other legal remedy against the decisions of courts and other state authorities, local community authorities and bearers of public authority by which his rights, duties or legal interests are determined (article 25 of the Constitution). Any court decision can be subject to appeal without any formal requirements from the applicant (especially if the appeal is submitted by an applicant without a representative).

The court must enable any minor of fifteen years of age, capable of understanding the meaning and legal consequences of his actions, to independently perform procedural acts.

<sup>127</sup> Z. Fišer: Preliminary Commentary to the Criminal Procedure Act (Uvodni komentar k zakonu o kazenskem postopku), p. 156.

The legal guardian may only perform procedural acts as long as the minor doesn't take over, stating so verbally. A minor under the age of fifteen or a minor who the court does not consider capable of understanding the meaning and legal consequences of his actions is represented by a legal representative. If the interests of the minor and his legal representative conflict, the court appoints a special representative. The court may also do that if it finds that it is necessary for the child's safety, considering the circumstances of the case. In conclusion, the court is obligated to submit a written order, which may be appealed, to a minor over the age of fifteen, who has expressed his opinion during the proceedings.

The appeal is submitted in writing or verbally on record. The appeal in for is simple enough for any citizen to write, even without advocate, representative or legal education. The law states that the appeal must include:

- The ruling which is being appealed;
- Reason for challenging the decision;
- Explanation of the appeal;
- Suggestion to either change of fully or partially annul the judgement;
- The signature of the applicant.

If the appeal does not have all the necessary components, the applicant must resubmit, or the court will deny it. If the applicant is a child, it is important that he or she have an advocate who looks out for their best interest.

xxiv. What are the rules about legal representation of children, especially in the case of complaints against their parents? What are the rules of participation of minors in trials? (Protection of their names, prohibition of media etc.)

An underage victim has a right to a person of trust, which is chosen by the victim, to be present at the pre-trial and criminal proceedings. Most commonly this is a parent, but conflicts may arise during the proceedings. In that case the court appoints a special advocate. This is also done in all other cases where the court decides the decision is in the child's best interests. In addition to the person of trust, the child is also entitled to a representative who is concerned with the victim's rights and protection of integrity. The legislature introduced this institute to provide special care for the child and prevent secondary victimization. The role of the representative is especially important when the child and the parents are in conflict and when the parents put their own interests in front of those of the child.

Criminal law regulates the presence of children at the main trial especially to prevent secondary victimization. During a questioning of a child under the age of fourteen, who is a witness in a criminal proceeding, the public may not be present. The public may also be excluded when the exclusion serves the best interests of the child.

Provisions of prohibition of a questioning of a child in the presence of the perpetrator and the prohibition of a questioning of a child at the main trial are also in place for the protection of the child. A child who is a witness can be additionally protected with implementation of one or more protective measures. Measures intended for witnesses who may be in danger because of their cooperation are: modified documents, non-disclosure of personal data and control of database queries, disguising the victim's identity for the purposes of the court proceedings, and other.

Whoever publishes personal details of a child who is party to a judicial, administrative, or any other proceedings, or publishes other information which would be relevant to establishing the child's identity, shall be punished by a fine or sentenced to imprisonment for not more than three years (paragraph 2 of Article 287 of the Criminal Code).

Preventive Measures

- xix. What kind of educational guarantees are given in relation to professionals working with children in the area of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse? What does the State do in order to assure these people are aware of these situations?

Professionals who deal with children are educated on the problem of sexual abuse. Their knowledge is gained through conferences, round tables, seminars and other training. These are organized by either the State or other non-governmental organizations which cover this particular area.

In April 2012 a now eleventh two-day conference entitled “Violence against Children – Do We Understand It?” was organized by the General Police Directorate and the Association of State Prosecutors of Slovenia in collaboration with the Centre for Judicial Training. Representatives of the police force and the legal profession as well as prosecutors attended the event, where they discussed the problematic of violence and sexual abuse and addressed topic from the fields of psychology, psychotherapy, social work and litigation.<sup>128</sup>

In 2011, the Ministry of Internal Affairs and the police in collaboration with non-governmental organizations organized a campaign dedicated to raising awareness of the sexual exploitation of children using the slogan “Some secrets must not remain hidden”. Training for police officers, detectives who deal with sexual abuse, and non-governmental organisations volunteers was organized as part of the campaign, among other activities.<sup>129</sup>

Another form of professional training intended for professionals in education is a programme called CAP (Children Assault Prevention). CAP is a programme of primary prevention. It includes workshops for children as well as presentations for the parents and the staff of schools, kindergartens and institutions. The goal of the programme is to familiarize parents and the staff of schools, kindergartens and institutions with information on abuse and violence against children.

xx. Does the State educate children regarding these issues? Does the State involve parents into this educative process?

The State uses various campaigns, projects and the media to raise awareness and educate children on the topic of sexual violence.

In 2006 the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Affairs together with the Ministry of Education, Science, Culture and Sports organized a project entitled “We, the adults, are here to help you” for the first time. As part of the project a brochure containing key information on various types of violence, how to recognize it and where to go for help was given out to elementary school children. A school lesson was dedicated exclusively to the issue of violence and the different types of help.

A group for juvenile crime, which is a part of the Police Directorate of Ljubljana, designed a comic book entitled “Now what, officer Beno?”, which is intended for children aged 8 to 10. Police officers from a local police station, along with the teachers, organized workshops for children where they used the comic book, whose main character is officer Beno, and tried to portray the work of the police, police officers and how their role is not always repressive. Through the comic book stories the children were also acquainted with the various types of violence and received information on where to go for help in times of crisis.

As we have already mentioned, the Ministry of Internal Affairs and the police in collaboration with non-governmental organizations organized a campaign using the slogan “Some secrets must not remain hidden”. A booklet written by the writer Goran Vojnovič also entitled “Some secrets must not remain hidden” was issued as part of the campaign. The purpose of the booklet was to educate elementary school children on when touches and actions become abuse, and on the necessity to speak up about these events. Additionally, posters and leaflets as well as a radio and television commercial were prepared as part of the campaign.

Social work centres within their local jurisdiction often organizes workshops at schools where children are educated on sexuality and sexual abuse.

Parents are not directly included in the educational process. They receive the information mainly from their children and the public media.

xxi. Has the State created preventive intervention programmes for people who fear that they may commit the crime?

The Republic of Slovenia has created no preventive intervention programmes for people who fear that they may commit a crime.

Protective Measures and Assistance to Victims

xxii. Are there any social programmes to provide support for victims? How exactly do these programmes work?

Social assistance of various types and forms takes place within the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Affairs:

- An assistance network in form of maternity homes, safe houses and shelters;

- A network of crisis centres for the youth;
- A network of coordinators for the prevention of violence;
- A network of various specialized therapeutic programmes for short-term day or full-day care for children who have been robbed of a normal family life, as well as for children and other minors who experience violence or sexual abuse;
- A network of various specialized therapeutic programmes providing psychosocial help for children and families with the goal of finding solutions for personal problems;
- A network for short-term day or full-day care for children and other minors who have been robbed of a normal family life, and specialized prevention programmes intended for children and other minors with development issues, which provide regional coverage according to statistical regions;
- A network of teams for telephone counselling for children, other minors and other persons experiencing a personal crisis (TOM Telephone, Peter Klepec Telephone ...).<sup>130</sup>

Despite all the forms of social assistance listed above, provided by the State, the majority of social assistance programmes dedicated to helping victims still functions within non-governmental organizations which are financed by public tenders issued by either various Ministries or municipalities. Social assistance is provided by the Association against Sexual Abuse, Emma Institute, Society for Non-violent Communication, the White Ring of Slovenia and several other associations which concern themselves with the issue of violence and sexual abuse.

xxiii. Are there any help lines in service of the victims? Are these help lines aware of the confidentiality principles?

<sup>130</sup> J. Zloković, O. Dečman Dobrnjič: Zaprte oči ne vidijo zla: trpinčenje, zanemarjanje in spolna zloraba otrok – odgovornost družine in šole (Closed Eyes See No Evil: Maltreatment, Neglect and Sexual Abuse of Children – a Responsibility of Schools and Families), Zavod Republike Slovenije za šolstvo, Ljubljana, 2007, p.192,193.

We have special anonymous telephone hotlines intended to provide assistance for victims, which abide to the rules of privacy and protection of personal data. Records on personal documentation are kept.

The Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Affairs organized a free helpline (080 1552) called the Peter Klepec Telephone, which can be used by children and other minors in case of exposure to violence as part of the “We, the adults, are here to help you” project. Callers can talk to a professional who tries to direct them to finding possible solutions to the problem.

In addition to the aforementioned helpline we also know other anonymous non-governmental helplines dedicated to helping victims, for example TOM Telephone, the SOS telephone hotline for women and children who have been victims to violence, the Association against Sexual Abuse telephone hotline, the Emma Institute and the Help Centre for Victims of Violence hotlines, as well as several others.

xxiv. How does the State assist victims when it comes to recovery? Are the intervention programmes (if there are any) aware of the possibility that these child victims could have sexual behaviour problems in the future? Does the State make sure to get the consent of the persons or inform them thoroughly about the intervention programmes?

The State assists the victims of violence and sexual abuse through the aforementioned social programmes, which are mostly part of social work centres. These employ professional coordinators who provide support for victims of violence, help set up and organize a general team on a local level and ensure inclusion of individual experts in the crisis teams. Other types of assistance are also offered as part of the social work centres, such as first social aid, providing assistance for families for their home, providing assistance for families at their home, social services offering various types of assistance and counselling when it comes to finding help, and other programmes within and outside the social work centres.<sup>131</sup> The victim is also offered personal assistance and is directed to find personal help such as psychotherapy outside the centres. Victims can also use maternity homes, safe houses and shelters. Minors can find help at crisis centres where they can go in times of crisis, when leaving their current environment is required.

Often the assistance provided by the State is insufficient or the victims are badly informed on their options of finding help. That is why the help often falls to their immediate environment, which forces the victim to seek assistance. Non-governmental organisations also play a significant role in form of individual personal counselling, help groups, helplines and online assistance on websites and forums. They also offer social advocacy, legal assistance and material assistance as well as provide escorts to various institutions for the victims.

III NATIONAL POLICY REGARDING CHILDREN

xiii. Is there a serious political discussion regarding the children in the respective country?

There was a serious political discussion regarding the children in Slovenia during the proposal of new Family Code, mostly in 2010 and 2011. Main purpose of this reform of the Family Code is improving the legal and factual situation of children, regardless of the form of the family they live in. Currently, there is no noticeable political discussion regarding children.

xiv. How has the awareness within the society regarding children's sexual abuse and exploitation been raised by committed NGOs and/or the State (use of official sources, documents, statistics...)?

There are some regular programs/conferences/brochures/etc. organised or prepared by NGOs or the State that help to raise awareness about children's sexual abuse: conference about internet children abuse in October 2012 in Ljubljana, organised by Web eye, Safer Internet Centre in collaboration with the Criminal Police Directorate at the General Police and the Association of Informatics and Telecommunications; yearly statistics about sexual abuse and exploitation prepared by Statistical Office of the Republic of Slovenia, etc.

To prevent violence, provide effective assistance in cases of violence against children and successfully raise awareness of this issue has been created a partnership between the Ministries of Labour, Family and Social Affairs and of Education and Sport in March 2006 for the first time carried out a joint project titled "Adults are here to help you "for all primary school students in Slovenia."<sup>132</sup>

xv. If the statistics are available, how many reporting have been done regarding children's sexual exploitation in last the 5 years (e.g. police records, court records etc.)?

There are some statistics from 2007. Then Social work centres treated 4,012 children who have experienced violence in the Slovenia: 1316 on suspicion of mishandling, 1098 due to neglect, 814 of them were victims of psychological and physical violence 369 victims, 266 children were treated for a suspected criminal offense applications and 149, because they were victims of sexual abuse.<sup>133</sup>

There is also one informative table from Statistical office of the Republic of Slovenia, number of criminal defendants accused and convicted against sexual assault on a child (less than 15 years old):

Table 4: Criminal defendants accused and convicted against sexual assault on a child (less than 15 years old).

Year	2006	2007	2008	2009
of defendants	145	155	141	118
of accused	86	80	74	64
of convicted	59	57	57	42

xvi. Are there any promotional campaigns in the State so far regarding these issues?

Yes, Ministry of the Interior and the police, in cooperation with non-governmental organisations prepare campaign in October 2011, designed to raise awareness of sexual abuse of children.

xvii. How has the children's perspective represented in the law making process?

There is no children's perspective represented in our law making process.

xviii. Who are the main national Non-Governmental Organisations working on the topic of children's rights? Does the State regulate (or not) their involvement in law making process?

Main national Non-Governmental Organisations working on the topic of children's rights in Slovenia are:

- Association for nonviolence with SOS telephone for women and children, victims of violence;
- Association against sexual violence- users are children that may be victims of all forms of harassment, sexual assault, domestic violence and bullying;
- White collar Slovenia - psychosocial and legal assistance to victims of crime, educational programs for professional staff who work with victims, informing the public of the whole spectrum of assistance, preventive action, preparation of legislative proposals to improve the situation of victims, protection and presentation of victims' rights, cooperation with governmental and non-governmental organizations, material assistance to victims, networking with similar organizations and involvement in an international network of services for victims of crime.

Involvement of non-governmental organisations in law making process is not significant.

IV OTHER

Are there any other legal or political issues that might be relevant in the respective country? Please keep in mind that ELSA is a non-political organisation, hence only political issues which might affect the data you have provided should have been mentioned here.

In Slovenian jurisprudence there are many known cases in which an allegation of sexual abuse of the children is used as a method of clients in divorce litigations to cause damage to opposite client. Preventive measures, which are immediately taken, break the contact between the parent accused of sexual abuse and the child that is alleged victim. Protection of the children is utilized on a way that the child and the accused parent become victims of a false accusation. These kind of false allegations of sexual abuse have occurred 40 to 60 times per year and are in the vast majority proven to be false<sup>134</sup>. This is distorted system of protection against child abuse.

Usually, this pattern appears in process of terminating marriage with divorce, when are both spouse trying to get the custody of the child. In the meantime he has to live in the middle in hostile environment. Sadly in some divorces attorneys suggest such an option.

If parents do not come to agreement on the maintenance of joint children by their own or with the help of social work centre, the court reaches decision in non-legal procedure, unless it decides on contact together with disputes concerning the care and upbringing of children in this cases decides in legal procedure as says Article 106(4) of Marriage and Family Relations Act (Zakon o zakonski zvezi in družinskih razmerjih-ZZZDR)<sup>135</sup>. The main motive is the child's interest in promoting the child's development, support and emotional attachment. The court also account principle of continuity of child development, in order to continue the current situation in life and it would not be necessary to change the environment and schools. If both are suitable to care for the child, the decision depends on the opinion of the child and review of the social work centre as Marriage and Family Relations Act proscribes in Article 106(7).

At that time the court, who has jurisdiction for the current process in which one of the parents were accused of sexual abuse, usually triggers proceedings before a criminal court and immediately withdrawn or restrict contacts, as is required when any suspicion that threats interests of the child such as mental stress, physical and mental development occur as proscribed in Article 106(5) ZZZDR. Court has to decide between the right of a father to have contacts with the child and the interests of the child which might be re-exposed to sexual assault.

In addition to immediately enforce interim measures to suspend contacts, the court has the possibility of ordering contacts under the supervision of the premises of the Centre for Social Work, accompanied by a social worker. This option is because of its unnatural note proven harmful to the relationship between children and parents.

The Convention on the Rights of the Child in the Article 9 says that the State has a duty to ensure that children are not separated from the family except in cases where the proceedings found it necessary to defend the interest of the child, especially when it comes to abuse or neglect of the child by the parents, or when in the event that the parents are living separately and it's not yet decided about children's residence. It also states that the child in such cases has the right to contacts with the other parent, unless it is contrary to the child's best interests.<sup>136</sup>

The Court, therefore, has full authority under Slovenian law and the Convention on the Rights of the Child to limit contact in the child's best interests, but the question is, how much time should be maintained in such condition, taking into consideration the length of the Slovenian judicial proceedings and the consequences that such an injunction is left on the relationship between the accused parents and the child. Interim measures to suspend contacts cannot be challenged by regular legal means and is directly enforceable, the European countries are now also under the Brussels Regulation IIa<sup>137</sup>. Proceedings before a criminal and family section on the court can be pulled from two to four years, although the rate of such procedures is essential. Marriage and Family Relations Act in Article 10<sup>138</sup> notes that these matters are addressed as a priority. As well as the European Convention on the exercise of children's rights<sup>139</sup> in the paragraph 7 to judicial authority imposes a duty to respond quickly. Unfortunately, in Slovenian jurisprudence has been proved countless times that the slowness of our courts considered fatal to the relationship between the parent and the child.

Interests of the child are extremely endangered in the proceedings of collecting evidence through investigation and criminal proceedings are derived on base of Criminal Procedure Act<sup>140</sup> (Zakon o kazenskem postopku). Different expertise opinions in the same process can be contradictory and conflicting. In addition, children are exposed to psychological physical irritation. Since the court is obliged to consider child's opinion, there is also considerable pressure on the child and manipulations of all kinds, from both parents. The importance of the child's opinion of our law is also determinated in Article 106(7) ZZZDR that prescribes child's opinion in divorce proceedings that are running separately of criminal proceedings, to be very carefully considered if the child is able to understand its meaning or implications, if he tells it on its own or by the trustee. Also the Convention on the Rights of the Child in Article 6 demands of the judicial authority's responsibility to have enough information to decide to take the right decision in the interests of the child and to make possible to the child to express their views and take it under consideration.

A further problem in such cases is this, that these false charges and not prosecuted but simply overlooked although it's a criminal offense which is punishable by imprisonment for up to two years by Criminal Code (Kazenski zakonik) in Article 289(1).

The increasingly common problem of false allegations of sexual abuse in conflict between spouses, and also the abuse of criminal proceedings has been pointed out to the court in Strasbourg. European Court of Justice ordered 6,000 € penalty to Slovenia, where father's rights were violated due to false allegations of sexual abuse, who after three years of proceedings proved to be untrue. And this case is not the only one.

However, none of the Slovenian governments, until now, had any attention to fix this problem. Even though in 2011, Parliament affirmed a new Family Code, which would indirectly through mediation and shorter deadlines effect on the earlier resolution of this kind of situations. The Family Code was unfortunately rejected by the people.

Slovenia is a signatory to the Council of Europe's Lanzarote Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse. The Convention was signed on the 25 October 2007. The Republic of Slovenia is progressively adapting its legislation to the Convention; in June 2012, it has adopted an amendment to the Criminal Code, where, among other things, a new offence has been introduced in the chapter Criminal Offences against Sexual Integrity: Communication with a person younger than 15 years for sexual purposes, or child grooming. In other aspects, Slovenian criminal law is quite compatible with the Lanzarote Convention. The Slovenian Criminal Code protects children under 15, and in some cases also those under 18, with numerous criminal provisions. In Slovenia, the following is considered a criminal offence: sexual assault on a person younger than 15 years; communication with a person younger than 15 years for sexual purposes, or child grooming; violation of sexual integrity by abuse of position; prostitution; presentation, manufacturing, possession and distribution of pornographic materials; and incest. According to the prescribed punishment, the actions listed above are among the most serious offences.

Even in the very process of investigation and prosecution, there are some measures in the criminal law that pursue the principle of »the best interests of the child«. To avoid deepening the trauma experienced by the child as much as possible, there are specific rules on interviews with child victims under 15 years of age. During criminal proceedings, an obligatory special representative of a minor victim plays an important role. If the victim does not choose a representative, a lawyer is appointed by the court. The representative defends the minor's rights and protects their integrity during the procedure. In addition, multidisciplinary teams consisting of experts from the police, prosecution, health and social care also contribute greatly to the protection of a child and its interests during criminal proceedings. Such teams are put together by social work centres operating under the auspices of the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Affairs, and have the public powers to take the necessary measures to protect children and their rights.

Furthermore, non-governmental organisations working together with state authorities play a vital role in preventing sexual abuse and assisting victims. Most social victim-aid programs operate primarily within the context of non-governmental organizations, which provide actual help such as individual counselling, support groups, assistance over the phone and via websites or online forums, provide social advocacy, accompaniment to a variety of institutions, legal advice and material help. Apart from the state, the non-governmental organizations have an important role in educating and raising the awareness of employees as well as children and the general public on the problem of sexual abuse and sexual violence.

Slovenia has made great efforts to implement the legislative and other measures necessary to protect children and prevent all forms of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse of children. However, some legislative measures are sometimes not implemented the way they should be.

Sexual abuse is a problem of society and not only a problem of an individual. The future of the victim often depends on his or her surroundings, which is why all of us, not only individual institutions, need to try hard to help the victims and protect children from such heinous crimes as sexual abuse.

I INTRODUCTION

i. Roma Community:

Historically the Roma community has been one of the most discriminated ethnic in the Spanish society. In Spain there are around 800,000 mainly located in Andalusia, Extremadura, Madrid, Catalonia and Valencia. These data have been published by the Ministry of Health and Social and Equality Policy in its report 'Social Diagnostic of the Roma Community in Spain'.

Roma people have significant difficulties in accessing education. Thus, illiteracy rates are around 70% in the people above 16 years old belonging this collective, being this rate higher in the case of women. The reasons which justify this trend are eminently cultural, but also it is influenced by the situation of Roma children who are required to collaborate in the occupations of their parents.

Regarding the labour market, the Roma have access to precarious and temporary jobs. Roma women have more difficulties to obtain stable jobs. Only 51.8% of citizens belonging to this ethnic group have paid employment, facing to 81.6% which is achieved by the rest of the Spanish population.

One of the effects of discrimination of Roma is related to housing. Although the presence of shanty towns has decreased in the past few years, 12% of the population of this ethnic group is still living in substandard housing. Accessing to rent is complicated because of the discrimination which these people are suffering. On the other hand, the urban planning of many cities leads to the formation of specific Roma ghettos.

Immigrants:

In Spain there is a total of 5.711.040 immigrants registered in the Public Offices. This makes it the second European Country with highest rate of immigrants, just after Germany. The 58% of them come from less developed nations. Their salary is 42.8% lower than the one which perceives national citizens.

Although in our country the number of people who say they are in favor of immigration is almost 89%, nearly three out of ten Spanish citizens understand that immigrants who are in a situation of long-term unemployment should leave the country. Data obtained from the information collected in the 2010 survey of the Bertelsmann Foundation, entitled "The Spanish perception of diversity and immigration." The report also confirms that almost 67% of respondents consider that the number of immigrants in Spain is "high". An Institute INJUVE report of 2008 has reflected the view that young Spanish people have of immigrants. 44% of respondents see more advantages than disadvantages in living with foreigners, while those who believe that the damages outweigh the benefits are 38%. The main disadvantages are that immigration is take jobs (31%), crime and insecurity cause (23%), there is no control (6%) and accept work for low wages (6%). Also of concern to young Spanish that immigrants do not adapt to our customs (5%) have more help foreign citizens (4%) and collapsing public services (2%).

The percentage of people who have felt discriminated among immigrants is four times that of the natives, especially among those under 24 years. Discriminatory behaviours are detected frequently in access to housing and when looking for a job. There are numerous reports of young Moroccans who have difficulties accessing to bars, entertainment venues, restaurants ... But there is a particular immigrant group punished by immigration: the Ecuadorians. They are the ones who suffered more abuse on the street. They also claim to have more difficulties in accessing employment, and they ensure that suffer frequently rough treatment by police authorities.

It is common to link immigrants with the lack of security and committing crimes in cities. However, while the immigrant population increased by 86.5% between 2002 and 2006, the crime rate per capita has fallen to 22%.

People with disabilities:

According to data from the Survey of Disability, Personal Autonomy and dependency situations of 2008, about 9% of the Spanish population has a disability, that is, more than 4.1 million people. Citizens with disabilities face major exclusion situations, especially in employment and education. In Spain, 5% of people claim to have witnessed acts of discrimination against this group.

The major obstacles exist in access to public spaces and the labour market. And, according to data from the National Statistics Institute, the Spanish half say they feel fairly or very uncomfortable in the presence of a disabled person. A majority of the citizens of this country, namely 89.5%, recognizes, however, that people with disabilities face barriers to access public transport, 73.2% in hotels and restaurants and 74.1% all amenities.

To overcome this historical situation of inequality, several standards have been adopted in the years of democracy and should be mentioned in Law 13/1982 of the Social Integration of the Disabled and the Law 51/2003, of December, 2, equal opportunities, non-discrimination and universal accessibility for people with disabilities. More recently approved a new text, Law 49/2007 of December, 26, establishing the system of offenses and penalties relating to equal opportunities, non-discrimination and universal accessibility for people with disabilities

Women discriminated in Spain:

According to the report "Women and men in Spain", of the National Institute of Statistics, in 2008 the rate of women in compulsory education was 48.5%, which increased to 51.5% in further education.

The average gross annual salary of a woman in Spain is about, according to the "Report on equal pay", the UGT union, to 78.1% male. The differences are seen also in the total number of women who hold leadership positions in our country. Information published by the newspaper ABC on March 8, 2012, titled "The directors, pending for women", indicate that only 24% of management positions are held by women, although these represent 51% graduate of posts. One in three companies in Spain does not have any women in leadership positions. According to the newspaper El País in an interview published on April 16, 2012, entitled "A wall tie against women managers", in Spain women engaged in responsible charge private companies charge about a third less than their male counterparts.

Discrimination for reasons of sexual orientation.

According to the Eurobarometer of Discrimination 2008, 48% of the citizens of this country understand that discrimination against homosexuals is widespread. The 47.5% that the Spanish are little or not tolerant to homosexuality. Some 13% of people understand that homosexuality is a disease and should be treated as such. Another 22.2% think it is unnatural. 23% think that gay people should not be entitled to the same rights as heterosexuals and 42.1% believe that same-sex couples should not have the same facilities as heterosexuals to adopt children 30% have little or no sympathy for gay people, the same percentage of people who show concern in the case of having a gay son.

But if the case of homosexuals is delicate, the situation is no better when it comes to transsexuals. This fact has tried corrected the approval of Law 3/2007, which allows citizens to change gender in the Civil Registry. However, Malaga University has produced a report, commissioned by the Federation of Lesbians, Gays, Transsexuals and Bisexuals. The study, based on the results of this survey, reveals, among other things, that 48% of people who participated in it have prostituted. 55.9% also states have had problems in their work environment after making public his transsexualism.

But if the situation is delicate to older transsexuals, discrimination cases are accentuated in adolescents. Thus, the study notes that while the average in which children discover their transsexualism is 10.8 years, most choose not to communicate until he was 18.

ii. There is no specific description of the term "family" in the Spanish legal system. This is a contingent concept that changes with the social reality of the moment. During the Franco dictatorship, extramarital children were not included in the family. However, the progress of democracy and the promulgation of the Spanish Constitution have led to a new understanding of family relationships, formulating new principles that have completely altered the legal regulation of this matter.

The wording of Article 39.2 of the Constitution meant the removal of the situations of inequality between marriage and children conceived outside of the marriage relationship. Similarly, Article 32.1 establishes the principle of equality between men and women toward marriage.

Regulation of the family and marriage is established in the Civil Code. In its Article 67 contains the obligation to protect family relationships. The interests of the children are a priority. In Article 154 Title VII, based on parent-child relationships, the Code requires that parental authority is exercised always to the benefit of the children, which means "watch over them, keep company, feed them, educate them and provide them comprehensive training "and" represent and manage their goods". In the subsequent provision, it points out the obligations of children regarding their parents. Specifically, it cites the duty of obedience and respect, as well as to collaborate, to the extent possible, to support the dependents. In addition, section 158 requires the judge to take all measures to prevent the child from being exposed to a hazard or serious injuries.

Our legal system also recognizes the figures of foster care and adoption. The first one would be the inclusion, temporary or permanent, of a child in a family other than the biological, but without losing the child's relationship with their family of origin. The situation is similar in the case of adoption, with the exception that in this case the child loses all ties with her biological family. Both figures are described and regulated in Chapter V, first and second sections of Title VII of the Civil Code. The creation of Law 13/2005 recognizes this possibility also to homosexual people.

The Civil Code dedicates its Title IV of Book I to the regulation of marriage. Law 13/2005, which was mentioned before, meant a great novelty in the regulation, including the possibility that the marriage can be contracted by people of the same sex, in a situation of full equality to heterosexual couples. According to Article 45, the marriage will have free and voluntary character. However, Articles 46 and 47 determine prohibitions, more or less intense, to marry. In example, they would not be able to do contract marriage non emancipated minors and those who are linked with another previous marriage. According to Article 47 may not marry each other "straight relatives of consanguinity or adoption, collaterals to the third degree and convicted of wilful death of the spouse of any of them." However, Article 48 recognizes certain qualifications in these general prohibitions, establishing the possibility of judicial dispensation in cases of children under 16 years and of consanguinity. It also notes that the Ministry of Justice may authorize a marriage even if wilful death of the former spouse. It is recognized under Article 49, effectiveness to the rites of marriage under those confessions that have agreements with Spain in this regard.

The Civil Code recognizes in Article 67 the equal rights and obligations of spouses. Thus, under Article 68, must respect and help each other, in addition to acting in the interests of the family. They are also required to "live together, be faithful and help each other", and also to collaborate in achieving equitable housework.

Regarding forms of marriage dissolution or suspension, the Code includes the separation, that is, the "suspension of the common life of the spouses." This formula does not involve the dissolution of marriage. That is precisely the main difference with the divorce, in which marriage is permanently discontinued. The nullity involves the absence of marriage and its effect goes back to the time of conclusion of the alleged link. Marriage, therefore, would not have ever existed.

In 2011 in Spain held a total of 161.345 marriages. This figure confirms a trend that has continued in recent years. With respect to the previous period, the total marriages was 4.4% lower.

Regarding the average age of marriage celebration, there has been a gradual delay. In 1980 the average age at which marriage contracted in Spain was 24 years for women and 26 for men, today that number has increased to 30 years for boys and 32 girls. Particularly relevant is the case of Roma children, traditionally used to marry at age 14, pursuant to the provisions in Article 48 of the Civil Code, which allows marriage between non emancipated minors subject to receiving immunity from court judge, and after listening to the child and their parents or guardians. Nevertheless, at present, mostly Roma decide to marry later, once they have turned 16.

Only 15 children under 17 were married in 2009, but the number of girls who married in this age group increased to 162.

It has also increased the number of marriage dissolutions. Thus, in 2011 the figure rose to 110,651. The formula for finding the most common bonds of marriage is divorce, which represented about 93.6% of marital breakdown, far ahead of separations (6.2%) and nullity (0.1). The duration of the marriage was a mean of 15.7 years. Of particular concern is the case of marriage dissolutions in couples with children. While 42.8% of marriages dissolved in 2011 had no children, 48.4% had only minor children, 3.9% in children under economic dependence and 4.9% children under and older dependents. In these cases, the statistics tell us that the children eventually end up in the custody of their mothers; this is so in 81.7% of cases. Only 5.2% of children were under the custody of their parents, and 12.3% under joint custody. With regard their maintenance, the Civil Code refers to Article 143, which requires the provision of food to the spouses and the ascending and descending, in Spain 57.2% of marriage dissolutions had assigned alimony, taken in 85.9% of cases by parents, at 5.1% to 9% and mother both spouses.

Regarding the average age of birth in Spain in 2011 was 32.0 for Spanish people and 28.8 for foreigners. A fact of particular concern in the situation of many Spanish children: nearly 30,000 women under age 20 become pregnant in Spain, with the particular impact which this may cause for the proper personal development of children.

iii. The child was seen in different ways throughout history. There was a time. When the child was seen as 'small adults', they children were unknown. Then there are two diametrically Opposed Ways of Seeing Children as 'intrinsically bad' or 'good Essentially'. The child, before modernity, was small adult Considered gear was part of a society and educated to be an adult, to help preserve the social group. To disintegrate the cohesion gaze turns to the single subject. That conception within the child begins to September as a subject, as being true can perceive the World Differently to adult.

The term 'child' has not taken its modern sense until the seventeenth century. Before, They Knew not Distinguish the different ages, and the term child Applied Often even to adolescents of 18 years. Just add the nineteenth century the 'baby'.

This conquest of the child has been gradual and not Until the early twentieth century, with the Contributions of cognitive psychology and psychoanalysis, with the concepts of evolutionary development, with an eye towards children to discover the origins of complex characters, with the fullness of historical consciousness of man, Is that the notion of child Reaches configured as a status worthy of being watched and Studied from all disciplines. Modern knowledge privileged childhood as an object of scientific research and social intervention and had the effect of an extension of the look on children, Which Became The Most important stage in the life of human beings.

While concerned with understanding scientific disciplines and learn more about the child and the stages of their evolutionary development, the Social and Economic situation was resulting in the emergence of the notion of children as property, I was seen as inferior, whose destination should be controlled by adults was required conformist and passive attitude, and is valued only for their ability to work. This arose the need to create laws to Regulate Child Labour.

In the context of the Interests of the Child, the Convention on the Rights of the Child Provides protection in any Work That Hinders Their full development and places children and adolescents as the main recipients of social policies. This makes clear the Economic survival of the family cannot be an excuse for child labour. It is at children and adolescents are family competent fill gaps.

100 years ago, children had a significant Presence and workforce in Industrialized Countries (in some cases up to 50%), working workdays to 13 hours a day.

Between the 30s and 50s behaviourism that what really counts ruled in development is what comes from outside: learning. Psychology sailing Between Two alternatives: the child comes into this world endowed with innate structures and has its own Mechanisms for the development of the same or the child is a 'tabula rasa' u all, it acquires in Contact with the medium.

We have spent the concept of 'child' as a small man preparing for life, the concept of the child's mind is like a blank slate, on which everything is written. Today, we can say that the child has its own dignity itself as Autonomy and Such, and not in preparation for something.

About Spain issues of rights of children have Ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child adopted by the United Nations on November 20, 1989, was Ratified by Spain in 1990 and Became part of our legislation, existing Commitment Ratified Countries have That it to Report to the United Nations on its Implementation every three years.

The Committee of UN experts Considered the second report of Spain (CRC/C/70/Add.9), submitted on October 12, 1998, at its 798th and 799th meetings (CRC/C/SR.798 and 799) held at the UN Headquarters in New York on 4 June 2002, and adopted at its 804th meeting, held on June 7, 2002, the concluding observations. Therefore, Spain is fully Committed to the safety of children and punishing sexual abuse and rape and abuse more severely abuse inflicted on children and adolescents so I can see typified in the Spanish Penal Code in Chapter II, sexual abuse of Articles 181 and 182 and Chapter II A, of the abuses and Assaults under thirteen in article 183 and 183 bis, chapter III, of sexual harassment in Article 184 CP.

The Spanish are aware and greatly Concerned about the health and safety of children, Usually most are Encouraged to curb abuses That harm children's development and Their integration and even mental health creating insecurities and fears, believe it is important to Stop These crimes with harsher penalties and Whenever These Situations and report it is important to educate children and parents also.

There have been cases of Human Rights Violations that attracted the attention of the Media.

iv. The Regulations Which Attracts the matter to Ensure the Implementation of international treaties aid the Council of Europe as an institutional framework to the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe Convention presented a preliminary draft was submitted to the That Consultative Assembly for opinion. Based on the rights members of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights United Nations is where a group of rights as the prohibition minimal contained in Article 4 paragraph 2 of forced or compulsory labour and other restricted rights group and A third group of rights under other protocols.

The Convention on the Rights of the Child United Nations on 20 November 1989 adopted a milestone in the history of childhood and the recognition of their rights.

The very development of paediatrics is also a relatively recent, barely a century in our country. That recall the first children's hospital in Spain, Hospital of the Infant Jesus of Madrid, was inaugurated in 1877.

Considering child as every human being below the age of 18 is another of the key elements to analyze the problems of children and adolescents and their care needs. The child is subjected to continuous biological changes (somatic growth and development), psychological (intellectual and emotional maturity) and social (Autonomy, responsibility, expanding the circle of relationships ...) that will affect your health or the onset of disease. Consideration of childhood as a specific population needs Group with biological, psycho-social and protection also is a recent infantile.

The health and social care is a basic right of citizenship.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, of 10 December 1948, states in Article 25 that:

1. Everyone has the right to necessary medical care and social services.
2. Motherhood and childhood are entitled to special care and assistance.

All children, born in wedlock whether or out of wedlock, Shall enjoy the same social protection.

Systems of basic rights protection initially instructed the domestic law of each State, through the Mechanisms for protection under the Constitutions of each of these (and possibly some constitutional rules later). However, this view openly restricted in the recognition of basic rights was later superseded by a phenomenon they call "internationalization of human rights", which operated after the Second World War.

The failure of the law to Provide Adequate Safeguards for the protection of basic rights, and the assumption of some organs Alleged or state Authorities in some Countries About What Should be Understood as a "fundamental right" That was the incentive allowed the United ADOPTED as the Need to Implement a supranational system That is Effective and binding on the protection of basic rights.

Initially, This primitive conception adopted by a few states (in Europe) was suppressed by Fought and others, citing as grounds his "self-determination" in Resolving Conflicts Their internal, international law must be limited to conflict resolution in nature exterior. This criterion was exceeded, as noted by Professor Gomez Perez: "Public International Law Established as one of its essential purpose the protection of human rights and step by step, from the outlawing of the slave trade by the treaties of Vienna in 1815, Until the Charter and the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the UN General Assembly on December 10, 1948, was devoting a progressive international law has been giving more and better systems to protect these rights.

This protection has been given by both universal and regional schemes. Thus, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is a universal type instrument in the United Nations system that, although not a treaty but a resolution of the General Assembly, is a source of law is an essential foundation of all UN system in this area.

Predominantly and besides this Universal Declaration, the Universal System is Comprised of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (both December 1996) and the Optional Protocol to the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, International Also law has created Mechanisms to Protect Human Rights and Special Procedures for this.

But, in turn, have created regional systems Such as Europe, Whose origin is put at the 1950 Convention, Developed through several additional protocols, and American regional system, Comprising all countries party to the That Are Charter of the Organization of American States and the American Convention of Human Rights in San José, Costa Rica " However, This fact That infuses the progressive nature of human rights in the international arena was not Assumed by States peacefully, Even When They have Ratified and Assumed the obligation of These binding international law of human rights against any provision of law, statutory or constitutional Either nature.

Importantly, This obligation, if not implicit in some international treaties on Human Rights is part of ius cogens of international law, Which has been exhibited in various statements issued by international courts of human rights protection, Restricting ourselves to the purpose of this paper to the Inter-American System of Human Rights Protection.

The Convention on the Rights of the Child was adopted by 193 States, so far unprecedented in the field of human rights. Spain made no reservation to the Convention and Ratified in 1990. It is important to draw attention to the international context in which it is born, with a variety of Situations and at a time when to finding That Suffered and children suffer enormous Difficulties and Injustices. It was clear That the Limitations in Protecting Their health, education or Preventing access to (and Prevent) its development, and That children were (and are) subject to abuse and exploitation through prostitution or harmful work or Recruited for Military Purposes, or Victims of war.

The Convention on the Rights of the Child is part of the legal system, so you can claim compliance to the Authorities. It is important to emphasize that the rights in the Convention are recognized that rights are part of our domestic law. The overall level of implementation is inadequate.

v. Spain uses three legal instruments on admission, selection and award. Firstly the compliance with the formal requirements, deadlines, and data compliance requirements will be monitored. In the second study the specific proposals that have been send, and third applicant's ability to carry out the project: financial sufficiency, and other administrative capacity.

In the final section of the organizers Stated that "The European Community pursues an equal opportunities policy, Therefore, either particularly encouraged to submit proposals or participate in the presentation." It is a very respectful consideration, but not more than that, because not prioritized in any way that kind of request.

2 THE LANZAROTE CONVENTION

vi. The European Convention on Human Rights was adopted by the Council of Europe in 1950, being enforceable by the Contracting States since 1953. Despite of this fact, Spain did not form part of it until 4th October 1979, when it was ratified. The reason of this time lapse, since its adoption until its ratification, was that from 1939 to 1975 Spain had been a dictatorial State where no public freedoms were recognized, and massive fundamental rights violations were committed almost every day. Therefore, Spain did not respect the rights set in the Convention, and, as it can be concluded, it could not be part of it because it would be contradictory with the own Convention.

In 1975 there was a breach in the existing system; General Francisco Franco, the one who had been its maximum leader during thirty six years, deceased. During this period of time public freedoms were not recognized for the citizens neither were any kind of right. This fact supposed the end of the regimen, its excision, and the beginning of a new historical stage known as 'The Transition', not being common agreement about its length, depend its end of different important facts. This period is characterized by the transformation of the totalitarian State into a democratic and social State of Law throughout progressive changes in time.

One of these changes, the most important of all, is the creation of the Spanish Constitution in 1978, establishing the fundamental pillars of the system. It recognizes a set of Fundamental Human Rights; some of them were already collected in the European Convention on Human Rights. The Convention should respect what is established in the Constitution in order to make it part of the domestic legal order. This was not a problem because as it was explained before, the own Fundamental Law promulgates a set of Fundamental Rights which in any case are contradictory with those content in the European Convention on Human Rights, therefore, it could be part of Spanish law since its ratification.

vii. The Convention on the Protection of Children Against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse of the Council of Europe, also known as the Lanzarote Convention, is an International Treaty promoted by the Council of Europe in 2007 legally binding to the Contracting States which signed it.

The primary goal of this legal text is preventing the commission of sexual offences whose victims are children, promoting cooperation between States through establishing the achievement of common goals in order to protect the rights of the victims of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse. The Convention introduces new crime legal conceptions, such as grooming, which must be pursued by the Contracting States, as well as preliminary measures and protective measures to the victims in order to prevent those offences.

Spain is part of the Lanzarote Convention since its ratification, on 12th March 2009, entering into force on 1st December 2010, and formulating a Declaration in relation to Gibraltar situation in the Convention which will be explained later.<sup>141</sup>

viii. The Lanzarote Convention is an International Treaty and therefore is part of the Spanish legal order since its adoption, always once it is checked it accomplishes with the constitutional formalities.

As each International Treaty, the Convention is a primary source of legislation so it has legal range. It has a special position in relation with the law due to the fact it has passive force facing it, this means that International Treaties cannot be modified by the law, according to article 96 of the Spanish Constitution.

<sup>141</sup>. Ratification Instrument of The Convention on the Protection of Children Against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse of the Council of Europe, made in Lanzarote 25th October 2007

The regulation for the International Treaties' celebration and its subsequent incorporation to the Spanish legislative body is established in articles 93-96 of the Fundamental Law. These articles impose different requirements, procedures and limits, depending of the type of Treaty which may be celebrated. In example, article 93 is referred to those treaties which may be part of Spanish legislation constituted within an international organization of integration which assumes the exercise of State powers, as it is the Directives' case, created by the European Union different institutions. In the current case, the Convention has been promoted by the Council of Europe which is an international organization of cooperation so that is not applicable.

Article 94 of the Constitution imposes an important limit to the State Government's freedom: it is required to inform or, depends of the case, needs the authorization of the Parliament in order to celebrate International Treaties with specific content.

The Lanzarote Convention somehow affects to Fundamental Rights because it contains criminal and child protection measures, thing which has to be taken into consideration. For this reason, Parliament had to known about the ratification of this Convention, although it has not any disposition which may be opposite to what is established in the Constitutional Act. If there was that case, article 95 of the same Act reflexes its supremacy disposing as a requirement its reform if an International Treaty with contrary content wants to be approved.

There is no implementing legislation in relation to an specific law, as it would be the case of European legal transpositions, because the Convention binds to its accomplishment since its entering into force. Despite of this fact, in 2010 the Criminal Code was reformed, being the Lanzarote Convention principles enshrined.

ix. The Criminal Code reform created specific offences in which is related to children protection in sexual crimes field. This legislation contains the majority of the Convention principles in Substantive Criminal Law (grooming, children pornography, etc.) Furthermore, apart from the Spanish ratification of the Convention, one of the main reasons which lead to reform the Criminal Law was the need of transposition to the domestic legal order of one Council Decision<sup>142</sup>, communitarian legal instrument which is binding directly to all Member States in all its elements.

When Criminal Code reform entered into force meant, particularly, under thirteen years old protection strengthened, creating specific criminal offences. Before 2010 reform when the criminal offences passive subject was a minor of thirteen it was an aggravating to the own crime but after the reform, when the victim is under that age, this has his own substantively, not being considered as an aggravating anymore but an independent act, which due to the passive subject age has as consequence higher imprisonment. Thus, child sexual indemnity has higher protection. Apart of this, special aggravations are introduced when the minor would be in special situation of vulnerability, and always when he is under the age of four, when the crime was collectively committed, within a criminal organization, using intimidation, force or violence or when there would be superiority abuse, kinship or a relationship of trust between victim and criminal.

It is also created a new offence which is directed to that person who through tricks and telematic media tries to meet an under thirteen child with sexual purposes, grooming in order to make the victim participate in pornographic spectacles and aggravations in crimes that already existed, like is the case of prostitution and storage and distribution of child pornography. New Criminal Code redaction also covers legal person liability when they would be active subjects in mentioned crimes, establishing penalties of fine making dependent their amount to the type of crime committed.

On the other hand, apart from the specific penalties set, ancillary penalties can be applied, as it is the case of deprivation of parental rights penalty. In the end, the aim of these penalties is give more protection to the victim under-age and preventing recidivism when those crimes would be committed in the minor's circle of trust.

x. Although there is legislation related to Lanzarote Convention principles, it is important pointing out that law bills are discussed in the Congress of the Deputies, one of the Spanish legislative bodies. The Criminal Law is an Organic Law due to its special content and according to what is established in article 81 of the Constitutional Text, it is required absolute majority of this body in order to approve, modify or derogate it. Therefore, it was needed a majority in the Congress to 2010 reform. This body is formed by deputies elected by citizens periodically each four years. In order to study and promote the reform a specific commission<sup>143</sup> was created and it was formed by deputies who belonged to different political groups and who may count with the help of experts in the fields they are trying to rule.

The Convention is domestic law since its entering into force so that could be applied directly but the criminal reform was necessary to give it more effectiveness due to the fact that the Convention itself does not create offences but establishes obligations of general accomplishment to the Contracting States, leaving them freedom to establish their penalties, aggravations and what is needed to ensure those obligations.

xi. Spain has not make any reservation to the Convention but it has make a declaration related to Gibraltar situation, which being in Spanish territory is depending in its external relationships to the United Kingdom, even conserving its local autonomy. Spain declares that in the case that Gibraltar would apply Lanzarote Convention in its territory, this would be within its local independence power, in its interim competences, not modifying in any kind of way its dependence to United Kingdom. The reason of this is to avoid potential competences and/or jurisdiction conflicts between Spain and United Kingdom which may arise if Gibraltar applies the treaty.

1 GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE JURISDICTION

i. Hispania was the name the Romans gave to Spain. In the years of power Octavio Augusto, there were created three provinces in the Iberian Peninsula: Andalusia, Tarragona and the Lusitania.

In the late V would begin the crisis of the Roman Empire. With the decline of the oligarchies of Rome came the barbarians. These recovered territorial unit who had defended their predecessors. However, with the arrival of the eighth century the first signs of decline in the Peninsula Visigoth pushed Muslim troops to take control of the territory of the former Roman Hispania. In just over three years, the entire peninsula, except for some northern mountainous regions, subject to the dominion over peoples from North Africa.

<sup>143</sup> Commission of Justice about the Bill of Organic Law which modifies Law 10/1995

Nevertheless, the new visitors respected the particularities of all faiths that inhabited this new territorial entity called Al Andalus.

The remains of the Visigoth army that had resisted the clashes with Muslim troops concentrated in the northern peninsula. From there orchestrated the "Reconquista", expanding the domains Plateau Christians, given the weakness of the Arab Caliphate.

In 1212, with the battle of Las Navas de Tolosa, came the final decline of the Peninsula Hispanic-African domain. There arose two crowns that were Aragon and Castile. In 1410 Isabel I of Castile and Ferdinand I of Aragon married, which de facto meant the union of the two kingdoms. This created the so-called Universal Spanish monarchy, which extended his dominions to American and European regions, and ended with the diversity of kingdoms that made up the peninsula. This situation lasted until the death of Philip II in the late sixteenth century. With the death without issue of Charles III opened a succession showdown. Austria, Holland and Britain defended Charles of Hapsburg in his ascent to the throne of Spain, while France had chosen Philip of Anjou. The victory fell on the side of the latter. Felipe V, as well be renamed, repealed the charters and the Courts of the Kingdoms of the Crown of Aragon, Charles of Hapsburg ally in the War of Succession. Already with Carlos III in power became enlightened despotism, an absolute monarchy that sought the advancement and progress of Spain turning to the right.

Between 1793 and 1808 the republican troops from France invaded the Spanish territory. The Spanish people's response was immediate. While fighting war unfolded, in Cadiz, a group of men of liberal spirit marked the first Spanish Constitution adopted in 1812. However, when Fernando VIII returned from exile ended with the ambitions and restored the previous liberal political order. During these turbulent times of constant struggle between liberalism and absolutism, the Spanish territories in America began their emancipation process.

In the nineteenth century Carlist Wars sparked calls, again faced liberals and absolutists. The victory clinched the first throne to a Regent Maria Cristina, for convenience related to the thesis of the bourgeoisie, a new social class that emerged strongly in the Spanish political landscape. During this stage the political parties were born, differentiated between moderate and progressive.

In the span of time between the years 1868 and 1874, with the crisis of moderate governments and to leave the country by the Regent Maria Cristina, came Sexenio liberal, still recognizing, however, the monarchy as a form government, in the shape of Amadeo of Savoy. That is until 1873, when Spain was established in the First Republic, who favoured a decentralized state model and an advanced system of liberties. The republican project failed, and in 1874 revived the monarchy. The Spanish throne was occupied by Alfonso XII, who in 1876 would establish a new constitution. The two major parties, the liberal and the conservative, alternated in power through a shift system and despotism.

In 1898, following the Spanish-American War called, Spain lost its colonies in Cuba, Puerto Rico and the Philippines, for the benefit of the United States. The two-party model established by Cánovas disappeared with the birth of nationalist parties and a new social class, the proletariat.

After the failure of the military actions in North Africa, Spain entered a period of depression, exacerbated by social stress in which Spain was immersed. Then, in 1921, the military dictatorship of Miguel Primo de Rivera. With the failure of centralized and military objectives, the end of the dictatorship was accelerated. Another soldier, Damaso Berenguer, took power, but also failed, causing the decline and disappearance of the monarchy of Alfonso XIII.

In 1931 the Second Republic was established. This was a democratic regime in which the tensions between the two Spains were growing increasingly. So much that in 1936 civil war broke out dividing the country into two halves, one was a Republican and the other that of the rebels, also known as "the national side."

The war ended with the victory of the latter, which in 1939 led to the birth of a new dictatorship that lasted for nearly 40 years. Gone are the political parties, developed a model national-catholic and limited civil rights. In the decade of the 50s there was an opening on a regime that led to the technocracy. Later, in 1955, in an attempt to get closer to the positions of the democratic powers, Spain is part of the UN, and in the mid 70's General Franco died, and with him all the regime he headed. Then a transition to democracy started, which resulted in the adoption of a new constitution, signed in 1978. This is a text of a liberal, enshrining a model of market economy and a form of government known as "parliamentary monarchy". The standard has become the top of the Spanish legal system.

It also established the so-called state of autonomies, a unique model in the world that bears some similarities to federal systems. This follows from the wording of Article 2, which states that "The Constitution is based on the indissoluble unity of the Spanish Nation, the common and indivisible homeland of all Spanish, and recognizes and guarantees the right to autonomy of the nationalities and regions it is composed and the solidarity among them all."

In 1982 Spain joined NATO, and in 1986 joins the European Communities, now the European Union.

ii. Human rights do not have an explicit provision in Spanish law. The Spanish Constitution, in Articles 14 to 29, recognizes a set of principles and civil rights to citizens. These are called fundamental rights, although starting from the foundation of natural law, have certain differences with the so-called human rights. Fundamental rights would be a positivization a series of human rights that the Constitution has taken as reference and inspiring its legal structure, and which enjoy special protection, since it requires a larger majority to reform them. In its preamble our Constitution is set as the objective "to protect all Spanish and peoples of Spain in the exercise of human rights, their cultures and traditions, languages and institutions." Then, in Article 10, which gives access to Title I of the Constitution, the Constitution specifically required to "read all the rules that affect the fundamental rights and freedoms recognized in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and international treaties and agreements thereon ratified by Spain". This gives a "supra legal" value to international treaties that prevents the national legislature may contravene the commitments made by our country in terms of human rights.

In addition, the Spanish Constitution protects human rights in Article 81.1, under which for concreteness and delimitation of such guarantees is necessary fundamental organic law. This means that approval requires an absolute majority in parliament. Article 53.1 EC law reserves to the complementary development of fundamental rights. The Constitutional Court has already clarified that it should not identify "the generic concept of law with the most restricted of General Law or Law passed by general state organs." Thus in its Sentence 37/1981 the High Court recognizes the legislative bodies of the Autonomous Communities certain powers in the development of fundamental rights. So, said, "When the statute does not affect the basic conditions of such exercise, may be enacted by the autonomous communities to which their laws legislative competence conferred on a subject whose regulation necessarily implies the exercise of constitutionally guaranteed rights."

Our Constitution also describes an instrument that grants certain legislative powers to the executive branch. The Regulation is a legal concept applicable in cases of extraordinary and urgent need which has the force of law. In the case that the regulations would rule fundamental rights, the Constitutional Court has stated in its Sentence 127/1994 the following: "In addition, any legal discipline that" affect "fundamental rights is not constitutionally required to be approved by Law, but a "regulation" of such rights inevitably enters the reservation of Art. 81.1 of the Constitution, rather than in the ordinary legal reserve of art. 53.1-when "develop" the Constitution and directly essential to the definition of the fundamental right, either in direct regulation, general and global thereof or in partial or sector, but also on essential aspects of right, and no, partial, or less directly aimed at contributing to the definition and legal definition of the right". This means that the Act shall be a regulation of the essential fundamental right, while the ordinary law and regulation would take care of those complementary elements of it.

As noted, there is as such none an express declaration of human rights in our legal system, beyond those mentioned indirect references. However, we can indeed speak of various sectorial rules that are responsible for developing the various rights under the Constitution and international treaties. Also of Article 10.2 must mention, pursuant to which the provisions on fundamental rights shall be interpreted in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other international treaties signed by Spain. This does not mean that the rights recognized in international law are integrated directly into our Constitutional legal order. That is, do not become constitutional canon while the Constitution does not expressly mentioned, but "requires interpreting the relevant provisions of this according to the content of such treaties or conventions, so that in practice this becomes content somehow constitutionally declared in the content of the rights and freedoms set forth in chapter two of title I of our Constitution" (Sentence of the Constitutional Court 36/1991, of 14 February). Some of these international agreements to which Article 10.2 refers are the Pact on Civil and Political Rights in New York, the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, both of 1966, the European Social Charter of 1961, and the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, signed in Rome on 4 November 1950, among many others.

Neither there are just allusions to children's rights within the Spanish Constitution of 1978, beyond the rights attributed generally to other citizens in Title I. It is only recognized in Article 39 the protection that parents and the public authorities have to give to minors. In the fourth paragraph, the aforementioned article notes that "children shall enjoy the protection provided by international agreements which safeguard their rights." Spain has signed several international treaties on Human Rights. Example is the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, signed in New York on December 19, 1966. In particular, in matters relating to the rights of children, it seems that Article 39.4 and described us back to the Convention on the Rights of the Child, adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on November 20, 1989, which in Article 19.1 states that "States Parties shall take all appropriate legislative, administrative, social and educational measures to protect the child from all forms of harm or injury or abuse, neglect or negligent treatment, maltreatment or exploitation, including abuse sexual, while the child is in the custody of their parents, legal guardian or any other person who has the care".

However, the Organic Law 1/1996, of January 15, Protection of Minors, partially amending the Civil Code and the Civil Procedure Act devotes itself to a number of specific provisions for the protection of rights of children. This piece of legislation is developing and complementing the regulation of the rights of children performed by the Convention on the Rights of the Child of 20 November 1989, and the European Charter on the Rights of the Child. The Spanish legal text enshrines the interests of children as paramount, ahead of other legitimate interests with which they could attend, also regulate the status of adoptions of foreign children and foster care by public administrations of homeless children.

We cannot forget the Law 5/2000, of 12 January, regulating criminal responsibility of minors, which has basically punitive character and it is oriented to education, prevention and social reintegration of children.

The direct and effective protection of children has been transferred to the Autonomous Regions. There also autonomic regulation related to the subject, although not all regions have developed specific rules correctly about systems of protection and assistance to children. Some regions have developed the matter itself are Andalusia, Madrid, Castilla La-Mancha, Extremadura, Aragon, etc.

iii. Spain has a Constitutional Court, governed by Title IX of the Constitution. It consists of 12 members appointed by the King, four by the Congress by a majority of 3/5, four by the Senate, two by the Government and two by the General Council of the Judiciary. This is a court that, among its extensive features guarantor of the Constitution, has recognized the special expertise of the resolution of the constitutional complaints, a peculiar form of challenge to all those acts of state that may involve a violation of rights and freedoms enshrined in Articles 15 and 30.2 of the Constitution. It is a subsidiary instrument, since it is necessary previously exhausted all other instruments, for the same purpose, the law makes available.

Article 41.2 of the Organic Law 2/1979 of 3 October, the Constitutional Court, identifies individuals who may have committed the violation of the rights protected by the application for protection. Specifically speaks of the authorities and their staff, regardless of their belonging to the State, the Autonomous Communities or any other public entity territorial, corporate or institutional. It may be worthless acts of law, rules, or assault acts of government or acts or omissions of the judiciary. In the first case, to proceed the filing of the appeal is required within three months of the act is held firmly under the Statutes and Regulations of the legislature. If it is an administrative act, it must have been previously exhausted its challenge in the ordinary courts. In the latter case, it is imperative that resources have been filed to challenge court order specific to each application for protection before.

The procedure is described in Articles 48 to 58 of the Organic Law of the Constitutional Court. The person shall submit an application to the Registry of the Court which clearly described the events and the constitutional principles that are believed injured. Assistance is required Barrister and Solicitor, in accordance with article 81.1 LOTC. Section of the Court unanimously decided in the admission or rejection of the application process, depending on whether or not it meets the formal requirements (Article 50. Organic Law of the Constitutional Court). If problems are remediable defect of nature opens a cure period, out of which the claim is deemed rejected.

When the Board has completed this process, the Court shall hear the organ whose act allegedly injurious to fundamental rights, the plaintiffs, the people appeared in court in previous proceedings and the public prosecutor to formulate their arguments. Subsequently, the court shall issue a ruling which shall be binding, res judicata and erga omnes, as guaranteed by Articles 51 and 52 of the Organic Law of the Constitutional Court.

But ordinary measures of protection of individuals against possible violations of human rights are found in the ordinary courts. As we know, in our legal system there are five different court systems, civil order, in charge of knowledge of all matters that come not by law assigned to another court order, the criminal, who will judge all the cases of crimes and misdemeanours, the social order, where all known issues with state guarantees social and contentious-administrative one, for possible conflicts between government and a private person.

In each of these there are various jurisdictional courts. Each court will know, in the same order, with concrete matters assigned by law. Article 53.2 recognizes the protection of fundamental rights of special character, preferential and summary. This is a special procedure, which can be formulated only in cases of violation of the rights to which allude Articles 14 to 29 of the Spanish Constitution. It is a preferred method because the matter will be treated as a priority. On the other hand, is summary because tighter deadlines and procedures would be simplified. There are numerous sectorial laws governing that procedure for the protection of fundamental rights within the jurisdictional order that we mentioned before.

iv. The Supreme Court

In Spain there is a Supreme Court. It is the highest court in all respects, except in regard to constitutional rights and guarantees, whose competence is attributed to the Constitutional Court. It consists of five regular and four special rooms. The former include the First Chamber of the Civil, the Second Chamber, Criminal, the Third Chamber of Administrative Litigation, the Fourth Chamber, of the social and the Fifth Chamber of the Military. ECCC would be a Court of Jurisdictional Disputes, a Chamber of Jurisdictional Disputes, a Board Conflict of Competition and a Special Chamber.

The Chief Justice will turn the General Council of the Judiciary, the body responsible for ensuring the independence of judges and courts.

The criminal procedure

The Spanish Legal Order recognizes no single model of criminal procedure. Depending on the criminal act that is deemed criminal procedures are articulated. In this presentation we will focus on the ordinary procedure and the abbreviated, being the most common, and treat others superficially.

I. The process of "habeas corpus" (regulated by the Organic Law 6/1984)

It is to ensure the detained citizen access to the courts for those deciding on the legality of his detention. Know of such procedures trial courts, which rule within a maximum of 24 hours of admission of demand. No need legal advice or attorney.

II. The trial of offenses (Book VI of the Criminal Procedure Act)

They weigh facts which, by its low gravity, are constitutive lack. Additionally a civil action may be brought to demand compensation for damages caused heritage. This is a fundamentally oral procedure, which does not require the presence of an attorney or a lawyer. The assistance of the prosecution is required only in those cases where criminal offenses are prosecuted ex officio.

III. The abbreviated procedure (Title II of Book IV of the Criminal Procedure Act)

Whose crimes are prosecuted by imprisonment not to exceed 9 years? It starts by a complaint from an individual, a police report or investigations instituted by the public prosecutor. It required the assistance of a lawyer. This procedure consists of three phases:

a) Hearing phase. The magistrate will conduct an investigation to ascertain the facts and make the accusation. Precautionary measures may be taken to ensure the protection of the parties.

b) Intermediate phase: The magistrate decides whether or not the opening of the trial. The parties may submit an indictment; request the file of the case or the practice of complementary measures. When the judge has agreed to the opening of the trial the defendant may prepare a statement of defence.

c) Trial: At this stage we present the evidence that the parties have requested in their letters of accusation and defence. On grounds the judge pronounce sentence, unable to impose a sentence higher than requested by the prosecution and convict him of a crime other than that is the subject of the process. Given this statement may be filed, within 10 days, an appeal to a higher court.

IV. The ordinary procedure

It is applied to offenses whose imprisonment exceeding nine years. Instruction handles the magistrate court and prosecutorial jurisdiction for that purpose, which in most cases is usually the Provincial Court. It consists of three phases:

a) Pre-trial or trial proceedings (Title IV of Book II of the Criminal Procedure Act): The aim is to clarify the facts and investigate potential liabilities. This phase is secret. Only interested parties can access the proceedings, unless the judge has decreed a gag for them too. By indictment charged to the judicial authority subject committing a crime and present a summary conclusion to the body responsible for prosecuting the facts.

b) Intermediate phase: This deliberative body may confirm or reverse the order of summary conclusion. If it is confirmed, this could be an acquittal (file actions) or the opening of the trial. In the latter case, the file will be forwarded to the Public Prosecutor. The parties shall submit a statement of qualifications which reflect the facts in the indictment, the crime that his opinion exist and aggravating circumstances, mitigating or extenuating that may arise.

c) Trial (regulated in Book III of the Criminal Procedure Act): tests suggested by the parties in the original score may be accepted or rejected. If accepted, you will receive a probationary phase to allow the parties to modify the content of their written classifications. Subsequently they will be exhibited in an oral report reflecting their findings. The accused will have the last word. Once this phase, the judge will sentence, against which there is an appeal to the Supreme Court.

The appeal in criminal matters

The appeal is governed by Chapter V of Law 1/2000. It can occur when a statement opposes the Supreme Court's jurisprudence or resolve questions and issues on which there is no peaceful doctrine in the provincial courts. It is one of the powers which Article 57 of the Organic Law of the Judiciary recognizes the Second Chamber of the Supreme Court.

v. The Organic Law 5/2000, of 12 January, regulating criminal responsibility of minors, has determined, in its first article that the minimum age for the existence of criminal responsibility is 14 years. This piece of legislation is applicable only to citizens at the time of commission of the offense with less than 18 years. It also requires public authorities, particularly the prosecutor, to ensure children's rights. With the entry into force of the Organic Law 5/2000 establishing a juvenile court, to prosecute those causes that are the subjects involved as recognized in Article 1 of this rule. The execution of the judgments of these courts is the responsibility of the Autonomous Communities

Statistics (Data from the National Statistics Institute in 2010)

In 2010 there have been 18,238 minors' convictions as final judgments submitted to the Register of Judgments Juvenile Criminal Responsibility. This is an increase of about 3.8% over the previous year. 84.1% of those convicted were male, while 15.9% were female. Of these, 76.1% are Spanish, while the remaining 23.9% are foreigners, representing, in the latter case, an increase of 1.5% over the previous year.

Most juvenile has committed a single criminal offense. Only one in three has incurred more than one.

The autonomous city of Ceuta and some autonomous communities such as La Rioja and the Balearic Islands recorded the highest rates of juvenile offenders. At the other end, Madrid, Catalonia and Navarre had the lowest levels.

Regarding criminal offenses in 2010 have registered a total of 31,061, representing an increase of 4.8% over the previous year. The faults were 64.7% and 35.3% crimes. The offenses include theft (39.2%), injuries (11.8%) and crimes against road safety (11.2%). The most frequent errors were those made against property (62.3%) and against people (32.6%)

By sex, men commit 89% of the faults and 78.9% of the crimes. The figure falls to 11% and 21.1% of faults of crimes in the case of women.

The number of juvenile offenses has slightly fallen down in Spain from 76.3% to 74.8%. By contrast, the number of offenses committed by foreign minors in Spanish territory rises from 23.7% to 25.2%.

The autonomous city of Ceuta, the communities of La Rioja and the Basque Country with the highest rates of crime, while Madrid, Castilla - La Mancha and Catalonia the lowest.

More punitive measures applied by the Spanish judges have been on probation (34.7%), providing the benefit of the community (21.1%), and the realization of socio-educational tasks (12.5%)

With increasing age of the offender, judges tend to impose further conducting socio-educational tasks to the detriment of probation.

Internment in closed more often applies to foreign children (6%) than for domestic (1.4%). The trend is similar in the case of detention in semi-open (14.5% vs. 10.5%)

With the approval in 2000 of the Children Act opened the door to the Autonomous Communities may order the administration of juvenile detention centres to private entities. Today, this situation has been adopted for autonomy in 73% of cases. We require that foundations are required entrusted with the operation of the centre are non-profit.

2 SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW

2.1 Sexual Abuse

i. The regulation of the sexual crimes in children has been very affected for the 2010 reform of the Spanish Criminal Code affected. This modification is a response to the indispensable adaptation to the Decisión Marco 2004/68/JAI del Consejo, de 22 diciembre 2003, relativa a la lucha contra la explotación sexual de los niños y la pornografía infantil<sup>144</sup>, known as Convenio de Lanzarote.

From then on the basic conduct for the crime of sexual abuse in children under 13, precept 183.1 of Criminal Code, is meant to be “any kind of acts that attempt against minor sexual indemnity” but without any kind of violation or intimidation because in that case it would be considered as a case of “sexual assault”, precept. 183.2. Hence, “The typical conduct” of sexual abuses in children under 13 years is any kind of conducts that affects to the sexual indemnity of the child, including any type of acts from kisses in mouth or neck to touching or molestations in child’s sexual organs. That means, in professor’s MONGE FERNÁNDEZ words “every action by which the perpetrator pretends to get the person [child] involved in a sexual context”.

On the other hand, jurisprudence had already produced (before the amendment of the year 2010) a series of criteria for the interpretation of the former articles regulating this crime when the “legal good” to protect was honesty or sexual freedom and thus says the STS 7849/1998 by saying that “the violation of sexual freedom is committed when trying to satisfy the sexual instinct by touching”<sup>145</sup>, of the most diverse nature, carried out in the body of a child under twelve years of one sex or the other, provided that such touching affect erogenous zones or to nearby. Looking for the criterion to distinguish between acts punishable and which are not, can be considered actions that an adult person would reasonably consider as interference in the area of sexual intimacy susceptible to be rejected if not give its free 'consent'. In this regard the judgment considers breach conduct consistent processing in “repeatedly kissing cheeks and trying to kiss, unsuccessfully, on the lips, caress in the knees and thighs with the claim to unequivocally reach the genitals of an 11 year old girl”.

ii. No article mentions expressly the “intentionality” as such but some sectors of the doctrine, the Professor MONGE FERNÁNDEZ for example, considers that “types of sexual abuse require intent, i.e. both knowledge about the sexual nature of the act and the age or status of the victim, and the willingness to run it"<sup>146</sup>". The realization of the punishable conduct (sexual abuse of a minor) in a reckless or negligent manner (i.e., not malicious) is not covered by the code and therefore could not punish you (article 12 of the Criminal Code).

iii. The Spanish Code does not define a specific age from which it is legal to participate in sexual activities. However, following the reform of the year 2010 be considered well legal protected "sexual indemnity" of children under 13 years, any type of sexual activity with children younger than 13 years was completely prohibited.

When the child is in the range between 13 and 16 years, the regulation is unclear since article 182 worth only the conduct of intercourse if it has mediated deception. In this sense must also be taken into account that marriage in Spain can be carried out from the age of 14 in certain cases and with judicial waiver (article 48 of the Civil Code).

From the age of 16 there is no doubt that children already can participate in sexual activities giving their consent.

iv. These three situations are treated differently in the Spanish criminal code. The appearance of the element of force or the threat would make the conduct ceases to be considered 'abuse' and was to be considered as "aggression" in the article 183.2 and punished with the highest punishment (for this penalty is of 2 to 6 years and for that of 5 to 10 years in prison).

On the other hand, the use of disability it would be placed within the aggravating factors common to both typical behaviour (abuse and aggression). It would have room in the intellectual or physical underdevelopment of the victim that it had been placed in a State of total helplessness that collects article 183.4 to) and would be considered an element that can occur in both cases and its effect is that the fixing of the penalty has to be in the upper half of the respective (the case for abuse of 4 to 6 and the aggressions of 7 and a half to 10).

v. There is no specific regulation for the crime of incest but if that referred to the situation that a family member abuse of a child as an aggravating cause to crimes of aggression and abuse (says the article 183.4 d literally). The penalty of the crime of abuse will be settle in its upper half when, for the execution of the crime, responsible for has charger a relationship of superiority or kinship, as parent, or brother, by nature or adoption, or allied with the victim.

vi. As in the previous case, this possibility is included among the aggravating factors common to crimes of abuse and assault of children doing the penalty that applies in the top half. The wording of the article points out that the penalty will be worsen "when the guilty any charger of its authority, agent of this, or any public official". The doctrine has in general considered this aggravation is based on increased confidence that public servants can awaken in children, which facilitates its attraction and implies fewer risks. Its broad wording included on the one hand the forces of order ("authority or agent of the authority": police, civil guards, etc.) and all charges of public nature (all those that work carried out by public institutions: teachers, principals, coaches, sports, etc.).

Also it is worth mentioning in this regard article 184 of the code on sexual harassment as to this given in "the area of a relationship working, teaching or provision of services, continuous or habitual". In this case the typical conduct punishable is the request for favors of a sexual nature, for himself or for a third party in the above environments and the penalty would go from 3 to 5 months in prison or a fine of 6 to 10 months. If in addition there is the element of abuse of occupational, educational or hierarchical superiority, the penalty increases 5 to 7 months in prison or 10 to 14 months fine. Also in this case the special vulnerability of the victim by reason of age, illness or mental situation is considered aggravating.

2.2 Child Prostitution

vii. Spain is part of the Council of Europe Convention on Action Against Trafficking in Human Beings. The treaty was signed on July 9, 2008 and was published in the BOE No. 219, dated Thursday, September 10, 2009, Section I. Page 76 453.

viii. It is difficult to define the terms child pornography and child prostitution, as there is no unanimous doctrine about it, yet we include them in behaviours called "sexual exploitation", finding some common characteristics:

"a) coercing a minor into prostitution or into participating in pornographic performances, or profiting from or in any way exploit a child for such purposes.

- b) recruiting a child into prostitution or into participating in pornographic shows
- c) Practice sexual activities with a child using one of the following means:

- Make use of coercion, force or threat;
- To offer money or other forms of compensation or return for care to be provided to engaging in sexual activities;
- Abuse of a recognized position of trust, authority or influence over the child.”<sup>147</sup>

We found, in Spanish law, two typical behaviours that define child prostitution: The first, contained in the Criminal Code art.187.1 provided that, induce, encourage, promote or facilitate prostitution (known as favouring prostitution of minor) such acts encourage the practice of prostitution in a direct way.<sup>148</sup> Also coincides with a certain profit obtained by that person while not purely economic, as might be the person to incite prostitution with a vengeance without enriching mobile directly<sup>149</sup>. Also, as stated by the doctrine of the Supreme Court, it can constitute the offense of prostitution as inductor the customer whose payment is crucial for the child to undergo a qualitative change in their sex life in addition to their lustful mood. In second place is punishable in the same way the attitude of the request, accept or obtain remuneration or promise sex with minors, this pay or promise have an immediate economic content, directly or not. Penalties are provided of one to five years and a fine of twelve to twenty four months in its objective form, but the second point of the aforementioned article provides an aggravating factor that increases the penalty to imprisonment for 4-6 years if the victim is less than 13 years.

Besides this crime admits the existence of a possible fraud to the person promoting prostitution but not worrying to find out whether it is a minor or not, taking the risk to profit so be it. Referring the matter of maintaining sexual relationship with the child, the

- a) Persuading or coercing a child to engage in any unlawful sexual activity
- b) The exploitative use of children in prostitution or other unlawful sexual practices
- c) The exploitative use of children in pornographic performances and materials, including the production, sale and distribution or other forms of trafficking in such material, and possession of such material

STS of 14 May 1997 states that will prove as any other cause of responsibility. With regard to aggravating circumstances, throughout this report we will discuss it in depth.

By the time, the preparatory acts of crime are not typified, although it is possible a punishment for those involved in human trafficking for prostitution (not in isolated cases), by promoting or favouring crime of illegal immigration workers. And it can turn a crime of child abduction if the transfer is made by the responsible (guardian, conservator ...) with intent to commit a crime of prostitution on the child below. And the complication in detecting these cases is such that the law aims to characterize the crime as mere activity by the difficulty of proving any results.

While the Lanzarote Convention provides that, for child prostitution means purposes of the Convention, "the fact of using a child for sexual activities in exchange for money or the promise of money, or any other form of remuneration, payment or advantage, whether or not the same is available to the child or a third person." Falls relatively to the offense contained in the Criminal Code in Spanish refers to the induction, promotion or to favour this kind of activities. Just as the Convention mentions, to offer money or the promise thereof, or any other way to see the child rewarded activity. There are found obvious signs that the Spanish legislator has adapted and included in the law, the intentions and purposes promoted by international law.

ix. Regarding the authorship of this type of crime, the Spanish legal system frames crimes against minors, both a third person, as an adult who has an intercourse with the victim. This is one of the differences with Article 188, which provides for the prostitution of an adult, as the latter does not criminalize activity that keeps the sexual relationship with the taxpayer. The reason is that the doctrine and jurisprudence understand that the price paid by the customer has enough strength to motivate the minor or incompetent and therefore promoting prostitution.<sup>150</sup> There settled other precedents such as the agreement of the Supreme Court (2nd) of February 9, 2005, which proclaims that only being an active subject of the type of corruption of minors under Article 189.4 CP<sup>151</sup>, which pursues of third party regarding the typical behaviour. Finally APRCP 2008<sup>152</sup> provides for criminal punishment of those who seek, accept or obtain remuneration or promise, a sexual relationship with minor<sup>153</sup>, somehow trying to approach the European policy, in particular the Framework Decision 2004 / 68/JAI Council. The victim is always the child who is protected from conduct that may affect normal development, particularly in sexual sphere.

2.3 Child Pornography

x. By the time and place when the Convention was stated, Spain was represented, and it proceeded through the Plenipotentiary for signature and ratification. It dates from November 23, 2001, being the place the city of Budapest (Hungary).

xi. There is no unanimity in the design of child pornography. Thus we see as UN defines child pornography as "any representation, by whatever means, of a child engaged in explicit sexual activity, real or simulated, or any representation of the sexual parts of a child for primarily sexual<sup>154</sup> purposes", while the Council of the European Union believes "pornographic material that depicts or visually depicts:

- i. A real child involved or engaged in sexually explicit conduct, including lascivious exhibition of the genitals or pubic area of a child, or
- ii. A real person appearing to be a child involved or engaged in the conduct mentioned in subsection ii, or;
- iii. Realistic images of a non-existent child involved or engaged in the conduct mentioned in subsection<sup>155</sup> i."

For its part, the Council of Europe branded as pornographic "any material that shows a minor well developed in a sexually explicit conduct, or a person who is a minor apparently developing sexually explicit conduct or realistic images representing a minor developing a

However, we cannot admit that any representation of a naked child in the abstract is to be considered child pornography. The same social logic is observed in photographs took by parents or relatives to the children of the house naked. Drawing the line between innocent records and criminally reprehensible conduct can be a daunting task sometimes. In this vein, the law gives a resounding answer: The key is that the material focuses on sexual behaviour, sexual organs or their sexuality<sup>158</sup> and there are enough precedents to support this position.<sup>159</sup>

Considering the above, we can approach the term child pornography within certain limits as key features, such as:

1. It is a visual representation, where they reign as media:
  - a. Photographs
  - b. Videos and DVD's
  - c. Telephone: cases in which the child keeps dialling telephone conversations with sexual content<sup>160</sup>

The defendant cannot give a reasonable explanation about the zoom at the trial ...".

La Sentencia de la Audiencia Provincial de Alicante, sección 3ª, nº 239/2009, de 5 de mayo lidia con un acusado que aprovechando que la víctima, menor de edad, estaba dormida, empleó su teléfono móvil para tomar fotografías de su torso desnudo (sin mostrar la cara), los genitales a corta distancia y muy explícitamente. La misma concluye que “las imágenes sin reserva reputan su contenido como explícita y exclusivamente sexual, sin que pueda vislumbrarse ninguna otra finalidad de su producción o tenencia, ni artística ni documental, ni científica ni como valor de recuerdo afectivo personal, lo que permite calificar las repetidas fotos como material pornográfico”.

d. Internet: Current Trojan Horse for the dissemination of child pornography and complicated control stands as the middle star to paedophiles and regular users of this type of pornography.

2. Real: see a true and authentic nature, we mean the same by "explicit child pornography", this being one in which directly involved a minor or incompetent or being subject to film exhibition.<sup>161</sup>

It always base themselves exclusively lewd content aimed at sexual arousal rudely and lack serious literary, artistic or educational, as noted by the Supreme Court Decision No. 803/2010 of 30 September.<sup>162</sup>

For now we can draw on the "obscene graphical representation that addresses the sexual impulse excitation, comprising all forms of manifestation of communication."<sup>163</sup> It should be mentioned also, one of the biggest problems facing the regulatory framework relating to child pornography, which is none other than the simulated child pornography. We talk about that hypothetical situation where the minor or incompetent is not so; clear is the example of an adult, which produced substantial modification technology fully resembles a minor maintaining active sexual behaviour prohibited by the law.<sup>164</sup>

You must check previously used barrier that gives visual representation, since the difference in the consideration or not as child pornography, is crucial. No action could compare photography to observe the genitals of a child by the medical staff; as well we would if it did a paedophile. We will have to meet the rules set by Lanning to exempt typicality, who are <sup>164</sup> We identified two types within simulated child pornography: Technique Pornography means "starring adults posing as minors by very different means or procedures (retouching photographs or films consisting of removing pubic hair or facial features softening, employment of clothing for teenagers). We are faced with an adult posing as minor generate getting the impression that indeed it is. Child pornography is artificial in the pornographic representation involving a minor or disabled on a pattern created totally unrealistic. Pseudo pornography or virtual child pornography is an intermediate figure between pornography riding technique and artificial. We talked about the case of imaging partially created fictitious traits or characteristics of a real pattern-on-identifiable minor or incompetent. Certainly any child makes a representation so it cannot be taken as child pornography, on the other hand we cannot forget that the right to privacy, self-image and to honor the child supposedly represented are substantially affected. We talked about a controversial assumption that threatens the legal system is so problematic that provide effective protection to the injured child.

none other than the professional application of the material and the concordance of use with this professional application.<sup>165</sup>

In any case, the legally protected regarding a child aspires to "ensure maximum protection for those under age."<sup>166</sup> It welcomes in this perspective several rights: the right to self-image, the right to form free decisiveness (sexual indemnity)<sup>167</sup>, the dignity of the human person and for children in general<sup>168</sup>.

xii. Law 15/2003, of 25 November, amending Law 10/1995 of November 23, introduced amendments to the Criminal Code which provide, for the first time in Spain, the offense of possession of pornographic material. The penalties for having pornographic pictures, videos, real images, digitized, electronic files, etc., whose production employs a minor of 18 years will lead to the imprisonment of up to one year. It also incorporates the offense of producing, selling and distributing pseudo pornography, this as mentioned, is where pornographic material was not used directly but use less his image or voice altered or modified.

Penalties, on the other hand, increased up to four years in prison for inmates punished for the production, sale or distribution of pornography, which appear and are intended for children under 18, one aggravating it the fact that the child is under 13 years, for which the penalty will be of four years' imprisonment, to be eight years in prison. The so-called P2P programs do very complex combat this problem given its characteristics. They employ of decentralized structures makes identification harder in case of web pages or e-mails.

<sup>165</sup> Following this line, it is necessary to clarify the issue of the age of the victim as sheds regulation shall mean any victim of child pornography under eighteen, attend or not consent. However we cannot forget that the Budapest Convention considered as minor a person who does not exceed 18 years and yet leaves complete freedom to depart States so that they can set the limit at 16 years. Other provisions of this Convention binding on states, pose a posteriori the hypothetical problem of conduct that is perpetrated in Spain (where the legal system protects the child up to 18 years) and whose material is produced in a country in which the conduct of minors is atypical. Article 23.4 e) of the Judicial Power in Spain, indemnity shielding minors, is no longer what it was since the reform which occurred by Organic Law 1/2009, of 3 November.

<sup>168</sup> Stresses the Consultation 3/2006 of the Attorney General, which states: "the types of articles 189.1 b) and 189.2, unlike the kind of art. 189.1 q) do not protect personal goods, but the safety of children in the abstract and dignity, advancing the protection barriers and attacking the danger inherent in behaviors that can promote specific practices by pedophiles on children."

The diffusion through these programs is very different from simply sending a file containing child pornography. For this reason some authors call this activity as passive diffusion. The operation of these programs creates a folder or exchange-incoming-my shared folder that stores the downloaded material but also turn back shares on the same, except that the user avoid, thus creating a multiplier effect.<sup>169</sup>

Both the Supreme Court and the majority of this conduct doctrine located within art.189.1 b). However, there is no clear case law about unity, since there are many statements that accuse the lack of proportionality in applying this type to a clearly active and wilful conduct, as a passive, whose intent is difficult to prove. For instance, the STS No. 105/2009, of 30 January<sup>170</sup>. It currently provides verification of the Criminal Code in relation to its compatibility with paragraphs 1-1f Article 20 of the Lanzarote Convention.

o. Possession: This conduct is criminalized in Article 189.2 of the Criminal Code, establishing as active subject "who for their own use possess pornographic material whose production had been used minors or incompetents." No to the reform included made by Law 15/2003, and was, however, subject to parliamentary debate<sup>171</sup>. However, this claim held both the FD 2004/68/JHA as the Budapest Convention, and even the Council of Europe<sup>172</sup>. This crime is known solitary offense between doctrine and jurisprudence<sup>173</sup> and their supposed persecution operate on demand for child pornography material to thereby eliminate supply-just as they in turn preserves the dignity of the child as a legal protected object<sup>174</sup>.

Also, is the emergence of more serious future behaviours performed by the offender, and is that a large number of paedophiles and pederasts who possess such material ultimately end producing its own new child pornographic material<sup>175</sup>. A new problem is now launched by Internet, and that is the consumption through on-line display; it focused Lanzarote

o. Pornography Pseudo Traffic or morphing: Located in Art. 189.7, condemning the conduct of "who produces, sells, distributes, exhibits or offering pornographic material by any means and not having been used directly minor or incompetent, his voice is used or altered or modified image." It was also introduced by the Law 15/2003, which punishes the dissemination of pornographic material in his possession at any case, even when not directly acting on any minor. The difference of this unique type with respect from the rest is that affects both their freedom and sexual indemnity (except as a kind of danger), but affects their right to honor<sup>177</sup>, privacy<sup>178</sup>, self-image and dignity<sup>179</sup>. Although the minor itself is not used, it is actually there voice, or image technically manipulated.

There are three different ways of expression:

- I. Images altered and sexualized bodies, like the image of a child in a swimsuit that is removed the garment using computer programs;
- II. Separate images in one picture, like a child's hand superimposed on a penis of an adult;
- III. Photomontages, some of which represent a minor and others have sexual content.<sup>180</sup>

The penalty under the Penal Code for this behaviour involves the imprisonment of three months to one year or a fine of three months to two years. Virtual Pornography and Pornography or Technical: True typicality lacking at present, however, there are few provisions effective advocates criminalization. The Framework Decision 2004/68/JHA<sup>181</sup>, or the Budapest Convention<sup>182</sup> are an example, and therefore the repeated exclusion of this behaviour in our Penal Code is a breach of the first, according to several authors, ostensibly as a result of the protection of freedom expression, although it could hardly be understood in any case a child pornography as well protected by freedom of expression. Typing is justified on the basis that these materials may constitute a provocation to commit sexual abuse of minors and the exaltation of paedophile behaviour, which could in turn contribute to the acceptance of these behaviours and generally attack the dignity of childhood. Data show an increase in sexual addiction to children caused by virtual pornography, not to mention at any time that such claims Berglet<sup>183</sup>, it will soon be impossible to distinguish between real images and CGI.

At this point it is necessary to mention the victim's consent. We can affirm for the moment the total irrelevance of its consent in our legal system, and the reason is that "the legally protected for this crime is none other than the sexual indemnity of minors, meaning their psychological well-being, as a necessary condition for proper and normal sexual training process, which is prevalent in these people, on sexual freedom, since by age or disability, these people need adequate protection for lack of maturity needed to decide responsibly on this type of behaviour can become severely condition the rest of his life, which is indifferent to criminal legal effect, the minor or incompetent consent to be used for this type of behaviour."<sup>184</sup>

Although the Framework Decision of the Council of Europe 2004/68/JHA<sup>185</sup> envisages criminal responsibility exclude the production of pornographic images when the child had reached the age of sexual consent, the consent of both mediate and use of such iconography was strictly private, this possibility remains denied by the Spanish government.

Away from the main perpetrator of the crime or actor, there are other subjects whose activity (or lack thereof) can be decisive in child pornography offenses.

We have to mention even a possible liability of Internet service providers. Currently, there is a law of Services of the Information Society and Electronic Trade<sup>186</sup> which involves securing them to civil, criminal and administrative, in case of violation of the principles set by law (including that of the protection of children and young people), the State may take the necessary measures to prevent the continuation of such activity.

Although the responsibility tends to focus on the owner of the website, sometimes also extends to service providers, administrators and others, as noted by the instruction of the Attorney General of the State 2/2006 and Directive 2000 / 31/CE, on June 8, the European Parliament and the Council. And so it is recommended about a possible default mode commission.

In real terms it is necessary to point the difficulty of limiting half as impressive as the Internet, it is necessary to use new legislative techniques that protect the child from the potential dangers that this scenario offers, but at the same time respecting the freedom that has characterized Internet since its birth. Only few authors advocate for getting more management and control of web pages in the form of registration or identification. At the moment it looks like that will be the way forward for European countries.

It is common during the procedure, the use of the defendant of the excuse of error. And this can be invoked in several ways: On the one hand the defendant can argue a type error regarding the download or on the age of the persons appearing in the material<sup>187</sup>, would be as to the circumstances in case and as stated in the SAP Las Palmas, SEC. 6th of October 8, 2010, based on the amount of material being found defendant's belongings. Often the argument of an accidental discharge, alleging seeking adult pornography and random and involuntary discharge of material involving minors, although it will be impossible to deny the fraud in the conduct if there are multiple files<sup>188</sup>, there is some organization of the same or are stored in storage units, nor will be accepted if repeatedly downloaded files or terminology has been used unambiguously referred to child pornography as search criteria. It could also be argued in terms of error diffusion, but basically it is assumed successful only in cases where the subject assets have a very limited knowledge of computers and therefore do not know the mechanics of running the programs known as peer to peer<sup>191</sup>. In other cases it is considered that the "repeated use Emule program let the user know that it is a specific tool for file sharing between users.<sup>192</sup>" The truth is that it is difficult to sense in these cases because the Supreme Court itself has ruled out the application of the rate automatically by the mere fact of using a p2p program<sup>193</sup>. in paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 20. However, the results for fighting child pornography could be deduced about anything, because Spain is ranked number two in the ranking of the states in which most circulating pornography.

xiv. Article 189.1.a) points out that the Spanish State will sanction any person "who captures or uses images of minors or incapable with exhibitionist or pornographic purposes, whether public or private, or to make any kind of pornographic material, whatever its medium, or finances any of these activities or profits with them." So the answer to the question is yes.

Paragraph 4 of the same article could be understood remarking a difference related with coercion as the text says that "to involve a minor or incompetent ..." what one can deduce that some pressure, regardless of the tricks used to such. Indeed, it has been applied to the minor or incompetent to get their will constrict.

Thus, these two sections make the differentiation in recruitment and coercion concerned, because the first paragraph a) of Article 189 mentions recruitment or use of children or incompetent. Paragraph 4 of that article, as already mentioned, refers rather to the action of engaging or have the minor or incompetent to participate in pornographic performances.

2.4 Corruption of Children

xv. The inclusion of the named type of corruption of minors has been criticized for a long time, (though certainly it no longer receives that designation) as being that is intended to punish conduct that escape other rules, sometimes it is not understood as some of these acts may be sanctioned by a more specific rule.

This chapter also we can see again that the Criminal Code, again protects children under 18 years, as it did with the child pornography offenses previously analyzed and the indemnity related to the conditions for the exercise of a free sexuality. Somehow the legislator understood that art. 189.4 CP<sup>194</sup> responds to the emergence of new forms of perpetration (i.e. Internet) and a legislator's will is not to miss any form of possible offence in this field, to the extent of getting a detriment of legal certainty by the lack of clearness on our dictates.

On the other hand we worked on the same line to cover all sides with the inclusion on the principle of universal justice (art. 23.4 LOPJ) of crimes relating to prostitution and corruption of minors and disabled and the illegal or clandestine immigration that we all know<sup>195</sup> is very linked in many cases with sexual exploitation<sup>196</sup>.

Currently and after the amendment of Art. 23.4 LOPJ, operated by the Organic Law 1/2009, of 3th November, its protection is drastically reduced assuming a delay in this matter.

2.5 Solicitation of Children for Sexual Purposes

xvi. The offense of grooming was inserted in the Criminal Code Article 183bis, under the amendment made in 2010<sup>197</sup>. A while now, the emergence of new technologies and mass access to the Internet have allowed the proliferation of behaviours designed to contact minors to engage in situations that threaten their sexual indemnity<sup>198</sup>. It is known as well that new information and communication technologies have become essential social tools for many people now, that use them as a means of entertainment and personal development<sup>199</sup>.

National Statistics Institute data<sup>200</sup> states that 1 in 3 young people regularly use social networks; in fact the majority of people using these media are between 14 and 25 years (about 30%). The point is that this large number of users of such a young age do not know in most cases the impact of the use of Internet networks, being the major problem the dissemination of material, that with just one click, could appear anywhere around the world.

Basically we know that this behaviour involves an adult and a child, with whom the adult contacts in order to gain their trust and end up getting him/her in sexual situations. It is important to point that, the behaviours of these adults, themselves, are atypical and, while not trespassing the limits of any of the offenses that protect sexual indemnity, they are not punishable. Its nature rather corresponds to acts preparatory to the commission of any of the crimes already covered by our criminal sexual, not existing then as an autonomous figure itself<sup>201</sup>.

We can identify several stages in the grooming offense<sup>202</sup>:

1. Beginning of a phase of friendship. Refers to making contact with the child to know their tastes, preferences and create a friendly relationship with the object, reaching confidence as much as possible.
2. Beginning of phase of relationship. Often includes personal and intimate confessions between the child and the bully. Thus, the confidence gained is consolidated and deepened the minor in information about his life, tastes and customs.
3. Sexual component. Often includes explanations of terms specifically sexual and minors request their participation in acts of a sexual nature, image recording or taking pictures.

In Spain the decision to punish the grooming offense is relatively recent. The legislator's choice led to cover all conduct that would be directed, using any communications technology, to the commission of any offense described in sections 178 to 183 and 189 of the Penal Code peninsular. The political basis of the above crime, on the one hand lies in contributing to the enhancement of the level of protection of victims more vulnerable and, on the other, the need to transpose the Framework Decision 2004/68/JHA of The Council of Europe, 22 December 2003 on combating the sexual exploitation of children and child pornography.<sup>203</sup>

For the Spanish legislature is clear that in cases of sexual offenses committed against minors, protecting the legally acquires a special dimension for the highest content of unfair that these behaviours mean. It also justifies the extension of the use of Internet and information technology and communication with child sexual purposes has highlighted the need to punish criminal conduct by an adult develops through such means to gain the trust child to arrange meetings for sex-related concessions. Given the above, it was determined that a new Article 183a is regulated by the internationally known as "child grooming", also anticipating severe penalties when approaching the lower is obtained through coercion, intimidation or deception.<sup>204</sup>

Stresses that the behaviours are to be performed using a technological medium as a vehicle by which to hold a meeting concrete conduct prohibited by law. Although it must be accompanied by material acts leading to rapprochement. Currently in Spain there are a number of entities, including its programs, including prevention, awareness and combating grooming. Some examples are Alia2 Foundation, Protégés INTECO, Pantallas Amigas, Cobertura Protegemenores or government campaign "quenoteladen".<sup>205</sup>

xvii. Far from the main perpetrator of the crime or actor, there are other subjects whose activity (or lack thereof) can be decisive in child pornography offenses. We should note the offense of the omission by parents or similar (guardians, keepers ...) preventing the continuation of pornographic activities by children in their care. This type is regulated in art.189.5 and involves the intervention of the Public Prosecutor to deprive offenders of parental rights, guardianship, custody or foster care to offenders.

In turn there is the mention of a possible liability of Internet service providers. Currently, there is a law of Services of the Information Society and Electronic Commerce<sup>206</sup> which involves securing them to civil, criminal and administrative, in case of violation of the principles set by law (including that of the protection of children and young people), the State may take the necessary measures to prevent the continuation of such activity.

Although the responsibility tends to focus on the owner of the website, sometimes also extends to service providers, administrators and others, as noted by the instruction of the Attorney General of the State 2/2006 and Directive 2000 / 31/CE, on June 8, the European Parliament and the Council. And so it is recommended about a possible default mode commission. In real terms it is necessary to point to the difficulty of limiting the Internet, it is necessary to use new legislative techniques that protect the child from the potential dangers that this scenario offers, but at the same time respecting the freedom that has characterized Internet since its birth. Regarding pornography offenses is necessary to refer to some of the consequences that the perpetrator may experience after the commission of a child pornography offense, applicable in turn, as we have seen, on child prostitution offenses

It involves the disqualification for the exercise of parental authority, as a result of art. 192.2 CP. In these cases it is at the discretion of the judge or court reasoned imposes the disqualification penalty for the exercise of rights of custody. However, the rights of the child who is the holder on the prisoner will subsist in any way. Finally after the reform with the LO 5/2010, of June 22 we had introduced the penalty of deprivation of parental rights, as directed by the Lanzarote Convention.<sup>207</sup> Another consequence is the imposition of accessory penalty of disqualification for official duties, or the exercise of any trade or profession that may be related to minors, also reflected in Article 192 of the Penal Code, and also drawn by the Lanzarote Convention<sup>208</sup>.

Finally, Article 127 finds the incidental consequence of confiscation of equipment and supplies. Would have to proceed to the seizure of computer equipment used a supporting images or videos<sup>209</sup>. With regard to the authorship of this type of crime, the Spanish crimes against children, both third mediating and the one who practices a sexual intercourse are considered liable at this point. There is no punishment by the time for the preparatory acts of crime, although it is possible that the punishment is involved in human trafficking for prostitution (something quite common), by promoting or favouring crime of illegal immigration workers<sup>210</sup>. And it can turn a crime of child abduction if the transfer is made by the responsible (guardian, conservator ...) with intent to commit a crime of prostitution on the child below<sup>211</sup>. The complication in detecting these cases is such that the law aims to characterize the crime as mere activity by the difficulty of proving any results.

It is obvious by Legislator protective's attitude, that the victim in this crime will always be a minor be as in fact, it contains atypical activities when perpetrated against an adult. This may prosecute some conducts which do not contain physical contact with the victim, and thus part of the doctrine considers therefore the inapplicability of the types of sexual assault and abuse. <sup>212</sup>Also welcomes the conduct of an activity a priori considered as prostitution, not bounded by price, where the offence of prostitution cannot be applied. ## 2.6 Corporate Liability xviii. The Spanish Criminal Code does not have a general provision which attributed criminal responsibility for legal persons for the offences of violence or abuse against minors. There is only a provision, article 189 bis, which penalizes the conduct of legal persons who commit any of the activities referred to in chapter V (crimes relating to prostitution and corruption of minors). In this regard the article itself refers to the definition of legal person which makes the code itself in article 31 which attaches criminal liability to legal persons when crimes "on your behalf or on behalf of them and to their advantage" by its administrators and legal representatives in fact or in law as well as when such crimes are discussed "in the exercise of social activities and account and benefit from the same", by those who remain subject to the authority of the natural persons referred to in the preceding paragraph, has been carried out the facts by not being exercised on them proper control served the concrete circumstances of the case".

In this case if that we can see a distinction between "representatives legal and administrators in fact or in law" of the rest of the employees since the first answer in double way, by acts which commented on behalf or for the benefit of the legal person as well as for not exercising proper control on those subject to their authority in the development of social activities of the legal person.

For the rest of offences covered by the 8th of offences against sexual freedom and indemnity (abuse, violence,...) there is no provision or specific mention that specific reference to the liability of legal persons, and in principle seems logical that such liability is not established as natural persons are that perform behaviours (actions) punishable under Chapter VIII of the Code.

xix. The responsibility that is imposed is criminal in principle, but the same court may also determine the liability for damages. The actor may however, reserve civil action so that civil liability for damages, to be determined in the civil jurisdiction. In addition in the case of the rights of parental authority, guardianship, conservatorship, guard, employment or public office or exercise of the profession or occupation or deprivation of parental authority they may be prosecuted by the criminal judge<sup>215</sup>.

xx. Criminal responsibility in the Spanish legal system is always individual. However it also contemplates the possibility that, as we have seen, is made responsible for in addition to a legal person. But so that it can be so, should be considered guilty the individual who actually committed the crime. In cases of prostitution and corruption of minors, article 189 bis says that the realization of one of these activities within the framework, described in a "social activity" of a legal person the responsibility would fall on it; (but the penalty would be more or less serious depending on what will be the penalty assigned to the individual (for example, article 189bis 1.a) if the offence committed by the person has provided a term of imprisonment of more than five years, the penalty for the legal person shall be a fine of three to five times of the benefit). That is, that there is a dual responsibility: the individual person for the crime itself and the legal person by "protected".

2.7 Aggravating Circumstances

xxi. The Spanish Penal Code, approved by Organic Law 10/1995 of 23 November, includes several aggravating circumstances in relation to the crimes against sexual freedom and indemnity. They are regulated in Title VIII.

First of all, it must be distinguished between aggravating circumstances applicable to offenses that criminalize attacks against sexual indemnity of minors who are under 13 years old<sup>216</sup> and aggravating circumstances applicable to crimes that can be committed when the victim is over 13 years old but still a minor or an adult<sup>217</sup>.

There are five specific aggravating circumstances set out in article 180 Penal Code. They are explained below. These circumstances are applicable to offenses of sexual assault (art.178) and rape (art.179). They only apply if the minor is over 13 years old. Otherwise it will be covered by article 183.4.

a) “Violence or intimidation particularly degrading or humiliating”. It does not refer to sexual acts which are already humiliating, insulting and degrading but to violence or intimidation used in its execution<sup>218</sup>. This circumstance will only be noticeable when violence or intimidation exceeds clearly the levels of crime itself<sup>219</sup>. So, what is punished is the plus of unlawfulness that represents the “modus operandi” of the perpetrator when the concrete and specific actions, considered in their own objectivity, represent a qualified disregard for the dignity of the victim<sup>220</sup>. For example, the Spanish Supreme Court appreciated this circumstance in the case of a 17-year-old, anal and vaginally raped simultaneously<sup>221</sup>.

b) “Crime committed by the joint action of two or more people”. It requires concerted action but does not require that everyone performs all elements of the type. It is enough if each of the participants runs any of them. For example, some of them hold the minor while other threatens him/her and finally another one sexually assaults him/her.

c) “Victim particularly vulnerable because of his/ her age, illness, disability or status”

d) “Perpetrator takes advantage of a superiority or kinship’s relationship, being ascendant, descendant or brother, by nature or adoption with the victim in order to execute the crime”.

e) “Perpetrator uses weapons or other equally dangerous means capable of causing death or any of the injuries listed in articles 149 and 150 Penal Code”.<sup>222</sup> This circumstance is applicable without prejudice to the penalty that may apply for death or injuries. The Spanish Supreme Court has ruled out the automatic assessment of this aggravation in all cases where the weapon is used just for intimidating, and the perpetrator just displays it. Otherwise, it may cause a breach of the principle “non bis in idem” to describe the facts as sexual assault (involving violence or intimidation) and as aggravated assault considering the intimidation caused by the exhibition of weapon<sup>223</sup>. The legislator specifies the use of the weapon in the potential of causing death or particular gravity injury, so it is not enough that used means are dangerous, it is needed that their use in the concrete action may cause such results.

Therefore, what matters is not the instrument but how it is used<sup>224</sup>. This aggravating circumstance has been appreciated in cases when the perpetrator used the weapon against a vital area of the victim's body. The essential in this is that, not yet materialized aggression; the victim feared for his/her life or limb and not just for his/her sexual freedom or indemnity.

If two or more of these aggravating circumstances come together, the penalties will be imposed in the upper half.

Article 181, paragraph 5° increases the penalty for the crime of sexual abuse, punished in the upper half in the event of aggravating circumstance 3rd (vulnerability of the victim) or 4th (take advantage of relationship of superiority) provided by article 180. It also increases the penalty, imposed in the upper half, in the event of aggravating circumstance 3rd or 4th of art.180, when in a deceitful way; the perpetrator performs sexual acts with a minor over thirteen and under sixteen (article 182), crime traditionally known as “fraudulent rape”.

In Chapter II BIS, added to the Spanish Penal Code by the Organic Law 5/2010, of 22 June, which explicitly criminalize abuse and sexual assault when the victim is under thirteen years old, it has been included specific aggravating circumstances and has been excluded the application of other crimes and their aggravating circumstances set out in Title VIII when the victim is under 13 years old.

In the third paragraph of article 183 is provided an aggravation for the crime of sexual abuse (art.183.1) and sexual assault (art.183.2) to a minor who is under 13 years old, when the attack consists of vaginal intercourse, anal or oral or introduction of bodily members or objects for any of the two first places. It may be punished in the first case with imprisonment from eight to twelve years and with imprisonment from twelve to fifteen years in the second case.

Furthermore, in the fourth paragraph of article 183 is established a list of aggravating circumstances to the conducts described in the first three paragraphs, raising the corresponding imprisonment in the upper half. They are:

f) “When the low intellectual and physical development of the victim has placed him/her in a situation of complete helplessness and, in any case, when the victim is under 4 years old”. The explicit definition of this aggravating circumstance is partly due to the policy on crime. Events such as “Mari Luz Case”<sup>225</sup> placed great importance on the media and public debate to the discussion about whether to increase the penalties, even more, because of the vulnerability of the victim.

g) “Offense committed by the joint action of two or more people”. It must be interpreted in the same way that the art.180’s aggravating circumstance cited above.

h) “Violence or intimidation exercised involves particularly degrading or humiliating”. It must be interpreted in the same way that the art.180’s aggravating circumstance cited above.

i) “Perpetrator takes advantage of a superiority or kinship’s relationship, being ascendant, descendant or brother, by nature or adoption with the victim in order to execute the crime”. The existence of this aggravating circumstance is justified by the greater psychological damage to the victim involved in a sexual assault by a family member.

j) “Perpetrator endangers child’s life”. This aggravating circumstance sets the offense as a real danger, besides protecting child’s sexual indemnity, their life. Perpetrator should be aware that his actions had endangered child’s life. The reckless endangered are atypical.

k) “Offense committed within an organization or a criminal group engaged in the conduct of such activities”. It is understood according to article 570 BIS Penal Code<sup>226</sup>:

“The group consists of more than two people in a stable or indefinitely way, that in a concerted and coordinated way, share various tasks in order to commit crimes”

In this aggravating circumstance it is not required that the perpetrator takes part in the organization, but simply that they serve him/her to commit the crime.

<sup>225</sup> “Mari Luz Case” A 5-year-old girl was killed in January 2008. Her murderer had execution of a conviction for a crime of minors’ sexual abuse pending by virtue of which he should have been imprisoned in the date on which the crime was committed

<sup>226</sup> For comparison, article 1 of Joint Action 98/733/JHA adopted by the EU Council on December 21, 1998, criminal organizations means: “A structured association of more than two people, established over a period of time and acting in concert to commit offenses punishable by a custodial sentence or a security measure of imprisonment of up to 4 years at least or a more serious penalty; regardless of whether such offenses are an end in themselves or a measure of obtaining material benefits and, where appropriate, of improperly influencing the operation of public authority”

l) “Perpetrator takes advantage of condition of authority, agent or public official”. The application of this circumstance requires, first of all, the official status to be real and, moreover, that this condition is used expressly to commit the crime. Its assessment implies the imposition of the penalty of general disqualification for six to twelve years.

Article 183 BIS Penal Code criminalizes “Child grooming” establishing that penalties will be imposed at the upper half for that offense when the approach to children under 13 years old is obtained through coercion, intimidation or deception.

Afterwards, it is defined sexual harassment and in article 184, paragraph 3º higher penalties are if the conditions of article 184.1 (basic type of sexual harassment) and 184.2 (qualified type of sexual harassment), the victim is particularly vulnerable by reason of age, illness or situation.

Prostitution of minors is criminalized in article 187. They are specific aggravating circumstances: victim is younger than 13 years old, perpetrator takes advantage of the condition of authority, agent or public official and perpetrator that belongs to an organization or association, including transitory, which engages in the conduct of such activities.

The crime of minors’ corruption is punished in article 189, involving the use of minors in exhibitionist spectacle or for the manufacture of pornographic material which is then disseminated. In the third paragraph, six aggravating circumstances of this offense are set out:

m) “Use of children who are under thirteen”. As this offense is not explicitly mentioned in Chapter II BIS (crimes of abuse and sexual assault under thirteen years old), there is no distinction for it meanwhile the victim is older or younger than thirteen years old, so it has been created this specific aggravating circumstance.

n) “Acts are a particularly degrading or humiliating”. This is assessed in view of the special nature of the events that accentuate the negative connotation. Events must be executed in order to cause a special feeling of humiliation to the victim. The degrading or abusive nature is to be said, not the sexual act performed by the offender (itself demeaning) but the violence or intimidation employed especially humiliating for execution. The Spanish Supreme Court has understood, for example, that recording a sexual encounter with a minor, in which the adult defecates over the child, has to be considered as particularly degrading or humiliating<sup>227</sup>.

o) “Acts have particularly gravity by virtue of the economic value of the pornographic material”. The existence of this aggravating circumstance is controversial. Noteworthy that an offense which does not require profit for its commission, has constructed an aggravation from economic value of files. The existence of websites where the content is charged for downloading or fixing any kind of monetary compensation for free access to objectionable material exchanged, has introduced an economic element that justifies, in obviously serious situations, the application of this circumstance. The jurisprudence<sup>228</sup> has required several requirements for the assessment of this situation: 1-The expert determination of the economic value of the files; 2-The files have a transcendent economic relevance; 3-Constancy of lucrative purpose by the accused, who must obtain or be willing to obtain economic benefit derived from files’ sale or exchange.

p) “Pornographic material depicts children being victims of physical or sexual violence”. There are referred to two kinds of violence alternatively: One, equivalent material strength and another coincident with the nature of the act or sexual acts performed, likely to arouse a greater degree of satisfaction of this kind, for example, sadism<sup>229</sup>. Sexual violence has a physical component that is not directly addressed to break the will or consent of the victim but it must be seen in the area of sexual behaviour, itself disproportionate, abnormal or excessive. Spanish Supreme Court’s sentence 1098/2010 (Legal Basis 3º) means sexual violence as actions or forcing situations comparable to rape or children’s sexual assault cases in which children are bound hand and foot, assumptions of special subjection and restraint that excess of the “simple” sex with a minor. Spanish Supreme Court’s sentence 1377/2011 (Legal Basis 3º) has understood that this circumstance existed in a pornographic video featured a four-year-old boy who was back with the chest on the bed, with his legs spread and tied while an adult anally penetrated him. It has also been understood that this aggravation existed in cases that the disproportion between perpetrator’s sexual organs and his victim’s was significant<sup>230</sup>.

r) “Perpetrator belongs to an organization or association, even transitory, which engages in the conduct of such activities”. The jurisprudence<sup>231</sup> requires several demands: 1-Joint action of two or more people, related to each other, with division of responsibilities and a structured and hierarchical basis, more or less formal, to which the perpetrator “belongs”, i.e, in which participates continuously and not performs just occasional collaboration. 2-Use of a structured network likewise to have some intention of continuing, despite the precept of not requiring a duration or stability given. The simple temporal association suffice, but if it is something more than the execution of a particular criminal operation. 3-Offenses can survive and be independent of the individual performance of each of the group members; 4-Use of suitable material for the purpose of coordinating their respective performances; 5-That all of this tends to promote greater ease of committing the offense, also offering special difficulties both for the prevention and prosecution of crime. Spanish Supreme Court’s sentence 1444/2004 understood that this aggravating circumstance must be applicable in the event that, through internet, a plurality of users in “the virtual meeting place”, coordinate their actions to enhance opportunities for consumption of harmful images to minors’ rights and allowing further dissemination to others outside the organized group.

s) “Perpetrator is an ascendant, guardian, teacher or any person, who in fact or in law, takes care of the minor”.

2.8 Sanctions and Measures

xxii. The Spanish Penal Code punishes previously described crimes with different sanctions. Only imprisonment can be imposed to punish behaviours that the legislator considered serious. In other cases, sentence of prison can be either alternated or combined with a fine.

The penalties for some of the crimes that are most relevant to our study will be analyzed now.

Article 178, which regulates minors older than 13 or adult’s sexual assault, provides imprisonment’s penalties of 1-5 years. This conduct is punished with imprisonment from 5 to 10 years if there are any of the aggravating circumstances listed in that article.

Continuing with the analysis, rape of children older than 13 years old or adult is punished in article 179 with imprisonment for 6-12 years<sup>232</sup>.

Sexual abuse of children is a crime for which the Spanish Penal Code establishes an alternative penalty: prison sentence of 1-3 years or a fine of 18-24 months. However, if the abuse consists in sexual intercourse the only punishment is imprisonment of 4-10 years. Besides, if there is article 180's aggravating circumstance 3rd or 4th, penalties are imposed in the upper half.

However, sexual abuse of a minor under 13 years always is punished with imprisonment (for 2-6 years), like sexual assault of a minor under 13 years (imprisonment for 5 to 10 years). Moreover, crime known as "Child Grooming" (article 183 BIS) is punishable by alternative imprisonment 1-3 years or a fine of 12-24 months.

Sexual harassment is punishable by imprisonment of 3-5 months or a fine of 6-10 months. When the victim is particularly vulnerable because of their age, illness or situation, in one hand, basic offense is punished with alternative penalties: imprisonment of 5-7 months or a fine of 10-14 months, in the other hand aggravated offense is punished with imprisonment of 6 months to 1 year.

Exhibitionism and sexual provocation to minors is punishable by imprisonment from 6 months to 1 year or a fine of 12-24 months, in article 185. The display of pornographic material to minors is punishable in article 186 with the same penalties.

Then, the crime of prostitution of minors, provided in article 187, carries a cumulative penalty: prison of 1-5 years and a fine of 12 to 24 months. If the victim is under 13 years; imprisonment is imposed for 4-6 years. Pimping minors (article 188 second paragraph) carries imprisonment for 4-6 years and if it has been employed with minors under thirteen years, imprisonment for 5-10 years. And finally, corruption of minors (art.189) is punished with imprisonment for 1-5 years.

In Spain, active extradition<sup>233</sup> may be only requested in relation to Spanish citizens who have committed crimes in Spain and they have taken refuge in a foreign country; Spanish citizens who have committed crimes (attacks against the external security of Spain) abroad and have taken refuge in a third country and foreigners who have committed crimes which must be tried in Spain but they have been refugee in other country than that of which they are nationals.

Furthermore, active extradition only proceeds in cases determined in treaties which are in force between Spain and the state in whose territory the person is claimed. Failing treaty, extradition proceeds under customary law in force in that state or in the absence of both cases, when extradition is appropriate under the principle of reciprocity.

Prosecutors in High Court or Supreme Court, ask the judge or court who is hearing the case, to propose to Spanish government to request the active extradition. Extradition's request will be made by Spanish government through the Ministry of Justice to its namesake of the state where the defendant is located. In some cases, the extradition may be requested directly by the judge or court hearing the case by virtue of treaty in force.

About passive extradition<sup>234</sup>, it can be said that it will only be granted by Spain by virtue of the principle of reciprocity and the committed offense<sup>235</sup>.

Extradition's request will be made through diplomatic channel. If this channel is not used, the Ministry of Justice of the requesting state writes the Spanish Ministry of Justice. Then, the Spanish Ministry of Justice, within a period of eight days from the day following receipt of the extradition request, will raise the Spanish government the reasoned proposal about whether continue the judicial extradition proceedings. Spanish government will take its decision within 15 days.<sup>236</sup>

Finally, the Spanish government decides the person's delivery or to deny it according to the principle of reciprocity or reasons of security, public order or other essential interest to Spain. There is no appeal against the decision agreed by Spanish government.

xxiii. It seems to be reasonable to look up in official statistics on the subject in order to assess the effectiveness and the dissuasive effect of the penalties provided in Spanish Penal Code to punish offenses against child sexual indemnity.

<sup>235</sup> Extradition may be only granted for offenses for which Spanish and requesting state's law provides a penalty of not less than one year of imprisonment in its maximum or when the request was entered to the enforcement order to a penalty of not less than four months' imprisonment according to Spanish law.

<sup>236</sup> If they agree to proceeding through the courts, a extremely complex proceeding begins, in which the judge at whose disposal are put the defendant, will solve by reasoned order on the admissibility of extradition.

The National Statistics Institute develops a convicted people's statistical since 1998. This is a social demographic and criminological study of convicted by final sentence. Variables studied are data on the offender (sex, age and nationality), data on crime and punishment data. Its scope is national and regional. Its frequency is annual.

Convicted for crimes against sexual freedom and indemnity amounted to 981 according to statistics in 1998 in Spain. Next year, it suffered a slight decrease to the number of 974 but it increased in 2000 with 993, decreased again in 2001 (949) and increased significantly in the following years: 1057 people were convicted in 2002, in 2003 they were 1147 and in 2004, they were 1286. Largest increase over the previous year was in 2007, when 2246 people were convicted for such crimes, increasing by 924 convicted people over 2006. The maximum occurred in 2009 when it reached the figure of 2624.

The study comes to the year 2010, when 2428 people were convicted (which, nonetheless, accounts for 0,9% of all convicted of committing crimes in Spain) Admittedly, the increase may be due to factors such as an increase in reports of these crimes, the greater effectiveness of the Spanish Security Forces in pursuing this kind of crime or more accurate work of the Prosecution and individual allegations when exercising prosecution and not just a mere increase in the commission of these crimes. Having only data through 2010, the statistics do not allow us to assess the effect that these crimes had in the commission of the Penal Code's reform by the Organic Law 5/2010, June 22 as it entered into force on December 23, 2010. This reform, among other things, increased the maximum penalty for sexual assault in a year and introduced Chapter II BIS clearly to criminalize abuse and sexual assaults on children under thirteen.

However, the most important variable when assessing the effectiveness of the penalty is the repetition of the offense. In 1998, there were 108 repeat offenders of the 981 total convicted of crimes against sexual freedom and indemnity, which represents an 11% recidivism. Until 2003, the proportion of recidivists was stable but the same year, it suffered a very considerable increase: Recidivism for crimes against sexual freedom and indemnity rose to an alarming 66,17% of all convicted and next year reached its maximum in a 73,62%. In 2005, there was a sharp descent to return to the proportions of 1998, around 10-11%. There are only available data until 2006. In view of these data, we should consider that, with few exceptions, the rate of recidivism in crimes against sexual freedom and indemnity in Spain is not very high despite what the media can suggest in punctual cases.

In light of these data, it can be stated that the penalties for crimes against sexual freedom and indemnity are effective because recidivism rates in the commission of the offense are not high, so it seems that is accomplished, in most cases, the social reintegration of convicted for these crimes. Besides, the latest reform of the Penal Code in 2010, introduced the figure of probation<sup>237</sup> for those convicted to imprisonment for crimes against sexual freedom and indemnity that runs as a security measure after the imprisonment and whose duration will be 5 to 10 years if the offense was serious and 1 to 5 years if the offense was less serious.

Nevertheless, sanctions do not seem to be entirely dissuasive because generally, there has been a successive increase of convictions for crimes against sexual freedom and indemnity over the years except for specific and slight decreases.

Finally, proportionality of sanctions should be mentioned. It is necessary the severity of the imposed sanction to be proportionate to the seriousness of the crime. The General Council of the Judiciary, on its report in the latest reform of the Penal Code, noted that increased cases for crimes against sexual freedom and indemnity was not justify itself to increase penalties. That is not consistent with the principle of proportionality.

After the reform, there are considerable problems of proportionality. For example between the crime of rape of minors under 13 years old (art.183 paragraph 3º) and the crime of murder (art.138). First of them is punishable by 12-15 years in prison and second, is punishable by 10-15 years in prison. Therefore, offense of rape can reach more penalty than murder which damages life.

xxiv. Legal persons are criminally responsible for crimes committed by their legal representatives and administrators of fact or law in their name or on behalf of them and for their benefit. In article 189 BIS Penal Code<sup>238</sup> is provided that when a legal person is responsible for the crime of prostitution of minors, it will be punished by the following sanctions:

a) There is a fine of three to five times the profit made, if the offense is planning a prison sentence of more than five years when it is performed by an individual.

- b) There is a fine of two to fourfold of the profit made, if the offense is planning a prison sentence of more than two years to a maximum of five years when an individual performs.
- c) There is a fine of two to three times the profit made in other cases.

In addition, Courts may impose other penalties contained in article 33 paragraph 7 Penal Code such as legal person's dissolution which produces the definitive loss of its legal personality; suspension of legal person's activities for a period not exceeding 5 years; closure of premises and facilities for a period not exceeding 5 years; permanent or temporary ban (not exceeding 15 years) to conduct future activities in the exercise of which the legal person has committed, aided or concealed the offense; disqualification to hold public subsidies, contracts with the public sector and to enjoy benefits or tax incentives or Social Security for a period not exceeding 15 years or receivership of the entire corporation or any of its sections to safeguard the workers and creditors' rights for a period not exceeding 5 years.

xxv. <sup>239</sup> The confiscation of materials and implements used in the commission of the crime is imposed as a consequence of the principal penalty but it's not a penalty itself, because it does not respond to any of the penalties' purposes (prevention through motivation or compensation). Confiscation appears in article 127 Penal Code that says:

“Any penalty imposed for an offense or misdemeanour will entail the loss of the effects that come from them and goods, means or instruments with which the crime has been prepared or executed, as well as the proceeds of crime or misdemeanour”

At the end of this article, it is stressed that the confiscation will take place unless the effects belong to a bona fide third party not responsible for the offense and who has obtained them legally, so it can be said that Spanish legislation protects the bona fide in these cases.

According to paragraph 5° of article 127, confiscated effects will be sold if they are in lawful commerce and the gotten money will be applied to cover the offender's liabilities if the law does not provide otherwise. If they are not in lawful commerce, they will be given the fate that is in prescribed provisions and, failing that, they will render useless.

Moreover, currently there is not an intervention program that can be allocated to the assets seized by the commission of sexual offenses against minors, similar to Fund of assets seized by drug trafficking and related crimes, regulated by Law 17/2003, 29 May and created for the purpose of affecting the assets seized in drug trafficking offenses to drug prevention programs, assistance to drug addicts, intensification and improvement of prevention actions and international cooperation in the matter. There is also a Fund of assets seized by human trafficking.

xxvi. If a sexual offense against a child has been committed within his/her family, Spanish criminal law reacts forcefully. Article 189 paragraph 5th creates an offense that occurs when a person is the holder of parental authority, guardianship, custody or placement of a child and being informed the child's prostitution or corruption, he/she does not do his/her best to prevent the child to continue in this state. There are alternative penalties of imprisonment of 3-6 months or a fine of 6-12 months.

More generally, in the second paragraph of article 192 Penal Code, it is provided that if the parents, guardians, conservators, teachers or any other person in charge of the child, take part as perpetrator or accomplice of one of the sexual offenses against children, they will be punished with the penalties provided to the offense, in the upper half unless this circumstance is already specifically contained in the crime type in question<sup>240</sup>.

Furthermore, Judge or Court, as provided in paragraph 3 of same article 192, will be able to impose the penalty of disqualification for the exercise of custody's rights, guardianship, and conservatorship for a time from six months to six years.

3.1 Investigation

i. The principle of best interests of the child is one of the most significant manifestations of the movement to protect children's rights, which reaches throughout the twentieth century and has its climax in the International Convention on the Rights of the Child. As it is known, both the Convention and the rest of the Spanish law advocate the best interests of the child, giving it ownership of human rights and the exercise of those whose reasoning is able to exercise, too, a series of legal guarantees in the field of process. Indeed, the Criminal Law is no stranger to these guarantees, especially when it is incardinated on protecting the rights of legal precious: life, physical integrity, freedom, sexual indemnity, heritage, etc.

The guarantees of protection of minors involved in criminal proceedings operate in a manner not unlike other adult victims. Regarding the child as victim, he is no stranger to the traditional secondary victimization resulting from the shortcomings of our system, as it has been to point out the best doctrine. So while the accused was surrounded by a set of procedural safeguards that facilitate while clarifying their status, the victim does not have a defined role within the process<sup>241</sup>. What happens is that these adverse effects of the so-called second victimization reach its peak when the victim is a minor. However, in recent years is being reduced as far as possible this victimization. It was through the Organic Law 14/1999, of June 9, when significantly addressed the new role they had to play minor victims in criminal proceedings. They started to take care of the details concerning the statement of the child in the trial stage whilst minimizing or eliminating as far as possible, the child's physical match with her attacker in the same room. Along with this possibility (i.e., the output of the defendant's room during the testimony of the child, or the location of the witness at another time), there is also the option to prevent eye contact between victim and defendant in the same room<sup>242</sup>. That point is set out by article 731 bis of the Criminal Procedure Act.

Criminal addresses this issue at the plenary stage<sup>243</sup>, while Article 325 of the Act<sup>244</sup> deals with ensuring guarantees identical phase. Regarding the content of the declaration, the doctrine of the Supreme Court is considering versions borrowed from the victim as part of a crime with a measure of hiding such as crimes against sexual freedom may themselves constitute proof office, with the added difficulty of its destruction by the prosecution<sup>245</sup>.

ii. In our criminal justice system, the protection of victims in the criminal investigation conducted by the Office of Children call. Juvenile Prosecutors play a crucial role in the investigation stage of the proceedings committed by and against juveniles, and its main function is regulated in Article 12.m) of the Organic Statute of the Public Prosecution<sup>246</sup>.

In addition, the act also prosecutors of Victims of the Provincial Prosecutor, coordinated by the Managing Board Attorney for the protection of victims in criminal proceedings. As stated in Instruction 3/2008, of 30 July, on the Prosecutor Coordinator Juvenile Hall and Juvenile Sections, the spirit of its activity is in "practice proceedings referred to in art. 5 EOMF<sup>247</sup>, and intervene directly or through instructions given to the juvenile units in those criminal or civil proceedings of special importance appreciated by the General Attorney, relating to juvenile offenses or proceedings relating to child protection. "

Regarding operations in secrecy, our system does not recognize the actions of these bodies covertly. However, it is recognized by the jurisprudence of the agent undercover, and this is always a member of the Security Forces of the State. Law 5/1999, of 13 January<sup>248</sup>, it introduced in Article 282 bis of the Criminal Procedure Act, endorsed by the European Court of Human Rights on 15 June 1992<sup>249</sup>. In addition to complying with current legislation, obviously, prescriptive, the undercover agent must obtain judicial authorization when fundamental rights are at stake for the person.

Regarding the investigation of child pornography, is undoubtedly one of the most common ways to combat this type of crime. It is sometimes necessary prior penetration in the home of alleged offender, which, as is known, only possible after refusing the dweller in flagrante delicto or under judicial authorization<sup>250</sup>. Other times, and thanks to advances in technology, it is possible to reach computer scans and to the alleged offender.

iii. In general it is considering an earlier stage, for scientific purposes, before the call instruction, is the research phase itself, which can last years, especially in some complex crimes. Therefore, it is not necessary in the case of a continuing offense for purposes of Article 74 of the Penal Code to get going research. However, in order to initiate an investigation, as an act of judgment (a complaint, an arrest, detention decree, etc ...), it is sometimes necessary for the offense to take the form of continued, precisely to acquire the penal punishment. Consider, for example, in a crime of sexual harassment, in the family, where it is very difficult to begin the investigation with the first touching without consent<sup>251</sup>.

On the other hand, it must be stated in the semi-public nature of these crimes. Unlike most of our Criminal Code offenses, which enjoy public nature of crimes, these are not such, and their differentiation makes them adopt its own characteristics that are especially in the initiation of the procedure. As stated in article 191 of the Penal Code, for the initiation of the process, it is necessary the complaint of the victim, not the rule operating public offenses under which the prosecution alone can activate the initiation of proceedings. Now, as the same article points out, this is not valid exception to allow the forgiveness of the offended extinguish criminal liability, and it is designed to avoid possible pressure from the accused or his environment further clouding the already on their particular vulnerability of a victim of such attacks. Notwithstanding the foregoing, the final paragraph of Article 191.1 of the Code excludes crimes against children produced thirteen years of the category of crimes semi-public integrated into the general classification of public offenses, and thus sufficing performance of the prosecution to start the procedure. Therefore, and according to the general rule of public offenses on the withdrawal of complaints, declarations or other acts initiator of the procedure, these actions alone will not get the stay of the criminal proceedings.

iv. According to Article 132.1 of the Penal Code, crimes against sexual freedom and indemnity contemplated a range of limitations, ranging from early twenties, when the maximum penalty prescribed for the offense is imprisonment of fifteen or more years, five years. This section is appropriate to affirm the specificity with which is studied in relation to sexual offenses, not lead, as unnecessary, in the periods of limitation generally. Limitation periods are twenty, fifteen, ten and five years, depending on penalty prescribed for offenses in the Criminal Code. Thus, a crime of violation of Article 183.3 of the Penal Code, punishable twelve years, would a prescription for fifteen years. However, a corruption offense under Article 187 of the Penal Code, punishable by three years, would have a five-year limitation.

<sup>251</sup> This note habituality further complicate the work of the instructor called "touching surprise", of such legal subtlety that led to create a own jurisprudence. Vid. Sentence of the Criminal Chamber of the Supreme Court of 18 December 2007.

As set out in Article 132, the prescription starts to run "from the day on which the offense punishable". In criminal cases permanent, continuous or requiring habitual, it shall be counted from the day of the last offense. However, as a protective measure, being underage victims, deadlines definitely counted from the day when the child reached the age of majority, and if dies before, from the time of death.

As for the suspension of the prescription, the new Article 132.2<sup>252</sup> of the Criminal Code allows for a maximum period of six months, if not lack offense<sup>253</sup> and, if through the process complaint or suit is brought against one or more persons allegedly responsible for the illegal acts. If in this time the body falls resolution aimed at continuing the investigation against such persons, interruption, and no suspension of prescription means retroactively produced from the filing of the complaint or denunciation. Otherwise, the computation of the prescription continue from the filing of the complaint or denunciation.

v. The age of the victim may be vital to face criminal proceedings for an offense against sexual freedom. As is known, the crimes committed against children under thirteen years have a greater criminal reproach, hence its importance. Sometimes it is difficult to determine the age of the child, either by language problems, homelessness, slurred speech, lack of identity documents, etc ... In such cases, allowing the law are evidence of a medical nature, as orthopantomography<sup>254</sup> radiation-proof-teeth, or other similar tests, such as bone radiographs.

vi. Corresponds to the Central Registry of Criminals, which depends on the General Administrative Record to support judicial activities, the Ministry of Justice. Especially it is noted in that Register a footnote should be added if the victim is a minor, for crimes against sexual freedom and indemnity.

This information is often transmitted to other countries, not only in the field of the European Arrest Warrant and Surrender<sup>255</sup>, but administrative constraints of a more bureaucratic, more routine. For example, in a simple request for certification of criminal, much in demand in other countries before signing an employment contract, you must go to

vii. The initiation of criminal proceedings can occur in two distinct forms, of its own motion or at the request of a party. Regarding the initiation request, this can be accomplished through a complaint or grievance. The complainant may be a person other than the victim, if it is minor, being a relative or guardian who will perform his complaint. As can be seen, unlike earlier times, there is no anonymous accusations. It should be stressed that the complaint is not, in itself, a way to initiate the procedure, since it corresponds to the appropriate authority (judge or magistrate, prosecutor or member of the Security Forces of the State) this job opening. On the other hand, we must also influence the informal complaint, which may be in writing, in form approved or not, through the internet or even orally.

Unlike the complaint, if the complaint is itself a form to initiate the process. That is why it is also required a certain formality, is in writing, and even necessary to have the same legal services attorney and solicitor. In the complaint, the complainant must identify the child's guardian, on your behalf, if that is the victim, the defendant and the court to which it is directed, and the classification of the facts provided, noting the day, hour, month and scene allegedly criminal. The same is also necessary to make the request for proposals investigative body and firm lawyer and attorney, which ratified and the contents thereof. It should be noted especially the difference between the indictments and called the lawsuit itself, because the former is itself a further procedural stage where there is no longer a defendant only true, but at least formally charged, and is sought against him the penalty is deemed appropriate by the prosecution.

viii. In accordance with Articles 6 and following of the Code of Civil Procedure<sup>256</sup>, governing supplementary representation in all types of processes, parents or guardians are placed in the role of the child victim, as much as possible, especially at the time of presentation of the complaint, and above all, of the complaint. Once late in the process, there is, of course, replace the declaration of the child by the parent, both during training and in plenary. However, as we said, the child may be protected by physical barriers separating with their abuser, or state in different places or at different times<sup>257</sup>. As for the advertising of the process, the restriction is directed especially to prevent undue stress on the child's name in the media, in cases generally very rugged and media. While in camera is a great achievement in this field, the use of the name, location and other details of the child by the media is looking to avoid that usually remains common practice in our country.

4 COMPLEMENTARY MEASURES

i. In Spain, first analyzing the education sector, the level of teaching in both childhood and primary education, there is not in the curriculum any subject related to child sexual abuse. So teachers can only access training of these characteristics through extension courses are made occasionally in some University, but certainly not the general tone of Spanish universities offer courses of this nature. As for access to an official position of the education system, understood as public school worker in the service of the State Administration, it is not necessary to pass any subject or course about prevention or treatment of child sexual abuse.

The same applies to other professionals working with children, as may be paediatricians or psychologists that are not included in their university training any subject that involved, at least directly, child or teenagers abuse. In a similar situation are social workers.

Although, outside academic level, State Administration, and especially of the Autonomous Communities, offers specific courses on the subject matter, but bear in mind that since it is not a required course for access to these professions, carry them out depend on the goodwill of the various aforementioned professionals, if deemed necessary for proper formation.

A good example of a specific course may be the Aspacia program, elaborated in Valladolid in March 2011, which is aimed primarily at police, health centre workers and social service professionals, to acquire detection mechanisms at risk to enable a quick and effective intervention in cases of child sexual abuse. But the realization of this type of course varies from one to another professional area, and from one to another Autonomous Community, making it impossible to provide a standard overview state-wide.

As for state action, basically boils down to awareness campaigns, attempts to promote coordinated activities across territories that have competencies in protection, and fund specific training programs and co-financed by the Autonomous Communities in some cases treatment centres that exist in different areas.

ii. The answer is No. There is not any subject that addresses the issue of sexual abuse in any of the stages of education: Nursery, primary, secondary or high school. As I mentioned earlier about how professional training, there are specific days in which they are involved children, parents, or both together, to explain about the subject matter, , but given the small number of these campaigns we can qualify as exceptional..

To highlight a program that has been implemented in Spain and has been successful, include those carried out by Save the Children Spain, through the funding of the initiative of the European Commission: Daphne.

One of the coordinators of Save the Children Spain, Elena Hayward, said that in Spain is increasing awareness of the problem of child sexual abuse, including making some prevention programs. Although there are few programs that have been evaluated, Hayward presented two that have actually been tested, and I present below as an example of what might be the next steps in the future in Spain:

1 - Project Name: Prevention of child sexual abuse<sup>258</sup>:

Presenter: Amaia del Campo, a psychologist and professor at the University of Salamanca.

The project was evaluated before and after the sessions on track of 8 months and a final meeting with teachers acting as observers.

As for the final results, the experimental group reported a significant increase in both knowledge and skills. 97% of children felt safer, and 95% were satisfied with the program.

Teachers reported that they had not appreciated disciplinary problems or fear among children. They found that 71% helped their fellows more and 86% felt more confident.

---

<sup>258</sup> The project developed information guides for parents and educators and lesson plans for kindergarten, primary and secondary. Participants included 82 children, 254 mothers and 26 fathers. First were divided the children into an experimental group and two control groups. The experimental group had two training sessions on child sexual abuse. One of the control groups was given a sex education program, and the other group was not intervention of any kind. 70% of parents took part in the program, a higher proportion than expected, this shows that parents are not a barrier to educating children on these issues.

98% of parents felt they knew more about the subject of sexual abuse.

2 - Name of Project: 'Ep! Badis No! '(Hey, be careful!)<sup>259</sup>:

Presenters: José Manuel Alonso Rodriguez Varea and Josep Roca, both from the University of Barcelona.

The feedback of the training sessions for professionals shows that 92% of participants found them interesting and 83% original and innovative; 89% rate the speakers of the courses as good or very good, and a similar proportion would recommend the course to other colleagues. 77% of participants wanted to keep in touch with the program.

Besides, children also increased their knowledge of child sexual abuse. It is studying the possibility of extending the project to other cities.

iii. Preventive intervention, meaning the established formal and evenly to all the Spanish territory, doesn't exist. Since no criminal record can be ordered when you apply for a job, as in other countries, as the background for these crimes are not public and cannot be communicated.

No track people who have committed such offenses. There are only a few treatment programs in prisons, linked to rehabilitation. Any other preventive intervention does not exist in Spain.

But we cannot forget the penalties that may be imposed on perpetrators found guilty of child sexual abuse, , Including probation, imposed separately or in addition to a prison sentence, such penalty fulfils a special preventive function, beyond the punitive function accompanying penalties as definition<sup>260</sup>

This pilot project aims to help children and adults to develop simple protective measures to prevent child sexual abuse. It is implemented through a local team, which provides support to families and involves teachers and health professionals, and institutions and local authorities including the police. The Centre for Research on Health and Welfare of Catalonia has carried out an assessment, based on questionnaires completed by all participating groups.

<sup>260</sup> As set out in Article 106.1 of the Spanish Penal Code, probation consist of the submission of the sentenced to judicial review through compliance one or more of the following measures The obligation to be always reachable by electronic devices, the regular reporting in place that the judge or court set, to communicate, each change of place of residence or place of job. And the prohibition of approaching the victim, or contact her. Also, as a general preventive measures, not focused on recidivism against the same victim, include the prohibition of performing certain activities that may offer or provide the opportunity to commit crimes of a

Taking into account that a large number of perpetrators are minors, there are some re-education programs for young sex offenders in reformatories and juvenile centres. Specifically a program developed by Save The Children, funded by the Daphne Programme of European Union Commission, supported by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs of Spain, But again only offers challenges and expectations, there is nothing regulated state-wide, so it all depends on the goodwill of the directors of these centres, and the specific programs developed on regional level.

As measure of not recidivism in Spain, as in other Latin American countries and Russia,

It is applied voluntary chemical castration for recidivist rapists or sexual abusers. This measure is not a punishment, but remains fully available to the defendant to undergo this treatment, this needs to be assessed by experts as it is specially designed for those inmates who cannot suppress their sexual instincts, and they decide to end with it motu proprio.

iv. In this sense, Spain scrupulously complies guidelines Lanzarote Convention, which in Article 13, provides an example of the child support mechanisms, the establishing a phone line.

There is a phone number in each Autonomous Community which depends of the Ministry of Social Welfare.

Almost all regional governments manage this service through the foundation ANAR (Assistance to Children and Adolescents at Risk). This line has been operating since 1994, and covers not only cases of child sexual abuse, but includes all types of abuse or neglect that may suffer the minors, since often a situation of sexual threat to the child brings with other crimes. ANAR Public Foundation is under the Ministry of Education, Social Policy and Sport, which checks its annual accounts for the purpose of complete transparency in management.

This foundation also operates, in addition to the whole Spanish State, in other countries, mainly in Latin America, made through telephone supporting at number 900 20 20 10, a helpdesk quick, direct and confidential for child or teenager who requests it. This line similar nature. Required to participate in training programs, labour, cultural, sexual education or similar obligation and/or to follow a medical control treatment.

operates 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. There is also the e-mail ANAR that serves the same purpose, but the increased workload for the foundation is still, by far, the phone calls.

The phone ANAR Aid Child and Adolescent Risk recorded 195,547 calls in 2011, 20 percent more than last year. Of these, 32 percent had to do with a child-related violence in all its forms: neglect, sexual abuse, and bullying or gender violence, among others.

Regarding the modus operandi of this service, we can say that the main objective of Phone ANAR is to provide children and teens a safe and confidential space, where they feel heard and respected, and where they can freely express what happens to try to find alternatives together with them.

To ensure that the child is helped with the utmost professionalism is essential that all psychologists, counsellors, both recruited as volunteers and university interns go through a process of theoretical and practical training that prepares them for the attention of ANAR Phone. The training course is taught by psychologists, lawyers and social workers, from a multidisciplinary approach. The 34-hour theoretical course is complemented by the practice of co-listening, which is that the volunteer sees and hears how an experienced counsellor psychologist handles calls from children and adolescents to later start guide with supervision, so as to ensure proper care. (See footnote 2 for course content).

Sometimes children and young people need to have several calls before your problem. Therapeutic skills of the psychologists' team are essential to detect conditions that are hidden, giving children and adolescents' security to face their fears.

When is required a specialized intervention comes into operation the social department and/or the legal department:

Social Department

There are certain situations in which the solution of the problem of the child needs to activate the network resources within their municipality, autonomy or anywhere in Spain.

Depending on the need raised, it initiates contact with Social Services, Child Protection, Health Centres, First Reception Centres, other NGOs, etc.

Legal Department

It advises on the laws and the rights of children and adolescents, adapting to the language and understanding of the child. When an adult is willing to help the child, you will explain the legal steps to follow.

When is necessary, working in close cooperation with the competent authorities as Juvenile Prosecutor, Police and Civil Guard.

However this unit throughout the Spanish territory has recently lost, while in 20 European Union countries have 116111 awarded to the same entity to provide telephone support to minors.

Three Autonomous Communities independently managed it: Castilla-La Mancha, Valencia and the Basque Country. "It is incomprehensible. Meaning is lost harmonize this issue, declared of social interest," said Benjamin Ballesteros, director Anar Foundation Programs. In the Valencian Community will serve the young in need through a call center) managed by the GCS company that "manages only linked with the social lines, such as the Elderly or the Woman one" as said a spokesman for the Valencian Community. In the Basque Country will Agintzari who attend children, a cooperative made up of specialists in education, psychology, education and social work. And in Castilla-La Mancha, the phone will continue managed (so from 1999) by Aserco, an association of graduates in Law and Psychology.

From Anar emphasize that this supposes a problem: "The track is broken" when a young use the service from an online community where Anar manages, and then calls from one of the other regions. "We have a database of all calls. Way, who come to us again not have to repeat their story," explains Luis Estebarez, Director of the Anar Phone.

The other two communities that offer an alternative line are Andalusia through 900 851 818, seeks to provide a rapid and effective response to child abuse and child sexual abuse. This phone does not operate 24 hours a day and has shorter hours, especially on weekends and holidays.

The Community of Madrid has adopted the operational in most of the European Union, the aforementioned 116,111, offering a service similar to this.

v. In the field of protection, we highlight the Plan III against Sexual Exploitation of Children and Adolescents 2010-2013. This Plan was prepared by the Department of Families and Children, dependent of Ministry of Health, Social Policy and Equality.

This project specifies a number of operational measures in the field of knowledge of reality, social awareness and protection for victims. . Each of these proposals is responsible, or to a government department, secretary general, directorate or other administrative levels, or the Autonomous Communities. It is also noted as a partner, normally, NGOs, the Observer for Children, or any other administrative body.

Because of the broad content of the Plan, the large number of proposals and the difference between them make impossible a summary of them in a workspace is as small as this report<sup>261</sup>.

vi. Again no state programs, responsibility for childcare correspond to the Autonomous Communities that are responsible for deciding whether create treatment centres for victims.

Some AACC have them, some do not. Just as some ACs train professionals to work in these centers, and others not.

As for the funding of these centres or recovery programs, some Communities allocate funds directly, while others make collaboration agreements with various NGOs or associations, which co-finance these projects.

At this point, although it not directs or monitors these plans, the State does support these resources through complementary funding. The Ministry of Health co-funds through Income Tax funds and so-called "pilots" of NGOs and associations, several centres state wide, because if not, funded only by the AACC would not hold.

However there is a serious problem: most of the centres are dependent or part of the system of child protection that acts only with children who are declared in distress or danger. What does this mean about the abuse? These centres can only serve child victims of domestic abuse who lack of family support, or other abuse situations that put them in a situation of helplessness requiring institutions to assume their care. But if the child is abused by her teacher, for example, believes that parents are their guardians and managers charge to seek therapeutic help for the child, neither the state nor the Communities give it, and must pay the child's own family. In this second case, although most centres performed an assessment or survey of the psychological state of the victim not carried out nor finance their treatment. To do it, victims have to go to any of the private centres that exist in Spain.

About the psychological damage that may have been victims and the resulting trauma that causes sexual problems in the future, must stress that in public centres the victim assistance is provided by professional staff, who have the proper training and certainly will be aware of this problem.

And finally, logically calls the consent of the victim for attending to these centres, not the State by itself, but the Autonomous Communities in the exercise of its powers.

III NATIONAL POLICY REGARDING CHILDREN

i. In 1990 Spain joined in the protection of children's rights through the ratification of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNC). Although this supposed an important legal reform, it is necessary to recall what UNICEF highlights: "Rules by themselves are not enough and, to the initial emphasis on the legal and normative reforms to adapt the national legislation to the UNC, must be added changes in other significant areas of the public action to strengthen and to improve the effective exercise of the rights throughout the public policies"<sup>262</sup>

In this area, Spain has made some progress, as evidenced by the last report of the Committee on the Rights of the Child, reflected in the UNICEF's official page<sup>263</sup>, although there is still a need for further improvements. This involves that there is some concern about children's rights, as revealed by National Strategic Children and Young People's Plans.

Well, only a National Strategic Children and Young People's Plan, the one on 2006-2009, which is characterised by its imprecise and abstract objectives. The Ministry of the Presidency planned to approve another one for 2011-2014, but finally it didn't take place. Also, the electronic newspaper Europa Press<sup>264</sup> published the news referred to the request made by the Congress for a National Strategic Children and Young People's Plan 2012-2015, from which it can be drawn that, though there is some concern in advocacy for children, there is not a serious political discussion regarding the children in Spain.

ii. Although in Spain there is not a serious political discussion regarding children, there have been several actions to improve public awareness about child abuse and sexual exploitation, which have been developed mainly by organisations as: UNICEF, Platform of Childhood Organisations, Spanish Red Cross, Federation of Associations to Prevent Child Abuse, etc.

Furthermore, the State integrates in its Administration a range of bodies aimed at this kind of actions too, as: the general Direction of Families and Childhood (Ministry of Labour and Social affairs), Ministry of Education and Science, Ministry of Health and Consumption, Institute of Youth, Spanish Federation of Municipalities and Provinces, Childhood Observatory (Ministry of Health, Social affairs and Equality), etc.

Some of the activities taking place have been these:

-UNICEF produces reports about the impact of the economic crisis on children<sup>265</sup>; about their rights<sup>266</sup>; it also carries out campaigns, as the current collection of signatures for the sake of childhood as the poorest group<sup>267</sup>; it also organizes lectures and conferences to involve society in this subject.

-Platform of Childhood: it develops campaigns for the raise of awareness about children's rights and its infringement; it promotes the dialogue with children and youth, allowing their involvement on social networks, dedicated to the knowledge of their own rights; it promotes the comprehension of the National Strategic Children and Young People's Plans<sup>268</sup>.

-Spanish Red Cross: it works with children in social difficulties, promoting their improvement and adaptation with programs such as "Hospitalized childhood", support classes, online bulletins on social vulnerability, etc.

-Federation of Associations to Prevent Child Abuse: it develops campaigns about prevention and awareness related with childhood and adolescence; it disseminates information related to with child abuse for its detection; it elaborates reports related to child abuse too; it promotes the achievement of policies directed to the improvement of the childhood and youth<sup>269</sup>. The Federation of Associations to Prevent Child Abuse is an organisation that launches a huge awareness labour. An important part of it is taken up by social networks, which allow a big data dissemination<sup>270</sup>.

In the State, for its part, it is noteworthy the Childhood Observatory, which is assigned to the Ministry of Health, Social Services and Equality. It has the burden of fostering the public policies related to childhood and youth, and it conducts researches to prevent problems in this field, it publishes studies and issues periodical reports to improve the rights of childhood and adolescents. All this is developed through the preparation of electronic documents which promotes information about the situation of the childhood and youth, such as “Childhood in figures”, “Edition of the Universal Day of Children Rights 2011”, “National Strategic Children and Young People’s Plans. Adapted version for boys and girls”, etc<sup>271</sup>

The job of the State in this area focuses primarily on the formulation of public policies of action, its debate and its reflection on the national or autonomic rules<sup>272</sup>, as well as in the collaboration with organisations dedicated to subjects such as ill-treatment and sexual abuse of children. In addition, the relevance of Plan of Action to Combat the Sexual Exploitation of Children and Adolescents, directed to the public awareness about this kind of crimes and to form professionals in this area (prominent is the III Plan of Action to Combat the Sexual Exploitation of Children and Adolescents<sup>273</sup>).

iii. News coverage has not been so wide as (although there are not statistics) a consultation study realized by Save the Children to boys and girls during the II Plan of Action against the Children Sexual Exploitation revealed that a 50% of respondents didn’t have clear ideas about such important terms as “human rights, childhood rights, freedom”, etc; and a 70% had heard a bit or nothing about sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children.

The next table elaborated by the Childhood Observatory shows the evolution of the facts known by the different crimes linked to the sexual exploitation:

Child Pornography	392	677	1197	1134
Illegal adoption	4	11	14	5
Corruption of minors/disabled	201	255	272	264
Total	597	543	1483	1403

iv. There are some campaigns that the State develops in collaboration with organisations dedicated to the ill-treatment and sexual abuse of children. So, in collaboration with Federation of Associations to Prevent Child Abuse, the State has conducted a campaign called “My well-being is your responsibility. Don’t forget it”, which is formed by several state campaigns throughout some years:

-I and II State Campaign for the Prevention of Child Ill-treatment (2008): “It hurts, doesn’t it? If it hurts, denounce it”, in collaboration with the Ministry of Education, Social Policy and Sports.<sup>274</sup>

-III State Campaign for the Prevention of Child Ill-treatment (2009): “All Against the child ill-treatment”, in collaboration with the Ministry of Health and Social Policy:<sup>275</sup>

This campaign was conducted specially by the image and the slogan, for a month. On the report made by the Federation of Associations to Prevent Child Abuse about this campaign contains some testimonies of children who have been victims of abuse and ill-treatment, and the importance of the media.

-IV State Campaign for the Prevention of Child Ill-treatment (2010): “20 proposals for the improvement of the attention to childhood and adolescence in Spain“, in collaboration with the Ministry of Health and Social Policy.<sup>276</sup>

-V State Campaign for the Prevention of Child Ill-Treatment (2011): “You are not alone, don’t be afraid. You are not alone, break the silence”, with the support of the Ministry of Health, Social Policy and Equality.<sup>277</sup>

v. In the Spanish law making process it is very important the superior interests of the child. Based on that is the system of children and youth protection. In this way, it is relevant the Organic Law 1/1996, 15th January, about Minor Legal Protection, which modified partially the Civil Code and the Civil Procedure Law, with which the minor is more protected due to the automatic assumption of the safeguarding of the minor when he/she is on a situation of very little protection of children by the public competent entity.

This is a result of the pressure exerted by public institutions dedicated to the minor’s protection, as the Ombudsman, the State Attorney and several associations dealing with minors, to bring in line the legislation to the reality of the child as an active subject, participative and creative, with capacity to modify their own personal and social environment; participate in the research and satisfaction of their needs and in the satisfaction of the needs of others.

Due to this, the expression “to be heart if he/she had enough judgement” has been generalised in all that cases which affect the minor in our legal system. This involves that the minor’s needs appear as the centre of rights and protection that the Law recognises them.

This campaign was brought about through the web and media. It is a “reminder-campaign”, without a fixed period, in which the e-mail was essential, together with media.

<sup>276</sup> Fourth State Campaign for the Prevention of Child Ill-Treatment (2010): it is directed mainly to incise on the politic area. In the X State Congress of Abuse Childhood, this generated a report whose title is the same of this fourth campaign. This way intended to give the advices that the Federation of Associations to Prevent Child Abuse with regard to the National Strategic Children and Young People’s Plan, to the Plan of Action to Combat the Sexual Exploitation of Children and Adolescents and the Plan of Action to Combat the Sexual Exploitation of Children and Adolescents (processed in 2011).

The general principal is that any performance will take into account the minor interest as the guiding principle, avoiding interfering in their school, social or working life. So, the well-being and the security of the minor is searched in any moment. The agility and immediacy is needed in every process which affects to a minor to avoid him/her the unnecessary prejudices due to the rigidity of the process. The intervention of the Public prosecutor (who is the minor and unable representative) has also been enforced<sup>278</sup>.

In this enforcement the superior interest of the minor, the Plan of Action to Combat the Sexual Exploitation of Children and Adolescents (2010-2013) has an important place, because it protects the four general principles of the Convention on the Rights of the Child: the survival and development of children, the equality, the participation in the issues which affect them and the superior interest of the minor. For this, many times it is necessary to protect their identity and privacy<sup>279</sup>.

It is very important to meet what the Criminal Code (modified recently by the Organic Law 5/2010, 22th June, which increases the minor's protection at improving the sexual assaults and abuse committed against children under thirteen) says to understand the child situation in the Spanish legislative process. For this, it adds a new chapter: "Abuses and sexual assaults to children under thirteen years old", alongside an increase of the penalties laid down in these cases.

Therefore, the protection sphere is extended when categorized the Child grooming and the penalties of certain crimes against minors have been enforced<sup>280</sup>.

vi. The main Spanish NGO which work in the subject of children rights are: UNICEF, Save the Children, Cáritas and the Federation of Associations to Prevent Child Abuse. Its implication in the legislative process is not regulated by the State. So its only possible way of participating is doing an encouragement about the subject, denounce any aspect of childhood which is yet needed of legislation, in such a way that any parliamentary group presents a non legal proposition to the outset of Congress by the legal way<sup>281</sup>.

IV OTHER

V CONCLUSION

The communities susceptible of being discriminated in Spain in education, employment and accommodation matters are: the Roma community, the immigrants, the homosexuals and transsexuals, people with disabilities and women.

There is not a concrete term of 'family' in our legal system. From the rights and obligations of the holders of guardianship and the children submitted to it, which are the same for adopted children, children born within a matrimony or outside it, we can infer that family is a social group in which each member from its status, cooperate within its possibilities to fulfill its family's duties, in a framework of respectful coexistence, being the children obliged to obey their parents and being the parents obliged to feed and educate their children.

Heterosexual and homosexual matrimony in Spain involves equal rights and obligations between the married couple such as the duty of respect and mutual help, the duty of living together and the duty of being faithful. The average age to contract a marriage has noticeably postponed, being of 30 years old for men, 32 for women and 16 for Roma people. The number of divorces continues increasing.

In Spain the child is conceived as a human being whose autonomy and dignity have to be preserved to guarantee its comprehensive development. Child is considered a holder of rights and legal guarantees. Spain is committed with the prevention of children's mistreatment and an evidence of that is its ratification of the United Nations International Convention on the Rights of the Child in 1990. The principle of the superior interest of the child means that we have to preserve its well-being and security, speeding the process up so that the child does not suffer more than necessary. Secondary victimization is decreasing avoiding the physical coincidence between the victim and its aggressor.

The Lanzarote Convention or the Council of Europe Convention for the Protection of Children against the Sexual Abuse and Sexual Exploitation became into force in Spain the 1st December 2010. It influenced the reform of our Criminal Code in 2010, introducing new preventive measures against children's sexual crimes and new crimes such as grooming and the sexual abuse and sexual assault against children under 13.

The History of Spain is based on a succession of invasions of foreign populations with authoritarian governments that submitted native population until the promulgation of the Spanish Constitution in 1978 that establishes a stable democratic government with intense international relations.

Fundamental rights are established among the articles 14-29 of our Constitution. Although there is not an express declaration of human rights in our legal system, the Universal Declaration on Human Rights and other international treaties signed by Spain have supra-legal force.

The protection procedure of fundamental rights is special, preferential and summary. It starts in ordinary via, being accepted the extraordinary protection appeal to the Constitutional Court –guarantor organ of the Constitution- when the ordinary via is over. The Supreme Court is the superior legal organ in every jurisdictional order.

The minimum age of criminal responsibility is stated in 14. The judicial condemns against minors offenders have recently grown up but they are non-habitual offenders.

The Attorneys General Office deals with the cases where the child is victim or aggressor. The process generally starts at the instance of the party and the Attorneys General Office starts the process in case the sexual crimes are against children under 13. If the victim is a minor, the report will have to be presented by its parents or its tutor. If the age of the minor is unknown, it can be ascertained by a medical proof. In these processes advertising is restricted, although sometimes the media does not respect these restrictions damaging the victim. The prescription period is taken into consideration from 18 years old onwards with the possibility of suspension for a short period of time.

The person in charge of the Central Register of Criminals and Rebels depends on Ministry of Justice and it contains the certificates of criminal records that are personal. There is a general respect to the rule 15/1999 of protection of personal data. The sexual crimes against minors are stated among the articles 182-189 of the Criminal Code: sexual abuse and sexual aggression against children under 13, grooming against children under 13, prostitution and corruption of minors under 18 and pornography against minors under 18.

The sanctions punishing these crimes are: prison from 1 to 15 years, fine from 1 to 2 years and supervised freedom. The number of judicial sentences has increased but the number of sexual crimes against minors has not decreased. The recidivism is not very high, around 11%, despite of Media has created the perception of a high rate of recidivism in these crimes. There is a worrying lack of proportionality between these crimes and their sanction, because the attack against children's sexual freedom and sexual indemnity is put on the same level to the attack against children's life, essential legal good so that the rest of legal goods the law protects can exist. The supervised freedom fulfils a preventive function of recidivism of the condemned by sexual crimes and it is implemented once prison has finished. The chemical castration for recidivist rapists is voluntary. The deprivation of guardianship is implemented if the sexual crime against the minor has happened within the family.

The complementary measures undertaken are: campaigns to raise public awareness, reports about children's mistreatment and proposals of improvement, action policies and voluntary monographic trainings of professionals.

There is a free telephone number to assist children in the whole national territory managed by Fundación ANAR from 1994 against children's mistreatment and negligence depending on Ministry of Education. It is operative 24 hours 365 days a year and the team consisting of psychologists, lawyers and social workers is in charge of listening to minors' victims of mistreatment or negligence and providing them free social and legal assistance.

The III Plan against Children and Teenagers' Sexual Exploitation (PESIA) implemented during 2010-2013 from the General Direction of Families and Equality depending on the Ministry of Health, is responsible for the knowledge of the reality, for rendering protection to the victims and for raising public awareness, including proposals for improvement from the NGOs participating.

The autonomous regions have assumed the competence on childhood, so they are responsible for the creation, direction and supervision of centres of victims' assistance and the running of the training programs addressed to professionals that are not working in the whole national territory. The State co-finances these centres that can only accommodate children declared in risk or neglect situation, that is to say, in case the crime occurs within the family. The rest of children's victims of sexual violence crimes whose parents support them have to pay for the treatments costs of private centres.

Nowadays, in the national policies there is a kind of concern about children's rights that is reflected in the Strategic National Plans about Childhood and Adolescence (PENIA) for 2006-2009. So far there is just one plan with imprecise and abstract objectives and there is not a real discussion on childhood in Spain. Moreover, the information cover is limited and Spanish population does not have the concepts of human rights, childhood, children's sexual abuse and sexual exploitation very clear.

There are lots of NGOs in Spain that are coping with public awareness actions about children's mistreatment and children's sexual exploitation -UNICEF, POI, Cruz Roja, FAPMI-ECPAT Spain, Fundación Alia2, etc.- and organs from the Central Government – Ministry of Education and Ministry of Health, Youth Institute, Childhood's Observatory, General Direction of Families and Equality, etc. The main NGOs in Spain are UNICEF, Save the Children, Cáritas and FAPMI, that nevertheless have a limited participation in the legislative procedure, as it is not regulated by the State and as it is limited to the attraction of the parliamentary groups to a concrete aspect about childhood so that they start the legislative procedure to reform specific issues without going beyond.

Recommended measures to be undertaken:

- Integrating the communities which can be discriminated in society, facilitating their access to education, accommodation and labour market in equal opportunities as the rest of the population.
- Spreading awareness campaigns on child's violence to all the inhabitants of the national territory, involving them according to their occupation and making especial emphasis in youth sector.
- Innovating in the field of sanctions and other measures against children's sexual violence and the ensurance of their implementation to increase their dissuasive effectiveness and reduce crime.
- Imposing more proportional sanctions with respect to children's sexual freedom and indemnity and children's lives.
- Establishing a more clear demarcation of ranges of age in sexual crimes against minors, distinguishing among the crimes against minors under 18 and the crimes against people over 18.
- Speeding the criminal process up to avoid the secondary victimization, that is to say, the victim suffers more than necessary to clarify the facts and pass a sentence.
- Stating an effective equality among the kinds of victims that can receive a free or co-financed treatment in public centers runned by the autonomous governments.
- Regulating and extending the NGOs participation in the Spanish legal procedure, as they have reports on reality, professionals with expertise on childhood and a more direct contact with population.
- Encouraging States to listen, support and link people working in favour of children's rights in the entire world, so that exchanging different knowledge and resources, we fight against this kind of criminality with a bigger efficiency and scope, because children's mistreatment is an international problem with an international solution.

- Creating and spreading a compulsory national training program about children caring made by an independent multidisciplinary team addressed to professionals who work in contact with children, to guarantee the well-treatment and their ordinary development.
- Establishing 18 years old as the unitarian limit of over age, to extend the number of minors protected by sexual crimes such as child pornography and States promoting the creation of an International Code of Best Practices that can benefit the international community.
- Including the children's violence issue within de political and media discussion.
- Investing more efficiently in education, particularly in human rights and children's rights awareness, because the more educated population especially in values, rights and duties, the more progress and the less problems in society.
- Implementing more legal research groups in universities connecting them to international children and youth parliaments and real parliaments.

I INTRODUCTION

1 GENERAL

i. The question of whether national discrimination exists or not is quite complicated to answer. When searching through information on the subject, i.e. reports, studies, research reviews from Governmental committees, the Equality Ombudsman (DO)<sup>282</sup> and social authorities such as The National Board of Health and Welfare,<sup>283</sup> a general societal problem can be recognized to exist in Sweden where unfavorable treatment is pursued on all discrimination grounds.

For example, and to begin with, in light of the National Board of Health and Welfare's publication "Unequal conditions for health and care - Equality Perspective on Health Care",<sup>284</sup> the answer to the question of the existence of national discrimination is "yes".<sup>285</sup> The report focused on conditions within the healthcare sector, providing descriptions on the discrimination situation for groups based on age, gender, disability, education, social status, country of birth, religion and sexual orientation. The investigator concluded, based on interviews with representatives of patient organizations, results of national patient surveys, and the 2011 issues of the Equality Ombudsman (DO), that there is evidence that discrimination is not unusual.<sup>286</sup>

In The Inquiry on Health, care and structural discrimination<sup>287</sup> it was stated that it is when investigating the patients' experiences of treatment in the health care sector that not infrequently discriminating behavior emerges in its "hidden shape". "Hidden" in the sense the discriminating treatment is inexplicit, indirect or incidental – due to being considered

<sup>285</sup> The publication originated in a Governmental assignment to provide a description of the current equality situation in the health care sector with regards to groups of age, sex, disability, education, social status, country of birth, religious affiliation and sexual orientation, cit. p. 20.

“normal” or “pursuant to standard” in certain social structures or specific institutional contexts. The inquiry exemplified how this hidden discrimination manifested itself in the daily care routines by asking: “how are healthcare resources distributed among different patients? Who is chatted with and how? Who is greeted with a smile? Who asks you if you need something to eat or drink? Who is bypassed in the care queue because their names are difficult to pronounce? Who is allowed to receive visits from family and friends?”<sup>288</sup>

An additional sector of society which has been admitted to inspection under a critical microscope in search of prevailing discrimination tendencies – more especially on ethnic and religious grounds – is the judiciary. The sector-oriented investigation “Is justice fair? Ten perspectives on discrimination against ethnic and religious minorities in the justice system”<sup>289</sup> exemplified and commented discriminatory ills and malfunctions in all parts of the legal chain – that is from police surveillance operations, the reporting of the offences to the police and the criminal investigation, to witness situations, the drafting of judgments and choices of verdicts and sanctions. In the report professor Christian Diesen refers to the conclusions from a foregoing research project, “Equality before the law”,<sup>290</sup> which admitted unequal treatment due to a variety of misconceptions of characteristics following class, age, gender, sex, disability, sexual orientation, political views and country of birth, and e.g. supported that unfavorable treatment of persons of foreign origin occurs in the judiciary.<sup>291</sup> For example in the case of an assault – a crime whose necessary prerequisites is that the threat was made “in a manner likely to cause serious fear to the threatened” – it has been found to be easier for the police, prosecutors and courts to understand that the person threatened in fact was scared, and that the threatening evoked such “serious fear” when the threat has been uttered by a foreigner.<sup>292</sup>

The structural discrimination has yet again, in another seven selected sectors of society, been subjected to further focus and review by the Investigation on structural discrimination, which was commissioned in 2003 to compile, analyze, and supplement already available knowledge and research regarding the existence of discrimination based mainly on ethnic and religious affiliation.<sup>293</sup> In 2005, the investigation reported their conclusions in the Inquiry "The blue-yellow glasshouse – structural discrimination in Sweden".<sup>294</sup> The Inquiry conclusions<sup>295</sup> were confirmed by the Investigation on Power, integration and structural discrimination,<sup>296</sup> which was also mandated<sup>297</sup> to identify and map the root causes of institutional discrimination based on ethnic and religious affiliation.

Taken together the mentioned publications indicate a paradigm shift where the discrimination phenomenon is focused upon as institutional, and it is found that the combating actions, accordingly, ought to be designed to change prevailing discriminatory structures, not the deviant, individual behavior patterns of a few "racist bad apples".<sup>298</sup> In general the mentioned investigations acknowledge that the Swedish society is far from a fair one, in which deplorable, isolated expressions of discrimination only on an exceptional basis might occur at the individual level (individual discrimination). On the contrary, the discrimination of today in Sweden is systematic, a result of societal institutions' routine enforcement of practices, attitudes, norms and traditions which has become "normalized" and amount to discriminatory expressions at each perfunctory application of rules onto anyone who was not a template for the standard's establishment.

ii. Initially it can be said that no universal consensus reigns on the term "family". The term is also lacking a formal definition in Sweden, although a number of family law terms naturally have been defined. Regarding the terms mother and father, e.g., the Children and

Parents Code<sup>299</sup> provides articles whose prerequisites, if met, constitute legal mother- or fatherhood. For example, following only from the marital bond between a man and a woman giving birth, the husband is presumed to be the child's father, and receives legal status – is legally defined – as the child's parent at the time of birth.<sup>300</sup>

To get hold of the family concept, once and for all, one could approach the phenomenon from a different angle – that is by recognising that, depending on the biological, ancestral, or couple relation between individuals (the dispositive fact) there comes in addition a specific treatment (the legal consequence) that indicates “familiarity”. The coming of certain rights and obligations (legal consequences) thus would be the receipt or the confirmation of family bonds. Rather than frame different human group configurations, and from existing kinship, ties of blood or togetherness try to seek where the boundaries for the “real family” lies, one should thus look at the specific treatment that may come with these various bands. Professor J. Schiratzki accurately states that: “in relationships family-related rights and obligations [the legal consequences that the authors understand as indications of a family] often enter gradually”.<sup>301</sup> The full legal effect of the couple’s relationships’ enters, in its turn, like a staircase: first with the establishment of the relationship whilst living apart, then the transition to cohabitation, the birth of children and last with marriage. An example can be given of gay partners, for whom registered Partnership was instituted in 1994. With this, the same legal effects – in the sense of right to marital property etc. – were obtained as in marriage – and consequently this couple constellation would not, when it comes to family related (or family indicating) rights, be regarded as less of a family than the other.

In summary, therefore, the term “family” is most easily encircled from the “family-related rights and obligations” that gradually arise as a partner relationship progresses “up the ladder”.

Regarding the “status of marriage” it can be noted that an influential value, channelled through the relevant family laws of the early 1900s,<sup>302</sup> was that the formal marriage would take priority as cohabitation form. The fixed ideological goal, that the legitimate marital relations must be safeguarded, was, for example, realized when certain marital effects (e.g. right to marital property), formerly following combinations of betrothal, marriage vows, and sexual intercourse, was abolished from the legislation in 1915 – being replaced by tort liability for the contractor who was found mainly responsible for the breaking of betrothal (The Marital Code Chapter 1, § 3).<sup>303</sup> The legislature's ideological ambition to curb illegitimate relations not only took the expression that marital effects were exclusively reserved for the regular marriage; in addition, children have been used as a tool for the achievement of the legislator's ambition in the sense that illegitimate children have had to bear the consequences of their frivolous parents faults by thus earning a bad legal position (denial of children's right to inheritance if born out of wedlock by divorced parents etc.).<sup>304</sup>

A paradigm shift occurred, however, as a result of the appointment of the 1969 parliamentary committee Family law experts<sup>305</sup>. The convening was prompted by “changing social conditions and new ethical values”, identified by the reporting cabinet minister in the bill following the legislative changes proposed by the preceding 1956 Family Law Committee<sup>306</sup>, and considered appropriate to result in a more radical revision of marriage laws. In the name of consistency the Minister of Justice already in the directives<sup>307</sup> to the Family law experts thus stated that the family and marriage law should be neutral to different cohabitation patterns. In other words, the legislature no longer had support to implement the earlier ideological goal to single out one legitimate form for human coexistence.<sup>308</sup> In the bill following the Family law experts' final investigation in 1972 the reporting cabinet minister stated that: "there is (...) evidence which suggests that in recent years it has become more common for men and women to start a family without getting married. The marriage rate has fallen".<sup>309</sup>

The conditions for the formation of families and relationships have, consequently, in recent decades undergone changes. Not least this can be seen in marriage statistics in which, as already mentioned, the number of marriages "peaked" in 1966 (closer to 61,101)<sup>310</sup> but then - apart from normal fluctuations - continuously has declined<sup>311</sup> in favor of cohabitation without marriage.<sup>312</sup> The self-sufficient woman can provide a large part of the explanation: she no longer has economic reasons neither to marry nor to later renounce divorce – financially she can manage on her own.<sup>313</sup> Regarding cohabitation, it is known today to be the most common starting point on a road which, eventually, could end in children and/or marriage.<sup>314</sup>

A concrete manifestation of the described 1970s marriage law reform work, which says something about how the marriage status indeed has changed, is the liberalization of the divorce institute. An aspect of the early 1900s' safeguarding of the legitimate marriage was of course not only to create a legal culture in which marriage was favored; naturally the target was for the marriage to be lifelong and offset its dissolution through the mediation of a priest or civil mediator and, in reference to modern standards, rather orthodox prerequisites to permit divorce initiated only by one spouse.<sup>315</sup> One aim for the family law experts' work was therefore to liberalize the regulatory framework and, discarding the so-called principle of disunion,<sup>316</sup> create an order where a single spouse's desire for divorce came to be respected as sufficient reason to dissolve the marriage.<sup>317</sup> The dramatical decrease in marriage since the peak in the 1960s has, consequently, also come with an increased propensity to divorce<sup>318</sup>

Finally, it should be said that the marriages that still come about do so at a higher average age than before: the average marital age in 2011 was 33.1 years for women and 35.6 years for men who married for the first time. This means a substantial increase in the average age since the late 1960's.<sup>319</sup>

iii. Initially something ought to be said about the interpretation of the question at hand. Regarding the Child's status, historically and culturally, the report authors have assumed that a transformation in family laws correlate to and reflects the contemporary, general societal progress – and the status of the child as part of this. Thus, particular reformations in family law – affecting or changing the child's legal status – have been presumed to be a gateway to the development of society and the child's social status.

Generally speaking - no claim to continuity and context – it is feasible to disconnect and highlight a number of fragments or moments in legal history as evidence of what has been the child's social status. The child's status has overall been dependent on the reigning religiously colored morality norms and family traditions. An image of the child's low status emerges particularly when comparing children in and of wedlock: at the time of the Reformation the subject of Government intervention, such as poor relief, often were unmarried mothers with illegitimate children and poor children without family.<sup>320</sup>

As a starting point has been chosen a time period as far back as the source material allows: Sweden in the 1500s, in the transition from Catholicism to Protestantism (The Reformation) when the Church impact on family life grew.<sup>321</sup> In the reformed Sweden the Lutheran doctrine was to be upheld by the Church through the sacred upbringing in the Lutheran faith, with the Bible as guiding principle.<sup>322</sup> One aspect of the Lutheran orthodoxy was the so-called Small Catechism and its House Rules, providing that power and authority in the home were centralized to the good man (bonus pater familias).<sup>323</sup>

A fundamental tool, available to the family man in order to uphold God's law within the household was the corporal punishment of the child (aga). Aga will henceforth be used as an example enlightening the changing societal attitudes to children's social and legal status at large, from the time mentioned to the present.

It is remarkable - and something which tells a lot about the withholding of the child's legal rights and its mere status as an object of its parents "godly upbringing" - that from Kristopher's law in the 1400s and all the way to its successor, the law of 1734, there were no statutory provisions providing a clue to how the punishment ought to be executed.<sup>324</sup> The act of 1734 provided only an ultimate line to the exercise of aga: "accidental manslaughter" (våda dråp) - which was punishable by a fine.<sup>325</sup> Due to this it would seem as if a license to, with modern terminology, child abuse was given, as long as it didn't have a lethal consequence.<sup>326</sup> We know, however, by the existence of e.g. the Lego Charter or Servant Charter (Legostadga) of 1664 and the oldest preserved Charter for children schools (Skolstadga) of the same century that aga was not at the mercy of complete arbitrariness and that the master/magistrate, teacher etc., did not have full discretion to physically reprimand children. Instead - if at all necessary - one should exercise a reasonable, appropriate, modest aga. For example, it was stipulated in the latter charter that the causing of physical damage was punishable.<sup>327</sup> To beat the child in the head, puff their cheeks, turn their noses, pinch their ears, tear or pull their hair, kick or knock them down, was completely forbidden and corporal punishment reserved solely for those children whose misdeeds and wrongdoings was considered an "evil outflow of the mind".<sup>328</sup>

Notably, however, is that the mentioned Lego or Servant statute was applicable to situations in which children - which were not unusual in this era – took service in another household; similarly the School charter regulated the situation when the teacher would come to aga someone else's child. In general, contrary to an otherwise extensive case law spoken of in so called stads- och tänkeböcker (urban books) during the 1500s, there is little material to interpret the parent's authority to aga their own children and what could constitute an illegitimate exercise of the parental fostering responsibility.<sup>329</sup> Examples indicating that a gradual regulation was coming about, as a result of corporal punishment increasingly being called into question can be found in the second half of the 1880s. Though jurisdiction inside the home was not established at this time either, the questioning of school aga by the so called elementary school inspectors yet resulted in a stipulation that corporal punishment by no means was to be distributed in anger, by reckless violence, but with "loving seriousness and with correction for the offender's age and individuality".<sup>330</sup> From the development in the early 1900s may further be mentioned that the 1920 Children in marriage Act provided in particular that "if it is needed for the raising of the child, the parents are entitled to chasten it in a way which with respect to the child's age and other factors is considered appropriate."<sup>331</sup> The case law of this era brings to discussion what was included in the "lawful parental right to chasten with the purpose of rearing the child" – but judging e.g. by two cases from the Supreme Court of Sweden in 1918 and 1922 it seems the tone still is strongly permissive since the cases end in acquitting judgments of the nurse respectively the father who "chastised" using corporal punishment.<sup>332</sup> The trend is symptomatic for most of the 1900s: changes in the Penal Code in 1957, equating aga with assault whilst discarding the exemption previously applied for chastening parents, and in the Elementary school charter in 1958, preceded a total prohibition.

Somewhere in the development, after having had countless of children badly fared; getting their personal and integrity claims violated, a turning point was however reached. This began with the 1966 legislative amendment whereby the Children and Parents Code provision was deleted which thus far had justified the corporal punishment of a child by its parent. An explicit prohibition of tangible reprimands was however not included in the Parental Code; aga was still to be equated with assault under the Criminal Code. By Governmental authority a committee was summoned in 1977 to investigate whether there should be such a prohibition of corporal punishment of children should be introduced in the Children and Parents Code.<sup>333</sup> This would in 1979 lead to Sweden, as the first country in the world, enacting a law prohibiting corporal punishment in the home.<sup>334</sup> To the Children and Parents Code Chapter 6, § 1 the following was added: "Children are entitled to care, security and a good upbringing. Children should be treated with respect for their person and individuality and may not be subjected to corporal punishment or other degrading treatment".<sup>335</sup>

Regarding "the general approach to children's rights issues", one of the Governmental long-term goals is to ensure full respect for human rights, including children's rights, in Sweden.<sup>336</sup> To address – or approach – this goal the Government has, for example, adopted national action plans for human rights, the last for the period 2006-2009,<sup>337</sup> in order to advise relevant activities and to coordinate and develop the same.<sup>338</sup> Work for a sequel to that is aimed to be completed this autumn.<sup>339</sup>

With specific regards to the rights of children, the general assumption is that efforts towards the realization of children's rights are "an ongoing process to improve both the law and application, where it is important that all relevant actors at national and local level are governed by common principles".<sup>340</sup> Through the ratification of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (henceforth: the Convention) in 1990 and its Optional Protocols in 2003 and 2006 (more about the status of the Convention, as to date of ratification; status of national legislation by incorporation or realisation through transformation etc., in question iv.) the Convention is recognized as the compilation which the actions of public institutions', courts', administrative agencies', legislative bodies' and social welfare agencies' must comply with. <sup>341</sup> The Convention shall thus be obeyed in all matters affecting children and the principle of the best interest of the child must be given prominence in all activities with children.<sup>342</sup> In other words it could be said that there is no other way to legislatively or administratively approach children's rights issues than in the manner proclaimed in the Convention, such as this, through transformation, has been expressed in Swedish law and is construed by courts and law enforcement authorities.<sup>343</sup>

The Government has assigned a practical tool for ensuring the Convention's impact in Sweden, provided to public sector actors at national, regional and local level in their law enforcement community activities on children and youth: the Government's proposed Strategy for the Realization of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, which was approved by the Parliament in December 2010, <sup>344</sup> replacing its predecessor from 1999. The strategy, in short, constitutes a policy manifesting how to concretely approach children's rights issues, that is, in selection, by systematic legislative action, "family services" in the <sup>341</sup> It's another thing that the UN Children's Rights Committee, in its concluding observations in 2009 on Sweden's implementation of the CRC, expressed concern that the coordination and coherence of efforts on behalf of children at both central and local levels were inadequate, and that large disparities remained between municipalities, counties and regions concerning the implementation of the Convention. Committee on the rights of the Child, (CRC/C/SWE/CO/4), June 12th 2009, p. 3.

<sup>342</sup> The Committee has, furthermore, pronounced concern about the fact that the principle of the best interests of the child is not sufficiently implemented in practice, in the administrative spheres – especially in the asylum processes where the best interests of asylum-seekers and migrant children are not sufficiently taken into consideration. <sup>343</sup> An evaluation of the internal law's compliance with the Convention was latest executed in 2011, publicized in the Minisrty Publication Series (Ds) 2011:37, Hur svensk lagstiftning och praxis överensstämmer med rättigheterna i barnkonventionen- en kartläggning [How Swedish legislation and practice correspond with the rights in the Convention on the rights of the child-a survey]. sense of parental education and support, skill developing initiatives, evaluation of children's living conditions and follow-up activities of decisions and actions affecting children.<sup>345</sup>

For reasons of space it will not be possible to give an account of every mentioned way of approaching children's rights issues; the report authors therefor have focused on the Legislator in the enactment of certain laws – the legal approach - as well as their legally secure enforcement. As mentioned, the Convention is set to be transformed into Swedish national law; thus, in the following the authors will give a few examples on how the matter of ensuring the implementation of children's rights has been realized in using the Governmental "tool of law".

The authors therewith have made the assumption that the adoption of a law is not only a reflection of an "isolated" Governmental mind and the single Governmental choice of approaching children's rights, but also captures that of the society – the societal choice of approach – which the state by virtue of the people's foremost representative is set to realize, and which is exercised by the parliament when it passes a Governmental bill to law.

One way in which children's rights have been sought to be legally provided for is the recognition that the child must get the opportunity to be heard and express its will in, e.g., a custody investigation following the Social and Health rules.<sup>346</sup> The legislator has, furthermore, with law e.g. marked to be incumbent upon parents, social welfare committees, authorities and their employees etc. a corresponding legal responsibility to ensure children's rights by reporting suspected abusive behavior towards them.<sup>347</sup> This follows today from the Children and Parents Code Chapter 6, § 1 and the Social Services Act Chapter 14, § 1, as well as from a number of special provisions for specific sectors, such as the Health and Medical Care Act and the Education Act, which, by reference to the Social Services Act makes the latter applicable to the executives within the sectorial industry. Numerous sectors of society, public and private, thus have been submitted to a responsibility to report suspected abuse within a family that could mean that a child is mistreated.

<sup>346</sup> Something which also must be ensured within the family, schools, institutions, courts and administrative bodies – and which the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child has urged Sweden to ensure, firstly by promoting and facilitating children's participation in all matters affecting them whilst being respected for their views, and secondly by making sure that adults who work with children are providing the latter the opportunities to do so, and are giving their views due weight. Committee on the Rights of the Child, (CRC/C/SWE/CO/4), 2009, p. 7.

According to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child (henceforth: the CRC) one of the areas lacking in formal legal protection is that of the children without a residence permit, who needs to get their right to education and health- and medical care – that is medical examination, treatment and care with complementary and alternative medicine – accurately secured by law.<sup>348</sup> The rights of children without residence permit have been extensively debated in Sweden in recent years (more to this subject under the section “other”).<sup>349</sup> In the Governmental report 2011 to the CRC it was furthermore stated that:” it is estimated that the Swedish legislation generally agrees with the CRC, but its enforcement must be further ensured [author’s italics].”<sup>350</sup> That being said: it is obvious that, despite a well-developed and ambitious formal legal protection, the rights provided by law must be afforded a legally secure practical impact – so that every child's right is catered for in each concrete situation.<sup>351</sup>

In order to answer the question of whether or not there is a national "general concern" on children's rights, once more, focus will be fixed upon the 1979 prohibition of corporal punishment (aga). The Committee on Child Abuse - a parliamentary commission with the task of describing the development of child abuse and seeking its explanations –<sup>352</sup> presented in 2001 a compilation of completed (statistical) surveys of what has been the general attitude towards corporal punishment is and since 1965<sup>353</sup>.

In summary, the Committee on Child Abuse showed a decrease in the proportion of Swedish people who kept aga as an indispensable tool in the raising of children. This is further supported by the national surveys of children's and parents' experiences and attitudes towards physical punishment and other degrading treatment which, on behalf of the Government, were conducted and published 2011 by the Children's welfare foundation.<sup>354</sup> On the basis of two national surveys the publication pointed out that: "The positive attitude to corporal punishment declined significantly from the mid-1960s until the mid-1990s. Since then it has fluctuated between seven and eight percent of the parents."<sup>355</sup>

The Committee against Corporal Punishment of Children (aga) also dwelt on the children's attitudes to aga and corporal punishment as a sanction to misconduct, defiance and disobedience. The Committee annotated the reviewed surveys<sup>356</sup> in terms of: "The reason for this strong [negative, the authors' note] attitude change of school children in the latter part of the 1990s, we certainly do not know anything. However, it is clear that children today are much more aware of their rights than before due to the education they receive in school and by voluntary organizations on the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child."<sup>357</sup> The extensive change in attitudes regarding corporal punishment is thus assigned, albeit speculative, to a similarly altered teaching agenda established in the Swedish schools, which includes children's rights – and ultimately has created a "children's concern" on their Rights in general. In the name of consistency, the corresponding reduction in the number of adults in support of corporal punishment must be taken as a pretext that, here too, there has been established a concern on the rights of the child in general.

In the Children's Welfare Foundation's publication it was also established that an increasing number of reports of suspected child abuse are received by the police today and have been so since the mid-1980s. Regarding the increase of reports in, the 1990s and, the 2000s, the National Council for Crime Prevention has, in 2000<sup>358</sup> and 2011<sup>359</sup> respectively, issued in depth studies. With the support of these the publication explains that the increasing number of complaints are due to the greater propensity of preschools', schools', social services' and

iv) The relevant legislation regarding the implementation of international treaties is the 10th Chapter of the Instrument of Government.<sup>362</sup> According to the §§ 1-4 the Swedish Government is entitled to make agreements with foreign states or international organisations – with the reservation that a parliamentary approval is needed if the agreement will require changes in legislation, annulment of law or making of law. Sweden is a part to the Vienna Convention and practices ratification as a method of restraint in accordance with its article 14.<sup>363</sup>

On the matter of the implementation of international treaties into national legislation Sweden conforms to a dualistic principle. Thus, the treaties must be incorporated (that is, when the “authentic treaty text” is stated, in national legislation, to be Swedish law and thus directly applicable) or transformed (that is by adapting/harmonizing legislation to meet the requirements of the treaty text) in order to be applicable by courts and authorities in the adjudication process. The latter method requires gradual and continuous adaptation of national law as Conventions need to be interpreted in the light of changing social conditions and development.

The Swedish ratification of the Convention of the Rights of the Child was dated June 1990,<sup>364</sup> without reservations, after a parliamentary decision.<sup>365</sup> The Convention and its two Optional Protocols have been transformed into Swedish law.<sup>366</sup> In Sweden, there is a current discussion on the incorporation of the Convention, following the CRC's exhortation. The Office of the Children's Ombudsman has in a letter to the Government (2009) urged the Government to appoint a Commission to do a broad review on whether the Swedish legislation and practice reflect the Convention's provisions and consider whether the whole of the Convention should be given legal status as law. Also the Delegation for the Protection of Human Rights in Sweden has suggested that the Government should assemble a Commission to investigate the appropriateness of incorporating more Conventions (regarding the Lanzarote Convention, see the following chapter 2) into Swedish law, including the CRC).<sup>367</sup> In October 2012 the Swedish Government has finally decided to investigate the incorporation of the Convention (more regarding this investigation in chapter III, question i)).

v) Article 27 of the directive 2011/92/EU of the European Parliament and the European Council of 13 December 2011 reads: "Member States shall bring into force the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with this Directive by 18 December 2013". No such laws etc. have entered into force, nor has any investigatory work, foregoing law enactment, reached the public light.

iii) There are plans to ratify the Lanzarote Convention in Sweden. The question of whether Sweden should ratify the Convention was examined and evaluated in a Government report<sup>371</sup> from 2010. The report concludes that Sweden should ratify the Convention and it states that to be able to reach the goals within the Convention some changes have to be made in Swedish law. These changes have to be made before a ratification of the Convention is possible.<sup>372</sup>

The report states that these changes would be presented in a Government bill in January 2012.<sup>373</sup> However the Government bill has not been fully processed. The question why Sweden so far has not ratified the Convention was discussed as late as June 2012 in a parliament discussion.<sup>374</sup> The answer from the Government was that the Government bill is still in the making. Furthermore, the Government states that the process is taking longer time due to the Government wanting to enable a good result and to make sure that Swedish law will follow the Lanzarote Convention when it has been ratified.

iv) According to the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969, Sweden is bound to follow the Convention after ratifying it.<sup>375</sup> According to article 27 in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, Sweden may not invoke the provisions of national law as a justification if Sweden fails to fulfill the obligations of the Convention. Sweden is also bound to interpret national law in the light of international agreements. However it takes further measures to be able to invoke the Lanzarote Convention fully into Swedish law. This measure could for example be a transformation of the Convention or an incorporation of the Convention. After such a measure the Convention would get the rank between constitutional law and national law.

1 GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE JURISDICTION

i. The Swedish system of Government is based on general elections that are held every fourth year. People have the possibility to vote on a political party to represent them in the Swedish Parliament (Riksdagen), county councils and municipalities.

The Parliament is Sweden's primary representative form and consists of 349 members. The Parliament is, since 1971, a unicameral (one-chamber) parliament. It is the Government that governs the country but it is accountable to the Parliament. The prime minister is appointed by the Parliament and he on his part is responsible of forming a Government. The Government, not the head of state (which is the monarch), is empowered under the constitution to make decisions. The Government is to implement the decisions of the Parliament and take initiatives to new laws on which the Parliament later decides.<sup>376</sup>

ii. The Swedish Constitution, the Instrument of Government, mentions human rights in its Chapter 2, § 19 which refers to the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (henceforth ECHR). The paragraph states that legislation cannot be passed if in conflict with ECHR. The Instrument of Government as we know it today was created in 1974 and ECHR was incorporated into Swedish law in 1994.<sup>377</sup> Children are mentioned as a group for example in article 5 ECHR but not in the Swedish constitution itself.

iii. There is no appointed Constitutional court. Individuals can claim their rights through direct effect. It is possible to turn to the Ombudsman for Justice (JO). The ombudsman is to ensure that official authorities follow the laws while exercising public authority.<sup>378</sup>

iv) First of all, the police conduct a preliminary investigation, which is led by a police officer or a prosecutor. The preliminary investigation may result in a prosecution and there will then be a trial at the District Court, the first instance.<sup>379</sup>

The judgment can be appealed by both parties to the Court of Appeal. In practice the Court of Appeal is the actual highest instance in many cases, but formally the Supreme Court is of highest instance. For a case to appear in the Supreme Court it must have a leave to appeal which is given if the judgment from the Supreme Court could provide a precedent.<sup>380</sup>

v. Penal Code, Chapter 1, § 6 states that for children under the age of 15 years the sanction cannot be imprisonment.<sup>381</sup>

The Swedish National Council for Crime Prevention produces the national official crime statistics. The agency has been in existence since 1974. Its statistics show that there were no children under the age of 18 sentenced to serving time in prison during 2011.<sup>382</sup>

2 SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW

2.1 Sexual Abuse

i. In 2005 the term sexual intercourse was replaced by the term sexual activities throughout the Penal Code Chapter 6 about sexual crimes. The Government of Sweden aimed the new term to be equal to sexual intercourse but comprise much more. To be defined as a sexual act, there should be a reasonably lasting physical touching of either the other's genitals or the other's body with the perpetrators' own genitals.<sup>383</sup> However even acts, which do not include a lasting physical touching, can be comprised by the term, if the act has had a substantial sexual character and has been aimed to violate the victim's sexual integrity. Other circumstances, for example if the sexual act has occurred at a repeated number of times, should be taken into consideration.<sup>384</sup> The sexual act must have consisted in sexual intercourse or another sexual act, which with respect to the nature of the violation and other circumstances, is comparable to sexual intercourse. Crucial for comparison is the sexual nature of the violation and not the sexual act itself.<sup>385</sup>

Acts as having vaginal, oral and anal intercourse, or entering fingers, objects or a fist into a woman's genitals or a person's anus or masturbating in front of another person are within the concept of sexual activities. Acts with sexual character where direct contact is prevented by clothes are also comprised by the term. An example is if the perpetrator touches another person sexually or makes another person masturbate at the same time as he or she is masturbating. Even acts that do not individually reach the level of sexual activity can together, as a whole, be seen as one. What characterizes these acts is the perpetrator's use of the victim's body for sexual satisfaction.<sup>386</sup>

An example is a case from the Supreme Court of Sweden; the perpetrator had taken of the sleeping victim's underwear, touched her body and her genitals and parted her labium. The perpetrator had subsequently masturbated, standing in front of the sleeping woman.<sup>387</sup>

The term 'sexual activities' has to be applied broadly, which is the Government's purpose of changing the previous term of sexual intercourse. The broad interpretation given in the new term was considered necessary by the Government to avoid that reprehensible acts fall outside of the criminal area.<sup>388</sup> The term of sexual activities is broad enough to include the sexual activities covered by the Optional Protocol.<sup>389</sup>

ii. There is no definition of "intention" in the Swedish legislation but the development in doctrine and case law has helped clarifying the term. There are three forms of intention, which are direct intention, indirect intention and negligent intention.

Direct intention requires a purpose or a meaning with the act, for example, when the perpetrator intends to kill a certain person.<sup>390</sup> Any form of intention is acceptable for criminal liability to the extent that direct intention is not demanded.

Indirect intention is when something happens as a by product of the perpetrators act. These effects are not intended, even though the perpetrator is aware of them being sequel to his or her actions. The perpetrator might lack intention with his or her acts or intend something other than the criminal effects.<sup>391</sup>

The third form of intention is negligent intention. In a case from 2004, the Supreme Court stated that negligent intention is applicable if the perpetrator has realized the risks of the effects of his or her actions and been negligent about it.<sup>392</sup>

Intention is implicit if nothing else is stated. The legislator does not repeat this criterion in every article. Instead, if negligence is sufficient for criminal liability, and intention is not required, it must be stated explicitly in the article.<sup>393</sup>

An act will be considered as a crime only if it is committed intentionally, unless otherwise is specifically provided. Has the offence been committed in self-inflicted intoxication or if the perpetrator by own fault is temporarily from his or her right mind, shall not lead on the offence not been considered as a crime.<sup>394</sup>

Intention is required in crimes concerning sexual abuse of children. But there are some crimes, where in certain respects carelessness is also sufficient for responsibility. Criminal liability will be sentenced even in cases where the perpetrator didn't realize but had reasons to assume that the victim was a minor.<sup>395</sup> The article requires somewhat high rate of carelessness. The perpetrator will not be sentenced to crime if the minor has a body development, which makes her or him seem older or if the perpetrator did not have any reason to be alert. However, if such carelessness cannot be proven, other regulations that do not have these age requirements may be applied.<sup>396</sup> This regulation should be applied with caution, which is emphasized by Council on Legislation.

An example is a case from the Sodertälje District Court where three of five perpetrators denied that they knew about the age of the minor. However, the Court found that they had reasons to assume her being under the age of 18, because she was still in high school.<sup>397</sup> minors, is applicable. This article comprises crimes, described in Penal Code chapter 6, § 4 paragraphs one and two, i.e. rape of children, but which are less grave. As an example, the Government bill gives a sixteen year old and a fourteen year old, who have a close and good relationship with each other and participate in a mutual and voluntary sexual activity.<sup>400</sup>

An act, which is voluntary and mutual and where the child is close to the age of sexual right of self-determination, shall not be sentenced as child rape but instead as sexual exploitation of children.<sup>401</sup> There is however a special discharge rule in Penal Code chapter 6, § 14<sup>402</sup> when it is obvious that no abuse has happened.<sup>403</sup> It is applicable on cases of sexual exploitation of children in accordance with Penal Code chapter 6, § 5 and sexual abuse of children in accordance with chapter 6, § 6, paragraph 1.<sup>404</sup> The rule concerns mainly children under the age of 15 who have come far in their maturity and are closer to sexual self-determination. It applies primarily to situations where there are entirely voluntary contacts between adolescents that differ slightly in age and development.

There is a case from Svea Court of Appeal where a 27year old had had sexual intercourse with a child who would have her 15th birthday the day after. The Court decided that the perpetrator could have thought that the intercourse was voluntary even though the child said otherwise. Because of this and the child's age close to sexual self-determination the perpetrator was sentenced to eight months of prison for sexual exploitation of a child.<sup>405</sup>

iv) A person who has sexual intercourse with a child under the age of 15 or carries out a sexual act with a child that with regard to the nature of the violation and other circumstances are comparable to sexual intercourse, will be convicted of child rape to imprisonment for a minimum of two and a maximum of six years. The same applies to anyone who commits an act referred to against a child who has turned fifteen but not eighteen and who is a descendant of the perpetrator or under the instruction of, or has a similar relationship to the perpetrator, or for whose care or supervision the perpetrator shall be responsible because of an authority's decision.<sup>406</sup>

Anyone who performs a sexual act other than as described above with a child under the age of 15, or with a child who has turned 15 but not 18 and with whom the perpetrator has a relationship shall be sentenced for sexual abuse of a child to imprisonment not exceeding two years.<sup>407</sup>

The articles above do not require any threat or force, i.e. these are not a prerequisite for responsibility. Regardless of anything, sexual abuse is always to be considered as a serious injury to the child's integrity. Even in the absence of any threat or force, the child can still experience the adult as threatening.<sup>408</sup>

"In Government's opinion, the abuse of power and ruthlessness, which the perpetrator makes himself or herself guilty against the child, weighs in these cases as heavy as an exercise of such violence as required under the corresponding provision of rape".<sup>409</sup>

In the Government bill states that a child can never consent to sexual activities and consequently eliminates the argumentation of the child's participation without any force.<sup>410</sup> It is not of any importance whether it is the perpetrator or the child who is the active one in the sexual act.<sup>411</sup> Sexual activity with children under the age of is always to be considered as rape, regardless of the circumstances.<sup>412</sup>

There is an exception to this rule though. If the offence is less grave and the child is almost 15 years old, the act can be sentenced as sexual exploitation. The level of maturity of the child and his or her ability to understand his or her actions is of importance in that case.<sup>413</sup> This is stated by the Supreme Court in a case where a 25 year old male had had sexual intercourse with a 13 year old female.<sup>414</sup> The intercourse was mutual and had been planned by both of them. In this case the girl's age, maturity, voluntariness and ability to understand her own actions was considered as relevant factors for the assessment of the crime. The man was therefore convicted to sexual exploitation of a child instead of rape of a child.

Even though force and threat is not a prerequisite for criminal liability, it does have an effect on the seriousness of the crime.<sup>415</sup> See question xxi below.

v. A person who has sex with his or her own children or their descendants will be convicted of sexual intercourse with a descendant to imprisonment not exceeding two years. A person, who has sexual intercourse with a sibling, will be sentenced for sex with a sibling to imprisonment not exceeding one year. This does not apply to the person induced to the act by unlawful coercion or otherwise improperly.<sup>416</sup>

There must be a biological relationship between the parties for the provision to be applicable, i.e. the rule does not apply to adoptive and stepchildren relationships.<sup>417</sup> If the descendant is younger than 18 years, Penal Code Chapter 6, § 4 paragraph 2 is to be applied instead.<sup>418</sup>

Observe that only sexual intercourse, and no other sexual activity, is criminalized by the article. The article includes only vaginal intercourse and it is sufficient with a woman's and a man's genitals touching to be defined as intercourse.<sup>419</sup> However, sexual intercourse cannot occur between people of the same sex in accordance with the Penal Code.

For offences relating to sexual intercourse with a descendant only the older party shall be sentenced. As regards the crime intercourse with a sibling however, both parties are held responsible.<sup>420</sup> By siblings, the article refers to full siblings. It is not enough that the parties have one mutual parent.<sup>421</sup> If the parties are not aware of their relationship they are free from liability.<sup>422</sup> employments, assignments, internships and similar.<sup>423</sup> Sweden has, however, not introduced a ban on hiring someone who has been convicted of any of the offences, which has been criticized by the representatives of the Office of the Children's Ombudsman.<sup>424</sup> The legislature would not limit the employer's freedom to employ by imposing a ban of such character and motivates it as follows:

“To legislate on occupational ban would, in our opinion, not be an appropriate path to follow in the light of both the labour tradition and with regard to the possibilities of a perpetrator's rehabilitation and reintegration into society. Therefore, it is up to the employer to determine if the person concerned will be employed”.<sup>425</sup>

An employer's capacity to make a responsible decision on hiring someone convicted of sexual offences against a child was not disputed in the report.

There is a new case about a kindergarten teacher who is suspected of aggravated rape of three children and sexual abuse of one child. The teacher has been suspected in 2007 for sexual molestation but the investigation has been closed down.<sup>426</sup>

Regarding children older than 15 years, Penal Code chapter 6, § 3, about sexual exploitation of a person in a position of dependence, is applicable. The article states that a person who induces another person to undertake or endure a sexual act by seriously abusing that the person is in a position of dependence to the perpetrator shall be sentenced to imprisonment not exceeding two years. At felony, the perpetrator shall be sentenced to a minimum six months and a maximum of four years of imprisonment.<sup>427</sup> Such position of dependence can be an employment or subordination relationship or the relationship between a prison inmate and a staff person.<sup>428</sup>

““Payment” is not restricted to money but also includes clothing, jewelry and other forms of compensation.”<sup>434</sup>

In contrast to the previous article, which was only applicable to street prostitution and similar, purchase of sexual acts that take place under conditions that are not pure prostitution conditions are now included.

The Government bill sets out several requirements that must be met for criminal liability. In conformity with the Lanzarote Convention, the promised or the given payment to the child must have been a prerequisite for the sexual act. It is not necessary, though; that the remuneration has been given out to the child, i.e. even cases where it has been given, in whole or in part, to anyone other than the child is comprised by the article.<sup>435</sup> It is also important to note that if the perpetrator had believed that the child was over the age of 18 and had no reasonable cause to suspect otherwise, § 11 about the purchase of sexual services, which does not have an age limitation, may be applied.<sup>436</sup>

We believe that the Swedish definition of “child prostitution” is compatible with the definition given in the Lanzarote Convention. All prerequisites given in article 19 (2) of the Convention are fulfilled in the Swedish legislation.

Child prostitution is a term used internationally to describe the purchase of sexual activities of children. The term is also used in this report. However, the term is not used in the Swedish legislation. The perpetrator is sentenced to purchase of a sexual act from a child instead of child prostitution. Important to note is that ECPAT Sweden does not want to use the term “child prostitution” because the term can give the expression that a child can consent to sexual exploitation and does not accurately reflect the abuse that constitutes child prostitution.<sup>437</sup>

ix. The crimes of trafficking, unlawful coercion and pimping are regulated in the Penal Code chapter 4, § 1a, chapter 4, § 4 and chapter 6, § 12.<sup>438</sup> The purchase of a sexual act from a child is regulated in the Penal Code chapter 6, § 9.

When the victim is under the age of 18, the perpetrator shall be sentenced for trafficking even if no improper means has been used. If an offense is less serious, the perpetrator will be sentenced to imprisonment not exceeding four years.<sup>439</sup>

A high penalty is imposed where the perpetrator has exhibited particular ruthlessness or if the child is very young.<sup>440</sup> The article includes internal trafficking as well as border crossing trafficking.<sup>441</sup>

There are cases where someone grants premises or an apartment or accepts children in their home. That person can be considered to have promoted or financially used children having occasional sexual relations for remuneration and therefore be found guilty of procuring in accordance with the Penal Code chapter 6, § 12 of. The person will be sentenced to imprisonment not exceeding four years.<sup>442</sup>

The requested promotion can be done by maintaining a brothel, assigning premises, leaving instructions on prostitutes' addresses, transport, and surveillance. To meet the given requirements, the perpetrator must through his or her actions have enabled occasional sexual relations, i.e. intercourse or other sexual activity, for another person. It is not necessary to prove that an occasional sexual relation has actually been brought about. It is important, however, that the perpetrator has taken some of the earnings, although the requirement for neither habitualness nor profit purpose exists. x. Sweden signed the Convention on Cybercrime 2001-11-23.<sup>445</sup>

The question of whether Sweden should ratify the Convention and the additional protocol was discussed in the ministerial memorandum Ds 2005:6. It was said to be important that the Swedish penal legislation could offer good protection against the misuse of modern technology and that procedural law could give efficient opportunities to investigate crimes of IT-nature. It was also expressed to be important that Sweden work as an active part in the international cooperation on such issues concerning IT crime, as the main characteristic is that those types of crimes are generally not restricted by national borders. In the memorandum, the ministry proposed that Sweden should ratify the Cybercrime Convention and the additional protocol and that its provisions should be redrafted to Swedish legal text.<sup>446</sup>

The Ministry of Justice also suggested, in a directive in 2011, that a new examination should be done on the legislative changes that would be necessary for Sweden to meet the requirements of the Convention and the additional protocol. The new examination was said to be needed because of ongoing ratifications of other directives<sup>447</sup> and because the basis of the assessment in the previous directive, of whether Swedish law complies with the requirements drawn up in the Convention and the additional protocol, had substantially changed since 2005.<sup>448</sup> The new examination should include a review of the provisions in the Convention and protocol in order to analyze the need for Swedish constitutional amendments, proposals for change in legislation as well as suggestions on which xi. Offences concerning child pornography are legislated in the Penal Code chapter 16, § 10 a. The definition of "picture" includes all types of art forms, i.e. also images produced with computer technology and cartoon images, and it is not required that the image depicts a specific child or that a child has modeled.<sup>451</sup>

The definition of pornographic image is the same for child pornography offences as for other crimes relating to pornography. A picture is generally considered to be pornographic under Swedish law when it depicts a sexual scene in an uncovered and challenging way, without containing any artistic or scientific values.<sup>452</sup>

In the context of child pornography, a "child" is defined as anyone under the age of 18 or a person whose pubertal development is not complete.<sup>453</sup> It is the external physical changes that occur during puberty that are intended when speaking of "pubertal development". Due to this definition, the provision means that anyone who goes through puberty late can be assessed under the concept of "child" even if he or she is 18 or older.<sup>454</sup> If the person is under the age of 18 but fully developed through puberty it may, in some cases, be required by the law that it is understandable from the pornographic image and the surrounding circumstances that the depicted person is under the age of 18, for criminal liability to be imposed on the accused.<sup>455</sup> When assessing whether the depicted person is perceived to be under the age of 18, the court can examine how the image has been marketed or what information is given through, for example, advertising text. If there is only a suspicion that the depicted person may be under the age of 18, the age requirement might not be considered to be met.<sup>456</sup>

Since the provision on child pornography contains a definition of the term "child", it seems the legislature did not intend to criminalize so-called "evocation pornography", referring to cases where adult models are portrayed as children or are provided with different characteristics to bring thoughts to children in a sexual context.<sup>457</sup> It is not, however, required that a child is included in material which have obvious sexual meaning, but it may be sufficient that the child is in a situation where one or more adults perform some type of sexual act. Images portraying children in a manner that alludes to sexual behavior, without having the child participating in any act, may also be subject to criminalization. As a general rule to determine the nature of materials, it is required that the image is perceived, under common values and language, to be presenting a child in a pornographic environment.<sup>458</sup>

The provision on child pornography includes involvement of any child pornographic images in all types of media. In other words, the provision is intended to cover images in printed magazines as well as those accessible on the internet and images in videos or films.<sup>459</sup>

It is worth mentioning that when Sweden ratified<sup>460</sup> the Optional Protocol on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography, a reservation was declared to one of the articles;

Article 2

"For the purposes of the present Protocol:

(a) Sale of children means any act or transaction whereby a child is transferred by any person or group of persons to another for remuneration or any other consideration;

(b) Child prostitution means the use of a child in sexual activities for remuneration or any other form of consideration;

<sup>461</sup> Optional Protocol on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography (New York, 25 May 2000) Article 2.

Sweden declared that “any representation” in paragraph (c) was interpreted as “visual representation”.<sup>462</sup>

xii. The child pornography offences punishable under Swedish law are:

1. To depict a child in a pornographic image
2. To distribute, assign, let, display or otherwise make such an image of a child available to someone else
3. To acquire or offer to sell such an image of a child
4. To pass on contacts between buyers and sellers of such images or to take other actions aimed at promoting trade in such images, or
5. To possess such an image of a child or view such a picture that he or she has made available for him- or herself.<sup>463</sup>

If the pubertal development of the child who is illustrated has been completed, responsibility for offences mentioned above in 2-5 may only be imposed if it can be determined by the presentation of the image and circumstances surrounding the image that the person is under the age of 18.<sup>464</sup>

The intention of establishing the list above in the provision for child pornography offences was to try to criminalize all forms of acts where an image with child pornographic content is made available to anyone else and the legislator has meant the list to be interpreted only as exemplifications of criminal acts.<sup>465</sup>

The definition of "depicting" a child in a pornographic image is that such an image is produced through for example photographing, filming, artificial manufacture or through the child being used as a model for drawings. It is not necessary that the child imagined is a real person; the provision also includes fictional representations. Also manipulation of film sequences, for example, to create child pornography material through cutting and pasting such sequences, may be subject to criminal penalties.<sup>466</sup>

The expression "distribution" means that an image is transmitted or made available for more than a few people. In the case of availability or brokering to a limited group of people or to a single person, the same paragraph of the list may be subject to application but then rather by the terms "assigning", "leasing" or "displaying", depending on the circumstances.<sup>467</sup> To "assign" a picture means that the picture is sold, donated or traded away. To "let" a child pornographic picture to someone else means that the image is rented out or lent without compensation. "Displaying" of an image means that someone plays a movie for someone else.<sup>468</sup> The terms mentioned in paragraph 3 of the list refers specifically to criminalization of purchasing a child pornographic image and making such an image available for sale. The purpose of this paragraph is to cover the intermediaries who can be involved at the stage of distribution and assigning of child pornographic images.<sup>469</sup>

Anyone who arranges contacts between buyers and sellers of child pornographic images or takes any other similar measures aimed at promoting trade with such images may carry criminal responsibility according to paragraph 4. Such actions can thus be criminal without the organizer directly being in contact with child pornography, if he or she intends to increase the circulation of such material. These types of acts are punishable at the level of action to facilitate transfer or acquisition. An example could be that a person provides address information between sellers and buyers of the material without there being any personal contact but it is required that the deed has sought to promote trade in child pornography and that there has been more than a single occasion of communication or transaction.<sup>470</sup>

To possess a child pornographic image (paragraph 5) means that the person has it in his or her possession without necessarily being the owner. This provision represents the lower limit of the punishable responsibility. Because it requires possession of the image, it is not illegal to simply look at the picture as someone else shows it and it is not illegal to physically hold the image as it is displayed.<sup>471</sup>

If an image has been retrieved through the use of Internet, possession of the image arises when the image is saved by transferring it to any type of storage device.<sup>472</sup>

To make a child pornographic image available for oneself means that someone has actively, paid for access to the material or otherwise, through effort, has gained access to it.<sup>473</sup>

The penalty scale of child pornography criminal offences is imprisonment of up to two years but if the offence may be regarded as less severe, the scale allows a maximum of six months in prison or imposes fines.<sup>474</sup> An example of a case where the offence may be considered as less severe is when one person at a single occasion has produced and saved a child pornographic image on his or her computer, or if, for example, a tourist is caught with such material in his or her luggage.<sup>475</sup>

Child pornography offences can also be considered to be of a more severe nature. For such offences, the penalty scale imposes imprisonment for at least six months and at the most six years. When evaluating the severity, it should especially be taken into account if the crime has been committed for financial or commercial gain, as part of business, if a particularly large number of images have been involved or if the images are of especially young children. It should also be taken into account if the offence has been a part of criminal activities on a systematic or larger scale, or if the child is exposed to violence, coercion or any form of exploitation in a particularly ruthless manner.<sup>476</sup>

An exemption from criminal liability for depiction and possession is when someone paints, draws or otherwise produces an image of a child pornographic nature through handicraft, if the image is not intended to be displayed, distributed, transferred, leased, or otherwise be made available to others. With this exception, the intention has been to refer to cases where a person uses such a method to manufacture an image of child pornographic nature and it can be assumed that the image essentially is intended for personal use. If, however, the image might be shared or otherwise put into circulation, criminal responsibility is still effective.<sup>477</sup>

A second exemption from the provision on child pornography is if the materials can be regarded as justified with reference to the surrounding circumstances. This is intended to exclude such possession which may be necessary for research, news dissemination and advocacy from criminal responsibility. When determining if this exemption can be applicable, it has to be assessed if the purpose of the possession may be considered justifiable, i.e., not whether the holder of the material can be regarded as excusable due to his or her profession.<sup>478</sup>

Furthermore, the legislator considers that there is no explicit exemption from the prohibition provided in cases where young people, for example two persons who are both 16 years old, depict their own legally performed sexual acts.<sup>479</sup>

As regards statutory limitation, penalties for child pornography crimes of a normal nature may not be imposed if the suspect has not been indicted or been arrested within five years from the date on which the offence was completed. For minor offences, there is a two-year limitation and ten years for crimes with aggravating nature.<sup>480</sup>

Even if the child pornography offence has been committed abroad, there is in some cases a possibility for the Swedish court to rule. According to general rules there should be some link to Sweden for Swedish jurisdiction to be applicable. Ties may exist if the offender habitually resides in Sweden or if he or she is a Swedish citizen. However, there are often restrictions in jurisdiction according to the requirement of double criminality, meaning that the offence shall be punishable in the country where the offence was committed, as well as in Sweden. In addition, there may be restrictions ruling that the penalty cannot be more severe than the most severe punishment prescribed for the same offence in the country where the crime was committed.<sup>481</sup>

There are also provisions in Swedish law (1998: 1443) stating that import of child pornographic images to and export of such images from, Sweden is illegal.<sup>482</sup>

xiii. Child pornography offences can be detected by the police in various ways. The police frequently receive tips from the public which are first assessed for credibility and then an investigation may be opened regarding the materials and the circumstances surrounding the case. Every image of child pornography that the police are given knowledge of are marked with a unique code and stored in an image database. When the police review an image, attempts are made to identify the vulnerable depicted children. Occasionally, information on the origin of the image can be retrieved by analyzing the backgrounds or dialects and languages used. Criminal investigation begins when the offender or the child has been identified. Interpol is also informed. The police also work to seek out people who share child pornography material on the Internet, which often leads to international cooperation since the networks can be transnational. If the police find a webpage containing child pornography they collaborate with the internet service provider (ISP), if such an agreement exists. The ISP can then redirect the link to a blocked page. Information on the webpage found is also sent to the Finance Coalition aiming to ensure that no one can make financial purchases with the current page.<sup>483</sup>

The Swedish Financial Coalition works to complicate and prevent trade of child pornography, with the goal to stop child abuse. The coalition was established through a partnership between several Governmental institutions and partners in both the non-profit and private sectors. Ultimately, it is the police who are responsible for combating child pornography, but because economic transactions occur in this type of trade, different parties of the financial industry also become key players in the preventive work. Members of the coalition focus primarily on finding sellers of child pornographic material and then act to close the possibility for the seller to receive any payments.<sup>484</sup>

xiv. One of the main reasons for criminalization of child pornography is that the legislator considers there to be a substantial risk that such images might be used to encourage children to participate in sexual acts.<sup>485</sup> The criminalization is intended not only to protect the children depicted or otherwise involved in the creation of the material, but also to protect children in general. Those children who are involved in the creation, however, are exposed to a particular risk of harm to privacy and integrity and both the creation and possible circulation of the image imply a violation even if the child is normally not able to assess the impact and meaning of his or her own participation. The violation of integrity may be considered to be continuous in the sense that every occurrence of the image implies a penalty worth violation.<sup>486</sup> However, it can be possible to produce child pornography without committing sexual assaults against children.<sup>487</sup> The criminalization of child pornography is therefore included as a provision in the Penal Code chapter concerning crimes against public order. This is done to differentiate between child pornography offences and what is regarded as “other” sexual assaults against children. For this reason, it is considered that the link to a sexual child abuse is irrelevant for the question of whether child pornography is punishable or not.<sup>488</sup>

xv. Sexual harassment is a criminal offence in the Penal Code chapter 6 on sexual offences, criminalizing acts that involve someone touching a child who is under the age of 15 or induces the child to participate in, or carry out, acts of sexual meaning. Sexual harassment also includes someone “flashing” himself or herself naked to someone else or commits any other act which is likely to violate the other person’s sexual integrity.<sup>489</sup>

To have the effect of criminal responsibility, the offence should be of unmistakable and clear sexual character, based on an adult person's assessment, and it does not matter what the child's attitude to the situation is.<sup>490</sup> As for the actual act, it is sufficient that it is typically of such nature that it constitutes a violation of the victim's sexual integrity.<sup>491</sup>

In the Governmental report of sexual offences investigation in 2010 it was not considered necessary that the offender holds a particular sexual purpose for committing an act of touching a child sexually or otherwise involving a child in a situation of sexual nature.<sup>492</sup> It was also suggested in the report that the provision on sexual harassment would cover situations when children witness sexual acts, even if such an extensive interpretation of the rule already seemed to exist according to certain practices. It was, however, justified from a principle of legality point of view that the provision should be supplemented with explicit criminalization of the offence when someone for sexual purpose induces children to witness a sexual act. The report also commented on certain requirements of the legislation, according to the Council of Europe Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse. "Causing" can be constituted through offering, coercion or persuasion and the offence has to be intentional for criminal responsibility. It was considered that legislation should contain direct demands for sexual purposes, and what constitutes such objective should be settled in court. Furthermore, it was said that the interpretation of the provision should be broad and not only include situations in which the sexual desire of the offender is "teased" or satisfied.<sup>493</sup>

xvi. "Contact with children for sexual purpose", also called "grooming", is a punishable offence under the Penal Code chapter 6, § 10 a. It is punishable under the provision to make an agreement with a child who is under the age of 15 to meet and then take action likely to promote that such a meeting will happen, if the purpose of the agreement is to enable the crime of committing rape<sup>494</sup>, sexual exploitation<sup>495</sup>, sexual abuse<sup>496</sup>, sexual harassment<sup>497</sup> or exploitation of a child for sexual posing.<sup>498</sup>

This provision intends to criminalize contact with children when the purpose of the contact is making sexual abuse possible through a physical encounter. Such contact is in practice often initiated through the use of Internet.<sup>499</sup> To "take action" in order to make an encounter likely to happen can mean that the adult, through repeated contacts with the child, propels that the deal should be completed, that the adult gives instructions to the child concerning transport or timetables or that the adult arranges the child's transportation or accommodation.<sup>500</sup> There have to be actual actions involved which confirm that the perpetrator stands by the arrangement to meet the child in order to enable sexual abuse.<sup>501</sup> The form of contact can be any type of sexually-oriented conversation with a child, that the child is asked to show him- or herself through a webcam or that the adult shows nudity to the child. Other types of contact can be sending pictures of sexual content to a child or that a child is induced to send such images of him- or herself. Any contact mean that the child is offered some kind of payment for sexual services or if the child through the contact be prevailed upon to perform any type of sexual activity by threats or blackmail. In the introduction of this provision, however, the Government stated in its bill that two main categories of sexual contact with children could be identified; contacts aimed at subjecting children to sexual abuse online and contacts aimed at getting children to physically meet with an adult for the enabling of sexual abuse. As regards the first category of contact types, the Government already felt that there was general protection in the Penal Code for the conduct of various elements which could occur following such purpose, but that there was a particular need to adopt legislative measures to further strengthen the protection of children from being exposed to sexual abuse at physical encounters.<sup>502</sup>

Criminal responsibility requires actual active intention to commit certain offences, which have been listed above, and there has to be an overall assessment of the purpose. The parties' relationship, age difference, the agreed meeting place and the way in which the parties have had contact are of particular importance when making the assessment.<sup>503</sup> The parties need not to actually have met for criminal liability to be imposed but it is sufficient that there is a mutual will between the parties to meet at a certain time and place.<sup>504</sup> In terms of the agreement, it may be totally informal and it does not matter which one of the parties has taken the initiative to the contact.<sup>505</sup>

The offence applies only to acts committed against children under the age of 15, i.e. the age of sexual self-determination in Sweden. However, there is no requirement that the offender should know whether the child is under the age of 15 or not; to be criminally liable it is sufficient that the adult had reasonable grounds to believe that the age of the child was below the age provision.<sup>506</sup>

The intention when creating the provision on contact with children for sexual purpose was to discourage such contact with children which might threatened to lead to sexual abuse at a physical meeting. The provision is technology-neutral and applies to all types of contacts, both by phone or per internet or, for example, through contact which occurred in connection with recreational activities. Abuse can also be considered committed "online", and for such offences the legislator referred to already existing criminal law protection in the Penal Code. It depends on the circumstances of the case which offences occur in a particular case, in addition to the unlawful contact with the child under this provision. The circumstances may bring up offences that do not have a direct sexual orientation, such as unlawful coercion, unlawful threat, insult, harassment or defamation.<sup>507</sup>

In cases where the circumstances clearly tell that the offence has not resulted in any abuse of the child, for example if the difference in age between the parties is insignificant, it may be a case of discharge. The provision for discharge is stated, as said above, in the Penal Code chapter 6, § 14 which is also applicable in cases of sexual abuse, exploitation for sexual posturing or sexual harassment of a child. This meaning was extended when the provision on contact with children for sexual purpose was introduced in 2009.<sup>508</sup> of a sexual act of a child<sup>516</sup> and procuring (including crime of aggravating nature)<sup>517</sup> are criminalized at the stage of attempt, according to the Penal Code chapter 6, § 15. The provision does not include criminalization of attempts of sexual harassment.<sup>518</sup>

In addition, preparation and conspiracy to commit rape, aggravated rape, rape against children, aggravated rape against children, serious exploitation of children for sexual posing, aggravated procuring, and failure to disclose such crimes, is also criminalized according to the same provision.<sup>519</sup>

As for child pornography crimes, attempting to commit such offences are punishable at the normal degree, as well as attempts and preparations for aggravated child pornography offences.<sup>520</sup>

General provisions on attempt, preparation, conspiracy, and participation in such activities are also legislated in the Penal Code chapter 23.<sup>521</sup> For penal responsibility at the experimental stage under these provisions it is necessary that the offender has started the execution of the crime and that there has been an actual threat that the crime could be successfully carried out but could not be implemented solely because of temporary circumstances.<sup>522</sup>

2.6 Corporate Liability

xviii. Under Swedish law it is punishable to carelessly spread child pornographic images if the act was carried out for trading purposes or through business operations.<sup>523</sup>

Sweden explained in a proposition to the adoption of a framework decision on the strengthening of the European Union's common efforts to combat sexual exploitation of children and child pornography offences (2003/04), that the European Commission had stated that Sweden at the time could be regarded as one of eight Member States whose legislation contained effective legal responsibility for offences covered by the framework decision subject area. On this basis, the Government assumed that the Swedish legislation on corporate fines was considered to meet the requirements of liability and imposition of penalties for legal persons in the subject area in question.<sup>524</sup>

Legislation with general criminal liability for legal persons is provisioned in the Penal Code chapter 36. It is stated in §7 that when crimes are committed in the exercise of commercial activities, in some cases, the operator should be required to pay corporate fines. Those fines are imposed on the request of the public prosecutor and the criteria to be met are that there is stricter punishment than monetary fines prescribed and that the trader has not done what could reasonably have been expected of him in order to prevent the crime, or if the offence is committed by:

- a) A person in a leading position based on power to represent the businessman or to take decisions on his behalf, or
- b) Other person considered to have specific responsibility for the control and supervision of the company's operations.<sup>525</sup>

Criminal responsibility may thus be imposed on a legal person where he or she can be considered to have had a lack of routines, checks and procedures<sup>526</sup> and the offender should be a person who is part of the company's management or due to independent responsibility reports directly to the management<sup>527</sup> or at least a person who works as a supervisor and bears greater responsibility than for day-to-day tasks.<sup>528</sup>

As regards the assessment of the danger or damage that the criminal offence has implied, the evaluation is to be carried out objectively and as a rule, damage or danger can be assessed as more limited if the individual offender has acted intentionally or was negligent.<sup>529</sup>

In the assessment of the offence it should be taken into account to which extent the trader can be to blame for the crime and it is also relevant to assess the degree to which the trader's obligations have been breached as well as the position of the offender within the organization and whether the crime has been accepted by the management.<sup>530</sup>

If a crime that can lead to a corporate fine has been committed by negligence and it is not likely to lead to sanctions other than fines, the case may be brought to prosecution by the public prosecutor only when it may be considered appropriate from a general point of view.<sup>531</sup> This rule means that the corporate liability is primary in relationship to individual responsibility in cases of negligence and when financial penalty can be imposed. Prosecution may be considered appropriate from a general point of view when the penal value approaches the limit of crimes which imply fines or in cases where the offences mean certain risk and special protection purposes can be considered to exist.<sup>532</sup>

xix. According to the Government's view, stated in the bill concerning corporate fines,<sup>533</sup> which resulted in the rule above, corporate fines should be the primary criminal sanction in the case of less serious crime. The provision is therefore a procedural trial rule which means that prosecutors in some situations should not prosecute an individual offender for the violation if it may lead to a case of corporate fines. For more serious offences, however, both corporate fines and individual responsibility can be demanded. The Government stated in the bill mentioned above that if the committed crime can lead to other penalties than fines, it should also be possible to direct criminal sanctions at the individual, no matter the success of the case on corporate fines. Then, it is not assumed to be a question of “less severe” crime of negligence. This view was presented with the motive that the legitimacy of the rule should not be undermined.<sup>534</sup>

xx. Felony is stated in the Penal Code chapter 6, § 4, paragraph 3. If the offences are considered as grave, the perpetrator shall be convicted of aggravated rape of a child to imprisonment for a minimum of four and a maximum of ten years. In assessing whether the crime is grave, special consideration shall be taken of whether the perpetrator has used violence or threats of criminal offence or if more than one person abused the child, or otherwise participated in the assault or the perpetrator with regard to the approach or the child's young age, or otherwise demonstrated particular ruthlessness or brutality.

An example is when a guardian or someone involved in the child's upbringing repeatedly has used the child sexually by abusing the child's dependency. The punishment may be more severe if the child has been harmed psychologically or physically as a result of the abuse.

There is no age limit, but the lower the age of the child, the greater the importance of assessing the penalty value. This does not mean that abuse of older children cannot be considered as grave. In these cases the personal circumstances of the child may affect the penalty value.<sup>535</sup>

What is said in chapter 6, § 4, paragraph 3, beside the threat and violence requisite, also applies when determining aggravated sexual abuse of a child in accordance with § 6, paragraph 2.

Except what is stated for each offense through Chapter 6 of the Penal Code, there are other aggravating factors listed in chapter 29, § 2.<sup>536</sup> Among these are, if the perpetrator seeks to attain more serious consequences than the crime committed and if the child had difficulty in defending him or herself. If the perpetrator abused a position or abused a special trust, if he or she by coercion, fraud, or abuse of the child's lack of understanding, dependency or young age persuaded him or her to participate in the crime, are also covered. Eventually, if the offense is part of a crime in an organized form<sup>537</sup>, systematically or if it was preceded by special planning, if the subject were to violate a person, a group because of race, color, national or ethnic origin, religious belief, sexual orientation or other similar circumstances, and if the crime alluded to harm the security and trust of a child in its relation to a related person, are mentioned.

Extradition

The provisions on extradition are regulated in Act (1957:668) on extradition for commission of a crime (Act nr 1) and the Act (1959:254) on extradition to Denmark, Finland, Iceland and Norway for commission of a crime (Act nr 2), which facilitates delivery to these countries, more than in the previous act. According to both laws extradition is excluded if the perpetrator has already been convicted of the crime in Sweden.<sup>538</sup> In case of extradition, the applicant state cannot sentence the person to death penalty.<sup>539</sup>

According to §1 of the Act nr 1, any person who is suspected, accused or convicted of a criminal offense in another state, and is staying in Sweden, may by a decision by the Government be surrendered to that state. Extradition may be granted only if the offense is equal to an offense for which under Swedish law imprisonment of one year or more is provided. When extraditing to Nordic countries, however, it is not a requirement that the offense is punishable under Swedish law.<sup>540</sup>

If the person has already been convicted in the requesting State, he or she may, according to Act nr 1, be extradited if he or she will be imprisoned or put into care in institutions for at least four months.<sup>541</sup> Extradition cannot be granted, when taking into account the person's youth, health or personal circumstances in general, the nature of the act and the foreign state's interest, it is considered incompatible with humanity demands.<sup>542</sup> It has to be taken into consideration if the person is a minor or has physical or mental health problems. The seriousness of the crime and the time since it was committed will be compared to the circumstances which prevent extradition.<sup>543</sup>

In the case of extradition to the Nordic countries, extradition may not take place if the offender can only be sentenced to a fine in the requesting state.<sup>544</sup>

Extradition will not be granted if it is a statute-barred crime according to Swedish law,<sup>545</sup> or if the person is prosecuted for any crime in Sweden, for which prison is prescribed<sup>546</sup>. The same applies if the preliminary investigation has already been launched in Sweden. Extradition may take place only after conditional release if the sentence has already been announced in Sweden.<sup>547</sup> According to Act nr 2, §6, extradition may not take place if the person is prosecuted for a crime which has two years of imprisonment in its range of punishment, or disposal in institutions for crimes or preliminary investigation has been launched. It is not an obstacle to extradition if the person is prosecuted in Sweden for the same crime.<sup>548</sup>

A Swedish citizen can be extradited to the Nordic countries, if that person has had his or her permanent abode in the requesting country for at least two years or if the offense is punishable, by Swedish law, by more than four years' of imprisonment.<sup>549</sup>

According to both laws, a person extradited shall not, without special permission given in § 24 or §18, be prosecuted or punished in the foreign state for any crime committed before the transfer, or except when wanted by two or more states,<sup>550</sup> be extradited to another state<sup>551</sup>. If the requesting state would violate the so called principle of specialty, it would be a crime against international law.<sup>552</sup> However, this can be set aside if the Government gives consent to it.<sup>553</sup>

Important to note is that the Act (1959:254) on extradition to Denmark, Finland, Iceland and Norway for commission of a crime is abrogated as from 2012-10-16.

xxiii. Sweden is one of the countries that have made progress in its legislation regarding the protection of children. However, there is still much to do in this area and we believe that the protection of children who are victims of sexual exploitation should be strengthened. CRC considers the penalties not being proportionate with the seriousness of the crimes and criticizes the financial penalties and short term of imprisonment. We, members of the national research group, agree with CRC's criticism.

In conformity with CRC, we believe that a fine is not an acceptable punishment for the sexual exploitation of children and the purchase of sexual acts from a child and these crimes should not be classified as less serious sexual offences against children.<sup>554</sup> We agree with the Swedish Ombudsman for Children and find the requirement of double criminality for prosecuting a Swedish national who has purchased a sexual act from a child in another country, very unfortunate.<sup>555</sup> The requirement of double criminality, which means that a crime committed outside the Swedish territory must be criminalized in that country as well as in Sweden for the possibility of prosecuting, should be abolished, which is also emphasized by CRC. We also agree on the necessity of including sounds in the regulation of child pornography and not only pictures.

A major problem we believe exists in Sweden today is the fact that there is not a ban on hiring persons, convicted of sexual offences against children, in occupations that involve direct contact with children. While we respect the employer's freedom to employ, we think that such a ban would not mean such restrictions on that freedom as the Government claims it would. A ban would prevent these people from moving between different workplaces and continuing to work with children. This is clearly not accomplished with the obligatory register controls that exist today. We welcome, therefore, CRC's encouragement to the Swedish Government to prohibit sex offenders from working with children.<sup>556</sup>

We also find it unfortunate that the sanctions against legal persons are limited to pecuniary penalties and we agree with CRC who recommends the penalties to include criminal, civil or administrative sanctions.<sup>557</sup>

Another problem is the protection of children who are unaccompanied asylum seekers which is to be discussed in chapter IV.

Corporate fines are imposed if the offense is prescribed with punishment more severe than a fine and if the trader has not done what could reasonably be required to prevent the crime or if the offense is committed by a person who has a leading position with authority to represent and make decisions on behalf of the trader or has a special oversight of the business. This does not apply if the crime was directed against the trader.<sup>561</sup> The traders have an extensive responsibility and the rules about freedom from liability should be applied restrictively.<sup>562</sup>

Corporate fines shall be set at not less than SEK 5000 and not more than SEK 10 million.<sup>563</sup> In determining the amount of the corporate fine the damage that the crime resulted in, the extent of the crime and its relation to the economic activity should be taken into consideration. Whether the trader has previously been ordered to pay corporate fines should also be taken into account.<sup>564</sup> If the company has made a profit, the value thereof shall be declared forfeited, unless this is unreasonable.<sup>565</sup>

Seizure relates only to personal property and objects that are accessible. The right to confiscation does not involve the right to search for objects but requires a search warrant, a decision about body search or similar. The object needs not to be invoked as evidence, but can be used as a basis for investigation or similar. When the item is not of any value or in someone's possession but is useful for the investigation, the rules about seizure do not apply.

xxvi. The health care, kindergartens and schools, agencies whose activities affect children and youth, as well as other agencies within the psychiatric evaluation activities, social services, and correctional care and their employees have the obligation to notify the social welfare committee when a child is exposed to violence or sexual abuse at home.<sup>568</sup> This also applies to those professionally engaged in individual activities involving children and young people or in the field of health care or social services. However they do not have to notify the police.<sup>569</sup> After the social services have investigated the circumstances, it is up to them to decide whether the event should be reported to the police or not.<sup>570</sup>

In case of suspected abuse or sexual abuse of a child, several agencies work together and carry out investigations. The social welfare committee investigates whether the child needs support and protection while the police carry out the preliminary investigation under the supervision of the prosecutor. If required, the child and adolescents psychiatry services can be connected to the case. During the preliminary investigation a special representative is appointed when the suspect is a parent or a guardian or someone who is in close relationship with the guardian. The representative's roll is to take the child's wishes into consideration and protect the child's rights during the investigation and the trial.<sup>571</sup> Under this Act a child is any person under the age of 18.

The child's best interest should be taken into account in actions concerning children.<sup>572</sup> The Social Services Committee has to make sure that children grow up in secure and good conditions and to provide support for children at risk of adverse developments.<sup>573</sup> They also have an obligation to provide the child with relevant information and identify his or her

In cases where a guardian or a child over the age of 15 does not give his or her consent to the necessary care for the child, the committee may decide on compulsory institutional care.<sup>578</sup> If in cases of physical or mental abuse, improper exploitation, neglect or any other condition in the home, there is a real risk that a young person's health or development will be damaged, a decision about the care of the person shall be made.<sup>579</sup> This is decided by the administrative court on application by the Social Services Committee.<sup>580</sup>

The Social Services Committee may decide on immediate placement of a person younger than 20 years, if it is likely that the young person needs care on the basis of this Act and the court's decision cannot be awaited with regard to the risk of the young person's health or development.<sup>581</sup> The design of the care and the place where the young person will live is determined by the Social Services Committee.<sup>582</sup> During the time of the young person's absence from home, the above mentioned committee is responsible that his or her rights according to the Children and Parents Code chapter 6, § 1 are fulfilled.<sup>583</sup> These rights include that the child is given security, good care and upbringing, is treated with respect and is not subjected to physical punishment or other degrading treatment.<sup>584</sup>

The Social Services Committee may also, at the same time as satisfying the child's need of contact with parents and guardians<sup>585</sup> as far as possible, decide what the interaction should be like and determine if certain restrictions should also apply to telephone and mail contact.

3.1 Investigation

i. Article 3 in the Convention states that the best interest of the child shall be a primary consideration. The article is directed not only to public but also to private institutions for example the legal bodies and the courts of law. Sweden has taken several measures due to its obligations to interpret Swedish law in the light of the Convention. The establishment of the Barnahus can be seen as a step towards adjusting the criminal procedure to the best interest of the child.<sup>588</sup>

On behalf of the Government, the police in cooperation with the prosecution, national board of forensic medicine and the social board have established a reception and advocacy center for child victims of sexual abuse and exploitation, so called Barnahus. Barnahus is a cooperative composed of police, public prosecutors, forensic doctors, social workers and child psychologists who aim to provide child victims with one place to go for legal and other support service. The Barnahus process facilitates tape-recorded testimony with investigators, which later can be used in court to avoid re-victimizing child witnesses. Common guidelines have also been developed. The purpose of these guidelines is to ensure that the interaction takes place in an efficient legally secure manner with a continuous focus on the child perspective. Currently there exist about 22 Barnahus activities in different cities.<sup>589</sup>

In 2009 the faculty of law at University of Stockholm conducted an evaluation on the Barnahus. The result of the evaluation was presented in 2010. The evaluation points out that the preliminary investigation done at the Barnahus has the same deficiencies as the regular police and prosecution investigation and that the prosecution rate in fact was lower at the Barnahus. The evaluation on the other hand points out that the inter-agency cooperation is higher in places with Barnahus and that more children tend to receive crisis support. The participation of medical experts also leads to more medical examinations.<sup>590</sup>

In 2011, the Government commissioned the crime victim compensation and support authority to develop and implement a training program for better treatment of victims of sexual exploitation during police investigation, pre-trial and trial. The program intends to focus on children and young people's special vulnerability and needs due to sexual offences. The program also focuses particularly on the best interests of the child. The program is addressed to police, prosecutors, judges and lawyers.<sup>591</sup>

The handbook "handling of child abuse" has worked as guidance for prosecutors. The handbook puts a focus on how to conduct an investigation from a child's perspective, in an efficient and legally secure way.<sup>592</sup>

Förundersökningskungörelsen (1947:948) §17 states that an interrogation of a person under the age of 18 must be planned and executed so that there is no risk that the person who goes through an interrogation suffers from it. The provision is applicable to the injured party, witness and suspect. If the interrogation concerns sexuality special care shall be taken to this circumstance, and the investigation should not be more detailed than the circumstances require.<sup>593</sup> §17 also states that the best interest of the child shall be taken into account. An interrogation with a child should therefore not take place more times than what is necessary.

In Swedish law there are several measures that can be taken to provide support or protection to victims and witnesses during a trial. Sweden is also obliged by the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography (OPSC) article 8 to ensure that measures are adopted in order to protect the rights and interests of child victims. Article 8 OPSC states that states shall provide appropriate support service to child victims through the legal process.<sup>594</sup>

A victim has in many cases a right to a counsel for an injured party or, if the victim is a child under the age of 18, the Government provides a special representative in cases where the parents are accused or may not pursue the child's best interest because of the relationship with the accused.<sup>595</sup> The counsel for an injured party's general assignment is to look after the child's interests as well as to be a support for him or her.<sup>596</sup> The counsel can also request that the process will be held behind closed doors or that the questioning with the injured party may be made in the absence of the accused.<sup>597</sup> During the preliminary investigation the counsel shall explain to the child how an investigation is performed.<sup>598</sup> A counsel for an injured party also has the right to be present at all hearings held with the child. At a main hearing the counsel shall provide the child with general support and draw the court's attention to a situation that could cause stress for the child.<sup>599</sup> He or she is, however, only to be seen as a counsel and has no ability to act on his or her own without authorization from the principal.<sup>600</sup>

A victim of crime that is going to be heard in a trial may be accompanied by an appropriate person as a personal support, a so called support person according to Code of judicial procedure chapter 20, § 15, paragraph 1.<sup>601</sup> It is the injured party that initiates the need for a support person. The injured party is the one to decide who will be their support person.<sup>602</sup> The purpose of the provision has been to give the child, in cases that he or she can experience particularly stressful, a right to special support.<sup>603</sup> The support person should be seen as a complement to the injured party's defense, who under the observance of his or her duty of impartiality doesn't have as a main task to provide support to the child.<sup>604</sup> A support person cannot, unlike an attorney, carry out any legal acts.<sup>605</sup> A support person has beyond

The majority of the Swedish courts also conduct a witness support activity. A witness support person is a person who works on a non-profit basis in assisting witnesses and victims of crime with support and practical information in relation to a criminal trial. A witness support person will primarily be a fellow human being but he or she can also explain how the criminal procedure is carried out.<sup>607</sup>

The court is allowed to provide security in court under the Act (1981:1064) on the safety in court. According to the act, decisions on safety checks can be made if such checks are needed to limit the risk for serious danger to life, health, liberty or extensive destruction of another's property.<sup>608</sup> Since 2001 a security check can be made at the entrance to a courtroom, but also at the entrance to the building.<sup>609</sup>

The Child Abuse team was established to serve as a centralized focal point for domestic and international cooperative efforts including Interpol. Team within its Special Victims Unit. The National Criminal Investigation Department has issued an Action Plan for International police work on child sex offences and child pornography.<sup>610</sup>

The National Criminal Investigation Department's child pornography group (C.I.D) consists of ten police officers and one administrator, of which four police officers are dedicated to work with child sex tourism. also investigate child pornography cases. Every picture is put and stored in a database with a specific code for each photograph. A computer program then sorts out the pictures that have been under investigation. The pictures can also be put together to series. The group also works to identify the children who are in the pictures. When identifying the children in the pictures, C.I.D for example looks at the background of the pictures to get information about the location where the photo was taken. When the child or the perpetrator has been identified a criminal investigation is initiated by the police. The information is also sent to Interpol. When working to find child pornography on the internet the C.I.D receives cases from both Europol and Interpol. They also receive tips from the general public.<sup>612</sup>

Since September 2006, a separate division has been set up within the prosecutor's office to combat international crime and serious organized crime. The new division means that the processing of cross boarder crime and serious organized crime has been concentrated in three international public prosecution offices, which are located in Stockholm, Gothenburg and Malmo. The national public prosecution offices deal with matters relating to trafficking and aggravated procuring.<sup>613</sup>

In Sweden there is currently some uncertainty circulating around the legality of so called secret operations. In 2007 the Government authorized the Ministry of Justice to appoint a special investigator in order to address some police legal issues concerning covert surveillance and investigations. The investigation was concluded in 2010. According to the investigation there was no need for any special regulations concerning undercover reconnaissance, so called infiltration. Infiltration can currently be carried out according to the Police Act ( 1984:387).<sup>614</sup> However the Government emphasized that three basic principles should be considered when carrying out such operations.<sup>615</sup> The first principle states that the police is forbidden to commit a crime when seeking to detect a crime. According to the second principle the police shall never provoke someone into committing a crime. The police may also never of reconnaissance reasons ignore to take the required measures against a criminal suspect.<sup>616</sup> Article 8, Police Act also states that an action made by the police shall always be in accordance with the principle of necessity and the principle of proportionality. As for provocative actions, the Government proposed that regulation should be made in relation to such provocative actions that could lead to someone being induced to commit a criminal offence.<sup>617</sup> Currently provocative actions may only be made in accordance with the National prosecutors guidelines which stipulates that needs and proportionality must be observed, that it is never allowed to provoke someone to commit a crime, that there must be a strong suspicion of crime, provocative measures may only be used to reveal serious crime, that decisions on provocation shall be made by the prosecutor and that such measures must be thoroughly documented.<sup>618</sup> In 2006 a new law was introduced increasing opportunities for the police to work under cover with protected identity.<sup>619</sup>

According to Act (2007:978) on secret bugging, bugging is officially allowed during preliminary investigation in cases of serious crime. With secret bugging purposes eavesdropping or recording which occurs in secret and with technical aid designed to reproduce sounds, and refers to speech in private, conversations between other or negotiations at a meeting, which the public has access to.<sup>620</sup> Article 2 states that secret bugging may be used during preliminary investigation if the crime, for which it is not prescribed a less severe punishment than imprisonment for four years, other offences if it due to the circumstances can be assumed that the penal value exceed imprisonment for four years and it is a case of (...) rape of a child under chapter 6, article 2, third paragraph, Penal Code, aggravated sexual abuse of a child under chapter 6, article 6, second paragraph, Penal Code, exploitation of a child for sexual posing under chapter 6, article 8, third paragraph, Penal Code (...) aggravated child pornography offences under chapter 16, article 10 a, fifth paragraph, Penal Code. Attempt, preparation or conspiracy to commit one of the above mentioned offences may also allow secret bugging if it is punishable and if it from the circumstances can be assumed that the offence has a penal value of four years. the above mentioned, or if action is of extraordinary importance for the preliminary investigation and reasons for such action outweigh the intrusion or means for the suspect.<sup>621</sup> Secret bugging may for example be used in the suspect's home according to article 4, Act on Secret Bugging. Questions about secret bugging is to be considered by the court at the request of the prosecutor.<sup>622</sup>

iii. In the Code of Judicial Procedures chapter 23, § 1 states that a preliminary investigation is initiated whenever there is reason to believe, because of an indication or any other reason, that an offense subject to public prosecution has been committed. The perpetrator does not need to be known and it does not require any proof of certain strength.<sup>623</sup> However, it is required that there is a suspicion of a specific crime.<sup>624</sup> Reason to believe that an offense has been committed may be due to a report, but that need not to be the case.<sup>625</sup> Code of Judicial Procedures chapter 20, § 3 prescribes the offences subject to public prosecution. These crimes do not belong to the category of crimes that require the injured party to press charges.<sup>626</sup> An investigation is initiated as soon as the police or the prosecutor learns of the crime, for example from information that comes up during a general police operation.<sup>627</sup> A report is not necessary to initiate an investigation.<sup>628</sup> The decision to initiate an investigation is made by the police or the prosecutor in accordance with the Code of Judicial Procedure chapter 23, § 3. A report on a crime subject to public prosecution cannot be revoked.<sup>629</sup> It is the prosecutor who decides if a prosecution shall be undertaken.<sup>630</sup> The prosecutor must then strongly believe that the indictment will lead to a conviction.<sup>631</sup>

iv. In connection with the sexual law reform in 2005, the period of limitation for certain sex offences against children was extended.<sup>632</sup> The reform also resulted in an extended coverage of several sexual offences. Chapter 35, § 4, paragraph 2, Penal Code now states an extended statute of limitations for certain sex crimes. § 4, paragraph 2 states that the special limitation periods in Penal Code chapter 35, § 1 should not be counted from the day of the offense but from the day when the injured party turns 18 years old. Offences with extended periods of limitations are offences under Penal Code chapter 6, §§ 4-6 and 8 paragraph 3, or attempts to commit such crimes, or offences under chapter 6, §§ 1-3 or 12, or attempts to commit such crimes if the offense is committed against someone under the age of 18. The statute of limitation thus takes as its starting point the victim's legal age.<sup>633</sup>

v. Children who are born in Sweden are registered at birth by the Swedish Tax Agency. In general there is therefore not a problem to determine the age or identity of a child born in Sweden. Problems arise mainly in relation to age determination of migratory children. In order to determine their age, a medical examination is performed if no papers or identification documents are found.<sup>634</sup> The national Board on Health and Welfare has recommended that a medical examination shall be performed by a pediatrician.<sup>635</sup> Teeth, bone structure, hands and the weight of the child shall be examined. An x-ray of the skeleton may also be performed.<sup>636</sup> However these examinations cannot give a definite answer, which often results in children being treated as adults because the medical examination suggests it. The consequences for a child who is estimated to be over the age of 18 can be crucial for both the criminal process and the asylum process. Save the children Sweden has expressed a concern about the legal security of these examinations and the limited right to appeal a determination of age.<sup>637</sup> As a response, the National Health and Welfare Agency has developed new guidelines for how to determine the age of a child in a more efficient and secure way.<sup>638</sup>

vi. According to the Criminal Records Act (1998:620), § 1, the National Police Board (NPB) is responsible for recording and storing data for convicted offenders. Courts and prosecutors can extent the data into the registry, but the NPB are still responsible for personal data in the registry.<sup>639</sup> This also means that the NPB is responsible for inaccurate information is corrected and liable to stand for compensation in cases of damage and violation of privacy caused by the data processed in violation of the law.<sup>640</sup> Criminal records Act §3 states that anyone who has been found guilty of committing a crime shall be registered in the criminal record.

Nordic police authorities assist each other in criminal investigations.<sup>641</sup> Criminal Records Act §12 states therefore that data from the register shall be submitted to the court or the police or prosecutor in Denmark, Finland, Iceland or Norway if requested for investigation in criminal cases. The collaboration also includes, upon request, to disclose records of financial penalty sanctions when such information is needed for a criminal investigation in another Nordic country.<sup>642</sup> When it comes to other states data may, on request, be submitted to the court or the police or prosecutor in a state that is connected to Interpol if necessary to the authority for prevention, detection, investigation or prosecution of criminal offences or a foreign case.<sup>643</sup> Almost all countries are connected to Interpol. Disclosure may be made in cases where information is needed to prevent crime. This means that information from the registry that can be significant for other countries intelligence may be disclosed.<sup>644</sup>

A request for data from the registry shall be handled by the NPB.<sup>645</sup> However, the Government or an authority appointed by the Government may issue regulations that a police department, in some cases, may consider whether to disclose information or not.<sup>646</sup> A person who takes part of the personal data from the registry may not improperly disclose this information.<sup>647</sup> In the public sector the provision of the Public Access to information and Security Act (2009:400) is applied. Terms of breach of professional secrecy is stated in Penal Code chapter 20, § 3.

appealed.<sup>648</sup> The law gives a right to appeal to the person who was a party in the lower instance. According to Swedish law everyone has the right to be a party, no matter the age.<sup>649</sup> A difference is however made between a person being competent and a person who has process eligibility. A person with eligibility is a party that himself/herself can be active in the process through a counsel. Process eligibility is in Sweden associated with legal competence. A child is according to Swedish law without legal competence.<sup>650</sup> The legal competence will instead be carried out by the child's legal representatives, according to Code of Judicial Procedures chapter 11, § 1 paragraph 2.

For a party to be entitled to bring an appeal against a judgment the judgment must from a legal point of view have passed him or her.<sup>651</sup> The assessment of what can be seen as passing a party is done from an objective perspective.<sup>652</sup> As for other decisions made by the court, only decisions that are final can be appealed. Which decisions that are final are stated in the Code of Judicial Procedure chapter 17, § 1 and chapter 30, § 1. From these statements the conclusion can be made that a final decision is a decision where the court distinguishes itself from the case.

In Swedish law, the right of the child to be heard and to express his or her opinion is to be ensured by its legal representatives, normally his or her parents. If the parents are considered not to have the child's best interests in mind, a counsel for an injured party may be appointed.<sup>653</sup> Then it is the counsel that ensures the rights of the child and processes the appeal. According to the Government, the system of the especially appointed counsel for a child lives up to the requirements of article 12 on the Convention on the Rights of the Child.<sup>654</sup> The Care of Young Person's Act (1990:52) § 36 however states that a child over the age of 15 has the right to bring his or own action in a case.

Code of Judicial Procedure chapter 52 prescribes what details an appeal against a decision shall contain. Any such complain must be written and submitted to the court within three weeks from the date of issue of the notification of the judgment or the decision, or from the date when the appellant received the decision. The appeal must include an explanation of the decision being appealed and the amendment demanded the grounds of appeal and the facts relied upon in support of any appeal, the evidence relied on and what should be attested with each evidence.<sup>655</sup> The appeal must be submitted to the district court but should be addressed to the court of appeal.<sup>656</sup>

viii. A child's action is brought by a deputy due to the fact that a child according to Swedish law lacks legal competence. The deputy works in these standings as a representative of that party and carries out the proceedings in the child's name. What a deputy undertakes in the process is therefore legally binding for the party.<sup>657</sup> In Swedish law the deputy normally is the child's legal guardian or a representative of society.<sup>658</sup> The Swedish Government provides a special representative for child victims under the age of 18 in cases where the parents are accused or may not pursue the child's best interests because of a relationship with the accused.<sup>659</sup>

A prerequisite for a special representative to be appointed is that the crime in question prescribes prison. This means that it is not possible to appoint a special representative in cases where the law only prescribes fines. The suspicion of a crime must also be so strong that there is reason to believe that a preliminary investigation will be initiated, i.e. that there is reason to believe that a crime has been committed.<sup>660</sup>

A special representative shall not be appointed if, having regard to the child, it is to be considered as unnecessary, or if there are other reasons against it.<sup>661</sup> The need for a special representative shall be made in consideration of the age and maturity of the child. If a special representative is ordered, he or she also assumes the guardian's powers in matters relating to the investigation and trial. The special representative may however not prosecute or make a claim for damages without a public prosecution.<sup>662</sup> A special representative may be a lawyer, an associate at a law firm or other.<sup>663</sup> In order to be appointed to the mission as a special representative Act (1999:997) on special representative of the child, §5 paragraph 2, prescribes criteria on knowledge, trial experience and personal qualities. There is an emphasis on the representative's personal qualities and his or her knowledge of the child's vulnerability.<sup>664</sup>

According to act (1988:609) on Counsel for an injured party, a counsel for an injured party shall be appointed for the plaintiff when an investigation has begun. In cases concerning offences under Penal Code chapter 6, a counsel for an injured party shall be appointed, unless it is clear that the plaintiff has no need for such a counsel.<sup>665</sup> Thus, for cases concerning sexual offences there is a strong presumption that the court shall appoint a counsel. A counsel for an injured party may be appointed during a trial as well as during a preliminary investigation.<sup>666</sup> The appointment of a counsel for an injured party is made by the court. It is up to the prosecutor to monitor that the plaintiff has a legal counsel and that a request to the court is made without delay. If the plaintiff and his or her legal guardian have not made a request about a counsel, the issue should be considered by the prosecutor. The Code of Judicial Procedure chapter 23, § 5 paragraph 2 states that it is the responsibility of the prosecutor to draw the court's attention to the need for a counsel. A counsel for an injured party may also be appointed if the plaintiff requests it or if the court acts ex officio.<sup>667</sup>

The general principle in Swedish law is according to Code of Judicial Procedure chapter 5 § 10 that the parties and others who are going to take part in the trial shall turn up in the courtroom or where the session will be held. Code of Judicial Procedure chapter 5, § 10 paragraph 2 prescribes the possibility for a victim to be heard in a courtroom through sound transmission or sound and picture transmission. In assessing whether there are grounds for such participation, the court shall take into consideration the fact that a person who is to take part in a trial can feel fear of being present in the courtroom.<sup>668</sup>

Children are rarely heard directly in court. During normal circumstances, a child will be heard during the preliminary investigation. The interrogation with the child will be videotaped and the interrogation will then be viewed during the main hearing.<sup>669</sup> This is to try and protect the child from exposure to any stress that could follow from attending a main hearing.<sup>670</sup> However, if the child is over the age of 15, it is of general principle that he or she shall be called to the main hearing.<sup>671</sup>

The obligation to witness in Swedish court is absolute. This means that those who are called to testify in a trial are obliged to do so. This general principle is however subject to exceptions. Code of Judicial Procedure chapter 36, § 4 states that those who are under the age of 15 or those of any age suffering from a mental disorder are only obliged to testify if the court finds it to be suitable. In a suitability assessment the court has a right to take into consideration any consequences for the individual person following being submitted to an interrogation, but also in regards of the presumable value of the witness's testimony.<sup>672</sup> The court also has a possibility to decide that a victim or witness may give his or her testimony in the absence of the defendant or the audience, according to Code of Judicial Procedure chapter 36, § 18. Such a decision may be made if the court has reason to believe that the victim or witness is afraid or abstains from telling the truth because of the presence of the defendant or the audience.<sup>673</sup>

The general principle in Swedish law is that a hearing shall be public, which follows from the provision in Code of Judicial Procedure chapter 5, § 1 paragraph 1. If it can be presumed that confidential information may be presented during the main hearing the court can decide to hold the hearing in camera, but only under the condition that it is of the utmost importance that the data will not be disclosed. There must therefore be a particularly strong need for confidentiality in order to deviate from the principle of public access to official records. The implication of the main hearing being held in camera is that only the court and the parties may be in the courtroom. The hearing will consequently be closed to the press.

Code of Judicial Procedure chapter 5, § 1 paragraph 3, also states that an interrogation of a child under the age of 15 may be held in camera.<sup>674</sup>

The Public Access to Information and Security Act (2009:400) chapter 35, § 12 states confidentiality of information about an individual's personal and financial circumstances, if it can be assumed that the individual or someone close to him or her would suffer injury or harm if the information were to be disclosed and the information occurs in a case concerning guilt for sexual offences, human trafficking. Confidentiality is also imposed on the court with regards to information about a child depicted in a pornographic image in the event that it can be assumed that he or she or somebody close to him or her would suffer injury if the information were exposed and the information figures in a case of liability, compensation or description of child pornography.<sup>675</sup>

4 COMPLEMENTARY MEASURES

i. The Government's National Action Plan against Sexual Exploitation of Children states that all professional groups working with children shall be given knowledge on these subjects.<sup>676</sup> The national action plan has, as mentioned above, not been updated since 2007 and an updated version of the action plan has been postponed until sometime in 2012. CRC has in its concluding observations on Sweden expressed a concern about the fact that the national action plan has been postponed.<sup>677</sup>

The judiciary has organized training on issues of child abuse. The goal has been to increase the knowledge around those whose work affects children. The crime victim compensation and support authority has also, between 2007-2009, had a special government mandate to design, and in consultation with the relevant authorities, carry out a training program to improve treatment of sex offenders.<sup>678</sup>

Prosecutor training courses include sections on child abuse and child pornography. The Prosecution Authority has created an additional instruction manual for prosecutors investigating cases involving child abuse. A course focused on child pornography has also been added to prosecution training on IT crimes and evidence collection in IT context.<sup>679</sup>

Within the National Police Authority on trafficking (NPA), the Government has mandated the crime victim compensation and support authority to arrange a training program for the police and prosecution authority, the Swedish courts and the Swedish Migration Board on matters related to prostitution and human trafficking for sexual purposes. The training program is intended to improve knowledge about the underlying mechanisms that affect the incidence of prostitution and human trafficking for sexual purposes and to improve treatment of victims.<sup>680</sup>

Europol also hold an annual training course on combating sexual exploitation of children on the internet for law enforcement officers and the judiciary from EU member states, as well as from other countries. The training aims to share experiences and good practice to develop the participants' knowledge and investigation skills, whilst presenting to them the latest investigation methods and techniques.<sup>681</sup>

The above mentioned courses are however not mandatory.

ECPAT Sweden has conducted training on commercial sexual exploitation of children for police, prosecutors, judges, lawyers and teachers, as well as students of law, tourism, social workers and journalists. However ECPAT Sweden stresses that none of these groups are given compulsory regular training in the field of commercial sexual exploitation of children.<sup>682</sup>

Within sex education, knowledge is given on sex and reproductive health. Sex education also gives an opportunity to address attitudes, norms and values when it comes to sexual contact, gender roles and sexual identity.<sup>685</sup> That information should be provided about the risks of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse is not enacted in any document.<sup>686</sup> According to the Government this does not preclude that these issues may be addressed in the context of the social oriented subjects in school.<sup>687</sup> The current curriculum for 2012, presented by the national agency for education, does however not put specific focus on knowledge about sexual exploitation of children.<sup>688</sup>

ECPAT Sweden has, in a response to the Government's statement on implementation of the Lanzarote Convention, recommended the Government make education about commercial sexual exploitation of children, and the risks connected, a compulsory part of the school curriculum.<sup>689</sup>

Since 2002, the Media Council, Sweden's "Awareness Node", has been participating in the EU project "Safety, Awareness, Facts and Tools (SAFT)", which aims to promote more secure use of the Internet among children and younger people. The Media Council has also produced a brochure entitled "ten tips to parents with surfing children".<sup>690</sup>

The Center for Andrology and Sexual Medicine at the Karolinska University hospital is however only primarily available for residents, when it comes to treatment, in the Stockholm region.<sup>692</sup>

In the report “Rehabilitation efforts targeting individuals who have committed or run the risk of committing sexual offences against children” from 2011, the National Board of Health and Welfare expressed that tried efforts should be further elaborated and be made available for men, women and children who have committed, or run the risk of committing, sexual offences. The National Board of Health and Welfare also emphasized the importance of developing regional centers able to facilitate access for children and younger people to proven treatments closer to their home district.<sup>693</sup>

In March 2012, the Government begun a project called PrevenTell, a helpline for persons with unwanted sexual desires. PrevenTell aims to provide help in time to potential sex offenders. The organization is also addressed to relatives. A person who is worried, experiencing anxiety or has questions relating to their sexual fantasies or acts can turn to PrevenTell by making a duty free and anonymous call. Through the helpline a person can get in contact with nurses, doctors and psychologists. The Centre for Andrology and Sexual medicine is responsible for the organization.<sup>694</sup>

v. A general NGO-helpline for children exists on violence against children through the Children's Rights in Society Helpline. In Sweden the non-profit organization Children's Rights in Society (BRIS) has since 1971 conducted an activity with a helpline where the organization assists vulnerable children with advice and support anonymously for free. The activity now includes the BRIS e-mail and the BRIS chat, and an online discussion forum. The organization is built upon gifts by private as well as official donations.

Since the end of 2010 there is also a broad state-operated helpline for victims of trafficking called safetrip.se. However, the helpline mainly concentrates on helping women rather than children.

ECPAT Sweden has run a web-based hotline since 2005, at www.ecpathotline.se, where the general public can anonymously report cases of the commercial sexual exploitation of children. The information received is sorted out and forwarded to the National Criminal Investigation Department (CID) for investigation. The ECPAT Hotline is an alternative way to report cases and the general public should, in all instances, also contact the police. ECPAT Sweden does not conduct any investigation.<sup>696</sup>

The Swedish Government has not implemented the European Commission's 2007 decision to reserve the number "116000" as the standard "missing and sexually exploited childcare's telephone hotline" in every EU country.<sup>697</sup> There is therefore currently no other available helpline providing specialized assistance to child victims of trafficking in Sweden. The Swedish Government has however stated that there is a plan to begin implementation of the 116000 helpline.<sup>698</sup> CRC noted in 2012 that the helpline still hadn't been implemented and therefore recommended Sweden to take necessary measures to introduce it.<sup>699</sup>

Within the frame of the public domain counseling is given through UMO.<sup>700</sup> UMO is a national youth clinic online for young people between the ages of 13-25. The youth service provides general information and an inquiry service where young people can anonymously ask questions about health, sex and relationships. UMO was introduced in 2009 and the development of the organization is carried out in collaboration with Swedish youth clinics, school health and interest groups as well as others who work with young people.<sup>701</sup>

Throughout the country there are also young women and men empowerment centers. There are currently about 60 young woman's empowerment centers in Sweden. These centers are non-profit organizations aiming to give support and strength to young women. Anyone who identifies themselves as a young woman can turn to an empowerment center with any thought or issue. The people working at the centers are not professional psychiatrists or experts but they can listen, encourage and give advice on where to turn when, for example to file a report.<sup>702</sup>

vi) Sweden currently has a number of public bodies, set up in their respective business areas, responsible for protecting and assisting victims of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse. These bodies mainly include social and health care services. According to the Social Service Act the residence municipality always has the ultimate responsibility that those who reside in the municipality receive the support and help they need.<sup>703</sup>

The Social Service Act (2001:453) chapter 5, § 11 states that the Social Services Committee is responsible for care of crime victims and their relatives. The Government has determined that Sweden fulfills article 39 of Convention on the Rights of the Child, which states that a child victim of any form of neglect, exploitation, or abuse (...) has a right to rehabilitation and reintegration, by referring to chapter 5, § 11 of the Social Service Act.<sup>704</sup> The treatments of children who have been victims occur mainly within the children and youth psychiatry. There are currently only two official clinics in the country that specialize in sexual abuse, child psychiatry Elephant in Linköping and BUP Vasa in Stockholm. These clinics can offer different treatment methods, for example group therapy and individual counseling.<sup>705</sup>

However, a child that has suffered trauma is not given an unconditional right to treatment in Sweden.<sup>706</sup> In order for a child to receive help it is required that he or she exhibit a serious symptom and that the child and its parents are motivated to treatment and make initial contact.<sup>707</sup> It was therefore stated in SOU 2004:71 "Sexual exploitation of children in Sweden" that BUP is not an ideal solution for treatment of a child.<sup>708</sup>

The County Administrative Board in Stockholm (CABS) has, through the Governments mandate, been assigned to coordinate and develop activities in order to secure a safe return for victims of sexual exploitation to their home country.<sup>709</sup> The ambition has been to offer more comprehensive support and assistance for a return than just paying for a ticket to the home country.<sup>710</sup> With the ambitions to develop a national safe return program, CABS has initiated collaboration with the NGO International Organization for Migration in Helsinki.<sup>711</sup> This pilot project was launched in August 2012 and is intended to be a 14 month long project.<sup>712</sup> The project will be focusing on supporting Swedish authorities in providing return counseling to the target group, empower the projects beneficiaries to take an informed decision on voluntary return, and to help organizing approximately 15 assisted voluntary returns followed by individually tailored reintegration support and monitoring.<sup>713</sup>

ECPAT Sweden has, in their global monitoring of Sweden, highlighted that the access to appropriate recovery and reintegration service for child victims of trafficking is hampered by the lack of cooperation, coordination, knowledge and clear division of responsibilities between various organizations working on the issue.<sup>714</sup> They also stressed the lack of child perspective in the guidelines.<sup>715</sup> The CRC, in the "Concluding observations of 2011 on Sweden's implementation of the OPSC", also expressed a concern that foreign children are not receiving

In Sweden there are currently no intervention programs for children who have been exposed to sexual exploitation.

In 2011, new provisions were included in the Social Service Act to further strengthen protection of children.<sup>717</sup> It is stated that the child should receive the relevant information, and that his or her attitude shall be mapped as far as possible. Consideration should also be made to the child's wishes with consideration of the child's age and maturity.<sup>718</sup>

III NATIONAL POLICY REGARDING CHILDREN

i) There is a political discussion regarding incorporation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child in Sweden. In 1990 the Convention was ratified by Sweden without any dissents.<sup>719</sup> Sweden has chosen to use a transformation method to change and adopt the Swedish legislation to the Convention, but it has currently not been incorporated into Swedish law.<sup>720</sup> However the government has recently decided to make an inquiry about making the Convention on the Rights of the Child Swedish law. There is still an uncertainty if Moderaterna, one of the parties in the government, wants to make the Convention part of Swedish legislation or not. Moderaterna's previous counterargument has been that the rights of children are not necessarily straightening by making the Convention law. There is one party, Sverige Demokraterna, who doesn't want the Convention part of the legislation, but three parties in the government and three parties in the opposition want the Convention on the Rights of the Child part of the Swedish law system.<sup>721</sup>

In 2010 the parliament adopted a strategy to strengthen children's rights in Sweden.<sup>722</sup> In the strategy the Government suggests a few proposals on how to strengthen children's rights in Sweden. The Government states, among other things, that all legislation concerning children shall be designed in accordance with the Convention.<sup>723</sup> Children should, for example, be aware of their rights and how these can be applied in practice. The Government also want to ensure children and young people the possibility to express their views in matters concerning him or herself. The current knowledge about children's living conditions should be the foundation for the decisions and priorities concerning children. The aim of the strategy is to strengthen children's rights in all areas and activities at the Governmental and municipal level.<sup>724</sup>

ii. ECPAT is a non-Governmental organisation that, among other things, conducts campaigns to raise public awareness about issues concerning sexual exploitation of children. There has been an international campaign called "Stop Sex Trafficking of Children and Young People" which ECPAT Sweden conducted together with the company The Body Shop. ECPAT is collecting knowledge and producing information materials about commercial sexual exploitation of children, both domestically and internationally. ECPAT Sweden initiated both the blocking collaboration with the ISPs and the Swedish Financial Coalition. Their main focus is on the commercial aspects of the global exploitation of children.<sup>725</sup>

In the National Action Plan against Sexual Exploitation of Children, the Government's vision is expressed that no child in Sweden shall be subjected to sexual exploitation.<sup>726</sup> It is also stated that no child in any other country shall be exposed to sexual exploitation by a person from Sweden.<sup>727</sup> Children who still suffer from sexual exploitation shall get the help they need.<sup>728</sup> Sweden will also contribute to an effective international cooperation regarding this issue.<sup>729</sup> However, the national action plan has not been updated since 2009.

The Minister of Justice, Beatrice Ask, and the Minister for Children and Elderly, Maria Larsson, arranged a seminar in May 2012 for authorities and organisations about child pornography and sexual exploitation of children. The seminar was held to raise awareness about the issue, before a follow-up and a review on the current national action plan.<sup>730</sup> Nevertheless, the CRC has in its concluding observations called upon the state party to increase and improve the awareness-raising measures.<sup>731</sup>

iii. The responsible agency for official crime statistics in Sweden is The National Council for Crime Prevention. In Sweden there is lack of data regarding almost all forms of sexual exploitation of children. Not only does the lack of data make the analysis of the statistic difficult, various experts, for instance the Faculty of Law at Stockholm University, has, as recently as 2011, pointed out that it is not possible to follow a case from reporting or notification to verdict.<sup>732</sup> The lack of a comprehensive system for data collection has also been a concern of CRC who, in their 2011 concluding observation of Sweden, recommended Sweden to further develop and centralize mechanisms for systematic data collection.<sup>733</sup> They also recommended Sweden to establish a coordinated system of data.<sup>734</sup>

Concerning pornography offences, 125 Swedish children were identified in Interpol's database of abusive pictures in 2009, according to information by the Swedish Government. From year 2006 to 2008, statistics provided by the Swedish National Council for Crime Prevention (BRÅ) indicated that more than 1,000 cases of child pornography were reported. During 2006 and 2007 there were in total 132 convictions. The estimated conviction rate during the period 2001 – 2005 is 15 % and consists of about 70 convictions per year. In 2010 there were 390 reported offences of child pornography in Sweden.<sup>735</sup>

In a Swedish Government Official Report<sup>736</sup> 303 verdicts of child pornography were analysed during the years 2001 to 2005. The defendants were, in about 50 % of the verdicts, sentenced for other offences as well as child pornography. Two thirds of these defendants were sentenced for sexual offences against children.<sup>737</sup>

iv. In 2011, the Ministry of Health and Social Affairs conducted a campaign called “Titta inte bort” (Don’t look away) highlighting sexual offences against children. The message of the campaign was spread through a film, which was shown in Scandinavia’s airports during the winter of 2011. The campaign was run in collaboration with the Swedish Police and ECPAT.<sup>740</sup>

ECPAT and The Body Shop had a common campaign called “Stop Sex Trafficking of Children & Young People” which was part of an international campaign. In June 2011, 325590 signatures were handed over to the Minister of Justice, Beatrice Ask, with demands for improvement in the Swedish commitment against child trafficking for sexual purposes.<sup>741</sup> The Committee on the Rights of the Child has also called upon the state party to increase and improve its awareness-raising measures, including campaigns.<sup>742</sup>

v. The legislative process in Sweden starts with an initiative from the Government, a political party, interest organisation, authority or a citizen.<sup>743</sup> The Government thereafter makes a decision on the directives for an appointed investigation. The Government’s official review then goes on circulation for comments from authorities and organisations, after which a proposal is prepared by the relevant ministry, and then the Council on Legislation review the proposal. The Government subsequently hand over the Government bill to the Parliament. The Government bill, and possible motions from the oppositional parties, is processed in the parliament's committees. The parliament then makes a decision and if the legislative proposal is approved the Government pronounce the law.<sup>744</sup>

In the Government has also declared the importance of making the whole legislative process characterized by a child rights and child's perspective, from the directive for the investigation to the final decision-making in the parliament.<sup>745</sup>

In the design of all relevant legislation and regulations the basic principles of the Convention on the Rights of the Child shall be respected, regardless of the area.<sup>746</sup>

The circulation for comments is an important part of the legislative process and involves both authorities and the civil society. The Ombudsman for Children has the responsibility to pay attention to laws and regulations and make sure that the adjudication is comported with the Convention. The Ombudsman for Children can make proposes for constitutional changes and other essential measures.

vi. There are many NGOs working for children's rights in Sweden. Some of the main contributors in this field are Save the Children Sweden,<sup>747</sup> UNICEF Sweden,<sup>748</sup> ECPAT Sweden<sup>749</sup> and Plan Sweden<sup>750</sup>, who are all working both nationally and internationally, and BRIS who is working only on a nation level.<sup>751</sup>

That the Government has stressed the importance of allowing authorities, NGOs and other actors to contribute with their opinions in the political decision-making process is acknowledged.<sup>752</sup> The circulation for comments has its base in the constitutional law's "beredningskrav" (demand for drafting) which is stated in chapter 7 paragraph 2 Instrument of Government. The aim of the circulation for comments is to foresee as many of the consequences as possible, if a proposal was to be approved. In the same time the circulation for comments is a way to encourage participation of citizens in public debates. It's not mandatory for NGO's to give responses to the submissions for comment but they can be invited to do so. If an organisation hasn't been given an invitation to leave their comments they still have the opportunity to do so, this is called "spontanytttrande" (spontaneous comment). <sup>753</sup>

IV OTHER

What is the expressed legal protection of asylum-seeking children in Sweden?

Sweden has ratified the UN Convention on the Rights of a Child and its Optional Protocol on the Sale of Children, Child Pornography and Child Prostitution and is therefore obliged to protect all children regardless of their legal status in the country. <sup>754</sup> However, Sweden has received a lot of criticism from the Ombudsman for Children and the Committee on the Rights of the Child. The criticism from the Committee concerns the implementation of the Optional Protocol into the Swedish legislation.

Every year, an alarmingly high rate of asylum-seeking children disappears without ever being found. Between June and January 2010, the Migration Board recorded 660 asylum-seeking children as missing. In June, 494 children were missing of which 118 were unaccompanied refugee children. <sup>755</sup> The Ombudsman believes that many of these children are still in Sweden and considers it likely that many of those are in danger of becoming victims of sexual exploitation. <sup>756</sup>

Beside the Ombudsman for Children, Sweden has also been criticized by the Committee which shows concerns about the lack of protection that Sweden gives to unaccompanied asylum-seeking minors and children of irregular immigrants or undocumented children. The Committee's concern is not unaccounted. Especially unaccompanied asylum-seekers have a risk of being exploited for sexual purposes. It is also known that several boys were exploited in a refugee camp in 2003 by perpetrators who used their vulnerability.<sup>757</sup>

There is also an existing problem concerning cooperation between the Migration Board and the Social Services Committee regarding the protection of unaccompanied asylum seeking children. None of these have the main responsibility for these children which leads to them not having the full protection they are in need of.<sup>758</sup> Therefore, CRC encourages Sweden to improve protection for children in an unaccompanied asylum-seeking or migration situation, including by increasing control of the persons into whose care the child is put.<sup>759</sup> CRC also underlines the importance of residence permit for children who have been trafficked into Sweden.<sup>760</sup>

The issue of trafficked children who are smuggled into the country with look-alike passports is considerable in Sweden. It often happens that a person travels alone from Sweden and comes back with a child, claiming to be the parent. There is a case where a woman was stopped when she wanted to come to Europe with six children and none of them were hers.

Foreign children are not receiving assistance and protection services with the same quality standards as for children from Sweden. Above are some of the reasons why Sweden has been recommended to ensure that child victims, especially those of foreign origin, are provided with appropriate assistance. This includes social reintegration as well as physical and psychological recovery.<sup>762</sup>

Sources on the subject of legal status of children in Sweden can be dated back to the 16th century. By following the development on the subject of corporal punishment and abuse of children, by parents, teachers, magistrates et al. over the centuries an order appear where the child – contrary to as we now know it; its rights to respect for its individuality, physical and mental integrity, codetermination etc. being acknowledged, protected and promoted – has been deemed an object merely of the parental responsibility to properly raise. Today, the tone has changed insofar the vast majority of parents no longer consider the corporal punishment an infeasible parenting tool and the perspective has also shifted in the sense that children no longer solely are considered a parental responsibility and a parental obligation to make every effort possible to look after, but a separate legal entity with a claim to be respected.

When glancing at the national legislation of today, a different image than the one above appears: although the Instrument of Government does not mention children as a group, vast legislative changes have been carried out due to the Swedish accession to the 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child and its Optional Protocols. It can also be said that dualistic traditions through adaptations of law obligate Sweden to fully obey the principle on the child's best interests and in a legally secure manner ensure every individual child its rights. To try to guarantee children their rights, such as those codified in the Convention, Sweden seek to ensure their full national impact through transformation. The state's largest problem has been identified in terms of meeting the Conventional standards in practice, in every application of laws onto a actual case, not only by upholding a formal legal protection in the enactment of law.

That being said: the State itself considers that an overall accurate adaptation of internal legislation has been ensured in order to comply with the Conventional provisions. Although, there are articles of the Convention that still awaits transformation. Transformation at large has, furthermore, by UNICEF Sweden, Save the Children, the CRC, a majority of the political parties et. al., been deemed an unsatisfying method as the legislation is considered not meet the challenges in safeguarding child's rights in e.g. the legal process, on the school ground, while in contact with social authorities or at home etc. Recently in 2012 there has been decided upon an inquiry to investigate the possibility of giving the Convention legal status as law.

Further legislative work has been carried out following the Swedish approval and ratification of the Convention's Optional Protocol on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography in 2006. The sexual activities hereby referred to are today covered by the Penal legislation on sexual crime since its revision was carried out in 2005 and the extension of the term sexual activities was achieved. During the revision of the sexual offences legislation in Chapter 6 of the Penal Code in 2005, the term sexual intercourse was rephrased to “sexual activities”. With the substitution an extension and further application of the concept was denoted so that not only regular intercourse or penetrative acts would fall within the punishable area, but also other equally intrusive acts of pronounced sexual nature. For any of the crimes of the Penal Code chapter 6, intention is required for criminal liability unless otherwise is stated.

The legal age for engaging in sexual activities is 15 years, a far from absolute limit which can be stretched due to a special discard rule applicable if the child is far gone into its maturity process, insofar a sexually self-determined child engaging in sexual activities with a 14-year-old is committing a crime, sexual exploitation of a minor, which is considered less grave than rape of a child. The formal legal age has also proved to be just formal when a child close to turning 15 had been bought to perform sexual acts with a number of grown men; the latter being sentenced for sexual exploitation of a child.

It is noteworthy that it is not imposed for the crime rape of child prerequisites, equivalent to the rape offense for adults, which requires that the offense is committed under duress, threat or use of force. At the commissioning of these crimes it is presumed to be an issue of abuse of power and ruthlessness, which weighs as heavy as the requirement for violent or formulation of an advanced threat at the rape offense. Furthermore it should be added that it is irrelevant for the question of criminal liability whether or not the child was coerced, exploited, taking advantage of, exposed of violence or, on the other hand, engaged consensually and voluntarily in the act. The Penal Code legislation on sexual offences also occupies rules about sexual intercourse between biologically related persons, such as parents, children and siblings, as well as exploitation of a person in a position of dependence (intended for cases when school or pre-school personnel et al. are abusing their authorities.

In Sweden, there is a discussion going on about the ratification of the Lanzarote Convention, in which it is claimed from the Government that it strives to get the internal legislation to conform to the Convention before ratifying the latter. An example of a successful such attempt to create conformity is that the Conventional requirements now are met with regards to specific requisites of the offense purchase of sexual act from a child. Swedish criminal code similarly admits provisions on trafficking, unlawful coercion and pimping in conformity with the Council of Europe Convention on action on human trafficking, which was ratified in 2010. Regarding child pornography Sweden has ratified the Optional protocol to the Convention, on the Rights of the Child, the Sale of Children Child Prostitution and Child Pornography. Furthermore it is being discussed whether the Convention on Cybercrime of 2001 should be ratified by Sweden; in 2011 was latest summoned an investigation to identify necessary legislative changes for Sweden to meet its requirements. While awaiting the report, the offences punishable as child pornography under contemporary national law are the depiction of a child in a pornographic image, distribution, display, offering to sell, acquiring etc. of the same. The act of so called “grooming”, that is to take action (often initiated through the use of internet) towards a physical meeting with a child in order to fulfill a sexual purpose, is likewise criminalized under the penal Code chapter 6. The sentencing formally following above mentioned crimes vary from being punishable by a fine to ten years imprisonment (aggravated rape of a child). The authors consider however, as has been pointed out by the CRC, that the actual sanctions is not proportionate to the real damage. There ought not be a fine in the range of punishment for the crime of sexually exploiting a child, further on a purchase of sexual acts from a child should not be regarded a less serious sexual offence against children. As has been pointed out by both the CRC and the Children’s Ombudsmen the requirement of double criminality should thereto be abolished in order to enable Swedish authorities to prosecute a perpetrator that has bought a sexual act from a minor in another country.

If we leave the legislature and the crime investigating authorities' activities, and attend to a greater perspective on how the impact of children's rights generally is guaranteed in various sectors of society through complementary measures it can, in summary, be said that this offers a colorful view. For example, the judiciary has organized trainings on child abuse and child pornography, courses on the latter has been introduced, instruction manuals has been created and provided to prosecutors investigating child abuse and the crime victim compensation fund has carried out a training program for the improved treatment of sex offenders. ECPAT Sweden concludes though that none of the groups police, prosecutors, judges, lawyers, teachers, students of law et al are given compulsory training on the topic commercial sexual exploitation of children, in all its various expressions.

On the school area sex education knowledge is provided on sex and reproductive health in order to address attitudes and norms towards certain sexual conduct, sexual contacts and sexual identities; although lacking in providing relevant information about the risks of being sexually exploited and abused. ECPAT Sweden has recommended the Government to make education on these topics compulsory parts of the school curriculum.

Finally, with regards to the curative and preventive work there has been established help lines in PrevenTell and the Children's Rights in Society helpline as well as the ECPAT hotline, aiming at, on the one hand, provide help to prospective sex offenders in time, on the other hand provide a channel for children experiencing violence in home, and on the third hand enable the public to report suspected cases of commercial sexual exploitation of children. Further on, considering for example in the Stockholm area at the Karolinska university hospital where projects are running assisting "sexually addicted" individuals, it can be concluded that the rehabilitation efforts made, targeting individuals that has committed or are risking to commit sexual offences against children, by necessity must be developed and made available.

Final word

For approximately 1,5 year ago I was introduced to the main outlines for the project "ELSA for Children". I immediately felt that this was a great opportunity for the ELSA network to work in a concrete way in line with our vision "A just world in which there is respect for human dignity and cultural diversity" at the same time as we could make a contribution in the way towards enlightening the complex issues regarding sexual abuse against children in different contexts.

From the start I was completely convinced that I would find qualified national researchers for the project, however I could never imagine the engagement I would find in the persons I chose to conduct the research. They have made an impressive and amazing effort to create a complete report of high quality.

We have not only received support and good advices that has been absolutely necessary for us to be able to achieve our academic ambitions from our Academic Advisor, Amanda Bertilsdotter Nilsson, ECPAT, she has also been a great source of inspiration for our research group.

We have also received some external help regarding the language from Kirsten Sandberg, professor in law at Oslo University, and Lee Dobson that we are very grateful for.

I INTRODUCTION

1 GENERAL

Aim: This introductory section will be a general overview on the status of the internal protection of the subjects of our research. It is very important that you give official credits of your statements, to grant the objectivity of this general part. When you will describe the implementation of international and European instruments, it's important that you cite name and number of the main legislative acts; in this way, readers will have precise references of the legal basis that sustain also the following answers.

Equal Rights

i. Are there discrimination problems regarding sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth, sexual orientation, state of health, disability or other status of men and women? Please quote official reports from National or International Institutions, reports from the main NGOs that are active in the country and/or Journalistic inquiries.

“The ETC (Equal Treatment Commission) is concerned because Muslim women looking for jobs or internships may suffer from discrimination due to the fact that some private and public sector organisations ban headscarves in the workplace.”<sup>1</sup>

“The Netherlands Institute for Social Research (SCP) has extensively researched<sup>39</sup> the scope and causes<sup>40</sup> of discrimination based on race and ethnic origin in recruitment and selection procedures.

Even when candidates' qualifications and motivation are equal, employers tend to base their choice of applicant on their own biases regarding ethnic origin.”<sup>2</sup>

“Women in the Netherlands structurally earn less than men, even after correction for factors such as age and job level.”<sup>3</sup>

Family Protection

ii. What is the definition given to the term “family” in your national legislation or Constitution? What is the status of marriage? What is the average marital age of the population? Please quote official reports/statistics from National or International Institutions or official statistics from Private Institutions or NGOs.

The traditional Dutch family is still consisting of a mother, a father and two children. The family ties are looking more like ties with friends.<sup>4</sup>

Non-traditional families like gay families consisting of two mothers or two fathers are been accepted more and more but it is still an issue in mostly rural areas.<sup>5</sup>

It is often thought that the family has lost ground in western society and has given way to other social ties, such as friends, colleagues and associations. Some say that families today are as disjointed to describe and they are possible causes of the changing labour market and the welfare state. The industrial age brought with it the social and geographical mobility of individuals. This can hinder maintaining family ties. The welfare state made it possible for people who cannot take care of themselves to be independent of their families and hire professional help.

Child Protection

iii. What is the general status of children within the respective States’ cultural and historical background? What is the general approach to children rights issues in the respective state? Is there a general concern regarding children/children rights? Were there/are there any violations that has been caught the eye of the media or the legislators?

Parents are primarily responsible for the upbringing of their children. Problems must, as far as possible, be solved with support from their own environment. Most parents and children succeed in this well. But if children are in need of care, this must be adequately and timely delivered through the Centres for Youth and Families and other care facilities for youth. The role of government is to protect children from any form of discrimination and maltreatment by parents or others. The Netherlands have an Ombudsman for the Children. There is in the national and local government's policies always a policy regarding to children but this is not very specific sometimes.

About the media & children:

The public broadcaster must legally serve all groups in society, including children and young people. Since 2000, children have their own television channel within the public broadcasting. On the general channels of the public broadcaster there is since 2005 Zappelin for children aged two to six years and Z @ PP for the older children from six to twelve years. Z @ PP and Zappelin transmit daily from 7:00 to 19:30 from. Zappelin / Z @ PP broadcasts are also available 24 hours a day on the same digital theme channel.

Z @ PP and Zappelin each have their own website, with the aim of children in a stimulating way to engage with the program's using the transmitter offered. Children can find there games, news, information and videos of the associated programs. The websites have taken into account the online safety of children.

Children have also a wide range of educational and informative programs, including private daily news, the Youth News, which on schooldays broadcasts even two times. The partnership of the public broadcaster, the Dutch Broadcasting Foundation, is legally obliged to this special news for children. The children's public broadcaster is of high quality, which is demonstrated by the fact that it regularly wins international prizes.

iv. International obligations: What is the relevant legislation regarding the implementation of international treaties? What is the relationship between State law and international treaties (dualistic or monistic approach)? What is the date of ratification of United Nations Convention on Rights of the Child? Did the State make any reservations to the Convention? What is the general status of implementation?

Normally The Netherlands are very internationally orientated and are signatory parties to many treaties. The Netherlands have a monistic approach between State law and international treaties. The Convention was ratified 6 Feb 1995, there we no reservations by The Netherlands. It is fully implemented.

To elaborate a bit more:

UN Convention

The UN Convention has existed since 1989 and is about everything that kids may face from birth until the eighteenth birthday. According to the CRC, the government should take all possible measures to combat sexual exploitation of children and prevention. The UN Convention was signed by 193 countries (all UN member countries except the USA and Somalia). In the Netherlands, the CRC since 1995. Article 34 and 35 deal specifically with the protection of children against sexual abuse, sexual exploitation and trafficking.

Article 34

The child is entitled to protection from sexual exploitation and sexual abuse. The government should take measures to prevent child prostitution and child pornography. These purposes, States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to prevent:

- A child inducement or coercion to engage in any unlawful sexual activity;
- Exploitative use of children in prostitution or other unlawful sexual practices;
- Exploitative use of children in pornographic performances and materials.

Relationship with other Articles of the CRC

Article 34 and 35 of the UN Convention are closely related to the other articles that focus on the protection of children against exploitation, including economic exploitation (Article 32) and other forms of exploitation (Article 36). Article 34 should also be seen in relation with Article 19 and Article 39 of the UN Convention. Article 19 is much wider and determines that the child's right to protection from all forms of abuse and neglect, including sexual exploitation and abuse. Article 39 deals specifically with the right to special care for children who are victims of exploitation or abuse.

Optional Protocol on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography

The Optional Protocol is part of the UN Convention and is intended to make the text of Article 34 and 35 to tighten. Like the CRC calls the Optional Protocol to the countries party to the banning of the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography. The Optional Protocol is much more extensive and thus provides for improvements in detection and prosecution and child-friendly legal procedures. It also draws attention to the disproportionate number of girls who are victims of sexual exploitation.

The Netherlands has signed on 23 August 2005 the Optional Protocol on the sexual exploitation of children.<sup>6</sup> It has ratified it on 23 August 2005.

v. European Obligations: If the State is an EU Member, what is the general implementation process of the Directive 2011/92/EU of the European Parliament and the European Council of 13 December 2011? Please cite the internal legal instruments of the implementation.

On the 15 of November 2011 this Directive was implemented.

The following text is directly from the Dutch translation of the Directive. We found it so valuable and so important that we will mention it here as a quote:

“Sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children are particularly serious crimes, as they are directed against children, who are entitled to special protection and care. They cause long-term physical, psychological and social harm and existence of such practices is an attack on the core values of a modern society relating to the special protection of children and the trust in relevant State institutions. Although accurate and reliable statistics are lacking, research indicates that a significant minority of children in Europe may be sexually abused during their childhood, and that such abuse over the years is not decreasing, but rather that certain forms of sexual violence are increasing. In general, the policy of the Union in this field, in accordance with Article 29 of the Treaty on European Union, aimed at preventing and combating offenses against children, including sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of kids. This should be done by the third pillar a more coherent framework for the combat these crimes and their effectiveness increase. Specific objectives would be to effectively prosecute the crime, the protection of the rights of victims, prevention of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse of children and the introduction of effective monitoring systems.”<sup>7</sup>

2 THE LANZAROTE CONVENTION

Aim: To give general overview on the implementation of this legal instrument in the internal protection of this subjects. Answers should be precise and detailed, as required before, to grants objectivity.

vi. When did the State ratify the European Convention on Human Rights?

http://www.eerstekamer.nl/eu/europeesvoorstel/com\_2009\_135\_gedrukt\_als\_kamerstuk/document/f=/vi3pc0btjxnr.pdf

On 31-8-1954.

When the Netherlands on 4 November 1950 signed the Convention, and by the means of ratification on 31 August 1954 it entered into force for the Netherlands. The Dutch didn't know that the treaty would play such a significant role to play. Although the government was not entirely reassured and during the negotiations - largely unsuccessfully - had sought the text of the treaty to weaken, it was assumed that the ECHR had no practical significance and would not have that for the Netherlands. However, it seemed unbelievable that the Netherlands human rights violations would occur and they saw the treaty therefore especially as a clear statement against the totalitarian countries in Europe where the guarantee of rights and freedoms would not have applied.

Until well into the seventies of the last century it was estimated that the ECHR had no role in The Netherlands, although in the literature the attention increased and it also highlighted the potential significance of the treaty for the further development of human rights in The Netherlands.

Also in Dutch administrative law, the ECHR has in the last twenty years played an increasingly important role, focusing is assumed to meaning of Article 6 of the Convention for the establishment of the administrative judicial protection. In the literature - even in the administrative manuals - this procedural influence of Article 6 is widely discussed. Thereby we could include issues such as the independence and impartiality of the administrative court, the reasonable period, the obligation to state reasons for a decision of the court, the assessment by the court of an expert report, etc.

vii. Is the state a party to the Lanzarote Convention? Date of signature and ratification? Did the country make any reservations to the Convention/opt out of any parts?

Yes, signature 25-10-2007 and ratification was on 1-3-2010. No reservations or opt outs.

Since January 2010, the Netherlands amended its legislation and thus the Lanzarote Convention ratified. The amendment is 'grooming' punishable under Article 248th Sr. Under 'grooming' is defined by an adult on internet sites actively approach and seduction of minors with the ultimate goal of committing sexual abuse with minors. By this provision this person can be prosecuted once he makes a proposal for a meeting with the child. The penalty for this is up to two years imprisonment or a fine of the fourth category of the Dutch Penal Code.<sup>8</sup>

v. What is the rank of the Lanzarote Convention under your national legal order? Is there a legislation regarding its implementation? If so, indicate the source and if available, an English translation.

There is national legislation for the implementation of the Convention. National criminal law has been changed at some points to be able comply with all the requirements set by the Convention.

vi. Does this legislation address all the issues within the Lanzarote Convention?

Yes.

II NATIONAL LEGISLATION

1 GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE JURISDICTION

Aim: This section is important to frame the juridical system of the Country that is the object of the research. It's important to understand how the legislation is implemented and how victims of violations can be protected.

i. Please give us a brief history of the respective State and the governmental regime (Federal State/Central government?)

The Netherlands have a central government. The term central government stands for the collective name of the ministries, a large number of implementing organizations, the inspectorates and the High Councils of State.

In the Netherlands, the government consists of the central government and three other tiers: provinces, municipalities and water authorities. The central government operates at the national level while the other tiers operate at a regional respectively a local level.

Each ministry is headed by a minister, often with the support of one or more state secretaries. There are also ministers without a portfolio, this means who are not in charge of a ministry, but who still fall under one of the ministries. An example is the ‘Development Cooperation’, which is part of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

The ministries are responsible for a large number of civil service agencies and implementing organizations. These include:

- the Tax and Customs Administration, which is responsible for the collection of taxes and social insurance contribution
- the Custodial Institutions Agency, whose responsibilities include implementing prison sentences.

The central government also has a number of inspectorates. These include, but are not limited to:

- the Education Inspectorate;
- the Healthcare Inspectorate;
- the Transport and Water Management Inspectorate.

The High Councils of State monitor and advise the central government bodies. The Constitution states that the Councils must be independent and autonomous. They include:

- the Senate and the House of Representatives (Parliament);
- the Council of State;
- the Netherlands Court of Audit;
- the National Ombudsman.

The Kingdom of the Netherlands was recently political restructured. It concerns the former Netherlands Antilles, consisting of the islands Curacao, Sint Maarten, Bonaire, Sint Eustatius and Saba. The use of referenda showed that all islands, except for one, no longer wanted to be part of the Netherlands Antilles, without detracting the relations with the Kingdom.

The Netherlands Antilles ceased to exist on 10 October 2010. The new structure entails that Curacao and Sint Maarten gained a similar status as Aruba. Aruba contains the status of country within the Kingdom and has this status since 1986.

From 10 October 2010 the Kingdom consists of four, instead of three equivalent countries, the Netherlands, Aruba, Curacao and Sint Maarten. The countries hold a high degree of internal autonomy.

The three remaining islands, Bonaire, Sint Eustatius and Saba, have chosen for a direct relation with the Netherlands and form the “Caribbean part of the Netherlands”. They gain the status of a public entity as stated in Article 134 of the Dutch Constitution. This status is similar to the status of the Dutch municipalities with certain modifications. The Dutch-Antillean legislation is for the time being still applicable in the public entities.

The countries themselves are responsible for the implementation of obligations deriving from international treaties. The Dutch government assists the other countries within the Kingdom in the field of children’s rights amongst other by way of cooperation programs.<sup>9</sup>

ii. About the general approach of the National legislation to Human Rights, how does the State legislate Human Rights? Is there a “Bill of Rights” within the respective country or are human rights mentioned in the Constitution as fundamental principles? When was this Constitution/Bill of Rights created? Are there any specific provisions regarding Children Rights?

There is no Bill of Rights in the Netherlands. Human rights are codified in the Dutch Constitution. The present Constitution is generally seen as directly derived from the one issued in 1815, constituting a constitutional monarchy. A revision in 1848 instituted a system of parliamentary democracy. In 1983 the Dutch constitution was largely rewritten. The text is very sober, devoid of legal or political doctrine. It includes a bill of rights. Another important aspect is the fact that laws and treaties cannot be tested against the constitution. There are no specific provisions regarding children rights within the Dutch Constitution.<sup>10</sup>

With regard to the question how human rights are legislated, a closer look is needed at Articles 93 and 94 of the Dutch Constitution. This will be dealt with in the upcoming questions. Therefore, a reference to p. 4 - 6 of this document is sufficient.

iii. Are there specific judicial bodies which monitor the implementation of international and national human rights instruments (for example Constitutional Courts etc.)? Can individuals claim their constitutional rights directly (e.g. direct effect)? Is there a Constitutional Court? Is it possible to apply individually? If not, how can the individuals claim their constitutional rights in case of violation? Is there a system of hierarchy or other jurisdictions to ask before being able to go before Constitutional/Supreme Court? Please, briefly describe the application process.

The monitoring of implementation of international and national human rights instruments is conducted by several institutions. The courts are entrusted with these tasks, next to the Ombudsman and the Child Ombudsman. Recently, the College for Human Rights was established which is also responsible for the monitoring of the implementation of (inter)national human rights instruments. An outline of all these institutions will be given starting with the Child Ombudsman, followed by the College of Human Rights and to conclude with the Youth Monitor.

□ Child Ombudsman

Since 1 April 2011 the Netherlands have a Child Ombudsman. This is a new, nationwide functioning and independent institution which monitors the compliance of the children rights. Marc Dullaert is the first Child Ombudsman inaugurated by the Parliament.

The Child Ombudsman advises the Parliament and the government and has the task to make adults, children and the youth aware about children rights. His main working area is not limited to the government, but also includes the youth care, education, child care and health care. His tasks are covered in the Law Child Ombudsman.<sup>11</sup>

□ College of Human Rights

The Netherlands have a national human rights institution since 2012. In November 2011, the Senate approved the law which established this institution. The College of Human Rights is independent and is established in accordance with the Paris Principles.

The aims of this College are to protect human rights in the Netherlands, to raise awareness about human rights and to enhance compliance with human rights. This is achieved by conducting investigations, reporting about the human rights situations in the Netherlands by a long-term collaboration with civil society actors and national, European and other international institutions entrusted with the protection of human rights.<sup>12</sup>

The Youth Monitor is created to inform policymakers, researchers and other interested persons about the situation of the youth. The monitor contains indications and publications about the youth (0-25 years). Het Centraal Bureau voor de Statistiek (Statistics Netherlands) created this monitor in collaboration with the Ministerie of Volksgezondheid Welzijn en Sport (Ministry of Health, Wellbeing and Sports). This Youth Monitor does not contain any information about sexual abuse or human trafficking. However, the Youth Monitor does contain statistics about child abuse and youth care.<sup>13</sup>

With regard to the question whether constitutional rights can be enforced by a Constitutional Court, the following remarks should be taken into account. The Netherlands do not have a Constitutional Court. So, constitutional rights cannot be invoked directly for a Constitutional Court. However, constitutional rights can be invoked for every other judge (civil, criminal, administrative) based on Article 93 of the Dutch Constitution which states:

“Provisions of treaties and of resolutions by international institutions which may be binding on all persons by virtue of their contents shall become binding after they have been published.”

Article 94 of the Dutch Constitution states:

“Statutory regulations in force within the Kingdom shall not be applicable if such application is in conflict with provisions of treaties that are binding on all persons or of resolutions by international institutions.”

This means that every provision from a treaty or resolution is binding by virtue of their contents with the consequence that these provisions may be directly invoked (in other words, they have direct effect) before the national courts.

The concept of direct effect of international law within the Dutch legal order is relevant for the question how the Netherlands legislate human rights as well as how individuals can claim their constitutional rights in case of a violation.

The starting point is that binding international law automatically has direct effect in the Dutch legal order. This means that the legislator, the judges and the executive bodies are obliged to apply these rights. With regard to the question how citizens can invoke these rights, Articles 93 and 94 of the Dutch Constitution are relevant as mentioned before. These articles contain rules with regard to the supremacy and direct effect of these international rules.

First of all, Art. 93 speaks of ‘provisions of treaties and of resolutions by international institutions which may be binding on all persons by virtue of their contents’ rather than ‘direct effect’. The question whether such provision may be binding on all persons by virtue of their contents must be answered by the judge.

According to settled case law of the Dutch Supreme Court the judge takes the following point in consideration in order to answer this question in the affirmative:

- the content of the provision is decisive, unless according to the text or the history of the creation of the text of the treaty the contracting parties have agreed that no direct effect should be granted to those provisions

It is also important whether the treaty provisions prescribes that the Dutch legislator has an obligation to adopt national legislation with a certain content or scope, or that these provisions can function as objective law in the domestic legal order.

According to settled case law of the Dutch Supreme Court, the following considerations have to be taken into account to establish that no direct effect should be granted to the provision in question:

- the general wording of the provision can hardly function within the domestic legal order without further elaboration
- the provision does not contain a specified standard which by its content is suitable for direct application
- the provision concerns performances of the government towards the citizens and these provisions cannot function within the domestic legal order without any further elaboration.<sup>14</sup>

This means that an individual can invoke any provision, including human rights, if this is binding on all persons, from any treaty before the domestic court next to the human rights codified in the Dutch Constitution. In other words, next to the human rights which are codified in the Dutch Constitution also these provisions derived from international law have direct effect.

In case of a violation of a human right, the individual can rely on the direct effect of this category of rights with the consequence that the judge at issue is obliged to assess whether such an infringement has taken place.

There is a hierarchy between the courts in the Netherlands. The highest court is the Supreme Court. However, all remedies must be exhausted in order to be able to file a complaint at this highest court. This means that first the district court must be consulted, after this the Court of Appeal and hereafter the Supreme Court may be consulted.

iv. Is there a Criminal Supreme Court? Please, briefly describe the criminal procedure.

There is a Criminal Division within the Supreme Court, but not a specific separate Criminal Supreme Court.

This Criminal Division is entrusted with criminal cases and cases as mentioned in Article 31 Extradition Law (Uitleveringswet) and Article 32 Law on the Enforcement of Transfers of Sentences (Wet overdracht tenuitvoerlegging strafvonnissen).<sup>15</sup>

The Supreme Court and thereby the Criminal Division of the Supreme Court is only competent to hear cases in case of exhaustion of all remedies.

v. What is the age of criminal liability? Are there any statistics available regarding children prisoners?

The age of criminal liability of children is 12-17 years. With regard to this group, the youth justice system in principle. However, exceptions can be made in case of aggravating circumstances.

In 1965 the current range for criminal liability was established setting the age of criminal liability at 12 years. Before 1965 the age of criminal liability was set at 10 years.

<http://www.rechtspraak.nl/Organisatie/Hoge-Raad/Regels%20en%20procedures/Pages/Procesreglement-van-de-strafkamer-van-de-Hoge-Raad.aspx>.

A minor younger than the age of 12 years cannot be criminally prosecuted since 1965. He or she enjoys an irrefutable presumption of insanity.

The Report of Commission Overwater, which formed the foundation for the amendment, made it clear that children under the age of 12 years should not be held responsible because criminal proceedings would be a ponderous measures which are not necessary. This age stayed unmodified during the amendment of 1995.<sup>16</sup>

There is also a maximum age of criminal liability. This is set at 18 years and has been established in 1905. Before 1905, the age was set at 16 years. Cort van der Linden, then Minister of Justice, consciously chose the maximum age of 18 years. According to Cort van der Linden, 16- and 17 years old persons find themselves in a critical phase of life which makes them insecure and they need supervision because of this.

During the revision of the youth criminal law in 1965, the border at 18 years stayed unmodified. Even though the possibility was present to apply an adults penalty on persons between the age of 16 ad 17 years, this penalty was hardly used. However, a legal criterion was added with regard to this provision: it is not required that the judge uses the penalties derived from the youth criminal law, when he believes that the severity of the committed crime and the personality of the offender obliges him to apply adult penalties. By law of 1995, this criterion was modified: it is not required that the judge uses the penalties derived from the youth criminal law, when he believes that the severity of the committed crime, the personality of the offender or the circumstances in which the offense was committed obliges him to apply adult penalties.<sup>17</sup> This modification meant that the conditions did not have to apply in a cumulative manner.

In 2008 the judge imposed 17.200 penalties on minor offenders. The most common penalty is the community service (50%), followed by the conditional custodial (voorwaardelijke vrijheidsstraf) (15%) and a money penalty (geldboete) (14%).

□ Community services and money penalties

In 2008, 10.200 community services penalties were imposed on minor children and almost 2.400 money penalties. Per 1.000 12 until 17 years old persons, this means that 7 community services were imposed, 1 training order and 2 money penalties.

The amount of community services penalties per 1.000 minors shows us a rising trend and shows that in 2008 with regard to 2003 the amount of these penalties is increased with 52%. The money penalties show a fluctuating trend. In 2008, the amount of money penalties is similar to that of 2003.

□ Custody

In 2008, more than 4.000 custody penalties were imposed by the judge. Almost 65% from these penalties had a conditional character. The other percentage did not have a custodial character. Most of these penalties are for a period of maximum 3 months. The amount of these penalties under the group of 12- until 17 years old is increased until 2004/2005. Hereafter, a drop is visible. In 2008 with regard to 2003, the amount of custody penalties has decreased with 45% , the penalties not exceeding 3 months decreased with 37%.<sup>18</sup>

2 SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW

Aim: In this section the research starts to explore national peculiarities. Researchers are asked to analyze the protection provided by criminal law about sexual abuse, child prostitution, child pornography, corruption of children, solicitation of children for sexual purposes.

2.1 Sexual Abuse

i. How does the national legislation define the term “sexual activities”? Is it to be applied broadly or narrowly?

The Dutch legislator defines the term sexual activities that are punishable in national criminal law as “ontucht” (sexual abuse). The term sexual abuse has to be applied broadly and in Dutch law is defined as “handelingen met een seksuele strekking in strijd met de social-ethische norm” (activities of a sexual nature in violation of the social-ethical norm).<sup>19</sup>

ii. Does the law define and interpret the word “intentionally”? What is the criminal liability of an internationally committed crime of sexual abuse?

In Dutch law the bestandsdeel “opzet” defines when intention has to be proven. Intention is defined in Dutch law as “willens en wetens” (willingly and knowingly) . There are several different levels of severity of intention that are used with each lowering the amount someone knew or should have known.

iii. What is the legal age for engaging in sexual activities? How are consensual sexual activities between minors regulated?

Normal consensual sexual activities between minors are considered to be within social-ethical boundaries and therefore fall outside the Dutch criminal code.<sup>20</sup> However this can only be considered if there is a slight age difference. The legal age for sexual maturity in The Netherlands is 16.

iv. How is the use of force, taking advantage of disability or threat regulated in regards to sexual offences against children?

If a person uses force or threatens to use force for any sexual crime this person can be prosecuted on the basis of article 246 of the Dutch criminal code.

v. How is the crime of “incest” regulated?

Incestuous relations are punishable under article 249 (1) Dutch criminal code.

vi. Are there any specific provisions regulating offenders who take advantage of school and educational settings, care and justice institutions, the work-place and the community?

If a person uses advantage of educational settings, care and justice institutions, the workplace or the community they will be able to be prosecuted under article 249 (2)2 of the Dutch criminal code.<sup>21</sup>

2.2 Child Prostitution

vii. Is the State a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Human Trafficking? If yes, what is the date of ratification and signature? If not, is the State planning to ratify the Convention?

The Netherlands has ratified the convention on Action against Human Trafficking. It has been signed on 17th of November 2005 ratified on 22nd April 2010 and entered into force in The Netherlands on 1st of August 2010.<sup>22</sup>

viii. How does national legislation define “child prostitution”? Is it compatible with the definition in Article 19(2) of the Lanzarote Convention? Please comment.

The national legislation provides for two different ways in which child prostitution can be the case. The first is when the child itself is offering his/her services. In that case if someone takes advantage of that by using the services then that person can be prosecuted under article 248b of the Dutch criminal code.

If however the child is held against her will and forced into prostitution Dutch law looks at the actual actions. Under article 273f human trafficking is punishable. The article includes provisions for when someone, under the age of 18, is recruited<sup>23</sup> or coerced<sup>24</sup> into prostituting him/herself for the benefit of the third person.<sup>25</sup>

ix. Does national legislation criminalize both the recruiter (the person that coordinates the business of child prostitution) and the user (the person that pays to conduct sexual activities with children)?

Where the recruiter can therefore be prosecuted under article 273f, the user is thus criminally prosecutable under article 247 and 248b of the Dutch criminal code.

2.3 Child Pornography

Child Pornography in General:

x. Is the State party to the Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime? If yes, what is the date of ratification and signature? If not, is the State planning to ratify?

The Netherlands is a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime. It has been signed on 23rd of November 2001, ratified on 16th of November 2006 and entered into force in The Netherlands on 1st of March 2007.

xi. How does the national legislation define “child pornography”? Is it compatible with the definition in Article 20(2) of the Lanzarote Convention? Please comment.

The definition the Dutch government adopted is the same as in the Lanzarote Convention. Child pornography is “een afbeelding, van een seksuele gedraging, waarbij iemand die kennelijk de leeftijd van achttien jaar nog niet heeft bereikt, is betrokken of schijnbaar betrokken”,<sup>26</sup>

xii. To whom does the State attribute the criminal liability to? Is it compatible with the Article 20(1.a) to (1.f)?

The state attributes criminal liability to the person whom is involved, looks to be involved, distributes, publicly shows, makes, imports, exports or has in his possession and materials .

Under point 1.f. The Dutch government has been the government who proposed to add this point but 1.f. it was put in the Convention only as an optional clause.<sup>27</sup> As proposers of the clause they off course have taken it up in their own legislation and can be found back in the Dutch criminal code.

xiii. What is the control mechanism for pornographic materials? If the state is a party to the Lanzarote Convention, did the state use the reservation right that has been given to them in the Lanzarote Convention Article 20(3) and 20(4)?

The Netherlands has not used the reservation rights under Article 20(3) and Article 20(4). Under Article 20(3) first subsection it has the ability to exclude paragraph 1a to e to the production and possession of pornographic materials “consisting exclusively of simulated representations or realistic images of a non-existent child”.

The Dutch government has as his aim with art 240b Criminal Code a broad protection of children against sexual exploitation and sexual abuse<sup>28</sup> which can be found back in the bestandsdeel „schijnbaar is betrokken“ (apparently is involved). The background of this is that the Dutch government has wanted not only to protect the child but also that the child must be protected from „behaviour that can be used to make encourage or seduce children to participate in sexual behaviour or behaviour that can become part of a subculture that sexual abuse encourages“.<sup>29</sup> Therefore also virtual child pornography can be a violation of Dutch law in specific circumstances.<sup>30</sup>

The second subsection of Article 20(3) would allow for an reservation for cases where „a child that would have reached the legal age for sexual majority but not yet the age of 18 and the images possessed would solely be for their own private use“. In this case the Dutch government recons that the chances of such a case coming to light are quite slim but if this would happen the “opportuniteitsbeginsel” gives the public prosecutor the possibility not to prosecute so making a reservation is not needed.<sup>31</sup>

In regard to the possible reservation right under art 20(4) Lanzarote Convention the Dutch government has not used its right to make a reservation and as it is already criminally prosecutable under article 240b.

Participation of a Child in Pornographic Performances:

xiv. Does the State criminalize intentional conduct of making a child participate in pornographic performances? Does the State highlight and differentiate between recruitment and coercion? What is the State’s approach to the attendance of pornographic performances involving the participation of children? If the State is a party to the Lanzarote Convention, did the state use the reservation right stated in Article 21(2)?

The intentional conduct of making a child participate in pornographic performances is criminalized under several Articles of the Dutch criminal code depending on the circumstances.

When a child is recruited for the use in a pornographic performance it is criminalized under Dutch law under article 273f.<sup>32</sup> The article makes human trafficking illegal and by Article 273f(2) this includes forcing or recruiting someone for sexual abuse or prostitution.

Also the seduction of a child into participation in sexual abusive actions is criminalized by Article 248a of the Dutch criminal code.

Under Dutch law intentionally attending a pornographic performance with people involved, of whom someone knows or should know that they have not reached the legal age of 18 years, is criminalized under Article 248c of the Dutch Criminal code. For this article it does not matter how the children are recruited as the action of being present is a criminal action. Therefore the Dutch government has not used its reservation right under article 21(2) of the Lanzarote Convention.<sup>33</sup>

2.4 Corruption of Children

xv. Does the State criminalize the intentional causing of a child to witness sexual abuse or sexual activities, without necessarily having to participate? How does the state define “causing”? Does it involve forcing, inducement, and promise?

Because of the Convention of Lanzarote the Dutch legislator has seen the need to adapt the Dutch penal code and add Article 248d. This article criminalizes the intentional causing of a child to witness sexual abuse or sexual activities.<sup>34</sup> In its “Memorie van Toelichting” (considerations) the Dutch legislator has not specifically made a definition or consideration on how to define “causing” in this case.<sup>35</sup> xvi. How does the State criminalize intentional sexual gratification through information and communication technologies by an adult? Does it specify that the perpetrator should also propose a meeting with the potential child victim and come to the meeting place in order to be accused of committing this kind of crime (a.k.a. grooming)?

Next to the criminalisation of corruption of children the Dutch legislator changed the Dutch penal code to also include grooming. This has been done in Article 248e of the Dutch penal code which reads:

“A person who, using a computerized device or system or a communication service, proposes a meeting to a person whom he knows or may reasonably be expected to know to be under the age of sixteen, with the objective of committing an indecent act with this person or manufacturing an image of a sexual act in which this person is involved, shall be liable to a term of imprisonment not exceeding two years or a fourth-category fine if he takes any action directed towards the realization of this meeting.”

As can be seen it specifies that for grooming to be an offence it is not necessary that the perpetrator actually meets the child. It is needed though that the contact leads to a concrete proposal for a meeting and that the offender actually makes actions that are directed towards realizing this meeting.<sup>36, 37</sup>

xvii. Does the State criminalize aiding or abetting and attempting to the activities that have been mentioned in the subsection a, b, c, d and e?

Yes, through the normal Dutch legal system for aiding/abetting and attempting allows that all actions in the previous subsections are criminally prosecutable.

2.6 Corporate Liability

xviii. Does the State hold legal/moral persons (entities) such as commercial companies and associations liable when an action has been performed on their behalf by a person in a position at their entity? Is there a difference between leading persons (persons in position of authority) and regular employees being held liable? If yes, please describe the differences.

Under Dutch law crimes can be committed by natural and legal person (Article 51(1) Dutch Penal Code. When a legal person commits a criminal offence it can be criminally prosecuted and the penalties and measures foreseen by law can also be applied to legal entities where applicable (Article 51(2) Dutch Penal Code).

xix. What kind of liability does national legislation impose? Criminal, civil or administrative? Please explain.

Criminal: Article 51 (2) of the Dutch Penal Code. When found guilty, then the victim could also start a civil procedure to get compensation.<sup>38</sup>

xx. Does national legislation exclude individual liability when there is a corporate liability?

In Dutch legislation there is not a specific provision that can exclude someone from his individual criminal liability if there is a corporate liability.

2.7 Aggravating Circumstances

xxi. Does the state accept any aggravating circumstances for the crimes that have been described above? (e.g. when the offence damaged physical health of the child) Please, write down these circumstances and explain, try to specify the different crimes if there are different aggravating rules applying.

Dutch criminal code article 248 provides increased punishments for aggravated circumstances.

“1. The prison sentences provided in Sections 240b, 242 to 247, 248a to 248e, 249 and 250 may be increased by one third if the offence is committed jointly by two or more persons.

2. The prison sentences provided in Sections 240b, 242 to 247, 248a to 248e may be increased by one third if the offender commits the offence against his child, a child submitted to his authority, a child that he cares for or rears as if part of his family, his ward, a minor entrusted to his care, instruction or supervision, or his minor servant or subordinate.

3. In case of an offence as described in the articles 240b, 243, 245 to 247, 248a, 248b and 249 results in severe physical harm, or when mortal danger for another person can be expected, a term of imprisonment not exceeding twelve years or a fifth-category fine shall be imposed.

4. In case of an offence as described in the articles 240b, 243, 245 to 247, 248a, 248b and 249 results in death, to a term of imprisonment not exceeding eighteen years or a fifth-category fine shall be imposed.”

2.8 Sanctions and Measures

xxii. How does the state sanction the above mentioned crimes? Is there a penalty including deprivation of liberty? How does the state legislate extradition?

The Dutch criminal law has several penalties: jail sentence, civil commitments.

Article 16, paragraph 4 of the European Convention on Extradition states that provisional arrest can be terminated somewhere between 18 days and 40 days if the original request for extradition and accompanying documents are not received by the requested state. Following Dutch legislation, provisional arrest can last no longer than 20 days without the receipt of the original request for extradition and accompanying documents. If the original request for extradition and accompanying documents (a fax version is not sufficient) are not received within 20 days after a Dutch judge has ordered the provisional arrest, this provisional arrest must be terminated. Only after the original request for extradition and accompanying documents are received can the requested person be arrested for extradition again.

xxiii. Do you consider the sanctions effective, proportionate and dissuasive? Please comment.

There are strong feelings within the society to make the violators ‘pay’ more. In other words to give them more severe punishments.

xxiv. How does the state sanction the legal persons/moral entities? What kind of measures does it include?

It sanctions legal persons/moral entities with the same punishments as normal persons when the sanctions are applicable. Art. 9 of the Dutch Penal Code provides the possible sanctions.

xxv. Does the state legislate seizure and confiscation of materials, instruments... etc. used for committing the crime? Does the state protect bona fide third parties? Is there allocation of a special fund for financing prevention or intervention programmes in which these properties confiscated allocated?

The state does legislate seizure and confiscation of materials used for committing the crime. In this matters there was no evidence found that the State protected bona fide third parties.

There is no special fund for financing prevention or intervention programmes in which these properties confiscated are allocated.

xxvi. When the crime has been committed within the family or within the close environment of the child, how does the state react?

Articles 249 and 248 (1) of the Dutch Penal Code explicitly mention the punishments for crimes committed by members of the family of the child or those close to the child.

3 CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Aim: After the analysis of the protection framed by criminal law, in this section researchers are asked to explain if national rules of criminal procedure take into consideration the particular needs and situation of the child.

3.1 Investigation

i. How is the principle of the “best interests of the child” applied during investigation of a crime as mentioned above? Is there a protective approach to the victims? What kind of measures has been taken? Is the victim offered protection during the court proceedings? (such as appointing special representatives) If so, please indicate what kind of protective measures have been taken.

There are multiple measures to ensure that the child will get the necessary protection. An outline will be given of the current protective measures towards victims. (Slachtoffer hulp Nederland, spreekrecht, slachtoffer-dadergesprekken, wet versterking positie slachtoffers)

□ Victims Supports Netherlands

Victim Supports Netherlands offers victims, including young persons, help after a crime or road accident. The staff offers practical and legal advice and emotional support. They inform the victims about the criminal proceedings and they can assist them during those proceedings. The volunteers and the paid staff followed an education to enlarge their expertise about the support of the youth who find themselves being victims of violence.

Also the possibilities offered by the internet are used to support the young victims. Next to e-mailing, young persons can also use the chat function on the website (ikzitindeshit.nl). The reason to choose for the chat function is that young persons are already familiar with this. The chat function is an accessible and approachable medium that allows them without much fuss to ask a question.<sup>39</sup>

□ Spreekrecht (right to speak during proceedings)

Since 1 January 2005, victims and (nabestaanden) are entitled, in case of serious offenses, to give a declaration during the trial about the consequences of that offense in their regular life.

This declaration may also have the form of a written declaration. Children from the age of 12 years may use this right. However, also children under the age of 12 years are in particular circumstances entitled to invoke this right when they have a reasonable understanding of their interests.<sup>40</sup>

□ Victim-offender meetings

Since 2007, there is a possibility for everyone, including the youth, to create victim offender meetings. Slachtoffer in Beeld (Foundation Visible Victim) is responsible for the organization of such meetings. These meetings are run according to a fixed method and may contribute to the processing of the crime by the victim.

Moreover, a successful meeting may have a positive influence on the behaviour of the offender and may contribute to the preventing of recidivism. In case of young offenders, the meetings have a positive pedagogical impact: by these meetings they insistently learn about the consequences of their behaviour. These meetings have a complementary character. They also have a voluntary character. In other words, these meetings are not mandatory and can only take place if the victims want to.<sup>41</sup>

□ “Wet versterking van de positieve van het slachtoffer in het strafproces”

On 1 January 2011 the Law to Amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Criminal Code to strengthen the position of victims in the criminal proceedings entered into force. With this law, codified in a separate section in the Code of Criminal Procedure, the following rights can be invoked by victims:

---

<sup>40</sup> Idem.

- Right to proper treatment (“bejegening”)
- Right to information from the point of declaration to the release of the convicted
- Right to damages
- Right to access to the files

These rights can be invoked by all victims including the youth. This law is also concerned with the obligation from the parents to be present during the criminal proceedings against their minor child. Also, the right to hold the parents of children under the age of 14 years liable for the damage is codified.<sup>42</sup>

The implementation of the Lanzarote Convention by the Netherlands resulted in the following measures:

- The tightening of criminalization of child porn (Article 240 (b) Sr)
- The criminalization of (“corrumpieren”) corrupting children and
- The criminalization of “grooming” (by pimps)

These legislative measures entered into force on 1 January 2010.

ii. Are there any special units for investigating the crimes mentioned above within the legal force? Are they authorised to carry out covert operations? Do they investigate and analyse child pornography materials?

There is no specific separate coordination mechanism for the fight against the sale of children, child prostitution and child porn. The reason for this lies in the fact that the Netherlands approach these problems from the criminal view and not from the perspective of the type of victims in question.

There is a Task Force Human Trafficking with its own Plan and there is also a Task Force against Child Porn and Child Sex Tourism with its own plan. During 2007-2010 there also was a Steering Group for the Fight against Child Abuse with her own Plan, ‘Children Safely Home’. In the beginning of 2012 there was a new Action Plan against Child Abuse.

The primary responsibility with regard to the first two subject lies with the Ministry of Safety and Justice. With regard to the child abuse subject, the responsibility lies with the Ministry of Safety and Justice and the Ministerie van Volksgezondheid Welzijn en Sport (Ministry of Health, Wellbeing and Sports).

Whenever this is necessary, horizontal measures can be taken for minor victims of the aforementioned crimes. Examples hereof would be; allowing statements of children in criminal proceedings and investigating them. Also horizontal preventive measures are taken, for example the programs and websites for children concerning relationships and sexual health. Whenever this is necessary, further horizontal measures will be taken.

However, the government is planning to tackle child porn more and more severe. From the beginning of 2011, 75 extra police staff were put in, a nationwide plan with regard to child porn was set up and a nationwide expertise centre with regard to child porn was set up. The aim is 25% more suspects in 2015.

There is a special team of (Korps Landelijk Politie Diensten) KLPD which is concerned with the fight against child porn in the Netherlands. The team mainly focuses on the following subjects:

- Infiltrating on the internet and networks
- Detecting the producers of child porn
- Developing new tools, for example a database with found images and the software to compare these new images in order to detect the victims and offenders more easily.<sup>43</sup>

The investigation of sex offences is conducted by special investigators (“rechercheurs”). Within the police training special courses are offered to increase the expertise in the field of sex offences. Within the police regions, special trained investigators are part of the sex offences unit.

Since 2010, a separate education is offered to police officers who have the task to investigate data on the presence of child porn images, like photographs and videos.<sup>44</sup>

iii. Is it required that the crime is reported in order to be investigated? Do the proceedings go on even in case of withdrawal from the statements?

Between 1991 and 2002, the Dutch Criminal Code contained several sex offenses in title XIV which could only be prosecuted in case of a complaint. It concerned sex offences with minors from the age of 12 until 16 years. The aim of the requirement of a complaint was to protect minors.

In practice this meant that because of the complaint requirement, the public prosecutor could not ex officio start a criminal investigation in case of minors from the age of 12 until 16 years. This complaint could either be brought by the minor himself or herself, one of his or her parents, or by the Council of Child Protection.<sup>45</sup>

In 2002, this complaint requirement was replaced by the right to be heard. The reason for the introduction of this right was the fact that the complaint requirement did not have satisfactory results. The right to be heard is codified in now Article 167a of the Code of Criminal Procedure and was set by the Law of 13 July 2002, Stb. 388.<sup>46</sup>

iv. How long is the statute of limitation? When does it start? Can it be suspended?

The Minister of Justice, Ivo Opstelten proposed a new bill that will radically alter the statute of limitations by preventing criminals whose crimes were committed 12 or more years ago from avoiding punishment.

At the moment, only crimes carrying a life-long sentence are not included in the statute. Opstelten wants to change this to include lesser sentences for murder, rape, human trafficking and child molestation.

“It is completely unacceptable that criminals should avoid punishment just because a certain amount of time has elapsed since they committed their crime”, Opstelten writes in the introduction to his bill.<sup>47</sup>

This bill was lodged at 1 May 2012 and was accepted by the Parliament. At the moment, this bill is at the Senate waiting for its approval.<sup>48</sup>

v. How does the national legislation proceed when the age of the victim is not certain?

This is a very hypothetical question. It's almost always certain how old a victim is.

vi. Who is responsible for recording and storing data for convicted offenders? Who do they relate to? Can and do these authorities transmit their data to other competent authorities in other states? Do the authorities respect protection of personal data rules?

The following data concern the registration of sex offenders:

- Onderzoeks- en Beleidsdatabase (OBJD)

This is an encrypted, anonymous copy of the official judicial documentation system; JDS which is managed by Judicial Information Service (JustID). Only the offenses are registered which have led to contact with the judicial bodies. However, it only concerns those offenses which are dismissed by the court or OM.

- Monitoring Informatiesysteem Terbeschikkinggestelden (MITS)

This is managed by Dienst Justitiele Inrichtingen (Service of Judicial Institutions) of the Ministry of Justice. With this information system a further distinction is made towards the type of sex offense.<sup>49</sup>

3.2 Complaint Procedure

vii. How does the complaint procedure work in case of violations of Substantive Criminal Law? Are children allowed to present their individual complaint? What are the criteria for Communication to be accepted for examinations (e.g. written/oral)?

The procedure to bring a complaint in case of no (further) prosecution is codified in Article 12-12l of the Code of Criminal Procedure. This right is codified because of the possible disadvantages of two main principles which should be applied during criminal procedures. The two principles are:

- The principle that the monopoly of prosecution only lies with the competent authority
  - The principle of opportunity

These two principles give the government a great amount of power. The principle of opportunity legitimizes that the government does not prosecute and the fact that only the government has the right to prosecute also prevents the establishment of an actual criminal procedure.

Because of this, it is very important to have a complaint procedure. This also means that the public prosecutor must be more cautious when balancing the interests whether to start a criminal procedure or not.

First of all it must be pointed out this procedure is not a procedure to enforce a criminal procedure. It concerns a dispute about the discretionary powers of the public prosecutor. This makes it a more administrative dispute.<sup>50</sup>

Based on Article 12 (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure the complaint must have a written character. It is not bound to any further form. The complaint must be submitted to the court within the jurisdiction of which the dismissal decision is taken or the punishment decision is taken or at The Hague court if the decision is taken at the national office.<sup>51</sup>

With regard to the question whether a child can bring a complaint, the following considerations must be taken into account. The Articles 12-12l of the Code of Criminal Procedure do not mention that the minor child or the legal representative is entitled to bring a complaint.

To fix this gap, academics in the literature suggest that by way of analogy with other rules in the law, it is possible for minor children or their legal representative(s) to bring a complaint based on Article 12 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The Gerechtshof (Court of Justice) of Amsterdam stated that a minor child can bring a complaint itself. However, it is conceivable that the court will state that the complaint is inadmissible if the minor is not in the position (also) by his age to oversee the meaning and scope of the complaint. The same Court also stated that the legal representative, one if the child has more than one, is entitled to bring a complaint.

However, some additional remarks must be made here. This possibility of the legal representative only exists during the minority of the child. This means that if the child reaches the age of 18 years during the course of the complaint procedure, the child will be called by the Councillor Commissioner (raadsheer-commissaris) to show his point of view. If this child wishes that the complaint must be dealt with and states that he or she maintains the complaint, the child instead of the legal representative would be regarded as the plaintiff from that point. In this case, the legal representative does not have an interest in the prosecution procedure anymore.

If the complaint is filed by the parent of the adult child, this parent would in principle be regarded as inadmissible. Again, the Councillor Commissioner would ask the opinion of the adult child in order to qualify the adult child as the plaintiff. If a parent is regarded as inadmissible, the adult child still has the right to bring a complaint procedure himself or herself. This would even be more desirable since no time is lost with the formalities of bringing a complaint and the public prosecutor does not have to request the views of the adult child.<sup>52</sup>

viii. What are the rules about legal representation of children, especially in the case of complaints against their parents? What are the rules of participation of minors in trials? (Protection of their names, prohibition of media etc.)

Not very clear in the law. It depends on the judge and his/her decision.

4 COMPLEMENTARY MEASURES

Aim: In every system complementary measures have an important role in terms of prevention, education and recovery. This is the area where National Institution has more freedom of movement, because they are free to choose the more suitable means to obtain the result, meaning the protection of children. This section is of great importance, because it will allow the exchange of experiences and “good offices” between systems.

Preventive Measures

i. What kind of educational guarantees are given in relation to professionals working with children in the area of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse? What does the State do in order to assure these people are aware of these situations?

<sup>52</sup> S.J.A.M van Gend, G.J Visser, Artikel 12 Sv, Ars Aequi Libri Nijmegen 2004, p. 93-94.

Following the Amsterdam abuse case (2001), the independent committee Gunning investigated which measures nurseries can take to sexual abuse by professionals to prevent and better signalling. The government has summarized everything in a policy. The Ministries of Social Affairs and Employment of Security and Justice have six conclusions drawn from the report of the committee Gunning<sup>53</sup>:

A situation where a group of children in long day care can be alone with an adult, is from the viewpoint of safety not acceptable.

Signs of sexual abuse should be noted earlier and agencies must work better together.

The educational level of the employees and the formation of building a nursery should ensure that employees are able to provide child safety.

The recruitment and selection procedures should be strictly implemented.

The administrative supervision but especially enforcement by the municipality with more force must be taken in hand.

In the interest of safety of children there should be made more stringent quality requirements for nurseries. Also, repositioning of the child should be considered: not only directed at the reception function, but primarily on the development of the child.

ii. Does the State educate children regarding these issues? Does the State involve parents into this educative process?

In education this subject of sexual abuse prevention in the eighties and nineties of the last century was very much in the spotlight. There is generally school policy on sexual behaviour developed, the first counsellors did their appearance and there were complaints and complaints committees were established. There is a material developed for students, teachers are trained to identify sexual abuse. Stimulant policies of the Ministry of Education have resulted in the PPSH<sup>54</sup> (prevention project sexual harassment). PPSH is an expertise in the field of combating and prevention of (gay) sexual harassment and sexual abuse in education and works with schools to implement security and support of counsellors in the performance of their duties. Since 1998, the PPSH its was extended to the broader spectrum of undesirable behaviour such as physical and psychological violence (bullying) and discrimination.

Then, the years after the nineties it becomes very quiet when it comes to government attention to sexual violence. The emphasis shifts to domestic violence.

The State has taken some measures to educate children regarding to sexual exploitation and child abuse, so it's not totally absent after the 1990's. One of those measures is the 'underwear rule' (ondergoedregel).<sup>55</sup> Though the Dutch government itself has not developed this rule, we do see this rule used as a reference when it comes to education of the children.

The Dutch Agency Grey Amsterdam developed with the Council of Europe "The Underwear Rule" concept. We have not seen any particular national projects regarding this when it comes to educating children and/or their parents.

iii. Has the State created preventive intervention programmes for people who fear that they may commit the crime?

From April 3th 2012 paedophiles can call to an anonymous telephone helpline. The psychiatric clinic The Waag and Meldpunt Child Porn want with the 'Stop it Now' campaign prevent paedophiles to put their desires into practice.<sup>56</sup> Stop it Now! receives funding from the Ministry of Health, Welfare and Sport.

Protective Measures and Assistance to Victims

iv. Are there any social programmes to provide support for victims? How exactly do these programmes work?

There are many, many social programmes to provide support for victims. In the list below we will summarize some of them and mention their method of work:

<http://www.seksueelgeweld.nl/> : A website for victims of sexual violence and the people around them. Objective of this site is accessible help and peer support. This website is made possible by volunteers.

<http://www.seksueelmisdrijf.nl/> : The site is intended for anyone who is professionally or as an educator involved in people with mental, physical, auditory or visual impairment. The website is an initiative of the Rutgers Nisso Group and MOVISIE. Central to the website is a database with descriptions of materials, courses and other tools that can be used for sex education and for prevention and treatment after sexual abuse of people with disabilities

<http://www.fondsslachtofferhulp.nl/?gclid=CLn25qjCx7MCFcbLtAod10QAyg> : The mission of the Fund is to promote the Victim assistance to victims (and survivors, relatives and witnesses) of a crime, accident or disaster, promoting prevention of victimization and otherwise improve the position of victims in every way.

They do this through the following activities:

1. Financial support (grants) to organizations active in victim assistance, prevention of victimization or otherwise improve the position of victims;
2. Emergency financial assistance to individual victims;
3. Follow and justify expenditures, conducting a spending policy research;
4. Where necessary, initiating projects, campaigns and research;
5. Raising funds through private donors and businesses, lotteries and the organization of events;
6. Education, awareness and advocacy campaigns.

Overall can be said that the most of social programmes try to cover the possible costs of the victims and try to help them with financial means as well to get their lives back on track after such a traumatic experience.

v. Are there any help lines in service of the victims? Are these help lines aware of the confidentiality principles?

Yes, there are some helplines available:

<https://www.hulplijnseksueelmisbruik.nl/> : this is the national helpline funded by the State directly.

<http://www.slachtofferhulp.nl/seksueel-misbruik/Delicten/Seksueel-misbruik/> : Victim Support Netherlands helps victims of crime, traffic accidents and calamities. They are also helping survivors, witnesses and other people involved. Their help is always free, thanks to funding from the Ministry of Security and Justice, municipalities and the Victim Fund.

Both helplines are fully aware of the confidentiality of the victims. Confidentiality is a core principle in the Dutch professional help for the victims of sexual crimes.

vi. How does the State assist victims when it comes to recovery? Are the intervention programmes (if there are any) aware of the possibility that these child victims could have sexual behaviour problems in the future? Does the State make sure to get the consent of the persons or inform them thoroughly about the intervention programmes?

Through several above mentioned programmes the State tries to assist the victims in their recovery. In the investigations after the child abuse cases all the researchers concluded that the victims who were at an age, at which they could understand to the fullest what was happening to them, might have sexual behaviour problems in the future.<sup>57</sup> On the 16th of May 2012 a report by the WODC<sup>58</sup> was published. In this report a study was done (an overview) of the research literature on problems reported after sexual abuse (SCM) in childhood.<sup>59</sup>

Every help of the State commences only after prior consent of the victims or their parents.

III NATIONAL POLICY REGARDING CHILDREN

Aim: In this section researchers will describe the commitment of active citizenship and NGOs in the protection of children.

i. Is there a serious political discussion regarding the children in the respective country?

On this moment there are certain active political discussions regarding to the position of children. Due to certain major public scandals and issues, awareness for the children's position arose and political action has been taken.

In the following we will (shortly) mention two of these events and the concrete actions of politicians. First we will mention in short the wide broad public and political aversion against Dutch paedophiles' association called 'Martijn'. Second, we will provide some information about the consequences of the abuse scandals which scourge the Roman Catholic church in The Netherlands.

A. Paedophiles' association 'Martijn'

<sup>57</sup> <http://www.rijksoverheid.nl/documenten-en-publicaties/persberichten/2012/05/16/wodc-veel-problemen-na-seksueel-misbruik-in-de-kindertijd.html>

‘Martijn’ was an association where its adult members advocated for legal sexual relationships with children and the acceptance for paedophilia. As probably expected, a wide broad public and political discussion arose.

On the 29 November 2011 a debate took place in the Dutch Parliament about the continuity of this specific association.<sup>60</sup> In The Netherlands the freedom of association is a constitutional right (Article 8 Dutch Constitution), but all politicians agreed on the fact that this freedom is not unlimited. And however the association did not committed any (known?) crimes, the politicians agreed also on an investigation by the public prosecutor by what possibilities this association could be stopped and disbanded. The main thought is that you “keep your hands off from children”. No one in Parliament challenged that idea.

Judgement of the court of Assen

Finally, this political discussion led to a judgement of the court in Assen, which ordered on 27 June 2012 that the group was indeed illegal and that it had to disband immediately. The main argument of the judge was that the safety of children would be undermined if you consider such an organisation and its views (e.g. adults having sexual intercourse with children) as legal and as the norm.<sup>61</sup>

B. Scandals Roman Catholic church in The Netherlands

At the beginning of 2010, the first signs of the (globally) wide scale abuse of minors in catholic institutions came into light in The Netherlands. In other countries the issue was questioned earlier in public. One of the reasons for this later outcome, is that some of the cases were already dealt with internally by the church itself, so by cannon law. Another reason is that people were reluctant to step outside with their story, because the limitation period of the sex crime already expired and/or they did not want to rip open old wounds.

Through political discussion, a commission was established (“Commissie Deetman”) which had to investigate this scandal. They had to bring into view the size and aspects of this scandal between 1945 and 2010. The report the commission offered to the Minister of Safety and Justice (mr I.W. Opstelten) led to the following reaction.

First, there has to be more and deep investigation about the status and aspects of child abuse in The Netherlands, since such events can have grave and major consequences on the life of children and their future. Both the Minister and the Commission under scribe this.

Second, a special Taskforce is established which is commissioned with asserting the Plan of action against child abuse (“Kinderen veilig – Actieplan tegen kindermishandeling 2012-2016”).<sup>62</sup> This plan contains improvements for the prevention, signalling and fighting of child abuse. This Plan will be dealt with in a more extensive way in Paragraph iv, because of its high promotional character.

Third, according to the limitation period of sex crimes, already expired crimes cannot be prosecuted anymore. Following from the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, this conflicts with Article 7 ECHR. However, there is space to extend or annul the current term. Therefore the Dutch Cabinet proposed a bill in which is stated that the limitation period of grave sex crimes and abuse against children cannot expire anymore. This because of the fact that sometimes it takes a lot of time for victims being able to bring their story into light, because of feelings like shame, guilt, fear and more.

Main conclusion:

Political discussion exists regarding to the position of children and the national politics (on state or municipality level) deal with it in an adequate fashion.

ii. How has the awareness within the society regarding children’s sexual abuse and exploitation been raised by committed NGOs and/or the State (use of official sources, documents, statistics...)?

NGO’s

Before we can answer this question, we have to determine what a “NGO” exactly means. In this report NGO means: an organisation held by private non-profit parties, acting without any involvement en steering of the State or its organs and set up for the social importance.<sup>63</sup>

In the Dutch landscape there are quite a lot of NGO’s representing children’s rights and fighting child abuse. These NGO’s are raising awareness through various methods. In the following I will sum up the two biggest and well-known organisations and their methods. I note that does not mean that the other smaller ones count for less, of course. But because of the limited space provided, inevitable choices need to be made.

A. “Stop Kindermisbruik”<sup>64</sup>

This may be the biggest well-known private organisation in The Netherlands regarding to the struggle against child exploitation, more specific child prostitution. It is founded by two Dutch celebrities and a lot of popular Dutch celebrities are supporting this organisation. Its main purpose is to free children who are trapped in child prostitution, but not only in The Netherlands. They cooperate with a lot of foreign organisations in order to realise their (same) purpose.

The manners the organisation uses to raise public awareness is through media, such as television, radio and not to forget, social media. It owns various accounts on media like Facebook and Twitter. People can even download banners from the site to place on their own site as a link.

Stop Kindermisbruik suggests people to take action by themselves, in order to raise awareness in their environment. On educational level, they suggest that children can hold a presentation about the topic at school and teachers can download a program of lessons they can present to their pupils. Private persons and companies can sponsor the organisation with (monetary) support. On its website the guest can look for many opportunities and manners to do something.

B. “No Kidding”<sup>65</sup>

This organisation has an interesting purpose formulated on the home page of its web site. It states that ‘No Kidding dreams of getting all Dutch grown ups become a member of its organisation and thus via this public movement raise awareness for the abused child. This can be effectuated by being a sponsor or a volunteer in order to make the topic of child abuse discussable. When people can talk freely about it, child abuse can be prevented.’ Also here a Dutch celebrity is represented.

---

Their web site provides a lot of general information about the topic and people can find possibilities what to do, like holding presentations about the topic. Volunteers can visit schools, companies even the government to hold a presentation as well. They are also involved at big events which can count on a big public interest, like sports events where a delegate as a participant tries to bring the organisation under the attention.

State

The State raises awareness directly via public campaigns, mostly initiated by the involved Minister. I will discuss a very recent one in Paragraph iv. But it also raises awareness indirectly when it establishes commissions in order to investigate great public scandals regarding to child abuse. These commissions are frequently in the news with their findings. I already mentioned Commissie Deetman who investigated the situation about the scandals scourging the Roman Catholic Church. Another commission noticeable is the Commissie Samson, which investigates since 2010 the situation about children placed by the State<sup>66</sup> in (state) institutions, foster families, boarding schools and orphanages, from 1945 till now.<sup>67</sup> There were signals that child abuse sexual abuse took place on a very great scale in these environments. There is also information that the State was aware of signals that could have concerned child abuse, but did not react in an adequate fashion. The commission earlier mentioned to be shocked about the scale and the severeness of the abuse. Children taken care of by Jeugdzorg (the Dutch Youth care) or placed in foster families were under a much greater risk to get exposed by sexual abuse.<sup>68</sup>

The results of the investigation will be published in October 2012, unfortunately after the outcome of this report.

Such awareness is maybe not wished, because the (possibly) lack of the government will come into light and the dysfunction of the bigger youth care institutions, but this also falls under the concept of raising awareness. People need to know what sexual abuse of children means, that it exists and how have dealt with it (or not).

iii. If the statistics are available, how many reporting have been done regarding children's sexual exploitation in last the 5 years (e.g. police records, court records etc.)?

For answering this question we had to search through several sources, because it was quite hard to find 'just' numbers. Therefore we will mention several sources which provided some information about the sexual abuse of children.

A. Nederlands Jeugd Instituut (NJI)

This is a non-profit organisation with a public profile, thus investigating on all public topics regarding to the Dutch youth. The NJI works on request of the government, other state institutions and professionals working in youth care.<sup>69</sup> From what we read on the websites of the different Ministries, the statistics provided in brochures are mainly results of NJI. Concerning sexual abuse of children, in 2010 there were 118,000 children exposed to children abuse. 4% of these children were victims of sexual abuse. The total number of 118,000 children was increased compared to results in the years before.

B. Politie / Openbaar ministerie (Police and public prosecutor)

The police comes with the following statistics, which it extracted from the Ministry of Safety and Justice<sup>70</sup>:

'Numbers sexual abuse with children:

- Almost 40% of all women experienced a form of sexual abuse before the age of 16;
- Almost 15% of all women experienced a form of sexual abuse by a family member before the age of 16;
- Sexual abuse is most likely between the age of 8 and 12 year;
- The public prosecutor takes care of 2050 to 2350 per year;
- Etc.'

Note: it was hard to find results for the last five years. A careful conclusion can be drafted that however there is an increase of numbers, mainly because there is more awareness about the topic, more adequate approach exists and signals can be picked up much quicker, so more cases come into light.

---

C. First report of the National Reporter of Human Trafficking – Child pornography

In this extensive report regarding to child pornography it is stated that there are no numbers available concerning child pornography. The only conclusion the National Reporter could draft is that there exists a lot of child pornography and that the amount only increases. Furthermore the approach should not only be limited through criminal law. The private sector for example should join in the struggle against child pornography.

iv. Are there any promotional campaigns in the State so far regarding these issues?

“Kinderen veilig – Actieplan aanpak kindermishandeling 2012-2016”

Over the last couple of years the State initiated several campaigns in order to bring this subject under attention. The most recent campaign is called “Kinderen veilig – Actieplan aanpak kindermishandeling 2012-2016” (“Children safe – Plan of action against abuse of children 2012-2016”). I already mentioned this campaign in foregoing Paragraph i. This campaign is launched 28 November 2011 by the Minister of Safety and Justice (mr I.W. Opstelten) and the Secretary of the State of the department Health, Wealth and Sports (mrs M.L.L.E. Veldhuijzen Van Zanten-Hyllner).

In the following a brief summarize of the main points of this Plan of action is provided. Then the focus will be set on a particular section of this Plan, the section regarding to the sexual abuse of children.<sup>71</sup>

i. The three pointers

This plan has three main pointers and these are:

1. Preventing child abuse; the number of victims has to be decreased. The way to effectuate that is through improving the general help with the upbringing of a child and providing assistance to high-risk families;

2. Bundling powers; the cooperation between the different institutions and organisations has to improve on the fields of stopping severe cases and the treatment and help for perpetrators and victims. They aim on a multidisciplinary approach;

3. Approach of violent physical abuse and sexual abuse: the need for tackling sexual abuse is many times under scribed in investigations.

Point 3 of this Plan will be discussed in the following, now this has more relevance regarding to the subject of this report.

ii. Point 3

After several investigations done by certain commission (which are almost all stated here in this report as well), there are three central tasks which has to be fulfilled:

1. Physical safety more explicit

Counsellors and other helpers in youth care should pay more notice to the physical safety of children. This also counts for medical specialists. The physical state of a child can be an important indicator that abuse may be the cause. Between these actors should be a better communication in case of signalling, so adequate action can be taken if needed. Forensic-medical expertise can also be used by determining the case.

2. Approach of child pornography should be integrated in the approach of sexual abuse of children

This point was stressed in the first report of the National Reporter Human Trafficking.<sup>72</sup> The National Reporter came with the quite harsh conclusion that The Netherlands fails on the approach of child pornography. However, it is not only the concern of the government, also public-private organisations and the internet communities could act.

This plan states the following approach:

- Prevention: make people (parents and children) more ‘digi-skilled’ or ‘digi-alert’. The internet offers a lot of opportunities, but it may confront you as well with a lot illegal material like children pornography. People who (intend to) search for children pornography are offered help. It will probably be difficult to reach these people however, since there exist a lot of shame and distrust.

- Online inform button: a special button can be clicked on if a minor sees him or herself confronted with indecent behaviour of other people, such as bullying, abuse, sex or harassing.
- Signalling: the National Reporter suggested to look out for visual material when a case of child abuse or sexual abuse is determined. With Jeugdzorg (Youth care) special agreements and instruments are developed to raise the awareness.
- Stopping: the police and the public prosecutor are not only looking for the downloaders of child pornography, but as well to the makers of it. Regarding to the internet, this is not locally dealt with but on a national level. Also on a national level is that the search for child pornography is prioritized. With this the public prosecutor has to be able to prosecute 25% more perpetrators. This should be all effectuated by the earlier mentioned multidisciplinary approach.

On a regional level the police force is increased so the more officers can work on cases concerning sexual abuse and the making of child pornography.

- After care of child pornography victims: victims should get the best care there is. A big case concerning child pornography in Amsterdam (2011) learned that there are good experiences with adequate after care. This Plan wants to broaden this specific kind of care.
- Improving private-public cooperation: investments will be made in a broadened approach of child pornography with relevant partners like ICT platforms; youth care institutions and care institutions for paedophiles. This can be realised by bringing in map what the main barriers are between the organisations and then anticipate on these.

3. Physical safety in a professional setting

A topic which is on top of the list of the government, but also on the list of organisations in the field. A lot of progress has been made, but the attention should not weaken. The several investigations of earlier en next mentioned commissions should make more clear where improvement is needed and should be realised. The report of the earlier mentioned Commissie Samson is in this context a very important one.

iii. Monitoring and control of the plan

A team of so-called ambassadors will monitor and control the asserting of this plan. To obtain a good monitoring, they will meet the involved institutions and organisations in periodic meetings where the plan will be evaluated. Other tasks of the ambassadors will be keeping certain topics high on the (public) agenda and stimulate specific initiatives.

The National Reporter of Human Trafficking will get a broader report request. Now she reports about child pornography, but she will report about sexual abuse of children, including child pornography.

Different other already existing Inspections are keeping their function on controlling on child abuse.

v. How has the children's perspective represented in the law making process?

This question here is maybe a bit difficult to answer. The point I want to make here is that a lot of measures are realised through policy, but not through hard law. However, the main idea is always that children have to be safe under all circumstances and should not be abused or violated in whatever way. Therefore reports are made, plans are presented in order to decrease the number of abuse and to increase the numbers of conviction. All of this is in the benefit of the child.

vi. Who are the main national Non-Governmental Organisations working on the topic of children's rights? Does the State regulate (or not) their involvement in law making process?

There are two main NGO's which work on the topic of children's rights, one is called 'Kinderrechtencollectief' and one is called 'ECPAT'. In the following I will discuss these two NGO's in a more detailed way.

A. Kinderrechtencollectief<sup>73</sup>

Kinderrechtencollectief exists of several separate (bigger) organisations standing for children's rights on different divisions, so not only regarding to the sexual abuse of children. Their starting point is that if they bundle their powers, they will stand stronger and can make stronger points towards the government. This is important since the State can not neglect the UN Convention of the Rights of the Child.

Thus, one of their main activities is to advise the government concerning children's rights. Kinderrechtencollectief used the recently held elections (12 September 2012) to bring under attention that there should be a lot of attention paid to the people who can not vote, the children. The accord the coalition is going to make should however contain a paragraph regarding children in The Netherlands, which should have as a starting point the UN Convention of the Rights of the Child. This advice is sent 23 August 2012 to the leaders of all political parties.

Other activities can be found in the field of education; special brochures can be obtained as well material in order to hold a presentation about children's rights.

Kinderrechtencollectief is an organisation which has an advising function. The State does not regulate their involvement in the law making process, since it is an independent organisation which only advises.

B. ECPAT<sup>74</sup>

ECPAT stands for 'End child prostitution, child pornography & trafficking of children for sexual purposes'. ECPAT itself is an international organisation, but ECPAT Nederland is the national department. Together with Defence for Children it forms one organisation: Defence for Children. ECPAT Nederland is founded 1995 and tries to raise awareness about the above mentioned topics at the public. They think that if greater awareness arises, public involvement will improve and thus the problem of child abuse will be countered. To achieve this, they provide a lot of educational material, do research, but they lobby as well. ECPAT is also part of the above mentioned Kinderrechtencollectief.

Concerning politics and government the organisation pleads for good assistance and adequate and effective legislation, regarding to the prevention of sexual exploitation of children. Even Internet Service Providers and travellers agencies are summoned to watch out for malicious intentions of their customers.

ECPAT Nederland has a research team, which contains of a lot of academic skilled people, like lawyers specialised in children's rights. Since this is a private organisation, no regulation of the State regarding to the law making process is at the order, in fact ECPAT is not involved in this process.

Are there any other legal or political issues that might be relevant in the respective country? Please keep in mind that ELSA is a non-political organisation, hence only political issues which might affect the data you have provided should have been mentioned here.

In this chapter we will provide the reader information about the biggest scandals ever in the Dutch history of child abuse in children's day care and which has shocked the nation. The central topics in this case (child abuse, child pornography) fit the main topics regarding this report and should therefore not be unnoticed.

We will first start with sketching the situation and the facts. Second, we will bring into view the main points of the report of Commissie Gunning which commission was established to investigate the situation about the current children's day care in Amsterdam. This in-depth report contains a lot of conclusions and advices and serves as guidance for the national politics and legislator.

Children's day care 't Hofnarretje'

In December 2010 the whole nation was shocked by the news that on the Amsterdam babies and children's day care 't Hofnarretje a former male employee, Robert M., had been arrested, being accused of grave abuse of children such as rape, and on a very big scale: 30-50 children. This case came into light after a photo was found in the United States, showing a child with a particular Dutch toy, 'Nijntje'. 'Nijntje' could and eventually was the sign this picture and abuse took place in The Netherlands. The same night after the picture was shown in a Dutch police program, Robert M. was arrested.

The suspect, Robert M. was a foreigner who married a Dutch man and came to work with children in different situations, such as various children daycares but he also worked as a private babysitter. During this 'working' he sexually abused his protégées, whom some of them were extremely young babies and toddlers. He recorded and photographed these actions and shared this self-made child pornography worldwide with other paedophiles.

After his arrest a deep investigation took place and Robert M. admitted he abused and raped at least 87 (very) young children. He was however prosecuted for the abuse and rape of 67 children, since the public prosecutor could only prove these certain cases and next to this fact, some of the parents did not want to have the name of their child appeared on the charges. The public prosecutor claimed for 20 years jail and TBS.<sup>75</sup> His spouse, Richard van O. was also prosecuted. Factually, Richard van O. never abused and raped children with Robert M., but he was accused of having and spreading child pornography. He was also a short time member of earlier mentioned paedophiles association 'Martijn'. Although he never touched children<sup>76</sup>, he never tried to stop Robert M. from his deeds as well. His motivation was that he loved him too much and was afraid he would leave him.

Finally, on 21 May 2012 the Dutch court in Amsterdam decided the following sentences, regarding to Robert M., namely 18 years of years plus TBS. Because his lesser mental sanity, which was proven by mental health experts, the judge shortened the period he has to spend in jail with two years.<sup>77</sup> Robert M. declared he will appeal against his sentence. He does not agree because his fully cooperation with the investigation would have been reason for less punishment. Richard van O., his spouse, heard a jail sentence of 6 years against him, based on proven complicity.<sup>78</sup>

Commissie Gunning

Almost directly after this big case came into light, the mayor of Amsterdam established in December 2010 a certain commission, 'Commissie Gunning' to investigate the situation about the involved children day cares and private babysit companies and how it was possible that the abuse could take place.

This Commissie Gunning came in April 2011 with an extensive report<sup>79</sup> in which it brings into map the situation and many recommendations. Such ad hoc reports are more than valuable in the sphere of protecting children, here specifically children taken care for in children's day cares. In the following I will discuss the conclusions drawn and will discuss shortly a few recommendations. Note that the list is very long (77 recommendations) and therefore we cannot discuss all.

<sup>75</sup> In Dutch criminal law, TBS is a measure the judge can decide for, possibly together with an a jail sentence. In this context TBS means treatment in a special clinic in order to minimize danger for recidivism in the future.

<sup>76</sup> That may be not completely true. Earlier he was accused of assaulting an 11 year old boy though fact was never proved.

Conclusions

Roughly, the commission drew six main conclusions. In the following we will set them out, with a short explanation.

i. 'Principle of four eyes'<sup>80</sup>

The commission stresses the concept that there should always be at least two persons to watch for and hear the children. This is essential to counter abuse. However, one of the results of its investigation is that it is rare practice that there is more than one person functioning. A reason for this is that it is more expensive to employ more staff, but there are exceptions though. There are children day cares which do employ more persons and have no hole in their budget, because they are hiring for example trainees.

ii. More attention for learning to recognise the signals of child abuse<sup>81</sup>

The commission found out that in the event a person is inflicted with signals of child abuse, people do not recognise the abuse or tend to ignore the feeling they get and think that the abuse is not happening. This is wrong. Providing educational material to parents and paying a lot more attention to these subjects in the various studies are the main solutions to effectuate more awareness.

iii. The education level of workers in children day cares should be improved<sup>82</sup>

In case the education level of employees are improved, the workers are able to recognise the first signals of child abuse. Furthermore, there has to be a good mixture of the different degrees in specialisations, meaning people who actually take care for the children and pedagogical workers.

iv. Tougher procedure recruiting and selecting<sup>83</sup>

In the case people apply for a job in a children day care, they need to hand over references and a VOG, a declaration of the municipality in which is stated that the person who requested for it, is of unspoken behaviour. The commission wants sharper control, even after the application and during the working period. That can be periodically checking for VOG's.<sup>84</sup> References, diplomas and such should be available all time at the location.

v. Increase administrative supervision and control<sup>85</sup>

The commission recognises the great importance of administrative supervision and control. Unfortunately, resulting from different report of the national inspection of health care, this supervision and control is in a lot of municipalities under the line. Supervision and control can only work if the specific municipality internally makes a strong hand and acts adequately on this topic.

However, in order to improve there are several points the commission stresses to focus on. One is the quality improvement of lagging day cares. Instead of nagging about structures and legal/administrative stuff, they really need to focus on other aspects like these. The other one is the case of unannounced visitations in order to check certain documents. The commission recommends checking the content of documents on its quality instead of being satisfied when the needed documents are just available.

vi. Children day cares: from care giving to child development<sup>86</sup>

In The Netherlands, children day care is a very popular way of daytime activity for a child when the parents work. Unfortunately, there are not enough places on day cares. The commission then pleas for only good to very good day cares since there are not many places and young parents often do not know what is 'good' whatsoever. The should only choose between those two. Day cares which perform badly, should be under supervision and if there is no improvement, the day care should be closed as a punishment. Another point to stand still with, is that the children day care is a place where children develop and they should do that in a high quality environment and with all safeguards imaginable.

Recommendations<sup>87</sup>

The commission provides a long list of recommendations to the specific actors, like parents, the children day cares and the municipalities. However, the children's day cares are seen as the main actors who are primary responsible for the safety of the children. Like I mentioned earlier, this list is so extensive that it will not be possible to discuss all recommendations. Therefore we will shortly discuss a few of these.

i. Parents should be critical in their choice for a day care<sup>88</sup>

Parents have to be critical in choosing a day care. And when they have chosen one, they should ask for reports of inspections in order to get a full profile.

ii. Camera surveillance<sup>89</sup>

However it is not ideal, camera surveillance could be used in a small scale. The risk exists that spontaneous behaviour will decrease or the visual material gets in the wrong hands.

iii. Introduce annual education programs for staff<sup>90</sup>

In order to maintain the necessary quality in a day care, personnel should be up-to-date according to the knowledge needed.

vi. Dutch as mother language<sup>91</sup>

However in Dutch law is stated that the spoken language on a children day care should be Dutch, this is not always the case. One language maintains the uniformity and clear interpretation of policy, better understanding with parents and a good development of the speech of Dutch language.

v. Ask twice a year for a 'VOG'<sup>92</sup>

As a day care, ask twice a year a VOG of your employees. This is a declaration of 'unspoken behaviour' which can be obtained at the municipality.

vi. Different angle of inspection<sup>93</sup>

In case the GGD (municipal health care service) visits a day care, the focus should not be an administrative-legal test, but much the more a test on quality.

vii. Children day cares as an important policy field<sup>94</sup>

The municipality should recognise children day cares as a very important field which needs policy, now it's in the direct context of the health and wealth of a child.

V CONCLUSION

After so many months of investigation of the Dutch legal system regarding to the child victims of sexual abuse and the victims' position in the society we can summarize the following points:

It is the women's movement who has in the seventies driven attention to sexual violence. Because the feminist analysis of sexual violence emphasized the power differences between men and women as the cause, there was in the beginning with particular attention to sexual violence against women, within such power relations between father and daughter.

In the nineties the focus on the importance of selective prevention shifted to the focus from women as victims to children as victims.

Currently, it lacks a national policy and a national action program to combat sexual violence in all its forms. There is a need for a directing role of the national government.

The need for the government to respect of sexual violence can be the reached the best by setting firmly framework policies. The tangible and intangible costs of sexual violence have been very high. Recent figures show that the number sexual offenses have increased again. Victims are at high risk of post-traumatic stress disorder, major depression or an anxiety disorder to develop.

Moreover, they have a greater chance to become again victims of sexual violence. Male victims often develop later to offenders.

Preventing and addressing sexual violence are necessary for three reasons. First, the number of perpetrators and victims, and thus the costs of sexual violence need reduction. Second, to prevent the victims to develop themselves to perpetrators or further victimization. Third, the impact of sexual violence on victims and their immediate environment must as little as possible and need good initial and adequate assistance. In short, it is necessary to adequately tackle sexual violence through effective prevention, appropriate assistance to victims and their environment and treatment of offenders, framed in a policy.

By implementing the Lanzarote Convention The Netherlands is on a right path of protecting child victims and set an example for other countries.

Though there are some lacking points in the protecting of the children especially when it comes to education of children and their parents of sexual abuse, the Dutch government is quite on the right track of safeguarding children's rights.

I INTRODUCTION

1 GENERAL

i. As a member state of UN, Council of Europe, OSCE and CIS and also as a state whose main foreign policy priority is European Union integration, Ukraine ratified many international legal acts aimed at realization the principle of equity. According to Article 9 of the Constitution of Ukraine these international legal acts after their ratification become a part of national legislation of Ukraine. For example, as a UN member state Ukraine ratified Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, International Convention on Elimination of All Forms of Race Discrimination, a number of ILO documents and UNESCO. Ukraine is also a party to the majority of the Council of Europe antidiscrimination documents. Nevertheless in the European Commission Against Racism and Intolerance report there are few recommendations on the improvement of acceptance by Ukraine international legal standards of equity principle realization insurance. Ukraine is recommended to ratify such international legal instruments as Convention on Participation of Foreigners in Social Life on the Local Level and International Convention on Rights' Protection of Working Immigrants and Their Families' Members. Under its membership in OSCE and CIS Ukraine ratified main acts on human rights that contain equity guarantees.

Equity principle and discrimination counteraction are reflected in such normative-legal acts of national legislation as: Constitution of Ukraine, Law of Ukraine "On National Minorities", "On Languages in Ukraine", "On Refugees", "On Equal Rights and Possibilities of Men and Women Insurance", Criminal Code of Ukraine, Code of Laws of Ukraine on Labour and so on. The institutionalization of this principle takes place with the help of State Committee for Nationalities and Religions and Parliamentarian Representative in Human Rights (Ombudsman).

Article 24 of Constitution of Ukraine provides that "citizens have equal constitutional rights and freedoms and are equal before the law".<sup>1</sup> Also this article highlights the principle of non-discrimination for race, skin colour, religious and other beliefs, ethical and linguistic characteristics reasons. Disadvantage of the formulation in Article 24 is that the principle of equity and non-discrimination embraces only citizens of Ukraine but not all the people that remain under the jurisdiction of the country.

Law of Ukraine “On National Minorities” declare that Ukraine guarantees to citizens regardless of their national origin equal political, social, economic and cultural rights and freedoms, supports the development of national self-consciousness and self-expression. Beside that the Law guarantees to all national minorities the right to national cultural autonomy.

On 3rd July, 2012 Verkhovna Rada of Ukraine (Ukrainian Parliament) adopted a Law “On the Principles of State’s Language Policy” which is aimed to make Ukrainian legislation relevant to the European Charter on Regional Languages and Languages of Minorities, ratified by Ukraine.

Law of Ukraine “On Equal Rights and Possibilities of Men and Women Insurance” defines equal rights of men and women as an “absence of restrictions or privileges according to sex feature” and equal possibilities as “equal conditions for equal rights realization”.<sup>2</sup> This act is aimed to provide gender equity in all spheres of social life and is the reflection of a so called substantive model of equity which foresees the acknowledgement of differences between men and women but does not limit to formal statement of their equity. The existing model of gender equity in Ukraine underlines the importance of insurance of equal possibilities for men and women and allows additional guarantees for women for their rights realization. In order to provide equity of men and women in Ukraine and development of state gender policy it is being realized a UN Development Programme project “Support of National Gender Mechanism”.

On 6th September, 2012 Verkhovna Rada adopted a Law “On principles of Prevention and Counteraction to Discrimination in Ukraine”. According to the norms of the Law “discrimination” is a decision, actions or inactions aimed to provide restrictions or privileges for a person and/or group of people under race features, skin colour, political, religious and other beliefs, sex, age, inability, ethnic or social origin, family and property status, place of living, under language or other features (further on – particular features) if they unable acknowledgement and realization on different grounds human and citizen's rights and freedoms. This Law embraces all the people on the territory of Ukraine. It regulates such spheres of social relations: social and political activities; state service and service at the bodies of local self-government; justice; labour relations; healthcare; education; social protection; housing relations; access to goods and services; other spheres of social relations. The entitled subjects for prevention and counteraction to discrimination are: Verkhovna Rada of Ukraine, Verkhovna Rada of Ukraine Empowered for Human Rights, Cabinet of Ministers of Ukraine (Ukrainian government), other state bodies, power bodies of Autonomous Republic of Crimea, bodies of local self-government, non-governmental organizations, individuals and legal persons.

A person, who considers that the discrimination took place in respect to it, has the right to appeal to the Verkhovna Rada of Ukraine Empowered for Human Rights and/or to the court. The realization of this right cannot be the ground for biased treatment and can not cause any negative consequences for a person who is using its right (Article 14 of the Law).<sup>3</sup>

Article 161 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine forbids

“intentional actions aimed to provoke national, race or religious hostility and detestation, to humiliate the national honour and dignity and to offend citizens’ feelings with regard to their religious beliefs, to restrict directly or indirectly rights or to impose directly or indirectly privileges under the race features, skin colour, political, religious and other beliefs, sex, ethnic or social origin, property status, place of living, under language or other features”.<sup>4</sup>

Beside that cl.1 p.3 Article67 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine classifies racist motivation as an aggravating circumstance. Amended in 2009 p.1 Article300 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine defines the crime

“importation to Ukraine works that popularize ... race, national or religious intolerance and discrimination with the aim to sell or distribute or with the purpose of their production, storage, transportation or other relocation with the same purpose or their sale or distribution and forcing to participate in their production”.<sup>5</sup>

According to the Report in Human Rights Practices of Democracy Bureau, Human Rights and Labour of State Office of the USA from 2011 negative attitude to foreigners of a non-Slavic appearance remains to be a problem. Criminals who committed crimes under race intolerance motives are usually charged with “hooliganism” and related crimes. International rights’ protection organization Amnesty International has the same point of view.<sup>6</sup> Official statistics concerning crimes committed under race intolerance does not exist. According to the data provided by General Prosecution Office of Ukraine 5 people were sentenced for committing crimes under race intolerance motives. Furthermore 4 out of 5 people received amnesty and another person has been released because of its active cooperation with the prosecution bodies and court. Nevertheless in the Shadow Report to the 21st Report of Ukraine on compliance of International Convention on Elimination of All Forms of Race Discrimination there is data on much bigger quantity of crimes committed under race intolerance motives.<sup>7</sup> Remains complicated the situation of protection of the rights of Roma. Facts of discrimination against Crimean Tatars were also registered. Anti-Semitism is expressed mainly in vandalism regarding monuments of Jewish culture, offending expressions in the media, especially during pilgrimage to the Rabbi Nahman grave in Uman.

Since signing of the Agreement between Ukraine and EU on Readmission, the number of migrants, asylum seekers and refugees substantially increased in Ukraine. According to the Amnesty International Report 2010 violations of their rights are often related to the state bodies’ activity.<sup>8</sup> For example, in 2010 300 asylum seekers, who filed an appeal on the decision of refusal of their legal status change, remained without any documents for the whole period of their complaints’ consideration.

In their reports Amnesty International and Minority Rights Group International express disturbance with the limited access of NGOs’ representatives and international rights’ protection organizations to the centres where migrants are kept. The conditions of migrants’ maintenance are also disturbing both in such centres and at the maintenance zone in the “Boryspil” airport.<sup>9</sup>

Despite ratification by Ukraine of the UN Convention on Refugees’ Status that forbids coercive return of individuals to the countries where they can become victims of human rights violations, during 2006-2009 there were registered cases of such returns.

Among other problems in this sphere the following are distinguished: opacity of the procedure of applications for the refugee status consideration, very common are motiveless verifications of migrants’, asylum seekers’ and refugees’ of a non-Slavic appearance documents by the police, realization of economic and social rights.

Gender equity and women’s rights in Ukraine, despite of developed legislative basis in this issue, remain to be the sphere which requires a lot of attention. In the NGOs Coalition, that are engaged in women rights protection, Report, presented for the periodical universal UN review, there were 70 items that highlight the main violations of the gender equity principle and women’s rights in Ukraine.<sup>10</sup>

There are mentioned such issues in the Report as institutional mechanism of gender equity implementation destruction, counteraction to domestic violence, trafficking in person as a result of liquidation of Ministry of Ukraine in family, youth and sports issues, absence of the State programme for gender equity implementation, formal existence of the Gender issues Advisor position, sexism in the information and media dimensions, big difference in salaries of men and women, low level of women representation in the state government mechanism, existence of gender stereotypes in education programmes. Also a lot of attention in the Report of State Office of the USA and miscellany “Pekin +15: international obligations and practices of their implementation” is paid to such problems as violence in families, its detection and suspension difficulties, sexual pretension against women, sex tourism and trafficking in person. It is also distinguished in the miscellany “Pekin +15: international obligations and practices of their implementation” the necessity of address events implementation concerning old women rights protection, women, who live in the rural areas, representatives of ethnic minorities and women-victims of gender violence.<sup>11</sup>

Among other grounds for equity principle violations it worth mentioning the age (children are often subjected to violations in the sphere of education, housing, sexual inviolability, the rights protection of disabled children is problematic as well; old people are discriminated in the sphere of labour, economic and social rights); health condition and disability (access to education, labour market, healthcare, segregation); sexual orientation and gender identity.

Some media reports: “up to 2011 the average salary of women in Ukraine is 8% less than men, that is discrimination against women, of course, and infringement of rights.”<sup>12</sup> Rating of gender development in Ukraine fell by 14 points due to low participation of women in power and social status of women. Even the Pension Code, which rises the retirement age for women, is discriminatory. On one hand, there is an objective trend to equalize the retirement age for men and women. But no one considers unpaid domestic labour of women and they spend about four times more time than men on it.<sup>13</sup> But some politicians in their interviews for press deny the existence of discrimination: “Discrimination is against the weak, those who are looking for reasons, not the solution, who shouted: “Skip the woman!” There is as a lot of women in Verkhovna Rada as: a) the chosen people, b) how many women have decided to go for this.”<sup>14</sup> However, we can often find the mentioning of discrimination against men in the press. For example Labour Code of Ukraine has the signs of sexual discrimination in certain positions. But it applies to men. Society considers discriminatory provisions of the Code that do not provide equal opportunities for men and women to combine family obligations with work responsibilities. In particular, the experts recommended extending to men who have children in the Code of setting for women with children, regarding the reduction of working time, a more flexible work schedule and holidays.<sup>15</sup> Most of appeals to Commissioner of Verkhovna Rada on Human Rights are appeals about discrimination. The highest number of complains is for violations of civil rights (56,2 %) in particular, discrimination against certain classes of society in judicial proceedings. Almost 17% of appeals relating to discrimination in the social sphere, including deprivation of benefits and compensation, violations of the appointment of pensions, providing financial assistance and subsidies. In the third quarter (14%) - notification of the economic rights of citizens: to work, its proper and timely payment, ownership of land. In 12% of complaints on an infringement of personal rights, including rights to personal security, torture, as well as government interference in private lives of citizens and about 2% of appeals concerning violations of political rights. In addition, nearly 100 thousand Orthodox Citizens of Ukraine appealed last year to the Commissioner of discrimination on religious grounds and protection of their rights to an alternative form of registration of natural persons - taxpayers without an identification number and any electronic documentation.<sup>16</sup>

Committee of Verkhovna Rada on Human Rights, National Minorities and International Relations makes regular reports on issues of discrimination that is part of its duties and subject of jurisdiction. In these documents much attention is paid to the issue of gender discrimination. It's important point because in Ukraine we have no women in government, among the heads of regional administrations, including the leadership of the judiciary. We can see the practical removal of Ukrainian women from decision-making at the highest political level, the lack of women in the Cabinet of Ministers of Ukraine, among the heads of regional state administrations, few women deputy heads of executive agencies. In general, women predominate in the civil service, as managers and professionals, respectively 64,8% and 79,5% in early 2010. However, women constitute an absolute majority of civil servants at lower positions on the lower level that requires lower qualifications and, of course, provides a lower level of responsibility and participation in decision making. Only 13.3% in the first official category leaders involved in decision making – it is women.<sup>17</sup> There are only 8% of female members of the general composition in Verkhovna Rada. During the last local elections only 7 women (4.0%) became the head of the city of regional and national importance; the head of towns - 18 (6.5%), head of the village - 151 women (19.5%).<sup>18</sup>

Ministry of Justice is concerned with combating discrimination because its work lies in fact that it consults authorities on special legal issues and analyzes laws. In general, Ministry of Justice makes legal conclusions and analyzes all legal documents relating to anti-discrimination. Sometimes it holds public discussion like discussion on President's draft decree on Strategy to combat discrimination. Report of the Ministry of Justice on this issue includes analysis of the draft decree and list of remarks and reasons why the draft can't be accepted.<sup>19</sup> In the report on overcoming of gender violence Ministry of Justice recommended

“to develop measures for implementation of the campaign to combat violence against women of Council of Europe at the national level; create a database of agencies, institutions and organizations which are aimed at preventing gender-based violence; to attract men to participate actively in the fight against all forms of violence against women, including domestic violence of family”<sup>20</sup>

Actually, if you raise the issue formally, the law currently provides a specific mechanism of protection against discrimination only on grounds of sex. In all other laws there is only declared prohibition of discrimination, but provides no mechanisms to guarantee the victims of discrimination in a particular area or on a particular basis of the right to challenge discriminatory practices in relation to themselves in court or out of court. This problem requires an immediate solution because for example rights of convicted persons are not protected in fact. Access to information on the rights of prisoners in the system is too limited. Practice of not providing answers or only partial information from officials of requests still pending. By department employees who violate the law on information, not taking steps reaction.

So from these reports and other legal documents we can draw some conclusions. First of all Ukraine has no legislation to prohibit discrimination and effective state antidiscrimination policy. But before the law it's necessary to provide the definitions of key concepts related to the phenomenon of discrimination that would be understandable, unambiguous and applicable case law. Now Ukrainian legislation does not meet international standards on human rights and non-discrimination and cannot provide adequate protection to victims of violations, because constitutional guarantees are mainly declarative and today the Criminal Code of Ukraine remains the main source of non-discrimination. The most common subject to discriminatory actions are minors, HIV-infected, pensioners, persons with disabilities and also gender discrimination prevalent in many spheres of social life. As for discrimination of HIV-infected people that are 340 thousand in Ukraine<sup>21</sup>, fifth part of HIV-infected confronted with violations of human rights during last year.<sup>22</sup> However, there are much more references about different types of discrimination in media than in official reports. Thus, members of human rights organizations say about discrimination based on age which begins from 30 years but only 9,7% of people whose rights in professional sphere were violated try to protect their rights. It's easier to find a good job for people of the age of 23-39 because 15% of paper announcements and 58% of internet job announcements include age limits.

"Discrimination based on age is very widespread in Ukraine despite the fact that state and public organizations in theory would have to work on overcoming it. The practice of refusing to accept the post for too young people makes it impossible to learn how to work. Too "old", i.e. people over 50, 40 or even 30 years, are denied a job because those who have the experience, the more difficult to manage manipulative methods to impose meaningful manifestations of corporate loyalty."<sup>23</sup>

According to media reports such discrimination can even cause suicides, like the case when man who has once again been denied employment, citing his 45 years of age committed suicide from the fire unit.<sup>24</sup>

But the greatest resonance in the field of age discrimination has produced another case described by the media when citizen of Kharkiv has filed a lawsuit against an employer who refused to the applicant for employment, citing the young age of the candidate is not enough.<sup>25</sup>

"Not long ago, 54-year-old Alexander turned to the office of the Kharkiv Human Rights Protection Group and complained of the fact that he was refused to be accepted for the post of storekeeper, arguing that it is not appropriate for age. But suddenly the applicant's age troubled employer. Head of the organization did not stand on ceremony and said the man: the main requirement of employment - up to age 30 years. And the most interesting: constituting a claim to court, human rights activists tried to find precedents in the database of judicial decisions in Ukraine, but this kind of case will be considered at first.”<sup>26</sup>

Analysis of judicial practice shows that in most cases courts of appeal instance have acquitted persons accused of discrimination, and courts of third instance left without meeting the application for review of such decisions. This applies to all categories of cases like administrative, civil, and criminal.<sup>27</sup> There was even claim to Prime Minister of Ukraine<sup>28</sup> on protection of personal rights for equality between women and men of honour, dignity and business reputation and non-pecuniary damage at the Supreme Court of Ukraine specialized in handling civil and criminal cases. Plaintiff appealed to the court with a suit, which asked to recognize the speech of Prime Minister of Ukraine: "... it's not for women to carry out reforms ..." as those that have signs of discrimination against women, and it personally insulting her honour, dignity, business reputation, enable her to make public response to the appearance of the defendant in the newspaper "Governmental courier" charge in her favour 1 hryvnia (national currency, 0.125 dollars) pecuniary damage. But court decided to reject cassation complain because Court is set and it is seen from the case that the impugned judgments made in compliance with the rules of substantive and procedural law. These arguments in the cassation appeal the findings of the courts are not denied.<sup>29</sup>

So resolution to the problem of discrimination in Ukraine should involve a wide range of activities including a focus on the level of state institutions (especially the legislative and executive branches of government), and in the sphere of social, charitable, religious and other non-governmental organizations, including human rights and national and cultural associations. It is also important to develop specific rules and make the appropriate changes to existing legislation regarding the establishment of adequate administrative and criminal liability of officers for violation of any rights and for the discriminatory acts. There is a need to mainstream the issue of discrimination in society and develop and adopt a comprehensive anti-discrimination law with the most complete and open the list of possible grounds for discrimination, a clear definition of discrimination, locking mechanism protection from discrimination.

ii. Constitution of Ukraine does not define a term “family” proclaiming that “the family, childhood, maternity and paternity shall be under the protection of the State” (Article 51). Article 3 of the Family Code of Ukraine is devoted to the defining of the term “family”:

“Family is original and the main centre of society. The family is composed of persons living together who are related by common way of life and have mutual rights and obligations. Spouses is considered to be the family even if wife and husband do not live together because of studying, work, medical treatment, the necessity of taking care of parents or children and other valid reasons. The child belongs to the family of his/her parents in case if he/she does not live with them. The single person has the rights of the family member. The family is created on the basis of marriage, blood relation, adoption as well as other grounds not prohibited by law and not contradicting the moral fundamentals of society.”

The Constitutional Court of Ukraine singled out the following features of family and family membership:

“blood relationship, family relationships, marital relationships, and provisions on determination of paternity stated in part 3 of Article 53 give grounds for recognition of factual marriage relationships (concubinage) as one of the features of family.”

Moreover, the term “family” is defined in Article 1 of Ukraine’s Law “On State Social Aid to Indigent Families”, in particular “family is persons who live together, related by common way of life and have mutual rights and obligations.” Separately, the term “family with children” is defined in Article 2 of Ukraine’s Law “On State Aid to Families with Children” as “the circle of persons connected by family ties and obligations to maintain each other, in which own and adopted children as well as children under custody or care are brought up.”

Therefore, the notion “family” is presented through formulation of its features.

Under Article 4 of Family Code of Ukraine, the person who gave birth to child regardless of her age can create the family. Therefore, a connection could exist between the fact of child’s birth and the appearance of new family or inclusion of child as a new member to the existing family of his/her parents (this family is complete) or of one of them (incomplete family is family consisting of mother or father and child (children) by Article 1 of Ukraine’s Law “On protection of childhood”). The creation of new family can take place in case of adoption since the rights and obligations between adopter and adopted child arise to the same extent as between native parents and children. On the contrary, from legal point of view there is no new family and the quantity of members of existing family is not changed in case of transferring the child to grow up in a foster family, in family of foster caregiver, the establishment of children’s home of family type or guardianship. Under such circumstances there are no family relationships between child and the persons who took him/her into foster care but relationships partially equals to them, they are not considered family members and cannot obtain rights and obligations determined by such a status.

Under Article 21 of Family Code of Ukraine,

“Marriage is a marital union of man and women registered in the state registry office. Joint residence of man and women as a family without marriage is not a ground for arising of the rights and obligations of spouses. The church wedding ceremony is not a ground for arising of the rights and obligations of the spouses, unless the church wedding ceremony has taken place before establishment or renewal of state registry bodies. Marriage is based on free consent of man and women. Women or man shall not be forced to get married.”

The term “union” underlines the legislative definition of contract theory of marriage defining its voluntary character.

Therefore, the main features of marriage characterizing the status of marriage in Ukraine could be pointed out:

1. The marriage is a marital union. However, birth of children is not a constitutive feature of marriage, since from legal point of view family exists with the presence or absence of children, and the status of parents is not a part of spouses’ status.
2. It is a monogamous union. National legislation does not endow the person with the right to be in two or more registered marriages.
3. It is an opposite-sex union. Only man and women as persons of different sex can get married.
4. It is an equal union. Spouses have equal rights and obligations.
5. It is a union registered in a state registry body. Joint residence of man and women as a family without marriage is not a ground for arising of the rights and obligations of spouses.

Man and women after acquiring of marriage status are vested with a set of personal non-pecuniary rights and obligations. They are the following: the right to maternity (paternity) (Article 49, 50 of Family Code of Ukraine), the right of wife and husband to respect of her/his personality (Article 51 of Family Code of Ukraine), the right of wife and husband to physical and moral development (Article 52 of Family Code of Ukraine), the right to change the surname (Article 53 of Family Code of Ukraine), the right to disposal of obligations and joint solution of family issues (Article 54, 55 of Family Code of Ukraine), right to freedom and personal inviolability (Article 56 of Family Code of Ukraine).

The marital age attaining which the person has the right to get married is set in Article 22 of Family Code of Ukraine and is equal to 18 years (before the alteration of Family Code of Ukraine by Law №452-VI of 15/03/2012 the marital age for men was 18 years, for women – 17 years). But in accordance with Article 23 of Family Code of Ukraine, after filing a submission by a person attained 16 years of age he/she could be granted the right to marriage under the court decision if court determined that this corresponds to his/her interests.

Taking into account the official report of UN of 2008 concerning World Marriage Data, the average marital age in 2008 in Ukraine was 25,9 years for men and 23,1 for women.<sup>30</sup>

According to L. Slysar, the researcher of Institute for Demography and Social Studies of M. V. Ptuh, nowadays the average marital age is 30 years for men and 27 years for women. Women have an average age at first marriage of 21-24 years and men - 26 years. The most numerous is the quantity of marriages with women who reached 21-23 years of age and men - 23-25 years of age.<sup>31</sup>

The researcher stressed that:

“Ukrainians, like most Europeans, get married later. This is because modern person shall study for a long time and to find profession prior to becoming financially independent and able to maintain family”.<sup>32</sup>

Taking into account the official statistics of State Statistics Service of Ukraine, the latter calculates the marriage's indicators, in particular, the average age at entering into a marriage and average age of the persons who got married for the first time, separately for men and women. In 2010-2011 the average marital age was 30,3 years for men and 27,4 for women. Simultaneously, the average age of persons who entered into a marriage for the first time in 2010 was 26,7 years for men and 24,1 years for women; in 2011 – 26,8 and 24,3 years correspondingly.<sup>33</sup>

The origin of social assistance, care began in ancient families. Later on the same stage society begins to worry about small children. Neighbours paid great attention to children whose parents are sick. They could come to clean the house, cook and eat, etc. After the death of parents, children already had to take care of other family. Thus begins gradual solving the problem of guardianship. Also, people are faced with the problem of succession.

The subsequent period is the period of Kiev Rus. It begins with the 10th century. Then in "Ruska pravda" at first appears the concept of "custody." It is understood that after the death of his parents, guardian of the child is someone of the close relatives. Guardians on loan transferred movable and immovable property belonging to the fatherless. But he was supposed to return everything after the child reaches adulthood.

At the same stage it was typical princely protection and care. Then Prince Vladimir tried various good works to help disadvantaged children. He also urged people to help orphans and children living in poor families. Vladimir bared school for normal children, enabling them to gain at least some level of education.

It is worth mentioning the period of the USSR. That's when children were actively creating organizations focused on child development. Almost all pupils were pioneers.

Also during the Soviet times it was compulsory for children to do sports. All of them were involved in some kind of sport. This has stimulated a good physical development of children.

The status of children in families is determined by different customs and traditions. According to Ukrainian cultural and historical background children, as a rule, live in families that influences on their moral, ethical, spiritual bringing up. A traditional Ukrainian family has one or two children. The parents try to give them good school education, provide them with all necessary facilities for overall, complete development as a personality.

But there are also one-parent families, where the position of children is not so good. Unfortunately, one parent does not have enough possibilities to give his/her child all necessary care.

According to our research results of the reports of International and state organizations and state bodies on human and children rights, we have found out different types of violations which commonly relate to different family types.

Generally, children in full families, complain of not being listened to, their opinions not being taken into account by parents, school authorities, state bodies, courts, etc in cases which are concerned with them.

In incomplete families the situation is worse. The aforementioned problems become secondary. Insufficient material support, lack of parents' attention and care become primary. The largest number of complaints concern violations of children's rights during conflicts between the parents of the child or failure by a parent to fulfil his responsibilities by law or court regarding the child. The most common problems are related to alimonies, appeals relating to the conflict to determine residence of the child whose parents separated or divorced, child abduction by a parent, including interstate kidnapping of children, property disputes between parents or between parents and third parties, whose hostages are children, untimely or wrong calculation of state benefits.

However, the most vulnerable are orphans. The government provides a range of benefits and assistance to orphans and children deprived of parental care. However, social orphanhood becomes rampant. About six thousand children in Ukraine become orphaned each year, having living parents. They are left without parental care. At the same time not many people who wish to adopt a child from a boarding school, can do this because of the low level of financial support.

The task set by the children's social and educational institutions is to ensure optimal conditions of life of orphans and children deprived of parental care. There are also problems with the placement of children after graduation. For most students to continue education is primarily to get a place in a hostel, financial support in the form of scholarships and other benefits established by the state.

According to our research results, there are some approaches concerning the issues directly related to children's rights. In Ukraine on a legal level there is legislative foundation to provide sufficient protection of common children's rights. Depending on the degree of violation, there exists civil, administrative and criminal liability. Despite such legislative basis the society actively discusses inefficiency or incompleteness of execution of Ukrainian legislation by state bodies, courts and individuals.

The majority of cases are directly related to civil liability. Usually these are cases of alimony non-payment, divorces processes, parental rights hostages of which are children. Most often such cases are connected with personal interest of parents, but not the rights of their children.

Another type of liability is administrative. The cases concern different types of minor violations of children's rights by state bodies, such as untimely payment of state benefits, no observance of living conditions of children at special institutions. Unfortunately, in such cases, there is a problem of children representation before the court.

Criminal liability connected with children's rights sets in cases of international kidnapping by one of the parents, rape, sexual abuse, slavery, etc.

In such cases there is hush up of the facts of the crimes. Parents usually put their individual interests prior to protection of children rights. It is connected with the fear of parents of publicity.

On the other hand, because of high corruption level, the cases are often hushed up, or rejected the right to open criminal cases, or are closed on the investigation stage.

Consequently, such information rarely gets sufficient mass media coverage.

According to social polls, the most important issues of childhood are still alcoholism and drug addiction among children and adolescents. The society is concerned with prevalence of children and juvenile's crimes on the ground of social and economic inequality. The third most important problem is low standard of living in Ukrainian families with the children. That is why, the questioned people are sure that these are the most urgent issues which became the reason of various violations of children's rights. Over the past two years, the Ukrainians began to attach more importance to the problems of low living standards of families with children, as well as poor living conditions of orphaned children in institutions. Each year, number of homeless and orphaned children grows substantially. As a rule this is a concern of the state bodies. These children are sent to specialized preschool and school institutions. The concern of population on numerous violations of their rights, abuse and violence against children has been reported in the press. The children's right to secondary school education is assumed to be best realized in Ukrainians' opinion. The interviewed are also satisfied with the fact that rights of children to freedom of expression and their own opinion are respected. The realization of the right to receive medical care in kindergartens, schools, hospitals, special institutions for the handy kept and juvenile criminals is much worse.

The most poorly implemented today are children's rights to protection from violence and abuse in the family and in different institutions, the protection from the information that is harmful to their health and moral development.

Unfortunately, public discussion of problems directly related to the children and their rights is still not very developed. The government and the society do not pay enough attention to such violations. Generally it is connected with the low level of justice understanding and fear of public opinion. We are sure there are still a lot of different cases, which have not received enough general public attention. A great number of cases have not been investigated at all or have been closed on the investigation stage. The main reasons of this are high corruption level, the questions of morality and fear to reveal such cases before public, which can cause various types of damage to the child or a family.

During our research we have not found many cases of violation of children's rights highlighted in the mass media. Among those mentioned in the press is information linked to juvenile suicide due to violations of the rights of children in boarding schools and correctional facilities for juveniles, sexual abuse, children's prostitution and taking part in porno movies, exploration of children's labor in the fields, workshops. There is some general information and statistics about common violations and petty crimes in the state mass media, special government websites, etc.

Regarding the legal framework for the protection of children's rights, we guided the following regulations:

1. Council of Europe Convention Against Trafficking
2. UN Convention on the Rights of the Child
3. Optional Protocol on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography to the Convention on the Rights of the Child
4. Council of Europe Convention on the Protection of Children Against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse
5. Stockholm Declaration and Action Plan against Sexual Exploitation of Children for Commercial Purposes
6. Law of Ukraine "On the National Program National Action Plan for the Implementation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child"
7. Law of Ukraine "On Protection of Childhood"

8. Joint Order of the State Committee of Ukraine for Family and Youth, Ministry of Internal Affairs of Ukraine, the Ministry of Education and Science of Ukraine, Ministry of Health of Ukraine dated 16.01.2004 № 5/34/24/11 "On Approval of the Procedure of Consideration of Appeals and Messages About Child Abuse or Real Threat of It"

9. Law of Ukraine "On Bodies and Services for Children and Special Facilities for Children"

10. The Criminal Code of Ukraine

11. Family Code of Ukraine

According to the Law of Ukraine "On the National Program of the National Action Plan on Implementation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child", Ukraine identified four priority areas of activity: promotion of healthy lifestyles, providing opportunities to acquire high-quality education, protecting children from abuse, violence and exploitation, the fight against HIV/AIDS, and providing a global action plan that focuses on the development and protection of human rights and interests of the younger generation, and the challenges that the international community should perform for children and with children.

However, these indicators are not commonly met. For example, the rate of stillbirths in 2010 was 6.5 (2009 - 6.7, down for 0.2%), the mortality rate of children under one year of birth defects has decreased by 3.1%.

Prosecutor's audit found serious violations of the law on the protection of children's rights in protection of life, health, education, custody, care, work, employment and crime prevention in the structural subdivisions of executive bodies and local authorities, the police.

Guardianship authorities of the executive committees of village councils do not always ensure implementation of the Family Code of Ukraine and the Rules of Guardianship, to exercise control over the conditions of detention, education, teaching of a child under the guardianship or custody, record keeping and personnel files of children in this category.

Shortcomings are being identified in the work of regional criminal police departments for children. Most of these units state that juvenile delinquency is not analyzed; the causes and conditions that led to it are not studied, leading to an increase in crime by 10 months of this year by 21.4%. (Most of them in Kremenchuk, Kozelshchina, Hrebinkivskomu, Semenov and areas in Komsomolsk). Also this year juveniles committed two murders.

Law of Ukraine "On Protection of Childhood" defines child protection in Ukraine as a strategic national priority aimed to ensure the realization of children's rights to life, health, education, social protection and comprehensive development, establish the fundamental principles of state policy in this area.

All the children in Ukraine, regardless of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, property status, health condition or any other circumstances, have equal rights and freedoms defined by this Law and other regulations.

In accordance with the legislation, the state guarantees all children equal access to free legal assistance necessary to protect their rights.

iv. United Nations Convention on Rights of the Child had been ratified in Ukraine on the 27th of February, 1991 by the Resolution of the Parliament of the Ukrainian SSR N 789-XII.<sup>34</sup> Ukraine did not make any restrictions to the Convention.

According to Article 9 of the Constitution of Ukraine<sup>35</sup> ratified Convention is considered to be a part of the Ukrainian national legislation. Consequently, the Convention on the Rights of the Child in accordance with Article 9 of the Constitution of Ukraine is part of the national legislation of Ukraine, and Ukrainian law as well as other legislative rules pertaining to this area should be aligned with the provisions of the Convention.

Based on the provisions of the Constitution of Ukraine, the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and other international instruments, on the 26th of April 2001 the Law of Ukraine "On Protection of Childhood" and a number of other laws aimed at protecting the rights and interests of children have been adopted. Since 2004 the new Civil Code of Ukraine and the Family Code of Ukraine, the basic laws of independent Ukraine, in particular in the field of legal protection of children, entered into force. The new codes have taken into account a number of important observations and recommendations of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child. In recent years a series of public programs aimed at ensuring the rights of the child have been implemented. Resolution of the Verkhovna Rada (Parliament) of Ukraine on January 1, 2006 approved the State Program of National Adoption in Ukraine "Every child - his own family" in 2006-2016.

On the 5th of March, 2009 the Parliament of Ukraine has finally adopted the Law "On the State Program "National Plan of Action for the implementation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child" until 2016"<sup>36</sup>, which has been developing during past five years. As noted in the second part of the Program, the purpose of this document is to ensure optimal functioning of an integrated system of protection of children's rights in Ukraine in accordance with the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and Aims of development, proclaimed by the UN Millennium Declaration, and strategy of the Final document of the special session of the UN General Assembly for children's interests "The world, which is beneficial for children."

The Ombudsman's monitoring proves that, despite the implementation of the best provisions of the international instruments, laws of Ukraine in the sphere of children's rights are mostly a declarative.<sup>37</sup> Therefore, in practice the realization of individual rights of the child, including accommodation, access of talented youth to higher educational institutions, obtaining quality medical services, etc., is especially complicated. The financial and economic crisis has exacerbated these negative phenomena.

This fact is also proved by the numerous NGO's monitoring reports in the sphere of children rights in Ukraine. For example, according to the results of monitoring performed by specialists of the Ukrainian public organization "Human Rights Organization" Common Goal" the status of implementation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child in Ukraine is extremely low.<sup>38</sup> According to this monitoring prepared by the Government of Ukraine 193-page "The combined 3rd and 4th periodic National Report on the implementation by Ukraine of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child", submitted to the UN Committee in autumn 2010, while covering the issues of the Convention and contains extensive statistical material, not fully reflects the real situation and offers no effective ways to implement the Convention and to ensure the inviolability of child rights.

At the same time, the rights of children require special protection from the state, as provided by international instruments and national legislation of Ukraine. Problems relating to children's rights increase, primarily due to lack of a systematic approach of creating effective child protection procedures. Declaring social benefits for children, the state today does not always provide the basic tasks of compliance with the minimum standards for children's rights. For example, well-known is violence and child abuse, unlawful bringing children to work in the most polluted areas of economic activity (work in porn and the sex industry), child trafficking etc.

There is no effective mechanism for coordination and monitoring, which would make a systematic and comprehensive data collection on Ukraine's compliance with all provisions of the legislation of Ukraine and assumed international obligations regarding the rights of the child.

Media do not pay enough attention to the problems of children and childhood, publications and materials are superficial and one-sided scandalous nature. Media mostly do not control and are not covering the activities of law enforcement agencies as a result of the release of material for investigative journalism.

v. In DIRECTIVE 2011/92/EU OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND OF THE COUNCIL of 13 December, 2011 on combating the sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children and child pornography, and replacing Council Framework Decision 2004/68/JHA speaking about suggestions to EU States' legislation. This Directive establishes minimum rules concerning the definition of criminal offences and sanctions in the area of sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children, child pornography and solicitation of children for sexual purposes. It also introduces provisions to strengthen the prevention of those crimes and the protection of the victims thereof.

In 3 to 6 paragraphs of Directive describes offences concerning sexual abuse, offences concerning sexual exploitation, offences concerning child pornography, solicitation of children for sexual purposes and tells about incitement, aiding and abetting and attempt.

In Ukrainian legislation, namely in the Criminal Code we have separate section devoted to sexual abuse in general. In articles of this section child sexual abuse is mentioned but as an aggravating circumstance. The smallest penalty is to 5 years of imprisonment and the biggest punishment is 15 years.

We don't have any State program of protection of children from sexual abuse, but actually we need one.

2 THE LANZAROTE CONVENTION

- i. Ukraine ratified the European Convention on Human Rights on 17.07.1997.
- ii. Ukraine is a party to the Lanzarote Convention. It was signed on 25.10.2007 and ratified on 20.06.2012; it comes into force on 01.12.2012.

With the ratification of the Lanzarote Convention Ukraine added 2 parts:

- Ukraine declares that the state body in Ukraine which has authority for the purposes of paragraph 1 of Article 37 of the Convention is the Ministry of Internal Affairs of Ukraine;
- Ukraine declares that this Convention is the legal basis for cooperation on mutual legal assistance in criminal matters and extradition if a request from the state - party to this Convention, with which Ukraine has no agreement on mutual legal assistance in criminal matters or extradition.

Central Body in Ukraine, which has authority to consider paragraph 3 of Article 38 of the Convention is the Ministry of Justice of Ukraine (on trial or execution) and the General Prosecutor of Ukraine (under preliminary investigation).

v. According to p.5 Article 3 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine, laws of Ukraine on criminal responsibility should correspond to the provisions of international treaties ratified by Verkhovna Rada of Ukraine. For now there is no legislation in Ukraine on implementation of Convention provisions into national legislation of Ukraine.

vi. There is no relevant legislation.

vii. There are 18 legal acts that are partly connected with the Lanzarote Convention.<sup>39</sup> It is worth mentioning that it is international conventions and action plans concerning children rights and interests. There already exists a draft law with amendments “Law draft On Amendments to Some Legislative Acts of Ukraine with respect to Ratification of Council of Europe Convention on Protection of Children from Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse” from 09.11.2011 (№9434). It was suggested in particular to make amendments to Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine, Criminal Code of Ukraine, Law of Ukraine “On Childhood Protection”, Law of Ukraine “On Social Morality Protection”. On 05.07.2012 the consideration of this draft has been suspended. This draft exists only in Ukrainian.

There were six parliamentary committees involved in the ratification of the Convention. However, the Main Committee was the Committee on Foreign Affairs. But consideration of the draft law with amendments to the national legislation is currently adjourned.

viii. Ukraine did not make reservations to the Convention.

II NATIONAL LEGISLATION

1 GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE JURISDICTION

i. The history of state and law of Ukraine is very complicated; it includes many periods of being a part of foreign countries, strong external influence on the development of state and legal system, the story of young democracy, lawful state and civil society. The evolution of state regime of Ukraine contains the following periods:

Historical Period	Dates	Form of the State

Disunity of Kyiv Rus	XII-XIV century
Ukrainian lands belonged to the Big Lithuanian Principality	XIV-XVI century	Monarchy. Main governing bodies – king, royal council, landowners council

Ukrainian lands belonged to Poland	XVI-XVIII century	Nobility republic, governed by elected kings. Sejm existed

On 24th August, 1991 Verkhovna Rada of Ukraine adopted an Independence act of Ukraine. USSR stopped its existence. A new country appeared on the geopolitical map of the world – Ukraine.<sup>40</sup>

On 28th June 1996 the Constitution of Ukraine was adopted.

Article 5 of the Constitution of Ukraine declares that Ukraine is a republic. The carrier of the sovereignty and the only source of power in Ukraine is the people. The people perform their power directly and through the bodies of state power and bodies of local self-government.

Article 6 of the Constitution of Ukraine provides that the state power in Ukraine is performed under the principle of its division to legislative, executive and judicial.<sup>41</sup>

There exists one autonomous republic in Ukraine – Autonomous Republic of Crimea. According to Article 134 of the Constitution of Ukraine it is an inalienable part of Ukraine.

ii. Provisions on human rights and freedoms can be found in Chapter II of the Constitution of Ukraine. It also contains guarantees of human rights and freedoms realization. One of the main guarantees is reflected in Article 3 of the Constitution of Ukraine which stipulates:

“A human being, its life, health, honour and dignity, inviolability and security are acknowledged to be the highest social value in Ukraine. Human rights and freedoms and their guarantees determine the content and direction of a state’s activity. The state is responsible before a human being for its activity. Strengthening and ensuring human rights and freedoms is the main state’s obligation.”<sup>42</sup>

According to Article 22 of the Constitution of Ukraine “human rights and freedoms provided by this Constitution are not exhaustive”.<sup>43</sup>

Constitution of Ukraine foresees different kinds of human rights – Article 27-36.

Constitution of Ukraine has the following references concerning children rights:

1. P.2 Article 24 of the Constitution of Ukraine:

“Equity of men and women is ensured with providing women with equal with the men possibilities in social, political and cultural activity, obtaining education and professional preparation, work and reward for it; with special means concerning labour protection and women’s health, establishment of pension privileges; creation of conditions that allow women to combine work with motherhood; legal protection, material and moral support of motherhood and childhood, including providing of payable vacations and other privileges to pregnant women and mothers”.

2. P.3 Article 51 of the Constitution of Ukraine: “Family, childhood, motherhood and fatherhood are protected by the state”.

3. P.2 Article 52 of the Constitution of Ukraine: “Any violence concerning children and their exploitation is prosecuted by law”.

4. Cl.6 Article 92 of the Constitution of Ukraine:

iii. The task of the Constitutional Court of Ukraine is to guarantee supremacy of the Constitution of Ukraine on the territory of Ukraine with determination whether laws and other legal acts correspond to Constitution of Ukraine and official explanation of laws of Ukraine. In its activity the Constitutional Court of Ukraine is guided by the Constitution of Ukraine, Law of Ukraine “On Constitutional Court of Ukraine” from 16.10.1996 and Regulations of the Constitutional Court of Ukraine. Constitutional Court of Ukraine consists of 18 judges who are elected by Verkhovna Rada, President of Ukraine and Congress of judges of Ukraine.

According to Article 13 of the Law of Ukraine “On Constitutional Court of Ukraine”, the Constitutional Court of Ukraine decides and makes conclusions concerning:

1. Constitutionality of laws and other legal acts of Verkhovna Rada of Ukraine, President of Ukraine, Cabinet of Ministries of Ukraine, Verkhovna Rada of Autonomous Republic of Crimea;
2. Conformity of Constitution of Ukraine to valid international treaties of Ukraine or those international agreements ratified by Verkhovna Rada of Ukraine;
3. Observance of the constitutional procedure of investigating and considering the case of removal of the President of Ukraine from the position under impeachment within Article 111 and 151 of Constitution of Ukraine;
4. Official interpretation of the Constitution and laws of Ukraine;
5. Conformity of the draft law on amendments of the Constitution to the requirements of Article 157 and 158 of the Constitution of Ukraine (concerning impossibility of amending the Constitution of Ukraine in case amendments foresee cancellation or restriction of human rights and freedoms or if they are aimed to cancel independence or violate the territorial unity of Ukraine and impossibility of the second presentation of such draft to Verkhovna Rada earlier than a year after deciding upon this draft).<sup>44</sup>

According to Article 38 of the Law of Ukraine “On Constitutional Court of Ukraine”, forms of application to the court are constitutional presentation and constitutional appeal. Under the definition given in Article 39 of the Law constitutional presentation is a written appeal to Constitutional Court of Ukraine concerning acknowledgement of the legal act (its separate provisions) being unconstitutional, determination of conformity of the draft law on amendments to the Constitution of Ukraine with requirements of Article 157 and 158 of the Constitution of Ukraine, constitutionality of an international agreement or necessity of an official interpretation of the Constitution of Ukraine and laws of Ukraine. A constitutional presentation is also a Verkhovna Rada of Ukraine address on making a conclusion concerning observance of constitutional procedure of investigation and consideration of the case of removal of the President of Ukraine from the position under impeachment, violation by Verkhovna Rada of Autonomous Republic of Crimea the Constitution of Ukraine or laws of Ukraine. Subjects of constitutional presentation are the President of Ukraine, not less than 45 deputies of Ukraine, Supreme Court of Ukraine, Verkhovna Rada of Ukraine Commissioner on human rights, Verkhovna Rada of Autonomous Republic of Crimea. In some cases subjects of constitutional presentation can be other state power bodies and local self-government.

According to Article 42 of the Law constitutional appeal is a written appeal to the Constitutional Court of Ukraine concerning the necessity of an official interpretation of the Constitution of Ukraine and laws of Ukraine in order to provide realization or protection of constitutional human rights and freedoms and rights of legal persons. Subjects of constitutional appeal are citizens of Ukraine, foreigners, persons without citizenship and legal persons.

Nowadays the only violated rights protection mechanism is addressing courts. In Ukraine there is the following model of judicial system:

1. Local general courts,
2. Courts of appeal in oblasts, Court of Appeal of the city of Kyiv and Sevastopol, Court of Appeal of ARC,
3. Higher specialized court of Ukraine in civil and criminal cases,
4. Supreme Court of Ukraine.

iv. According to Article 2 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine tasks of criminal justice are the protection of rights and lawful interests of individuals and legal persons who participate in it, quick and comprehensive investigation of crimes, detection of guilty persons and providing of proper implementation of the Law in order to punish everybody who committed a crime and ensure that nobody innocent is being punished.<sup>45</sup>

Article 33 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine provides that all criminal cases are considered by district, city districts', city and intercity courts. Before the court considers the case in the first instance there is a preliminary examination of the case by a judge. Depending on the results of the preliminary examination of the case the judge makes one of these decisions: to appoint the case to a trial; to terminate the investigation in the case; to return the case to the prosecutor; to direct the case according to the jurisdiction; to close the case or to return it for additional investigation.

In order to provide the right to appeal against the court's decision the judicial system of Ukraine foresees the possibility to address the court of the appeal instance. According to Article 356 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine appeals against the court's decisions of district, city districts', city and intercity courts are considered by the Court of Appeal of the Autonomous Republic of Crimea, oblasts' courts of appeals, cities of Kyiv and Sevastopol. Depending on the results of the case consideration the court can leave the verdict without changes, abolish the verdict or change it. In some cases the court of appeal has the right to abolish the verdict of the first instance court and bring its own one.

The next instance for the case revision is cassation. According to Article 383 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine, "cassation refers to verdicts and ruling of the court of appeal made by it during the appeal procedure." Article 385 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine provides that cassation complaints are considered by the board of judges of the Judicial Chamber in criminal cases of the Higher Specialized Court of Ukraine in civil and criminal cases.<sup>46</sup>

With respect to its competence determined by the Law of Ukraine "On Judicial System and Judges' Status", HSCU considers cases of civil and criminal jurisdiction under the cassation procedure according to the procedural law; analyzes courts statistics, learns and generalizes courts practice; provides methodical help to courts of a lower level with the aim of equal application of the Constitution norms and laws of Ukraine in judicial practice; provides specialized courts of a lower level with recommendation interpretations of legislation implementation concerning consideration of cases of particular jurisdiction.

After considering the case by the Court, it can leave the verdict, ruling or decision without changes and cassation complaints without satisfaction; abolishes the verdict, ruling or decision and directs the case to a new investigation or new court's or appeal procedure; abolishes the verdict, ruling or decision and closes the case; changes the verdict, ruling or decision.

According to Article 397 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine, "cassation court does not have the right to strengthen the punishment or apply law on more serious crime".

Despite appeal and cassation procedures Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine foresees the procedure of courts decisions revision under newly detected circumstances. The revision of the court's decision by the Supreme Court of Ukraine is possible in case of unequal application by the cassation court the same provisions of the criminal law concerning similar socially dangerous actions that led to making different by content courts decisions or detection by an international judicial organization, which jurisdiction is acknowledged by Ukraine, the violation of international obligations by Ukraine during the consideration of the case. After considering the case the Supreme Court of Ukraine makes a ruling on the satisfaction of application or denial in satisfaction of the application.

v. Both Criminal Code of Ukraine from 1960 and valid Criminal Code of Ukraine<sup>47</sup> impose the general age for criminal responsibility from 16 years. According to p.2 Article 22 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine individuals who have committed a crime in the age from 14 to 16 years will bare criminal responsibility only in case of: intentional murder (Article 115-117), state or social figure life infringement, official of the rights protection body, member of a civil formation on social order protection and state's border or serviceman, judge, juror with respect to their activity, execution of justice, protector of the interests or representative of the person with respect to their activity connected with providing legal aid, foreign country representative (Article 112, 348, 379, 400, 443),

Article 7-3 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine foresees the procedure of solving cases on socially dangerous activities committed by individuals who did not reach the age of criminal responsibility. A person in the age from 11 years, suspected in committing a socially dangerous act, which has the features of an act for which the Criminal Code of Ukraine imposes a punishment of over 5 years of imprisonment, and which did not reach the age of criminal responsibility and concerning which there is enough of grounds to consider that it will be avoiding investigation and trial or executing procedural decisions, obstructing in establishment the truth in a case or continuing unlawful activity, can be placed in a receiver-distributor for children for 30 days. This term can be prolonged in the case of grounds availability for 30 days more. Investigator after establishing in the criminal case that the socially dangerous act was committed by a person in the age of above 11 years and before reaching the age of criminal responsibility introduces a ruling on closing of the case and application to the juvenile coercive educational measures. The case together with the ruling is transferred to the prosecutor.<sup>49</sup>

The official web site of the State penitentiary service of Ukraine does not contain statistic data on the quantity of juveniles kept in investigatory solitary confinement cells of the Service. According to the right of access to public information within the research an inquiry has been made to the State penitentiary service of Ukraine with regard to the Law “On Access to Public Information”. ## 2 SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW

i. National legislation of Ukraine does not contain the definition of a term “sexual activities” though it is used in the legislation, in particular in the Law of Ukraine “On Violence Prevention in the Family”, Law of Ukraine “On Social Morality Protection”.

The term “sexual activities” should be applied broadly. Unfortunately national legislation of Ukraine does not foresee any responsibility for some crimes of a sexual character, for example such crime as “sexual pretension”.

ii. The word “intentionally” in Criminal Code means “with intent”. Article 24 of Criminal Code divides intent into two categories: direct and indirect intent, providing an explanation to both of them.

“Direct intent is the intent when a person was aware of socially dangerous character of his act (action or inaction), foresaw its socially dangerous consequences and wished its occurrence.

Indirect intent is the intent when a person was aware of socially dangerous character of his action (act or inaction), foresaw its socially dangerous consequences and although did not wish but knowingly assumed its occurrence.”

Legislative definition of direct and indirect intent includes three features characterizing psychic treatment of a person to committed act and its consequences: 1) person’s awareness of social danger of his act; 2) foresight of socially dangerous consequences of his act; 3) wish of the consequences occurrence or knowing assumption of its occurrence. The first two features (awareness and foresight) characterize the processes occurring in the person’s psyche, as a result, making up the intellectual component of intent. The third feature (wish or knowing assumption of consequences) characterize the volitional sphere of a person making up the volitional component of intent.

Criminal liability for an intentionally committed crime of sexual abuse varies depending on the specific circumstances of the crime committed. It is strictly fixed in Chapter IV (Crimes against sexual freedom and sexual inviolability) of Criminal Code (Article 152-156).

iii. The legislation of Ukraine does not foresee a particular age for engaging in sexual activities. It is considered that it requires sexual puberty. Sexual puberty embraces only biological factors and is not connected with reaching certain age. It happens individually in any case. For consideration of sexual puberty a forensic medical expertise is applied concerning sexual stages which define whether a person reached sexual puberty (Ministry of Healthcare Order from 17.01.1995 №6 “On Development and Improvement of Forensic Medical Service”). Criminal Code of Ukraine foresees criminal responsibility for sexual relations with a person who did not reach sexual puberty. The subject of this crime is a person who reached 16 years. If both children are engaged in sexual activities before 16 years, their actions would not be punished in case of mutual consent and if there was no other crime of a sexual character committed.

iv. The use of force, taking advantage of disability or threat as constituent elements of crime “rape” (Part 1 of Article 152 of Criminal Code) are foreseen in its main corpus delicti. Thus, to qualify the rape at least one of the three ways of its commitment should be proved – use of force, threat or taking advantage of disability (“helpless state” under Criminal Code). One of the aggravated corpora delicti of rape pertains to minors aged from 14 till 18 and another one (particularly aggravated) to minors aged till 14 (Part 2 and 4 of Article 152 of Criminal Code correspondingly).

The same approach is applied to the regulation of crime “forcible sexual satisfaction in unnatural way” (Article 153 of Criminal Code) where the use of force, taking advantage of disability or threat is set forth as constituent elements of the crime, and commitment of the crime in relation to minors till 14 and minors till 18 is qualified as aggravated corpus delicti of the crime (Parts 2 or 3 of Article 153 of Criminal Code).

Also if there is another body of the crime present in the actions of a person its actions are qualified as a totality of crimes, for example “rape” and “serious corporal injuries infliction”.

v. The term “incest” is not used in national legislation. Legislation of Ukraine contains a definition of a term “sexual violence in a family”. According to Article 1 of the Law of Ukraine “On Violence Prevention in a Family”, sexual violence in a family is an unlawful assault of one member of the family on sexual inviolability of another member and actions of a sexual character against juvenile member of the family. There is a criminal responsibility foreseen for committing sexual violence in a family.

Applying general definition of incest as “sexual intercourse between family members and close relatives”<sup>50</sup> we can find references to it in Criminal Code, in particular, in:

- Part 2 of Article 155 “sexual activities with a person who did not reach puberty”;
- Part 2 of Article 156 “corruption of minors”<sup>51</sup>.

In the first case incest could be inferred from Part 2 of Article 155 (“sexual activities with a person who did not reach puberty”) that establishes the criminal liability for sexual activities with a person who did not reach puberty committed by father, mother, stepfather, stepmother, guardian, or the person who has undertaken the obligations of taking care of that person.

“The separation of mentioned persons as special subjects of the crime is quite justified from the set of circumstances. Foremost, it is those persons who are responsible for taking care and upbringing of minors. [...] The cases of incest place the greatest social danger. The most essential harm to sexual inviolability of minors is caused by actions committed by parents (pedophilic incest). [...] The cases of pedophilic incest influence on social morality to the great extent, general care for growing generation, which is the reason why a social danger of paedophilic incest is higher than other paedophilic actions”.<sup>52</sup>

In accordance with Article 10, 12 of Ukraine’s Law “On the Protection of Childhood”,

“State protects child from all forms of physical and psychical violence, insult, negligent and cruel treatment, including sexual abuse and sexual abuse by parents or persons who substitute them. Parents or persons who substitute them have the right and duty to bring up a child, take care of his health, physical, intellectual and moral development, studying, to create due conditions for his natural skills development, to respect his dignity and prepare him for independent life and work. Parents and person who substitute them hold liability for violation of rights and restrictions of a child’s legal interests to health protection, physical and psychical development, studying, non-fulfilment of parental obligations in accordance with law.”

As a result, the punishment foreseen for sexual activities with person who did not reach puberty committed by father, mother, stepfather, stepmother, guardian, or the person undertaken the obligations of taking care of that person is harsher (5-8 years imprisonment with the deprivation from the right to hold certain office or deal with certain activity to the term 3 years or without such term) than those for the main corpus delicti of the crime in accordance with Article 155 of Criminal Code (restriction of freedom or imprisonment up to five years).

It is necessary to refer to the court practice. In conformity to Clause 16 of the 5th Resolutions of the Plenum of Ukraine's Supreme Court of May, 30, 2008,

“voluntary sexual activities with the person who did not reach puberty establish the corpus delicti of the crime foreseen by Article 155 of Criminal Code in case the guilty person realised (reliably knew or assumed) that victim did not reach puberty as well as had to and could realise that. Voluntary sexual activities are recognised those exercised without the use of force, threat of its using and taking advantage of disability (helpless state of a victim). If a victim due to mental retardation or minor age could not understand the character and meaning of committed actions as to him/her, sexual activities with such a person need to be qualified as rape with the use of helpless state of a victim (Article 152 of Criminal Code).”<sup>53</sup>

Thus, courts in case there is no consent of a person to be engaged in sexual activities usually qualify the actions of the guilty person as rape committed in relation to minor (Part 4 of Article 152 of Criminal Code). The absence of consent should be proven by physical harm the type of which is established by obligatory forensic examination.<sup>54</sup>

The second case of inferred incest is provided in Part 2 of Article 156 of Criminal Code as committing of corruptive actions as to a person who did not reach 16 years (“corruption of minors”) by father, mother, stepfather, stepmother, guardian, or the person undertaken the obligations of taking care of a victim.

What are corruptive actions? We would like to highlight a national court practice.

“Corruptive actions are to have sexual character and can be in form of physical actions or intellectual corruption. These actions are directed at satisfaction of sexual passion of a guilty person or sexual instinct excitation of minor. Physical corruptive actions should be considered outcrop of genitals of guilty person or victim, lewd fondling causing sexual excitation, teaching sexual perversions, simulation of sexual intercourse, inclination or compulsion of the victims to exercise certain sexual activities between themselves, committing sexual intercourse or masturbation act in the presence of a victim etc. Intellectual corruptive actions are acquaintance of a victim with pornographic images, videos, cynical talks with her on sexual topics etc.

Corruptive actions can be committed by male as to female and vice versa, as well as between persons of the same sex, but in all cases the victim is a person who did not attain 16. Previous behaviour of the victim (including her previous sex life) does not influence the qualification of actions of the guilty person under Article 156 of Criminal Code.”<sup>55</sup>

The criminal liability for committing this crime is set up in the form of 5-8 imprisonment with the deprivation of the right to hold certain office or deal with certain activity to the term 3 years or without such a term. Therefore, the liability is severer than those set up for “corruption of minors” by not a close person (it is restraint of freedom up to 5 years or an imprisonment up to the same term).

vi. As for specific provisions, the first one concerns those taking advantage of the workplace. Article 154 of Criminal Code is specifically devoted to compulsion to sexual intercourse. The main corpus delicti of the crime foresees “compulsion woman or man to sexual intercourse by natural or unnatural way committed by a person from whom a woman or man are materially or officially dependent.” The punishment foreseen for the crime committed is set forth as a fine up to fifty non-taxable minimum of citizens’ income or arrest up to six months.

The Plenum of Ukraine’s Supreme Court gave the interpretation of some provisions dealing with the above mentioned crime,

“The courts should take into account that the corpus delicti of crime foreseen by Part 1 of Article 154 of Criminal Code can take place only provided that it is proven that the influence was done on a male or female victim with the use of his/her material or service dependence from the guilty person with the aim to compel her to engage in sexual intercourse by natural or unnatural way against his/her will. Thus, under Clause 1 of Article 154, the sexual intercourse by natural or unnatural way shall be understood as a natural sexual act, act of sodomy or lesbianism to which according to guilty person’s intent a victim has to agree as a result of his/her compulsion.

Material dependence of a victim occurs when the victim is on full or partial maintenance of the guilty person, lives in the latter’s apartments, and when the guilty person due to his/her acts or inaction is able to cause essential deterioration of the material state of the victim. Official dependency takes place when woman or man holds an office under which he/she is subordinate to the person using compulsion or falls under the control of such a person, or victim’s interests depend on official status.

The only proposition to engage in a sexual intercourse without the compulsion made in relation to the person who is materially or officially dependent from the offerer does not fall under the corpus delicti envisaged by Article 154 of Criminal Code. Compulsion shall not be considered as a promise to another person to improve his/her material or official state if woman or man expresses consent to engage in sexual intercourse.”<sup>56</sup>

The second specific provision is Part 2 of Article 155 of Criminal Code that has been mentioned above. It sets forth sexual activities with person who did not reach puberty committed by father, mother, stepfather, stepmother, guardian, or the person who has undertaken the obligations of taking care of that person. The punishment set out for committing such crime is 5-8 years imprisonment with the deprivation from the right to hold certain office or deal with certain activity to the term 3 years or without such a term. The punishment is harsher than those set out in Part 1 of Article 155 (the main corpus delicti of the crime without the aggravating circumstance – commitment by a special subject) since it is set out in the form of restriction of freedom or up to 5 years imprisonment.

Article 156 “Corruption of minors” also contains Part 2 with a special subject of the crime, in particular, “father, mother, stepfather, stepmother, guardian, or the person who has undertaken the obligations of taking care of a victim”. The crime foreseen by Part 2 of Article 156 is punishable by 5-8 years imprisonment with the deprivation of the right to hold certain offices or exercise certain activity up to 3 years or without such a term. In the same time the punishment for the main crime “corruption of minors” (Clause 1 of Article 156 of Criminal Code) is determined alternatively: in the form of 5 years restriction of freedom or 5 years imprisonment. Consequently, the criminal liability for committing the crime by special subject is harsher in both cases confirming more socially dangerous character of the crime committed by a person legally responsible for taking care of a child.

As for the interpretation of the notions “guardian or the person undertaken the obligations of taking care of that person”, it should mean patronage guardian, foster father (foster mother), foster father from children’s home of family type. Some of the authors propose to add to this category the person who took a child to his/her family who is an orphan or because of another grounds is deprived of care.<sup>57</sup> Nevertheless, to define as a special subject only the persons related by blood would substantially restrict the circle of persons who have the legal obligation to take care, educate and develop a child. Then it is quite justified and expedient to spread the notion “the person who has undertaken the obligations of taking care of that person” to cover other persons who are entrusted to care for a child. In accordance with Ukraine’s legislation, a wide range of people have the obligations of care for person who did not reach puberty. They are the following: the persons who 1) exercise care and education of children of pre-school age (heads of institutions, teachers, nurses), 2) exercise care and education in school and extracurricular educational institutions (heads of institutions, their deputies, teachers, psychologists), 3) carry out organization of free time and rest for children in recreation camps (heads of camp and their deputies, teachers, organizers of educational, art and sport activity etc.), 4) carry out oversight, education and observance of the regime of serving punishment in correctional educational institutions for the minors who have committed socially dangerous acts or crimes (heads of the unit, teachers, psychologists etc.) The decisive legal characteristic of these persons is a direct vesting them with the obligation of maintenance, taking care, education, custody and development of minors.<sup>58</sup>

vii. Ukraine is a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Human Trafficking. It was ratified on the 21st of September, 2010.

viii. Unfortunately, Ukrainian legislation doesn’t content the definition of “child prostitution”. It takes the definition given by the Lanzarote Convention, where child prostitution means the use of a child in sexual activities for remuneration or any other form of consideration. The Code of Ukraine on Administrative Offences contents the punishment for prostitution, but there is no differentiation on adult or child prostitution (Article 181-1 of the Code of Ukraine on Administrative Offences). The general age for administrative responsibility is 16 years. Children in the age from 16 to 18 years are considered to be not victims of this crime but offenders. This kind of situation is a violation of children rights and Ukrainian legislation should be amended correspondingly.

ix. Criminal Code of Ukraine criminalizes only the recruiter (the person that coordinates the business of child prostitution) for creating or running brothels, and also trading in prostitution.

Article 303 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine “Procuring or involvement of a person into prostitution” foresees responsibility for involvement of a juvenile or infant person into prostitution or forcing to prostitution. If abovementioned acts committed by engaging a minor – that is aggravating circumstance, that causes greater penalty. The user (the person that pays to conduct sexual activities with children) doesn’t get punished under criminal or administrative responsibility.

Loopholes in legislation give a “green light” to foreigners who come to Ukraine to get sexual services from children and choose Ukraine because they are not liable for their actions here. In 2012 Centre La Strada-Ukraine with Centre of social expertises of Institute of sociology NAS Ukraine, Criminalist association of Ukraine and Kharkiv national university of internal relations conducted a research “Children sex-tourism in Ukraine: an attempt of situational analysis”. Researchers name the following reasons of sex-tourism in Ukraine being common: social and economical factors of sex-tourism development, influence of the environment on the development of children’s personality, children abandonment, alcoholism and drug abuse, lack of proper social protection, accessibility of Ukrainian women, little probability of being punished for sex with a child, cheap sex services, cheap accommodation, alcohol, well developed infrastructure, the possibility to get sex services confidentially, absence of visa regime.

There were several attempts to improve national legislation in protection of children’s rights in the sphere of combating child prostitution. One of them is the “Draft Law on Amendments to Some Laws of Ukraine on Combating Child Prostitution” which was registered on the 12th of November 2011. The amendments included: to establish responsibility for the user, to distinguish the “adult” and “child” prostitution and to establish different types of liability, to establish social rehabilitation to children, who were prostitutes. But it was withdrawn.

2.3 Child Pornography

x. Ukraine is a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime. It was signed on the 23 of November 2001 and ratified on the 7th of September 2005.

xi. According to the Lanzarote Convention the term “child pornography” shall mean any material that visually depicts a child engaged in real or simulated sexually explicit conduct or any depiction of a child’s sexual organs for primarily sexual purposes. In Ukrainian legislation the meaning of the above mentioned term was widen. According to the law of Ukraine on ‘Protection of Public Moral’ “child pornography” is any material that visually depicts a child or a person appearing to be a minor engaged in real or simulated explicit conduct or any depiction of a child’s sexual organs for primarily sexual purposes. The definition given by the Law corresponds to the Conventional definition.

xii. Criminal Code of Ukraine had criminalized crimes concerning child pornography. These are: importation into Ukraine for sale or distribution purposes, or production, transportation or other movement for the same purposes, or sale or distribution of pornographic images or other items, containing child pornography, and compelling minors to participate in making pornographic works, images or motion and video films, computer programs. The person conducting these crimes shall be punished by imprisonment of five to ten years with the deprivation of the right to occupy certain positions or engage in certain activities for a term up to three years and forfeiture of pornographic items, motion pictures, video films, computer programs, and means of their making, dissemination and showing (p.4 Article 301 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine).

xiii. Ukraine while ratifying the Convention on Cybercrime reserved the right not to apply subparagraphs 1.d. (procuring child pornography through a computer system for oneself or for another person) and 1.e. (possessing child pornography in a computer system or on a computer-data storage medium). The Ministry of Interior Relations of Ukraine is responsible for disclosing offences concerning child pornography. There is a department on combating with cybercrime and trafficking in people.

There is the National Expert Commission of Ukraine on the protection of public morals. The main objective of the Commission is examination of products, events and sexual or erotic material and products containing elements or promoting the cult of violence, cruelty, pornography. Commission in accordance with its tasks: analyzes TV, radio and video production, repertoire of theatres, films and videos, production of printed media, as well as events and their accordance with legislation on the protection of public morals; takes measures to prevent the proliferation and prohibition screenings and programs, information materials, entertainment activities that might harm public morality; provides advice to public authorities and local governments, individuals and entities with government regulation and control over the circulation of goods and spectacles sexual or erotic nature; creates a database (catalogue) of all products with a sexual character and products containing elements of erotic, violence and cruelty; archive of erotic, pornographic products and products containing propaganda of a cult of violence and cruelty; publishes the conclusion of compliance with legislation on the protection of public morality about:

- printed production of sexual or erotic nature, intended for sale and distribution in designated places;
- events with sexual or erotic nature, held by individuals and legal entities in specially designated areas;
- production of electronic media with a sexual nature, production of audio and video cassettes recordings with sexual or erotic nature intended for sale or the provision of public rental;
- audio and video production with a sexual or erotic nature, designed to display in cinemas.

Having such responsibilities the abovementioned Commission takes expertise and gives the conclusion whether the given material is pornographic. If necessary the Commission has the right to address rights protection bodies and court.

xiv. National legislation of Ukraine does not foresee criminalization by separate articles of Criminal Code of Ukraine intentional behaviour concerning: children recruitment for participating in pornographic performances or children inducement for participation in such performances, forcing children to participate in pornographic performances or getting profit from that or another exploitation of children with this purpose, conscious attendance of such performances in which children are involved.

Article 304 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine imposes criminal responsibility for involving juveniles in criminal activity. Involvement into criminal activity is expressed by actions of an adult person connected with direct psychological or physical influence on the juvenile and committed with the aim to provoke the desire to participate in one or several crimes by conviction, intimidation, corruption or fraud, etc. Direct object to this crime is a normal moral development of juveniles, persons under 18 years old.

2.4 Corruption of Children

xv. In case a child becomes a witness of sexual violence or sexual actions according to national legislation it is not qualified as “corruption of children” (Article 156 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine). First part of the article foresees criminal liability for committing corruptive actions against a person who did not reach 16 years. The second part foresees commitment of the same actions against infant person by father, mother of a child or a person that substitutes them. Corruptive actions can be physical (baring of victim's genitals, touching them, conducting sexual activities in the presence of a child, etc.) or intellectual (demonstration of pornographic images, etc.). The consent of a child for corruptive actions commitment does not matter for the criminal valuation of the guilty person's actions.

2.5 Solicitation of Children for Sexual Purposes

xvi. Ukrainian legislation does not criminalize children corruption through Internet. Communication technologies development makes the problem of children corruption through Internet (grooming) more serious. Children institutions are not equipped with special systems that would block pornographic web sites. Nowadays it is performed mostly by parents. Moreover a person that corrupts a child through Internet could be liable only under Article 156 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine but in most cases it is very difficult to prove that crime even if the criminal arranged a meeting with a child. The mechanism of proving this kind of crimes is not foreseen by Ukrainian legislation.

xvii. Ukrainian legislation prescribes liability for preparation to a crime (Article 14 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine), attempt to a crime (Article 15 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine) and accomplices in a crime (Article 26-31 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine). It also concerns crimes of a sexual character. Preparation, attempt and accomplices are also considered to be a crime committal and according to the legislation of Ukraine criminal will be liable for that.

2.6 Corporate Liability

xviii. Corporate liability in Ukraine does not exist as such. Legal persons' responsibility can be civil and in some cases administrative. The legislation of Ukraine prescribes legal persons' responsibility that violate legislative norm in a form of monetary charge (fine), termination of a license, etc.

Criminal responsibility concerns only individuals but in some cases of imposition of punishment the legislation of Ukraine distinguishes individuals according to their positions. Criminal Code imposes on coordinators, servants of legal persons of all property types bigger responsibility, accordingly they will be punished for crime committal more severely than ordinary workers of a legal person.

It is worth mentioning Article 21 of the Law of Ukraine “On Public Morality Protection” which provides:

“Violation of norms of legislation of Ukraine on public morality protection, conditions of goods circulation, and procedure of conduct performance events of sexual character and production distribution which contains pornographic elements causes civil, disciplinary, administrative or criminal liability according to the valid legislation of Ukraine. Actions of state power bodies’ chairman, local self-government, mass media, institutions and organizations of all property forms, legal and physical persons that violate norms of this Law can be appealed before court.”

In case a newspaper is distributing a pornographic production responsible for that will be both the legal person itself (annulment of the license) and the owner of the newspaper (distribution of pornographic materials, Article 301 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine).

xix. Legislation of Ukraine foresees civil, disciplinary, administrative or criminal responsibility.

As it has been mentioned already legal persons can bare civil and in some cases administrative responsibility.

Individuals bare all kinds of responsibility. Depending on the occupied position the individuals’ responsibility extent can vary.

xx. No, Ukrainian legislation does not exclude individual responsibility when it comes to legal persons’ responsibility (corporate responsibility).

2.7 Aggravating Circumstances

xxi. The availability of aggravating circumstances influences on the qualification of a crime and on the extent of sentenced punishment as according to Ukrainian legislation punishment of crimes of a sexual character have an alternative sanction and it is decided by the court in every particular case separately.

Article 67 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine provides a comprehensive list of aggravating circumstances:

1. commitment of a crime repeatedly and setback of crimes;
2. commitment of a crime by a group of people or under prior conspiracy;
3. commitment of a crime on the ground of race, national or religious hostility or enmity;
4. commitment of a crime in relation to execution by the victim its official or social obligation;

5. serious consequences caused by the crime;
6. commitment of a crime against infant, old person or a person in a helpless state;
7. commitment of a crime against a pregnant woman if the guilty person was aware of that;
8. commitment of a crime against a person who was materially, officially or in another way dependant from the guilty person;
9. commitment of a crime with the usage of infant or a mentally sick person;
10. commitment of a crime with exclusive cruelty;
11. commitment of a crime under military or emergency situation, other extraordinary events;
12. commitment of a crime in a generally dangerous way;
13. commitment of a crime by a person under alcohol or drug intoxication.

2.8 Sanctions and Measures

xxii. It should be mentioned that Law of Ukraine of 01.06.2010 N 30<sup>59</sup> strengthened the liability for crimes against sexual freedom and sexual personal integrity. In majority of cases deprivation of freedom (imprisonment) should be applied for offenders, but for minor offenses deprivation of the right to occupy certain positions or be engaged in certain activities, confinement and penalties can be applied. When the object of the crime is a child (an underage person), this fact is considered to be an aggravating circumstance which leads to applying tougher sanctions for a crime. For example:

Rape shall be punishable by imprisonment for a term of three to five years. Rape of a juvenile (under the age of 18) shall be punishable by imprisonment for a term of seven to twelve years. Rape of a minor (under the age 14) shall be punishable by imprisonment for a term of ten to fifteen years.

Satisfaction of sexual desire in an unnatural way with the usage of physical violence, threats of it or using the helpless state of the victim is punishable by imprisonment for up to five years. The same crime committed against a minor or a juvenile shall be punishable by imprisonment for a term of three to ten years. The same crime committed against a minor or a juvenile that caused any especially grave consequences, shall be punishable by imprisonment for a term of ten to fifteen years.

Sexual intercourse with a person, who has not reached puberty, shall be punishable by confinement for up to five years or imprisonment for the same term. The same crime committed by a father, a mother, a stepfather, a stepmother, a guardian or a trustee, shall be punished with imprisonment from five to eight years, with deprivation of the right to occupy certain positions or engage in certain activities for a term up to three years or without it.

Debauchery of a person, who has not reached the age of sixteen, shall be punishable by confinement for up to five years or imprisonment for the same term. The same crime committed against a minor by a father, a mother, a stepfather, a stepmother, a guardian or a trustee, shall be punished with imprisonment from five to eight years, with deprivation of the right to occupy certain positions or be engaged in certain activities for a term up to three years or without it.

The analysis of the sanctions proves that the legislation of Ukraine sets up more serious responsibility for crimes committed against a child and crimes committed against a child within a family by the members of a family of a child. The last fact is especially important because in most cases, a sexual assault is committed by family members or others who live in the family of the child or frequently visit family. Usually these people have the trust of children and often acting as trustees.

Law of Ukraine № 2286-VI "On Amendments to the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine on Issuing Entity (extradition)", adopted on May 21, 2010 (hereinafter - the Law № 2286-VI), amended Code of Criminal Procedure (CCP) with Chapter 9 ("Extradition"), which, of course, had a positive impact on the development of the institute of extradition in criminal proceedings in Ukraine. Law № 2286 - VI was adopted pursuant to Article 22 of the European Convention from 1957, which states that if this Convention does not provide otherwise, the procedure concerning extradition and provisional arrest is regulated exclusively by the law of the requesting party.

xxiii. Strengthening of criminal liability for sexual crimes should be considered as a positive step, because in order to change the situation of children protection in Ukraine radically, first and foremost, the national legislation should be brought into line with international standards. Particular attention in modern world is paid to increasing criminal liability for committing sex crimes against minors and minors in families and by those who must educate them.

Court practice shows that judges often apply Article 75 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine (deliverance from punishment under probation) concerning some sex crimes, for example for corruption of juveniles, sexual intercourse with a person who did not reach sexual puberty and other crimes.

According to the abovementioned article if criminal responsibility for a crime imposes not more than 5 years taking into account the guilty person's personality, circumstances of the crime, a court can release from responsibility on probation. Applying Article 75 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine judges usually do not give enough arguments in their decisions for that position and often limit to the phrases "is positively characterized at the place of work (education/living)", "was not tried before". Such approach leads to de facto avoidance of punishment by the criminal. We consider it to be a serious problem which requires amendments of legislation.

There are discussions being held in Ukraine nowadays concerning strengthening of the punishment for sex crimes and application of castration as it already works in neighbouring countries – Republic Moldova and Russian Federation. But there is no draft law for now on that.

Scientific researches in this sphere proclaim that there are still ways to improve the system of responsibility for crimes against children. For example, there is a scientific suggestion which is worth attention - to allocate crimes against minors separately as an independent unit of a Criminal Code. Supporters of this idea motivate this by the reason that this separation is required by the interests of consistent science-based classification of the provisions of the Special Part of the Criminal Code for a generic object. We can add that this approach will be also consistent with international legal agreements in the field of protection of the younger generation.

The other common idea is that we should not only punish offenders for already committed crimes but also avoid new crimes by eliminating their reason.

Such measures include measures related to changes in the adverse conditions of identity formation in cases where antisocial setting of the person has been already formed. Due to the fact that sexual crimes are usually committed in the certain, mostly typical situations, preventive measures should exclude such situations and eliminate conditions that contribute to their existence. Preventing non-violent actions of sexual nature is full disclosure of already committed crimes, combating and preventing sexual crimes that are being prepared. Of great importance for the prevention of non-violent actions of sexual nature are operational measures that are taken by the police to identify persons able to commit sexual crimes, timely taking them on operational accounting and holding them for preventive work. Police operational measures to identify persons able to commit sexual crimes, taking them on a timely operative accounting and carrying out their prevention work play a great role for preventing sexual crimes as well.

xxiv. The provisions of Criminal Code of Ukraine shall not be applied for legal entities.

xxv. The legislation of Ukraine does not provide such legal mechanisms as confiscation of materials, instruments or protection of bona fide third parties in cases regarding violation of sexual integrity of a child. Generally the mechanism of confiscation and expropriation of property, money, etc. is foreseen by the Ukrainian legislation. It usually concerns economic crimes or crimes against person's property.

xxvi. Sex crime against a child in many cases is being "noticed" by the state through its bodies only if serious consequences for a child took place, for example pregnancy, systematic or long-lasting corruption, etc. In Ukraine the topic of sexual violence against children in a family is closed. In many cases members of the family who found out about the violence try to keep everything in secret. The state condemns commitment of sexual violence in a family against a child. Valid legislation foresees responsibility for commitment of such crimes; Ukraine joins international standards on children rights protection but nevertheless the quantity of crimes increases and the quantity of children victim raises.

In practice it is very difficult to reach an accusatory verdict in cases on sex violence. The case starts only if serious consequences are available, that has to be reflected in the experts' conclusions which could be convincing for investigators and prosecutors. Often investigators refuse starting a case under Article 156 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine (juveniles' corruption) if the materials contain only child's statement. If the criminal did not inflict any corporal injuries to a child in the area of genitals the chances for a case to be brought to court are very low. For example there was a case when an infant child K. was for 3-4 years systematically corrupted by her father. Corruption was in the form of sexual games but the child did not get any corporal injuries. In few years the child got used to these games and started to feel a need in them. When mother of child found out about the corruptive actions of her husband against a child – she addressed the police. The case was closed because the father denied everything and nobody believed a 5-years old child.

Also a serious problem in Ukraine is sexual violence commitment against children in specialized institutions (boarding schools, orphanages). Principality is often smothering cases of sexual violence being afraid of publicity.

Nevertheless the state moves forward combating sexual violence in the family with legislation improvement, application of preventive measures.

3 CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

3.1 Investigation

i. The problem of criminal law protection of minors is a very important and challenging for society, the state, schools and families. Current legislation of Ukraine to some extent aimed at ensuring the rights of the child who is a victim of violence against children. The principle of the “best interests of the child” applied during investigation of these crimes implemented by various means to ensure children's rights. First of all, according to the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine in cases where the victim is a minor, to participate must be attached representative of victim. Representatives of the victim may be lawyers, close relatives, legal representatives and other persons under the order of the person inquirer, investigator, judge or a court order. Legal representatives in this situation are parents, guardians, trustees of the person or representatives of institutions and organizations in the care or taking care of it.<sup>60</sup> Supreme Court of Ukraine put it slightly different. If the victim is recognized to be a minor, the court provides in the case of legitimate representative of the person who has to protect his rights and protected legitimate interests, with the consent of the victim to participate in case the legal representative is not required. After achieving by victims 18 years legal representative functions are terminated, but the latter may participate in the case as representative of the victim.<sup>61</sup>

<sup>60</sup> Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine, December 28, 1960, Articles 32, 52, <http://zakon2.rada.gov.ua/laws/show/1001-05/page2>

<sup>61</sup> Supreme Court of Ukraine, Resolution On the use of legislation, which provided for the rights of victims of crime, July 2, 2004, article 8, <http://zakon1.rada.gov.ua/laws/show/v0013700-04>

The problem which exists in this case is the prohibition of double procedural status. It means that the representative of a child cannot be a witness of the case at the same time. Analysis of courts' cases on domestic violence and cases related to sexual violence and sexual exploitation against children showed that in this category of cases legal representatives of children are witnesses of such crimes. If this situation occurs person has to choose whether to be a legal representative of its child or a witness in a case and testify. The legal representative of a child is a very important participant of the criminal procedure as the child, because of its age and development is sensitive, and needs the legal representative's participation that has to look after children rights and interests to be preserved in their full extent. Also there are cases when a person independently brings up a child and is a single mother or father. That is why legal representatives' testimonies as witnesses are a very important proofs basis in a case. Prohibition of being a legal representative and a witness at the same time in a case can lead to the situation when a legal representative will be another member of the family or relative but its participation will be formal. It is worth mentioning that not everybody have a financial possibility to get a qualified legal aid and hire a lawyer. Law does not foresee obligatory participation of an attorney on the side of infant or juvenile victim or witness but at the same time it is obligatory for juvenile convict or defendant.

Legal representative of juvenile convict can be examined as a witness within the courts' proceedings and in this case a question on his double procedural status does not occur.

Taking into account the practice a combination of witness' and legal representative's obligation should not be contradictory as such combination takes place in the best interests of a child or a victim in a case.

The principle of the "best interests of the child" is realized also with other provisions. Given the fact that the victim in court is examined under the rules of examination of a witness, minor victim under 14 years old (at the discretion of the court - 16) should be questioned in the presence of the teacher, and if necessary - a doctor, parents or other legal representatives. Juvenile victims under 16 years Court clarifies the obligation to speak the truth, but about the criminal penalties for false statements they are not warned. In cases where the presence of the defendant in the court room may affect the completeness and accuracy of testimony of the minor victim, questioning of the latter with a trial decision may be conducted in the absence of the defendant. It also should discuss the feasibility of abandonment of a minor victim in the courtroom after his interrogation if case a legal representative of the victim is involved.<sup>62</sup>

In practice in the majority of cases a pedagogue is invited to the interrogation of a child as it is „more easy” to find it than psychologist. But in this case persons who conduct interrogation of a child have to put child’s interests on the first place. Formal approach to interrogation of a child can lead to the situation when a child will not tell what events it witnessed or victim of which criminal actions it became. In practice victims of sex crimes do not immediately tell about the events they experienced of different reasons: shame, fear, intimidation. Also interrogation should be divided into several stages: gathering the story and facts, conversation with a child. Conducting of interrogation with the participation of a qualified specialist in the sphere of children and juveniles psychology, that has experience in working with a child of the same age as the one being interrogated, will prevent additional traumatizing of a child, recurring interrogations of a child in future, and, in case of reminding negative memories during the interrogation, will help to immediately apply necessary methods. Also a psychologist can create an individual rehabilitation programme for a child.

As for a juvenile suspect or convict, their interrogation has to take place with the participation of a protector. If a juvenile did not reach 16 years or if it is considered to be mentally retarded, at his interrogation, with the decision of an investigator, prosecutor, judge, court or with solicitation of the protector, the participation of a legal representative, pedagogue or psychologist is provided and, if needed, a doctor, who during the interrogation can ask juvenile suspect or convict questions.

During the interrogation of a child who is suspected or convicted of a crime in the age from 16 to 18 years, if a child is not acknowledged to be mentally retarded, it is not provided the participation of the legal representative, pedagogue or psychologist and, if needed, a doctor, that puts a child in more sensitive conditions.

However, lawyers emphasize that the rules of the current Criminal Procedure Code and Criminal Code “do not fully meet the requirements of today, international conventions, covenants and agreements which provide protection of the interests of minors and does not cover all acts which are committed against them”. Reform legislation and recognition of the priority of international law over national law requires changes in the regulation of questions of criminal law protection of minors.<sup>63</sup> In addition,

“today in Ukraine holistic approach to solving the problem of protecting the rights of children - members of criminal procedure is not developed, there is no strategy in this field and innovation, due to the radical socio-economic changes in the Ukrainian society”.<sup>64</sup>

It should be noted that there are attempts to resolve the issue with the authorities and civil society, the companion of law. Nevertheless, lack of coordination and ignoring the views of each other, both domestic and international experience does not allow the effective changes to protect children's rights.

New Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine that will enter into force on November 19, 2012 resolves the issue with slightly different formulation and wider one. Now if the victim is a minor, to participate in the procedural steps involving it, it is required for a legal representative to be present. Parents (adopters), and in their absence - guardians or caretakers, other adult relatives and family members, as well as representatives of care, institutions and organizations in the care or custody of the minor may be involved as legal representatives. Prosecutor makes the decision, and the investigating judge, the court - decides on bringing legal representative investigator. Copy of such document is given to the legal representative. In case of a legal representative interests contradict the interests of the people it represents, with the decision of the investigator, the prosecutor, the investigating judge of the court a legal representative is replaced by another from among the persons mentioned in the second part of this passage. Legal representative has all the procedural rights of the person whose interests he represents, except for procedural rights, the subject to implementation of which is directly a suspect, accused and cannot representative be assigned.<sup>65</sup>

We can notice a large number of cases of children rights violations during the trial. For example, court should inform the victim about the previous day trial. However, in practice this requirement of the law is often not met, that leads to judicial errors. Judges do not always check whether it is recognized at the pre-trial investigation all of victims, who have suffered damage offense themselves. Although resolution of the Plenum of Supreme Court of Ukraine indicated that in the previous trial judge must determine whether all persons to whom the offense was caused and who suffered moral, physical or property damage, are recognized as victims. If some of them are not recognized as victims under inquiry and investigation, upon appropriate motion judge in his decision has to recognize the person as injured, tell her about it and provide the opportunity to review the case. One of the means for ensuring the legality of sentences and thus protection of victims is to give them the right to appeal court decisions. In most cases, the victims complained on a violation of their procedural rights, including the fact that they are not acquainted with the case, not summoned, did not have the opportunity to participate in the debate, as well as the appointment of convicted penalties that victims felt were too soft.<sup>66</sup> But after studying cases we can conclude that the vast majority of representatives of juvenile victims in the criminal process is passive, hoping that their rights and legitimate interests are provided with the conduct of an investigation and trial. This largely depends on the level of professionalism and responsibility for the performance of official duties of employees of investigation, prosecutors, judges, and lawyers.

Media says that the most child victims of crime expect endless interrogations and meetings with the abuser. Unfortunately, the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine prescribed only mechanisms to work effectively on investigating and protecting the accused and has no mechanism to protect the injured child.<sup>67</sup> Deputies decided to change this problem again in December 2011 and re-introduced bill number 7340, which can protect the most vulnerable. Norms of bill number 7340 can protect a child victim of crime from re-injury during the investigation, including: enhance of the role and importance of the psychologist involved to conduct investigations that provide reducing their impact; limit the number of interviews of a child, and at the same time to arrange these interviews only when reasonably necessary; legislate new standards for interrogation, including specially trained people to interview for the investigator and in specially equipped centres; prevent conduct confrontation involving child witnesses and child victims of crimes of sexual nature, and so on. But the bill was never passed.

It's determined that more than 80% of the materials of criminal, administrative and civil cases are witnesses or victims, including children, contributing to the detection and investigation of crimes, administrative offenses and the clearest decision regarding civil rights. But the place and importance of questioning in ensuring the quality and effectiveness of investigation is determined not so much by quantitative indicators, but by the ability of the investigator or judge to correctly build and conduct an interrogation. Different social status of children, especially their psyche require investigators' knowledge of general and developmental psychology, which determine the nature of communication and tactics to interview them.<sup>68</sup> The limits of acceptability tactics to characterize are as follows: interrogation techniques are such that are contradictory to law, and particularly those that may lead to the fact that the child is not able to protect its legitimate interests are not allowed.

Considering the prospects of creating an integrated system of child protection - participants in the criminal process, we propose to begin the development and laying the foundation of the criminal justice system as the principles of procedural safeguards enshrined not within the criminal justice system, and independent system that is able to reliably provide the child with the implementation of its right to life and dignified existence. Consideration of the prospects for criminal justice, which is provided with the rights and freedoms of the child in criminal proceedings, requires consideration of the provisions of international instruments produced by mankind during its existence.

ii. Current Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine establishes that in cases of crimes against children (rape, forcible sexual assault committed in unnatural way, sexual intercourse with a person who has not reached puberty, seduction of minors and so on), and in all cases of crimes committed by minors investigating police conduct preliminary investigations.<sup>69</sup> New Criminal Procedure Code formulated this article in a new way. Now investigatory police conducts preliminary investigation of criminal offenses under the law of Ukraine on criminal liability, except for those assigned to the investigative jurisdiction of other pre-trial investigation.<sup>70</sup> Nevertheless, the rules' change in text does not affect the actual legal relations.

Important problem is the absence of appropriate authority investigation of mentioned cases. Moreover, educational institutions of the Ministry of Internal Affairs of Ukraine (MIA) almost don't train staff to work in the criminal police departments for children. The only exception - Kyiv University of Internal Affairs, where there was a relevant department few years ago. And the place of "children's services" at MIA also is full of uncertainty. Department of Criminal Juvenile Police was eliminated. At its base in central MIA was created and departments, which are subject to various departments, and not even able to align their activities. The technical base of law enforcement and actual system documentation and proof of such crimes is categorically outdated.

Problems in the investigation of mentioned crimes arise at the stage of a bringing a criminal case. In Ukraine the situation is such that police in fact recognizes and investigates all cases of apparent rape. Instead, sexual harassment and other pressures in the form of coarse "encouragement" with straight text or physical influence actually are perceived by police as "child's play". According to the Ombudsman in our country every five criminal cases related to crimes against sexual freedom and sexual integrity of a person where the victim is a minor is closed, and in fact criminals escape punishment.<sup>71</sup> Note: it is usually about rape. If the brakes can pull even a cause, the cause of abuse without trying to rape, the police did not take it: it is troublesome, unpromising, requires the highest skills.

There is no civilized mechanism of police interrogation of children in the system of MIA.

"Unlike civilized countries, we have not created a system of questioning children in so-called "green rooms." Currently, there are only few such rooms, and it was made not by the state but by the charitable foundation YUNIDEA and "La Strada". In these rooms, decorated like a children room, it can be held a friendly conversation with the child. However, this requires considerable cost, including construction of an adjoining room with Venetian glass (one way vision), audio-video recording, and more. All of this is part of the juvenile justice system, which somehow is a struggling part for deputies".<sup>72</sup>

Although the President in May this year signed a Decree that approved the concept of criminal justice for juveniles,<sup>73</sup> in order to implement these procedures it requires changes to the Criminal Procedure Code, concerning "examination of a witness," "interrogation of a minor witness" and "questioning the victim," and so on.

Also if bodily injury is relatively easy to prove, the sexual purpose in the absence of rape (child molestation) - extremely difficult. Problems arise in the stage of court proceedings. Firstly, such things are intimate, traumatic to the psyche and often the victims or their parents do not want to talk about them. In addition, a child at that age is not yet able to think in terms of "law", "crime", "criminal responsibility", "prison", "court", "the testimony of the victim," and seeks to forget experiences. Here much depends on the quality and speed of the investigators.

"If for the first time the child is questioned immediately after the incident, and for the second - after 1-2 months, the readings may differ for 80% of child victims of sexual crimes, protective psychological mechanisms turn on.

Official statistics for cases under Articles 155 and 156 of the Criminal Code of Ukraine (respectively, sexual intercourse with a person who has not reached puberty and corruption of minors) apparently does not reveal the real extent of the problem. Latency of cases in this category, as you realize, is very high. And it should be remembered that the corruption in law enforcement is high, because 20 thousand dollars is the bribe for investigators and judge for abuse of a child."<sup>74</sup>

iii. At present prosecutor, investigator or judge are obliged to accept the claim and notice of crimes committed or prepared, including cases that do not fall within their jurisdiction. If there are reasons and grounds, the prosecutor, the investigator, the police or a judge must decide on a criminal case, pointing actuators and grounds for instituting proceedings, articles of the criminal law on the basis of which proceedings are initiated and continue its focus.

If there are no grounds for instituting criminal proceedings, the prosecutor, the investigator, the police or a judge deny its decision to institute criminal proceedings, but must notify interested persons and enterprises, institutions and organizations. The investigator and the inquiry authority who denied criminal case can be appealed by the prosecutor and if such decision was rendered by prosecutor - superior prosecutor. A complaint is filed by a person whose interests are concerned, or its representative within seven days of receipt of a copy of the decision. Prosecutor, investigator and inquiry authority to deny criminal case can be appealed by the person whose interests are concerned, or its representative, to the court. Decision of judge who refused to initiate a criminal case can be appealed by the person whose interests are concerned or its representative within seven days after receiving a copy of resolution to the appeal.<sup>75</sup>

Even if a victim decides to withdraw their application the investigation continues if there is the body of a crime available, the rights protection bodies or prosecutor will initiate the criminal case. In case an official gives the application back to the victim and stops the investigation it can be accused of hiding a crime and will be liable for that.

iv. As for terms of criminal investigations in cases of crimes that are not serious, or very serious, inquiry is made within a period not exceeding ten days from the moment when the person who has committed it was found. In case of serious or especially serious crime inquiry is conducted in a period of not more than ten days after the proceedings. If elected to the suspect, precaution inquiry is made within a period not exceeding five days after pre-trial release. Pre-trial investigation in criminal cases should be completed within two months. During this period it is included the time since the initiation of proceedings to the direction of the prosecutor of the indictment or decision to refer the case to the court to consider the application of compulsory medical measures or the closure or suspension of proceedings. This period may be extended by the district or municipal prosecutor, military prosecutor of army, flotilla, garrisons and similar prosecutor in case of failing to complete the investigation up to three months. In particularly difficult cases the investigation can be extended to six months. Next it is possible to extend pre-trial investigation only in exceptional cases, the Prosecutor General of Ukraine or his deputies are entitled to do so.<sup>76</sup> It concerns only cases on crimes initiated by a person. Crimes initiated under a fact do not have terms of limitations and are investigated for years, are very convenient for investigators.

The total period of pre-trial investigation may not exceed six months from the date of notification of the person suspected of committing a small or moderate crime; twelve months from the date of notification of the person suspected of committing a grave or especially grave crime. The period from the date of an order of suspension of the criminal proceedings prior to its repeal investigating judge or an order of recovery of criminal proceedings is not included in the terms. The period of pre-trial investigation of the crime can be extended to three months if it cannot complete due to the complexity of the proceedings up to six months due to the special complexity of the proceedings, to twelve months due to the exceptional complexity of the proceedings.<sup>77</sup>

v. When the age of a victim is not certain current Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine provides for conducting expert evaluation. Expertise is granted in cases when the solution to certain issues in the proceedings in the case requires scientific, technical or other specialized knowledge. But it's obligatory for establishing puberty of a victim in cases of committing crimes in the area of child sexual abuse.<sup>78</sup> This provision will not change with the entry into force of the new Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine on November 19, 2012.<sup>79</sup>

Forensic examination to establish the age of victim is conducted in accordance with resolution of the person conducting the inquiry, the investigator, prosecutor, judges, and a court order. Conducting forensic examination is carried by experts of state institutions for forensic examinations of the Ministry of Health of Ukraine or it can be carried out on business principles based on the license issued by the Ministry of Health of Ukraine.<sup>80</sup> Procedure of examinations, specifically for establishing the age of the victim, in national legislation is not defined in detail, but regulations give us opportunity to conclude that the age is determined by identifying of victims sexual maturity.

In such cases anthropometric measurements by the examinee are performed during the examination of the establishment of puberty, namely: mass; height in standing and sitting;

the length of the body; chest circumference; the right shoulder circumference at the level of the middle third; circle right leg in the middle third; shoulder width; the size of the pelvis; determination of the number of teeth and the presence of wisdom teeth.<sup>81</sup> However, absence of a particular regulation that would regulate the procedure of examination to establish the age of victim complicates the investigation of criminal cases in category of violence against children.

vi. To determine authority that is responsible for recording and storing data for convicted offenders we need to find out about the establishment where convicted persons are serving their sentences. If it's remand prison data is stored there because according to the Order of Ministry of Justice of Ukraine "On Approval of the Instruction on Work Units (groups, sectors, senior inspectors)" enforcement of judgments of penal institutions and detention centres subsection institutions (prison) perform concrete functions. Among these functions are: to carry out personal and quantitative account of prisoners (persons detained), prepare reports on their size, composition and movement; keep records, form and store personal cases of prisoners (persons detained), hold it in an institution (prison).<sup>82</sup>

Another establishment of this kind can belong to the system of the State Penitentiary Service of Ukraine. According to the Decree of President of Ukraine "On Approval of the State Penitentiary Service of Ukraine" this Service is a central executive authority, whose activities are directed and coordinated by the Cabinet of Ministers of Ukraine through the Minister of Justice of Ukraine, it belongs to the executive power and ensures the implementation of state policy on execution of criminal penalties.<sup>83</sup> Main objectives of the Service are: implementation of the state policy of execution of criminal penalties; control over compliance with human rights and requirements of legislation to implement and serving criminal sentences, realization of the rights and interests of prisoners and persons taken into custody; to ensure the formation of a system of oversight, social, educational and preventive measures that apply to prisoners and persons detained.

Realization of enumerated functions implies that Penitentiary Service organizes registration of convicted persons and persons taken into custody, determines the type of penal institutions in which convicts will serve their punishments, carries them distribution and takes prisoners and persons detained with one institution to another.

These authorities can transmit their data to other competent authorities in other states and do this in pursuance of European Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters and performing of their functions. State Penitentiary Service of Ukraine establishes and maintains relations with international organizations, in consultation with the Minister of Justice of Ukraine who made agreements with relevant foreign authorities on cooperation in the execution of criminal penalties against crime and other matters within the competence of the Service. According to Convention which entered into force in Ukraine on June 9, 1998, a requested Party shall communicate extracts from and information relating to judicial records, requested from it by the judicial authorities of a Contracting Party and needed in a criminal matter, to the same extent that these may be made available to its own judicial authorities in similar case. Another situation for the information exchange is that each Contracting Party shall inform any other Party of all criminal convictions and subsequent measures in respect of nationals of the latter Party, entered in the judicial records. Ministries of Justice shall communicate such information to one another at least once a year.<sup>84</sup>

The authorities respect protection of personal data rules fulfilling the requirements of the Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data and the Law of Ukraine “On Protection of Personal Data”. According to Convention which entered into force in Ukraine on January 1, 2011, personal data revealing racial origin, political opinions or religious or other beliefs, as well as personal data concerning health or sexual life, may not be processed automatically unless domestic law provides appropriate safeguards. The same shall apply to personal data relating to criminal convictions. Derogation from these provisions shall be allowed when such derogation is provided by the law of the Party and constitutes a necessary measure in a democratic society in the interests of protecting State security, public safety, and monetary interests of the State or the suppression of criminal offences.<sup>85</sup>

Law “On Protection of Personal Data” and Order of the Ministry of Justice “On Approval of Order on Processing of Personal Data in Databases of Personal Data” determined that the collection of personal data for police purposes should be limited to the extent necessary to prevent a real danger or stop a specific criminal offense. Storing of personal data for police purposes should be limited to accuracy of data and treat such data as far as necessary to the police to carry out their legitimate objectives of the national law and their obligations under international law.<sup>86</sup>

So recommendations of the Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data are implemented into the national legislation of Ukraine, but there is a widespread opinion that it's necessary

“to provide registration of personal databases of law enforcement agencies in the State Register of personal data; establish a mechanisms for oversight of the Authority for the Protection of Personal Data (State Service of Ukraine on protection of personal data) in compliance with statutory law enforcement requirements for the processing of personal data; establish mechanisms for public monitoring of the processing of personal data by the competent authority on the protection of personal data”.<sup>87</sup>

An important aspect is also bringing legislation that regulates the activity of law enforcement bodies of Ukraine, in accordance with the Law of Ukraine “On Protection of Personal Data”.

3.2 Complaint Procedure

vii. In case of criminal law norms violation a criminal case has to be initiated. According to Article 4 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine a court, prosecutor, investigator and investigatory body are obliged within their competence to initiate a criminal case in every case of detection of crime body features, apply all the measures foreseen by the legislation for establishment of the event of the crime, persons, guilty of the crime commitment, and their punishment. Article 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine imposes reasons and grounds for criminal case initiation. One of the reasons and grounds is an application or information about a crime. Legislation of Ukraine does not impose any prohibitions for a child to inform about a crime or write an application. A child can do it in written or orally.

But a child cannot support the applied information about the crime or complaint. This right is realized through the legal representative, attorney or relative.

viii. Article 52 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine provides that the representative of a victim can be an attorney, close relative, legal representative and other persons under the ruling of a person who conducts investigation, investigator, judge or court. In a case when parents cannot be legal representatives of a child, child's interests are realized by the representative of a state power body who is entitled to protect child's rights and represent its interests in state and non-governmental bodies, including court.

If there is a real danger for life, health, dwelling or property person's security can be provided (Article 52-1 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine). Non-disclosure of data about a person kept under arrest can be provided with limitation of information about it in the materials of the review (applications, explanations, etc.) and in protocols of investigatory actions and court's hearings. Investigatory bodies, investigator, prosecutor, court (judge) after deciding on application of security measures, rule on the change of a surname and name of a protected person to a pseudonym. Further on in procedural documents only the pseudonym is mentioned and the real surname and name (date of birth, family status, place of work, occupation, place of living and other application data that contain information about the protected person) are mentioned only in ruling on the change of application data. This ruling is not included into the case's materials and is kept separately in a body under which jurisdiction is the criminal case. In case of change of the surname of protected person to pseudonym all the investigatory actions protocols and other documents containing data about this person are excluded from the materials of the case and kept separately and copies of these documents are included into the case with the change of a real surname to a pseudonym. Data about security measures and protected persons is the information with a limited access (Article 52-2 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ukraine).

4 COMPLEMENTARY MEASURES

i. It is quite difficult to find any legal acts on this issue. From the answer to our information request to the Ministry of Education and Science, Youth and Sports we found out that in higher education institutions that train specialists in "Social Pedagogy" are implemented courses on social and legal protection of children, social technologies and educational activities. Their education programs include studying of issues of child sexual abuse.

There are some organizations that try to protect human and children rights. As part of their work they organize educational events like workshops and trainings on such issues as sexual violence. As we can see now the society is beginning to notice the existence of the problem. Unfortunately, at the state level the interest in solving this issue is growing extremely slowly.

ii. Here is the data we have got from the analytical reference that is based on the interviews of children aged 10-17years in the project "Children's Rights in Ukraine: realities and challenges after 20 years of independence":

Every second child indicates a violation or failure to comply with certain rights that should be guaranteed in today's society. 52% think that there are cases of sexual exploitation of children.

Compared with research dedicated to children's rights held in 2000 the percentage of children who have never heard of Rights of the Child significantly decreased (from 8 to 1%).

Despite general awareness of children about their rights, some concern the fact that 11% of the respondents do not know that anybody has the right to use children for sexual gratification.

We can conclude that not all children have enough knowledge about this issue, and some are not aware of this problem. There is no subject that would fully reveal the problem of sexual violence and its prevention in educational programs.

From another side there are some thoughts in society that we don't need to tell children about sexual issues because sex education is poisoning their minds. Anyway talking about our generation (born in 90th) we never had any subjects about such issues at school. Unfortunately Ukrainian children do not receive information how it is necessary to take care of their safety and ask for help in the case of a threat of violence.

iii. According to the text of the Convention, the Ukraine state body authorized for the prevention of crimes against children and their protection from sexual exploitation and to ensure the prosecution of offenders is the Ministry of Internal Affairs.

According to Article 3 of the Law of Ukraine "On Prevention of Domestic Violence" to prevent home violence the state empowers the following bodies:

- 1) specially empowered executive body on prevention of domestic violence;
- 2) the relevant departments of internal affairs bodies;
- 3) bodies of guardianship and care;

4) specialized institutions for people who have committed domestic violence and victims of violence.

Beside the executive authorities, local governments, enterprises, institutions and organizations regardless of their ownership, associations, and individuals can contribute to the implementation of measures to prevent domestic violence.

In 2009 Ukrainian public organization "Women's Consortium of Ukraine", supported by the Ministry of Education and Science of Ukraine, organized the research on the issue "Violence in schools: problems and assistance needed by children and teachers in facing it" in schools of Vinnitsa, Kirovograd, Kyiv and Cherkasy regions. This research gave opportunity to understand the types of violence that are encountered in schools or at home.

There is no specific preventive work against child prostitution conducted by governmental institutions. Activities to prevent child sex tourism in Ukraine are mostly carried out by NGOs. Unfortunately, no tourism company in Ukraine has signed the Code of Conduct for Protection of Children from Sexual Exploitation in Travel and Tourism.

The Ukrainian government has been active in implementing preventive measures against human trafficking. Anti-trafficking awareness-raising materials were published and distributed to the public, though there was no special focus on child trafficking for sexual purposes. Efforts were made to include lessons for prevention of human trafficking in school curricula.

Centre La Strada-Ukraine runs an Internet hotline for child pornography reporting. With regard to private sector collaboration, Onlandia (www.onlandia.org.ua/ukr/) is a website developed by Microsoft Ukraine to raise awareness among children and young people about online safety.

iv. In Ukraine there are medical and social rehabilitation centers of victims of domestic violence. They are established in accordance with the laws governing the creation of health care.

In such centres are placed the victims of violence on the basis of the decision of the medical commission centre.

In the medical and social rehabilitation it is applied:

1. Treatment and psycho-social rehabilitation.
2. Victims of violence may be given certain types of mental health care.

3. Organized advising for victims.
4. Announces of committed domestic violence service precinct police inspectors or criminal police for children.
5. Provides information on the prevention of domestic violence at the request of authorities.

In 2010, there was a programme implemented "The rights of women and children against violence", which is funded by the Council of Europe.

Special programs for helping victims of sex crimes do not exist in Ukraine, neither for adults nor for children. As a rule, victims of sexual violence and sexual exploitation can get help at social service on the general grounds.

v. In Ukraine there exists a National “hot line” for prevention of domestic violence and children rights protection. It works on the basis of Centre “La Strada-Ukraine”<sup>88</sup>, where a person can get informational, expert, psychological and legal consultations. One of the main principles of the “hot line” work is confidentiality. A person is not obliged to name its name or address and receives the needed consultation. From 2013 Centre “La Strada-Ukraine” will have a separate “hot line” for children rights protection.

vi. Unfortunately there is not state social program in Ukraine aimed to help a child who suffered from sexual violence or sexual exploitation. A child goes through a rehabilitation course in social services; a psychologist is working with it. It can receive a single address help. But there are problems in this issue: lack of psychologists in the rural areas; the quantity of psychologists is not enough, low level of their qualification and impossibility of its improvement, low salaries, absence of systematic approach, absence of culture of addressing a psychologist in the need of help, bureaucracy (necessity of proper directions, etc.). If a legal representative or an adult does not want to go through the rehabilitation course there are no legal ground to make them to do it.

III NATIONAL POLICY REGARDING CHILDREN

- i. Children’s rights became the hot topic of political discussion and political manipulations in Ukraine very often especially before the elections.

The challenge for policy and programs for children was the destruction as a result of the administrative reform of institutional mechanism of children's rights protection. Presidential Decree of December 9, 2010 (№ 1085/2010) abolished Ministry of Ukraine for Family, Youth and Sports, which was the authorized central executive authority in this area. Presidential Decrees of April 6, 2011 approved position of central government and its functions were partly transferred to the Ministry of Social Policy. But only in November 2011 the Department of Child Rights Protection and Adoption began to operate within the Ministry of Social Policy of Ukraine. Financing of its activity was a residual one.

One positive result of political discussions was the creation in August, 2011 by the President of Ukraine the institution of Ombudsman for Children's Rights. But this new body cannot be considered as an independent monitoring mechanism, which would be set up to implement the UN Convention. In addition, the main function of the Commissioner is monitoring the situation of children's rights in Ukraine, not policy implementation that makes it relevant to the further strengthening of services for children. Certain wave of attention to the issue was raised in October during Ukrainian meeting for child protection. On December 12, 2011 Decree number 1163/2011 was signed by President, which is aimed at strengthening of children policy protection.

Furthermore, in 1991, ratifying the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, Ukraine has committed to implement juvenile justice at the national level. However, until now this issue is not resolved, moreover, it has acquired social deterioration. Since preparing reform projects, unfortunately, no one thought about conducting explanatory work with the population, which led to public opposition. Even the draft Concept of Development of Juvenile Criminal Justice in Ukraine, which was prepared by the Ministry of Justice of Ukraine, is not optimal, because it only takes into account the rights of children in conflict with the law, not paying any attention to the interests of children who are in contact with the law that is, those children who are victims of crime. However, certain political structures with the support of the Russian Orthodox Church expanded movement against the implementation of juvenile justice. They created special sites, held street protests; they are active in various online forums and social networks<sup>89</sup>. This opposition is still considered as a serious obstacle for implementing the institution of juvenile justice in Ukraine.

ii. It is extremely important to raise awareness about international standards of human rights and the status of their implementation in Ukrainian law. To this end, in 2004, the Commissioner for Human Rights with the assistance from the UN Office in Ukraine published a digest entitled “The Concluding Observations and Recommendations of the UN Treaty Bodies on Reports of Ukraine in the Area of Human Rights” in three languages (Ukrainian, Russian, and English). This was the first attempt to communicate the UN concluding observations and recommendations to the central and local government officials, lawyers, NGOs, trade unions, mass media, students, and the general public.

Due to the words of the Commissioner for Human Rights cases of cruelty and violence against children became more frequent in recent years in Ukrainian society. Unfortunately, Ukraine is recognized as one of the main centres of pornographic products using the image of the child. Some “Child Model Agencies” are reported to have cameras hidden in bathrooms to take pictures of naked children.

One of the first cases in Ukraine concerning images of violence against children production that became very loud because of the police investigation was the detection of model agencies in Kyiv, Kharkiv and Simferopol. The criminals’ victims who rented apartments for “photo sessions” became approximately 500 girls.

According to Interpol evaluation, the Ukrainian market of such products is estimated to be $ 100 million per year. Only in the last five years, nearly 3,000 people were sentenced for crimes against sexual freedom and sexual immunity of a person, where the victims were children. However, Ukraine has no statistics on children who are victims of sexual exploitation and trafficking, in particular about age, sex and location of the affected children. Such records must be urgently implemented.

According to the Department for information technologies of the Ministry of internal relations of Ukraine data in the year 2008 there were detected 303 cases of sexual abuse against juveniles in Ukraine (in 2007 – 251). Also there were registered 851 crimes concerning importation, production, sales and distribution of pornographic products, including those with the children involved (811 in 2007).

In 91% of the cases the reason for starting a criminal case against the children pornography producers was the citizens' notification, in 9% - police actions.

Very useful for the statistic are the reports of the ECPAT International. Due to their reports about situation in Ukraine child prostitution is most evident in the capital Kiev and other big cities such as Odessa, Kharkiv and Sevastopol. Though prostitution is illegal, it is still widespread due to light punishment. The majority of child victims of prostitution are unaccompanied children coming to the cities from rural areas and small towns in the eastern and southern regions. Some children are forced to migrate to large cities to pursue higher education and are later pushed to sell sex to support themselves. Prostitution of boys is also becoming an increasingly acknowledged problem.

Sexual exploitation of children in tourism is especially prominent during the summer season in the coastal areas where many children are trafficked from CIS countries like Moldova and Russia for prostitution, with demand from both local and foreign tourists. According to research conducted in 2010, the Internet plays a key role in the facilitation of child sex tourism in Ukraine, including through tourism agency websites that market sex with children to foreign tourists. Additionally, child trafficking is believed to be closely linked to the production of child pornography, as there have been a number of cases of children being trafficked from neighboring CIS region for this purpose.

Before Euro-2012 Championship International women rights protection centre La Strada-Ukraine summarized the research "Children sex-tourism in Ukraine: an attempt of situational analysis" and presented its results at the press-conference. Experts in children rights protection joined the discussion – President's authorized in children rights, Head's deputy of the UNICEF office in Ukraine, president of Kharkiv national university of internal affairs and head's deputy of Administration of criminal police for children of Ministry of internal affairs in Ukraine.

The research proved that the problem of children sex-tourism in Ukraine is considerable but latent. The real scope of this occurrence is impossible to define because of the difficulties in detecting these crimes, corruption and also because children usually do not understand that they are subjects to criminal activities and consider it as a normal earning. Beside that Ukrainian society tolerates children sex-tourism – the majority of people understands the term “a child” as children under 10 years old and the most often exploited are juveniles who usually look and are treated by outsiders as adults. The increase of offer of sexual services in Ukraine indicates that Ukraine attracts foreigners with accessibility of receiving services from children and impunity for such actions.

Foreign sex-tourists come mostly from the European Union countries (or candidate countries, such as Turkey), USA, Canada and from the Middle East, such as Israel and Syria.

Among the children involved into providing services to tourists are those who do it permanently and temporally. The first ones are usually the representatives of socially sensitive groups – orphans, children from the crisis families for whom it is the only way of making money, they are girls from 14 years and boys from 16-17 years. The second ones are those, attracted with “beautiful life”, expensive presents, girls from 16-18 years and boys from 14-17 years (their percentage increased from 2009 to 2011 4 times). Intermediaries-pouncers usually involve children in such work or even their own parents or sex-tourists themselves promising valuable things.

Yuriy Pavlenko, President’s authorized in children rights, admitted that there is pretty neglect treatment from the police’s side. If the case does not concern rape itself there is almost no chance for a proper attention of the police.

Centre La Strada-Ukraine has 8 cases concerning children rights violations, half of them are about sexual violence against children with 8 victims in total. None of these cases is unambiguous for our courts. Sometimes even the results of medical and psychological expertise is not enough for punishing perpetrators in these crimes.

UNICEF is worried about the fact that Ukraine remains one of the main countries in human trafficking in Europe. In its final observations from 21 April 2011 UN Committee in children rights expresses concern regarding absence of information about responsibility of people who deal with human trafficking and emphasizes on the importance of target information and information campaigns as a prevention measure.

Committee encouraged Ukraine to review all of its national legislation in order to provide its full relevance to the UN Convention on children rights and its Optional protocol, especially regarding the issue of children prostitution and other forms of sexual exploitation of children. Also Committee draws attention to the fact that a clear provision prohibiting children prostitution has not been included into legislation yet.

Ministry of Internal Affairs of Ukraine from 2009 until 2011 registered 37 crimes of children involvement in prostitution. At the same time the internal affairs' bodies detected 465 juveniles at the age of 16-18 years involved into prostitution.

During October 2010 – August 2011 in Ukraine there was held a global campaign “Stop children and youth trafficking with sexual purposes!”. Under this campaign 55 763 signatures had been gathered for the Petition with the same name. Among main demand of the Petition – improvement of national legislation concerning prevention of sexual exploitation of children including a clear prohibition installation of using children in prostitution and imposing responsibility on the clients. Petition and signatures were transferred to Verkhovna Rada on the 5 October 2011, V.V. Shemchuk in particular – contact parliamentarian in issues on fighting with sexual violence against children.

In nine months of the year 2009 police detected 40 cases of children trafficking, 110 rapes (50 children under 11 years), and 46 sexual intercourses with juveniles and 214 sexual abuses against juveniles.

In 2008 there were detected 37 facts of children and juveniles trafficking. Nevertheless experts are concerned that the official statistics does not reflect the objective situation. Since 2008 on the basis of NGO La Strada-Ukraine there exists a hot line where following the phone number on the web page (0 800 500 335) one can anonymously report about the cases of violence against children.

In 2008 La Strada-Ukraine together with Kyiv international sociology institute conducted a poll on public opinion concerning children rights violation. 84% of citizens named the children sexual services and 97% stated that it is necessary to criminalize it.

In Ukraine the Office for fighting against cybercrimes of the Department for fighting with crimes concerning human trafficking of Ministry of internal affairs is dealing with investigating cases of sexual exploitation of children through Internet. Ukrainian policemen cooperate in investigating crimes in this sphere with colleagues from Australia, Great Britain, Italy, Canada, Netherlands, Belarus and the USA. There was a draft law suggested by few deputies, V.V. Shemchuk, Bondarenko O. F., Lukyanova K.Y., on the changes to the Criminal Code of Ukraine and the Code on administrative offences of Ukraine concerning sexual violence against children and exploitation issues. It was created considering recommendations of state power bodies' specialists, international and public organizations during the discussion of fighting with children prostitution problematic. Changes into legislation were discussed during the deliberation “Condition of the legislation realization in the sphere of fighting with human trafficking, children prostitution and pornography and the perspectives of its improvement” (23.11.2010), experts hearings “Perspectives of improvement of national legislation in the sphere of children protection from human trafficking, sexual violence and exploitation” (02.03.2011), deliberations “Realization of UN Committee on children rights recommendation under the results of state reports’ consideration. “Counteraction to crimes against children” (08.07.2011) and deliberations “National legislation improvement concerning children protection from sexual exploitation and sexual overuses” (18.10.2011).

iii. In order to receive data on quantity and quality characteristics of sexual exploitation of minors (under 14 years old) and juveniles (from 14 to 18 years old) we analyzed courts’ decisions from 1 January 2007 until now:

Crime	Quantity of crimes in the Register	Sanction foreseen by the CC
Juveniles’ rape (p. 3 Article 152 CC)	340	Imprisonment from 7 to 12 years
Minors’ rape, including attempt to rape (p. 4 Article 152 CC)	480	Imprisonment from 10 to 15 years
Violent satisfaction of sexual passion in an unnatural way committed against juveniles (p.2 Article 153 CC)	816	Imprisonment from 3 to 7 years
Violent satisfaction of sexual passion in an unnatural way committed against minors (p.3 Article 153 CC)	320	Imprisonment from 10 to 15 years
Sexual relations with a	3	Freedom restriction for 5 years or imprisonment person who has not reached puberty (Article 155 CC)		for the same time; qualified structure - imprisonment from 5 to 8 years with the deprivation from the right to hold particular positions and conduct particular activities for 3 years or without that.

Abuse of juveniles (Article 156 CC)	9	Freedom restriction for 5 years or imprisonment for the same time
Trading in prostitution or involvement into prostitution against juveniles (p.3 Article 303 CC)	1	Imprisonment from 5 to 10 years with property confiscation

Crimes against sexual inviolability of juveniles and infants include rape itself and sexual desire satisfaction in unnatural way. The benefit of the latter is explained with the fact that crimes against sexual inviolability of juveniles and infants are usually committed by persons of the same sex as the victim. Both rape and sexual desire satisfaction in unnatural way against children are often committed by persons who were well known to the juvenile/infant, relatives in particular, step-mother, step-father, neighbours. Complicity is typical for this kind of crimes, especially in case when it is committed by several people without preliminary conspiracy.

Rape commitment and satisfaction of sexual passion in an unnatural way by group of people under the same malice is also typical. It usually happens under alcohol or drug intoxication. Beside sexual inviolability violation injuries are also inflicted to juveniles. Psychological pressure usually contains threads of infliction more serious injuries. There are cases of rapes and satisfaction of sexual passion in an unnatural way with the usage of victims' helpless condition, alcohol intoxication in particular. A typical image of such crime is a common leisure of a group of young people combined with the alcohol drinks consuming, after which few people who volunteered to help intoxicated juveniles/infants to get home, commits a crime against sexual inviolability of the latter.

Sexual relations with a person who has not reached puberty is not a common crime. It is typical for this crime to not inform about it the rights-protection bodies as in this case a person who has not reached puberty enters into sexual connection with another person by its own will. In the majority of cases of these crimes there were considered serious consequences for the victim's health.

Cases concerning juveniles' abuse include both physical and intellectual abuse, often both of them at the same time. The main feature of the victim is social and pedagogical abandonment.

The most dangerous the situation is in the localities where parents do not follow the spare time of their children enough, where children have access to alcohol drinks and often spend their time with "adult" companies that abuse alcohol and drugs. It is a serious problem that children do not possess information about danger of early sexual life, prevention of provocative conduct with which they can become victims of such crimes.

Ministry of Internal Affairs of Ukraine provides general statistics not separating children as special category of victims. Applying available statistics concerning crimes against sexual freedom and sexual inviolability in general that includes sexual exploitation of children as well, the following results can be singled out:

Year	Registered crimes against sexual freedom and sexual inviolability	Proportion in total, %
2011	1348	0.3
2010	1348	0.3
2009	1698	0.4 <sup>90</sup>

The participants of the project Youth Partnership against commercial sexual exploitation of children in Ukraine applied to Ombudsman for Children at the President of Ukraine with the recommendation to conduct the research as to the scale of sexual exploitation of children in Ukraine since the problem of absence of certain statistics on this issue exists nowadays.<sup>91</sup>

In fact, there is difficulty in obtaining official statistics in Ukraine concerning sexual exploitation and corruption of children. It is worth mentioning that not all of the crimes become known to law-enforcing bodies and not all of them are due investigated. The majority of children do not report about the facts of sexual exploitation committed by a close person being afraid of disclosure of that information or the fact that other persons will not believe them etc. "74 persons aged from 14 to 18 and 44 persons under 14 were recognized victims of rape during 2010. 144 persons suffered from rape in 2009 and 194 persons – in 2008."<sup>92</sup>

The problem of sexual exploitation in Ukraine is highly discussed by mass media. In official statistics based on the data of Ministry of Internal Affairs the real sexual violence against children is not precisely reflected as the only completed criminal cases are taken into consideration. There are no data on the quantity of commenced criminal cases concerning sexual exploitation of children. As representative of UNICEF in Ukraine has stressed, "in conformity to data of Ministry of Internal Affairs of Ukraine the quantity of crimes on corruption of minors was equal to 307 in 2007 and 347 in 2008."<sup>93</sup>

iv. There are a lot of promotional campaigns within the state regarding children's sexual exploitation; however, they are carried out mainly by NGOs. This is the project of Human Rights Centre "Progress", which was addressed to representatives of non-governmental organizations working for children groups risk, law enforcement agencies and organizations responsible for working with at-risk children, including representatives of civil society organizations that work to protect children, representatives of the Office of Human Rights Monitoring in the Ministry of Internal Affairs of Ukraine, representatives of various government institutions responsible for human children.<sup>94</sup>

Ukrainian Foundation "Welfare of children" had a thorough statistical research of the problem of violence against children to determine the attitude of adults to physical, corporal punishment and identify opportunities for child care in case of family violence.<sup>95</sup> The project results determined that the vast majority of respondents believe that the situation with regard to sexual violence against children is improving, but on the contrary, there is a trend towards deterioration. Participants of this project recognized the major problem an unclear procedure of survey and interviewing of victims of sexual violence or crime related to trafficking in persons, especially children. After an initial survey of the child 4-6 times repeats and re-living scenes of violence for documentary fixing crime goes through the identification of the offender to trial. It rarely involves a psychologist, more often an expert on child psychology.

Ukrainian NGO "Child Protection Service" analyzed while providing professional comprehensive assistance to victims, the crimes related to child trafficking, child prostitution, child pornography, abuse against sexual freedom and sexual integrity of children. It published a guide on this subject which is intended for personnel services for children, law enforcement, social services for families, children and young people, adoptive parents, teachers, foster parents, and professionals of NGOs, representatives of the media.<sup>96</sup> Authors suggest that there is carrying smuggled children, within the country and beyond its border in Ukraine, growing child sex tourism, often using children in prostitution or production of pornography, there is a high level of accessibility to pornographic materials containing children's pictures on the internet and so on. In their researching Youth NGO "Boom" states that the real number of victims of sexual violence is difficult to establish. Incomplete information about sexual abuse of children can be drawn from court statistics. These social studies show that the experience of sexual abuse before reaching the age of 15 had 34.9% of women and 29% men. Much of these cases occurred in the family. 10.5% of women and 3% of men have experienced rape or attempted.<sup>97</sup>

Many articles and coverage are dedicated to the fight against children violence. As a rule, journalists write that it is important that the society open its eyes and raises the facts of violence that should be reported to the appropriate service. It is very important that teachers, doctors, nurses, social workers who work with children and can see problems in children recognize that the child was the victim.<sup>98</sup> More than 38% of all raped in Ukraine are children and adolescents of 12-16 years. But sexual violence is understood as using a child (boy or girl) for adults or another child for sexual gratification or receiving benefits. Sexual abuse includes sexual intercourse (coitus), oral and anal sex, mutual masturbation, and other bodily contact with the genitals. It also includes involving children in prostitution, pornography, exposure to child sexual organs and buttocks, peeping at it when it did not suspect: while undressing, sending natural needs. It is not only different ways of intercourse, but too bold graces in demonstration pornography. The most horrible thing is that rape is molesting children themselves. More than half of the prostitutes were subjected to sexual harassment in childhood.<sup>99</sup>

v. Ukraine became a part of different Conventions on the protection of children rights. These are: the Convention on the rights of a child, Convention on Cybercrime, Convention on Action against Human Trafficking, etc. But, unfortunately, the biggest amount of norms was not implemented into the national legislation. For example, there is no definition for child pornography, child prostitution in national legislation. Nevertheless, Criminal Code of Ukraine contains punishment for the crimes committed against children. There were some Draft Laws, task of which were to improve national law and to align with the European law, but it were not supported by the legislative organ.

Nowadays Ukraine is on its way of implementation of protection of children rights in legislation along with the human rights. That is the 'blind' spot in Ukrainian law.

vi. The most basic national non-governmental organizations who work on the topic of children and women are: La Strada-Ukraine, Ukrainian Women's Fund, National Foundation "Protecting the rights of children," Ukrainian NGO "Child Protection Service", Women's Consortium of Ukraine and others.

International Women's Rights Centre "La Strada-Ukraine" is working towards the prevention of trafficking in persons, especially women and children, elimination of all forms of discrimination and violence in society, promote human rights, gender equality and children's rights.

It provides financial, information and advice to civil society organizations from Ukraine, Moldova and Belarus. UWF is a member of Ukraine Network Women's Program of Open Society Institute - New York, International Network of Women's Funds and Philanthropists Forum in Ukraine. NGO Ukrainian Foundation "Protecting Children's Rights" (VFZPD) is a non-profit organization that was founded in January 2003. The organization was founded by experienced professionals in the field of children's rights, which started its activities in the field of human rights protection in 1993 under the auspices of the Ukrainian Legal Foundation, and from 2002 to 2005 headed the Ukrainian Committee of protection of children, birth to entirely new approaches to the field of children's rights and logically continued implementation of innovative design and research activities within the Ukrainian Foundation "Children's Rights". The priorities of the organization is urgently important for Ukrainian society: legal education in the field of child protection, juvenile justice, children in conflict with the law, street children, prevention of all kinds of violence and exploitation of children, monitoring children's rights in Ukraine and research. For years, it was established close and fruitful cooperation with the Supreme Court of Ukraine, the Ministry of Justice of Ukraine, Ministry of Education and Science of Ukraine, the Ministry of Family, Children and Youth, the State Department of Ukraine for Enforcement of Sentences, the General Prosecutor of Ukraine, Ministry of Internal Affairs, UNICEF and several NGOs acting in the interests of children. The organization was one of the founders of the Network of NGOs for children.

Women's Consortium of Ukraine - a NGO, which provides a coordinating role in promoting advocacy, education and outreach initiatives aimed at preventing violence against women and children, in particular, home to overcome trafficking and promote equal rights and opportunities for women. Today, members of the Women's Consortium are 32 NGOs from all regions of Ukraine. This local and regional independent organizations working to address the following priority issues: domestic violence and child abuse, trafficking in persons, especially women and children, equal access of women to decision-making, gender stereotypes.

IV OTHER

While having conducted a global legal research on combating sexual exploitation of children in Ukraine, researchers became aware about the following problems, which complicate effective fight against sexual exploitation of children. First of all, the researchers mentioned that the relevant legislation is characterized by a wide range of contradictions. For instance, the relationship between the term 'child abuse' and such concepts as "domestic violence" "child exploitation," "sexual operation", "trafficking in children", "occupation of the child to criminal activity", "prostitution", "forced begging" is not clear. Secondly, it is worth emphasizing problems, which relate to ensuring relevant institutional infrastructure of combating sexual exploitation of children. Lack of effective institutional mechanism and relevant specialists prevent Ukraine from fast and qualitative dealing with the problem of child abuse.

A lot of issues are associated with lack of awareness of the topic. Firstly, as the problem does not become a subject for a wide public discourse, an issue of underreporting arises. Parents, whose children became victims of sexual exploitation, prefer not to reveal this fact due to the fact that (1) they do not believe in effective protection of their children's rights and (2) they are afraid of public discussion of the case. The problem becomes insoluble in case a victim is deprived of parental custody. Underreporting of sexual exploitation of children leads to lack of punishment of aforementioned crimes. Another issue, related to awareness, lies in the fact that children, especially those, who live in the rural area, lack awareness about sex, crimes against sexual inviolability and simple rules, which can help them protect themselves from becoming a victim of sexual offence. Under reporting of the problem and lack of open discourse lead to the fact that we do not have a real picture of the quantitative and qualitative characteristics of sexual exploitation of children in Ukraine.

It is obvious that combating sexual exploitation of children should become one of national priorities and improved in terms of legislation, institutional infrastructure and increasing awareness about the issue.

In Ukraine there might be three ways of improving the situation with the legislative children protection against sexual violence: governmental/parliamentary work, NGOs and public initiatives. All three are linked to each other and each of these elements can originate one from another.

As we saw from the situation of that kind of work in general is that the government is not aware of the reality in children rights protection issues at all, there is an institute of Ombudsman for children but it exists separately. This position was created, in our point of view, in order to relieve the government from the children rights matters but it resulted in a total indifference and distraction to the problem. Nothing is being done “from above”. It was really difficult to contact anybody from the governmental body during the research. Those who responded were not able to help. We did not manage to contact the responsible parliamentarian for children protection from sexual abuse. We have been working though with the Ombudsman. But as we see the possibility of such matters being discussed in the Parliament is equal to zero.

In the work of NGOs it is obvious the lack of coordination, the level of real cooperation between them is very low and their activities are limited to more theoretical work. Very few events organized by them include direct practical work with the children and adults. From this side we can assume that NGOs have not become a joint force in Ukraine that can have influence on the legislative process. But if they would have become active in a joint work it will be impossible for the government to not notice them and the issues in their work.

What we mean with the public initiatives is that people themselves are becoming active when it comes to children protection issues. Yes, we have a really unique phenomenon in Kyiv. A group of young people created in August this year an unofficial organization called “Okkupay-Pedofilyay” which also exists in some cities in Russia. Its aim is to fight against paedophilia. People from this organization are acting both in radically practical and extraordinary way. They create a situation under which a juvenile (a boy under 16-18) arranges a meeting with a man who seems to have a disposition to paedophilia. Members of the organization join this “agent” and interview the “paedophile” with camera recording. They do not use physical force and do not cause injuries to the “paedophile”. They only take an interview and in the end make sure that he is not going to continue meeting with juveniles. The videos are published on a web page in a Russian social network.<sup>100</sup> Some people state that it is hooliganism what they are doing though.

Another important issue for the children protection from sexual violence in Ukraine is juvenile justice. Our President has signed a decree on the juvenile justice policy in Ukraine and there exists a project of reforms on it but the society takes it completely wrong. Formally the main accent is being made on the criminal responsibility of juveniles but it also foresees social work of the governmental bodies with the families. In Ukraine a family is considered to be untouchable, it is a unity based on strong religious and cultural traditions. There is a stereotype that juvenile justice will lead to the situation under which children will be taken from their families for children rights violations by their parents. Furthermore a lot of organizations manipulate this misunderstanding. In particular, the so-called sect Dognala, unrecognized Ukrainian orthodox greek-catholic church, which leader Antinin Dognal has been deported from Ukraine under court’s decision. They systematically organize demonstrations against juvenile justice. They are sure that protection of children from sexual violence will lead to juvenile justice implementation. When we started promoting our legal research group the representatives of this sect filed several complaints to different state bodies including police. They are accusing our project of being aimed to take children from Ukrainian families. It does not sound serious but these complaints are obstructing the work of our network around Ukraine.<sup>101</sup> Unfortunately no educational programs concerning juvenile justice are implemented by the state and the society does not understand its meaning.

As we see the sexual violence issue is a very broad area for speculations. NGOs and governmental bodies should be very careful while dealing with it because at every stage of their activity they can meet the misunderstanding of the society.

V CONCLUSION

Childhood is the ground for every individual's development. It is the first stage in becoming a person. Its importance cannot be overvalued. That is why it should be properly protected by adults as children cannot do it themselves but they surely need it.

Ukraine has joined many international conventions on protection of childhood and children rights. Its legislation has been also amended. But somehow the mechanism of children rights protection does not work. Norms, providing guarantees for children rights realization, are mainly declarative, it is not clear who in particular is in charge for helping directly the children and families in children rights realization and protection.

Ukrainian legislation has a very formal approach in criminalization of socially dangerous activities. There are usually foreseen many obligatory features for every crime and in case of their absence the actions that have some other features of a crime are not considered as such, it is impossible to protect ones rights in case this kind of activity caused damages.

Also there is a big mess in all the existing laws. There can be a situation under which several laws regulate the same issue but at the same time they can prescribe different mechanisms for it. So if the state joins a convention and has to amend its legislation in accordance to it, it is sometimes really difficult to amend all the laws that contain an issue, regulation of which should be improved.

Ukraine ratified the Lanzarote Convention. It requires substantial changes of the legislation. To our mind it will take years to amend it and even more to make it work.

But the reasons for poor children rights protection situation is connected with much more factors than these of the abovementioned gender equity in particular. It is more natural for women to be concerned of children right issues. The statistics shows that there are almost no women involved in the decision making spheres of activities in Ukraine. To our point of view this is one of the main reasons why Ukraine still does not have any state program on children rights protection.

It is worth mentioning that one of the reasons for ignoring the sexual violence issues is soviet background. It is well known that sex in the Soviet Union was a forbidden topic and all the problems concerning sex issues "did not exist". It has been only 21 years that the Soviet Union collapsed and the elder generation still does not educate their children on sex issues. It is considered to be a kind of shame and disgrace to talk about it. That is why it obvious that in most cases the society remains indifferent when it comes to sexual violence.

The main thing that has to be done in order to improve the situation with combating sexual violence against children is not changes into legislation of Ukraine, it is consolidation. Everybody involved in the human rights protection have to clarify for themselves the main task in combating sexual violence against children and start acting together. In this case the government will be obliged to react to their position and finally create a state program at least on children rights protection. It is important for the NGOs to understand that they should influence on the government and not ask the government to support them. NGOs are an important force in the civil society and it should be in the Ukrainian society as well.

I INTRODUCTION

1 GENERAL

The present report focuses on how the UK legislation protects child victims from sexual violence, in its national legal framework in Europe. It must be acknowledged that the UK includes Great Britain<sup>1</sup> and Northern Ireland.<sup>2</sup> Great Britain is composed of England, Wales and Scotland. In areas such as family law, different laws apply in each part of the UK. In particular, Scots law applies in Scotland and Northern Ireland law applies in Northern Ireland. Legislation drafted in the parliament of the United Kingdom and UK Supreme Court judgments are highly influential in both legal systems.<sup>3</sup> However, due to restraints and limitations on research, this report will focus on England and Wales, where the law of England and Wales applies. This report is written in accordance with the guidelines and academic framework provided by ELSA for Children.

Equality Rights

i. The year of 2010 was marked by the introduction of the Equality Act 2010 which came into force in October 2010. This Act addresses and prohibits all forms of discrimination. The Act consolidates and simplifies a number of existing complex Acts and Regulations, which formed the basis of the anti-discrimination law. This included the Equality Pay Act 1970, the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, the Race Relations Act 1976, the Discrimination Act 1995 and the Disability Discrimination Act 1995.<sup>4</sup> In addition a number of regulations were consolidated in the Act including Employment Equality regarding religion or belief and sexual orientation.<sup>5</sup> The Equality Act 2010 covers a range of protected characteristics, which cannot be used as a reason to treat people unfairly. These are namely: age, disability, gender reassignment, marriage and civil partnership, pregnancy and maternity, race, religion or belief, sex and sexual orientation.<sup>6</sup> The Act has the same goals as four major EU Directives: EU Directive 2000/78/EC, 2000/43/EC, 2006/54/EC. This is evident when reading the Equality Act 2010, where pieces from the EU Directives have been included in the statute without any change.

In general, the Act did not change the law per se, but merely brought together a series of complex instruments by incorporating them in a single and simpler document. Nevertheless, since April 2011 all public authorities in Great Britain are subject to a general single equality duty as the Act “significantly extended the ability of employers and others to adopt positive action measures to promote equality”<sup>7</sup> However, while it requires equal treatment in access of employment regardless of age, disability, gender, reassignment, marriage and civil partnership, race, religion or belief, sex and sexual orientation, it allows transsexual people to be barred from gender-specific services if that is “a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim”<sup>8</sup>.

The Civil Partnership Act 2004 is another major piece of legislation regarding same-sex relationships. Its enactment and unilateral support from all UK parties demonstrates a change in attitude towards homosexual people. The Act granted civil partnerships in the UK identical rights and responsibilities as to civil marriage. This includes property rights<sup>9</sup>, parental responsibility for a partner’s children<sup>10</sup>, tenancy rights<sup>11</sup>, full life insurance recognition<sup>12</sup>, and a formal process for dissolving the partnerships akin to divorce<sup>13</sup>.

It should be pointed out that racially motivated crimes are severely punished under criminal law. The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 created new offences of racially and aggravated assaults. If a person commits an offence under s. 20 or s.47 of the Offences Against Person Act 1861, or common assault, and it satisfies requirements of the s. 29 (as amended by s. 39 of the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act) the maximum sentence for sections 20 and 47 which is five years is increased to seven years and in case of common assault from six months to two years. The judges’ reasoning in Rogers<sup>14</sup> implies that everyone who is of a different race to the defendant comprises a racial group. Furthermore, the Criminal Justice Act 2003 obliges the court to treat the act in question as an aggravating circumstance if:

“an offender demonstrated hostility towards the victim based on his or her sexual orientation or disability (or presumed sexual orientation or disability); or the offence was motivated by hostility towards persons who are of a particular sexual orientation or who have a particular disability”<sup>15</sup>

Relations between natives and people of African, Afro-Caribbean, South Asian, Middle Eastern descent and Irish travellers have improved over the past few years - according to the US Department of State report on the state of Human Rights 2011: “In 2010/2011 the Home Office reported 2,982 racially or religiously motivated assaults with bodily harm or other injury; there were 4,058 such assaults without injury. These figures represent a 15 percent and a 6 percent decline, respectively, from 2009/2010 figures.”

However, individuals might still encounter negative experiences. Despite the fact that all forms of racial discrimination are prohibited, there are sporadic problems reported, including incidents of homophobic violence and mistreatment based on racial or ethnic grounds. The Dale farm eviction is an example, where 300-400 Irish Travellers were forcibly evicted from their encampment in Essex, caught the attention of numerous national and international human rights institutions. The UN Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination has expressed its concern about the discrimination and lack of access to education, services and urged the British government to improve their employment prospects and living conditions.<sup>16</sup>

Family Protection

The United Kingdom has no single constitution document. It has an unwritten constitution which embodies written documents such as statutes, precedent and treaties.<sup>17</sup> It also includes unwritten sources such as parliamentary constitutional conventions and royal prerogatives.

Family law in particular is based on parliamentary legislation and extensive court decisions. In the British legal system, no definition of ‘family exists’. The law is more open and some less formal relationships can be defined as family. In the case of Fitzpatrick v Sterling Housing Association<sup>18</sup> Lord Slynn stated that in a familial relationship there should be “a degree of mutual interdependence, of the sharing of lives, of caring and love or commitment or support”<sup>19</sup>. According Schedule 1 par 2(2) of the Rent Act 1977, a person who was living as the wife or husband is treated as the spouse of the original tenant. It was decided that for the purpose of the Rent Act 1977 Schedule 1 paras.2 and 3., a tenant’s homosexual partner could depending on individual circumstance, be family member but not spouse. In the case of Mendoza v. Ghaidan<sup>20</sup> however, the House of Lords concluded that para.2 of the Rent Act 1977 should be read, and given effect to, as though the survivors of a homosexual couple living together was the surviving spouse of the original tenant.

The status of ‘marriage’ in the laws of England and Wales encompasses same sex unions only. The Civil Partnership Act 2004 however gives almost identical rights and responsibilities to civil partnerships as in marriage.

The minimum marriage age for both sexes according to the Ages of Marriage Act 1929 is 16.<sup>21</sup> Nowadays, the average age of marriage is 25-29 for both genders.<sup>22</sup> There has been a decrease in the number of marriages in recent years, with people preferring cohabitation.

Child Protection

iii. (a) Status of children within the UK’s cultural background and the UK approach to children rights

A sectoral approach has been prominent in the UK with particular focus on certain rights, and neglect for other rights.<sup>23</sup> Currently, 3.8 million children live in poverty the UK while 1.6 million children, who compromise 13 per cent of all children in the UK, are living in severe poverty. The criminal law system of the United Kingdom has been constantly criticised for having one of the lowest ages of the criminal responsibility in Europe, which is, since the abolishment of Doli incapax – a rule that protected children as being incapable of making a decision with full understanding of the consequences – in 1998, set at 10 years.<sup>24</sup> The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child criticised the UK's low age of criminal responsibility in 1995, 2002 and 2008. In 2001 the Prisons Minister Crispin Blunt has stated that the coalition government is not planning to increase the age to 14 years<sup>25</sup>, despite the requirement of the Convention to protect all children from contact with the criminal justice system.

Furthermore, amongst other problematic issues remains the treatment of asylum seeking children. The government is not currently planning to introduce a system to select guardians for unaccompanied children arriving to the UK. Children are being returned to Europe according to Dublin II regulation, removals of families are enforced by separating children from their parents, children are being held in detention centres for considerable period of time – all these issues evoke serious concern from the international community and require a thorough investigation by the government and effective attempts for improvement of the current situation.<sup>26</sup>

Progress has been made in the treatment of children during the screening interview process. Although the mistreatment has not ended completely, according to the reports of the Office of the Child Commissioner, a specialised training undertaken by the UKBA staff has improved experience of the children during interviews conducted.

(b) Violations catching the eye of the media and the legislators

In recent years there have been many cases reported by the media involving child abuse. The government and the legislators have been under extreme pressure to react to numerous scandals highlighting the UK law's deficiencies in the area of child protection.

The murder of 9-year-old Victoria Climbié, in 2000, who was tortured and killed by her guardians was crucial to the change of child protection policies in England. An inquiry was launched into the case pointing out the repetitive failures of the British system. The case led to the formation of the Every Child Matters initiative, the introduction of the Children Act 2004 which also created the Office of the Children's Commissioner chaired by the Children's Commissioner for England, the creation of the ContactPoint project and the creation of a government database designed to hold information on all children in England. The ContactPoint was a database, which contained information on all children under 18 in England. It was heavily criticised for privacy, security and child protection reasons.<sup>27</sup> The new UK Coalition Government announced the decisions for the termination of the project<sup>28</sup> and in August 2010 the database was switched off.

In 2007 the Baby P case, involving the death of a 17-month-old baby boy due to abuse, which was overlooked by Haringey Children's services and NHS health professionals, highlighted the persistent problems in the child protection system in the UK. In his report<sup>29</sup>, Lord Laming stated that too many authorities had failed to adopt reforms introduced by his previous review into welfare following the death of Victoria Climbié in 2000. Haringey Council initiated an internal audit to identify reasons for the failure of its officers to act, but the full report was not available to the public and therefore further investigations were launched. Two years following his death, the social worker working on his case and three managers of the Haringey Council were dismissed. The General Medical Council had actions of two doctors who examined the boy inspected, which resulted in their suspensions. As a consequence of a review of general practices of Haringey social services, which was conducted at the request of Edd Balls, Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families, Sharon Shoesmith - the head of children's social services was removed from her post as well.<sup>30</sup>

Recent stories have been published including teenage girls in care homes being groomed and targeted for sex by groups of men. Victoria Agoglia was a 15-year-old girl placed at a solo home, who died of heroin overdose after she was groomed for sex.<sup>31</sup>

In 2009, Vanessa George, who worked at a nursery, involved in a paedophile ring was convicted for a series of child sexual assaults and sharing images of the abuse online.<sup>32</sup> In 2012, another nursery worker admitted sexually abusing toddlers of ages two and three.<sup>33</sup> In September 2012 the British public was appalled by a grooming scandal in Rochdale. After arresting 9 men who led a children exploitation ring, an extensive examination has shown that the social workers failed to report stories of groomed girls, some as young as ten. In some cases the workers believed that 10 year olds “were making their own choices”, whilst the abused girls were attempting to seek help. The staff missed opportunities to address the problem and to “bring the perpetrators to justice”.<sup>34</sup>

iv. International Obligations

The UK has signed up to several major international instruments that affect children’s rights including Convention on Cybercrime, Convention on Action Against Trafficking, Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse. It is, therefore, responsible to uphold numerous international obligations regarding the rights of the child. According to the Constitutional Reform and Governance Act 2010, part 2:

“(1) Subject to what follows, a treaty is not to be ratified unless—

- (a) a Minister of the Crown has laid before Parliament a copy of the treaty,
- (b) the treaty has been published in a way that a Minister of the Crown thinks appropriate, and
- (c) period A has expired without either House having resolved, within period A, that the treaty should not be ratified.

(2) Period A is the period of 21 sitting days beginning with the first sitting day after the date on which the requirement in subsection (1)(a) is met”

The relationship between UK state law and international treaties is based on a dualist approach. In dualist states, a treaty adopted by the state does not alter the national laws unless incorporated into national law by the legislation.<sup>35</sup> Therefore, for treaty law to apply in UK territory, the UK parliament has to adopt the relevant legislation incorporating international law into national law.

The UK is a member state of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, which was ratified on 16 December 1991.

Reservations were made upon ratification on several topics, which were later withdrawn.<sup>36</sup>

The first reservation concerns “the right to apply such legislation, in so far as it related to the entry into, stay in and departure from the United Kingdom of those who do not have the right under the law of the United Kingdom to enter and remain in the United Kingdom, and the acquisition and possession of citizenship, as it may deem necessary from time to time”. The reservation was withdrawn on the 18 November 2008.

The second reservation concerned Art. 32. As stated “employment legislation in the United Kingdom does not treat persons under 18, but over the school-leaving age as children, but as “young people”. Accordingly the United Kingdom reserves the right to continue to apply article 32 subject to such employment legislation.” On 3 August 1999 the UK withdrew its reservation.

In its third reservation the UK “where at any time there is a lack of suitable accommodation or adequate facilities for a particular individual in any institution in which young offenders are detained, or where the mixing of adults and children is deemed to be mutually beneficial, the United Kingdom reserves the right not to apply article 37 (c) in so far as those provisions require children who are detained to be accommodated separately from adults.”<sup>37</sup> On 18 November 2008 the reservation was withdrawn.<sup>38</sup>

During the UK's Universal Periodic Review report<sup>39</sup> in the 21st session of the United Nations Human Rights Council in Geneva, several states urged the UK to withdraw its reservations on numerous optional protocols to the Convention on the Rights of the Child.<sup>40</sup> In response, Karen Pierce, the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom to the United Nations Office at Geneva stated that the UK has withdrawn its reservations to the Convention.

The Convention on the Rights of the Child is currently not incorporated into national law despite many calls from non-governmental organizations such as the Rights of the Child UK<sup>41</sup> and Barnardos<sup>42</sup>. Baroness Hale, however has stated that "Even if an international treaty has not been incorporated into domestic law, our domestic legislation has to be construed so far as possible so as to comply with the international obligations which we have undertaken. When two interpretations of these regulations are possible, the interpretation chosen should be that which better complies with the commitment to the welfare of children which this country has made by ratifying the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child." The provisions of the Convention are relevant to the interpretation of the European Convention and as Lord Bingham stated in Dyer v Watson [2004] 1 UKPC at [23] "colour the courts approach."<sup>43</sup> In other words, the courts when interpreting domestic legislation prefer to comply with international instruments.

The UK Government did not stand still. The Children's Act 2004 adoption for England and Wales created the Children's Commissioner for England. This position is currently taken by Sir Al Aynsley-Green. The Childcare Act 2006 and a range of legislation on the right to education<sup>44</sup> were enacted.

Despite recommendations by the Joint Committee on Human Rights that the UK Government should devise a comprehensive and detailed plan for implementation of the UNCRC recommendations across the UK in 2009<sup>45</sup>, the CRC has not been incorporated yet.

In 2010 the British Parliament started to discuss the adoption of the Children's Bill of Rights<sup>46</sup>, which would have made the Convention on the Rights of the Child part of UK national law. Unfortunately the Bill was not adopted, because the Second Reading did not take place. The Parliament was dissolved prior to the 2010 General Election.

Children's Minister, Tim Loughton, told the UK Parliament in September 2011:

"There are no plans to incorporate the Convention into domestic legislation. In general the UK Government does not incorporate treaties and international conventions directly into UK law. There is no requirement in the [Convention] that it be incorporated into a single piece of legislation. Our approach to deliver the [Convention's] outcomes is through a mixture of legislative and policy initiatives." The optional protocols on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, and on the involvement of children in armed conflict also need to be incorporated into UK law. It would ensure accessible means through which children can assert their individual rights and entitlements. Such a Bill would have a range of effects into national legislation and procedure and it would impose a duty to ensure all new legislation is compatible with the convention and is "children's rights proofed". The interpretation of convention rights would be determined by a court or a tribunal. 'Children in the UK are in need of a more comprehensive framework to protect their rights, they need their own Magna Charta recognizing their rights and entitlements.'<sup>47</sup>

v. European Obligations: Directive 2011/93/EU

The UK became a member state of the European Union on 1st January 1973. The UK is under obligation to conform to certain EU laws and incorporate them to national legislation in several matters, as part of the European Union. The Directive 2011/93/EU of the European Parliament and the European Council of 13 December 2011 on combating the sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children and child pornography, and replaced the Council Framework Decision 2004/68/JHA. The Directive “established minimum rules in the EU concerning the definition of criminal offences and sanctions in the area of sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children, child pornography and solicitation of children for sexual purposes and introduces provisions to strengthen the prevention of those crimes and the protection of the victims thereof”<sup>48</sup>.

During a debate in the House of Commons on the 26th of April 2011 Mr. Blunt<sup>49</sup> stated that no major changes would be required to existing legislation and practice in England and Wales, because the UK has implemented high standards of protection already and the reason behind opting in to this instrument is the desire to rise standards in other European states. <sup>50</sup>An article-by-article account of the plans for implementation across the UK will be provided once the text is finally agreed.<sup>51</sup>

No further information about the process of implementation of the directive has been provided by the UK authorities.

2 THE LANZAROTE CONVENTION

i. The European Convention on Human Rights was signed by the UK on 4 November 1950 and ratified in 1951. The UK was actively involved in the drafting of the Convention. The Human Rights Act 1998 is the main instrument of the ECHR implementation into UK law. According to Art. 3 of the 1998 Act, “so far as it is possible to do so, primary legislation and subordinate legislation must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights”. UK courts have, under Art.4 of the Act, the ability to make a declaration of incompatibility ‘if they are satisfied that the provision is incompatible with a Convention right’.

It should be noted that the European Convention on Human Rights does not provide much in particular to children’s rights. There have been series of cases being brought to the European Court of Human Rights against the UK regarding the physical punishment of children and care cases without much success. In the case of Campbell and Cosans v UK<sup>52</sup> the court rejected allegations of corporal punishment as the boy in question was not a subject of such punishment. It did, however, rule that the UK was in breach of Article 2 of Protocol 1 of the Convention which converts the right to education and the duty of the State to respect to the parents philosophical conviction with regards to that education and teachings. In the cases of Y v UK<sup>53</sup> and Costello-Roberts v UK<sup>54</sup> it was unsuccessfully argued that corporal punishment amounted to degrading treatment and therefore was in breach of Article 3 of the ECHR. In the landmark case of A v UK<sup>55</sup> however, it was held the applicants right under Article 3 had in fact been breach. The boy, in question, was beaten with a cane by his father, causing him bruising. Also in the case of Z and Others v UK<sup>56</sup> the Court held that the failure of social services to remove children from parents known to be neglecting them was in breach of Article. Nevertheless, in the case of D.P. and J.C. v UK<sup>57</sup> regarding the failure of social services to protect children from sexual abuse, no breach of any of the Convention rights in question, namely Article 3, 8 and 6, was found to exist. Yet, in the case of E and Others v UK<sup>58</sup>, failure of the social services to protect children from sexual and physical abuse by their mother's partner was in breach of Article 3.

ii. The UK is a signatory party to the Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse, namely the Lanzarote Convention since 5 May 2008 and it has yet to ratify it. No reservations or opt outs were made.

iii. There is no set date of ratification of the Convention at the present time. Questions have been made to the Parliament regarding the ratification and implementation process. The UK Government responded through Lynne Featherstone, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Equalities, who stated that “discussions are taking place across Government to establish a clear picture of current levels of existing compliance. Subject to the successful progression of these discussions, we aim to reach a decision on the steps needed to ratify and implement the convention before the conclusion of this Parliament.”<sup>59</sup>

iv. When ratified, the rank of the Lanzarote Convention under the UK's national legal order will merely be a source of interpretation. For it to have a binding effect, it has to be incorporated into national law. In addition, if ratified, the convention can be used as a source for guidelines for policy makers and step-by-step make children's rights a reality.

II NATIONAL LEGISLATION

1 GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE JURISDICTION

i. The modern United Kingdom (UK) is a union of England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. It does not include the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man (the British Islands). The UK is composed of three legal systems: (a) England and Wales, (b) Scotland, and (c) Northern Ireland. The focus of this report is on the law of England and Wales.

The seat of government is in Westminster, and the sovereign organ is the Queen-in-Parliament. Major public powers are vested in Ministers, who are servants of the crown. By structure of devolution, some legislative and executive powers have been vested in elected bodies in Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales. The essential features of the devolution settlement are to be found in the Scotland Act 1998, the Government of Wales Act 2006, and the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

There is no one single written Constitution. The British Constitution is rather "indeterminate, indistinct, and unentrenched"<sup>60</sup>; a product of history, but also originality<sup>61</sup>, and composing a 'flexible'<sup>62</sup> structure of rules, conventions, institutions and principles. Constitutional reforms effected since 1997 have relied for their efficacy on the unwritten rule of Parliamentary supremacy<sup>63</sup>. The UK is a parliamentary democracy and the fundamental principle of constitutional law is the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty, by which the Queen in Parliament "has under the English constitution, the right to make or unmake any law whatsoever; and further...no person or body is recognised by the law of England as having a right to override or set aside the legislation of Parliament<sup>64</sup>.

ii. The Human Rights Act was enacted in 1998, and incorporated the European Convention on Human Rights (1950; ratified by the UK in 1951) into domestic law<sup>65</sup>. The Government stated that its aim with this legislation was to “make more directly accessible the rights which the British people already enjoy under the Convention. In other words, to bring those rights home”<sup>66</sup>. The Act enables citizens to enforce their human rights before the domestic courts, rather than having to go to the European Court in Strasbourg as was previously the case, although having exhausted domestic remedies they may still have recourse to the Strasbourg Court<sup>67</sup>. The European Convention on Human Rights has had a significant impact on British constitutional law. Between January 1966, when the right of individual petition was accepted and the Convention was considered “a sleeping beauty (or slumbering beast...)”<sup>68</sup> and 2011, the Court has issued 279 judgements in which violations were found<sup>69</sup>.

In March 2011 the Government established an independent Commission on a Bill of Rights. Its mandate is to “investigate the creation of a UK Bill of Rights that incorporates and builds on all our obligations under the European Convention on Human Rights, ensures that these rights continue to be enshrined in UK law, and protects and extend our liberties”<sup>70</sup>. The Commission is due to report back by the end of 2012.

There are no specific provisions in the Human Rights Act regarding Children’s Rights, but that is because this is an Act giving ‘further effect to rights and freedoms guaranteed under the European Convention on Human Rights’<sup>71</sup>, not creating substantive rights. Specific provisions on child rights are contained within other legislation, including the Children Act

1989. In its submission regarding the Bill of Rights, the ROCK collation has suggested that such a Bill incorporate the rights in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

iii. With the incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights into domestic law by the Human Rights Act 1998 citizens are able to enforce their human rights before all domestic courts. The structure of these domestic courts is one of a multi-layered hierarchy. The Supreme Court of the United Kingdom is the highest court of appeal for UK civil cases, and also the highest court of appeal for criminal cases in England, Wales and Northern Ireland<sup>72</sup>. It was established by Part 3 of the Constitutional Reform Act 2005. It hears appeals from the Court of Appeal and, in exceptional circumstances, the High Court, which in turn hear appeals from the courts below them.

As for specific judicial bodies monitoring implementation of national and international human rights instruments, Section 3 of the Human Rights Act provides for an interpretive obligation on courts to ‘read and give effect’ to legislation in a way compatible with Convention rights, ‘so far as it is possible to do so’. Judges cannot disapply or hold invalid primary legislation as this would run contrary to Parliamentary legislative sovereignty, but under Section 4, specified (superior) courts can make a declaration of incompatibility as to the legislation if satisfied that a provision is incompatible with a Convention right. This brings the incompatibility to the attention of the relevant minister, facilitating amending legislation.

iv. The Supreme Court of the United Kingdom is the highest court of appeal for criminal cases in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. The criminal procedure for appeals to the Supreme Court is contained within the Criminal Procedure Rules 2012/1726. Appeals can be made following an application to the Court of Appeal concerning retrial following acquittal for a serious offence, an appeal to the Court of Appeal against ruling at preparatory hearing, ruling adverse to prosecution, or about conviction or sentence or following a reference to the Court of Appeal of point of law or unduly lenient sentencing<sup>73</sup>. The Court of Appeal must have granted permission to appeal.

<sup>73</sup> Rule 74 (‘Appeal or Reference to the Supreme Court’) of the Criminal Procedure Rules 2012/1727 (version in force from October 1 2012).

v. The age of criminal responsibility in England and Wales is 10 years old<sup>74</sup>. Children and young people aged 10-18 fall under the responsibility of the young justice system, which is distinct from the adult justice system and is overseen by the Youth Justice Board<sup>75</sup>. The average population under 18 in custody in 2010/11 was 2,040<sup>76</sup>. 79% of these were in Young Offender Institutions, 13% in Secure Training Centres, and the remaining 8% in Secure Children's Homes.<sup>77</sup>

2 SUBSTANTIVE CRIMINAL LAW

2.1 Sexual Abuse

i. Section 4 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (which replaced the Sexual Offences Act 1956 and hereafter referred to as 'Sexual Offences Act'), makes it an offence for a person (A) to intentionally cause another person (B) to engage in sexual activity without that person's consent, if he does not reasonably believe that B consents.

Under this section, the offence can be committed by words alone, for example a victim is forced to carry out a sexual act involving their own person (eg: self-masturbation). Also, the offence covers situations where the victim is forced to engage in sexual activity with a third party (who may be willing or not) or to engage in sexual activity with the offender.

'Sexual activity' is defined broadly in Section 78 of the Sexual Offences Act:

Penetration, touching or any other activity is sexual if a reasonable person would consider that – whatever its circumstances or any person's purpose in relation to it, it is because of its nature sexual, or because of its nature it may be sexual and because of its circumstances or the purpose of any person in relation to it (or both) it is sexual.<sup>78</sup>

According to the Legal Guidance of the Crown Prosecution Service, the nature of the activity has to be taken into consideration when deciding whether an activity is sexual (or not). Moreover, even where the nature of the activity is found not to be sexual, one should look at the circumstances or purpose of the defendant, or even both in deciding whether it falls under the definition of 'sexual'. An example is the case of R v Price [The Times 20 August 2003]<sup>79</sup> where the stroking of a woman's leg over trousers was considered to be an indecent assault and thus satisfying the definition of 'sexual'. [see also R v H (Karl Anthony)<sup>80</sup>] – where touching was again widely defined.

Finally, a secret fetish cannot be made sexual where the nature of the act cannot be sexual. Therefore, the term 'sexual activities' under the UK legislation is to be applied broadly.

ii. 'Intention' here is defined in the case law as basic intent; deliberate<sup>81</sup>. The criminal liability of an internationally committed crime of sexual abuse varies by offence, and is accordingly outlined in the Sexual Offences Act.

Section 7 of the Sex Offenders Act 1997 extended the jurisdiction of the courts of England, Wales and Northern Ireland. It was repealed and replaced by section 72 of the SOA 2003 on 1 May 2004, which in turn was amended by s.72 Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008. The outcome is that if a person commits an act outside the UK, which is an offence in that country or territory, that person can be prosecuted in the UK for the offence, if it is a sexual offence listed in Schedule 2 of the SOA 2003.

iii. The legal age for engaging in consensual sexual activities is 16. Consensual sexual activities between minors are regulated by the Sexual Offences Act and the Legal Guidance issued by the Crown Prosecution Service.

An important aspect of the criminal law is that the principal aim of the Youth Justice System is the prevention of offending by children and young persons. In particular, section 37 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 states that:

(1) It shall be the principal aim of the youth justice system to prevent offending by children and young persons.

(2) In addition to any other duty to which they are subject, it shall be the duty of all persons and bodies carrying out functions in relation to the youth justice system to have regard to that aim.<sup>82</sup>

The Directors Guidance on Charging (third edition: February 2007) states that offences under the Sexual Offences Act 2003 committed by or upon persons under the age of 18 years must always be referred to a Crown Prosecutor for early consultation and charging decision, whether admitted or not. In addition, Youth Offender Specialists should review all files involving youth offenders and take all major decisions in relation to those cases, in particular, whether or not a prosecution should take place.

The Code for Crown Prosecutors with regard to child defendants in these cases cites Lord Falconer's comment during the passage of the bill:

"Our overriding concern is to protect children, not to punish them unnecessarily. Where sexual relationships between minors are not abusive, prosecuting either or both children is highly unlikely to be in the public interest. Nor would it be in the best interests of the child...."

Prosecutors may exercise more discretion where the defendant is a child (under 18), according to the Code for Crown Prosecutors. Before commencing prosecution, the public interest will be considered, since the protection of children is the overriding public concern. In addition, there are a number of factors to be taken into account before prosecuting young defendants, detailed in the Legal Guidance.<sup>83</sup> Examples include the age and the understanding of the offender; the nature of the activity and what is in the best interests of both the complainant and the defendant. In R (on the application of S) v Director of Public Prosecutions, QBD (Admin) 28/06/2006, the following was emphasised:

"It is not in the public interest to prosecute children who are of the same or similar age and understanding that engaging in sexual activity, where the activity is truly consensual for both parties and there are no aggravating features, such as coercion or corruption. In such cases, protection will normally be best achieved by providing education for the children and young people and providing them and their families with access to advisory and counselling services. This is the intention of Parliament.”<sup>84</sup>

The Sexual Offences Act provides for three categories of offences against children of different ages: 13 (Sections 5-8), 16 (Sections 9-13), and 18 (Sections 16-24). The latter concerns offences involving abuse of position of trust. Where an offence under sections 9 - 12 is committed by a person under 18 there is a reduction in penalty. The culpability of young offenders who are found guilty of certain sexual offences (‘consensual’ category) is given a special provision. Thus, under the Sexual Offences Act, offenders aged younger than 18 will face a maximum penalty of 5 years’ detention as opposed to the maximum 14 years for offenders aged 18 or over.

Welfare is significant when dealing with young offenders. Specifically, section 44(1) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 states that when a court is dealing with a young offender, welfare should always be taken into account.<sup>85</sup> In addition, different factors can influence a decision. For example, in R v Paimant Asi-Akram<sup>86</sup> it was noted that the youth and immaturity of an offender should be potential mitigating factors when passing a sentence; however the seriousness of the facts of the offence should not be disregarded in any case.

The age of criminal responsibility in England and Wales is currently ten. Therefore no child under this age can be found guilty of a criminal offence. This should be worrying if we compare UK law to other laws in different countries. For instance, the age of criminal responsibility in France is 13, 14 in Germany, Austria, Italy and many eastern European countries. Also the age of criminal responsibility rises even more in Scandinavia which is set at 15 years old, 16 in Portugal, Poland and Andorra and 18 in Spain, Belgium and Luxembourg. It is also worth noting that some of the above mentioned countries have a presumption akin to doli incapax, which the UK has abolished under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. Section 34 states the following:

The rebuttable presumption of criminal law that a child aged 10 or over is incapable of committing an offence is hereby abolished.<sup>87</sup>

Critics of the UK age of criminal responsibility argue that this is too low and should be increased to at least 12 in accordance with the recommendations of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child. The Children's Commissioner Maggie Atkinson stated that:

“The age of criminal responsibility in this country is ten – that’s too low, it should certainly be moved up to 12. In some European countries it’s 14. People may be offenders but they are also children. Even the most hardened of youngsters who have committed some very difficult crimes are not beyond being frightened.”<sup>88</sup>

However, there is optimism surrounding this issue. Positive claims have been recently been made by the Justice Minister David Ford, that the age of criminal responsibility could rise to 12. He said he is committed to pressing for this increase in age while also stating that: ‘10 years old was too young to deal with the weight of a criminal justice system’.<sup>89</sup> He emphasised that young offenders are more in need of protection by the society rather than punishment.

iv. The use of force, taking advantage of mental disorder, or threat, in relation to sexual offences is regulated in Sections 30-37. Where a defendant, for example, is exploitative, or coercive, or much older than the victim, the balance may be in favour of prosecution, whereas if the sexual activity is truly of the victim's own free will the balance may not be in the public interest to prosecute.

Children with disabilities face an increased risk of abuse for a variety of reasons. According to the NSPCC, factors such as communication difficulties, or isolation and their dependency on their carer can affect a disabled child’s ability to recognise and understand that they are being abused as well as their ability to access help and support.<sup>90</sup> NSPCC strategy, whose vision is to end cruelty and protect children in the UK, is focusing in delivering innovative services that keep disabled children safe from harm. Moreover, NSPCC provides a course<sup>91</sup> for professionals who work with children with disabilities. This course aims in helping those professionals to develop confidence and knowledge to be able to safeguard and promote the welfare of children and young people with disabilities.

v. Crimes of incest are familial child sex offences. It involves family members and close relatives. Example of such situations are where someone is living within the same household as a child and assuming a position of trust or authority over that child; relationships defined by blood ties; adoption; fostering.

The crime of incest is regulated under Sections 25-29 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003. For instance, sexual activity with a family member is an offence (section 25), while inciting a child family member to engage in sexual activity is also an offence (section 26). For the purposes of sections 25 and 26 family relationships are defined in section 27 and they fall within three categories.<sup>92</sup>

vi. There are specific provisions concerning offenders who take advantage of school and educational settings, care and justice institutions, the work-place and the community. These are offenders aged 18 or over who are in 'a position of trust' and who abuse that position by behaving in a sexual way towards children under 18.

Sections 16-24 of the 'Sexual Offences Act' have been put in place which try to regulate abuses committed by persons in a position of trust. The main purpose of these provisions is to protect young people who are considered to be particularly vulnerable and could be easily exploited by people who hold a position of trust or authority in their lives.<sup>93</sup> Section 21 of the Sexual Offences Act outlines 'positions of trust' and Section 22 provides for interpretation of the positions. For example, looking after persons in educational establishments, residential settings, or where duties involve regular unsupervised contact of children in the community.

Moreover disqualification orders are available under sections 28 and 29 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000. A Disqualification Order can only be made by a Crown Court or Higher Court to disqualify a person convicted of an 'offence against a child' from working with children. The order may (and in some cases must) disqualify from working with children indefinitely.<sup>94</sup>

2.2 Child Prostitution

vii. The UK signed the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Human Trafficking on March 23 2007, ratified it on 17 December 2008, and brought it into force on 1 April 2009.

Abuse of children through prostitution is dealt with in Sections 47-50 of the Sexual Offences Act. These offences are: paying for sexual services of a child (47); causing or inciting child prostitution or pornography (48); controlling a child prostitute or a child involved in pornography (49); arranging or facilitating child prostitution or pornography (50). This category of offences complies with the stipulation in Article 19 of the Lanzarote Convention that State Parties are to take legislative or other means to ensure that intentional conduct in relation to the following is criminalised:

recruiting a child into prostitution or causing a child to participate in prostitution; coercing a child into prostitution or profiting from or otherwise exploiting a child for such purposes;

having recourse to child prostitution.

viii. The Lanzarote Convention specifically defines ‘child prostitution’ in Article 19(2) as ‘the fact of using a child for sexual activities where money or any other form of remuneration or consideration is given or promised as payment, regardless, if this payment, promise or consideration is made to the child or to a third person’. Whilst the Sexual Offences Act does not specifically define ‘child prostitution’ per se, the breadth and depth of provision for this offence renders it compatible with the Convention definition.

The offences under these sections concern either (i) a child (B) under 18 who is not reasonably believed by the offender (B) to be over 18; or (ii) a child under 13. The definition of ‘prostitute’ is provided in Section 51 of the Sexual Offences Act as ‘a person (A) who, on at least one occasion and whether or not compelled to do so, offers or provides sexual services to another person in return for payment or a promise of payment to A or a third person; and “prostitution” is to be interpreted accordingly.’

ix. Children involved in prostitution are primarily victims of abuse and people who take advantage of them by exploiting them, are child abusers. National legislation criminalises both the recruiter and the user of child prostitution, with offences outlined in Sections 47-50 of the Sexual Offences Act.

Consent is not in issue. It does not matter if a child of 16 or 17 consents to the activity, it is those who exploit children who commit a criminal act. Also, there is a defence that a person reasonably believed that the child was over 18. This does not apply if the child was under 13.

2.3 Child Pornography

x. The UK is a party to the Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime. It signed the Convention on November 23 2001, ratified it on 24 May 2011, and it entered into force on 1 September 2011.

xi. The main provisions regarding indecent photographs of children are Section 1 of the Protection of Children Act 1978 and Section 160 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. The Sexual Offences Act provides a definition of ‘pornography’ in Section 51 as ‘a person is involved in pornography if an indecent image of that person is recorded; and similar expressions, and ‘pornography’, are to be interpreted accordingly’. ‘Indecent’ is not defined by the Protection of Children Act, but case law has stated that it is for the jury to decide by reference to recognised standards.

xii. Under the Sexual Offences Act, criminal liability regarding child pornography is attributed to the person who causes or incites the child to become involved in pornography or who intentionally arranges or facilitates the involvement in it. Criminal liability for distributing an indecent photograph of a child is incurred under the Protection of Children Act, and criminal liability for possession of an indecent photograph of a child is incurred under the Criminal Justice Act. This is compatible with Article 20(1)(a) – (f) of the Lanzarote Convention.

xiii. The UK did not make a reservation under Article 20(3) and (4) of the Lanzarote Convention.

xiv. Intentional conduct of making a child participate in pornographic performance is criminalised under Section 48 of the Sexual Offences Act. This provision targets both recruitment and coercion.

2.4 Corruption of Children

xv. Section 19 of the Children's Act of 1960 addressed the criminal offence of corruption of children before being repealed by the Sexual Offences Act 2003<sup>95</sup>. Child sexual exploitation is defined by the UK government in the guidance and policy by the National Working Group for Sexually Exploited Children and Young People as "exploitative situations, contexts and relationships where young people (or a third person or persons) receive 'something' (e.g. food, accommodation, drugs, alcohol, cigarettes, affection, gifts, money) as a result of performing, and/or others performing on them, sexual activities"

The definition states that child exploitation can occur through technology without the immediate recognition of the child and stresses the power that is exerted through different means on the child.

Causing a child to witness sexual abuse or activity is a form of non-touching sexual abuse. Under Section 9(11) of the Sexual Offences Act various circumstances are detailed in which engaging in the sexual activity in the presence of a child is considered sexual activity with a child.

2.5 Solicitation of Children for Sexual Purposes

xvi. Grooming is dealt with by the Section 15 of the Sexual Offences Act. In addition to covering situations of contact through meetings and telephone conversations this sections covers internet communication where the perpetrator works to garner 'the child's trust and confidence so that he can arrange to meet the child for the purpose of committing a 'relevant offence' against the child'.<sup>97</sup> It is not necessary for the content of the earlier communication to be explicitly sexual in nature, for instance including discussion of sexual material or sending pornographic images.

Section 15 deals with physical meetings, which have been preceded by at least two communications. For the purpose of the offence the offender must either meet the child or have travelled to the prearranged meeting but the intended offence need not have occurred. Criminal liability is in the form of summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months and/or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 10 years.

xvii. Under the Sexual Offences Act 2003, Part 1 Section 73, a person is not guilty of aiding or abetting or counseling the commission against a child of an offence for four reasons including protecting the child from sexually transmitted infection, protecting the physical safety of the child, preventing the child from becoming pregnant or promoting the child's emotional well-being by the giving of advice. These reasons have to fall outside the purpose of sexual gratification or encouraging the activity constituting the offence or the child's participation in it. However, these exceptions apply only to Sections 5 (rape of a child under 13), 7 (sexual assault of a child under 13), 9 (sexual activity with a child) and 13 (Child sex offenses committed by children or young persons) of the Sexual Offences Act.

2.6 Corporate liability

xviii. A corporate employer is vicariously liable for the acts of its employees and agents where a natural person would be similarly liable.<sup>98</sup> The relevant Legal Guidance is issued by the Crown Prosecution Service. If the offending represents isolated actions by individuals, then that is a consideration against prosecuting. Likewise, prosecution of the company should not be as a substitute for prosecution of criminally culpable individuals; this will however be balanced with a consideration of the possible liability of the company where the criminal conduct is for corporate gain.

Corporate officers who are the embodiment of the company can be deemed 'controlling officers' of the company by the identification principle. Criminal acts by such officers will not only be offences for which they can be prosecuted as individuals, but also offences for which the company can be prosecuted because of their status within the company. Therefore, a company may be liable for the act of its servant even though that act was done in fraud of the company itself.<sup>99</sup> However, the key exception to corporate liability the most relevant here is: “A company cannot be criminally liable for offences which cannot be committed by an official of a company in the scope of their employment, for example rape”.<sup>100</sup>

xix. Corporate liability may be criminal, and with regard to offences requiring mens rea the ‘identification principle’ is applied. This states that the ‘acts and state of mind’ of those representing the directing mind will be imputed to the company<sup>101</sup>. The Crown Prosecution Service has outlined many factors considered in deciding whether to prosecute a corporation and hold it liable.

xx. National legislation does not exclude individual liability on the basis of there being corporate liability. Depending on the type of offence, it may be determined that the company, as a ‘legal person, capable of being prosecuted’ and which ‘should not be treated differently from an individual because of its artificial personality’<sup>102</sup> is wholly responsible.

2.7 Aggravating Circumstances

In 2007 the Sentencing Guidelines Council issued a Definitive Guideline which every court must have regard to in sentencing for offences under the Sexual Offences Act. The ‘general principles’ section deals with many factors<sup>103</sup>.

Factors indicating a higher culpability are as follows: ‘offence committed whilst on bail for other offences; failure to respond to previous sentences; offence was racially or religiously aggravated; offence motivated by, or demonstrating, hostility to the victim based on his or her sexual orientation (or presumed sexual orientation); offence motivated by, or demonstrating, hostility based on the victim’s disability (or presumed disability); previous conviction(s), particularly where a pattern of repeat offending is disclosed; planning of an offence; an intention to commit more serious harm than actually resulted from the offence; offenders operating in groups or gangs; ‘professional’ offending; commission of the offence for financial gain (where this is not inherent in the offence itself); high level of profit from the offence; an attempt to conceal or dispose of evidence; failure to respond to warnings or concerns expressed by others about the offender's behaviour; offence committed whilst on licence; offence motivated by hostility towards a minority group, or a member or members of it; deliberate targeting of vulnerable victim(s); commission of an offence while under the influence of alcohol or drugs; use of a weapon to frighten or injure victim; deliberate and gratuitous violence or damage to property, over and above what is needed to carry out the offence; abuse of power; abuse of a position of trust'.

Factors indicating a 'more than usually serious degree of harm' are as follows: 'multiple victims; an especially serious physical or psychological effect on the victim, even if unintended; a sustained assault or repeated assaults on the same victim; victim is particularly vulnerable; location of the offence (for example, in an isolated place); offence is committed against those working in the public sector or providing a service to the public; presence of others e.g. relatives, especially children or partner of the victim; additional degradation of the victim (e.g. taking photographs of a victim as part of a sexual offence); in property offences, high value (including sentimental value) of property to the victim, or substantial consequential loss (e.g. where the theft of equipment causes serious disruption to a victim's life or business)'.

In addition to the 'general principles', there are aggravating factors that are relevant to each offence. These divided in depth according to individual offence.

2.8 Sanctions and Measures

xxi. The European Parliament has laid out a specific Directive against sexual violence on children. According to the Directive 2011/92 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13th December 2011, on combating the sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children and child pornography, and replacing Council Framework Decision 2004/68/JHA, it has been clearly laid out but the European Parliament that Member States have the full responsibility to enact on the aforementioned Directive, so as to penalise persons who have committed sexual violence crimes on children.

Art. 13(1) spells out that ' Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that legal person held liable pursuant to Article 12(1) is punishable by effective, proportionate and dissuasive sanctions, which shall include criminal or non-criminal fines and may include other sanctions...'

Art. 15(1) puts forward that 'Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that investigations into or the prosecution of the offences referred to in Art.3 and 7 are not dependent on a report or accusation being made by the victim or by his or her representative, and that criminal proceedings may continue even if that person has withdrawn his or her statements'. Furthermore, in Art.2 and 3, it is mentioned that 'Member States shall take the necessary measures to enable the prosecution', and 'ensure that effective investigative tools, such as those which are used in organised crime or other serious crime cases are available to persons'. Accordingly, Member States also own the obligation to 'take the necessary measures to enable investigative units or services to attempt to identify the victims of the offences.' (Art. 15(4))

In addition, Art. 16(1) and (2) of the Directive states that Member States ought to report suspicion of sexual abuse or sexual exploitation by applying 'the confidentiality rules imposed by national law...' and that they should 'encourage any person who knows about the suspects'. Subsequently, Art. 18 provides general provisions on assistance, support as well as protection measures for child victims who suffer from sexual violence. Member States are subjected to provide necessary measures to ensure assistance and support are awarded in an appropriate manner, and that child victims can enjoy their rights by having those specific actions to assist and support granted to them.

By citing Art.20, it is a legal requirement that child victims are subject to the protection of the Directive in the process of criminal investigations and proceedings. Child victims can also enjoy the measures against advertising abuse opportunities and child sex tourism (Art. 21), and that Member States ought to take preventive intervention programmes or measures to 'prevent the risk of such offences being committed' (Art. 22). Art. 23, 24 and 25 have further spelled out the prevention, intervention programmes or measures on a voluntary basis in the course of or after criminal proceedings, as well as measures against websites containing or disseminating child pornography stipulations, respectively.

In the United Kingdom, the Sexual Offences Act 2003 is the most up-to-date legislation which is designed to act against various types of sexual violence, it also serves as a protection to child victims within the country, including prostitution, trafficking, as well as child sex offences. The aim of the Act was to 'make a new provision about sexual offences, their prevention and the protection of children from harm from other sexual acts'.

With specifications to sexual violence on children, S. 5 to 8 specify details of rape and other offences against children under 13 years of age; S. 9 to 15 of the Act describe conditions of sexual activity with child, causing or inciting a child to engage in sexual activity, engaging in sexual activity in the presence of a child, causing a child to watch sexual act, child sex offences committed by child or young persons, arranging or facilitating commission of a child sex offense, and meeting a child following sexual grooming etc; whereas S. 25 to 29 mention familial child sex offences. Situations on indecent photography of children are put forward in S. 45 and 46, while S. 47 to 51 are about the abuse of children through prostitution and pornography.

As this 2003 Act was reformed to reflect social changes on attitudes and values, in regard to the contemporary situation, the British government has placed heavy attention on the concept of 'consent' (to sexual activities) on this Act. It has been widely criticised by children's campaigners that the Act has no recognition of the concept of actual consent, thus the Act would also criminalise consensual sexual activities between children. As a result, the Act bears the risks of penalising the wrong persons, and in return, fails to protect those who are indeed needing assistance.

Although the United Kingdom is one of the Member States of the European Union and it exerts to protect children from any form of sexual abuse, whilst the European Parliament has spelled out a holistic Directive as a guideline to assist national legislations, the UK is in fact struggling to protect its victims by placing the attention of 'consent' inappropriately. On the other hand, by referring to the Sarah Payne case, it is apparent that tougher sentences for sex offenders are introduced on repeat offenders which this is deemed to be unjust in the legal system.

All in all, the United Kingdom is suggested to once again reform the 2003 Act according to the Directive. At the moment, the national Act appears to be slightly doubtful as false judgements on 'consent' can lead to granting wrong sanctions on the persons, and, providing inappropriate preventive measures to prevent children (and any other persons) from sexual abuse. To improve the situation, the UK government ought to reconsider the concept of 'consent' and reform the existing law from this point onwards.

3.1 Investigation

i. Section 4. 19 of the CPS Code for Crown Prosecutors states that ‘prosecution does not act for victims and must act in the overall public interest.’<sup>104</sup> The CPS however has a separate policy outlined for prosecuting criminal cases involving children and young people as victims and witnesses, which states that they will always think about what is best for children in criminal case but it is not the only thing that is considered in their decision making process.<sup>105</sup> During the instigative process the special measures that can be taken, specifically in relation to sexual offence crimes, is having trained police officers or social workers conduct video statements. Child victims can also make victim personal statements but these can be made through the parents or guardians of the children. The Ministry of Justice in the UK, also has issued guidance titled ‘Achieving Best Evidence in Criminal Proceedings: Guidance on interviewing victims and witnesses, and guidance on using special measures’<sup>106</sup> that elaborates on the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999. In regards to the investigative process, the police and the social care worker of the child are in communication to determine whether an investigation headed solely by the police is necessary. If the police conduct the interview the local authority can make enquires concerning the planning of the interview and the role of the social worker. In addition, reports to the CPS should always include clear information about the wishes of the child about their time in court.<sup>107</sup>

When it comes to the court proceedings, the child victim can make an application to the court to use some of the special measures that are offered when giving evidence. These include using their video evidence instead of appearing in person and in sexual offence cases, using the ‘live link’, children can also give evidence in private or behind a screen or using someone to explain the questions to the child. There is also a Witness Care Unit (CPS and the police) in place for the child during the entire process where a worker can help the child in court and in cases where there are very young children involved a trained ‘intermediary’ person to help them understand and answer questions.

The case of T and V v United Kingdom<sup>108</sup> at the ECHR set principles for how to conduct trials regarding children and related to Article 3 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child which states:

“In all actions concerning children, whether undertaken by public or private social welfare institutions, courts of law, administrative authorities or legislative bodies, the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration.”

In this monumental case the applicant alleged that the cumulative effect of the age of criminal responsibility, the accusatorial nature of the trial, the adult proceedings in a public court, the length of the trial and other reasons all accounted for a breach of Article 3. The courts lengthy discussion on this Article regarding the best interests of the child outlines the importance that should be paid to the issue of child rights throughout the entire process.

According to a Barnardo’s report titled ‘Puppet on a String’ a joint review of police practice and prosecution procedures is required to improve the prosecuting of cases of child sexual exploitation.<sup>109</sup> They also suggest that the priority should be the safeguarding of child victims and witnesses through a distinct witness care program. Another report from Barnardo’s further suggests that cross examination of child witnesses along with better training for all the legal personnel involved in the process.<sup>110</sup>

ii. There are a variety of special unit task forces on a national and local level that conduct investigations into crimes of the nature being examined here. The Major Investigation Team is responsible for investigating child homicide and suspicious child deaths leading many larger national cases. There are also other teams including The Serious Case Team investigates complex child abuse cases working with local Child Abuse teams and the Paedophile Unit focusing on the activities of individuals who produce and distribute indecent child images. There are also 18 Child Abuse Investigation Teams catering to the 32 London boroughs investigating allegations of physical abuse, sexual abuse, emotional abuse and neglect. Additionally, the Paladin Team safeguards the children at the London ports working alongside the UK Border Agency.<sup>111</sup>

The Child Abuse Investigation Command deals with many issues in addition to predatory paedophiles and sexually corrupting children through use of the internet through their Hi-Tech Crime Paedophile and Intelligence Units.<sup>112</sup> They also work proactively to prevent children offences such as grooming and conspiracy to commit rape facilitated through the internet. There is also a Child Exploitation and Online Protection (CEOP) Centre<sup>113</sup> takes a holistic approach to help eradicate the sexual abuse of children while the Serious Crime Analysis Section analysts and specialist police staff analyses rape and serious sexual assaults and motiveless or sexually motivated murder cases.<sup>114</sup>

iii. According to the Guidance on Investigating Serious Sexual Offences issued by the Association of Chief Police Officers in conjunction with the National Centre for Policing Excellence, the investigation begins with the reporting of a serious sexual offence to the police.<sup>115</sup> The most common is the reporting of the crime either via the phone or in person by the victim.<sup>116</sup> However, there is also the existence of third party and anonymous reporting which may be an organization or a direct witness to the crime reporting it.

In regards to withdrawal of a statement by the victim, if there is a withdrawal of support for the prosecution it can be for several reasons not pertaining to untruthful statements.<sup>117</sup> These withdrawal statements can be used as evidence in current or future circumstances so must be retained. Furthermore, if a victim retracts there statement - if they retract a partial statement, it may have an impact on the victorious prosecution and

iv. The UK does not have a statute of limitation for criminal offences.

v. Authorities should follow the UKBA guidance on assessing age when the age of the victim is unknown.<sup>119</sup> The general policy for assessing age includes taking into account all relevant sources, information and evidence.<sup>120</sup>

vi. Home Office Offenders Index and the Police National Computer are responsible for recording and storing the information regarding convicted offenders. The Offenders Index holds criminal history data for offenders convicted in England and Wales for all indictable and some summary conviction offences since 1963.<sup>121</sup> The Police National Computer stores all offences for which a custodial sentence is possible and records co-offenders information as well. Organizations can request data from the Offenders Index but have to give the Home Office a detailed report on how the data will be used and what the aims are. In addition there must be declarations signed to safeguard that the approved personnel would only access the information.<sup>122</sup>

According to The Code of Practice for Victims of Crime 16.1, victims can bring a claim to the service providers, particular organization who have failed to deliver under the obligations stated in the Code.<sup>123</sup> Additionally, there is an internal complaints procedure to which victims can make a complaint.<sup>124</sup> Service providers include the Police, Crown Prosecution Service (CPS), Joint Police/Crown Prosecution Service Witness Care Units, Crown Court, Magistrates' Court, Court of Appeal, Youth Offending Team, National Probation Service, Prison Service, Parole Board, Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority, viii. The appropriate legislature in this regard is S1.3 of the Children Act 1989<sup>128</sup> states that children’s views will be an important way to determine the welfare of the child, enshrined in s.1.1. In the article provided by David Boyd, 12.1 & 12.2 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child notes that children are to be given the opportunity to be heard in a judicial proceeding through a representative.<sup>129</sup>

According to the Guidance on interviewing victims and witness, and guidance on using special measures, children who are under the age of 18 are eligible under the criteria stated in B.2.4, B.2.5, B.2.6 and B.2.7 for special measures.<sup>130</sup> Measures to assist child witnesses during hearing prior to evidence includes decreasing court wait time, having waiting areas that are secure that also include toys and activities that pertain to the children, side door to the court room, and support worker present at all times.<sup>131</sup> With regards to some of the special measures that may be provided to children at court, these special measures include screens, a live link with a supporter included in the room, video recorded evidence or evidence provided in private, a communications specialist to communicate to the child as well as aids, appropriate amount of breaks, and cross examination that is pre-recorded on video.<sup>132</sup>

In order to receive such special measures, an application is made to the court at the earliest, where the magistrates' or the judge decide the type of special measure that is to be used and is thus case by case dependent.<sup>133</sup>

In some cases, in terms of publicity, the courts can declare newspapers, tv programs and radio not to disclose the identity of the child.<sup>134</sup> With regards to sex offence cases, the identity of the victim can also be prevented from disclosure by such news mediums.

The Children and Young Persons Act 1933, Section 39 states the limits placed on publicity.<sup>135</sup> The name, address, school, as well as any factors that may lead to the identification of the child must be kept hidden from publication.<sup>136</sup> The risks of the child are taken into account and weighed against the overall public interest.<sup>137</sup> Youth court proceedings are granted extensive protection in terms of publication as indicated in section 49 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933.<sup>138</sup>

Preventive Measures

Article 19 (1) of the Convention on the Rights of the Child outlines State parties' responsibility to protect children while in the care of individuals or institutions<sup>139</sup>, and Article 19 (2) outlines the protective and preventative measures that should be taken.<sup>140</sup> Although these standards are not binding in the UK, they are of vital importance that should be given attention to.

The purpose of this section is to examine the educational guarantees that are given in relation to professionals working with children in the area of sexual abuse and sexual exploitation, and to examine the State's role in ensuring that these individuals are aware of these situations.

Preventative measures to be taken are illustrated in Articles 5 - 7 of the Council of Europe Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse. Article 5 focuses on recruitment, training as well as awareness for persons who have contact with children whether it is within a professional or non-professional capacity. The rights of the child as outlined in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child are to be understood and enforced. The Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse indicates that knowledge and awareness of indicators of possible sexual exploitation or sexual abuse are required, and are to be reported. There is no obligation for training with this provision, as it is based primarily on whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that a child has been victimized of sexual exploitation or sexual abuse.

With regards to professionals who are working with children, a screening process is required in order to ensure that there are no previous sex offender convictions or other possible indicators of perpetrating against children. Although some member States are required to screen persons who volunteer with children, it is not required for all member States.

Article 6 of the Council of Europe Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse outlines each party's responsibility within primary and secondary education to educate and provide information to children and young persons regarding the sexual exploitation and sexual abuse.

The UK's leading children's charity, Barnardo's, has extensive involvement in prevention education in schools. As such, training on the topic of developing appropriate relationships was delivered amongst schools in the UK.<sup>141</sup> Additionally, Barnardo's Young Women's Project has been developed to provide training to "teachers, social workers and counsellors to educate young people about sexual exploitation with honesty and realism".<sup>142</sup> Barnardo's research recommends a national action plan to be taken in order to raise awareness as well as proper training for professionals in identifying and responding accordingly to sexual exploitation amongst children and young persons.<sup>143</sup> Barnardo's illustrates a need for improvement in relation to providing information to children and young persons in school on how to stay safe, while making a combined effort to educate parents and care takers on the early signs of possible sexual exploitation or sexual abuse.<sup>144</sup> In helping to achieve such goals, the Local Safeguarding Children Boards are vital for their cooperation in addition to other agencies including third sector agencies.<sup>145</sup> Furthermore, the Lucy Faithful Foundation provides educational services such as Internet safety seminars and safer recruitment training.<sup>146</sup>

xxii. In relation to Article 6 of the Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse, the State has an obligation to educate children at a primary and secondary school level on how to protect themselves of the risks of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse as well as provide access to resources for students.<sup>147</sup> Article 6 also outlines the importance of having a collaborative effort with parents and school staff whenever it is deemed appropriate.<sup>148</sup> Although the state must involve parents in the education process, this becomes difficult to do so when the parents are the perpetrators of the abuse. When it is appropriate to do so, the State must make a combined effort with parents and caretakers to involve them in the educative process however it is difficult to examine fully the extent to which parents have such involvement.

The Committee on the Rights of the Child notes the importance of prevention measures that are to be taken for children. Such prevention measures include the registration of children to access services, educating children of their rights and development of skills that will empower them, as well as implementing mentorship program.<sup>149</sup> With regards to Article 7 outlines information and consent such that consent must be given to enter into an intervention program and cannot be imposed unless convicted and the condition is stipulated in the sentence imposed.<sup>158</sup>

An example of a charitable organization that is worth mentioning is The Lucky Faithful Foundation. The foundation provides preventative programs, in addition to assessment and intervention services. The charitable organization has been in operation in the UK for twenty years and they specialize in the area of sexual abuse as well as the delivery of services within the criminal justice system. Lucy Faithful Foundation works with adult male and female sex offenders, young adult sex offenders, and individuals within probation services and with prisons.<sup>159</sup> The services in which the Lucy Faithful charity provides are assessment, risk management advice, educational courses, consultancy (both at an individual basis and on a team basis), devise and deliver supervision plans and intervention programs for young adults aged 18-21, as well as offer services for monitoring offender computers.<sup>160</sup> It is worth noting that the funding contract by the Public Protection Unit (now PPMHG) ended in 2010 for the service of assisting probation offender managers.<sup>161</sup> Evaluations conducted on the services provided reflect positive results.<sup>162</sup>

Protective Measures and Assistance to Victims

i. Barnardo's currently has 22 Specialist Services in the UK that provide support to children who are victims of sexual exploitation or are at risk.<sup>163</sup> Barnardo's focuses primarily on prevention by collaborating with schools, referral and residential units, as well as providing protection and support to those who are vulnerable of becoming victimized and those who are victims to sexual exploitation crimes.<sup>164</sup> The Barnardo model consists of four elements: "Access", "Attention", "Assertive Outreach", and "Advocacy for Young People in Need".<sup>165</sup>

Both children and young persons may refer themselves to Barnardo's services, as numbers are widely provided listing the nearest services available to these individuals.<sup>166</sup> Other agencies can refer individuals children and young persons upon identifying and responding to indicators of sexual exploitation.<sup>167</sup> As such, the services provided by Barnardo's ensures an inviting environment where the children and young persons are able to feel safe and comfortable.<sup>168</sup>

Attention

It is evident that children and young persons who are susceptible to becoming a victim of sexual exploitation or who have already been victimised, may lack the ability or the skills to trust adults.<sup>169</sup> Barnardo's strives on ensuring that attention is provided to each child and young person who enter into their services, by assigning one worker to remain with him/her throughout the duration of the utilization of the service.<sup>170</sup> This is to allow a trusting relationship to develop.<sup>171</sup> Barnardo's notes that this is established through a range of one-to-one work and counselling, drop-in support and group work sessions, we are eventually able to help the young person stabilise their life and build their confidence to a point where they are able to escape the situation in which they are being exploited.<sup>172</sup>

Assertive Outreach involves workers engaging with children and young persons on the street who may not realize the position to which they are in.<sup>173</sup> The Assertive Outreach team focuses on developing a relationship of trust and confidence in one another.<sup>174</sup> The Barnardo's staff helps children and young persons gain access to other services while striving to establish a supportive network.<sup>175</sup>

The NSPCC, which “is the only UK children’s charity with statutory powers to safeguard children at risk of abuse” provides a helpline service, a ChildLine as well as support services within the community.<sup>179</sup> According to the NSPCC Report & Accounts for 2010/2011, the ChildLine is utilized more than 50 000 times a month.<sup>180</sup> Additionally, the Helpline receives over tens of thousands of calls annually.<sup>181</sup> Within the UK, the NSPCC expanded its services to reach a greater number of children than adults.<sup>182</sup> A grant of £11.2 million was made by the UK government in support of helplines.<sup>183</sup> This illustrates the governments belief in the beneficial impact helplines can have on children and adults.

The Helpline reached more than 35,000 adults in the past year who had concerns about a child, which resulted in 16, 385 cases being brought to the police and social services.<sup>184</sup> The NSPCC is now dedicated in establishing a greater number of services within primary schools while transforming the national helpline such as developing a helpline text service in order to reach more adults.<sup>185</sup>

Within the UK, the “Stop it now!” campaign and helpline have been developed to prevent child sexual abuse and provide awareness of child sexual abuse in the region.<sup>186</sup> Information is provided in educating and training parents, caregivers as well as other members in the

The Helpline is confidential. We will not ask you for your name or any other details, but if you do give us any information that identifies a child who has been, is being, or is at risk of being abused, we will pass this on to the appropriate agencies. We will also pass on details of any criminal offence that has been committed.<sup>188</sup>

The Lucy Faithfull Foundation (LFF) provides services to victims of sexual abuse as well as other members within the family that have been affected by the abuse.<sup>189</sup>

iii. Aside from charitable organizations, the state does not fully assist victims in terms of recovery. The Childlines and helplines that are provided through charitable organizations include Childline, The Survivors Trust, and Lifecentre in the UK.

The state defines victim as ‘any child exploitation or sexual abuse’.<sup>190</sup> Article 14 of the Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse provides that assistance is to be given to victims both within the short term and the long term healing process from childhood to adulthood where the impacts of the victimization continue to be apparent/detrimental to the victim.<sup>191</sup> Recovery is provided both physically and psycho-socially.<sup>192</sup> As such, the child’s needs are vital and must be a significant factor while taking recovery measures. It is apparent that significant cases of sexual abuse or sexual exploitation occur within the family.<sup>193</sup> As such, the convention has the ability to remove a child who has fallen to sexual victimization within his/her home or the alleged Complimentary measures have an important role in terms of prevention, education and recovery. The purpose of this section was to examine preventive and protective measures as well as the assistance that is provided to victims. It is important to highlight UK's leading children's charity, Barnardo's, which has extensive involvement in prevention education in schools. Additionally, Barnardo's is the main provider of specialist child sexual exploitation services within the UK, and therefore the facts illustrating Barnardo's services and involvement are of great importance within this section of the report. Furthermore, the NSPCC has proven to be of great significance, as this charity has statutory provisions to safeguard children who are at risk of abuse by providing a helpline service and support services within the community.

III NATIONAL POLICY REGARDING CHILDREN

i. Political discussion regarding the children in the UK

An Overview of Well Being of Children in Rich Countries<sup>196</sup>, a report by United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund in 2007 revealed that the United Kingdom is placed at the bottom in the well-being of children and young people in 21 industrialised countries. Similarly, the United Kingdom was ranked among countries with the most unhappy children in Europe in 2009 report of the Child Poverty Action Group.<sup>197</sup> These worrying reports evoked a strong reaction from the Parliament. In 2009 the Joint Committee on Human Rights issued a comprehensive report on the state of children's rights in the UK, attempting to look at several specific issues of concern, among others incorporation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child into domestic legal system, status of children in the UK and their negative depiction in the media, sexual abuse and asylum seeking, refugee and trafficked children. The report compared the current protection of children rights in the United Kingdom to the standard required by the United Nations

CRC and recommendations by the UN Committee on Rights of the Child and identified numerous shortcomings, which according to UNICEF UK are:

“partly a result of the gradual approach that has been taken to implementing child rights – focusing on particular children in particular places, rather than looking at all aspects of every child’s life.”

In the Parliamentary session 2009/2010 the Children Bill, which was supposed to enshrine the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child in the United Kingdom law, was discussed among MPs. The Bill was supported by the Rights of the Child UK coalition, unfortunately the Second Reading did not take place before Parliament was dissolved prior to the 2010 General Election.

The Government’s response to the Munro review of Child Protection<sup>198</sup>, launched in July 2011 is evidence of such political discussion. Over the years, tragedies have encouraged national reviews and inquiries, resulting in calls for action. Consequently, legislation has been passed; rulebooks have expanded; more procedures and processes have been introduced and structures have been changed.

In their ‘Review of domestic violence policies in England and Wales’ 2011, stated that policy development after 2000 recognised the inter-relationship between domestic violence and the abuse and neglect of children. What follows are examples of such policies being put in place. The Framework for the Assessment of Children in Need and their Families (Department of Health, 2000) pointed the impact of domestic abuse on parenting capacity. The Every Child Matters Outcomes Framework (Department for Children, Schools and Families, 2003) set targets that children affected by domestic violence are identified, protected and supported. The National Service Framework for Children, Young People and Maternity Services (2004) highlighted the serious effects on children who witness domestic violence. A Vision for Services for Children and Young People affected by Domestic Violence Local Government Association, The Association of Directors of Social Services, Women’s Aid and CAFCASS, 2005) provided guidance focused on meeting the needs of children affected by domestic violence within the planning of integrated children’s services and this was strengthened by subsequent publication of Working Together A guide to inter-agency working to safeguard and promote the welfare of children(2006, revised 2010) which contains statutory and non-statutory guidance to public agencies to work together in relation to domestic violence to protect children, including unborn children; empower mothers to protect themselves and their children; and to identify the abusive partners, hold them accountable for their violence and provide them with opportunities to change.<sup>199</sup>

Following the last unsuccessful attempt to incorporate the UNCRC into British Law through Children Bill 2010, in 2012 Children's Minister Sarah Teather told Parliamentarians on a subcommittee of the European Scrutiny Committee: "We do not have any plans at the moment to enshrine the UNCRC in British law."<sup>200</sup> According to the Children's Rights Alliance England, one of the possible interpretations of this statement implies that although there are no such plans now, in the future there is a prospect that the issue will be brought back to Parliament for further discussion.<sup>201</sup>

On the 11th September, the Joint Committee on Human Rights, chaired by Dr Hywel Francis MP, launched an inquiry into the human rights of unaccompanied migrant children and young people in the UK, with a particular focus on those who are seeking asylum or have been the victims of trafficking. The committee is seeking written evidence on questions relating to their status in the UK, their treatment, also the committee is attempting to find out how to ensure their rights are protected effectively and they have access to them, and they are planning to report on their findings to both Houses before Easter 2013.<sup>202</sup>

In the last year there were two major children rights related topics that required submissions from external organizations. Firstly, in May 2012 UNICEF UK criticized de-prioritisation of children's rights. 2011 Report<sup>203</sup> reflected the Foreign Commonwealth Office is lacking a child rights expert on its human rights panel, the child rights strategy has expired and currently there are no plans for its renewal and the central position of the FCO that children rights are not included in its centrally driven human rights priorities. The NGO highlighted that “the government must ensure that its new strategy on Business and Human Rights pays particular attention to child rights because of the potential for irreversible harm during childhood.”<sup>204</sup>

Secondly, the concerns about the Office of the Children’s Commissioner resonated in the Joint Committee of Human Rights. In August 2012 both NGO Coordinating Group<sup>205</sup> <sup>206</sup> and the Children’s Rights Director for England<sup>207</sup> submitted a paper on reform of the office of the Children’s Commissioner. Report of the NGO Coordinating Group recommended strengthening Commissioner’s powers, children’s involvement and enhancing accountability of the office with the purpose of creating an effective National Human Rights Institution as defined in The Paris Principles, adopted by the United Nations’ General Assembly in 1993. In order to accomplish this aim, the group proposed to change budgeting of the office, reform the appointment process and the mandate itself, include vulnerable groups of children under its protection and work on suggested change which both reports have in common - functions and powers that the office entails. <sup>208</sup> Whereas submission of the Children’s Rights Director were focused on transferring its duties under the Office of Children’s Commissioner, in the report of the group of NGO’s it occurs to be only one of their numerous points of concern. Other improvements put forward by reports, that may enhance the effectiveness of the office, include promoting positive attitudes towards children, raising awareness about children’s rights as well as enhancing its legal powers and duties.

In respect to protection of children from sexual exploitation in particular, the Home Office has been working on a strategy to combat sexual violence against children and in 2009 Supplementary guidance and policy on sexual exploitation of children and on child trafficking was issued by Department for Children, School and Families<sup>209</sup>. One year later, Tim Loughton, Parliament Under Secretary of State for Children and Families, published a guidance on child sexual abuse that updates the Statutory Guidance in relation to Serious Case Review. The new guidance is a part of Working together to safeguard children: a guide to inter-agency working to safeguard and promote the welfare of children report.<sup>210</sup>

In November 2011, the Department for Education put out Tackling child sexual exploitation: action plan<sup>211</sup>, that contains initiatives to address sexual violence and abuse in a more considered and collaborative way. However, in the following February the NSPCC, the Lucy Faithfull Foundation, NAPAC and Action for Children jointly wrote a Letter to Tim Loughton MP,<sup>212</sup> calling for the action plan to also make specific reference to abuse that occurs within families.

On 3 July 2012, the Government issued the first report on progress, along with a new guide on what practitioners should do if they suspect a child is being sexually abused. The guide complements should be read in conjunction with the Safeguarding children and young people from sexual exploitation statutory guidance, published in 2009.

ii. How has the awareness within the society regarding children's sexual abuse and exploitation been raised by committed NGOs and/or the State (use of official sources, documents)

The National Working Group (NWG) for Sexually Exploited Children and Young People is the forum made up from a wide range of organisation regarding children's rights and especially the sexual exploitation of children. Along with other voluntary organisations, they are the main promoters of awareness within society regarding children's sexual abuse and exploitation. This task is being pursued through websites, conferences, seminars, training, awareness-raising events and national campaigns. It has been recognised by government officials that “the NWG alone has delivered awareness raising through conferences and training events to over 3.4000 practitioners since July 2011.”<sup>213</sup>

Several governmental departments have initiated action plans regarding different aspects of child sexual abuse and exploitation. Supplementary guidance and policy on sexual exploitation of children and on child trafficking was put in place. In November 2011, the Department of Education published an Action Plan on tackling child sexual exploitation after consultation with several governmental department, national organisations and community groups. The action plan was the outcome of the Barnado’s report Puppet on a string: the urgent need to cut children free from sexual exploitation published in January 2010. In July 2012 the government issued a progress report on the action plan on sexual exploitation of children and on child trafficking.

On 8 February 2012, NSPCC in collaboration with The Lucy Faithfull Foundation, the National Association for People Abused in Childhood and Action for Children sent a letter to Tim Loughton MP, the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Children and Families. While welcoming the Child Sexual Abuse Plan introduced and its effect in raising awareness, the charities raised a serious concern: the action plan lacked a specific reference to sexual abuse occurring within families regardless of the fact that between 2005 and 2009 81% of confidential calls made to their helplines were about another adult’s behaviour within the family.

In its progress report on the action plan in July 2012 the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Children and Families listed a series of attempts and practices to raise awareness throughout the country which had taken place up to that point. It highlights the role of the NWG and other voluntary sector organisations in promoting awareness and understanding of materials targeted at children and young people. It noted that the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) and the National Police Improvement Agency (NPIA) took on board proposals for the training of frontline police officers on child sexual exploitation. In attrition, ACPO created a virtual library of child sexual exploitation awareness material. The NHS joined by commissioning a short film of child sexual exploitation to go on it online portal NHS Choice.<sup>214</sup> The Department of Health in working towards improving the guidance of health professional while the 2012 Foundation Curriculum provides that new foundation year doctors should receive training in order to meeting the need of victims of violence and abuse. Special focus has been given to children going missing especially from care homes.<sup>215</sup> The government issued its Missing Children and Adults Strategy, while the Child Exploitation And Online Protection Centre (CEOP) is working towards integrating missing children in its operations. It currently provides advice and support with the aim of locating missing children to the maximum of its potential.<sup>216</sup>

The report also makes reference to voluntary groups' activities and campaigns on a local and national level. It praises promotional campaigns such as Say Something If You See Something campaign (see below for further details) and the joint publication of Barnardo's and the Local Government Association named Tackling Child Sexual Exploitation: Helping Local Authorities to develop effective responses providing good practice examples.<sup>217</sup> In addition it mentions the work of BLAST project on a local level in Leeds and Bradford in raising awareness regarding sexual exploitation of boys and young men.<sup>218</sup> The production of leaflets for the education of professional and the training of police officers were the focal points of other projects in Lancashire and Torbay accordingly.<sup>219</sup> The report also notices that numerous people approached the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Children and Families for the creation of support groups.

Free of charge sexual abuse awareness workshops for parents and carers were delivered at children's centres, schools, community venues and churches.<sup>220</sup> These courses were part of Stop It Now! UK & Ireland run by the Lucy Faithfull Foundation and had the support of the Department of Education. Barnardo's committed to the education of professional sent thousands of 'spot the signs' leaflets, postcards and posters to schools and other service providers.<sup>221</sup>

The Department of Education produced and circulated a guide for practitioners when in suspicion of the child's sexual abuse.<sup>222</sup> The report ends with several remarks on areas that need improvement and assures that the Tackling Child Exploitation Action Plan remains 'live' and further progress review are to follow.<sup>223</sup>

The UK government issued guidance on child sexual abuse as part of Working together to safeguard children: a guide to inter-agency working to safeguard and promote the welfare of children. It noted that 'voluntary organisations play a key role in providing information and resources to the wider public about the needs of children and young people, and resources to help families'<sup>224</sup>. The NSPCC in particular offers helplines dedicated to raising awareness and providing information, advice and support. It includes Stop it Now! which specialises in child sexual abuse prevention and Parentline Plus which is available to anyone parenting a child.<sup>225</sup>

The Children Act 2004 established the mechanism of the Local Safeguarding Children Boards (LSCB) giving every locality the statutory responsibility incorporate it. As it is stated in their website, "LCSBs are now the key system in every locality of the country for organisations to come together to agree on how they will cooperate with one another to safeguard and promote the welfare of children" According to section 14(1) of the Children Act 2004 the objective of the a LSCB is to "(a) co-ordinate what is done by each person or body represented on the Board for the purposed of safeguarding and promoting the welfare of children in the area of the authority by which it is established, and (b) to ensure the effectiveness of what is done by each such person or body for those purposes". The Local Safeguarding Children Boards Regulations 2006 outlines the functions of the LCSBs including developing policies and procedures in relation to recruitment, supervision and investigations of people working with children. In addition they can undertake reviews of serious cases and advise their authority and Board members.

iii. If the statistics are available, how many reporting have been done regarding children's sexual exploitation in last the 5 years (e.g. police records, court records etc.)?

In England and Wales crime is being measured based on Police Recorded Crime and the British Crime Survey. The Police Recorded Crime is based on figures supplied by the policy to the Home Office and it covers crimes reported and recorded by the police. The British Crime Survey is a victimisation survey focusing on the households in England and the Wales, asking a selection of people of crimes they have been victims to. Although being a large survey of a representative sample of people and providing a reliable measure of the extent of victimisation and national trends over times it has some serious defects regarding taking into account child victims. The survey included people only over the age of 16 and it is only recently in 2009 that it was opened up to the ages of 10-15 years old. In addition another major defect is the scope of the survey questions which are limited to the household and therefore not covering crimes carried out in institutions, such as care homes and prisons, and in the workplace. Nevertheless, it is still highly regarded within the UK.

According the statistics of a large NSPCC research on child abuse:

“17,727 sexual crimes against children under 16 were recorded in England and Wales in 2010/11.

32% of all sexual crimes (54,982 sexual crimes in total) recorded in England and Wales in 2010/11 were sexual crimes against children under 16.

In 2010/11 the police in England and Wales also recorded 146 offences of abuse of a position of trust involving a child under 18.

More than one third (38%) of all rapes recorded by the police in England and Wales in 2010/11 were committed against under 16 years of age”<sup>226</sup>

In total, 202 victims of child trafficking have been identified over the period 1 January to 15 September 2011, from 36 countries, for different purposes including sexual exploitation and domestic servitude. <sup>227</sup> This figure includes referrals made to the National Referral

Mechanism and referrals received by the Child Trafficking Advice and Information Line (CTAIL), operated by the NSPCC.

It should be highlighted that these statistics numbers are merely an indication of the reported offences. Several other factors, usually not in the hands of the victim or the state, play a crucial part in the criminal justice procedure. Many crimes go unreported as the victims might not realise that they have been victimized, they do not trust the police or that nobody will believe them.<sup>228</sup> In the case of children this problem is even more prominent due to their vulnerable nature and psychology. The government, in its response to the Stern Review gathered that according to statistics 89 per cent of rapes go unreported<sup>229</sup>, while 38% of victims of serious sexual assault since the age of 16 tell no-one about their experience<sup>230</sup>. Some 3.2 million women in England and Wales have been sexually assaulted at some point since the age of 16<sup>231</sup>, and 38 % of all rapes recorded by the police are committed against children under 16 years of age<sup>232</sup>.

Of the small number of offences that are reported even less are being investigated. In the investigation process the efficient involvement of the police is key. Evidence is being destroyed and witnesses may decide not to come forward. Furthermore even if an incident is investigated the chances of the prosecution moving forward, depends on whether there is a strong evidentiary support and a conviction is most likely to be granted. In October 2012, the Director of Public Prosecutions, Keir Starmer QC, admitted the failings of the justice system's approach to sexual exploitation and called for a comprehensive restructuring of the Crown Prosecution Services targeting at raising the number of convictions relating to sex grooming.<sup>233</sup>

iv. Are there any promotional campaigns in the State so far regarding these issues?

Promotional Campaigns regarding children themselves and children's rights takes a wide form and variation. On one level promotional campaigns are governmental campaigns based on policies. However there also exists campaigns around the country which are implemented locally.

The United Kingdom promotes the learning of Information Technology in school, there exists a wide range of websites designed solely for children. These websites contain child-friendly information on children's rights as well as suggestions of other safe websites that can be accessed. An example is www.childline.org.uk<sup>234</sup>. It includes a message board, requesting access to a counsellor, online chat and an 'explore' feature on the following topics: bullying, sexual health, your rights.

TALK to Frank is another promotional campaign by the state regarding drug and drug use by children and young people. FRANK provides a friendly, confidential and non-judgemental service to anyone wanting help, information or advice about drugs. It is available 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. It is a free service and operated by fully trained advisers. FRANK aims to give young people the skills and confidence needed to reject drugs and offer parents the information they need to bring up the topic with their children. The talk to frank campaign is being promoted by the home office on their website <sup>235</sup> and it is also available locally.

In many areas, the Local Safeguarding Children's Board exists. It has a 'responsibility to safeguard and promote the welfare of children and young people <sup>236</sup>as well as links all the agencies involved in working with children, young people and families in the local areas. In Leicestershire, urgent referrals can be made by professionals and members of the public if there are worried about a child. This is done through the 'Electronic Agency Referral form'.

<sup>237</sup> It is a secure website used to report concerns regarding a child or young person to the Central Duty Service electronically.

As a response to the Stern Review, a report by Baroness Vivien Stern CBE into how rape complaints are handled by public authorities in English and Wales, the Department of Health launched an awareness-raising campaign in November 2010 on violence against women and children, targeting health professional and patients.<sup>238</sup> It urges practitioners to notice signs of violence, including rape and sexual assault of women and children. The NHS Choices website in support of this attempt tried to improve access to information for the public by gathering all essential information on violence and abuse in its website.

In September - November 2011 the government re-ran a campaign of February - March 2010 regarding teenage relationship abuse as part of the Violence Against women and girls Action Plan which was published in 8 March 2010. Extensive advertising on youth TV stations, in cinemas, on posters in schools, shopping and leisure centres and online took place. The campaign aimed to educate teenagers and to make them re-access their view of acceptable violence and abuse. It also aimed at directing them to third party support and advice. A guide for parents and carers was produced as part of the campaign alerting the tell-signs to look out for a teenage being in an abusive relationship and advice on how to approach children was included. <sup>239</sup> A website with comprehensive information was also launched as part of the campaign while short video clips were featured in it. In addition, documents advising schools and students were distributed. A similar new campaign focusing on rape and sexual assault of teenagers has been launch on March 2012. The campaign focuses on the ages of 13 to 18 years old. What is new is that it gives an online portal of discussion for teenagers with their peers.

The ‘Cut Them Free’ campaign is an initiative to raise awareness of the sexual exploitation of children which the specific focus on getting ‘all police forces across England and Wales focused on tackling this appalling crime’<sup>240</sup>. By taking advantage of the Police Commissioner elections, Barnado’s aims to put pressure on election candidates via mobilised voters. The candidates are called to sign the statement “I support Barnado’s campaign to cut children free from sexual exploitation and if elected will take the necessary steps to tackle this abuse within my local Police and Crime Plan". National celebrities such as Brenda Blethyn and Alex Jones support the campaign.

In November 2011 the National Working Group for Sexually Exploited Children and Young People and The Children's Society developed a national "Say Something If You See Something" campaign focusing on the problem of hotels being used as venues for the sexual exploitation of young people. A part of the campaign talks in conferences took place such as in April 2012 in a conference organised by Just Whistle where talk was given on the campaign for the hospitality industry and a review of the work done so far was given.

In October 2012, a huge scandal erupted regarding one of the biggest media personalities in the UK, namely Jimmy Saville who as it has been revealed was a paedophile who according to the police's belief used his position to abuse hundreds of children across the country. He was an eccentric DJ, TV host and prominent charity worker who was given a papal knighthood by Pope John Paul II in 1990 because of his charity work and who died in October 2011. The police and the BBC are now conducting formal investigations into the allegations. It is believed that Jimmy Saville sexually abused over 200 children in a 40 year period span. It is alleged that suspicions existed throughout that period of time and claims were dropped due to the position of the perpetrator. The BBC Corporation and its administration are under severe criticism. The BBC has announced two inquiries regarding the abuse claims and a review into its current corporate sexual harassment policies. In addition an independent inquiry. This scandal raises further questions which were illustrated by the Guardian you took the time to publish comments of its reader.<sup>241</sup> These questions included as to whether institutions such as the BBC, the NHS and voluntary and charitable organisations did not take any action regarding rumours and allegations earlier. In addition questions are raised with regards to paedophiles in general in all parts of society and how to deal with paedophile behaviour on a wider level. Last but not least, it was noticed that the burden of protecting children from sexual abuse has primarily fallen on the shoulders of voluntary organisations and charities which are extremely underfunded.

v. How is the children's perspective represented in the law making process?

Article 12 of the UNCRC grants a child who is capable of forming a view the right to express that view freely in all matters affecting him or her; and these views should be given due weight in accordance with the age and maturity of the child. In the UK law the right is covered partially by Section 157 of the Education and Skills Act 2008, enabling children to have their voices heard in schools and by the Children Act.

The introduction of the 2004 Children Act has provided the legislative framework for taking forward the 2003 Every Child Matters and the 2007 Children's Plan, and these have helped change the way local and national government, and other organisations, work with children. The Children Act 2004 created an Office of Child Commissioner of England, a non-departmental public body, whose main function is to speak on behalf of children in all devolved parts of the UK and promote their views and interests. According to Office, their mission is:

“to use our powers and independence to ensure that the views of children and young people are routinely asked for, listened to and that outcomes for children improve over time. We will do this in partnership with others, by bringing children and young people into the heart of the decision-making process to increase understanding of their best interests.”<sup>242</sup>

In 2001 the first under 18s were given opportunity to present their views and opinions on the office of Children's Rights Commissioner before the Joint Committee of Human Rights, as a part of the campaign Right Here, Right Now, as a result of ceaseless lobbying by CRAE.<sup>243</sup>

The Department for Education has provided a grant for 2011/13 to the British Youth Council, a charity helping to empower young people, representing their views to local and the central government, to support young people's voice and involvement in local and national decision making.<sup>244</sup> In order to improve the negative image of children, which was criticised by the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child in 2008<sup>245</sup>, a part of the Government funding was given to the British Youth Council to support a small number of youth representatives to represent the views of young people in the media<sup>246</sup>. These general efforts are applauded and they might be trickling down to the issue of children sexual abuse, strengthening children voices.

Since 2010 Children Trust Board are obliged to consult with children when discussing their Children and Young People's plan and the plan itself has to be issued in language that would make it accessible to children. On national level the Government Code of Practice on Consultations recommends to make consultation documents available in a "young persons version" so that youth is encouraged to participate.<sup>247</sup>

Existence of the National Participation Forum offers another opportunity for young people to get involved in shaping their future. They have produced An Equal Place at the Table for Children and Young People, a document outlining barriers young people need to overcome when trying to get involved in the society and suggesting methods of changing the current situation and supporting children participation.<sup>248</sup>

Existence of the UK Youth Parliament provides opportunities for 11-18 year-olds to use their voice in creative ways to bring about social change.<sup>249</sup> The charity is run by young people, who are democratically elected to represent their constituency. Over 500,000 young people vote in the elections each year, which are held in at least 90% of constituencies.<sup>250</sup>

According to the research on Children's Participation in decision-making conducted by the Children's Rights Alliance: 92 per cent of organisations investigated believed that children's involvement in decision-making had increased over the last five years and over two-thirds of organisations had a written policy or strategy to support participation of children.<sup>251</sup>

Another example where children's views have been represented is from the Munro Report, whereby it is clearly stated that in putting the report together, children and young people partly contributed to the work themselves.<sup>252</sup> It is stated in the report that the Government agrees with Professor Munro that there will continue to be an important role for external inspection. Ofsted is designing a new inspection framework that will focus on the effectiveness of help given to children and young people, putting the experiences of children, young people and their families at the heart of the inspection system. In line with Professor Munro's recommendation, the new inspections will be conducted on an unannounced basis to minimise the bureaucratic burden associated with preparation for inspection.

CRAE, the Children's Rights Alliance for England has made comprehensive submissions each time the UK has been examined by the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child – in 1995, 2002 and 2008. For the 2008 examination, they supported and encouraged children and young people in England to carry out children's rights investigation and submit their own report to the UN. Get ready for Geneva was a three year project that enabled children to build knowledge about their rights and take an active part in the reporting process. Children could complete surveys and post their comments on an interactive website, elect "children rights champions" to influence local decision making and improve their lives.

vi. Who are the main national Non-Governmental Organisations working on the topic of children's rights? Does the State regulate (or not) their involvement in law making process?

Non-governmental organisations (NGO) have played a significant role in shaping children's rights policies in the UK. Before the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child meets with Government, to examine written evidence, it holds private discussions with non-governmental organisations (NGOs) and with children and young people. CRAE co-ordinates the NGO England alternative report to the UN Committee by submitting a written report highlighting areas of concern, as well as significant progress in implementing the Convention on the Rights of the Child.<sup>253</sup>

UNICEF UK is the world's leading organisation working to promote and protect children's rights around the globe for over 60 years. The work of UNICEF has been guided by the Convention on the Rights of the Child which states that specific role of the transnational organisation in its capacity as the UN body responsible for the rights of the child. They are currently campaigning for the protection of children from the effects of climate change and the implementation of a so called “Robin Hood Tax” on the financial sector which could raise considerable amounts of money to be used to help tackle poverty in the UK among other objectives.

The ROCK Coalition is an initiative of the CRAE in collaboration with UNICEF UK and Save the Children. It brings together organisation and individuals working on the area of children’s rights to consider how the Convention of the Rights of the Child can form part of the national legislation through a Bill of Rights and to pressure the UK government. In their attempts they published ‘Why incorporate? Making rights a reality for every child’ in 2012.

The Coram’s children’s Legal Centre is involved in research and policy making as well as publicising materials and providing training.<sup>254</sup> It undertakes research and consultancy in the areas of child rights, child law and policy both in the UK and abroad. The main projects over the last two years have covered child protection, juvenile justice, child employment and child protection in complex emergencies. In 2006, a research project was completed on complaints from children to the Independent Police Complaints Commission. Prior to this research, very little attention had been paid to the unique situation of child complainants or to the issues which arise for children in making complaints against police officers.

Child victims experience unique concerns and challenges at all stages of the criminal process. In 2010, Coram Children's Legal Centre completed a research project on the protection of child victims, which arose out of participation in a two-year EU-funded multi-country project which aimed at establishing best practice in meeting the needs of child victims and witnesses. The project was coordinated by La Voix De l’Enfant.

Coram Children's Legal Centre's aims to influence policy developments and promote the implementation of children's rights in the UK by publishing policy papers including responses to government consultations on children's rights issues, and submissions to domestic and international bodies on key children's rights issues. A list of their responses to consultation on children’s rights and equality can be found on their website.<sup>255</sup>

The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children (NSPCC) is one of the most well established NGOs in the UK dealing with the rights of the child and its work is widely recognised by the government. It is the only voluntary organisation with the ability to initiate proceedings to protect children under the terms of the Children Act 1989. It offers a number of services to children and practitioners, including a number of helplines and is acting as a liaison with local statutory agencies.

Barnardo's is another well established British charity fighting for the rights of the child for over a century now. It was founded in 1886 by Thomas John Barnardo to care for vulnerable children and young people and as of today it is spending over £190 million each year. The Charity has included child exploitation in its mandate for almost two decades.

The Children Are Unbeatable! Alliance is also a major campaigner and lobbyist the government with regards to children's rights and in particular corporal punishment. The Alliance was established in 1998. They are campaigning "for the UK to satisfy human rights obligation by modernising the law on assault to afford children the same protection as adults"<sup>256</sup>. Through regular newsletters reporting on the progress made and a plethora of information on corporal punishment, campaign material and information for an individual on how to approach and lobby a Member of Parliament, is regarded a very active and trust-worthy alliance.

The Children's Rights Alliance for England (CRAE) is major organisation fighting for the implementation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child in the UK. It protects children's rights by lobbying the government and others. In addition it offers legal information, raises awareness of children's human rights and contacts researches to children's the access of rights. It has produced bestseller children's books informing children and parents about the Convention on the Rights of the Child. CRAE also produces the State of Children's Rights in England- a CRAE annual publication<sup>257</sup> which included an in-depth analysis as to whether law, policy and practices in England comply with the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child recommendations, which was a useful tool in conducting the present report. Several changes have been made due to CRAE government lobby and alerting the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child. This includes local authorities having to have regard to the Convention on the Rights of the Child in all stages of their plans for local child services. The government took on board many of the CRAE's recommendations regarding changes to the Children Act 2004 which created the body of the Children's Commissioner and the independent review of that body. In addition due to CRAE pressure the Government promised to transform the Office of Children's Commissioner into an independent human rights body and committed to give 'due consideration' to the Convention on the Rights of the Child when adoption of new laws and policies.<sup>258</sup>

IV OTHER

There are no other legal or political issues that might be relevant in the United Kingdom for the purpose of the report.

V CONCLUSION

In a nutshell, sexual violence in child victims may take various shapes or forms. This can include child prostitution, child pornography, grooming, and solicitation of children for sexual purposes, child exploitation, causing a child to witness sexual abuse and many more. With the advances in technology and the widespread use of the internet, child victims may experience abuse face-to-face but also through using the internet. The main national UK legal framework dealing with sexual abuse is contained within the Sexual Offences Act 2003, forming part of criminal law. With it being such a recent piece of legislation, it encompasses a wide range of activities that can fall within the definition of sexual- as previously discussed above.

Thus, on one hand, it is fair to say that the UK national legislative does provide an adequate legal framework within criminal law dealing with offenders in providing sanctioning measures and imprisonment for those found to have been involved in a sexual activity with a child. Notably, S 16-24, which regulates abuses committed by persons in a position of trust. However, where on one side there are legal frameworks, on the other, the protection of child victims, on the other, also needs to be well balanced. Protection of the child victims in the UK can include being placed with a carer or with social care, special measures to assist child witnesses can be implemented in court and in some cases the identity of the child may not be disclosed for overall public interest;<sup>259</sup> to name a few. However, through case-law examples, it can be noted that not all of these special measures work adequately, thus there is still a gap in terms of ensuring that these rules are being abided by.

Ultimately, although there exists very good legislative frameworks, which might have been extremely well drafted, the effectiveness of such depends on its implementation within local council and safeguards put in place to identify and combat sexual abuse towards children. States' responsibility to protect children while in the care of individuals or institutions<sup>260</sup> are outlined in Article 19 (1) of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, and Article 19 (2) outlines the protective and preventative measures that should be taken.<sup>261</sup> Although these standards are not binding in the UK, they are of vital importance. However, as noted above, there have been instances where there has been a fundamental lack in the quality of services provided by some institutions e.g. The Rochdale grooming scandal. Another example is the case of Baby P, as discussed.

Another factor for the effectiveness of the legal framework and to reduce the risks of children being sexually abused is as stated by the ROCK Coalition, that a more comprehensive framework is needed for children to understand and recognise their rights and entitlement.<sup>262</sup> Hence why, the work of NGOs in the area of child abuse, child protection also forms an important part in shaping towards a change in the law, both nationally and on an international level, many of which also lobby for the implementation of international conventions within domestic law, for example, the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. For example, NSPCC is able to initiate proceedings to protect children under the terms of the Children Act 1989. CRAE, on the other hand, is fighting for the implementation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child in the UK. It protects children's rights by lobbying the government and others. In addition it offers legal information, raises awareness of children's human rights and contacts researchers to children's access of rights.

To conclude, there exists a number of positive points in relation to the national legislative framework of the UK, for example, Sexual Offences Act 2003 – where the act places emphasis on those who exploit children whilst committing a criminal act. However, there are also negative criticisms, in particular, on the issue of consent within the Sexual Offences Act 2003 as to the interpretation and definition of it, which has caused a lot of debate.

The fact that the UK has suggested to one again reform the 2003 Sexual offences act is evidence of a willingness to improve the system.
